NEW CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

SUPPLEMENT 2010

NEW CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

SUPPLEMENT 2010

NEW CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

SUPPLEMENT 2010

VOLUME 1
A-I

VOLUME 2
J-Z

INDEX

in association with

THE CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA • WASHINGTON, D.C.

GALE
CENGAGE Learning

Detroit • New York • San Francisco • New Haven, Conn • Waterville, Maine • London

GALE
CENGAGE Learning

New Catholic Encyclopedia Supplement 2010

Robert L. Fastiggi, Executive Editor

© 2010 by The Catholic University of America. Published by Gale, Cengage Learning.

ALL RIGHTS RESERVED. No part of this work covered by the copyright herein may be reproduced, transmitted, stored, or used in any form or by any means graphic, electronic, or mechanical, including but not limited to photocopying, recording, scanning, digitizing, taping, Web distribution, information networks, or information storage and retrieval systems, except as permitted under Section 107 or 108 of the 1976 United States Copyright Act, without the prior written permission of the publisher.

For product information and technology assistance, contact us at Gale Customer Support, 1-800-877-4253.
For permission to use material from this text or product, submit all requests online at www.cengage.com/permissions.
Further permissions questions can be emailed to permissionrequest@cengage.com

While every effort has been made to ensure the reliability of the information presented in this publication, Gale, a part of Cengage Learning, does not guarantee the accuracy of the data contained herein. Gale accepts no payment for listing; and inclusion in the publication of any organization, agency, institution, publication, service, or individual does not imply endorsement of the editors or publisher. Errors brought to the attention of publisher and verified to the satisfaction of the publisher will be corrected in future editions.

EDITORIAL DATA PRIVACY POLICY: Does this product contain information about you as an individual? If so, for more information about our editorial data privacy policies, please see our Privacy Statement at www.gale.cengage.com.

Gale
27500 Drake Rd.
Farmington Hills, MI, 48331-3535

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS CATALOGING-IN-PUBLICATION DATA

New Catholic encyclopedia supplement 2010 / Robert L. Fastiggi, executive editor.
p. cm.
Includes bibliographical references and index.
ISBN 978-1-4144-7588-2 (set) — ISBN 978-1-4144-7589-9 (v. 1) — ISBN 978-1-4144-7590-5 (v. 2)
1. Catholic Church—Encyclopedias. I. Fastiggi, Robert L.

BX841.N44 Suppl. 2010
282.03—dc22 2009031096

ISBN-13: 978-1-4144-7588-2 (set) ISBN-10: 1-4144-7588-8 (set)
ISBN-13: 978-1-4144-7589-9 (vol. 1) ISBN-10: 1-4144-7589-6 (vol. 1)
ISBN-13: 978-1-4144-7590-5 (vol. 2) ISBN-10: 1-4144-7590-X (vol. 2)

This title is also available as an e-book:
ISBN-13: 978-1-4144-6414-5 ISBN-10: 1-4144-6414-2
Contact your Gale, a part of Cengage Learning sales representative for ordering information.

Printed in the United States of America
1 2 3 4 5 6 7 14 13 12 11 10

EDITORIAL BOARD

Executive Editor
Robert L. Fastiggi
Professor of Systematic Theology
Sacred Heart Major Seminary
Detroit, Michigan

Associate Editors
Rev. Joseph W. Koterski, SJ
Professor
Department of Philosophy
Fordham University, New York

Frank J. Coppa
Professor of History
St. John's University, New York

Director of The Catholic University of America Press
David J. McGonagle

EDITORIAL AND PRODUCTION STAFF

PROJECT EDITOR

Douglas A. Dentino

EDITORIAL TECHNICAL SUPPORT

Amanda D. Sams

MANUSCRIPT EDITORS

Judith Clinebell
Tony Coulter
Judith Culligan
Laurie J. Edwards
Peter Jaskowiak
Elizabeth Shaw
Ann Shurgin

PROOFREADERS

Deb Baker
Judith Clinebell
Tony Coulter
Judith Culligan
Carol Holmes
Amy Unterburger

INDEXER

Factiva, Inc.

PRODUCT DESIGN

Pamela A.E. Galbreath

IMAGING

John Watkins

GRAPHIC ART

Mapping Specialists
Pre-PressPMG

PERMISSIONS

Dean Dauphinais
Kelly Quin

COMPOSITION

Gary Leach

EDITORIAL DIRECTOR

Hélène Potter

PUBLISHER

Jay Flynn

CONTENTS

VOLUME 1

Foreword xi
Preface xiii
List of Articles xv
List of Contributors xxix
Abbreviations xlvii
New Catholic Encyclopedia Supplement 2010 A–I 1

VOLUME 2

Foreword xi
Preface xiii
Abbreviations xv
New Catholic Encyclopedia Supplement 2010 J–Z 573
Index 1099

FOREWORD

The publication of this 2010 Supplement to the New Catholic Encyclopedia (NCE) is a cause of great joy to me as I conclude my tenure as President of The Catholic University of America. This supplement focuses on "Modern History and the Church," and it also includes new articles and updates on topics of contemporary Catholic interest, along with fresh coverage of the new "Saints" and "Blesseds" of the Church. Like the 2009 Supplement, it is being published in both electronic and print form, and it continues the fine collaboration of Gale, Cengage Learning with The Catholic University of America Press. I am happy to know that plans are already underway for supplements focusing on Literature, Music, and the Arts (2011) and Philosophy and Ethics (2012).

Since becoming President of The Catholic University of America in 1998, I have grown even more aware of the important role of the Catholic Church in the events of history, in both the United States and the world. In an age of instant communication, people of all faiths are interested in the role of the Catholic Church in public affairs and culture. This 2010 NCE Supplement helps to situate many contemporary questions and controversies in the light of Catholic history. The editors have recruited a team of eminent scholars to cover the central personalities, events and topics of modern Catholic history. In my opinion, they carry out their work with objectivity, accuracy and balance. The present volume establishes the truth of the old adage that we cannot understand the present without a clear understanding of the past.

The Second Vatican Council reminded us that the Church is "sancta simul et semper purificanda"—"at the same time holy and always in need of purification" (Lumen gentium, 8). In light of this, the authors of the present volume do not shy away from the shadows of Catholic history. On the other hand, many Catholic men and women of the past have responded to God's grace with heroic virtue and are justly honored as exemplars of holiness. The new "Saints" and "Blesseds" covered within the present volume show that, in spite of human weakness and failure, authentic faith, hope and charity is possible.

I wish to thank the editors of the 2010 Supplement—Dr. Robert Fastiggi, Fr. Joseph Koterski, S.J. and Dr. Frank Coppa—for their dedicated work. Likewise, I express my gratitude to Hélène Potter and Douglas Dentino of Gale, Cengage Learning, along with Jay Flynn, the publisher. I am especially grateful to Dr. David McGonagle, the Director of The Catholic University of America Press, who has insured that the New Catholic Encyclopedia will continue as a preeminent source of Catholic scholarship and information.

Very Rev. David M. O'Connell, C.M., J.C.D.
President,
The Catholic University of America

PREFACE

This 2010 Supplement to the New Catholic Encyclopedia (NCE) follows the approach established by the 2009 Supplement: Special attention is given to a particular theme while new and updated entries appear on other topics of historical and contemporary interest. Following the successful focus on Science and the Church (2009), the present 2010 volume concentrates on Modern History and the Church. Plans are underway for future supplements on Literature, Music, and the Arts (2011) and Philosophy and Ethics (2012).

The Catholic University of America Press first published the New Catholic Encyclopedia in 15 volumes in 1967, followed by four supplemental volumes between 1972 and 1995. In 2001, a Jubilee Volume was issued marking the year 2000, which was published by the Gale Group of Farmington Hills, Michigan in editorial partnership with The Catholic University of America Press. This Jubilee Volume covered the people, issues and events of the Catholic Church since the Second Vatican Council with a special focus on the pontificate of Pope John Paul II. It also prepared the way for the second edition of the NCE, which was published in 2003. This second edition included many new articles and revisions of the original entries from the 1967 volumes.

In the summer of 2006, planning for new supplements of the NCE began with an eye towards an electronic format. Cengage Learning (the successor to the Gale Group), together with The Catholic University of America Press, decided to combine the thematic approach of the 2001 Jubilee Volume with the necessary updating and revision of prior entries. A commitment was made to have annual supplements in order to have more frequent updating and revisions. Annual supplements also facilitate the inclusion of more new topics that touch on Catholic life, thought and practice. In 2009, the first supplement of this revised format was published, in both electronic and print form, with a thematic focus on "Science and the Church."

The present 2010 volume concentrates on Modern History and the Church, which is subdivided into Early Modern History (1500–1789) and Later Modern (since 1789). In addition to updated entries on these periods, there is also an updated entry on Early Church History and a completely re-written article on Medieval Church History. Readers will also find many entries dealing with Catholic and/or papal reactions to various events of modern history, such as the American Revolution, the American Civil War, World War I, World War II and the War in Iraq. Biographical entries appear on significant historical figures, such as Garibaldi, Stalin, Mussolini, Charles de Gaulle and John F. Kennedy. Important issues and movements are also treated, with updated or new entries on topics such as NATO, Nazism, anti-Judaism, Jewish-Catholic relations and the legal history of Church-State relations in the USA.

Just as the 2009 volume had a secondary focus on the Church in the United States, the 2010 supplement has a secondary focus on the new "Saints" and "Blesseds" of the Catholic Church. The entries on these newly canonized or beatified men and women frequently relate to Modern Catholic History because of connections with events such as the "Spanish Civil War" and the anti-Catholic persecutions in Mexico during the 1920s. There is also an article on the 800 men recognized as the "Martyrs of Otranto," executed for their faith in 1480.

As in earlier supplements, the editors realized that the ongoing life of the Catholic Church necessitates coverage of new ecclesial documents, personalities and matters of emerging interest. Thus, new entries are included in the present volume on Anglicanorum coetibus, the constitution for Anglicans wishing to enter into full Catholic communion, and Benedict XVI's encyclical, Caritas in veritate. Recently deceased Catholic figures, such as Stanley Jaki, OSB and Cardinal Pio Laghi, are also given coverage. In addition, the theological articles on the Blessed Virgin Mary have been either revised or completely re-written, and an entirely new article on Lutheranism appears. Other revised or new entries are found on topics such as the mandatum required for professors of Catholic theology and the 1990 papal constitution for Catholic colleges and universities, Ex corde Ecclesiae.

For the 2010 supplement, special thanks must be given to Associate Editor, Dr. Frank Coppa of St. John's University. His expertise in Modern Catholic History, especially the history of the papacy, was invaluable for the special focus of the present volume. The contributions of Fr. Joseph Koterski, S.J. of Fordham University and Dr. David McGonagle of The Catholic University of America Press also deserve much recognition. Finally, many thanks must go to Douglas Dentino, the Project Editor, and Hèlëne Potter, the Director of New Product Development of Cengage Learning. Without their help, the present volume would not have been possible.

Editorial Note: In an effort to focus on topics that are of interest to our readers, we have created a mailbox where you can email us your ideas for topics that you would like us to cover, or comment on those we have already published. We welcome your participation in the re-forging of the New Catholic Encyclopedia. The mailbox address is:

Gale.new.catholic@Cengage .com.

Robert L. Fastiggi
Executive Editor

LIST OF ARTICLES

SUPPLEMENT 2010

A

ACOSTA ZURITA, DARÍO, BL.
Laurie J. Edwards (2010)

ACT OF SUPREMACY (1534)
Tracey-Anne Cooper (2010)

ACTA APOSTOLICAE SEDIS
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)

ACTION FRANÇAISE
Gregory B. Sadler (2010)
Adrien Dansette (2003)

ADDAI AND MARI, ANAPHORA OF
Most Rev. Sarhad Jammo (2010)

ADENAUER, KONRAD
Roy Domenico (2010)

ADOWA, BATTLE OF
Roy Domenico (2010)

AFTERLIFE: I. PRIMITIVE SOCIETIES
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)
Stanley Diamond (2003)

AFTERLIFE: II. THE BIBLE
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)
Henry P. Köster (2003)

AFTERLIFE: III. ANCIENT GREECE AND ROME
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)
Gabriel Michel Sanders (2003)

AFTERLIFE: IV. ANCIENT EGYPT AND MESOPOTAMIA
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)

AFTERLIFE: V. PERSIA, INDIA, AND CHINA
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)

AFTERLIFE: VI. JUDAISM
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)

AFTERLIFE: VII. ISLAM
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)

AFTERLIFE: VIII. CHRISTIANITY
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)

AGGIORNAMENTO
Raymond F. Bulman (2010)

ALBERIONE, JAMES, BL.
Laurie J. Edwards (2010)

ALLENBY, EDMUND
Susan A. Maurer (2010)

ALLENDE, SALVADOR
Miguel A. León (2010)

ALLOCUTION, PAPAL
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)

ALPANDEIRE, LEOPOLDO DE, BL.
Laurie J. Edwards (2010)

ALPHONSUS DE LIGUORI, ST.
Rev. Sabatino Majorano, CSSR (2010)
Rev. Louis Vereecke (2003)

ALUMBRADOS (ILLUMINATI)
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)
Rev. Thomas K. Connolly, OP (2003)

AMERICA
Richard P. Harmond (2010)

AMERICAN CIVIL WAR, PAPAL STANCE TOWARD
Richard P. Harmond (2010)

AMERICAN REVOLUTION, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH AND
Timothy A. Milford (2010)

AMERICANISM
James Hitchcock (2010)
Thomas T. McAvoy (2003)

ANACLETO GONZÁLEZ FLORES AND NINE COMPANIONS, BB.
Joseph M. Keating (2010)
Rt. Rev. James A. Magner (2003)

ANAGNI
Tracey-Anne Cooper (2010)

ANGLICANORUM COETIBUS
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)

ANTI-CATHOLICISM (UNITED STATES)
Hans L. Trefousse (2010)

ANTI-JUDAISM
Suzanne Brown-Fleming (2010)

ANTI-SEMITISM
Suzanne Brown-Fleming (2010)

APOSTOLIC DELEGATE
Frank J. Coppa (2010)

ARAFAT, YASSER
John A. Donnangelo, II (2010)

ARCHE, L'
Beth Porter (2010)

ARMY OF MARY
Mark Miravalle (2010)

ARNÁIZ BARÓN, RAFAEL, ST.
Elizabeth C. Shaw (2010)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

ASCENSIÓN DEL CORAZÓN DE JESÚS, BL.
Laurie J. Edwards (2010)

ASSOCIATION OF CATHOLIC COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES
Richard A. Yanikoski (2010)

ASSUMPTION, RELIGIOUS OF THE
EDS. (2010)
Mother Marie-Denyse Blachère, RA (2003)

ATOMIC ENERGY
Rev. Thomas J. Massaro, SJ (2010)

ATOMIC WEAPONS "NUCLEAR," HISTORY AND MORAL QUESTIONS CONCERNING
E. Christian Brugger (2010)

AUBERT, ROGER
William Roberts (2010)

AUSCHWITZ-BIRKENAU
Joseph A. Biesinger (2010)

AVE MARIA TOWN, AVE MARIA UNIVERSITY
Joseph G. Trabbic (2010)

AVENIR, L'
William Roberts (2010)

AVIAT, FRANCESCA SALESIA, ST.
Elizabeth C. Shaw (2010)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

B

BÉRULLE, PIERRE DE
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)
Rev. Antanas J. Liuima, SJ (2003)

BÜTLER, MARÍA BERNARDA, ST.
Elizabeth C. Shaw (2010)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

BADANO, CHIARA, BL.
Laurie J. Edwards (2010)

BAKER, DAVID AUGUSTINE
James Hitchcock (2010)

BALICKI, JAN (JOHN), BL.
Laurie J. Edwards (2010)

BALTIMORE CATECHISM
Lara Vapnek (2010)

BATIFFOL, PIERRE
Mathijs Lamberigts (2010)
Rev. Francis Xavier Murphy, CSSR (2003)

BATTHYÁNY-STRATTMANN, LÁSZLÓ, BL.
Laurie J. Edwards (2010)

BATTISTA DA VARANO, CAMILLA, ST.
Laurie J. Edwards (2010)

BEATIFICATION
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)
Rev. Austin Edward Green, OP (2003)

BEAURAING (BELGIUM), APPARITIONS OF OUR LADY OF
Rev. Neil J. Roy (2010)

BELTRAME QUATTROCCHI, LUIGI AND MARIA CORSINI, BB.
Oswald Sobrino (2010)

BENEDICT OF NURSIA, ST.
Robert W. Shaffern (2010)

BENEDICT XIV-I AND BENEDICT XIV-II, ANTIPOPES
Michael Wolfe (2010)

BENEDICT XVI, POPE
Tracey Rowland (2010)
Tracey Rowland (2009)

BENEDICTINES, OLIVETAN
EDS. (2010)
Rev. Giorgio Picasso, OSBOliv (2003)

BERGSON, HENRI LOUIS
Rev. Thomas M. King, SJ (2010)
Idella J. Gallagher (2003)

BERKENBROCK, ALBERTINA, BL.
Oswald Sobrino (2010)

BERNADETTE OF LOURDES, ST.
William Roberts (2010)

BERNARD OF CORLEONE, ST.
Elizabeth C. Shaw (2010)
Rev. Thaddeus MacVicar, OFMCap (2003)

BESSETTE, ANDRÉ, ST.
EDS. (2010)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

BETANCUR (BETHANCOURT), PEDRO DE SAN JOSÉ (PETER OF ST. JOSEPH), ST.
Elizabeth C. Shaw (2010)
Rev. Lázaro I. Lamadrid, OFM

BEYZYM, JAN (JOHN), BL.
Oswald Sobrino (2010)

BIRAGHI, LUIGI, BL.
Elizabeth Inserra (2010)

BISMARCK, OTTO VON
Dolores Augustine (2010)

BLACK MASS
Massimo Introvigne (2010)

BOCCARDO, LUIGI, BL.
Elizabeth Inserra (2010)

BOLSHEVISM
Mauricio Borrero (2010)

BONHOMME, PIERRE, BL.
Elizabeth Inserra (2010)

BONIFACIO (DI PIRANO), FRANCESCO GIOVANNI, BL.
Elizabeth Inserra (2010)

BORGIA, CESARE
Michael Wolfe (2010)

BOSSILKOV, EVGENIJ, BL.
EDS. (2010)
Rev. Giorgio Eldarov, OFMConv (2003)

BOURGET, IGNACE
Rev. Neil J. Roy (2010)
Rev. Léon J. Pouliot, SJ (2003)

BOY SCOUTS
Timothy A. Milford (2010)

BOYS TOWN
Robert R. Tomes (2010)

BRADER, MARÍA CARIDAD, BL.
Elizabeth Inserra (2010)

BRANDO, MARIA CRISTINA, BL.
Elizabeth Inserra (2010)

BREVIARY
Rev. Jonathan Black (2010)

BUCKLEY JR., WILLIAM F.
James Gaston (2010)

BUDDHISM
Charles B. Jones (2010)
Rev. Francis V. Tiso (2010)
Charles B. Jones (2003)
Rev. Antonio S. Rosso, OFM (2003)

BUFALO, GASPARE DEL, ST.
EDS. (2010)
Rev. Andrew J. Pollack, CPPS (2003)

C

CAESAROPAPISM
Kenneth Pennington (2010)

CAGOTS
Christopher Jones (2010)

CAJETAN (TOMMASO DE VIO)
Rev. Jared Wicks, SJ (2010)
Rev. James A. Weisheipl, OP (2003)

CALL TO ACTION (CONFERENCE)
Russell Shaw (2010)

CANDELARIA OF ST. JOSEPH, BL.
Elizabeth Inserra (2010)

CANONIZATION OF SAINTS (HISTORY AND PROCEDURE)
Rev. Msgr. Robert J. Sarno (2010)

CANOSSA
Tracey-Anne Cooper (2010)

CARDINAL NEWMAN SOCIETY
Patrick Reilly (2010)

CARDINAL SECRETARY OF STATE
William Roberts (2010)
Salvador Miranda (2003)

CARDINAL VIRTUES
Rev. Romanus Cessario, OP (2010)

CARITAS IN VERITATE
Mark S. Latkovic (2010)

CARLEN, CLAUDIA
Msgr. Charles Kosanke (2010)

CASEY, SOLANUS
Br. Leo E. Wollenweber, OFMCap (2010)

CASSANT, JOSEPH-MARIE, BL.
Kimberly M. Henkel (2010)
Rev. Chrysogonus Waddell, OCSO (2003)

CASTRO, FIDEL RUZ
Elaine Carey (2010)

CATANOSO, GAETANO (CAJETAN), ST.
Kevin M. Clarke (2010)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

CATECHISMS
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)
Gerard S. Sloyan (2003)

CATHARI
Wanda Zemler-Cizewski (2010)
Yves Dossat (2003)

CATHOLIC ANSWERS
Oswald Sobrino (2010)

CATHOLIC LEAGUE
Msgr. Robert J. Batule (2010)

CATHOLIC WORKER MOVEMENT
Richard J. Wolff (2010)

CATHOLIC YOUTH ORGANIZATION
Oswald Sobrino (2010)

CATHOLIC-MUSLIM DIALOGUE
Rev. Thomas Michel, SJ (2010)

CAVOUR, GUSTAVO BENSO DI
Roland Sarti (2010)

CELESTINA OF THE MOTHER OF GOD, BL.
Elizabeth Inserra (2010)

CELIBACY, CLERICAL, HISTORY OF
Rev. Emery de Gaal (2010)
Very Rev. Philippe C. Delhaye (2003)

CENTURIONE BRACELLI, VIRGINIA, ST.
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)
Kevin M. Clarke (2010)

CERIOLI, PAOLA ELISABETTA (COSTANZA), ST.
Mark J. DeCelles (2010)
Rev. Vincent Anthony Lapomarda, SJ (2003)

CHAPPOTIN DE NEUVILLE, HÉLÈNE DE, BL.
Kimberly M. Henkel (2010)
Sister M. Francis of the Stigmata Condon, FMM (2003)

CHARISM
Peter S. Williamson (2010)
Rt. Rev. Ralph J. Tapia (2003)
Rev. Warren F. Dicharry, CM (2003)

CHARISMATIC RENEWAL, CATHOLIC
Susan A. Maurer (2010)

CHARLES OF AUSTRIA, BL.
Elizabeth Inserra (2010)

CHAVARA, KURIAKOSE (CYRIAC) ELIAS, BL.
EDS. (2010)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

Rev. Antony Chacko Kakkanatt, CMI (2003)

CHICHKOV, JOSAPHAT, BL.
Elizabeth Inserra (2010)

CHLUDZIŃSKA V. BORZĘCKA, CELINA, BL.
Brian Pedraza (2010)

CHURCH AND STATE IN THE UNITED STATES (LEGAL HISTORY): I. COLONIAL PERIOD
Howard Bromberg (2010)
Rev. Thomas O'Brien Hanley, SJ (2003)

CHURCH AND STATE IN THE UNITED STATES (LEGAL HISTORY): II. THE DISESTABLISHMENT PERIOD
Howard Bromberg (2010)
Matthew J. Mullaney, Jr. (2003)

CHURCH AND STATE IN THE UNITED STATES (LEGAL HISTORY): III. PERIOD OF CONFLICT
Howard Bromberg (2010)
Joseph C. Polking (2003)

CHURCH AND STATE IN THE UNITED STATES (LEGAL HISTORY): IV. SEARCH FOR SOLUTION
Howard Bromberg (2010)
Michael S. Ariens (2003)

CHURCH AND STATE IN THE UNITED STATES (LEGAL HISTORY): V. NEW CONTROVERSIES
Howard Bromberg (2010)

CHURCH, HISTORY OF: I. EARLY
Perry J. Cahall (2010)
Rev. Francis Xavier Murphy, CSSR (2003)

CHURCH, HISTORY OF: II. MEDIEVAL
Constance B. Bouchard (2010)

CHURCH, HISTORY OF: III. EARLY MODERN: 1500–1789
Frank J. Coppa (2010)
William S. Barron (2003)

CHURCH, HISTORY OF: IV. LATE MODERN: 1789–2009
William Roberts (2010)
Rev. John Francis Broderick, SJ (2003)
Frank J. Coppa (2003)

CISZEK, WALTER J.
Rev. Joseph W. Koterski, SJ (2010)

CLARKE, W. NORRIS
Rev. Joseph W. Koterski, SJ (2010)

COLD WAR AND THE PAPACY
Frank J. Coppa (2010)

COLL Y GUITART, FRANCISCO, ST.
Kevin M. Clarke (2010)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

COMBONI MISSIONARIES OF THE HEART OF JESUS
EDS. (2010)
Rev. Januarius M. Carillo, FSCJ (2003)

COMBONI, DANIELE, ST.
Kevin M. Clarke (2010)
Rev. Januarius M. Carillo, FSCJ (2003)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

COMENSOLI, GERTRUDE CATERINA, ST.
Laurie Malashanko (2010)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

COMMUNION OF SAINTS
Keith Lemna (2010)
Rev. Francis Xavier Lawlor, SJ (2003)

COMMUNISM
Rev. Joseph W. Koterski, SJ (2010)

CONCORDAT WITH GERMANY (1933)
Joseph A. Biesinger (2010)

CONSTANTINOPLE (BYZANTIUM, ISTANBUL)
Michael Wolfe (2010)
Glanville Downey (2003)

COPE, MARIANNE, BL.
Kent Wallace (2010)
Rev. Angelyn Dries, OSF (2003)

COR UNUM
Michael Andrews (2010)

CORAZÓN TÉLLEZ ROBLES, MATILDE DEL SAGRADO, BL.
Brian Pedraza (2010)

CROSS, THEOLOGY OF THE
John M. McDermott, SJ (2010)

CUAUHTLATOATZIN, JUAN DIEGO, ST.
Mark J. DeCelles (2010)
Rev. Jose Antonio Rubio (2003)

CUOMO, MARIO M.
Kevin E. Schmiesing (2010)

CURCI, CARLO MARIA
Frank J. Coppa (2010)

CURCIO, MARIA CROCIFISSA, BL.
Laurie J. Edwards (2010)

CURRAN, CHARLES
Susan A. Maurer (2010)

CZARTORYSKI, AUGUSTO, BL.
Laurie J. Edwards (2010)

D

D'ANNUNZIO, GABRIELE
Roland Sarti (2010)

DA COSTA, ALEXANDRINA MARIA, BL.
Laurie J. Edwards (2010)

DARONCH, ADÍLIO, BL.
Laurie J. Edwards (2010)

DE GAULLE, CHARLES
William Roberts (2010)

DEACONESS
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)

DEMOCRACY, CHRISTIAN
Richard J. Wolff (2010)

DEMOCRATIC PARTIES, CHRISTIAN
Roy Domenico (2010)

DENZINGER
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)

Robert L. Fastiggi (2003)

DETERMINISM
James M. Jacobs (2010)

DEVIL
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)
Rev. Louis F. Hartman, CSSR (2003)

DIOCESE
Edward Peters (2010)

DIVINE MERCY, DEVOTION TO
Timothy T. O'Donnell (2010)

DIVINE WORD, SOCIETY OF THE
EDS. (2010)
Rev. Vincent J. Fecher, SVD (2003)

DIVINI ILLIUS MAGISTRI
Curtis Hancock (2010)

DIVINIZATION (THEOSIS), DOCTRINE OF
Rev. David V. Meconi, SJ (2010)

DJIDJOV, PAVEL, BL.
Laurie J. Edwards (2010)

DONATION OF CONSTANTINE
Tracey-Anne Cooper (2010)
Walter Ullmann (2003)

DREYFUS AFFAIR
William Roberts (2010)

DUFF, FRANK
Judith Marie Gentle (2010)

DUPUIS, JACQUES
Rev. Gerald O'Collins, SJ (2010)

DURANDO, MARCANTONIO, BL.
Elizabeth Inserra (2010)

E

ECCLESIA DE EUCHARISTIA
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)

ECCLESIA DEI COMMISSION
Msgr. Arthur Burton Calkins (2010)

EDUCATION, CATHOLIC (HIGHER) IN THE UNITED STATES
James L. Heft, SM (2010)

EDUCATION, CATHOLIC (K THROUGH 12) IN THE UNITED STATES
Thomas C. Hunt (2010)

ELIA DI SAN CLEMENTE, BL.
Laurie J. Edwards (2010)

EMMERICK, ANNA KATHARINA, BL.
Kent Wallace (2010)

ERRICO, GAETANO, ST.
Elizabeth Inserra (2010)

ESCRIVÁ DE BALAGUER Y ALBÁS, JOSEMARÍA, ST.
Rev. Robert A. Gahl, Jr. (2010)
Mary Louise Maytag Kennedy (2003)

EUPHRASIA OF THE SACRED HEART OF JESUS, BL.
Laurie J. Edwards (2010)

EUROPEAN UNION AND THE PAPACY
Frank J. Coppa (2010)

EX CORDE ECCLESIAE
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)
Joseph A. Komonchak (2003)

EXCOMMUNICATION
Edward Peters (2010)
Msgr. Thomas J. Green (2003)
Rev. Francis Xavier Lawlor, SJ (2003)

F

FABRIS, EUROSIA, BL.
Laurie J. Edwards (2010)

FASCISM
Richard J. Wolff (2010)

FAWKES, GUY
William D. Griffin (2010)

FELIŃSKI, ZYGMUNT SZCZĘSNY, ST.
Laurie Malashanko (2010)

FELIX OF NICOSIA, ST.
Kevin M. Clarke (2010)
Rev. Thaddeus MacVicar, OFMCap (2003)

FELLOWSHIP OF CATHOLIC SCHOLARS
James Hitchcock (2010)

FERNANDES, BARTOLOMEU DEI MARTIRI, BL.
Laurie J. Edwards (2010)

FILIPPINI, LUCY, ST.
EDS. (2010)
Sister Margherita Frances Marchione, MPF (2003)

FINALY AFFAIR
Joyce Lazarus (2010)

FINDYSZ, WŁADYSŁAW (LADISLAUS), BL.
Neil P. Sloan (2010)

FLESCH, MARGARET, BL.
Laurie J. Edwards (2010)

FOUCAULD, CHARLES EUGÈNE DE, BL.
Damian X. Lenshek (2010)
Rev. Anthony J. Wouters, WF (2003)

498 MARTYRS OF THE SPANISH CIVIL WAR, BB.
Elizabeth Inserra (2010)

FRANCIA, ANNIBALE MARIA DI, ST.
Kevin M. Clarke (2010)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

FRANCISCANS, CONVENTUAL
Rev. Steven J. McMichael (2010)

FRANCO, FRANCISCO
Julia L. Ortiz-Griffin (2010)

FRASSINELLO, BENEDETTA CAMBIAGIO, ST.
Kevin M. Clarke (2010)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

FREINADEMETZ, JOSEPH, ST.
Elizabeth Inserra (2010)

FUSCO, ALFONSO MARIA, BL.
Sheila Marie Kirbos (2010)

FUSCO, TOMMASO MARIA, BL.
Sheila Marie Kirbos (2010)

G

GALEN, CLEMENS AUGUSTINUS VON, BL.
Kent Wallace (2010)
Mother Mary Alice Gallin, OSU (2003)

GALLICAN LIBERTIES
William Roberts (2010)

GALVÃO, ANTHONY OF SAINT ANNE, ST.
Kevin M. Clarke (2010)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

GARCÍA ZAVALA, MARÍA GUADALUPE, BL.
Ann H. Shurgin (2010)

GARIBALDI, GIUSEPPE
Roland Sarti (2010)

GIACCARDO, TIMOTEO, BL.
EDS. (2010)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

GINARD MARTÍ, MARÍA DE LOS ÁNGELES, BL.
Ann H. Shurgin (2010)

GIUSSANI, LUIGI
Rev. Antonio López, FSCB (2010)

GOJDIČ, PAVOL PETER, BL.
Ann H. Shurgin (2010)

GONZÁLEZ, EMMANUEL GÓMEZ, BL.
Ann H. Shurgin (2010)

GOOD SHEPHERD, CATECHESIS OF THE
Barbara M. Doran (2010)

GORAZDOWSKI, ZYGMUNT, ST.
Elizabeth Inserra (2010)

GREELEY, ANDREW M.
Richard P. Harmond (2010)

GREGORIAN CALENDAR
Robert W. Shaffern (2010)

GREGORIAN UNIVERSITY
Michael Andrews (2010)

GUÉRIN, MOTHER THEODORE, ST.
Alexis Lavin (2010)
Sister Mary Rodger Madden, SP (2003)

GUÍZAR VALENCIA, RAFAEL, ST.
Kevin M. Clarke (2010)
Eduardo J. Correa (2003)

GUADALUPE, OUR LADY OF
EDS. (2010)
Angel Maria Garibay Kintana (2003)

GUERRERO GONZÁLEZ, ANGELA DE LA CRUZ, ST.
Kevin M. Clarke (2010)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

GUEST HOUSE
Daniel A. Kidd (2010)

GUTIÉRREZ, GUSTAVO
Miguel A. León (2010)

H

HÖSS, CRESCENTIA, ST.
Brian Pedraza (2010)
Rev. Vincent F. Petriccione, TOR (2003)

HADDAD, JACQUES GHAZIR, BL.
Damian X. Lenshek (2010)

HELL (THEOLOGY OF)
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)
Rev. Edgar G. Hardwick, OMI (2003)

HELL, HARROWING OF
Msgr. Fernando B. Felices (2010)

HERESY, HISTORY OF: I. EARLY CHURCH
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)
Rev. Pierre J. Roche, CSSR (2003)

HERESY, HISTORY OF: II. MEDIEVIL PERIOD
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)
Bohdan Chudoba (2003)

HERESY, HISTORY OF: III. MODERN PERIOD
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)
Rev. Edward D. McShane, SJ (2003)

HERESY, HISTORY OF: IV. AFTER VATICAN II
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)

HIGGINS, GEORGE GILMARY
John L. Carr (2010)

HITLER, ADOLF
Joseph A. Biesinger (2010)

HOLY CROSS, CONGREGATION OF SISTERS OF THE
EDS. (2010)
Sister Maria Renata Daily, CSC (2003)

HOLY CROSS, CONGREGATION OF
EDS. (2010)
Very Rev. Edward L. Heston, CSC (2003)
James T. Connelly (2003)

HOLY FAMILY, SONS OF THE
EDS. (2010)
Rev. Louis J. Hoffman, SF (2003)

HOPKO, VASIL', BL.
Ann H. Shurgin (2010)

HOUBEN, CHARLES OF MOUNT ARGUS, ST.
Brian Pedraza (2010)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

HUMILIS DE BISIGNANO, ST.
Randall Woodard (2010)

HURTADO CRUCHAGA, ALBERTO, ST.
Brian Pedraza (2010)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

I

IGNATIUS OF SANTHIÀ, ST.
Elizabeth Inserra (2010)

IMPRIMATUR
Ino Rossi (2010)

INTERDICT
Edward Peters (2010)

INTERNATIONAL THEOLOGICAL COMMISSION
John M. McDermott, SJ (2010)

William E. May (2003)
Rev. Barnabas M. Ahern, CP (2003)
Rev. Francis J. Moloney, SDB (2003)

IRAQ, WAR IN (CATHOLIC CHURCH AND)
Howard Bromberg (2010)

IRISH NATIONALISM AND THE PAPACY
William D. Griffin (2010)

IRWA, JILDO, BL.
Ann H. Shurgin (2010)

IZQUIERDO ALBERO, MARÍA DEL PILAR, BL.
Elizabeth Inserra (2010)

J

JÄGERSTÄTTER, FRANZ, BL.
Elizabeth Inserra (2010)

JACINTO DE LOS ÁNGELES AND JUAN BAUTISTA, BB.
Joseph M. Keating (2010)

JACOBINS
William Roberts (2010)

JAKI, STANLEY
Rev. Paul Haffner (2010)

JANSSEN, ARNOLD, ST.
Dennis R. Di Mauro (2010)
Rev. Vincent J. Fecher, SVD (2003)

JERUSALEM, LATIN PATRIARCHATE OF
Rev. Alex Kratz, OFM (2010)

JEWISH-CATHOLIC RELATIONS (PUBLIC)
Eugene J. Fisher (2010)

JEWISH-CATHOLIC RELATIONS (THEOLOGICAL DIMENSIONS OF)
Rev. Lawrence E. Frizzell (2010)

JEWS, POST-BIBLICAL HISTORY OF THE: I. ROMAN AND BYZANTINE PERIOD (67–622)
EDS. (2010)
Rev. Kurt Hruby (2003)

JEWS, POST-BIBLICAL HISTORY OF THE: II. ISLAMIC PERIOD (622–1096)
EDS. (2010)
Rev. Kurt Hruby (2003)

JEWS, POST-BIBLICAL HISTORY OF THE: III. PERIOD OF THE CRUSADES AND SPANISH INQUISITION
EDS. (2010)
Rev. Kurt Hruby (2003)

JEWS, POST-BIBLICAL HISTORY OF THE: IV PERIOD OF THE RENAISSANCE AND REFORMATION
EDS. (2010)
Rev. Kurt Hruby (2003)

JEWS, POST-BIBLICAL HISTORY OF THE: V. BEGINNING OF THE MODERN ERA (1650–1750)
EDS. (2010)
Rev. Kurt Hruby (2003)

JEWS, POST-BIBLICAL HISTORY OF THE: VI. EMANCIPATION (1750–1948)
EDS. (2010)
Rev. Kurt Hruby (2003)

JEWS, POST-BIBLICAL HISTORY OF THE: VII. CONTEMPORARY HISTORY (1948–2009)
Rabbi Asher Finkel (2010)

JOSÉ APARICIO SANZ AND 232 COMPANIONS, MARTYRS OF THE SPANISH CIVIL WAR,
Laurie J. Edwards (2010)

JOSEPH TÀPIES AND SIX COMPANIONS, BB.
Laurie J. Edwards (2010)

JUGAN, JEANNE, ST.
Dennis R. Di Mauro (2010)
Rev. Thomas Francis Casey (2003)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

JUSTIFICATION, JOINT DECLARATION ON
Michael Root (2010)

JUSTO DE OLIVEIRA, LINDALVA, BL.
Jacob W. Wood (2010)

K

KŁOPOTOWSKI, IGNATIUS, BL.
Jacob W. Wood (2010)

KÜNG, HANS
Raymond F. Bulman (2010)

KASSAB, NIMATULLAH AL-HARDINI YOUSEF, ST.
Dennis R. Di Mauro (2010)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

KAZIMIERCZYK, STANISLAW YOUSEF, ST.
EDS. (2010)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

KENNEDY FAMILY
Robert R. Tomes (2010)

KENNEDY, JOHN F.
Steven J. Brust (2010)

KILMARTIN, EDWARD J.
Carmina Magnusen Chapp (2010)

KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS
Howard Bromberg (2010)
Christopher J. Kauffman (2003)

L

LÓPEZ DE MATURANA, MARGARITA MARÍA, BL.
Elizabeth Inserra (2010)

LAGHI, PIO
Russell Shaw (2010)
Most Rev. Timothy M. Dolan (2003)

LAMBETH ARTICLES
Timothy A. Milford (2010)

LEAGUE OF NATIONS AND THE PAPACY
Frank J. Coppa (2010)

LEDÓCHOWSKA, MARIA TERESA, BL.
EDS. (2010)
Rev. Paul Molinari, SJ (2003)

LEDÓCHOWSKA, URSZULA (URSULA), ST.
Robert Saley (2010)

Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

LEDÓCHOWSKI, WLADIMIR
EDS. (2010)
Rev. Paul Molinari, SJ (2003)

LEGION OF DECENCY
Lara Vapnek (2010)

LIBERALISM
James Hitchcock (2010)

LIMBO
Rev. Brian Harrison, OS (2010)
Rev. Kurt Stasiak, OSB (2003)
Rev. Paul J. Hill (2003)

LINCOLN, ABRAHAM
Hans L. Trefousse (2010)

LITTLE BROTHERS OF JESUS
EDS. (2010)
Rev. Anthony J. Wouters, WF (2003)

LITTLE MISSIONARY SISTERS OF CHARITY
EDS. (2010)
Rev. Thomas Francis Casey (2003)

LITTLE SISTERS OF THE POOR
EDS. (2010)
Sr. Constance Carolyn Veit, LSP (2003)

LIVIERO, CARLO (CHARLES), BL.
Cynthia Little (2010)

LLUCH, JUANA MARÍA CONDESA, BL.
Elizabeth Inserra (2010)

LONGHIN, ANDREW (ANDREA) HYACINTH, BL.
Elizabeth Inserra (2010)

LOZANO GARRIDO, MANUEL, BL.
Laurie J. Edwards (2010)

LUDOVICA DE ANGELIS, MARIA, BL.
Heather Blomberg (2010)

LUMINOUS MYSTERIES OF THE ROSARY
John Ryle Kezel (2010)

LUTHERANISM
Michael Root (2010)

M

MACKILLOP, MARY HELEN, ST.
EDS. (2010)
Rev. James G. Murtagh (2003)

MANDATUM, ACADEMIC
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)

MANGANIELLO, TERESA, BL.
Laurie J. Edwards (2010)

MANTOVANI, MARIA DOMENICA, BL.
Heather Blomberg (2010)

MANYANET Y VIVES, JOSÉ (JOSEPH), ST.
Robert Saley (2010)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

MARÍA DEL CARMEN OF THE CHILD JESUS, BL.
Heather Blomberg (2010)

MARÍA DEL TRÁNSITO DE JESÚS SACRAMENTADO, BL.
Heather Blomberg (2010)

MARCONI, GUGLIELMO
Sister Margherita Frances Marchione, MPF (2010)

MARELLO, GIUSEPPE (JOSEPH), ST.
Douglas A. Dentino (2010)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

MARIA CANDIDA OF THE EUCHARIST, BL.
Heather Blomberg (2010)

MARIA GIUSEPPINA OF JESUS CRUCIFIED, BL.
Heather Blomberg (2010)

MARIA MADDALENA DELLA PASSION, BL.
Heather Blomberg (2010)

MARIA OF THE PASSION OF OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST, BL.
Heather Blomberg (2010)

MARIA TERESA OF JESUS, BL.
Heather Blomberg (2010)

MARIA TERESA OF ST. JOSEPH, BL.
Heather Blomberg (2010)

MARIAN FATHERS
EDS. (2010)
Rev. Martin P. Rzeszutek, MIC (2003)

MARIANITES OF HOLY CROSS
EDS. (2010)
Sister Mary Lourdes Dorsey, MSC (2003)

MARIANO DE LA MATA APARICIO, BL.
Heather Blomberg (2010)

MARIE-CÉLINE DE LA PRÉSENTATION, BL.
Heather Blomberg (2010)

MARK OF AVIANO, BL.
Heather Blomberg (2010)

MARKIEWICZ, BRONISŁAW, BL.
Heather Blomberg (2010)

MARTILLO MORÁN, NARCISA DE JESÚS, ST.
Robert Saley (2010)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

MARTIN, LOUIS, BL.
Laurie Malashanko (2010)

MARTIN, MARIE-ZÉLIE GUÉRIN, BL.
Laurie Malashanko (2010)

MARVELLI, ALBERTO, BL.
Damian X. Lenshek (2010)

MARXISM
Rev. Joseph W. Koterski, SJ (2010)

MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN (IN THE BIBLE)
Rev. François Rossier, SM (2010)
Rev. Christian P. Ceroke, Ocarm (2003)

MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN (IN THEOLOGY): I. HOLINESS OF MARY
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)
Rev. John F. Murphy (2003)

MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN (IN THEOLOGY): II. KNOWLEDGE AND FAITH OF MARY
Rev. Thomas A Thompson, SM (2010)

Rev. Paul John Mahoney, OP (2003)

MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN (IN THEOLOGY): III. MARY AND THE CHURCH
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)
Rev. Cyril Vollert, SJ (2003)
Rev. Frederick M. Jelly, OP (2003)

MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN (IN THEOLOGY): IV. MEDIATRIX OF ALL GRACES
Rev. Paul Haffner (2010)
Rev Juniper B. Carol, OFM (2003)

MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN (IN THEOLOGY): V. SPIRITUAL MATERNITY OF MARY
Judith Marie Gentle (2010)
Rev. William J. Cole, SM (2003)

MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, DEVOTION TO
Rev. Thomas Buffer (2010)
Rev. Eamon R. Carroll, Ocarm (2003)

MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, PAPAL MAGISTERIUM SINCE VATICAN II ON
Msgr. Arthur Burton Calkins (2010)

MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, QUEENSHIP OF
Edward Sri (2010)

MARY (AND ECUMENICAL DIALOGUE)
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)

MARY MAGDALENE OF THE INCARNATION, BL.
Heather Blomberg (2010)

MASTENA, MARIA PIA, BL.
Rebecca Bowman Woods (2010)

MATTIAS, MARIA DE, ST.
A. J. Kim (2010)
Rev. Andrew J. Pollack, CPPS (2003)

MAZZINI, GIUSEPPE
Roland Sarti (2010)

MCMANUS, FREDERICK
Msgr. Thomas J. Green (2010)

MENEGUZZI, LIDUINA, BL.
Rebecca Bowman Woods (2010)

MERKERT, MARIA LUISA, BL.
Rebecca Bowman Woods (2010)

MERZ, IVAN, BL.
Elizabeth L. McCloskey (2010)

MILLERET, MARIE EUGENIE OF JESUS, ST.
Laurie Malashanko (2010)

MISSIONARIES OF CHARITY FATHERS
Rev. Darren N. Dentino, MC (2010)

MISSIONARIES OF CHARITY
EDS. (2010)
Rev. Berard L. Marthaler, OFMConv (2003)

MISSIONARY SISTERS OF ST. PETER CLAVER
EDS. (2010)
Rev. Paul Molinari, SJ (2003)

MIT BRENNENDER SORGE
Sister Margherita Frances Marchione, MPF (2010)

MODERNISM
Charles J.T. Talar (2010)

MOLLA, GIANNA (JOAN) BERETTA, ST.
Neil P. Sloan (2010)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

MONASTICISM: I. EARLY CHRISTIAN MONASTICISM (TO 600)
Rev. Placid D. Solari, OSB (2010)
Rev. Jean Gribomont, OSB (2003)

MONASTICISM: II. MEDIEVAL MONASTICISM (600–1500)
Rev. Placid D. Solari, OSB (2010)
Rev. Victor Joseph Gellhaus, OSB (2003)

MONASTICISM: III. MODERN MONASTICISM (1500–1960)
Rev. Placid D. Solari, OSB (2010)
Rev. Joel Rippinger, OSB (2003)

MONASTICISM: IV. CONTEMPORARY MONASTICISM (1960–2009)
Rev. Placid D. Solari, OSB (2010)
Rev. Joel Rippinger, OSB (2003)

MONASTICISM: V. EASTERN MONASTICISM UNTIL 1453
Rev. Placid D. Solari, OSB (2010)
Rev. Jean Gribomont, OSB (2003)

MONASTICISM: VI. EASTERN MONASTICISM SINCE 1453
Rev. Placid D. Solari, OSB (2010)
Rev. Thomas Špidlík, SJ (2003)

MONTI, LUIGI MARIA, BL.
Elizabeth L. McCloskey (2010)

MONTOYA, LAURA, BL.
Alexander Andujar (2010)

MONZA, LUIGI, BL.
Elizabeth L. McCloskey (2010)

MORE, SIR THOMAS, ST.
Gerard B. Wegemer (2010)
Richard S. Sylvester (2003)
Richard J. Schoeck (2003)

MOREAU, BASIL ANTHONY, BL.
Sheila Marie Kirbos (2010)
Very Rev. Edward L. Heston, CSC (2003)

MOTHER TERESA OF CALCUTTA, BL.
Elizabeth Inserra (2010)
Rev. Berard L. Marthaler, OFMConv (2003)

MUSSOLINI, BENITO
Roland Sarti (2010)

MUTTATHUPANDATHU, ALPHONSA, ST.
A. J. Kim (2010)

Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

N

NAMUNCURÁ, ZEPHERIN, BL.
Elizabeth L. McCloskey (2010)

NANTES, EDICT OF
Michael Wolfe (2010)

NARDINI, PAUL JOSEF, BL.
Elizabeth L. McCloskey (2010)

NATO, PAPAL REACTION TO
Susan A. Maurer (2010)

NAZISM, PAPAL RESPONSE TO
Frank J. Coppa (2010)

NEOSCHOLASTICISM AND NEOTHOMISM
Rev. Joseph W. Koterski, SJ (2010)

NEW AGE MOVEMENT, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH AND
Paul Thigpen (2010)

NICOLI, GIUSEPPINA, BL.
Rebecca Bowman Woods (2010)

NOMINALISM
Jack Zupko (2010)

NON LICET
Roy Domenico (2010)

NOUWEN, HENRI JOZEF MACHIEL
Michael Hryniuk (2010)

O

OBLATES OF ST. JOSEPH
EDS. (2010)
Rev. Silvio J. Chini, OSJ (2003)

OKELO, DAUDI, BL.
Ann H. Shurgin (2010)

OPUS DEI
EDS. (2010)
Ramiro Pellitero (2003)

ORIONE, LUIGI (LOUIS), ST.
A. J. Kim (2010)
Rev. Thomas Francis Casey (2003)

OROZCO, ALFONSO DE, ST.
Elizabeth-Jane P. McGuire (2010)
Brendan R. Cavanaugh (2003)

ORTIZ REAL, PIEDAD DE LA CRUZ, BL.
Ann H. Shurgin (2010)

OTRANTO (ITALY), MARTYRS OF
Elizabeth Lev (2010)

OUR LADY OF ALL NATIONS
Mark Miravalle (2010)

OWENS, JOSEPH
Mary C. Sommers (2010)

P

PÉREZ, LEONARDO, BL.
Liz Swain (2010)

PALESTINE, PAPAL POSITION TOWARD
Frank J. Coppa (2010)

PALOMINO YENES, EUSEBIA, BL.
Ryan M. Haber (2010)

PAPAL ELECTIONS
Roy Domenico (2010)

PAPCZYŃSKI, STANISLAUS OF JESUS AND MARY, BL.
Mark B. Giszczak (2010)
Rev. Martin P. Rzeszutek, MIC (2003)

PAQUAY, VALENTIN, BL.
Ryan M. Haber (2010)

PAULINE FATHERS AND BROTHERS
EDS. (2010)
Rev. James Dunn, SSP (2003)

PAVONI, LODOVICO, BL.
Ryan M. Haber (2010)

PELCZAR, JÓZEF SEBASTIAN, ST.
Elizabeth-Jane P. McGuire (2010)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

PELLESI, MARIA ROSA, BL.
Liz Swain (2010)

PEREIRA, NUNO DE SANTA MARIA ÁLVARES, ST.
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)

PERON, JUAN DOMINGO
Julia L. Ortiz-Griffin (2010)

PERPETUAL ADORATION OF THE BLESSED SACRAMENT, NUNS OF THE
EDS. (2010)
John H. McNeely (2003)

PERSONALISM
Kenneth Schmitz (2010)

PETER KIBE KASUI AND 187 COMPANIONS, MARTYRS OF NAGASAKI (JAPAN), BB.
Laurie J. Edwards (2010)

PETKOVIĆ, MARIA OF JESUS CRUCIFIED, BL.
Liz Swain (2010)

PIANZOLA, FRANCESCO, BL.
Elizabeth Inserra (2010)

PICCO, EUGENIA, BL.
Liz Swain (2010)

PIDAL Y CHICO DE GUZMÁN, MARÍA MARAVILLAS DE JESÚS BATTISTA,
Elizabeth-Jane P. McGuire (2010)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

PILSUDSKI, JOZEF
Rev. Michael A. Guzik, SJ (2010)

PIUS XII, POPE
José M. Sánchez (2010)

POLANYI, MICHAEL
Rev. Martin X. Moleski, SJ (2010)

POLONI, VINCENZA MARIA, BL.
Liz Swain (2010)

POPE JOHN PAUL II CULTURAL CENTER
Hugh M. Dempsey (2010)
G. Michael Bugarin (2003)

PORTILLO, ALVARO DEL
EDS. (2010)
Russell Shaw (2003)

POVEDA CASTROVERDE, PEDRO, ST.
Albert Edward Doskey (2010)

Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

PRAETER INTENTIONEM
Rev. Andrew Jaspers, SJ (2010)

PRECA, GEORGE, ST.
Albert Edward Doskey (2010)
Emanuel P. Magro (2003)

PRECIOUS BLOOD SISTERS: I. ADORERS OF THE BLOOD OF CHRIST
EDS. (2010)
Sister Angelita Myerscough, AdPPS (2003)

PRECIOUS BLOOD SISTERS: II. SISTERS OF THE MOST PRECIOUS BLOOD
EDS. (2010)
Sister Mary Patrice Thaman, CPPS (2003)

PRECIOUS BLOOD SISTERS: III. SISTERS OF THE PRECIOUS BLOOD
EDS. (2010)
Sister Mary Octavia Gutman, CPPS (2003)

PROTOEVANGELIUM OF JAMES
Rev. Neil J. Roy (2010)

Q

QUIETISM
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)
Rev. Thomas K. Connolly, OP (2003)

R

RANGEL, JOSÉ TRINIDAD, BL.
Liz Swain (2010)

RAPTURE
Paul Thigpen (2010)
Mary Frohlich (2003)

RAVASCO, EUGENIA, BL.
Liz Swain (2010)

REDEMPTION (THEOLOGY OF)
EDS. (2010)
Rev. Eugene Leo Peterman, CP (2003)

REGGIO, TOMMASO, BL.
Liz Swain (2010)

RENDU, ROSALIE, BL.
Liz Swain (2010)

RESSOURCEMENT THEOLOGY
Rev. Brian Van Hove, SJ (2010)

RITA AMADA DE JESUS, BL.
Liz Swain (2010)

RODRÍGUEZ CASTRO, BONIFACIA, BL.
Liz Swain (2010)

RODRÍGUEZ SOPEÑA, MARÍA DOLORES, BL.
Liz Swain (2010)

ROMA (GYPSIES)
John Radzilowski (2010)

ROMERO MENESES, MARÍA, BL.
Liz Swain (2010)

ROSAL VÁSQUEZ, MARÍA VICENTA, BL.
EDS. (2010)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

ROSMINIANS
EDS. (2010)
Very Rev. Claude Richard Leetham, IC (2003)

ROSMINI-SERBATI, ANTONIO, BL
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)
Rev. Denis A. Cleary, IC (2003)

RUBIO Y PERALTA, JOSÉ MARÍA, ST.
Albert Edward Doskey (2010)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

S

SACRAMENTINE SISTERS OF BERGAMO
EDS. (2010)
Rev. Franco Giuseppe Sottocornola, SX (2003)

SACRED HEARTS OF JESUS AND MARY, CONGREGATION OF THE
EDS. (2010)
Rev. Francis Larkin, SSCC (2003)

SAINTS AND BLESSEDS
Rev. Msgr. Robert J. Sarno (2010)

SALAZAR, ANTÓNIO DE OLIVEIRA
Julia L. Ortiz-Griffin (2010)

SALKAHÁZI, SÁRA, BL.
Liz Swain (2010)

SALVATION, NECESSITY OF THE CHURCH FOR
Rev. Francis A. Sullivan, SJ (2010)

SALZANO, GIULIA, ST.
Rebecca Bowman Woods (2010)

SARTRE, JEAN-PAUL
Rev. Thomas M. King, SJ (2010)

SCHELINGOVÁ, ZDENKA CECILIA, BL.
Laurie Malashanko (2010)

SECULARISM
Joseph Bottum (2010)

SEMINARY EDUCATION
Rev. David L. Toups (2010)
Msgr. William B. Baumgaertner (2003)
Sr. Katarina Schuth, OSF (2003)
Rev. James A. O'Donohoe, OMI (2003)

SHROUD OF TURIN
Rev. Msgr. Vittorio Guerrera, RC (2010)

SIMON (SZYMON) OF LIPNICA, ST.
Elizabeth Inserra (2010)

SIN (THEOLOGY OF)
Mark S. Latkovic (2010)
Rev. Joseph I. McGuiness, OP (2003)

SISTER CHURCHES
Msgr. Paul McPartlan (2010)

SISTERS OF PROVIDENCE OF ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS
EDS. (2010)
Sister Mary Rodger Madden, SP (2003)

SLAVERY: I. IN THE BIBLE
Joseph E. Capizzi (2010)

Rev. Hilary C. Franco (2003)

SLAVERY: II. AND THE CHURCH
Joseph E. Capizzi (2010)
Rev. Cornelius W. Williams, OP (2003)

SLAVERY: III. HISTORY OF
Joseph E. Capizzi (2010)

SMALDONE, FILIPPO MARIANO, ST.
Neil P. Sloan (2010)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

SOCIETY FOR CATHOLIC LITURGY
Carmina Magnusen Chapp (2010)

SOCIETY OF CATHOLIC SOCIAL SCIENTISTS
Stephen M. Krason (2010)

SOLÁ Y MOLIST, ANDRÉS, BL.
Jacob W. Wood (2010)

SONS OF DIVINE PROVIDENCE
EDS. (2010)
John Coss (2003)

SOPOĆKO, MICHAŁ, BL.
Jacob W. Wood (2010)

SPAIN (THE CHURCH DURING THE SPANISH REPUBLIC AND THE CIVIL WAR: 1931–1939)
Msgr. Fernando B. Felices (2010)

SPOTO, FRANCESCO, BL.
Jacob W. Wood (2010)

ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST, SISTERS OF
EDS. (2010)
Sister Adolfa Gallo, CSJB (2003)

STALIN, JOSEF
Mauricio Borrero (2010)

STATES OF THE CHURCH
Michael Wolfe (2010)
Very Rev. Eugène Jarry (2003)
Frank J. Coppa (2003)
Peter D. Partner (2003)
Thomas F. X. Noble (2003)
Renato Mori (2003)

STEIN, EDITH (TERESA BENEDICTA OF THE CROSS), ST.
Sarah Borden-Sharkey (2010)
John Sullivan (2003)

STENMANNS, JOSEPHA HENDRINA, BL.
Robert Saley (2010)

STERNI, GAETANA, BL.
Elizabeth Inserra (2010)

SUÁREZ, FRANCISCO
John P. Doyle (2010)

SURIANO, GIUSEPPINA, BL.
Elizabeth Inserra (2010)

SZYMKOWIAK, SANCJA (SANTIA), BL.
Elizabeth Inserra (2010)

T

TADINI, ARCÁNGELO, ST.
Laurie Malashanko (2010)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

TALAMONI, LUIGI, BL.
Elizabeth Inserra (2010)

TAPARELLI D'AZEGLIO, LUIGI
Thomas C. Behr (2010)
William J. Fulco, SJ (2003)

TAPARELLI D'AZEGLIO, MASSIMO
Thomas C. Behr (2010)

TARRÉS I CLARET, PERE (PETER), BL.
Elizabeth Inserra (2010)

TAVERNIER GAMELIN, ÉMILIE, BL.
Mark J. DeCelles (2010)

TEILHARD DE CHARDIN, PIERRE
Rev. Thomas M. King, SJ (2010)
Rev. Edouard L. Boné, SJ (2003)

TERESIAN ASSOCIATION
EDS. (2010)
Anna Mandiola (2003)

THÉRÈSE DE LISIEUX, ST.
Laurie Malashanko (2010)
Rev. Peter-Thomas Rohrbach, OCD (2003)

THEURGY, DOCTRINE OF
Rev. David V. Meconi, SJ (2010)

THEVARPARAMPIL, AUGUSTINO, BL.
Mark J. DeCelles (2010)

TOLERATION ACTS OF 1639 AND 1649, MARYLAND
Timothy A. Milford (2010)

TOLOMEI, BERNARD, ST.
Randall Woodard (2010)
Rev. Anselm G Biggs, OSB (2003)

TORRES MORALES, GENOVEVA, ST.
Neil P. Sloan (2010)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

TOUS Y SOLER, JOSÉ, BL.
Laurie J. Edwards (2010)

TOVINI, MOSES, BL.
Robert Saley (2010)

TRČKA, METOD DOMINIK, BL.
Mark B. Giszczak (2010)

U

ÜFFING, MARIA EUTHYMIA (EMMA), BL.
A. J. Kim (2010)

V

VALDÉS, JOSÉ OLALLO, BL.
A. J. Kim (2010)

VALLE, GIULIA NEMESIA, BL.
Elizabeth-Jane P. McGuire (2010)

VAN LIESHOUT, EUSTÁQUIO, BL.
Elizabeth-Jane P. McGuire (2010)

VANIER, JEAN
Beth Porter (2010)

VARIARA, LUIGI, BL.
Albert Edward Doskey (2010)

VENERINI SISTERS
EDS. (2010)

Rev. James H. Lambert, SM (2003)

VENERINI, ROSE, ST.
Laurie Malashanko (2010)

VEUSTER, JOSEPH DE (FR. DAMIEN), ST.
Damian X. Lenshek (2010)
Rev. Robert E. Carson, Opraem (2003)

VIGNE, PETER, BL.
Alexander Andujar (2010)

VISINTAINER, AMABILE LUCIA, ST.
Neil P. Sloan (2010)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

VITCHEV, KAMEN, BL.
Albert Edward Doskey (2010)

VOLPICELLI, CATERINA, ST.
Laurie Malashanko (2010)
Katherine I. Rabenstein (2003)

W

WALDHEIM, KURT
Brian E. Birdnow (2010)

WIECKA, MARTA MARIA, BL.
Neil P. Sloan (2010)

WILLEBRANDS, JOHANNES
Robert L. Fastiggi (2010)
Most Rev. Basil Meeking (2003)

WORLD WAR I, PAPAL REACTION TO
Frank J. Coppa (2010)

WORLD WAR II AND THE PAPAL ROLE
Frank J. Coppa (2010)

Z

ZATTI, ARTEMIDE, BL.
Dennis R. Di Mauro (2010)

ZEGRÍ Y MORENO, JUAN NEPOMUCENO, BL.
Elizabeth Inserra (2010)

CONTRIBUTORS

Rev. Barnabas M. Ahern, CP
Consultor
Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith
INTERNATIONAL THEOLOGICAL COMMISSION (2003)

Michael Andrews
Adjunct Professor
Department of History
St. John's University, New York
Associate Adjunct Professor in the History and Political Science Dept.
Molloy College in Rockville Centre,New York
COR UNUM (2010)
GREGORIAN UNIVERSITY (2010)

Alexander Andujar
Alumnus
Saint Leo University
MONTOYA, LAURA, BL. (2010)
VIGNE, PETER, BL. (2010)

Michael S. Ariens
Professor of Law
St. Mary's University of San Antonio
San Antonio, Tex.
CHURCH AND STATE IN THE UNITED STATES (LEGAL HISTORY): IV. SEARCH FOR SOLUTION (2003) (1900–2001)

Dolores Augustine
Professor of History
St. John's University, New York
BISMARCK, OTTO VON (2010)

William S. Barron
Assistant Professor of History
Regis College
Weston, Mass.
CHURCH, HISTORY OF: III. EARLY MODERN: 1500–1789 (2003)

Msgr. Robert J. Batule
Diocese of Rockville Centre
New York
CATHOLIC LEAGUE (2010)

Msgr. William B. Baumgaertner
Associate Director
Association of Theological Schools
Vandalia, Oh.
SEMINARY EDUCATION (2003)

Thomas C. Behr
Lecturer, Department of History
Director, Liberal Studies
University of Houston
TAPARELLI D'AZEGLIO, LUIGI (2010)
TAPARELLI D'AZEGLIO, MASSIMO (2010)

Joseph A. Biesinger
Professor Emeritus
Department of History
Eastern Kentucky University
Richmond, Ky.
AUSCHWITZ-BIRKENAU (2010)
CONCORDAT WITH GERMANY (1933) (2010)
HITLER, ADOLF (2010)

Rev. Anselm G Biggs, OSB
Chairman of the Department of History
Belmont Abbey College
Belmont, N.C.
TOLOMEI, BERNARD, ST. (2003)

Brian E. Birdnow
Adjunct Professor of History
Harris Stowe State University
St. Louis, Mo.
WALDHEIM, KURT (2010)

Mother Marie-Denyse Blachère, RA
Superior General
Institut de l'Assomption
Paris, France
ASSUMPTION, RELIGIOUS OF THE (2003)

Rev. Jonathan Black
Editor
Mediaeval Studies

Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies
BREVIARY (2010)

Heather Blomberg
Independent Scholar
Toronto, ON
LUDOVICA DE ANGELIS, MARIA, BL. (2010)
MANTOVANI, MARIA DOMENICA, BL. (2010)
MARÍA DEL CARMEN OF THE CHILD JESUS, BL. (2010)
MARÍA DEL TRÁNSITO DE JESÚS SACRAMENTADO, BL. (2010)
MARIA CANDIDA OF THE EUCHARIST, BL. (2010)
MARIA GIUSEPPINA OF JESUS CRUCIFIED, BL. (2010)
MARIA MADDALENA DELLA PASSION, BL. (2010)
MARIA OF THE PASSION OF OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST, BL. (2010)
MARIA TERESA OF JESUS, BL. (2010)
MARIA TERESA OF ST. JOSEPH, BL. (2010)
MARIANO DE LA MATA APARICIO, BL. (2010)
MARIE-CÉLINE DE LA PRÉSENTATION, BL. (2010)
MARK OF AVIANO, BL. (2010)
MARKIEWICZ, BRONISŁAW, BL. (2010)
MARY MAGDALENE OF THE INCARNATION, BL. (2010)

Rev. Edouard L. Boné, SJ
Head of the Department of Vertebrate Paleontology
University of Louvain, Belgium
TEILHARD DE CHARDIN, PIERRE (2003)

Sarah Borden Sharkey
Associate Professor
Philosophy Department
Wheaton College (IL)
STEIN, EDITH (TERESA BENEDICTA OF THE CROSS), ST. (2010)

Mauricio Borrero
Professor
Department of History
St. John's University
BOLSHEVISM (2010)
STALIN, JOSEF (2010)

Joseph Bottum
Editor
First Things
New York, NY
SECULARISM (2010)

Constance B. Bouchard
Distinguished Professor of Medieval History
University of Akron
CHURCH, HISTORY OF: II. MEDIEVAL (2010)

Rev. John Francis Broderick, SJ
Professor of Ecclesiastical History
Weston College
Weston, Mass.
CHURCH, HISTORY OF: IV. LATE MODERN: 1789–2009 (2003)

Howard Bromberg
Professor
Law School
University of Michigan
CHURCH AND STATE IN THE UNITED STATES (LEGAL HISTORY): I. COLONIAL PERIOD (1607–1776) (2010)
CHURCH AND STATE IN THE UNITED STATES (LEGAL HISTORY): II. THE DISESTABLISHMENT PERIOD (1776–1834) (2010)
CHURCH AND STATE IN THE UNITED STATES (LEGAL HISTORY): III. PERIOD OF CONFLICT (1834–1900) (2010)
CHURCH AND STATE IN THE UNITED STATES (LEGAL HISTORY): IV. SEARCH FOR SOLUTION (1900–2001) (2010)
CHURCH AND STATE IN THE UNITED STATES (LEGAL HISTORY): V. NEW CONTROVERSIES (2001–2009) (2010)
IRAQ, WAR IN (CATHOLIC CHURCH AND) (2010)
KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS (2010)

Suzanne Brown-Fleming
Center for Advanced Holocaust Studies
United States Holocaust Memorial Museum
ANTI-JUDAISM (2010)
ANTI-SEMITISM (2010)

E. Christian Brugger
Professor
St. John Vianney Theological Seminary
ATOMIC WEAPONS "NUCLEAR," HISTORY AND MORAL QUESTIONS CONCERNING (2010)

Steven J. Brust
Visiting Assistant Professor Department of Politics
The Catholic Univeristy of America
KENNEDY, JOHN F. (2010)

Rev. Thomas Buffer
Lecturer
International Marian Research Institute
University of Dayton
MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, DEVOTION TO (2010)

G. Michael Bugarin
Director
Pope John Paul II Cultural Center
Washington, D.C.
POPE JOHN PAUL II CULTURAL CENTER (2003)

Raymond F. Bulman
Professor of Systematic Theology
St. John's University
New York
AGGIORNAMENTO (2010)
KÜNG, HANS (2010)

Perry J. Cahall
Associate Professor of Historical Theology
Pontifical College Josephinum
Columbus, OH
CHURCH, HISTORY OF: I. EARLY (2010)

Msgr. Arthur Burton Calkins
Official
Pontifical Commission "Ecclesia Dei"

Vatican City State
ECCLESIA DEI COMMISSION (2010)
MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, PAPAL MAGISTERIUM SINCE VATICAN II ON (2010)

Joseph E. Capizzi
Associate Professor
School of Theology and Religious Studies
The Catholic University of America
Washington, D.C.
SLAVERY: I. (IN THE BIBLE) (2010)
SLAVERY: II. (AND THE CHURCH) (2010)
SLAVERY: III. (HISTORY OF) (2010)

Elaine Carey
Associate Professor of History
St. John's University
Queens, New York
CASTRO, FIDEL RUZ (2010)

Rev. Januarius M. Carillo, FSCJ
Professor and Missionary
Yorkville, Ill.
COMBONI MISSIONARIES OF THE HEART OF JESUS (2003)
COMBONI, DANIELE, ST. (2003)

Rev. Juniper B. Carol, OFM
Professor of Dogmatic Theology
Tombrock College
Paterson, N.J.
MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN (IN THEOLOGY): IV. MEDIATRIX OF ALL GRACES (2003)

John L. Carr
Executive Director
Department of Justice, Peace and Human Development
United States Conference of Catholic Bishops
HIGGINS, GEORGE GILMARY (2010)

Rev. Eamon R. Carroll, Ocarm
Associate Professor of Theology
Director of the Summer Program in Mariology
The Catholic University of America
Washington, D.C.
MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, DEVOTION TO (2003)

Rev. Robert E. Carson, Opraem
Teacher of Social Studies
Abbot Pennings High School
De Pere, Wis.
VEUSTER, JOSEPH DE (FR. DAMIEN), ST. (2003)

Rev. Thomas Francis Casey
Professor of Church History
St. John's Seminary
Brighton, Mass.
Chaplain
Catholic Graduates Club of Greater Boston
JUGAN, JEANNE, ST. (2003)
LITTLE MISSIONARY SISTERS OF CHARITY (2003)
ORIONE, LUIGI (LOUIS), ST. (2003)

Brendan R. Cavanaugh
Independent Scholar
Washington, D.C.
OROZCO, ALFONSO DE, ST. (2003)

Rev. Christian P. Ceroke, Ocarm
Professor
Dept. of Religion and Religious Education
The Catholic University of America
Washington, D.C.
MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN (IN THE BIBLE) (2003)

Rev. Romanus Cessario, OP
Professor of Dogmatic and Moral Theology
Saint John's Seminary
Boston, Mass.
CARDINAL VIRTUES (2010)

Rev. Silvio J. Chini, OSJ
Catholic Journalist
Pittston, Pa.
OBLATES OF ST. JOSEPH (2003)

Bohdan Chudoba
Professor of History
Iona College
New Rochelle, N.Y.
HERESY, HISTORY OF: II. MEDIEVIL PERIOD (2003)

Kevin M. Clarke
Teacher of Religion
St. Joseph Academy
San Marcos, CA
CATANOSO, GAETANO (CAJETAN), ST. (2010)
CENTURIONE BRACELLI, VIRGINIA, ST. (2010)
COLL Y GUITART, FRANCISCO, ST. (2010)
COMBONI, DANIELE, ST. (2010)
FELIX OF NICOSIA, ST. (2010)
FRANCIA, ANNIBALE MARIA DI, ST. (2010)
FRASSINELLO, BENEDETTA CAMBIAGIO, ST. (2010)
GALVÃO, ANTHONY OF SAINT ANNE, ST. (2010)
GUÍZAR VALENCIA, RAFAEL, ST. (2010)
GUERRERO GONZÁLEZ, ANGELA DE LA CRUZ, ST. (2010)

Rev. Denis A. Cleary, IC
Director
Rosmini House
Durham, United Kingdom
ROSMINI-SERBATI, ANTONIO, BL (2003)

Rev. William J. Cole, SM
Associate Professor of Theology
University of Dayton
Dayton, Ohio
MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN (IN THEOLOGY): V. SPIRITUAL MATERNITY OF MARY (2003)

Sister M. Francis of the Stigmata Condon, FMM
Director of Public Relations
U.S. Province of St. Francis)
Franciscan Missionaries of Mary
CHAPPOTIN DE NEUVILLE, HÉLÈNE DE, BL. (2003)

James T. Connelly
Associate Professor of History
University of Portland

Portland, Ore.
HOLY CROSS, CONGREGATION OF (2003)

Rev. Thomas K. Connolly, OP
Dominican House of Studies
Washington, D.C.
ALUMBRADOS (ILLUMINATI) (2003)
QUIETISM (2003)

Tracey-Anne Cooper
Dept. of History
St. John's University
Jamaica, N.Y.
ACT OF SUPREMACY (1534) (2010)
ANAGNI (2010)
CANOSSA (2010)
DONATION OF CONSTANTINE (2010)

Frank J. Coppa
Professor of History
St. John's University
New York
APOSTOLIC DELEGATE
CHURCH, HISTORY OF: III. EARLY MODERN: 1500–1789 (2010)
CHURCH, HISTORY OF: IV. LATE MODERN: 1789–2009 (2003)
COLD WAR AND THE PAPACY (2010)
CURCI, CARLO MARIA (2010)
EUROPEAN UNION AND THE PAPACY (2010)
LEAGUE OF NATIONS AND THE PAPACY (2010)
NAZISM, PAPAL RESPONSE TO (2010)
PALESTINE, PAPAL POSITION TOWARD (2010)
STATES OF THE CHURCH (2003)
WORLD WAR I, PAPAL REACTION TO (2010)
WORLD WAR II AND THE PAPAL ROLE (2010)

Eduardo J. Correa
Independent Scholar
Mexico City, Mexico
GUÍZAR VALENCIA, RAFAEL, ST. (2003)

John Coss
Independent Scholar
Framingham, Mass.
SONS OF DIVINE PROVIDENCE (2003)

Sister Maria Renata Daily, CSC
President
St. Mary's College
Notre Dame, Ind.
HOLY CROSS, CONGREGATION OF SISTERS OF THE (2003)

Adrien Dansette
Docteur en Droit
Diplôme de l'École des Sciences Politiques
ACTION FRANÇAISE (2003)

Rev. Emery de Gaal
Associate Professor of Systematic Theology
University of St. Mary of the Lake
Mundelein, IL
CELIBACY, CLERICAL, HISTORY OF (2010)

Mark J. DeCelles
Doctoral Candidate
School of Theology and Religious Studies
The Catholic University of America
Washington, D.C.
CERIOLI, PAOLA ELISABETTA (COSTANZA), ST. (2010)
CUAUHTLATOATZIN, JUAN DIEGO, ST. (2010)
TAVERNIER GAMELIN, ÉMILIE, BL. (2010)
THEVARPARAMPIL, AUGUSTINO, BL. (2010)

Very Rev. Philippe C. Delhaye
Canon of Namur
Professor of Moral Theology
Lille, France
CELIBACY, CLERICAL, HISTORY OF (2003)

Hugh M. Dempsey
Deputy Director
Pope John Paul II Cultural Center
POPE JOHN PAUL II CULTURAL CENTER (2010)

Douglas A. Dentino
Editor
Cengage Learning
MARELLO, GIUSEPPE (JOSEPH), ST. (2010)

Rev. Darren N. Dentino, MC
Priest
Missionaries of Charity Fathers
Guadalajara, Mexico
MISSIONARIES OF CHARITY FATHERS (2010)

Dennis R. Di Mauro
Graduate Student
The Catholic University of America
Washington, D.C.
JANSSEN, ARNOLD, ST. (2010)
JUGAN, JEANNE, ST. (2010)
KASSAB, NIMATULLAH AL-HARDINI YOUSEF, ST. (2010)
ZATTI, ARTEMIDE, BL. (2010)

Stanley Diamond
Professor of Anthropology
Syracuse University
Syracuse, N.Y.
AFTERLIFE: I. PRIMITIVE SOCIETIES (2003)

Rev. Warren F. Dicharry, CM
Dean, Registrar, and Professor of Scripture, Theology, and Greek
St. Mary's Seminary
Houston, Texas
CHARISM (2003)

Most Rev. Timothy M. Dolan
Archbishop of New York
LAGHI, PIO (2003)

Roy Domenico
Professor
Department of History
The University of Scranton
ADENAUER, KONRAD (2010)
ADOWA, BATTLE OF (2010)
DEMOCRATIC PARTIES, CHRISTIAN (2010)
NON LICET (2010)
PAPAL ELECTIONS (2010)

John A. Donnangelo, II
Adj. Assistant Professor
Department of History
Bronx Community College of The City University of New York
ARAFAT, YASSER (2010)

Barbara M. Doran
Independent Scholar
Irondale, Ala.
GOOD SHEPHERD, CATECHESIS OF THE (2010)

Sister Mary Lourdes Dorsey, MSC
Teacher of English
Academy of Holy Angels
New Orleans, La.
MARIANITES OF HOLY CROSS (2003)

Albert Edward Doskey
Doctoral Student in Historical Theology
The Catholic University of America
POVEDA CASTROVERDE, PEDRO, ST. (2010)
PRECA, GEORGE, ST. (2010)
RUBIO Y PERALTA, JOSÉ MARÍA, ST. (2010)
VARIARA, LUIGI, BL. (2010)
VITCHEV, KAMEN, BL. (2010)

Yves Dossat
Docteur ès lettres
Chargé de Recherche au Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique
Paris, France
CATHARI (2003)

Glanville Downey
Professor of History
Indiana University
Bloomington, Ind.
CONSTANTINOPLE (BYZANTIUM, ISTANBUL) (2003)

John P. Doyle
Professor Emeritus
Department of Philosophy
St. Louis University
St. Louis, Mo.
Distinguished Professor of Philosophy
Kenrick-Glennon Seminary
Shrewsbury, Mo.
SUÁREZ, FRANCISCO (2010)

Rev. Angelyn Dries, OSF
Associate Professor and Chair
Religious Studies Dept.
Cardinal Stritch University
Milwaukee, Wis.
COPE, MARIANNE, BL. (2003)

Rev. James Dunn, SSP
Independent Scholar
Brookline, Mass.
PAULINE FATHERS AND BROTHERS (2003)

EDS.
ASSUMPTION, RELIGIOUS OF THE (2010)
BENEDICTINES, OLIVETAN (2010)
BESSETTE, ANDRÉ, ST. (2010)
BOSSILKOV, EVGENIJ, BL. (2010)
BUFALO, GASPARE DEL, ST. (2010)
CHAVARA, KURIAKOSE (CYRIAC) ELIAS, BL. (2010)
COMBONI MISSIONARIES OF THE HEART OF JESUS (2010)
DIVINE WORD, SOCIETY OF THE (2010)
FILIPPINI, LUCY, ST. (2010)
GIACCARDO, TIMOTEO, BL. (2010)
GUADALUPE, OUR LADY OF (2010)
HOLY CROSS, CONGREGATION OF SISTERS OF THE (2010)
HOLY CROSS, CONGREGATION OF (2010)
HOLY FAMILY, SONS OF THE (2010)
JEWS, POST-BIBLICAL HISTORY OF THE: I. ROMAN AND BYZANTINE PERIOD (67–622) (2010)
JEWS, POST-BIBLICAL HISTORY OF THE: II. ISLAMIC PERIOD (622–1096) (2010)
JEWS, POST-BIBLICAL HISTORY OF THE: III. PERIOD OF THE CRUSADES AND SPANISH INQUISITION (1096–1492)(2010)
JEWS, POST-BIBLICAL HISTORY OF THE: IV PERIOD OF THE RENAISSANCE AND REFORMATION 1492–1650 (2010)
JEWS, POST-BIBLICAL HISTORY OF THE: V. BEGINNING OF THE MODERN ERA (1650–1750) (2010)
JEWS, POST-BIBLICAL HISTORY OF THE: VI. EMANCIPATION (1750–1948) (2010)
KAZIMIERCZYK, STANISLAW YOUSEF, ST. (2010)
LEDÓCHOWSKA, MARIA TERESA, BL. (2010)
LEDÓCHOWSKI, WLADIMIR (2010)
LITTLE BROTHERS OF JESUS (2010)
LITTLE MISSIONARY SISTERS OF CHARITY (2010)
LITTLE SISTERS OF THE POOR (2010)
MACKILLOP, MARY HELEN, ST. (2010)
MARIAN FATHERS (2010)
MARIANITES OF HOLY CROSS (2010)
MISSIONARIES OF CHARITY (2010)
MISSIONARY SISTERS OF ST. PETER CLAVER (2010)
OBLATES OF ST. JOSEPH (2010)
OPUS DEI (2010)
PAULINE FATHERS AND BROTHERS (2010)
PERPETUAL ADORATION OF THE BLESSED SACRAMENT, NUNS OF THE (2010)
PORTILLO, ALVARO DEL (2010)
PRECIOUS BLOOD SISTERS: I. ADORERS OF THE BLOOD OF CHRIST (2010)
PRECIOUS BLOOD SISTERS: II. SISTERS OF THE MOST PRECIOUS BLOOD (2010)
PRECIOUS BLOOD SISTERS: III. SISTERS OF THE PRECIOUS BLOOD (2010)
REDEMPTION (THEOLOGY OF) (2010)
ROSAL VÁSQUEZ, MARÍA VICENTA, BL. (2010)
ROSMINIANS (2010)
SACRAMENTINE SISTERS OF BERGAMO (2010)
SACRED HEARTS OF JESUS AND MARY, CONGREGATION OF THE (2010)
SISTERS OF PROVIDENCE OF ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS (2010)

SONS OF DIVINE PROVIDENCE (2010)
ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST, SISTERS OF (2010)
TERESIAN ASSOCIATION (2010)
VENERINI SISTERS (2010)

Laurie J. Edwards
Independent Scholar
Reidsville, NC
ACOSTA ZURITA, DARÍO, BL. (2010)
ALBERIONE, JAMES, BL. (2010)
ALPANDEIRE, LEOPOLDO DE, BL. (2010)
ASCENSIÓN DEL CORAZÓN DE JESÚS, BL. (2010)
BADANO, CHIARA, BL. (2010)
BALICKI, JAN (JOHN), BL. (2010)
BATTHYÁNY-STRATTMANN, LÁSZLÓ, BL. (2010)
BATTISTA DA VARANO, CAMILLA, ST. (2010)
CURCIO, MARIA CROCIFISSA, BL. (2010)
CZARTORYSKI, AUGUSTO, BL. (2010)
DA COSTA, ALEXANDRINA MARIA, BL. (2010)
DARONCH, ADÍLIO, BL. (2010)
DJIDJOV, PAVEL, BL. (2010)
ELIA DI SAN CLEMENTE, BL. (2010)
EUPHRASIA OF THE SACRED HEART OF JESUS, BL. (2010)
FABRIS, EUROSIA, BL. (2010)
FERNANDES, BARTOLOMEU DEI MARTIRI, BL. (2010)
FLESCH, MARGARET, BL. (2010)
JOSÉ APARICIO SANZ AND 232 COMPANIONS, MARTYRS OF THE SPANISH CIVIL WAR, BB. (2010)
JOSEPH TÀPIES AND SIX COMPANIONS, BB. (2010)
LOZANO GARRIDO, MANUEL, BL. (2010)
MANGANIELLO, TERESA, BL. (2010)
PETER KIBE KASUI AND 187 COMPANIONS, MARTYRS OF NAGASAKI (JAPAN), BB. (2010)
TOUS Y SOLER, JOSÉ, BL. (2010)

Rev. Giorgio Eldarov, OFMConv
Director
Archivio cattolico bulgaro di Roma (Rome)
BOSSILKOV, EVGENIJ, BL. (2003)

Robert L. Fastiggi
Professor of Systematic Theology
Sacred Heart Major Seminary
Detroit, Mich.
ACTA APOSTOLICAE SEDIS (2010)
AFTERLIFE: I. PRIMITIVE SOCIETIES (2010)
AFTERLIFE: II. THE BIBLE (2010)
AFTERLIFE: III. ANCIENT GREECE AND ROME (2010)
AFTERLIFE: IV. ANCIENT EGYPT AND MESOPOTAMIA (2010)
AFTERLIFE: V. PERSIA, INDIA, AND CHINA (2010)
AFTERLIFE: VI. JUDAISM (2010)
AFTERLIFE: VII. ISLAM (2010)
AFTERLIFE: VIII. CHRISTIANITY (2010)
ALLOCUTION, PAPAL (2010)
ALUMBRADOS (ILLUMINATI) (2010)
ANGLICANORUM COETIBUS (2010)
BÉRULLE, PIERRE DE (2010)
BEATIFICATION (2010)
CATECHISMS (2010)
DEACONESS (2010)
DENZINGER (2010)
DEVIL (2010)
ECCLESIA DE EUCHARISTIA (2010)
EX CORDE ECCLESIAE (2010)
HELL (THEOLOGY OF) (2010)
HERESY, HISTORY OF: I. EARLY CHURCH (2010)
HERESY, HISTORY OF: II. MEDIEVIL PERIOD (2010)
HERESY, HISTORY OF: III. MODERN PERIOD (2010)
HERESY, HISTORY OF: IV. AFTER VATICAN II (2010)
MANDATUM, ACADEMIC (2010)
MARY (AND ECUMENICAL DIALOGUE) (2010)
MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN (IN THEOLOGY): I. HOLINESS OF MARY (2010)
MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN (IN THEOLOGY): III. MARY AND THE CHURCH (2010)
PEREIRA, NUNO DE SANTA MARIA ÁLVARES, ST. (2010)
QUIETISM (2010)
ROSMINI-SERBATI, ANTONIO, BL. (2010)
WILLEBRANDS, JOHANNES (2010)

Rev. Vincent J. Fecher, SVD
Christ the King Seminary
Manila, Philippines
DIVINE WORD, SOCIETY OF THE (2003)
JANSSEN, ARNOLD, ST. (2003)

Msgr. Fernando B. Felices
Pastor
Gruta de Lourdes Parish
Archdiocese of San Juan, PR
HELL, HARROWING OF (2010)
SPAIN (THE CHURCH DURING THE SPANISH REPUBLIC AND THE CIVIL WAR: 1931–1939) (2010)

Rabbi Asher Finkel
Professor of Jewish-Christian Studies
Seton Hall University
JEWS, POST-BIBLICAL HISTORY OF THE: VII. CONTEMPORARY HISTORY (1948–2009) (2010)

Eugene J. Fisher
Associate Director, Emeritus
Secretariat for Ecumenical & Interreligious Affairs
U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops
JEWISH-CATHOLIC RELATIONS (PUBLIC) (2010)

Rev. Hilary C. Franco
National Office of the Propagation of the Faith
New York, N.Y.
SLAVERY: I. (IN THE BIBLE) (2003)

Rev. Lawrence E. Frizzell
Institute of Judaeo-Christian Studies
Seton Hall University
JEWISH-CATHOLIC RELATIONS (THEOLOGICAL DIMENSIONS OF) (2010)

Mary Frohlich
Associate Professor of Spirituality
Catholic Theological Union
Chicago, Ill.
RAPTURE (2003)

William J. Fulco, SJ
Alma College
Los Gatos, Calif.

TAPARELLI D'AZEGLIO, LUIGI (2003)

Rev. Robert A. Gahl, Jr.
Associate Profess of Ethics
Pontifical University of the Holy Cross
Rome, Italy
ESCRIVÁ DE BALAGUER Y ALBÁS, JOSEMARÍA, ST. (2010)

Idella J. Gallagher
Assistant Professor of Philosophy
Boston College
Chestnut Hill, Mass.
BERGSON, HENRI LOUIS (2003)

Mother Mary Alice Gallin, OSU
Associate Professor of History and Chairman of the Department
College of New Rochelle
New Rochelle, N.Y.
GALEN, CLEMENS AUGUSTINUS VON, BL. (2003)

Sister Adolfa Gallo, CSJB
Retreat Coordinator
St. Joseph's Villa House of Retreats
Peapack, N.J.
ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST, SISTERS OF (2003)

Angel Maria Garibay Kintana
Canon of the Chapter of Guadalupe
Mexico City, Mexico
GUADALUPE, OUR LADY OF (2003)

James Gaston
Associate Professor of History
Director
Humanities and Catholic Culture Program
Franciscan University of Steubenville
BUCKLEY JR., WILLIAM F. (2010)

Rev. Victor Joseph Gellhaus, OSB
Monk of St. Benedict's Abbey and Professor of History
St. Benedict's College
Atchison, Kans.
MONASTICISM: II. MEDIEVAL MONASTICISM (600–1500) (2003)

Judith Marie Gentle
Adjunct professor of Theology
Franciscan University of Steubenville
Steubenville, Ohio
DUFF, FRANK (2010)
MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN (IN THEOLOGY): V. SPIRITUAL MATERNITY OF MARY (2010)

Mark B. Giszczak
Ph.D. Student
School of Theology and Religious Studies
The Catholic University of America
Washington, D.C.
PAPCZYŃSKI, STANISLAUS OF JESUS AND MARY, BL. (2010)
TRČKA, METOD DOMINIK, BL. (2010)

Msgr. Thomas J. Green
Stephan Kuttner Professor of Canon Law
The Catholic University of America
Washington, D.C.
EXCOMMUNICATION (2003)
MCMANUS, FREDERICK (2010)

Rev. Austin Edward Green, OP
Novice Master for Laybrothers
Professor of Church History
Aquinas Institute
River Forest, Ill.
BEATIFICATION (2003)

Rev. Jean Gribomont, OSB
Prior
Pontifical Abbey of St. Jerome
Rome, Italy
MONASTICISM: I. EARLY CHRISTIAN MONASTICISM (TO 600) (2003)
MONASTICISM: V. EASTERN MONASTICISM UNTIL 1453 (2003)

William D. Griffin
Professor of History
St. John's University
New York
FAWKES, GUY (2010)
IRISH NATIONALISM AND THE PAPACY (2010)

Rev. Msgr. Vittorio Guerrera, RC
Priest of the Archdiocese of Hartford
SHROUD OF TURIN (2010)

Sister Mary Octavia Gutman, CPPS
General Councilor and Secretary-General
Congregation of the Sisters of the Precious Blood
Dayton, Ohio
PRECIOUS BLOOD SISTERS: III. SISTERS OF THE PRECIOUS BLOOD (2003)

Rev. Michael A. Guzik, SJ
Instructor of History and Religion
Canisius High School
Buffalo, NY
PILSUDSKI, JOZEF (2010)

Ryan M. Haber
Independent Researcher
Kensington, MD
PALOMINO YENES, EUSEBIA, BL. (2010)
PAQUAY, VALENTIN, BL. (2010)
PAVONI, LODOVICO, BL. (2010)

Rev. Paul Haffner
Full Professor
Department of Theology
Pontifical Athenaeum Regina Apostolorum
Visiting Professor
The Pontifical Gregorian University
Rome, Italy
JAKI, STANLEY (2010)
MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN (IN THEOLOGY): IV. MEDIATRIX OF ALL GRACES (2010)

Curtis Hancock
Professor
Rockhurst University
Kansas City, Missouri
DIVINI ILLIUS MAGISTRI (2010)

Rev. Thomas O'Brien Hanley, SJ
Assistant Professor of History
Marquette University
CHURCH AND STATE IN THE UNITED STATES (LEGAL HISTORY): I. COLONIAL PERIOD (1607–1776) (2003)

Rev. Edgar G. Hardwick, OMI
Doctorate in Scholastic Philosophy (Valladolid)
Coldham Cottage
Lawshall, England
HELL (THEOLOGY OF) (2003)

Richard P. Harmond
Professor Emeritus of American History
St. John's University
New York
AMERICA (2010)
AMERICAN CIVIL WAR, PAPAL STANCE TOWARDS (2010)
GREELEY, ANDREW M. (2010)

Rev. Brian Harrison, OS
Associate Professor (Emeritus) of Theology
Pontifical Catholic University of Puerto Rico
Scholar-in-Residence
Oblates of Wisdom Study Center
St. Louis, Missouri
LIMBO (2010)

Rev. Louis F. Hartman, CSSR
Professor of Semitic Languages and Literatures
The Catholic University of America
Washington, D.C.
DEVIL (2003)

Rev. James L. Heft, SM
Alton Brooks Professor of Religion
University of Southern California
President
Institute for Advanced Catholic Studies
EDUCATION, CATHOLIC (HIGHER) IN THE UNITED STATES (2010)

Kimberly M. Henkel
PhD Candidate
School of Theology and Religious Studies
The Catholic University of America
CASSANT, JOSEPH-MARIE, BL. (2010)
CHAPPOTIN DE NEUVILLE, HELÉNÈ DE, BL. (2010)

Very Rev. Edward L. Heston, CSC
Procurator and Postulator General
Congregation of Holy Cross
Rome, Italy
HOLY CROSS, CONGREGATION OF (2003)
MOREAU, BASIL ANTHONY, BL. (2003)

Rev. Paul J. Hill
Professor of Theology
Dean of Studies
Spiritual Prefect of Scholastics
Sacred Heart Seminary
Shelby, Ohio
LIMBO (2003)

James Hitchcock
Professor
Department of History
St. Louis University
St. Louis, Mo.
AMERICANISM (2010)
BAKER, DAVID AUGUSTINE (2010)
FELLOWSHIP OF CATHOLIC SCHOLARS (2010)
LIBERALISM (2010)

Rev. Louis J. Hoffman, SF
Superior
Holy Family Seminary
Silver Spring, Md.
HOLY FAMILY, SONS OF THE (2003)

Rev. Kurt Hruby
Chargé de cours (Rabbinic Hebrew)
Institut Catholique
Paris, France
JEWS, POST-BIBLICAL HISTORY OF THE: I. ROMAN AND BYZANTINE PERIOD (67–622) (2003)
JEWS, POST-BIBLICAL HISTORY OF THE: II. ISLAMIC PERIOD (622–1096) (2003)
JEWS, POST-BIBLICAL HISTORY OF THE: III. PERIOD OF THE CRUSADES AND SPANISH INQUISITION (1096–1492)(2003)
JEWS, POST-BIBLICAL HISTORY OF THE: IV PERIOD OF THE RENAISSANCE AND REFORMATION 1492–1650 (2003)
JEWS, POST-BIBLICAL HISTORY OF THE: V. BEGINNING OF THE MODERN ERA (1650–1750) (2003)
JEWS, POST-BIBLICAL HISTORY OF THE: VI. EMANCIPATION (1750–1948) (2003)

Michael Hryniuk
Executive Director
Henri Nouwen Society
Richmond Hill, Ontario
NOUWEN, HENRI JOZEF MACHIEL (2010)

Thomas C. Hunt
Professor
Department of Teacher Education
University of Dayton
EDUCATION, CATHOLIC (K THROUGH 12) IN THE UNITED STATES (2010)

Elizabeth Inserra
Independent Scholar
New York, New York
498 MARTYRS OF THE SPANISH CIVIL WAR, BB. (2010)
BIRAGHI, LUIGI, BL. (2010)
BOCCARDO, LUIGI, BL. (2010)
BONHOMME, PIERRE, BL. (2010)

BONIFACIO (DI PIRANO), FRANCESCO GIOVANNI, BL. (2010)
BRADER, MARÍA CARIDAD, BL. (2010)
BRANDO, MARIA CRISTINA, BL. (2010)
CANDELARIA OF ST. JOSEPH, BL. (2010)
CELESTINA OF THE MOTHER OF GOD, BL. (2010)
CHARLES OF AUSTRIA, BL. (2010)
CHICHKOV, JOSAPHAT, BL. (2010)
DURANDO, MARCANTONIO, BL. (2010)
ERRICO, GAETANO, ST. (2010)
FREINADEMETZ, JOSEPH, ST. (2010)
GORAZDOWSKI, ZYGMUNT, ST. (2010)
IGNATIUS OF SANTHIÀ, ST. (2010)
IZQUIERDO ALBERO, MARÍA DEL PILAR, BL. (2010)
JÄGERSTÄTTER, FRANZ, BL. (2010)
LÓPEZ DE MATURANA, MARGARITA MARÍA, BL. (2010)
LLUCH, JUANA MARÍA CONDESA, BL. (2010)
LONGHIN, ANDREW (ANDREA) HYACINTH, BL. (2010)
MOTHER TERESA OF CALCUTTA, BL. (2010)
PIANZOLA, FRANCESCO, BL. (2010)
SIMON (SZYMON) OF LIPNICA, ST. (2010)
STERNI, GAETANA, BL. (2010)
SURIANO, GIUSEPPINA, BL. (2010)
SZYMKOWIAK, SANCJA (SANTIA), BL. (2010)
TALAMONI, LUIGI, BL. (2010)
TARRÉS I CLARET, PERE (PETER), BL. (2010)
ZEGRÍ Y MORENO, JUAN NEPOMUCENO, BL. (2010)

Massimo Introvigne
Managing Director
Center for Studies on New Religions (CESNUR)
Torino, Italy
BLACK MASS (2010)

James M. Jacobs
Professor of Philosophy
Notre Dame Seminary
New Orleans
DETERMINISM (2010)

Most Rev. Sarhad Jammo
Chaldean Catholic Diocese of St. Peter the Apostle
San Diego, CA
ADDAI AND MARI, ANAPHORA OF (2010)

Very Rev. Eugène Jarry
Professor
Faculté des Lettres
Faculté de Théologic
Institut Cathotique
Paris, France
STATES OF THE CHURCH (2003)

Rev. Andrew Jaspers, SJ
Resident Instructor
Department of Philosophy
Creighton University
Omaha, Neb.
PRAETER INTENTIONEM (2010)

Rev. Frederick M. Jelly, OP
Academic Dean
School of Theology
Pontifical College, Josephinum
Worthington, Ohio
MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN (IN THEOLOGY): III. MARY AND THE CHURCH (2003)

Charles B. Jones
Associate Dean for Graduate Studies
School of Theology and Religious Studies
The Catholic University of America
Washington, D.C.
BUDDHISM (2003)
BUDDHISM (2010)

Christopher Jones
Independent Scholar
Midi-Pyrenees, France
CAGOTS (2010)

Henry P. Köster
Professor of Sacred Scripture
Associate Dean of Studies
Divine Word Seminary
Techny, Ill.
AFTERLIFE: II. THE BIBLE (2003)

Rev. Antony Chacko Kakkanatt, CMI
Vice-Postulator
St. Joseph's Monastery
Mannanam (India)
CHAVARA, KURIAKOSE (CYRIAC) ELIAS, BL. (2003)

Christopher J. Kauffman
Catholic Daughters of the Americas Professor of American Church History
The Catholic University of America
Washington, D.C.
KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS (2003)

Joseph M. Keating
The Catholic University of America
ANACLETO GONZÁLEZ FLORES AND NINE COMPANIONS, BB. (2010)
JACINTO DE LOS ÁNGELES AND JUAN BAUTISTA, BB. (2010)

Mary Louise Maytag Kennedy
Writer, philanthropist, and promoter of liturgical art
Pittsburgh, Pa.
ESCRIVÁ DE BALAGUER Y ALBÁS, JOSEMARÍA, ST. (2003)

John Ryle Kezel
Director
Campion Institute
Fordham Univeristy
New York
LUMINOUS MYSTERIES OF THE ROSARY (2010)

Daniel A. Kidd
President and Chief Executive Officer
Guest House, Inc.
GUEST HOUSE (2010)

A.J. Kim
Graduate Student
School of Theology and Religious Studies

The Catholic University of America
ÜFFING, MARIA EUTHYMIA (EMMA), BL. (2010)
MATTIAS, MARIA DE, ST. (2010)
MUTTATHUPANDATHU, ALPHONSA, ST. (2010)
ORIONE, LUIGI (LOUIS), ST. (2010)
VALDÉS, JOSÉ OLALLO, BL. (2010)

Rev. Thomas M. King, SJ
Professor
Department of Theology
Georgetown University
Washington, D.C.
BERGSON, HENRI LOUIS (2010)
SARTRE, JEAN-PAUL (2010)
TEILHARD DE CHARDIN, PIERRE (2010)

Sheila Marie Kirbos
Independent Researcher
Silver Spring, Md.
FUSCO, ALFONSO MARIA, BL. (2010)
FUSCO, TOMMASO MARIA, BL. (2010)
MOREAU, BASIL ANTHONY, BL. (2010)

Joseph A. Komonchak
Professor of Religion and Religious Education
The Catholic University of America
Washington, D.C.
EX CORDE ECCLESIAE (2003)

Msgr. Charles Kosanke
SS. Cyril and Methodius Seminary
Orchard Lake, Mich.
CARLEN, CLAUDIA (2010)

Rev. Joseph W. Koterski, SJ
Professor
Dept. of Philosophy
Fordham University
CISZEK, WALTER J. (2010)
CLARKE, W. NORRIS (2010)
COMMUNISM (2010)
MARXISM (2010)
NEOSCHOLASTICISM AND NEOTHOMISM (2010)

Stephen M. Krason
Professor of Political Science and Legal Studies
Franciscan University of Steubenville
SOCIETY OF CATHOLIC SOCIAL SCIENTISTS (2010)

Rev. Alex Kratz, OFM
Spiritual Director
Terra Sancta Pilgrimages
Detroit, MI
JERUSALEM, LATIN PATRIARCHATE OF (2010)

Rev. Lázaro I. Lamadrid, OFM
Historical Advisor for the Cause of Beatification of the Venerable Pedro de San José Betancur
BETANCUR (BETHANCOURT), PEDRO DE SAN JOSÉ (PETER OF ST. JOSEPH), ST. (2003)

Mathijs Lamberigts
Full Professor of Church History
K.U. Leuven
BATIFFOL, PIERRE (2010)

Rev. James H. Lambert, SM
Assistant General and Secretary-General of the Marist Fathers
Rome, Italy
VENERINI SISTERS (2003)

Rev. Vincent Anthony Lapomarda, SJ
Coordinator
Holocaust Collection, Department of History
College of the Holy Cross
Worcester, Mass.
CERIOLI, PAOLA ELISABETTA (COSTANZA), ST. (2003)

Rev. Francis Larkin, SSCC
National Director of the Enthronement of the Sacred Heart and Night Adoration in the Home
Washington, D.C.
SACRED HEARTS OF JESUS AND MARY, CONGREGATION OF THE (2003)

Mark S. Latkovic
Professor
School of Theology
Sacred Heart Major Seminary
Detroit, Mich.
CARITAS IN VERITATE (2010)
SIN (THEOLOGY OF) (2010)

Alexis Lavin
Teacher
Peoria Notre Dame High School
Peoria, Ill.
GUÉRIN, MOTHER THEODORE, ST. (2010)

Rev. Francis Xavier Lawlor, SJ
Professor of Dogmatic Theology
Weston College
COMMUNION OF SAINTS (2003)
EXCOMMUNICATION (2003)

Joyce Lazarus
Professor
Department of Modern Languages
Framingham State College, MA
FINALY AFFAIR (2010)

Very Rev. Claude Richard Leetham, IC
Peritus (Theological Advisor)
Vatican Council II
ROSMINIANS (2003)

Keith Lemna
Researcher
Center for World Catholicism
DePaul University
COMMUNION OF SAINTS (2010)

Damian X. Lenshek
PhD Student
School of Theology and Religious Studies
The Catholic Univesity of America

Washington, D.C.
FOUCAULD, CHARLES EUGÈNE DE, BL. (2010)
HADDAD, JACQUES GHAZIR, BL. (2010)
MARVELLI, ALBERTO, BL. (2010)
VEUSTER, JOSEPH DE (FR. DAMIEN), ST. (2010)

Miguel A. León
Assistant Professor
Department of History
State University of New York at Oneonta, N.Y.
ALLENDE, SALVADOR (2010)
GUTIÉRREZ, GUSTAVO (2010)

Elizabeth Lev
Adjunct Professor
Department of Art History
Duquesne University
Italian Campus, Rome
OTRANTO (ITALY), MARTYRS OF (2010)

Cynthia Little
Graduate Student
The Catholic University of America
Washington, D.C.
LIVIERO, CARLO (CHARLES), BL. (2010)

Rev. Antanas J. Liuima, SJ
Professor
History of Spirituality
Gregorian University
Rome, Italy
BÉRULLE, PIERRE DE (2003)

Rev. Antonio López, FSCB
Professor
John Paul II Institute
Washington, D.C.
GIUSSANI, LUIGI (2010)

Rev. Thaddeus MacVicar, OFMCap
Lector in Church History, Franciscan History, and Liturgy,
Mary Immaculate Friary, Glenclyffe
Garrison, N.Y.
BERNARD OF CORLEONE, ST. (2003)
FELIX OF NICOSIA, ST. (2003)

Sister Mary Rodger Madden, SP
Pilgrimage Coordinator
Sisters of Providence
Saint-Mary-of-the-Woods, Ind.
GUÉRIN, MOTHER THEODORE, ST. (2003)
SISTERS OF PROVIDENCE OF ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS (2003)

Rt. Rev. James A. Magner
Vice Rector for Business and Finance and Assistant Treasurer
The Catholic University of America
ANACLETO GONZÁLEZ FLORES AND NINE COMPANIONS, BB. (2003)

Carmina Magnusen Chapp
Academic Dean
Religious Studies Division
Saint Charles Borromeo Seminar
Philadelphia, Pa.
KILMARTIN, EDWARD J. (2010)
SOCIETY FOR CATHOLIC LITURGY (2010)

Emanuel P. Magro
Headmaster
Sacred Heart Minor Seminary
Victoria, Malta.
PRECA, GEORGE, ST.(2003)

Rev. Paul John Mahoney, OP
Professor of Theology
De Paul University
Chicago, Ill.
MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN (IN THEOLOGY): II. KNOWLEDGE AND FAITH OF MARY (2003)

Rev. Sabatino Majorano, CSSR
Professor of Theology
Accademia Alfonsiana
Roma
ALPHONSUS DE LIGUORI, ST. (2010)

Laurie Malashanko
Independent Scholar
Ann Arbor, Mich.
COMENSOLI, GERTRUDE CATERINA, ST. (2010)
FELIŃSKI, ZYGMUNT SZCZĘSNY, ST. (2010)
MARTIN, LOUIS, BL. (2010)
MARTIN, MARIE-ZÉLIE GUÉRIN, BL. (2010)
MILLERET, MARIE EUGENIE OF JESUS, ST. (2010)
SCHELINGOVÁ, ZDENKA CECILIA, BL. (2010)
TADINI, ARCÁNGELO, ST. (2010)
THÉRÈSE DE LISIEUX, ST. (2010)
VENERINI, ROSE, ST. (2010)
VOLPICELLI, CATERINA, ST. (2010)

Anna Mandiola
Independent Writer
Boston, Mass.
TERESIAN ASSOCIATION (2003)

Sister Margherita Frances Marchione, MPF
Professor Emerita
Languages
Fairleigh Dickinson University
FILIPPINI, LUCY, ST. (2003)
MARCONI, GUGLIELMO (2010)
MIT BRENNENDER SORGE (2010)

Rev. Berard L. Marthaler, OFMConv
Professor of Religious Education
The Catholic University of America
Washington, D.C.
MISSIONARIES OF CHARITY (2003)
MOTHER TERESA OF CALCUTTA, BL. (2003)

Rev. Thomas J. Massaro, SJ
Boston College School of Theology and Ministry
Chestnut Hill, MA
ATOMIC ENERGY (2010)

Susan A. Maurer
Instructor
Department of History, Political Science and Geography
Nassau Community College Garden City, New York

ALLENBY, EDMUND (2010)
CHARISMATIC RENEWAL, CATHOLIC (2010)
CURRAN, CHARLES (2010)
NATO, PAPAL REACTION TO (2010)

William E. May
Michael J. Mc-Givney Professor of Moral Theology
John Paul II Institute for Studies on Marriage and Family
Washington, D.C.
INTERNATIONAL THEOLOGICAL COMMISSION (2003)

Thomas T. McAvoy
Professor of History and Archivist
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Ind.
AMERICANISM (2003)

Elizabeth L. McCloskey
Ph.D. Candidate
School of Theology and Religious Studies
The Catholic University of America
MERZ, IVAN, BL. (2010)
MONTI, LUIGI MARIA, BL. (2010)
MONZA, LUIGI, BL. (2010)
NAMUNCURÁ, ZEPHERIN, BL. (2010)
NARDINI, PAUL JOSEF, BL. (2010)

John M. McDermott, SJ
Professor of Theology
Sacred Heart Major Seminary
CROSS, THEOLOGY OF THE (2010)
INTERNATIONAL THEOLOGICAL COMMISSION (2010)

Rev. Joseph I. McGuiness, OP
Chairman
Department of Theology
Marymount Manhattan College
New York, N.Y.
SIN (THEOLOGY OF) (2003)

Elizabeth-Jane P. McGuire
Doctoral Candidate
School of Theology and Religious Studies
The Catholic University of America
OROZCO, ALFONSO DE, ST. (2010)
PELCZAR, JÓZEF SEBASTIAN, ST. (2010)
PIDAL Y CHICO DE GUZMÁN, MARÍA MARAVILLAS DE JESÚS BATTISTA, ST. (2010)
VALLE, GIULIA NEMESIA, BL. (2010)
VAN LIESHOUT, EUSTÁQUIO, BL. (2010)

Rev. Steven J. McMichael
Associate Professor
Theology Department
University of Saint Thomas
Saint Paul, MN
FRANCISCANS, CONVENTUAL (2010)

John H. McNeely
Associate Professor of History
Texas Western College of the University of Texas
El Paso, Tex.
PERPETUAL ADORATION OF THE BLESSED SACRAMENT, NUNS OF THE (2003)

Msgr. Paul McPartlan
Professor of Systematic Theology and Ecumenism
The Catholic University of America
Washington, D.C.
SISTER CHURCHES (2010)

Rev. Edward D. McShane, SJ
Profosser of Church History
Alma College
Los Gatos, Calif.
HERESY, HISTORY OF: III. MODERN PERIOD (2003)

Rev. David V. Meconi, SJ
Asst. Professor of Patristic Theology
Saint Louis University
Saint Louis, MO
DIVINIZATION (THEOSIS), DOCTRINE OF (2010)
THEURGY, DOCTRINE OF (2010)

Most Rev. Basil Meeking
Bishop Emeritus of Christchurch
New Zealand
WILLEBRANDS, JOHANNES (2003)

Rev. Thomas Michel, SJ
Woodstock Theological Center
Georgetown University
CATHOLIC-MUSLIM DIALOGUE (2010)

Timothy A. Milford
Associate Professor
Department of History
St. John's University
New York
AMERICAN REVOLUTION, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH AND (2010)
BOY SCOUTS (2010)
LAMBETH ARTICLES (2010)
TOLERATION ACTS OF 1639 AND 1649, MARYLAND (2010)

Mark Miravalle
Full Professor of Theology and Mariology
Franciscan University of Steubenville
ARMY OF MARY (2010)
OUR LADY OF ALL NATIONS (2010)

Rev. Martin X. Moleski, SJ
Professor
Department of Religious Studies and Theology
Canisius College
Buffalo, New York
POLANYI, MICHAEL (2010)

Rev. Paul Molinari, SJ
Professor
Pontifical Gregorian University
Rome, Italy
LEDÓCHOWSKA, MARIA TERESA, BL. (2003)
LEDÓCHOWSKI, WLADIMIR (2003)
MISSIONARY SISTERS OF ST. PETER CLAVER (2003)

Rev. Francis J. Moloney, SDB
Professor of Biblical Studies
The Catholic University of America
Washington, D.C.
INTERNATIONAL THEOLOGICAL COMMISSION (2003)

Renato Mori
Professor of the History of the Risorgimento
University of Rome
Italy
STATES OF THE CHURCH (2003)

Matthew J. Mullaney, Jr.
Assistant Corporation Counsel for the District of Columbia
Washington, D.C.
CHURCH AND STATE IN THE UNITED STATES (LEGAL HISTORY): II. THE DISESTABLISHMENT PERIOD (1776–1834) (2003)

Rev. Francis Xavier Murphy, CSSR
Professor of Patristic Moral Theology
Accademia Alfonsiana
Rome, Italy
BATIFFOL, PIERRE (2003)
CHURCH, HISTORY OF: I. EARLY (2003)

Rev. John F. Murphy
St. Francis Seminary
Milwaukee, Wis.
MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN (IN THEOLOGY): I. HOLINESS OF MARY (2003)

Rev. James G. Murtagh
Pastor
St. Roch's Church
Glen Iris, Melbourne, Australia
MACKILLOP, MARY HELEN, ST. (2003)

Sister Angelita Myerscough, AdPPS
Instructor in Theology
St. Louis University
St. Louis, Mo.
PRECIOUS BLOOD SISTERS: I. ADORERS OF THE BLOOD OF CHRIST (2003)

Thomas F. X. Noble
Director of the Medieval Institute
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Ind.
STATES OF THE CHURCH (2003)

Rev. Gerald O'Collins, SJ
Research Professor in Theology
St. Mary's University College
Twickenham, UK
DUPUIS, JACQUES (2010)

Timothy T. O'Donnell
President
Christendom College
DIVINE MERCY, DEVOTION TO (2010)

Rev. James A. O'Donohoe, OMI
Professor of Canon Law and Moral Theology
St. John's Seminary
Brighton, Mass.
SEMINARY EDUCATION (2003)

Julia L. Ortiz-Griffin
Professor of Spanish language and Liturature
City University of New York
FRANCO, FRANCISCO (2010)
PERON, JUAN DOMINGO (2010)
SALAZAR, ANTÓNIO DE OLIVEIRA (2010)

Peter D. Partner
House Master
Winchester College
Winchester, England
STATES OF THE CHURCH (2003)

Brian Pedraza
Graduate Student
School of Theology and Religious Studies
The Catholic University of America
CHLUDZIŃSKA V. BORZĘCKA, CELINA, BL. (2010)
CORAZÓN TÉLLEZ ROBLES, MATILDE DEL SAGRADO, BL. (2010)
HÖSS, CRESCENTIA, ST. (2010)
HOUBEN, CHARLES OF MOUNT ARGUS, ST. (2010)
HURTADO CRUCHAGA, ALBERTO, ST. (2010)

Ramiro Pellitero
Adjunct Professor of Pastoral Theology
Universidad de Navarra, Spain
OPUS DEI (2003)

Kenneth Pennington
Professor
The Catholic University of America
Washington, D.C.
CAESAROPAPISM (2010)

Rev. Eugene Leo Peterman, CP
Professor of Systematic and Spiritual Theology
St. Meinrad Seminary
St. Meinrad, Ind.
REDEMPTION (THEOLOGY OF) (2003)

Edward Peters
Professor of Canon Law
Sacred Heart Seminary
DIOCESE (2010)
EXCOMMUNICATION (2010)
INTERDICT (2010)

Rev. Vincent F. Petriccione, TOR
Archivist of the TOR in the Americas
St. Francis College
Loretto, Pa.
HÖSS, CRESCENTIA, ST. (2003)

Rev. Giorgio Picasso, OSBOliv
Monk of the Abbey of Seregno, Milan
BENEDICTINES, OLIVETAN (2003)

Joseph C. Polking
Assistant to Staff Editor for Canon and Civil Law

New Catholic Encyclopedia
The Catholic University of America
Washington, D.C.
- CHURCH AND STATE IN THE UNITED STATES (LEGAL HISTORY): III. PERIOD OF CONFLICT (1834–1900) (2003)

Rev. Andrew J. Pollack, CPPS
Assistant Professor of History, Patrology, and Oriental Theology
St. Charles Seminary
Carthagena, Ohio
- BUFALO, GASPARE DEL, ST. (2003)
- MATTIAS, MARIA DE, ST. (2003)

Beth Porter
Director of Educational Initiatives and Publications
L'Arche Canada
Richmond Hill, Ontario
- ARCHE, L' (2010)
- VANIER, JEAN (2010)

Rev. Léon J. Pouliot, SJ
Historical Researcher
Collège Sainte Marie
Montreal, Canada
- BOURGET, IGNACE (2003)

Katherine I. Rabenstein
Senior Credentialing Specialist
American Nurses Association
Washington, D.C.
- ARNÁIZ BARÓN, RAFAEL, ST. (2003)
- AVIAT, FRANCESCA SALESIA, ST. (2003)
- BÜTLER, MARÍA BERNARDA, ST. (2003)
- BESSETTE, ANDRÉ, ST. (2003)
- CATANOSO, GAETANO (CAJETAN), ST. (2003)
- CENTURIONE BRACELLI, VIRGINIA, ST. (2003)
- CHAVARA, KURIAKOSE (CYRIAC) ELIAS, BL. (2003)
- COLL Y GUITART, FRANCISCO, ST. (2003)
- COMBONI, DANIELE, ST. (2003)
- COMENSOLI, GERTRUDE CATERINA, ST. (2003)
- FRANCIA, ANNIBALE MARIA DI, ST. (2003)
- FRASSINELLO, BENEDETTA CAMBIAGIO, ST. (2003)
- GALVÃO, ANTHONY OF SAINT ANNE, ST. (2003)
- GIACCARDO, TIMOTEO, BL. (2003)
- GUERRERO GONZÁLEZ, ANGELA DE LA CRUZ, ST. (2003)
- HOUBEN, CHARLES OF MOUNT ARGUS, ST. (2003)
- HURTADO CRUCHAGA, ALBERTO, ST. (2003)
- JUGAN, JEANNE, ST. (2003)
- KASSAB, NIMATULLAH AL-HARDINI YOUSEF, ST. (2003)
- KAZIMIERCZYK, STANISLAW YOUSEF, ST. (2003)
- LEDÓCHOWSKA, URSZULA (URSULA), ST. (2003)
- MANYANET Y VIVES, JOSÉ (JOSEPH), ST. (2003)
- MARELLO, GIUSEPPE (JOSEPH), ST. (2003)
- MARTILLO MORÁN, NARCISA DE JESÚS, ST. (2003)
- MOLLA, GIANNA (JOAN) BERETTA, ST. (2003)
- MUTTATHUPANDATHU, ALPHONSA, ST. (2003)
- PELCZAR, JÓZEF SEBASTIAN, ST. (2003)
- PIDAL Y CHICO DE GUZMÁN, MARÍA MARAVILLAS DE JESÚS BATTISTA, BL. (2003)
- POVEDA CASTROVERDE, PEDRO, ST. (2003)
- ROSAL VÁSQUEZ, MARÍA VICENTE, BL. (2003)
- RUBIO Y PERALTA, JOSÉ MARÍA, ST. (2003)
- SMALDONE, FILIPPO MARIANO, ST. (2003)
- TADINI, ARCÁNGELO, ST. (2003)
- TORRES MORALES, GENOVEVA, ST. (2003)
- VISINTAINER, AMABILE LUCIA, ST. (2003)
- VOLPICELLI, CATERINA, ST. (2003)

John Radzilowski
Assistant Professor of History
University of Alaska Southeast
- ROMA (GYPSIES) (2010)

Patrick Reilly
President
Cardinal Newman Society
Manassas, Va.
- CARDINAL NEWMAN SOCIETY (2010)

Rev. Joel Rippinger, OSB
Subprior
Marmion Abbey
Aurora, Ill.
- MONASTICISM: III. MODERN MONASTICISM (1500–1960) (2003)
- MONASTICISM: IV. CONTEMPORARY MONASTICISM (1960–2009) (2003)

William Roberts
Professor of History and Social Sciences
Fairleigh Dickinson University
Teaneck, N.J.
- AUBERT, ROGER (2010)
- AVENIR, L' (2010)
- BERNADETTE OF LOURDES, ST. (2010)
- CARDINAL SECRETARY OF STATE (2010)
- CHURCH, HISTORY OF: IV. LATE MODERN: 1789–2009 (2010)
- DE GAULLE, CHARLES (2010)
- DREYFUS AFFAIR (2010)
- GALLICAN LIBERTIES (2010)
- JACOBINS (2010)

Rev. Pierre J. Roche, CSSR
Independent Scholar
Dreux, France
- HERESY, HISTORY OF: I. EARLY CHURCH (2003)

Rev. Peter-Thomas Rohrbach, OCD
Prior
Discalced Carmelite Monastery
Washington, D.C.
- THÉRÈSE DE LISIEUX, ST. (2003)

Michael Root
Professor of Systematic Theology
Lutheran Theological Southern Seminary
Columbia, S.C.
- JUSTIFICATION, JOINT DECLARATION ON (2010)
- LUTHERANISM (2010)

Ino Rossi
Professor
Department of Sociology and Anthropology
St. John's University
New York City
IMPRIMATUR (2010)

Rev. François Rossier, SM
Executive Director
Marian Library-International
University of Dayton
MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN (IN THE BIBLE) (2010)

Rev. Antonio S. Rosso, OFM
Pontificio Ateneo Antoniano
Rome, Italy
BUDDHISM (2003)

Tracey Rowland
Dean and Permanent Fellow in Political Philosophy and Continental Theology
John Paul II Institute for Marriage and Family (Melbourne)
BENEDICT XVI, POPE (2009)
BENEDICT XVI, POPE (2010)

Rev. Neil J. Roy
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame Ind.
BEAURAING (BELGIUM), APPARITIONS OF OUR LADY OF (2010)
BOURGET, IGNACE (2010)
PROTOEVANGELIUM OF JAMES (2010)

Rev. Jose Antonio Rubio
Director of Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs
Diocese of San Jose
Santa Clara, California
CUAUHTLATOATZIN, JUAN DIEGO, ST. (2003)

Rev. Martin P. Rzeszutek, MIC
Superior
Marian Fathers Scholasticate
Washington, D.C.
MARIAN FATHERS (2003)
PAPCZYŃSKI, STANISLAUS OF JESUS AND MARY, BL. (2003)

Gregory B. Sadler
Assistant Professor
Department of Government and History
Fayetteville State University, N.C.
ACTION FRANÇAISE (2010)

Robert Saley
Graduate Student
School of Theology and Religious Studies
The Catholic University of America
Washington, D.C.
LEDÓCHOWSKA, URSZULA (URSULA), ST. (2010)
MANYANET Y VIVES, JOSÉ (JOSEPH), ST. (2010)
MARTILLO MORÁN, NARCISA DE JESÚS, ST. (2010)
STENMANNS, JOSEPHA HENDRINA, BL. (2010)
TOVINI, MOSES, BL. (2010)

José M. Sánchez
Professor Emeritus of History
Saint Louis University
St. Louis, Mo.
PIUS XII, POPE (2010)

Gabriel Michel Sanders
Associate Professor of Ancient History
University of Ghent, Belgium
AFTERLIFE: III. ANCIENT GREECE AND ROME (2003)

Rev. Msgr. Robert J. Sarno
Study Adjutant
Congregation for the Causes of Saints
Visiting Professor of Canon Law
Pontifical Urbanian University, Rome
Professor of Theology
Emmanuel School of Mission (Rome)
External Judge of the Tribunal of Appeals for the for the Diocese of Rome
CANONIZATION OF SAINTS (HISTORY AND PROCEDURE) (2010)
SAINTS AND BLESSEDS (2010)

Roland Sarti
Professor Emeritus
Department of History
University of Massachusetts, Amherst
CAVOUR, GUSTAVO BENSO DI (2010)
D'ANNUNZIO, GABRIELE (2010)
GARIBALDI, GIUSEPPE (2010)
MAZZINI, GIUSEPPE (2010)
MUSSOLINI, BENITO (2010)

Kevin E. Schmiesing
Research Fellow
Acton Institute
Executive Director
CatholicHistory.net
CUOMO, MARIO M. (2010)

Kenneth Schmitz
University of Toronto
John Paul II Institute
Washington, D.C.
PERSONALISM (2010)

Richard J. Schoeck
Professor of English
St. Michael's College
University of Toronto
Ontario, Canada
MORE, SIR THOMAS, ST. (2003)

Sr. Katarina Schuth, OSF
Director of Planning and Registrar
Weston School of Theology
Cambridge, Mass.
SEMINARY EDUCATION (2003)

Robert W. Shaffern
Professor
Department of History
University of Scranton
BENEDICT OF NURSIA, ST. (2010)
GREGORIAN CALENDAR (2010)

Elizabeth C. Shaw
Independent Scholar
Washington, D.C.

ARNÁIZ BARÓN, RAFAEL, ST. (2010)
AVIAT, FRANCESCA SALESIA, ST. (2010)
BÜTLER, MARÍA BERNARDA, ST. (2010)
BERNARD OF CORLEONE, ST. (2010)
BETANCUR (BETHANCOURT), PEDRO DE SAN JOSÉ (PETER OF ST. JOSEPH), ST. (2010)

Russell Shaw
Freelance Writer
Washington, D.C.
CALL TO ACTION (CONFERENCE) (2010)
LAGHI, PIO (2010)
PORTILLO, ALVARO DEL (2003)

Ann H. Shurgin
Independent Researcher
College Station, Texas
GARCÍA ZAVALA, MARÍA GUADALUPE, BL. (2010)
GINARD MARTÍ, MARÍA DE LOS ÁNGELES, BL. (2010)
GOJDIČ, PAVOL PETER, BL. (2010)
GONZÁLEZ, EMMANUEL GÓMEZ, BL. (2010)
HOPKO, VASIL', BL. (2010)
IRWA, JILDO, BL. (2010)
OKELO, DAUDI, BL. (2010)
ORTIZ REAL, PIEDAD DE LA CRUZ, BL. (2010)

Neil P. Sloan
Research Assistant
Secretariat of Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs
United States Conference of Catholic Bishops
FINDYSZ, WŁADYSŁAW (LADISLAUS), BL. (2010)
MOLLA, GIANNA (JOAN) BERETTA, ST. (2010)
SMALDONE, FILIPPO MARIANO, ST. (2010)
TORRES MORALES, GENOVEVA, ST. (2010)
VISINTAINER, AMABILE LUCIA, ST. (2010)
WIECKA, MARTA MARIA, BL. (2010)

Gerard S. Sloyan
Professor of Religious Education and Head of the Department
The Catholic University of America
Washington, D.C.
CATECHISMS (2003)

Oswald Sobrino
Editor
Catholic Analysis
http://CatholicAnalysis.blogspot.com
BELTRAME QUATTROCCHI, LUIGI AND MARIA CORSINI, BB. (2010)
BERKENBROCK, ALBERTINA, BL. (2010)
BEYZYM, JAN (JOHN), BL. (2010)
CATHOLIC ANSWERS (2010)
CATHOLIC YOUTH ORGANIZATION (2010)

Rev. Placid D. Solari, OSB
Abbot
Belmont Abbey
Belmont, N.C.
MONASTICISM: I. EARLY CHRISTIAN MONASTICISM (TO 600) (2010)
MONASTICISM: II. MEDIEVAL MONASTICISM (600–1500) (2010)
MONASTICISM: III. MODERN MONASTICISM (1500–1960) (2010)
MONASTICISM: IV. CONTEMPORARY MONASTICISM (1960–2009) (2010)
MONASTICISM: V. EASTERN MONASTICISM UNTIL 1453 (2010)
MONASTICISM: VI. EASTERN MONASTICISM SINCE 1453 (2010)

Mary C. Sommers
Professor and Director
Center of Thomistic Studies
University of St. Thomas
Houston Tex.
OWENS, JOSEPH (2010)

Rev. Franco Giuseppe Sottocornola, SX
Vice Rector and Professor of Philosophy
Xaverian Missionary Fathers Major Seminary
Parma, Italy
SACRAMENTINE SISTERS OF BERGAMO (2003)

Rev. Thomas Špidlík, SJ
Professor of Eastern Spirituality
Pontifical Oriental Institute
Rome, Italy
MONASTICISM: VI. EASTERN MONASTICISM SINCE 1453 (2003)

Edward Sri
Provost and Professor of Theology
Augustine Institute
Denver, Colorado
MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, QUEENSHIP OF (2010)

Rev. Kurt Stasiak, OSB
Associate Professor of Sacramental/Liturgical Theology
Saint Meinrad School of Theology
Saint Meinrad, Ind.
LIMBO (2003)

John Sullivan
Publisher
Institute of Carmelite Studies
Washington, D.C.
STEIN, EDITH (TERESA BENEDICTA OF THE CROSS), ST. (2003)

Rev. Francis A. Sullivan, SJ
Professor Emeritus
Pontifical Gregorian University
Adjunct Professor
Boston College
SALVATION, NECESSITY OF THE CHURCH FOR (2010)

Liz Swain
Independent Scholar
San Diego, Cal.
PÉREZ, LEONARDO, BL. (2010)
PELLESI, MARIA ROSA, BL. (2010)
PETKOVIĆ, MARIA OF JESUS CRUCIFIED, BL. (2010)
PICCO, EUGENIA, BL. (2010)
POLONI, VINCENZA MARIA, BL. (2010)

RANGEL, JOSÉ TRINIDAD, BL. (2010)
RAVASCO, EUGENIA, BL. (2010)
REGGIO, TOMMASO, BL. (2010)
RENDU, ROSALIE, BL. (2010)
RITA AMADA DE JESUS, BL. (2010)
RODRÍGUEZ CASTRO, BONIFACIA, BL. (2010)
RODRÍGUEZ SOPEÑA, MARÍA DOLORES, BL. (2010)
ROMERO MENESES, MARÍA, BL. (2010)
SALKAHÁZI, SÁRA, BL. (2010)

Richard S. Sylvester
Associate Professor of English
Yale University
New Haven, Conn.
MORE, SIR THOMAS, ST. (2003)

Charles J.T. Talar
Professor
Graduate School of Theology
University of Saint Thomas
Houston, Tex.
MODERNISM (2010)

Rt. Rev. Ralph J. Tapia
Associate Professor of Theology
Fordham University
New York
CHARISM (2003)

Sister Mary Patrice Thaman, CPPS
Associate Professor of History
Marillac College
Normandy, Mo.
PRECIOUS BLOOD SISTERS: II. SISTERS OF THE MOST PRECIOUS BLOOD (2003)

Paul Thigpen
Executive Director
Stella Maris Center for Faith and Culture
Savannah, Georgia
NEW AGE MOVEMENT, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH AND (2010)
RAPTURE (2010)

Rev. Thomas A Thompson, SM
The Marian Library
University of Dayton
MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN (IN THEOLOGY): II. KNOWLEDGE AND FAITH OF MARY (2010)

Rev. Francis V. Tiso
Pastor
Parish of San Michele Arcangelo, Fornelli (IS) Diocese of Isernia-Venafro
Molise, Italy
BUDDHISM (2010)

Robert R. Tomes
Professor of History
St. John's University
Jamaca N.Y.
BOYS TOWN (2010)
KENNEDY FAMILY (2010)

Rev. David L. Toups
Associate Director
United States Conference of Catholic Bishops Secretariat of Clergy, Consecrated Life, and Vocations
SEMINARY EDUCATION (2010)

Joseph G. Trabbic
Assistant Professor
Department of Philosophy
Ave Maria University
AVE MARIA TOWN, AVE MARIA UNIVERSITY (2010)

Hans L. Trefousse
Distinguished Professor
Department of History
Brooklyn College and Graduate Center
City University of New York
ANTI-CATHOLICISM (UNITED STATES) (2010)
LINCOLN, ABRAHAM (2010)

Walter Ullmann
Professor of Medieval Ecclesiastical Institutions and Fellow of Trinity College University of Cambridge, England
DONATION OF CONSTANTINE (2003)

Rev. Brian Van Hove, SJ
White House Retreat
Saint Louis, Missouri
RESSOURCEMENT THEOLOGY (2010)

Lara Vapnek
Assistant Professor
Department of History
St. John's University
New York
BALTIMORE CATECHISM (2010)
LEGION OF DECENCY (2010)

Sr. Constance Carolyn Veit, LSP
Publications Coordinator
Little Sisters of the Poor
Baltimore, Md.
LITTLE SISTERS OF THE POOR (2003)

Rev. Louis Vereecke
Emeritus Professor
Accademia Alfonsiana, Roma
ALPHONSUS DE LIGUORI, ST. (2003)

Rev. Cyril Vollert, SJ
Professor of Dogmatic Theology
St. Louis University School of Divinity
St. Marys College
St. Marys, Kans.
MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN (IN THEOLOGY): III. MARY AND THE CHURCH (2003)

Rev. Chrysogonus Waddell, OCSO
Organist choirmaster, Professor of Liturgy
Abbey of Gethsemani, Ky.
CASSANT, JOSEPH-MARIE, BL. (2003)

Kent Wallace
Independent Researcher
Providence, R.I.
COPE, MARIANNE, BL. (2010)
EMMERICK, ANNA KATHARINA, BL. (2010)
GALEN, CLEMENS AUGUSTINUS VON, BL. (2010)

Gerard B. Wegemer
Professor
Department of English
University of Dallas
MORE, SIR THOMAS, ST. (2010)

Rev. James A. Weisheipl, OP
Associate Professor of History of Medieval Science
Pontifical Institute of Medieval Studies
Toranto, Canada
CAJETAN (TOMMASO DE VIO) (2003)

Rev. Jared Wicks, SJ
Professor
Department of Religious Studies
John Carroll University
CAJETAN (TOMMASO DE VIO) (2010)

Rev. Cornelius W. Williams, OP
Professor of Moral Theology
University of Fribourg
Switzerland
SLAVERY: II. (AND THE CHURCH) (2003)

Peter S. Williamson
Adam Cardinal Maida Chair in Sacred Scripture
Sacred Heart Major Seminary
Detroit, Mich.
CHARISM (2010)

Michael Wolfe
Professor of History
St. John's University
BENEDICT XIV-I AND BENEDICT XIV-II, ANTIPOPES (2010)
BORGIA, CESARE (2010)
CONSTANTINOPLE (BYZANTIUM, ISTANBUL) (2010)
NANTES, EDICT OF (2010)
STATES OF THE CHURCH (2010)

Richard J. Wolff
Chief Executive Officer
The Global Consulting Group
CATHOLIC WORKER MOVEMENT (2010)
DEMOCRACY, CHRISTIAN (2010)
FASCISM (2010)

Br. Leo E. Wollenweber, OFMCap
Vice-Postulator
Father Solanus Center
Detroit, Mich.
CASEY, SOLANUS (2010)

Jacob W. Wood
Ph.D. Student
Systematic Theology
The Catholic University of America
JUSTO DE OLIVEIRA, LINDALVA, BL. (2010)
KŁOPOTOWSKI, IGNATIUS, BL. (2010)
SOLÁ Y MOLIST, ANDRÉS, BL. (2010)
SOPOĆKO, MICHAŁ, BL. (2010)
SPOTO, FRANCESCO, BL. (2010)

Randall Woodard
Theology Department
Saint Leo University
HUMILIS DE BISIGNANO, ST. (2010)
TOLOMEI, BERNARD, ST. (2010)

Rebecca Bowman Woods
Independent Researcher
Cincinnati, Ohio
MASTENA, MARIA PIA, BL. (2010)
MENEGUZZI, LIDUINA, BL. (2010)
MERKERT, MARIA LUISA, BL. (2010)
NICOLI, GIUSEPPINA, BL. (2010)
SALZANO, GIULIA, ST. (2010)

Rev. Anthony J. Wouters, WF
Procurator General
Society of Missionaries of Africa
Rome, Italy
FOUCAULD, CHARLES EUGÈNE DE, BL. (2003)
LITTLE BROTHERS OF JESUS (2003)

Richard A. Yanikoski
President/CEO
Association of Catholic Colleges and Universities
Washington, D.C.
ASSOCIATION OF CATHOLIC COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES (2010)

Wanda Zemler-Cizewski
Associate Professor
Theology Department
Marquette University
Milwaukee, Wis.
CATHARI (2010)

Jack Zupko
Department of Philosophy
Emory University
Atlanta, Ga.
NOMINALISM (2010)

ABBREVIATIONS

The system of abbreviations used for the works of Plato, Aristotle, St. Augustine, and St. Thomas Aquinas is as follows: Plato is cited by book and Stephanus number only, e.g., Phaedo 79B; Rep. 480A. Aristotle is cited by book and Bekker number only, e.g., Anal. post. 72b 8—12; Anim. 430a 18. St. Augustine is cited as in the Thesaurus Linguae Latinae, e.g., C. acad.3.20.45; Conf. 13.38.53, with capitalization of the first word of the title. St. Thomas is cited as in scholarly journals, but using Arabic numerals. In addition, the following abbreviations have been used throughout the encyclopedia for biblical books and versions of the Bible.

Books

Acts	Acts of the Apostles
Am	Amos
Bar	Baruch
1-2 Chr	1 and 2 Chronicles (1 and 2 Paralipomenon in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Col	Colossians
1-2 Cor	1 and 2 Corinthians
Dn	Daniel
Dt	Deuteronomy
Eccl	Ecclesiastes
Eph	Ephesians
Est	Esther
Ex	Exodus
Ez	Ezekiel
Ezr	Ezra (Esdras B in Septuagint; 1 Esdras in Vulgate) Gal Galatians
Gn	Genesis
Hb	Habakkuk
Heb	Hebrews
Hg	Haggai
Hos	Hosea
Is	Isaiah
Jas	James
Jb	Job
Jdt	Judith
Jer	Jeremiah
Jgs	Judges
Jl	Joel
Jn	John
1-3 Jn	1, 2, and 3 John
Jon	Jonah
Jos	Joshua
Jude	Jude
1-2 Kgs	1 and 2 Kings (3 and 4 Kings in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Lam	Lamentations
Lk	Luke
Lv	Leviticus
Mal	Malachi (Malachias in Vulgate)
1-2 Mc	1 and 2 Maccabees
Mi	Micah
Mk	Mark
Mt	Matthew
Na	Nahum
Neh	Nehemiah (2 Esdras in Septuagint and Vulgate) Nm Numbers
Ob	Obadiah
Phil	Philippians
Phlm	Philemon
Prv	Proverbs
Ps	Psalms

1-2 Pt	1 and 2 Peter
Rom	Romans
Ru	Ruth
Rv	Revelation (Apocalypse in Vulgate)
Sg	Song of Songs Sir Sirach (Wisdom of Ben Sira; Ecclesiasticus in Septuagint and Vulgate)
1-2 Sm	1 and 2 Samuel (1 and 2 Kings in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Tb	Tobit
1-2 Thes	1 and 2 Thessalonians
Ti	Titus
1-2 Tm	1 and 2 Timothy
Wis	Wisdom
Zec	Zechariah
Zep	Zephaniah

Versions

Apoc	Apocrypha
ARV	American Standard Revised Version
ARVm	American Standard Revised Version, margin
AT	American Translation
AV	Authorized Version (King James)
CCD	Confraternity of Christian Doctrine
DV	Douay-Challoner Version
ERV	English Revised Version
ERVm	English Revised Version, margin
EV	English Version(s) of the Bible
JB	Jerusalem Bible
LXX	Septuagint
MT	Masoretic Text
NAB	New American Bible
NEB	New English Bible
NIV	New International Version
NJB	New Jerusalem Bible
NRSV	New Revised Standard Version
NT	New Testament
OT	Old Testament
RSV	Revised Standard Version
RV	Revised Version
RVm	Revised Version, margin
Syr	Syriac
Vulg	Vulgate

A

ACOSTA ZURITA, DARÍO, BL.

Baptized Ángel; priest, MARTYR; b. December 13, 1908 (birth date always given as the 13th, but birth certificate indicates the 20th), Naolinco, Mexico; d. July 25, 1931, Veracruz, Mexico; beatified by Pope BENEDICT XVI, November 15, 2005.

Ángel Darío Acosta Zurita, son of Leopoldo Acosta and Dominga Zurita, was baptized at St. Matthew the Apostle on December 23, 1908. Darío was born into a poor Christian family. He learned about hardship and sacrifice at an early age. His father, a butcher, lost his livestock and income during the armed revolts of the Mexican rebellion. Leopoldo Acosta died when Darío was a child, so Darío helped his widowed mother support his four brothers. He expressed an interest in the priesthood and wished to attend seminary, but because he was young and greatly needed by his family, he was not selected. His mother, at great sacrifice to herself and her family, appealed to Bishop Guízar Valencia to have her son admitted as an external student, as she was sure he would later receive a scholarship for his hard work and piety.

Ordained on April 25, 1931, Fr. Darío said his first Mass on May 24 in Veracruz. On May 26, Msgr. Guízar appointed him coadjutor vicar of Assumption Parish in Veracruz. Fr. Darío placed great emphasis on children's catechesis and the Sacrament of Penance. Persecution and violence during the Mexican Revolution put his life and that of the other priests in constant danger, but they asserted that they were ready to face whatever they must to fulfill their priestly duties.

Their resolve was tested in July 1931, when Governor Adalberto Tejada enacted Decree 197 to end religious fanaticism by decreasing the number of priests. Fr. Darío's notification came on July 21, but he did not comply. The law went into effect on July 25, but the priests of Assumption Parish ignored the directive. Children prepared to attend catechism, and adults went to confession. As Fr. Darío, who had just baptized a child, exited the baptistery, soldiers entered the three gates and, in front of the 2,000 children present, fired at the priests. Fr. Darío died instantly after exclaiming "Jesus!" Another priest, Fr. Landa, was severely wounded. On hearing the news, Bishop Guízar sent a letter to the governor indicating that the bloodshed would result in stronger devotion to God.

On November 15, 2005, Benedict XVI issued an Apostolic Letter calling Ángel Darío Acosta Zurita and twelve other Mexican martyrs "Blessed" and setting November 20 as the date of their yearly memorial. That same day, in a soccer stadium in Guadalajara, Mexico, Cardinal José Saraiva Martins recognized Fr. Darío's sacrifice of his life for the cause of Christ.

Feast: November 20.

SEE ALSO BEATIFICATION; MEXICO (MODERN), THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Benedict XVI, "Apostolic Letter by Which the Supreme Pontiff Benedict XVI Has Raised to the Glory of the Altars the Servants of God," (Apostolic Letter, November 15, 2005) Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/benedict_xvi/apost_letters/documents/hf_ben-xvi_apl_20051115_beatification-messico_en.html (accessed October 22, 2009).

Claretian Missionaries, "Presbítero Ángel Darío Acosta Zurita," Misioneros Claretianos de Mexico, available (in Spanish) from www.claret.org.mx/sola/Acosta%20Zurita.pdf (accessed July 8, 2009).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Ángel Darío Acosta Zurita (1908–1931)," Vatican Web site, November 15, 2005, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_lit_doc_20051120_acosta-zurita_en.html (accessed October 22, 2009).

Laurie J. Edwards
Independent Scholar
Reidsville, N.C. (2010)

ACT OF SUPREMACY (1534)

The Act of Supremacy, passed in November 1534, confirmed the royal supremacy of the English king, Henry VIII, and brought to fruition the Reformation that had been brewing in England since at least 1527, when Henry had petitioned Pope CLEMENT VII to annul his marriage to CATHERINE OF ARAGON so that he could be free to marry Anne Boleyn. In the period between 1527 and 1534, a number of acts were passed which moved England toward royal supremacy, and the wording on the 1534 act makes it very clear that it was confirming authority that the king already enjoyed: "The king's majesty justly and rightfully is and ought to be the supreme head of the Church of England, and so is recognized by the clergy of this realm at its convocations." Already recognized as the head of the Church of England by his clergy, the purpose of the act was not, therefore, to grant but to confirm the king's status; this meant that parliament would not be able to revoke the act at a later stage. The king's authority was to cover all his realms "united and annexed," which at the time included England, Wales, and Ireland. As supreme head, the king was entitled to "all honors, dignities, preeminences, jurisdictions, privileges, authorities, immunities, profits and commodities" of the Church, and he also had the power and authority to "visit, repress, redress, record, order, correct, restrain and amend" all "errors, abuses, offences, contempts and enormities"; it was this clause which paved the way for the dissolution of the monasteries that began in 1536. The last clause of the Act of Supremacy makes it very clear that the act stood above "any usage, customs, foreign laws, [or] foreign authority"; thus, the State and Church were tied together in the monarchy, making any religious conviction contrary to ANGLICANISM a tacit repudiation of the power of the monarchy, and thus high treason.

In 1527 Henry claimed that his marriage to Catherine was against biblical teaching because Catherine had first been the wife of his late brother, Arthur. A special dispensation from Pope JULIUS II had allowed Henry and Catherine's wedding to take place in 1509, and the couple had a daughter, Mary, who would be made illegitimate by an ANNULMENT. Henry desperately wanted a male heir to avoid the kind of succession crisis that had led to the War of the Roses, and he wanted Anne Boleyn, who refused to be only a mistress, in no less measure. Pope Clement VII refused to annul the marriage because, under canon law, it was not permissible to overturn a prior dispensation. Moreover, Catherine's nephew was the Holy Roman Emperor, Charles V, a man the pope did not want to displease, and whose troops had only the year before taken the pope prisoner while they sacked ROME. Henry's inability to gain an annulment set him and England on the path toward the Reformation.

First, in 1529, Henry indicted his chancellor cardinal, Thomas WOLSEY, whom he blamed for the failed annulment attempt. Wolsey was deemed guilty of the crime of praemunire, the definition of which stemmed from a law dating back to the fourteenth century that prohibited assertion in England of foreign jurisdiction, including papal jurisdiction, against the supremacy of the monarch. Wolsey died while returning to London to answer to this charge of high treason. That same year the king summoned what became known as the Reformation Parliament to try to deal with the annulment issue. Although most members of parliament wanted some kind of reform, there was little agreement about the particular form it should take. Some, like Thomas MORE, just wanted new laws against HERESY; others, like Thomas CROMWELL, were keen on Lutheran theology and hostile to Rome, and advocated for royal supremacy over the English Church. In the end, parliament took the advice of clergymen who advised them that they could not empower the archbishop to act against a papal prohibition. Henry therefore decided to charge the whole of the English clergy with praemunire, and claimed £100,000 from the Convocation of the Church of England at Canterbury. Henry also added five important articles to this claim, which served as preparation for the 1534 Act of Supremacy: that the clergy recognize Henry as the "sole protector and Supreme Head of the church and clergy of England" and had spiritual jurisdiction; that the privileges of the Church were upheld only if they did not detract from the royal prerogative and the laws of the realm; that the king pardoned the clergy for violating the statute of praemunire; and that the laity were also pardoned. Although opposition was raised in parliament by Catherine's champion, Bishop John FISHER, the convocation consented to both the payment and the five articles on March 8, 1531.

In 1532 Thomas Cromwell, seeking to curry favor with the king, brought before parliament the act of Supplication against the Ordinaries, which listed, among its nine grievances against the Church, the abuse of power which came from the convocation's independent power of legislation. The act of May 15, 1532, Submission of the Clergy, recognized royal supremacy and proclaimed that the convocation could no longer make canon law without royal permission. Thomas More resigned as chancellor the next day, and Thomas Cromwell became Henry's unofficial chief minister. A flurry of acts was then passed in quick succession before culminating in the 1534 Act of Supremacy, though not without some opposition. Among these new acts, the 1533 Act in Restraint of Appeals forbade appeals to Rome, and it was this act which allowed Henry to be granted a DIVORCE in England without obtaining papal permission. When Henry married Anne Boleyn in WESTMINSTER ABBEY in January 1533, both he and his new archbishop, Thomas CRANMER, were excommunicated by the pope. The wording of this act is also important because, in effect, it declared England to be an "empire"—meaning an independent, sovereign nation-state, absolutely free from papal interference. Further acts forbade payments to Rome by the clergy and by landowners, and ordered that cathedrals refusing to invest the king's episcopal choices would be charged with praemunire. It is in light of this legislation that we can regard the Act of Supremacy of 1534 as the culmination of a series of legal maneuverings which wrested control of the English Church away from the papacy and brought about royal supremacy. Henry followed up the Act of Supremacy with the Treason Act of 1534, which made it high treason to deny royal supremacy. It was under this act that Thomas More and John Fisher were executed (both were canonized in 1935 by Pope PIUS XI). The act was repealed by Catherine of Aragon's daughter, Queen Mary I, and another very different Act of Supremacy was issued in 1559 by Anne Boleyn's politique daughter, Elizabeth I.

A Meal Shared. Henry VIII and Sir Thomas More were not always at odds with each other. Before Henry VIII broke with the Church of Rome, the two men were close friends. HENRY VIII WITH SIR THOMAS MORE ON HIS RIGHT, ENGLISH SCHOOL (20TH CENTURY) / PRIVATE COLLECTION / © LOOK AND LEARN / THE BRIDGEMAN ART LIBRARY

SEE ALSO CANONIZATION OF SAINTS (HISTORY AND PROCEDURE); CHARLES V, HOLY ROMAN EMPEROR; DISPENSATIONAL THEOLOGY; ELIZABETH I, QUEEN OF ENGLAND; EXCOMMUNICATION; HENRY VIII, KING OF ENGLAND; LUTHERANISM; MARY TUDOR, QUEEN OF ENGLAND; REFORMATION, PROTESTANT (IN THE BRITISH ISLES).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

G.W. Bernard, The King's Reformation: Henry VIII and the Remaking of the English Church (New Haven, Conn. 2005).

G.R. Elton, Studies in Tudor and Stuart Politics (Cambridge, U.K. 1974).

Norman L. Jones, The English Reformation: Religion and Cultural Adaptation (Malden, Mass. 2002).

Stanford E. Lehmberg, The Reformation Parliament, 1529–1534 (Cambridge, U.K. 1970).

David G. Newcombe, Henry VIII and the English Reformation (London 1995).

Tracey-Anne Cooper
Department of History
St. John's University, Jamaica, N.Y. (2010)

ACTA APOSTOLICAE SEDIS

Since 1909 the monthly journal Acta Apostolicae Sedis (Acts of the Apostolic See; abbreviated as AAS) has been the official means for promulgating documents, decrees, and decisions of the HOLY SEE. Its full title is Acta Apostolicae Sedis: Commentarium Officiale (Acts of the Apostolic See: Official Record). In view of the forthcoming Code of Canon Law (which appeared in 1917), St. PIUS X (pope from 1903 to 1914) recognized the need for an official periodical of the Holy See. By means of his constitution, Promulgandi of September 28, 1908, the publication Acta Apostolicae Sedis was established, and its first issue appeared on January 1, 1909.

Prior to the Acta Apostolicae Sedis, the periodical Acta Sanctae Sedis (Acts of the Holy See; abbreviated as ASS) served as the primary, though unofficial, means for promulgating the most important documents of the POPE and various congregations of the Roman CURIA. Established in 1865 by the priest Pietro Avanzini, the Acta Sanctae Sedis did not have the status of being an official publication of the Holy See until 1904 when the Sacred Congregation of the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH declared the ASS to be the "authentic and official" venue for the publication of the acts of the Holy See. This declaration, though, was superseded by Pius X's constitution of 1908, which initiated the Acta Apostolicae Sedis. The ASS, therefore, ceased publication in 1908, but in 1909, Monsignor Cesare Pecorari edited a general index of the forty-one volumes of the Acta Apostolicae Sedis, and the forty-one volumes of the ASS continue to serve as an important historical resource.

Both the 1917 and 1983 Codes of Canon Law recognize the Acta Apostolicae Sedis as the official means for promulgating laws of the APOSTOLIC or Roman See. Canon 9 of the 1917 Code states that: "Laws issued by the Apostolic See are promulgated by publication in the official record, Acta Apostolicae Sedis, unless in particular cases another means of promulgation was prescribed." Moreover, "These laws become effective only after three months have elapsed from the date of that issue of the Acta, unless they bind immediately because of the very nature of the matter or a shorter or longer suspensive period (vacatio) has been specifically and expressly established." Canon 8.1 of the 1983 Code repeats this canon almost verbatim. An addition, however, is made regarding particular laws, which "are promulgated in a manner determined by the legislator, and they begin to bind one month from the date of issuance unless another time period is determined in the law itself" (canon 8.2). The 1990 Code of the Eastern Catholic Churches, Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium, repeats canon 8.1 of the 1983 Code in its canon 1489.1, and its canon 1489.2 states that laws "issued by other legislators are promulgated in the manner determined by these legislators and begin to oblige from the date determined by them."

Most volumes of the AAS include the "Acts of the Supreme Pontiff," which, in turn, are broken down into the following categories: encyclicals, decretal letters, APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTIONS, apostolic letters, epistles, common declarations, homilies, allocutions, messages, and apostolic journeys. Also included in the AAS are the major acts of the congregations of the Roman Curia, such as the Congregation for the DOCTRINE OF THE FAITH, the Congregation for the Causes of Saints, the Congregation for Bishops, and the Congregation for the EVANGELIZATION OF THE PEOPLES. The AAS likewise publishes acts of the PONTIFICAL COUNCILS, such as the Pontifical Council for Christian Unity and the PONTIFICAL COUNCIL FOR INTERRELIGIOUS DIALOGUE. Acts of the Roman tribunals, such as the Apostolic PENITENTIARY, also appear as well as the Diary of the Roman Curia (Diarium romanae curiae). This diary includes the more solemn audiences, nominations of bishops, and records of deaths (Necrologia).

Most of the documents contained in the AAS are in Latin, but other languages also appear. Publication in the AAS usually constitutes the official and definitive text of a document, and all translations and questions of interpretation must then refer to the AAS as the editio typica (typical edition). This was the case with the documents of Vatican II and the vast majority of other MAGISTERIAL DOCUMENTS. Sometimes changes are made to these documents in their final AAS version, even after they have appeared in vernacular translations. One notable case was the passage from JOHN PAUL II's 1995 ENCYCLICAL, Evangelium vitae (no. 99), where he gave assurance to women who had abortions that their child was now "living in the Lord." Because this was open to flawed interpretations, the definitive text in the AAS 87 (1995), 515, was changed to read: "You can entrust your child to the same Father and to his mercy with hope." This change was subsequently referenced in footnote 98 of the 2007 document of the INTERNA-

TIONAL THEOLOGICAL COMMISSION, "The Hope of Salvation for Infants Who Die without Being Baptised."

Even though the AAS is the preeminent means for promulgating magisterial documents, other publications, such as the VATICAN newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano, frequently publish these documents prior to their appearance in the AAS. Sometimes, only the decree of promulgation of a law or a text is published in the AAS (e.g., for liturgical texts), and the Vatican Press will then be used for more widespread distribution. Other times, a decision of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith is published in the AAS, but a longer explanation or commentary of the decision will appear in L'Osservatore Romano. By the early 2000s, more and more people turned to the VATICAN WEB SITE for access to magisterial documents, even though the text in the AAS is normative.

Well-known sourcebooks, such as Denzinger's Enchiridion and the Enchiridion vaticanum, use the AAS as the normative reference for magisterial documents of the last century. Although some important documents, such as the 1949 Letter of the Holy Office to Archbishop CUSHING concerning Father FEENEY, never appeared in the AAS, it is fair to say that, since 1909, the Acta Apostolicae Sedis has played an important role in the life of the Church.

SEE ALSO ABORTION; ACTA SANCTAE SEDIS; ALLOCUTION, PAPAL; BAPTISM OF INFANTS; CANON LAW, 1983 CODE; CANON LAW, HISTORY OF; DECRETALS; EVANGELIUM VITAE; HOMILY; VATICAN COUNCIL II.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Acta Apostolicae Sedis Commentarium Officiale (Vatican City 2006).

Pio Ciprotti, "Acta Apostolicae Sedis" in Enciclopedia Cattolica, Vol. 1 (Florence, Italy 1948): 254.

Pio Ciprotti, "Acta Sancta Sedis," in Enciclopedia Cattolica, Vol. 1 (Florence, Italy 1948): 254–255.

Code of Canon Law: Latin-English Edition, translated by the Canon Law Society of America (Washington, D.C. 1998).

Code of the Canons of the Eastern Churches, translated by the Canon Law Society of America (Washington, D.C. 2001).

Codex Iuris Canonici Pii X Pontificis Maximi Iussa Digestus Benedicti Papae XV Auctoritate Promulgatus (Westminster, Md. 1964)

John M. Huels, O.S.M., "Book 1: General Norms," in New Commentary on the Code of Canon Law, edited by John P. Beal et al. (New York 2000): 59–61.

Robert L. Fastiggi
Professor of Systematic Theology
Sacred Heart Major Seminary, Detroit, Mich. (2010)

ACTION FRANÇAISE

Action Française (AF) is the name of a French right-wing political movement, its associated newspaper, and its fortnightly journal. The movement, active mainly in the first three decades of the twentieth century, advocated return to a corporatist political and social system under a restored monarchy, and exclusion or elimination of foreign elements and influences from French political and cultural life.

Program, Ideology, and Influence. A first committee of AF was born in 1898 during the DREYFUS AFFAIR. It was transformed in 1905 into a league of AF, which proposed to combat every republican regime and to reestablish the monarchy. It edited a biweekly periodical, called Revue de L'Action française, and in 1908 launched a daily newspaper, with the shortened name L'Action française. An institute of AF took charge of doctrinal propaganda. Charles MAURRAS was the unquestioned head and the theorist of the movement, which counted several other very talented leaders, such as Léon DAUDET, Henri Vaugeois, and Jacques Bainville.

AF was never a mass movement, and although Daudet was for a time elected a deputy, it played only a minor role in French politics. AF supported royalist and other conservative candidates, and attacked leftist candidates, politicians, and other opinion leaders. Its young partisans, grouped under the name "Camelots du roi," also carried out extraparliamentary political action, including marches and demonstrations, extending even to physical assault of opponents. Their tactics prefigured those of the later fascist and national socialist storm troopers. Maurras's and AF's Integral Nationalist social and political ideology bore considerable resemblance to but also notable differences from the later movements of FASCISM and National Socialism. Through the medium of Maurras's philosophy, AF provided inspiration for Italian nationalism and fascism and for integral nationalist and fascist movements in Belgium, Romania, Switzerland, and Portugal. It also exercised considerable influence in Spanish and Latin American political thought.

From the Dreyfus Affair on, AF supported the French military and the Catholic Church, and called for an aggressive French nationalist policy. Although its principal directors were atheists, they argued that if French society was to prosper as it had in the past, it must return to both the political form and the religious practice of earlier times. This stance reflected the influences of the eventually condemned philosophical school of nineteenth-century TRADITIONALISM and elements of the philosophy of Auguste Compte, upon whom Maurras drew extensively in the development of his own philosophical position. Maurras himself depicted France as the torchbearer of classical civilization, and Catholicism as an integral guiding dimension of French culture. He was opposed to the French Third Republic, democracy, and workers' movements, all of which were regarded as effects of the FRENCH REVOLUTION, brought about and consolidated by the four "non-French" groups Maurras denounced: Protestants, Jews, Freemasons, and the foreign-born.

The movement exercised considerable influence in French intellectual life. Controversies arose within the Church over the organization's influence over a section of the French clergy and faithful, its ideology and tactics, and its compatibility with Catholic teachings. Its journal taught that political laws proceed from experience, and that the national interest has an absolute primacy in moral matters. In brief, it was a political school whose concepts derived from a naturalist view of man, society, and religion; and this intellectual outlook obliterated the moral sense of its members in their concepts of foreign and domestic politics. During the Modernist controversy, in public clashes over these issues during 1909 and 1910, the philosopher Maurice BLONDEL (under the pen name Testis, and defending the democratic Catholic organization Semaines Sociales) argued against Catholic collaboration with AF, while the Jesuit theologian Pedro Descoqs came to AF's and Maurras's defense.

Attitude of the Church. Because of the complaints of French bishops, the Holy Office prepared a prohibition of seven books by Maurras as well as the periodical (but not the newspaper) of the movement (January 26, 1914). However, AF's combat against anticlerical republicans, its antimodernist stance during the MODERNISM crisis, and its struggle for a conservative type of Catholicism then in favor at the Vatican produced interventions in its favor in ROME. PIUS X (1903–1914) suspended publication of the decree, effectively granting AF a temporary reprieve from condemnation. BENEDICT XV (1914–1922) adopted the same attitude because of WORLD WAR I. PIUS XI (1922–1939) received new complaints as a result of an investigation that revealed the extraordinary ascendancy of the movement over Belgian youth, and he asked Cardinal Andrieu, Archbishop of Bordeaux, to publish a letter of disapproval, which appeared on August 25, 1926, and received papal approbation.

The response of AF was similar to that of the aforementioned traditionalists when they found their positions, seemingly strongly supportive of their image of Catholicism, condemned by the Church. AF replied violently to the L'Osservatore Romano's printed articles on the condemnation, branding the editors a "small band of demoniacal agents," and pretending in an article titled "Non possumus" that treason and parricide were being asked of it. A decree of the Holy Office (December 29, 1926) published the text of the 1914 condemnation, and added to it, with the ratification of Pius XI, the newspaper L'Action française, "as it is published today," because of articles written "these recent days especially ... namely by Charles Maurras and Léon Daudet, articles which every sensible man is obliged to recognize as written against the Holy Apostolic See and the Roman Pontiff himself." AF vilified L'Osservatore Romano as "Diffamatore Romano," and "an infamous rag." It resurrected all the familiar tropes of ANTICLERICALISM and accused the pope of being the victim of a plot to restore the Holy Roman Germanic Empire. This led Bishop Ruch of Strasbourg to classify L'Action française the most anticlerical newspaper in France.

Subsequent to the condemnation of December 29, 1926, the HOLY SEE published other disciplinary documents establishing how those who did not submit to the condemnation were to be reprimanded. Priests were forbidden to administer the sacraments to any such people, and they were threatened with canonical sanctions if disobedient. Marriages of the rebellious were merely to be blessed in the sacristy, as mixed marriages. Dying rebels were required to make honorable amends, or else they would be deprived of the last rites and go to their graves without the Church's prayers. Several French bishops remained sympathetic to AF, and at first either refrained from commenting on the Roman condemnation or made very fine distinctions in their observations. Undoubtedly at the Holy See's demand, a long declaration appeared with 116 episcopal signatures (March 8, 1927), but without the names of three bishops. One of these was later regarded by the Holy See as having resigned. Priests suspected of favoring the movement were gradually removed from influential posts, especially those dealing with young people.

The influential neo-Thomist scholar, Cardinal Louis BILLOT, who like many other Catholic intellectuals had supported the movement because of its anti-Modernist and antiliberal stances, resigned from the Sacred College over the condemnation of AF. There are conflicting accounts of Billot's resignation. Some maintain he was forced to do so, but there is better evidence that he asked Pius XI for permission to resign. One important previous supporter of AF, Jacques MARITAIN, published a book in collaboration with Père Doncoeur and four other ecclesiastics defending the Holy See's position, Pourquoi Rome a parlé (1927). Maurice Pujo replied to it in a series of articles which were later assembled in a single volume, Comment Rome est trompé (1929), and drew from M.-V. Bernadot, Maritain, and several other authors the reply Clairvoyance de Rome (1929). Other previous supporters, such as Decoqs and Reginald Garrigou-Lagrange, O.P., withdrew their support from AF less emphatically.

Some bishops closed their eyes, but others applied the sanctions rigorously. Many cases gained notoriety and, as time passed, hopes grew for a gradual appeasement of the affair. Some interventions occurred in Rome. Maurras wrote to Pius XI (January 1937), and received a reply. He then wrote two more letters to the pope. Their correspondence made it clear, however, that their viewpoints remained irreconcilable. The pontificate of PIUS XII (1939–1958) opened new perspectives on the matter. After long negotiations, the directive committee of AF sent a letter to the pope expressing their sincerest sorrow for anything in their polemics and controversies that had been injurious or unjust. The Catholics on the committee rejected all their erroneous writings and every precept and theory contrary to Catholic teachings. Pius XII had not demanded the type of retraction required by his predecessor, but the text signed by the committee constituted an implicit retraction since it admitted that the prohibition's motives were just. The Holy See triumphed in the end, as Catholic youths ceased joining the movement. Its defeat became more evident when the Duke of Guise, pretender to the throne, disassociated himself from AF in 1937. In 1944 the liberation government forbade the publication of L'Action française because of its attitude during WORLD WAR II.

AF has possibly exerted indirect effects on twentieth- and twenty-first-century movements also sharing the name "Traditionalism," including that of the late schismatic Archbishop Marcel LEFEBVRE and the likewise schismatic Society of St. Pius X. While Lefebvre denies having read the works of Maurras or having been associated with AF, he studied under Henri Le Floch, an AF supporter at the French Seminary in Rome, and the early membership of the Society of St. Pius X included numerous former AF members or supporters. Affinities of ideology between AF, Lefebvre, and the Society of St. Pius X are reflected in, among other aspects, their mutual rejection of modernity, in particular the French Revolution and its effects, which Lefebvre and his supporters see in the course and products of the Second Vatican Council.

SEE ALSO FRANCE, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; INDEX OF PROHIBITED BOOKS; VATICAN COUNCIL II.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Peter J. Bernardi, Maurice Blondel, Social Catholicism, and Action Française (Washington, D.C. 2008).

Joseph Brugerette, Le Prêtre français et la société contemporaine, 3 vols. (Paris 1933–1938).

H. Daniel-Rops, L'Église des révolutions: Un Combat pour Dieu, 1870–1939 (Paris 1963).

Nicolas Fontaine, Saint-Siège: Action française et catholiques intégraux (Paris 1928).

Denis Gwynn, The "Action Française" Condemnation (London 1928).

Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, edited by Michael Buchberger (Freiburg, Germany 1930–1938), 1:71–74.

Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, edited by Josef Hofer and Karl Rahner (Freiberg, Germany 1957–1965), 1:116–117.

Paul Mazcaj, The Action Francaise and Revolutionary Syndicalism (Chapel Hill, N.C. 1979).

Ernst Nolte, Three Faces of Fascism: Action Française, Italian Fascism and National Socialism (New York 1965).

S.M. Osgood, French Royalism under the Third and Fourth Republics (The Hague 1960).

Edward R. Tannenbaum, The Action Française (New York 1962).

Leo Ward, The Condemnation of the Action Française (London 1928).

E.J. Weber, Action Française (Stanford, Calif. 1962).

Adrien Dansette
Docteur en Droit
Diplôme de l'École des Sciences Politiques

Gregory B. Sadler
Assistant Professor, Department of Government and History
Fayetteville State University, N.C. (2010)

ADDAI AND MARI, ANAPHORA OF

The connection between the Aramaic Anaphora of the Apostles Addai and Mari, the Eucharistic prayer that has been used continuously in the AssyroChaldean Church of the East since its beginnings, and the Birkat Ha-Mazon, the ancient Jewish meal blessing, has been recognized since it was first brought to light by the French theologian Louis Bouyer (1913–2004) in 1968. A similar connection has been recognized between Chapter 10 of the Greek Didache of the Apostles, which contains an archaic Eucharistic Prayer belonging to the APOSTOLIC era, with the same Birkat. Therefore, to understand and trace the origin of the Addai and Mari, a familiarity with the Birkat Ha-Mazon is necessary.

The Babylonian Talmud states:

> Our teachers taught: The order of the blessing of food is the following: the first blessing is the one that is for the One Who Nourishes, the second one the blessing for the Land, the third is for the One Who Will Build Jerusalem ...Our teachers taught: From where does it result that the blessing for the food is contained in the law? From where it says: 'When you have eaten your fill, you shall bless.' (Dt 8: 10)

This text sets out the structure of the ancient Jewish meal blessing, which is structured in three sections: (1) a glorification of God for the gift of creation and nourishment: "Blessed are you, Lord our God, king of the universe, for you nourish us and the whole world"; (2) a thanksgiving for the gift of redemption: "We give you thanks, Lord our God, for you have given us for our inheritance a desirable land"; and (3) a petition for the blessed city and the nation: "Have mercy, Lord our God, on us your people Israel."

There is a structural similarity between the text of the Birkat cited above and the Eucharist of Chapter 10 of the Didache of the Apostles. This can be seen in the beginning of each of the three sections of the Eucharist in the Didache: (1) "Almighty Lord, you created all things for your Name's sake ... "; (2) "We thank you, holy Father, for your holy Name which you have made to dwell in our hearts ... "; and (3) "Lord, remember your Church ... "

In regard to the Addai and Mari, the composition of three sections (Pasoqe) was mentioned clearly by the Patriarch 'Ysho'yahb I in 587 as belonging to the Mesopotamian anaphora as well (See Chabot 1902, p. 169). As mentioned previously, the correspondence of structure, content, and style between the Addai and Mari and the Birkat Ha-Mazon can be observed by comparing both texts. At the same time, it is important to note the ways that the Christian LITURGY adopted the structure of the Jewish blessing. In the specific text of the Anaphora, for example, glorification and praise for creation and redemption are the topic of the first section ("Worthy of glory ... the Name ... who created the world ..."); thanksgiving for the gifts of redemption by Christ is the content of the second section ("We give thanks to you ... for you put on our humanity"); and asking the Father to remember all the FAITHFUL of the Church and grant peace to his people is the primordial topic of the third section ("Lord ... make a gracious remembrance for all the upright and just fathers ..., in the commemoration of the body and blood of your Christ") (Macomber 1966, pp. 360, 362, 364; Aramaic text).

In addition to information of a historic character, particularly the similarity of euchological structure, conceptual content, and the wording of the beginning and ending of each of the three sections between the Aramaic anaphora and the Birkat Ha-Mazon, there is sufficient evidence to show that the Addai and Mari originated in Mesopotamia, where the Apostles preached the advent of the MESSIAH to the Aramaic-speaking population and celebrated the Eucharist in the way that Jesus taught them to. The Apostles Eucharistic prayer, or anaphora, was a variation of the Birkat, which was familiar to many of their neophytes of Jewish tradition, and which they adapted to the new liturgy in memory of their crucified and risen Lord.

A comparison with Chapter 10 of the Greek Didache confirms this conclusion, which is overwhelmingly recognized by scholars. Indeed the Addai and Mari "is one of the most ancient Anaphoras, dating back to the time of the very early Church," as stated by the HOLY SEE's document dealing with its validity, the Guidelines for Admission to the Eucharist between the Chaldean Church and the Assyrian Church of the East. It seems clear, therefore, that the attribution of the anaphora to Addai and Mari, the "Apostles of Mesopotamia," should be taken seriously.

An Anaphora without the Narrative of Eucharistic Institution. An analytical study of the Addai and Mari has helped scholars gaze into its text and slice through the strata of its evolution. In so doing, they have discovered how pertinent elements, including the EPICLESIS, or invocation of the Holy Spirit, were inserted into its text at an early stage. Nevertheless, the Narrative of the Eucharistic Institution (including the actual words of Jesus) was never part of its authentic tenure, as witnessed by all ancient manuscripts. Meanwhile, the Western doctrine, following the Council of FLORENCE in its Decretum pro Armenis (1439), adopted the position that the Words of Institution are a constitutive part of the consecration of the elements. In particular, the words "this is my body ... this is my blood" are considered to be an essential part of the sacrament.

The Mesopotamian Church of the East expressed in its main anaphora all the constitutive elements of the sacramental Eucharist, according to the scriptural tradition and its own apostolic heritage. There is an explicit intention in this text to fulfill the command of Lord, given at the Paschal Supper, to "do this" in memory of him, and thus offer his body and blood in the manner that he then instituted. This tradition was transmitted to the Church through ecclesiastic and liturgical tradition. In the Epiclesis, the celebrant of the Addai and Mari calls for the Holy Spirit to "come and rest upon this Oblation of your servants and bless it and sanctify it, that it may be for us, O Lord, for the pardon of debts and the forgiveness of sins, for the great hope of resurrection from the dead and for new life in the kingdom of heaven with all of those who have pleased you." Here, as in many other eastern anaphoras, the Epiclesis, which constitutes the last segment of the Addai and Mari, expresses the completion of the consecration (Quddasha) of the Offerings.

As far as contemporary liturgical use is concerned, the Chaldean Catholic Church, adjusting itself to the general practice of the Church universal, has already inserted the Institutional Narrative into the anaphora, bringing the Addai and Mari in line with its other two anaphoras. The ASSYRIAN CHURCH OF THE EAST, however, while belonging to the same apostolic tradition, preserves the original version without the Narrative. This brings up questions of dogmatic, liturgical, and ecumenical relevance: Is it because it is deficient that the Addai and Mari does not include the Narrative, or because it is archaic? Likewise, is the absence of the Narrative the mark of liturgical imperfection or the remnant of a primordial and apostolic time? Finally, is it valid and proper for the Catholic Church to accept the Addai and Mari, as used by the Assyrian Church, as a valid contemporary Eucharistic celebration, though only in a selected ecumenical context and for pastoral needs?

Pertinent Questions and an Authoritative Response. These questions are of fundamental relevance to the Catholic doctrine as it relates to Eucharistic validity. They also presuppose a basic understanding of the Paschal Supper, as reported in the Scriptures, in regard to a number of basic points. First, regarding the words "this is my body ... this is my blood," which are uttered concomitantly with Communion, as reported in the four accounts (1 Cor 11:23–26; Lk 22:14–20; Mt 26:26–29; Mk 14:22–25), can one presume that Jesus did not consecrate until the moment of Communion? Second, since the blessing-thanksgiving occurs prior to the utterance of the holy words, how should its efficacy be considered when those holy words were not yet pronounced? Indeed, all of the apostolic Eucharistic liturgies, Eastern and Western, perform the breaking and signing as they are dealing with the consecrated body and blood. Is this not done because it follows the pattern set by Jesus at the supper?

Finally, does the command to "do this" refer to the above-stated holy words only, so that the ordained celebrant of the Eucharist must reiterate, in persona Christi, those very words for a valid consecration, or can we better understand this command to the holy Apostles, in adherence to the scriptural accounts, as referring to all of the components of the Eucharistic supper in its entirety ("he took, blessed, gave thanks, broke, and gave, saying")? If this is the case, then these holy words are the core and substance of the Eucharist, to be celebrated and fulfilled in persona Ecclesiae, according to each of the apostolic traditions, in memory of him, as the given order dictates, in the sense that the celebrant, as an ordained minister of the Church, consecrates, by the power of the Holy Spirit and offers hic et nunc the Eucharistic sacrifice, connecting this present act of the Church with the founding act of the Lord in an explicit way. Indeed, the two acts, as much as they are connected, are distinct: one is the founding act of the Lord in the Paschal Supper; the other is the sacramental act of the Church in her living context. The holy words express the substance of both acts.

With all of this in mind, the comprehensive question regarding the Addai and Mari is this: Is it a valid prayer of consecration without the inclusion of the cohesive text of the Narrative among its sections, even though it explicitly refers to the Words of Institution and contains all its elements in a ritually celebrated form? The Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, under the prefecture of Cardinal RATZINGER, tackled this issue, as presented by the Council for Christian Unity under the presidency of Cardinal Kasper. It then issued, with the personal approval of Pope JOHN PAUL II, a decision of historic relevance in October 2001 It was decided that the Addai and Mari, in its genuine version, is a valid Eucharistic prayer of Consecration, because "the words of Eucharistic Institution are indeed present in the Anaphora of Addai and Mari, not in a coherent narrative way and ad litteram, but rather in a dispersed euchological way, that is, integrated in successive prayers of thanksgiving, praise and intercession" (Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity 2001).

SEE ALSO ADDAI AND MARI, SS.; ARAMAIC LANGUAGE; CHALDEAN CATHOLIC CHURCH (EASTERN CATHOLIC); DIDACHE; DOCTRINE OF THE FAITH, CONGREGATION FOR THE; EUCHARIST (BIBLICAL DATA); EUCHARIST IN CONTEMPORARY CATHOLIC TRADITION; HOLY SPIRIT, GIFTS OF; LORD'S SUPPER, THE; MESOPOTAMIA, ANCIENT; SACRAMENTAL THEOLOGY; SACRAMENTALS; TALMUD.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Louis Bouyer, Eucharist: Theology and Spirituality of the Eucharistic Prayer (Notre Dame, Ind. 1968).

Sofia Cavalletti, Il Trattato delle Benedizioni del Talmud babilonese (Turin, Italy 1968).

Jean Baptiste Chabot, Synodicon Orientale ou recueil de synodes Nestoriens (Paris 1902).

Louis Finkelstein, "The Birkat ha-mazon," Jewish Quarterly Review 19 (1928–1929): 211–262.

Brunero Gherardini, ed., "Sull'Anafora dei Santi Apostoli Addai et Mari," Divinitas 47 (2004).

Sarhad Jammo, "The Anaphora of the Apostles Addai and Mari: A Study of Structure and Historical Background," Orientalia Christiana Periodica 68, no. 2 (2002): 5–35.

Peter A. Kwasniewski, "Doing and Speaking in the Person of Christ: Eucharistic Form in the Anaphora of Addai and Mari," Nova et Vetera 4, no. 2 (2006).

William Macomber, "The Oldest Known Text of the Anaphora of the Apostles Addai and Mari," Orientalia Christiana Periodica 32 (1966): 335–371.

Enrico Mazza, L'anafora eucaristica: Studi sulle origini (Rome 1992).

Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity, Guidelines for Admission to the Eucharist between the Chaldean Church and the Assyrian Church of the East; see L'Osservatore Romano, October 26, 2001, also available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/pontifical_councils/chrstuni/documents/rc_pc_ chrstuni_doc_20011025_chiesa-caldea-assira_en.html (accessed March 3, 2008).

Most Rev. Sarhad Y. Jammo
Bishop
Chaldean Catholic Diocese of
St. Peter the Apostle, San Diego (2010)

ADENAUER, KONRAD

The father of the German Federal Republic; b. Cologne, German Empire, January 5, 1876; d. Rhoumlndorf, German Federal Republic, April 19, 1967.

Konrad Adenauer (1876–1967) was instrumental in the founding of post–World War II Germany's Christian Democratic Union (CDU) and chaired the organization from 1950 to 1966. He served as federal chancellor from 1949 to 1963, was a member of the Bundestag from 1949 to 1967, and served as German foreign minister from 1951 to 1955. Adenauer is remembered chiefly as the leader who piloted his nation through the first half of the Cold War, rescuing Germany from the humiliation of defeat in World War II and establishing a new status for the nation through membership in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) and through Germany's key role in European union.

Adenauer formed his political views during the decades before Adolf HITLER's national socialist dictatorship. Representing the Catholic CENTER PARTY, in 1906 Adenauer was elected to the Cologne City Council. In 1917 he became Lord Mayor, a position he maintained until 1933. As one of the up-and-coming Center Party figures, Adenauer held other offices in the Rhineland Diet and the Prussian Parliament, positions he surrendered when the Nazis came to power. With his second wife (his first, Emma Weyer, died in 1916), Auguste "Gussie" Zinsser (1895–1948), Adenauer lived a private life during the Third Reich, although the two suffered harassment and, in 1944, arrest by the Gestapo in the wave of oppression that followed Claus von Stauffenberg's (1907–1944) assassination attempt on Hitler.

After the war, as chancellor, Adenauer's relations with the Catholic Church assumed more urgency. His work as a Catholic political figure, however, was somewhat ambiguous. On the one hand, he considered himself Europe's premier Catholic statesman, and when the HOLY SEE bestowed on him the honor of the Order of the Golden Spur in 1956, the act was done at his insistence. On the other hand, in his study of German church-state relations, Frederic Spotts noted that Adenauer's "deep religious feelings ... did not translate into concern for [the Catholic Church's] public interests" (Spotts 1973, p.171).

Adenauer was careful that the postwar CDU did not identify with ROME as closely as did the old Center Party. He therefore seriously courted Protestant voters (his second wife was, in fact, a convert from Protestantism), and he opposed the few attempts by Center Party veterans to revive that organization in the late 1940s and early 1950s. Adenauer worried that his obvious Catholic devotion would be misunderstood, especially by Protestants, as political subservience. Such concerns surfaced in his June 1951 trip to Rome, his first state visit abroad as chancellor. Not only did the trip hold great significance for postwar Germany's efforts to reintegrate itself into the family of nations; the Eternal City also embodied, for Adenauer, Western Christian civilization itself. He blissfully recorded that a stroll through the city's Pincio and Piazza del Popolo was "the loveliest moment" of his life (Schwarz 1997, vol. 1, p. 621).

The climax of that Roman sojourn came in his meeting with Pope PIUS XII. Adenauer's advisers had counseled against kneeling before the pontiff, but the chancellor later confessed, "When the double doors opened and the Holy Father stood before me in all his glory, I was on my knees before I even knew where I was" (Schwarz 1997, vol. 1, p. 621).

At home, Adenauer consequently maintained a respect for, but a distance from, the German Catholic Church, preferring that its clergy refrain from politics. Leaders of the hierarchy, such as Cardinals Michael von FAULHABER and Josef Frings (c. 1887–1978), expressed frustration with Adenauer on cultural and social issues, despite his concern for Germany's and Europe's moral health and Christian sensibilities. The chancellor's promotion of television did not sit well, for instance, nor did his surrender in the battle for confessional schools. Some relationships, however, could be very personal. In his later years, the chancellor relied on his son, Monsignor Paul Adenauer (1923–2007), for advice on Catholic issues and as an unofficial link to Rome, notably through Robert Leiber (1887–1967), the influential Jesuit and confidante of Pope Pius XII.

The issue of anticommunism cemented Adenauer's relations with the Catholic Church. In that sense, both the German hierarchy and the Holy See saw in him a steadfast ally. This mutual determination surfaced clearly in his warm relationship with Pope Pius XII. It suffered, however, when Angelo Roncalli took the throne as Pope JOHN XXIII. Adenauer suspected the sincerity of John's anticommunist vigilance and disdained his openness, in 1963, toward socialist participation in Italy's government. The chancellor also maintained misgivings over the Second Vatican Council and was particularly suspicious of the two leading German representatives, Cardinal Frings and Cardinal Julius DÖPFNER. Adenauer's meeting with Pope John in January 1963 depressed him. As he later confessed to the American secretary of defense, Robert McNamara (1916–), "I knew Pius XII and thought a lot of him. He was a distinguished man. John was a catastrophe, however" (Schwarz 1997, vol. 2, pp. 493–494).

SEE ALSO COLD WAR AND THE PAPACY; EUROPEAN UNION AND THE PAPACY; GERMANY, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Noel D. Cary, The Path to Christian Democracy: German Catholics and the Party System from Windthorst to Adenauer (Cambridge, Mass. 1996).

Hans-Peter Schwarz, Konrad Adenauer: A German Politician and Statesman in a Period of War, Revolution and Reconstruction, 2 vols., vol. 1 translated by Louise Willmot, vol. 2 translated by Geoffrey Penny (Providence, R.I. 1997).

Frederic Spotts, The Churches and Politics in Germany (Middletown, Conn. 1973).

Roy Palmer Domenico
Professor, Department of History
The University of Scranton (2010)

ADOWA, BATTLE OF

On March 1, 1896, Italy suffered a crushing rout at the hands of Abyssinia in the battle of Adowa (Adua), a humiliation that ruined Italian plans for empire there, at least until 1935 to 1936, when the Fascist dictator Benito MUSSOLINI avenged Adowa by conquering the African nation. Italy's force, numbering 20,000 men under the command of General Oreste Baratieri (1841–1901), invaded from its colonial possession of Eritrea and blundered into an ambush, suffering defeat at the hands of 140,000 troops under the command of Emperor Menelik II (1844–1913). Oreste enjoyed superiority in cannon fire, although Menelik possessed greater overall firepower. Perhaps half of the Emperor's troops carried firearms, and the Abyssinians had machine guns whereas the Italians did not. Four thousand five hundred Italian troops and more than 1,000 colonial troops died at Adowa.

The battle ended a nine-year campaign of imperialist aggression that began in 1887 with Italy's defeat at Dogali, a massacre that generally united Italians and briefly afforded a semi-official role to the Catholic Church during an era when it had lost its formal status in the new kingdom. The trauma momentarily relaxed the tensions that had plagued Italo-Papal relations since the unification, the Risorgimento, as clergy joined people to mourn the dead of Dogali. Much of Italy's early involvement there, in fact, beginning in the 1840s and 1850s, had been aided by the expertise of Italian missionaries. In the early 1850s, of only twelve Italians living in Abyssinia, more than half were Catholic clergy (Hess 1973, p. 97). Most notable among them was the Capuchin Cardinal Guglielmo Massaia (1809–1889), the HOLY SEE's chief representative from his arrival in East Africa in 1846 until his retirement in 1880.

Adowa, however, was another story because by 1896 Prime Minister Francesco Saverio Crispi (1819–1901), a ferocious anticlerical known internationally for his belligerent imperialist policy, headed the Italian government. Adowa destroyed his political fortunes. The humiliation alienated much of his middle-class support and accelerated the transformation of some of his bases of support, like Milan, into strongholds for his enemies, both Socialists and the growing Catholic political movement. Publications representative of the Holy See, La Civiltà Cattolica and the Osservatore Romano, condemned Crispi's colonial adventure, and the latter even celebrated the victory of Coptic Abyssinia, a heretical but Christian nation, over an Italy whose flag displayed "the pentarchic sign of disbelieving masonry" (Finaldi 2002, p. 91). A personal letter from LEO XIII to Menelik, furthermore, led to the Church's engagement in successful negotiations for the release of the Italian prisoners. Forty years later, Mussolini's conquest of Ethiopia occurred in a much-altered world. The LATERAN PACTS of 1929 had settled many of the outstanding controversies between CHURCH AND STATE, and the Italian clergy generally supported the Fascist war, to the extent that, in very public ceremonies, priests blessed lead wedding bands to replace gold ones that wives had donated to the cause.

SEE ALSO CIVILTÀ CATTOLICA, LA; FASCISM; RISORGIMENTO.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Giuseppe Finaldi, "Italy's Scramble for Africa: From Dogali to Adowa" in Disastro!: Disasters in Italy since 1860: Culture, Politics, Society, edited by John Dickie, John Foot, and Frank M. Snowden (New York 2002), 80–97.

Robert L. Hess, "Italian Imperialism in Its Ethiopian Context," The International Journal of African Historical Studies VI, n.1 (1973): 94–109.

Roy P. Domenico
Professor, Department of History
The University of Scranton (2010)

AFTERLIFE

This entry contains the following:

I. PRIMITIVE SOCIETIES
Stanley Diamond/Robert L. Fastiggi

II. THE BIBLE
Henry P. Köster/Robert L. Fastiggi

III. ANCIENT GREECE AND ROME
Gabriel M. Sanders/Robert L. Fastiggi

IV. ANCIENT EGYPT AND MESOPOTAMIA
Robert L. Fastiggi

V. PERSIA, INDIA, AND CHINA
Robert L. Fastiggi

VI. JUDAISM
Robert L. Fastiggi

VII. ISLAM
Robert L. Fastiggi

VIII. CHRISTIANITY
Robert L. Fastiggi

I. PRIMITIVE SOCIETIES

Although belief in a continuing or new life after death is widespread among the peoples of the world, profound differences exist among cultural traditions in conceptions of this afterlife; and, even in those societies in which a sharp division between the here and the hereafter is theologically postulated and conventionally accepted, personal variations occur in specific images of the afterlife. Despite the latter, two elements—belief in a final moral judgment of personal conduct in the world and belief in the specific existence of an after-world distinct from this world—define Christian, Christian-influenced, and to a lesser degree Jewish and Islamic conceptions of the afterlife. This article treats within the perspective of the comparative study of religion the differing conceptions found in (1) primitive societies; (2) the Bible; (3) ancient Greece and Rome; (4) ancient Egypt and Mesopotamia; (5) Persia, India, and China; (6) Judaism; (7) Islam; and (8) Christianity.

Generally speaking, primitive peoples do not share the twin assumptions of a final moral judgment of behavior in the world and the specific existence of an afterworld. Accordingly, most anthropologists would not agree with Wilhelm SCHMIDT's assumption of moral judgment and an associated belief in an afterworld as coextensive with primitive MONOTHEISM. Historically, it appears that as society becomes increasingly secularized and, in the literal sense, civilized, the sphere of moral action contracts and grows more complex; correlatively, the idea that the ultimate loci of the consequences of morality and immorality occur in the afterworld emerges with great clarity.

Continuity of the Self. Primitive societies are, as Robert Redfield and Paul Radin have indicated, moral at their core; persons relate to each other in a moral nexus, not as contracting partners in a legal, technical, commercial, that is, civilized order. This sacred quality of primitive life is evident in the ritually celebrated cycles of birth, death, and rebirth of the person, society, and nature at large. In these primitive rites of passage and ritual dramas, persons may be, for example, conceived as dying to a given status in the world and being reborn into another status, but without destroying the continuity of self. The self is never merely reduced to the status; rather, it is enriched by experiencing the pain of internal growth and diversification. In a sense, the passage of the person through primitive societies can be understood as a progressive spiritualization. In the Winnebago medicine rite described by Radin, the goal is what religious historian Mircea Eliade has called the "perpetual regeneration of the initiate," the "eternal return" to mythical origins, implying an abolition of time and a "reinstatement of the miraculous moment of creation" (Eliade 1964, pp. 319–320). Historical, progressive, lineal time, central to the modern scientific world view and expressed in the Hebraic and Christian cosmogonies (in the Christian context based on the historicity of Jesus), is not a primitive conception.

The cyclic and sacred character of primitive life is similarly evident in the common belief, as among the Anaguta of Northern Nigeria, that an infant is the reincarnation of an ancestral spirit in the grandparental generation; hence, the person who has literally died to the world, begins a new spiritual existence by being reborn. Thus, primitive society itself emerges as the arena of the original drama of creation and transcendence, of Eliade's "irruption of the sacred into the world" occurring in "primordial" time (Eliade 1961, p. 72). The passage through life takes on the aspect of a moral drama, culminating, as among the Winnebago people of Wisconsin, in the initiate's ultimate effort to grasp the meaning of creation and so win eternal life or rebirth. In these rites, the forerunners of the more explicit and historically specific Christian Sacraments, that which Eliade terms a "nostalgia for Paradise" (Eliade 1964, p. 508), for the instant of pure being, is evident.

Identity of World and Afterworld. The antinomies life-death, natural-supernatural, sacred-profane, and spirit-flesh that weigh so heavily in civilized Christian thought are, in primitive societies, largely irrelevant. Life moves on all levels simultaneously. Ordinary events are suffused with sacred meaning, and everything has personality; God, spirits, ancestors—dreamt of, seen, or felt—exist. The mode of primitive thinking is existentialist in the most comprehensive sense. Therefore, the split between this world and the afterworld is of little moment. Where conceptions of the afterlife are present, they typically assimilate, as Franz Boas put it, the "social life of the dead [to] ... the living" (Boas 1940, pp. 606–607). The deceased may maintain an active position in the kinship structure. The afterworld is, with minor exceptions, quite the same as this world; throughout North Asia, as elsewhere, the former is simply a mirror image of the latter. Frequently, the souls of the dead, on their passage to this inverted world, must pass over some obstacle or cross a narrow bridge. But this seems to be related to the psychology of mourning and the consequent need for ritualizing the trauma of separation rather than to a permanent journey to a distinctly conceived afterworld.

Despite the contradictions inherent in certain technical aspects of the primitive view of the afterlife (e.g., the social immediacy of souls versus their indeterminate existence in a double of this world), neither the idea of hell nor of other-worldly reward for moral behavior are important themes in primitive religions. This is true even where, as among the Anaguta, a clear-cut belief in an accessible supreme creator is evident.

SEE ALSO RELIGION (IN PRIMITIVE CULTURE).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Franz Boas, Race, Language and Culture (New York 1940).

Stanley Diamond, "Plato and the Definition of the Primitive," in Culture in History: Essays in Honor of Paul Radin, edited by Stanley Diamond (New York 1960), 118–141.

Stanley Diamond, "The Search for the Primitive," in Man's Image in Medicine and Anthropology, edited by Iago Galdston (New York 1963), 62–115.

Mircea Eliade, The Sacred and the Profane, translated by Willard R. Trask, (New York 1959; repr. 1961).

Mircea Eliade, Shamanism: Archaic Techniques of Ecstasy, translated by Willard R. Trask, rev. ed. (New York 1964).

R. Firth, "Fate of the Soul," in Anthropology of Folk Religion, edited by Charles M. Leslie (New York 1960).

Paul Radin, The World of Primitive Man (New York 1953; repr. 1960).

Robert Redfield, The Primitive World and Its Transformations (Ithaca, N.Y. 1953).

Wilhelm Schmidt, The Origin and Growth of Religion, translated by H. J. Rose, 2nd ed. (London 1935).

Stanley Diamond
Professor of Anthropology, Maxwell Graduate School
Syracuse University, Syracuse, N.Y.

Robert L. Fastiggi
Professor of Systematic Theology,
Sacred Heart Major Seminary
Detroit, Mich. (2010)

II. THE BIBLE

The Israelites believed in a ghostlike afterlife. According to their ideas, all the dead go to SHEOL, the nether world. Kings and slaves, old and young, "all go to one place" [Eccl 6:6; Ps 88(89):49; Jb 3:13–19; 30:23].

Abode of the Dead. The Babylonians refer in their myths, for example, in the GILGAMESH EPIC, to the abode of the dead as a place under the earth or on the other side of the world sea. The dead reach it by descending into the earth or by traveling to the farthest point west. Before entering, they must cross the underground river or the "waters of death." The Scriptures, too, refer to its locality by the direction in which the dead go, "down to Sheol" (Is 38:18; Ez 31:14; 1 Kgs 2:9). Even the New Testament localizes the abode of the dead in the depths of the earth (Mt 16:18; Lk 16:26; Acts 2:24, 27, 31; Rom 10:7; Rv 1:18; 20:13). According to mythico-dynamic thinking, this realm of death is constantly overflowing its banks. It is present wherever death exercises its sovereignty. Consequently, not only the grave [Ps 39(40):3; 54(55):24; 142(143):7; etc.] and the depths of the earth are linked with it [Ps 62(63):10; 138(139):8; Is 7:11], but also the sea [Ps 68(69):2, 16; Jon 2:4] and the desert (Jer 2:6, 31; Hos 2:5). These "three nonworlds" (Pedersen 1959) are considered manifestations of death and belong to the realm of death. In each diminishing of life, the realm of death disrupts the world of the living. Thus illness [Ps 12(13); 21(22); 29(30); 87(88); etc.], captivity [Ps 141(142); 142(143)], persecution and hostility [Ps 17(18); 143(144)], misfortune, poverty, and hunger are all a foretaste of the descent into Sheol and abandonment by Yahweh. The sinner is already living in Sheol (Ps 9A:16–18).

The texts of the preexilic as well as most of the postexilic books draw a most uninviting picture of Sheol. This realm of death is described as an eternal house (Eccl 12:5) with chambers and rooms (Prv 7:27) and gates [Ps 9A:14; 106(107):18; Jb 38:17; Sir 51:9; Wis 16:13; Is 38:10; Mt 16:18; Rv 1:18], a prison (Eccl 9:10) with bars (Jon 2:7) and bolts and bonds [Ps 115(116):3], the land of oblivion [Ps 87(88):13; 114(115):17], a land whence no one can return (Jb 7:9–10; 10:21; Prv 2:19; Sir 38:21). Sheol is called the "no more" (Is 38:11), destruction [Ps 87(88):12], dust [Ps 21(22):30; 29(30):10; 145(146):4; Is 26:19; Jb 17:16; Dt 12:2]. It is a place of horror [Ps 115(116):3], complete darkness [Jb 10:21–22; 17:13; 18:18; 38:17; Ps 87(88):7; 142(143):3], and remoteness from Yahweh. Even so, Satan does not have any influence in the abode of the dead, but Yahweh controls Sheol through His power [Ps 138(139):8; Jb 26:6; Prv 15:11; Is 7:11; Am 9:2].

State of the Dead. In the Old Testament, death is conceived as the end of the entire living man. Yet this basic conception does not exclude a further existence of the deceased in the realm of the dead, as can be shown by the frequent mention of the dead, of graves, and of funeral customs. For the Israelite, life is life only as it is filled with joy, fortune, wealth, and Yahweh's presence. These marks of life are not present in the deceased, who are referred to as r^{e}pāîm, the "weak" [Jb 26:5; Ps 87(88):11; Is 14:9] or as those who have descended into the pit [Ps 27(28):1; 29(30):4; Is 38:18; Ez 26:20; 31:14, 16]. In Sheol the dead remain in a state of suspended animation, phantoms of the entire former living man, devoid of all power and vitality (Is 14:10). There is no activity (Eccl 9:10), no pleasure (Sir 14:11–17), no participation in or knowledge of what is happening on earth (Eccl 9:5; Jb 14:12–17; 21:21). In the older books of the Old Testament no doubt exists that the deceased are taken away from the vital union with Yahweh. In the nether world no one praises God any more [Ps 6:6; 29(30):10; 113B (115):17; Sir 17:22–23; Is 38:18b].

However, the older, pessimistic concept of Sheol as the one place for all the dead, irrespective of the moral value of their lives, changes in the later books of the Old Testament. The doctrine of RETRIBUTION gradually leads to a distinction between the lot of the good and that of the wicked [Ez 32:17–32; Is 26:8, 14–21; 66:24; Ps 33(34):22–23; Wis 3:2–10, 19; Prv 14:32]. The just man has hope because he will be rewarded for his work (2 Chr 15:7; Wis 4:7–17, 20). In the writings of the postexilic period, a real change in the attitude toward afterlife is observable in the expectancy of resurrection. Israel's faith in its election by Yahweh and in His mercy and omnipotence, a faith that was justified by His constant intervention in the history of the nation and by its experience of the loving union between God and the pious man, developed into a trust in Yahweh that amounted to an undocumented guarantee of resurrection and immortality. This doctrine developed gradually [Jb 14:14–17; Hos 13:14; Is 25:9; 57:1–2; Wis 1:13–16; Ps 36(37):3–7; 64(65):5a], and Isaiah worked out some of its theological reasonings. One finds it in plain words in Dn 12:1–3; Jb 19:25–27; Is 26:19–21; and 2 Mc 7:9–11, 14, 22–23, 34–36. However, even at the time of Christ, the doctrine of individual resurrection, which was explicitly rejected by the SADDUCEES, was not commonly accepted in Israel (Mt 22:23–34 and parallels; Acts 23:6–10). In the New Testament Jesus clearly affirms the resurrection of the dead in opposition to its denial by the Sadducees (Mk 12:24–27; Mt 22: 29–32). Jesus refers to himself as "the resurrection and the life" (Jn 11:25), and Paul understands the future resurrection as a sharing in the victory Christ over death (1 Cor 15:20–28; Col 2:12). In addition to the future resurrection of the body, the New Testament affirms a distinction between the soul and the body (Mt 10:28; 2 Cor 5:8) that implies the continued existence of the human person as a soul in the afterlife. The just ones who die live in Christ (cf. Phil 1:23); they are destined to become like Christ and see him as he is (1 Jn 3:2). After death all human beings are subject to judgment before God (Heb 9:27; 12:23). The afterlife, then, consists of those who share in the blessed life of the heavenly kingdom with Christ (Mt 25: 34) and those who suffer the torments of hell (Mt 25:41). Some, however, will be saved "but only as through fire" (1 Cor 3:15), an image later understood within Catholic tradition as a reference to posthumous purification or PURGATORY.

SEE ALSO ABRAHAM'S BOSOM; GEHENNA; HEAVEN (IN THE BIBLE); HEBREW SCRIPTURES; HELL (IN THE BIBLE); IMMORTALITY; JUDGMENT, DIVINE (IN THE BIBLE); NEW TESTAMENT BOOKS; RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

P. Antoine, Dictionnaire de la Bible, Supplément, edited by Louis Pirot et al. (Paris 1928–), 2:1063–1076.

Robert Henry Charles, Eschatology: The Doctrine of a Future Life in Israel, Judaism, and Christianity; A Critical History (New York 1963).

P. Dhorme, "Le Séjour des Morts chez les Babyloniens et les Hébreux," Revue Biblique 16 (1907): 59–78.

P. Dhorme, "L'Idée de l'au-Delà dans la Religion Hébraïque," Revue de l'Histoire des Religions 123 (1941): 113–142.

Hermann Eising, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, edited by Josef Höfer und Karl Rahner, 10 vols., 2nd. ed. (Freiburg, Germany 1957–1965), 9:391–93.

Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, translated and adapted by Louis F. Hartman (New York 1963), 508–510.

André Feuillet, "Mort du Christ et Mort du Chrétien d'après les Épîtres Pauliniennes," Revue Biblique 66 (1959): 481–513.

Alfred Jeremias, Die Babylonisch-Assyrischen Vorstellungen vom Leben nach dem Tode (Leipzig, Germany 1887).

H. J. Kraus and B. Reicke, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 vols., 3rd ed. (Tübingen, Germany 1957–1965), 3:403–406.

Otto Kuss, Der Römerbrief (Regensburg, Germany 1957), 1:241–275, with bibliography.

Johannes P. E. Pedersen, Israel: Its Life and Culture, I–IV (London 1926–1940; repr. 1959).

Josef Schmid, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, edited by Josef Höfer und Karl Rahner, 10 vols., 2nd. ed. (Freiburg, Germany 1957–1965), 5:890–892.

Edmund Felix Sutcliffe, The Old Testament and the Future Life, 2nd ed. (Westminster, Md. 1947).

Henry Peter Köster
Professor of Sacred Scripture and Associate Dean of Studies
Divine Word Seminary, Techny, Ill.

Robert L. Fastiggi
Professor of Systematic Theology,
Sacred Heart Major Seminary
Detroit, Mich. (2010)

III. ANCIENT GREECE AND ROME

At the outset, from an extrinsic point of view, Greco-Roman beliefs about life after death did not come from a revealed religion; they were not fixed in sacred books, nor were they dictated, maintained, and controlled as dogmas by a religious authority. They were the product of a slow and steady evolution that corresponded closely, although often with marked lags and uncertainties, to the trends or stages in the development of classical culture in general. Belonging as they did to the domain of tenacious traditions no less than to that of innate anxieties and forebodings, they were in no wise monolithic. New beliefs were superimposed on old conceptions without adjustment or elimination. Rites that belonged to an outmoded faith continued to be performed, even when no one any longer understood their precise bearing or original signification. Conceptions that were basically divergent were found not only side by side in a given cultural period but also together, apparently without conflict, in the soul of one and the same individual.

In General. The mingling of markedly diversified ethnic elements, especially in the great Hellenistic and Roman centers, created a mixture of opinions and beliefs that would be difficult to reduce to its primary components. In view of the shortcomings of official religion in the sphere of death and the hereafter, religious conceptions were exposed to the strong influences of old wives' tales, superstitions, and black magic, so that, in the Hellenistic Age and under the early empire, the educated classes abandoned themselves to unbelief, skepticism, or indifference. The masses, who were long isolated from the progress of philosophy and literature, were too deeply engulfed in the precarious conditions of material subsistence to attempt—at least on their own initiative—a separation of religious rites from superstitious practices or of sound religious sentiments from chimerical fictions.

Intrinsically, Greco-Roman views on the life beyond the grave were conditioned by the evolving ideas of ancient man respecting anthropology, the image of the universe, ethics, and human destiny. From the viewpoint of the earliest beliefs on death, the earliest notions on man were neither spiritual nor materialistic in the modern sense of the terms, but simply human, in the sense that man did not originally think of himself as a being composed of two principles. The human being was one entity that death did not split into a lifeless body and a surviving soul. The shade in the lower world or the soul in heaven was most commonly only man in his entirety, viewed from the angle of his corporeal dematerialization. The development of the concept of man gradually arrived at an increasingly sharp dichotomy between body and soul. The explanation for the distinction is not to be sought in the different opinions that were held on the nature of the vital principle (breath, blood, heat, eidolon, spark), but rather, on the one hand, in the practice of incineration, which by destroying the body emphasized the soul, and, on the other, in the influence exercised by dualistic currents in philosophy.

The ancient image of the world passed from Earth as a flat disk floating on the waters of Ocean to a universe of concentric spheres in harmonious movement, circumscribed by the sphere of the fixed stars. Yet it did not detach itself from the idea that the earth, where man reigned as master, formed the center of the universe. Since what survived of man did not attain a dematerialization that escaped the category of place, beyond the grave the soul went to the precise region that the scientific image of the world and the ideas on the survival and nature of the soul suggested it be assigned.

Ethical concepts acquired real influence only when death ceased to be considered a mere passage to another world, where the lot of the dead man was simply a repetition of his social condition on earth. Notions of moral responsibility, of personal conscience, of virtuous conduct, and of sinful life did not appear, however, until the individual became conscious of himself. Then he abandoned the idea that life was lived on earth only, and he submitted to moral demands with their inevitable sanctions, whereby he could hope, in an existence beyond the grave, for the justice and recompense that he in vain had expected on earth.

Human destiny was at first confined within the narrow limits of a terrestrial life, from which man escaped only to the extent that he assured the continuity of his family, tribe, and community. When this changed to emphasize the individual, it opened a concept of survival that, in combining the idea of a reward beyond the grave with the notion of an immortal soul, surpassed in both duration and intensity the possibilities of life on earth. Thus, the true life could begin or re-begin only after death, which, far from diminishing the significance of the human soul, sent it back to its heavenly and divine home.

Early and Classical Greek Beliefs. According to a notion that was held for many centuries, the dead man survived in his tomb, so meticulous care was devoted to funerals, funeral furniture and offerings, and the cult connected, on certain days of the year (e.g., at the Anthesteria at Athens), with tombs. This was the source too, from Mycenaean times, of the family cult and then of the community cult of dead men who were especially significant, namely, the heroes. Subsequently, society, cut off from its ancestral tombs by emigration, was no longer acquainted with either the cult of the dead or that of heroes. Hence arose the general Greek belief—reinforced by the authority of Homer—that the dead were all found together in the subterranean realm of Hades. In the absence of any moral perspective, Hades was not yet a place of retribution, but rather an exact negative replica of life on earth without the positive features of the physical plane—countryside, light, warmth, color, and sound—or the psychological plane—security, freedom, and joy of existence. In this life, by law of repetition, shades continued the shadow of their earthly sojourn. Minoan religion, however, had postulated the existence of Isles of the Blest, located at the end of the world beyond Ocean, to which the gods transported men of divine lineage while they were still alive. This transatlantic eden of living heroes was subsequently changed into the underworld Elysium of the blessed dead—most probably under the influence of the Mysteries of Eleusis. The initiates, in keeping with the law of repetition, continued to celebrate their joyous feasts in their new abode, while the noninitiates had to be satisfied with a shadowy existence in mire (ἐν βορβόρῳ). This was not yet a form of punishment but a deprivation of true life.

Orphic Conceptions. From the seventh to the sixth century BC, the Orphics took over certain popular beliefs regarding the hereafter and substituted prescriptions of moral purity for the ritual demands of the Eleusinian Mysteries. They spread the idea that noninitiates would be punished in hell for their unworthy lives. From the sixth century, the Orphics also adopted the doctrine of metempsychosis, the transmigration of the soul. They maintained that the soul, divinely immortal and independent of the entombed body in which it was entombed (σῶμα, σῆμα), was able, by upright conduct in successive incarnations, to free itself finally from all dependence on a carnal body. It could then live its own proper and true life in an Elysium, which Orphic teaching (except in Pindar) has not described in detail.

Pythagorean Conceptions. From the end of the sixth century, Pythagoreanism borrowed from the Orphic Mysteries its views on metempsychosis and the popular notion of recompense after death. It thus contributed in its turn to the belief that in the lower world Elysium was reserved for the pious, whereas Tartarus in Hades was a place of punishment for sinners.

Judgment and Reward or Punishment. In the classical period (fifth and fourth centuries BC) the Orphico-Pythagorean belief in the punishment of Hades spread widely, as is evidenced by literature (Aristophanes, Plato) and art (vase paintings). Most people were hardly reached by the philosophical arguments of Plato, who sought to prove scientifically the immortality of the soul, but they were deeply influenced by the mythico-religious representations of a rewarding hereafter, of which they learned from mythology and the mysteries. Thus most probably around 400 BC, the idea of a iudicium post mortem took shape, as is known through the writings of Plato and the art of fourth-century, southern Italian, funerary vases. After death every soul appeared before a tribunal in Hades, where a college of three heroes (Minos, Rhadamanthus, and Aeacus) judged it according to its merits. Pious souls were rewarded with Elysian dwellings, those of less perfect conduct underwent a kind of purgatory, and hardened sinners were condemned for all eternity to the tortures of Tartarus.

Hellenistic Beliefs. Plato's affirmation of the divine affinity and immortal nature of the soul ended in the skepticism of the New Academy, whereas EPICURUS, following the atomic theory of Democritus, taught that after death the soul, like the body, dissolved into atoms. The early Stoics recognized in their vital principle, which was related to the fiery ether, a vague form of survival, but it was impersonal and limited in time. With Posidonius and his Platonic leanings, the soul regained true immortality. The mystery religions and the strong Orphico-Pythagorean beliefs in Magna Graecia promised a hereafter to their adherents. This paradise did not so much indicate a low level of morality as it reflected deep longings for felicity unthreatened by trials or death. According to popular belief, which was not influenced by skepticism or by the denials of the educated class, the hereafter was usually located under the earth. This is indicated by metrical epitaphs, curse tablets consigning their victims to the infernal deities, Orphic gold plates found in south Italy, and paintings on funerary vases from the same region. Similarly, the allegorical interpretation of the punishments of Tartarus as worked out by the Pythagoreans had no effect on popular notions of reward or punishment in the next world.

Nevertheless, the progress of Hellenistic civilization brought about marked changes regarding the location of the hereafter. On the one hand, according to new scientific theories on the structure of the earth and the universe, Hades had to be moved either to the dark antipodes of the inhabited earth or to the non-illuminated hemisphere of the world. On the other hand, philosophico-religious teaching on the divine, and therefore heavenly, origin of the soul; astrological cosmology, which turned man's eyes heavenward; the increasing importance of the symbolism of fire and light; and the astral myths telling of great mortals being changed into stars all exerted an influence on beliefs. Men gradually adopted the revolutionary idea that after death souls were changed into stars or flew off to the starry sky. Under the Roman Empire this lunisolar or astral immortality received support from solar pantheism, but only limited circles were affected. In the leisured class as a whole, skepticism was the rule, whereas the lower strata of the population maintained their previous idea of an underworld Hades.

Early Rome. Primitive Roman beliefs regarding the hereafter were restricted in scope and character. The dead man was placed in a tomb that was built in the form of a house. He led there a weak existence, and the living sustained him by funeral offerings. At the same time he was feared, as evidenced by references to apparitions in dreams, to ghosts, to the role of the ahori, or premature dead, and to necromancy. On certain days of the year, the dead had official access to the world of the living by removing the lapis manalis covering the entrance to the lower world (mundus). In so far as the dead man was a link in the long chain of his gens, or clan, he belonged to the divine ancestral spirits, the Di Parentes. Mixed in the mass of the dead, he formed a part of the Lemures, spirits of the dead who were divided into Lares and Larvae, which were benevolent or malevolent, respectively. Furthermore, these various connections were all brought under the head of Di Manes, to whom specific rites were assigned: the Parentalia, Lemuria, and Larentalia, and later the Rosalia and Dies Violares.

Before the fourth century BC, the Romans did not have an infernal lower world common to all the dead nor any form of punishment beyond the grave. After this time the Etruscans acquainted them with the Greek representation of Hades, but in the form that the terrifying Etruscan demonology had given it. In the third century BC, Magna Graecia invested this Etrusco-Roman world of the dead, Orcus, with all its rich infernal mythology and with all the Orphico-Pythagorean acquisitions to which the Greek genius had given birth. Through the direct contact between the Greco-Oriental and Roman civilizations, all these ideas and beliefs became more and more thoroughly acclimated at Rome. They received a quasi-sacred and definitive expression in the sixth book of Vergil's Aeneid.

Greco-Roman Beliefs. From the end of the republic, the Greco-Oriental and Roman worlds fused into a great cultural commonwealth in which the active, general circulation of religious ideas caused various forms of syncretistic religion to flourish. Still, old conceptions persisted, whether they took on a new life under their old patrons (the various philosophies), whether they adjusted themselves to the form and organization of religious practices coming from the East (the mystery cults), or whether they simply maintained themselves against the winds and waves of innovation, firmly anchored as they were in the hearts of the masses (popular beliefs).

Philosophy addressed the problem of the hereafter; Neo-Pythagoreanism (first century BC–second century AD) and Neoplatonism (c. 250–c. 500 AD)—despite some Oriental elements—represented currents and ideas of Greek origin. According to the Neo-Pythagoreans, souls, on being freed from the body, escaped into the atmosphere, where they were purified by the winds before they re-entered their original home, the starry spheres. The Neoplatonists taught that the soul, buffeted in some way between the material many and the spiritual One, had to apply itself to the noble task of regaining suprasensible divine life. The syncretistic teachings of Hermetic literature and of Gnosticism (second and third centuries AD) held in common that the soul, having once been cast into matter, could return to its heavenly source only through true knowledge. Besides the old mysteries, whose promise of immortality was reinforced through contact with Orphico-Pythagorean and Neoplatonic elements, various cults, under a flexible form of mystery religion probably borrowed from the Greek mysteries, honored divinities imported from the East (Cybele-Attis, Isis-Osiris, Sabazios, Mithras) and attracted the emotional devotion of the masses, among whom the earlier native stock was being submerged by cosmopolitan elements.

It is desirable, however, to evaluate the expansion of the philosophico-religious doctrines, which appealed strictly to the intellectual aristocracy insofar as they had not limited their hopes to the immortality of fame, and also to appraise the content of the message of salvation afforded by the mystery religions. Several lofty ideas that belonged to philosophy and the mysteries—freedom from death of the body by resurrection, deliverance from the death of the soul by spiritual rebirth and divine illumination, deification, divine filiation—had little or no influence on the common people before Christianity spread among them. Such ideas acquired their real efficacy, expansion, depth, and, in a certain measure, their existence only through the progress of Christianity.

The popular conceptions, vividly revealed by the metrical funeral inscriptions, indicate that common people were practically impervious to the Pythagorean idea that placed Hades in the sublunary region or in the moon itself and that they had no interest in solar pantheism or in Gnostic teachings on the fall and ascent of souls through the planetary spheres. The old believers clung to the cult of the dead at the tomb and to the idea of a lower world in which the shades lived the barest existence in darkness, although they granted that in rare cases the dead, as a reward for a pious life, enjoyed in the Elysian Fields a happy existence of eternal feasting. However, as the gods—and light—had their abode in the heavens, the blessed Hereafter belonged to the celestial heights. There the elect received as their portion the immortal happiness that the philosophico-religious teachings, the mysteries of Gnostic coloring, and imperial apotheosis had offered to a select few. Hell, in the modern sense, remained fixed in the traditional lower world; its punishments, to which Christianity made its contribution (e.g., in the Apocalypse of Peter), attained a diversity and refinement that emanated less from a conscience motivated by the unfulfilled desire for perfect justice than from the lower level of human thinking, over which neither the noblest pagan ideas nor the Christian gospel of salvation had effective control.

SEE ALSO Cretan-Mycenaean Religion; Etruscan Religion; Greek Philosophy (Religious Aspects); Greek Religion; Hades; Mystery Religions, Greco-Oriental; Neo-Pythagoreanism; Roman Religion; Stoicism; Orphism; Resurrection, Greco-Oriental.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

James Thayer Addison, Life Beyond Death in the Beliefs of Mankind (Boston and New York 1932).

Franz Cumont, Lux perpetua (Paris 1949; repr. 1987).

Albrecht Dieterich, Nekyia: Beiträge zur Erklärung der Neuentdeckten Petrusapokalypse, 2nd ed. (Leipzig, Germany 1913).

Lewis Richard Farnell, Greek Hero Cults and Ideas of Immortality (Oxford, U.K. 1921).

Friedrich Heiler, Unsterblichkeitsglaube und Jenseitshoffnung in der Geschichte der Religionen (Munich 1950).

Otto Kern, Die Religion der Griechen, 3 vols., 2nd ed. (Berlin 1963).

Kurt Latte, Römische Religionsgeschichte (Munich 1960).

Richmond Alexander Lattimore, Themes in Greek and Latin Epitaphs, 2nd ed. (Urbana, Ill. 1962).

Martin P. Nilsson, Geschichte der Griechischen Religion, 2 vols., 2nd ed. (Munich 1955–1961).

Walter Friedrich Otto, Die Manen oder von den Urformen des Totenglaubens, 3rd ed. (Darmstadt, Germany 1962).

Carlo Pascal, Le Credenze d'Oltretomba nelle Opere Letterarie dell'Antichità Classica, 2 vols. (Catania, Italy 1912, repr. 2006).

Gustav Pfannmüller, Tod, Jenseits und Unsterblichkeit in der Religion, Literatur, und Philosophie der Griechen und Römer (Basel, Germany 1953).

Erwin Rohde, Psyche: The Cult of Souls and Belief in Immortality among the Greeks, translated by W.B. Hillis from 8th German ed. (New York 1925).

Gabriel M. Sanders
Associate Professor of Ancient History,
Faculty of Philosophy and Letters
University of Ghent, Belgium

Robert L. Fastiggi
Professor of Systematic Theology,
Sacred Heart Major Seminary
Detroit, Mich. (2010)

IV. ANCIENT EGYPT AND MESOPOTAMIA

The ancient Egyptians were preoccupied with the afterlife. The practice of mummification extends back at least to the early part of the second millennium BC. At first people believed that continued existence in the next life required the preservation of the earthly body. Eventually, many in ancient Egypt came to believe that all dead continued to live in a realm ruled by Osiris, the god of the dead. The Egyptian Book of Going Forth by Day (or Book of the Dead) might have been composed as early as 1750 BC, though some place it as late as 1200 BC. It testifies to the ancient Egyptian interest in the afterlife and describes how, after death, the soul or heart of the deceased person is weighed on a scale balanced by the "feather of truth" before a tribunal of forty-two judges overseen by Osiris. This postmortem judgment is based on moral behavior during life. After the weighing of the heart, rewards or punishments follow, with complete annihilation sometimes a possibility.

According to ancient Egyptian mythology, Osiris had been drowned in a coffin and later chopped into pieces by his brother, Seth. Isis, the wife of Osiris, miraculously restored him to life, and thus she became the savior-figure of the cult of Isis, which later spread throughout the Greco-Roman world. The Golden Ass or Metamorphoses, written by Apuleius (c. 123–180 AD), and the work Concerning Isis and Osiris by Plutarch (c. 46–120 AD) testify to the interest in the cult of Isis. They also reveal the ancient Greek and Roman desire for a savior and a future life, a desire left unsatisfied by the fatalistic view of the Greco-Roman religions, which ascribed immortality to the gods and mortality to humans.

The ancient Mesopotamians, unlike the ancient Egyptians, did not conceive of a moral judgment of the soul after death. Instead, they believed in a netherworld, called Nergal, which was very similar to the early Hebraic concept of Sheol. In the Epic of Gilgamesh, composed between the eighteenth and seventh centuries BC, Gilgamesh conjures up and converses with the shade of his former companion, Enkidu, but this shade is hardly the person he was when alive. Nergal was understood by the ancient Mesopotamians as a gloomy dusty realm of "spirits and defeated gods," "a land in which there was no return, except perhaps for assassinated or wronged persons who might come back briefly to haunt their malefactors" (Smart 1991, p. 249).

SEE ALSO Book of the Dead; Egypt, Ancient; Gilgamesh Epic; Mesopotamia, Ancient.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Apuleius, The Golden Ass (Penguin Classics) E.J. Kenney trans. (New York, 1999).

The Epic of Gilgamesh (Penguin Epics) (New York, 2006).

Ninian Smart, The Religious Experience, 4th ed. (New York 1991).

Alice K. Turner, The History of Hell (Orlando, Fla. 1995).

Eva Von Dassow, ed., and Raymond Faulkner, trans., The Egyptian Book of the Dead: The Book of Going Forth by Day–The Complete Papyrus of Ani (San Francisco, 2008).

Robert L. Fastiggi
Professor of Systematic Theology,
Sacred Heart Major Seminary
Detroit, Mich. (2010)

V. PERSIA, INDIA, AND CHINA

Belief in a future life was prominent in the Persian religion of Zoroastrianism, which can be traced to the prophetic figure Zarathustra (Zoroaster in Greek) who lived around the ninth or tenth century BC (though some scholars place him in the seventh century BC). The Zoroastrian scriptures affirm both the judgment of the soul after death and a future resurrection of the body. The particular judgment of individuals is depicted as the crossing of a bridge (the Chinvat Bridge) toward paradise. Those who live wicked lives are tossed off the bridge into hell. The righteous souls, however, enter paradise, whereas other souls go to a state of limbo. In the future age (at the end of ordinary time), the souls of the deceased are reunited with their bodies. They then undergo a final judgment. After a final purification, the souls in limbo (and perhaps some of those in hell) enter into paradise. Some, however, are consigned to hell forever, along with Angra Mainyu, the evil spirit, and other demons.

The clear affirmations of life after death, judgment, heaven and hell, and the future resurrection of the body have led some scholars to wonder whether there might have been a Zoroastrian influence on Jewish eschatology through contacts with the ancient Persians, either during or after the Babylonian exile. Some scholars shy away from such speculation. Others, however, believe that it was not until the ancient Hebrews had contact with Persia "that such ideas as resurrection of the dead at the end of the world, a final judgment, the making of a new earth, and heaven and hell became important in the Hebrew scriptures" (Ellwood and McGraw 1999, p. 266).

From a Catholic perspective, it should be noted that PIUS XII, in his encyclical Humani generis (1950), acknowledged a possible influence of non-biblical sources on the authors of the Bible. The pontiff, however, stated that, if such sources were employed, the sacred authors made use of them "under the impulse of divine inspiration which preserved them from all error in selecting and assessing the documents they used" (Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 3898).

Followers of the main religions originating in India, such as JAINISM, HINDUISM, BUDDHISM, and SIKHISM, all believe in REINCARNATION and the TRANSMIGRATION OF SOULS. In their writings the Hindus and Buddhists also speak of numerous hells that some souls pass through on their way to ultimate purification or liberation. Although belief in reincarnation has been linked to some Greek philosophical circles, it is, by and large, a distinctive feature of Indic religious thought. The goal, however, is not to continue living on earth through numerous lives, but to escape the cycle of birth and rebirth (samsara) through liberation (Jainism and Hinduism) or the attainment of an unconditioned state (the Buddhist nirvana). Sikhism, which emerged in the sixteenth century AD, was influenced by Muslim monotheism. In spite of the Muslim influence, followers retained their belief in reincarnation as part of the journey toward eternal life with God.

The religions of India have multiple descriptions of the final state of liberation, and, in Buddhism, the state of nirvana is most often described by negation rather than affirmation (i.e., as a state beyond pain and desire). In Hinduism different schools of thought exist as to whether the individual soul is absorbed into the supreme reality (BRAHMAN) or whether the soul retains its own individuality.

Although popular beliefs in life after death existed in ancient China, classical Confucianism never developed a clearly defined eschatology. CONFUCIUS (c. 551–479 BC) did not deny life after death, but he was reluctant to talk about such matters. Instead, he concentrated his efforts on inculcating righteousness and propriety for the present life. The Chinese religion of Taoism (also called DAOSIM) tends toward a naturalism that is not very concerned with personal survival after death. There is talk of immortality, but it seems more focused on a mystical intuition of the way of things (the Tao) than an affirmation of personal, individual existence after death.

Devotional MAHAYANA Buddhism, more than Confucianism and Taoism, provided the Chinese with the image of a "pure land" beyond this life, which is free of pain and defilement and full of light and glory. Moreover, the understanding of the Buddha as a savior-personality, who could provide entrance into the pure land, became very attractive to many Chinese.

SEE ALSO CONFUCIANISM AND NEO-CONFUCIANISM; ESCHATOLOGY, ARTICLES ON; HEBREW SCRIPTURES; HUMANI GENERIS; MYSTERY RELIGIONS, GRECO-ORIENTAL; NIRVĀṆA; PERSIAN RELIGION, ANCIENT; ZOROASTER (ZARATHUSHTRA).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

M. Dhavamony, "Death and Immortality in Hinduism" in Death and Immortality in the Religions of the World, edited by Paul and Linda Badham (New York 1987), 93–108

Heinrich Denzinger and Peter Hünermann, Enchiridion symbolorum definitionem et declarationem de rebus fidei et morum, 40th ed. (Freiburg im Breisgau 2005).

Robert S. Ellwood and Barbara A. McGraw, Many Peoples, Many Faiths: Women and Men in the World Religions (Upper Saddle River, N.J. 1999).

Ward J. Fellows, Religions East and West, 2nd. ed. (Fort Worth, Tex. 1998).

Pius XII, Humani generis, Concerning Some False Opinions Threatening to Undermine the Foundations of Catholic Doctrine (Encyclical, August 12, 1950), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/pius_xii/encyclicals/documents/hf_p-xii_enc_12081950_humani-generis_en.html (accessed December 3, 2008).

Ninian Smart, The Religious Experience, 4th ed. (New York 1991).

Alice K. Turner, The History of Hell (Orlando, Fla. 1995).

Robert L. Fastiggi
Professor of Systematic Theology,
Sacred Heart Major Seminary
Detroit, Mich. (2010)

VI. JUDAISM

Although Judaism is less focused on the afterlife than Christianity and Islam, it has traditionally affirmed the reality of a future Messianic Age and the resurrection of the dead. The Jewish sage Moses Ben Maimon or MAIMONIDES (1135–1204 AD) included belief in the resurrection of the dead in his thirteen articles of faith (Fellows 1998, p. 263). Various passages of the Bible can and have been cited in support of the resurrection of the dead (e.g., Ps 16:10–11; Ezek 37:1–14; Dan 12:1–3), but some of the most prominent appear in the Deuterocanonical books of Wisdom (chapters 1–5) and 2 Macc (chapters 7 and 12). Although not accepted as part of the Hebrew Bible by contemporary Jews, Wisdom and 2 Maccabees provide clear evidence of a Jewish belief in the resurrection of the dead.

In addition to the BIBLE, rabbinical writings and the TALMUD provide ample evidence of Jewish concepts of JUDGMENT, heaven, and hell. In the Messianic Age, those judged as righteous will enter into heaven (Gan Eden), which is sometimes described as having five chambers "for various classes of the righteous" (Cohn-Sherbok 1987, p. 27). Although some rabbis consigned all Gentiles en masse to hell, the general Jewish consensus is that righteous Gentiles who observe the Noachide Laws (i.e., avoiding idolatry, incest, shedding of blood, profanation of God's name, injustice, and the dismemberment of living animals) will also gain entry into heaven in the World to Come (Cohn-Sherbok 1987, p. 30).

In the Babylonian Talmud, hell is depicted as having seven divisions, each divided into seven more subdivisions, with each of these containing seven rivers of fire and seven rivers of hail. Thousands of crevices, scorpions, and pouches of poison appear in the divisions of hell. Those sent to hell include Jews who disobey the Torah and Gentiles who violate the Noachide Laws.

In modern times, many Jews, including rabbis, have rejected or modified traditional Jewish eschatology. Some contemporary Jews accept the immortality of the soul but raise doubts about the resurrection of the body and the eternity of hell. Others have reinterpreted the Messianic Age in a secular or naturalistic way, viewing it more as a metaphor for a better world in the future. Still others have come to understand "the State of Israel as a substitute for the Messiah himself" (Cohn-Sherbok 1987, p. 32).

SEE ALSO HEAVEN (IN THE BIBLE); HELL (IN THE BIBLE); JUDAISM; MACCABEES, BOOKS OF; WISDOM, BOOK OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Daniel Cohn-Sherbok, "Death and Immortality in the Jewish Tradition," in Death and Immortality in the Religions of the World, edited by Paul and Linda Badham (New York 1987), 24–36.

Ward J. Fellows, Religions East and West, 2nd. ed. (Fort Worth, Tex. 1998).

Ninian Smart, The Religious Experience, 4th ed. (New York 1991).

Alice K. Turner, The History of Hell (Orlando, Fla. 1995).

Robert L. Fastiggi
Professor of Systematic Theology,
Sacred Heart Major Seminary
Detroit, Mich. (2010)

VII. ISLAM

The main focus of Islamic eschatology is on the day of reckoning, or future judgment, and a future resurrection of the body. Many Muslims believe that the day of reckoning will be ushered in by the return of the prophet, Jesus, as a Muslim and the appearance of Al-Mahdī, the rightly guided one (viewed by Shi'a Muslims as "the hidden imam"). On the day of reckoning, God (Allāh) will judge human beings as worthy of rewards in heaven (paradise) or punishments in hell. Many Muslims also believe that God (Allāh) directs angels to keep records of human deeds, and a person's record of deeds determines his or her fate after death.

Although the focus is on the future day of reckoning and the resurrection of the dead, Islam also affirms the continued consciousness of those who have died.

After death the wicked experience hell in the grave prior to the Day of Judgment and the resurrection of the body. Likewise, after death, the souls of the righteous experience the rewards of paradise, which continue forever after the reunion with their bodies. Following 2:262 and 5:69 of the Qur'ān, some Muslims believe that adherents of other religions can escape hell and enter paradise. Others, however, following 4:56, believe that those who deny the Qur'an as God's revelation will receive severe punishments. Islamic images of paradise and hell are taken from both the Qur'ān and the Ḥadīth (the records of MUḤAMMAD's sayings and deeds). These images are very vivid and sometimes sensual. Although all Muslims believe in judgment, heaven, and hell, not all interpret these images in a literal fashion.

SEE ALSO ALLĀH; ISLAM; ISLAMIC TRADITIONS (ḤADĪTH); QUR'ĀN; SHIĪ'ITES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

N.J. Dawood, trans., The Koran (Penguisn Books) (New York 1999).

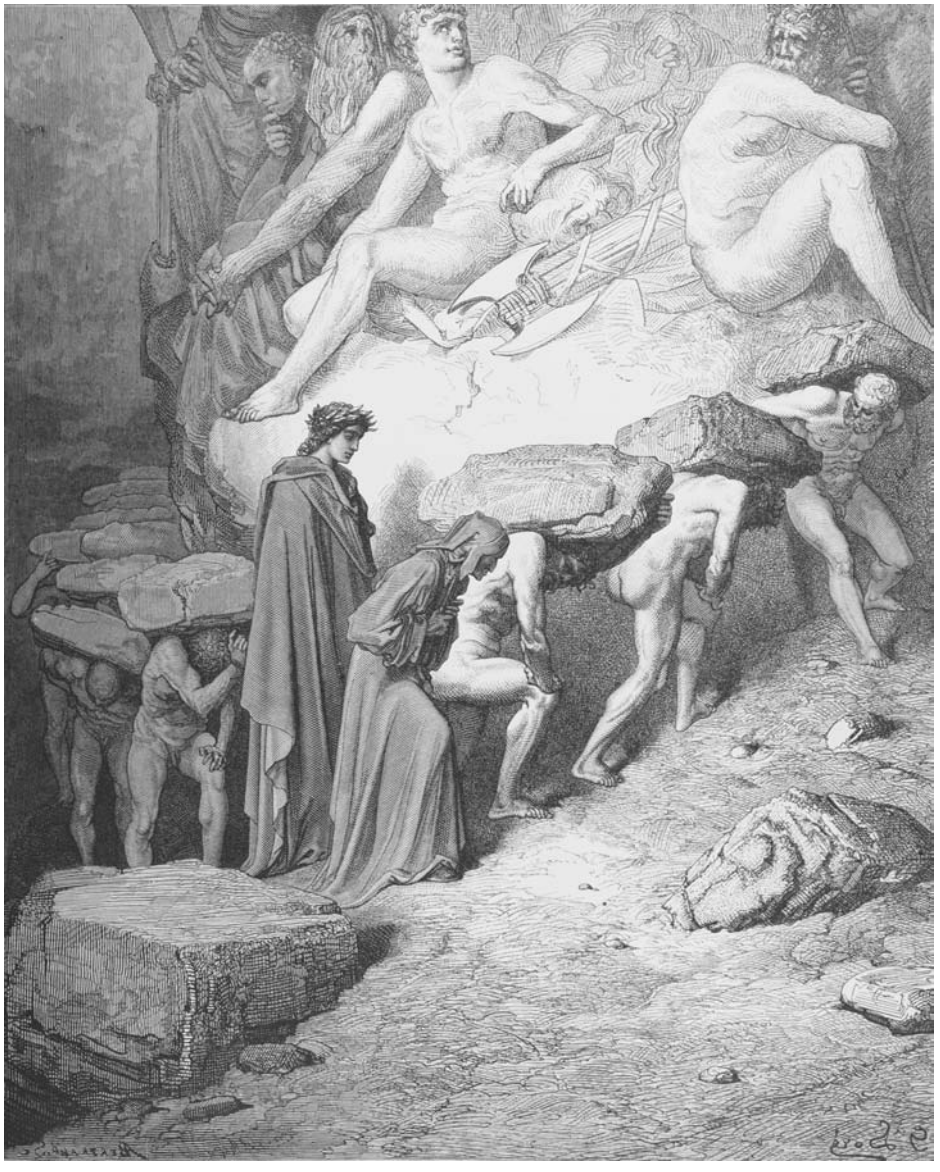
Jane I. Smith and Yvonne Yazbeck Haddad, The Islamic Understanding of Death and Resurrection (Albany, N.Y. 1981).

Salih Tug, "Death and Immortality in Islamic Thought" in Death and Immortality in the Religions of the World, edited by Paul and Linda Badham (New York 1987), 86–91.

Robert L. Fastiggi
Professor of Systematic Theology,
Sacred Heart Major Seminary
Detroit, Mich. (2010)

VIII. CHRISTIANITY

The scriptural and theological aspects of Christian eschatology are covered in other articles. A few words, however, can be said about the basic Christian understanding of the afterlife.



In Christian eschatology a distinction is made between individual eschatology and general eschatology. In individual eschatology the focus is on the fate of each individual after death. The basic topics are the particular judgment, heaven, hell, and PURGATORY. In general eschatology the focus is on the return of Jesus in glory (the PAROUSIA), the end of the world (as humans know it), the RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD, and the final or general judgment.

God judges the souls of all human beings after death individually. Although the New Testament "speaks of judgment primarily in its aspect of the final encounter with Christ in his second coming," it also "repeatedly affirms that each will be rewarded after death in accordance with his faith and works," and "each man receives his eternal retribution in his immortal soul at the very moment of his death" (Catechism of the Catholic Church 1997, 1021–1022).

The particular judgment requires the survival of the human person as a SOUL after death. Although the immortality of the individual rational soul was assumed by the Church's life and practice from the beginning, the Catholic Church only formally defined this doctrine in 1513 at Lateran V, in opposition to the Neo-Aristotelians of Padua (Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 1440). At the particular judgment the human soul is judged worthy of eternal life with God in the communion of the saints (heaven) or judged worthy of eternal separation from the blessed vision of God in hell. Some souls are worthy of heaven but require purification from the temporal effects of SIN before experiencing the BEATIFIC VISION. This process of purification is known as purgatory, a doctrine formally defined by the Catholic Church at the Councils of Florence and Trent (cf., Denzinger-Hünermann 2005; 1304–1305, 1820), though it can be traced to the Church's life and practice from the beginning. The faithful on earth can pray for the souls in purgatory to assist them in their process of purification.

The Catholic Church believes that those in heaven enjoy the blessed vision of God, the beatific vision, which is described in the New Testament as a "face to face" experience of God (1 Cor 13:12) and "seeing God as he is" (1 Jn 3:2). In addition to the beatific vision, they experience communion with all the angels and the just in "the communion of saints" (cf. Catechism of the Catholic Church 1997, 946–948). The souls in heaven are united with the faithful on earth in "a perennial link of charity," and by means of "an abundant exchange of all good things," the saints in heaven can intercede for those on earth (cf. Catechism of the Catholic Church 1997, 1475). The souls in heaven enjoy the beatific vision prior to the resurrection of the body, a truth clearly taught by Pope BENEDICT XII in 1336 (cf. Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 1000–1001). The resurrection of the flesh, however, is needed because God created the human person as a unity of soul and body. The resurrected body is a transformed and incorruptible body (cf. 1 Cor 15:36–49), but it retains a true continuity with the earthly body. The life of heaven is variously described as a joyful kingdom and a wedding feast (cf. Mt 25:10, 34), but the exact nature of heaven remains mysterious (cf. 1 Cor 2:9; Is 64:3). Although all in heaven are full of joy, the Church teaches that there will be degrees of glory among the blessed, corresponding to their merits (Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 1305).

The final consummation of the kingdom after the glorious return of Jesus likewise remains mysterious. After the resurrection of the dead, God's wisdom and justice throughout history will be revealed in the general or final judgment (cf. Catechism of the Catholic Church 1997, 1040–1041). The visible cosmos will be transformed, and there will be "the new heaven and the new earth" (Rev 21:1) freed from the limitations of sin and death.

A Christian's View. Dante speaks to Oderisi who labors under the weight he is forced to carry while in Purgatory. THE BURDEN OF PRIDE, FROM 'THE DIVINE COMEDY' (PURGATORIO) BY DANTE ALIGHIERI (1265-1321) ENGRAVED BY ANTOINE VALERIE BERTRAND (B.1823) C.1868 (ENGRAVING), DORE, GUSTAVE (1832-83) (AFTER)/PRIVATE COLLECTION/THE BRIDGEMAN ART LIBRARY

Hell is described as "the state of definitive self-exclusion from communion with God and the blessed" (Catechism of the Catholic Church 1997, 1033). The New Testament describes hell as a state in which the worm does not die and the fire is not extinguished (Mk 9:48). It is likewise depicted through images of darkness and wailing and gnashing of teeth (Mt 13:42; 24:51). The chief suffering of hell is the pain of loss experienced by "the separation from God, in whom man alone can possess the life and happiness for which he was created and for which he longs" (Catechism of the Catholic Church 1997, 1035). Positive punishments or pains are also experienced in hell, and it is generally acknowledged that these sufferings differ in proportion to the sins of the damned. In spite of some early Christian denials of the eternity of hell, the Catholic Church teaches that the punishments in hell are everlasting (cf. Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 801; Catechism of the Catholic Church 1997, 393, 1035).

SEE ALSO COMMUNION OF SAINTS; ESCHATOLOGY, ARTICLES ON; HEAVEN (IN THE BIBLE); HELL (IN THE BIBLE); JUDGMENT, DIVINE (IN THE BIBLE); JUDGMENT, DIVINE (IN THEOLOGY); LATERAN COUNCILS; TRENT, COUNCIL OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Catechism of the Catholic Church, 2nd ed. (Vatican City 1997).

Brian E. Daley, S.J. The Hope of the Early Church: A Handbook of Patristic Eschatology (Peabody, Mass., 2003.

Heinrich Denzinger and Peter Hünermann, Enchiridion symbolorum definitionem et declarationem de rebus fidei et morum, 40th ed. (Freiburg im Breisgau 2005).

Joseph Ratzinger, Eschatology: Death and Eternal Life 2nd Ed., Michael Waldstein trans. (Washington, D.C. 2007).

Michael Schmaus, Dogma 6: Justification and the Last Things (New York 1978).

Robert L. Fastiggi
Professor of Systematic Theology,
Sacred Heart Major Seminary
Detroit, Mich. (2010)

AGGIORNAMENTO

Aggiornamento (a commonly used Italian word meaning updating) was made popular by Pope JOHN XXIII, who used the term to indicate a program of change, renewal, and modernization in the Catholic Church. Aggiornamento was to become a hallmark theme of his pontificate. In his announcement of the coming ecumenical Council of Vatican II to the group of cardinals gathered at the basilica of St. Paul Outside the Walls on January 25, 1959, the PONTIFF declared that there can be no genuine Catholic renewal in the twentieth century without a serious pursuit of Christian unity. Authentic aggiornamento also required a new openness to secular culture that would enable the Church to present the GOSPEL message in a way that is more intelligible and appealing to modern people. At the same time the POPE assured his audience that this program of updating and "adaptation" to the secular world was never to be at the price of endangering the purity and integrity of the Church's teaching. For Pope John XXIII his call for aggiornamento and renewal was based on a deep pastoral concern for an effective preaching of the Gospel. At the same time any dialogue with modernity, he insisted, must remain totally loyal to "the sacred patrimony of truth received from the Fathers."

During his opening speech to the Council fathers on October 11, 1962, he further elaborated on the implications of aggiornamento by encouraging theologians and church scholars to make use of "the methods of research" and the "literary forms" of modern thought. To dispel any confusion about this task, Pope John carefully distinguished for his audience the "the substance of the ancient doctrine of the deposit of faith" from "the way in which it is presented." On this basis he proposed new forms of theological expression, provided they did not in any way dilute doctrinal substance. But even in matters of erroneous teaching, the pontiff urged the Council fathers to prefer "the medicine of mercy" to the "severity" of condemnations. These papal directives reflected the pastoral spirit with which Pope John intended to guide the Council.

Pope John XXIII had from the start attributed his decision to convoke the Council to a special "illumination" of the Holy Spirit. In contrast to those he referred to as "prophets of gloom," he believed that Divine Providence was leading the world to a "new order of relations," requiring a new openness on the part of the Church. He saw this openness as an opportunity for a more positive dialogue with the secular world and envisaged the coming Council as the beginning of a "new Pentecost." The council's task, he insisted, would be to "read the signs of the times" and to guide the Church to respond responsibly to the special challenges and possibilities of the modern world. Aggiornamento (renewal and modernization) was to be the Church's answer to the challenge.

Despite Pope John's consistent attempts at clarification and assurance, the Council fathers from the outset held sharply conflicting views and valuations of aggiornamento. While some saw it as an ingenuous and dangerous accommodation to the secular culture, others understood it to signify a deep spiritual renewal of the Church for the sake of the Gospel. These differing views continue to prevail in the Church of the twenty-first century.

As the Council progressed from the 1962 opening, its view of aggiornamento crystallized around the triad of inner Church renewal, dialogue with the modern world, and the promotion of unity among the Christian churches. Pope John XXIII, after having successfully steered a large, pluralistic group of sometimes hesitant fellow bishops through the first session of the ecumenical council, died in June 1963, before the second session began.

In his opening address at the beginning of the second session, John's successor, Pope PAUL VI, enthusiastically embraced the task of completing the Council and reiterated his commitment to the Council's goals. While some critics were not convinced that the new Pope consistently supported Pope John's modernizing vision through the rest of the Council sessions, Pope Paul's closing address on December 8, 1965, plainly reflected the spirit of aggiornamento, as he sent the bishops forth to spread the "good news" to the world "in a language accessible to all people."

Similarly, when Cardinal Karol Wojtyla, archbishop of Krakow, ascended the papal throne as JOHN PAUL II in October 1978, he immediately expressed his determination to continue the work of the Council. He even took as his papal name both John and Paul, to express his continuity with the two conciliar popes. His book Sources of Renewal: The Implementation of Vatican II (1979) recognized the Church's special debt to the Holy Spirit for the great gift of the Council. In his Apostolic Letter of 1994, Tertio Millennio Adveniente, in preparation for the millennial Jubilee celebration, he described the Second Vatican Council as a providential event and called for a communal examination of CONSCIENCE on the Church's fidelity to "the authentic spirit of Vatican II."

Social scientists, theologians, and historians have varying assessments of how consistently Church leadership has continued on the path of aggiornamento since the end of Vatican II. History suggests, however, that Church renewal and reform are never completed tasks—ecclesia semper reformanda.

SEE ALSO CONSCIENCE, EXAMINATION OF; MODERN MEDIA AND THE CHURCH; MODERNISM; MODERNISM, OATH AGAINST; PENTECOST; SECULARISM; TERTIO MILLENNIO ADVENIENTE; VATICAN COUNCIL II.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Anthony M. Barratt, "Interpreting Vatican II Forty Years On: A Case of Caveat Lector," Heythrop Journal 47 (2006): 75–96.

John XXIII, Festività della conversione di san paolo, Feast of the Conversion of St. Paul (Homily, January 25, 1959), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_xxiii/homilies/1959 (accessed June 8, 2008).

John XXIII, Gaudet mater ecclesia, Address on the Occasion of the Solemn Opening of the Most Holy Council (Speech, October 11, 1962), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_xxiii/speeches/1962 (accessed June 8, 2008).

John Paul II, Sources of Renewal: The Implementation of Vatican II (San Francisco 1979).

John Paul II, Tertio Millennio Adveniente, On Preparation for the Jubilee of the Year 2000 (Apostolic Letter, November 10, 1994), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/apost_letters/documents/hf_jp-ii_apl_10111994_tertio-millennio-adveniente_en.html (accessed June 8, 2008).

John W. O'Malley, S.J. "Reform, Historical Consciousness, and Vatican II's Aggiornamento," Theological Studies 32 (1971): 573–601.

Raymond F Bulman
Professor of Systematic Theology
St. John's University, New York (2010)

ALBERIONE, JAMES, BL.

Also known as Santiago Alberione or Giacomo Alberione; founder of the Pious Society of St. Paul, Alba, Italy; b. April 4, 1884, San Lorenzo di Fossano (Cuneo), Italy; d. November 26, 1971, Rome, Italy; beatified by Pope John Paul II, April 27, 2003.

James Alberione, the fourth of Michael and Teresa Allocco's six children, expressed a desire to be a priest from an early age. At the turn of the century, following hours of prayer, James felt the call to serve God and the Church, so he entered a seminary at age sixteen. He was ordained on June 29, 1907, and served at the Seminary of Alba, where he assisted with catechesis, preaching, and conferences.

Father Alberione's inspiration was the Apostle Paul, and he believed that, like Paul, God had called him to preach the GOSPEL to all people. He wrote two books that expressed his thoughts on communicating God's message using modern methods: Notes on Pastoral Theology (1912) and Woman Associated to Priestly Zeal (1911–1915). He also strongly supported the idea of involving women in the apostolate.

On August 20, 1914, he founded the Pious Society of St. Paul. With the help of Teresa Merlo (1894–1964), he began the Daughters of St. Paul the following year. His health failed in 1923, but he had a miraculous recovery that he attributed to St. Paul, and he was able to continue his work. Father Alberione went on to establish three more female congregations—PIOUS DISCIPLES OF THE DIVINE MASTER (1924), Sisters of Jesus the Good Shepherd (Pastorelle Sisters, 1938), and Queen of the Apostles Institute for vocations (Apostoline Sisters, 1959). His new institutes became known as the Pauline Family; their primary focus was holiness of life, followed by holiness of doctrine.

To spread God's message, Father Alberione used magazines; he started more than a half dozen periodicals for priests, laity, and even children. He also established branch houses throughout Italy as well as abroad and founded secular institutes for the consecrated life—St. Gabriel the Archangel, Our Lady of the Annunciation, Jesus Priest, and the Holy Family. In spite of painful scoliosis, he attended VATICAN COUNCIL II (1962–1965). In 1969 Pope PAUL VI gave Father Alberione the cross Pro Ecclesia et Pontifice, and in 1971 the pope visited Father Alberione shortly before the priest died. On June 25, 1996, Pope JOHN PAUL II declared Father Alberione venerable and, on April 27, 2003, declared him blessed for his humble, tireless service and his heroic virtues.

Feast: November 26.

SEE ALSO ITALY, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; PAUL, APOSTLE, ST.; ST. PAUL, PIOUS SOCIETY OF DAUGHTERS OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

James Alberione, Antonette Jesumani, and Rosy Mathew, Eucharistic Adoration: Prayers and Reflections Inspired by Bl. Alberione (Mumbai, India 2005).

"Blessed James Alberione," The Daughters of St. Paul, available from http://www.daughtersofstpaul.com/Founders/BlessedJamesAlberione/tabid/114/Default.aspx (accessed July 9, 2009).

Congregation for the Causes of Saints, "On the Beatification of Blessed Father James Alberione: Homily of Cardinal José Saraiva Martins," Vatican Web site, April 28, 2003, available (in Portuguese) from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/congregations/csaints/documents/rc_con_csaints_doc_20030428_homilia-martins_po.html (accessed July 8, 2009).

John Paul II, "Beatification of Six New Servants of God," (Homily, April 27, 2003), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/homilies/2003/documents/hf_jp-ii_hom_20030427_beatification_en.html (accessed June 12, 2009).

"The Founder: Blessed James Alberione," Society of St. Paul, available from http://www.paulus.net/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=22&Itemid=37 (accessed July 8, 2009).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "James Alberione (1884–1971)," Vatican Web site, April 27, 2003, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_lit_doc_20030427_alberione_en.html (accessed June 12, 2009).

Laurie J. Edwards
Independent Scholar
Reidsville, N.C. (2010)

ALLENBY, EDMUND

British Field Marshall during WORLD WAR I and High Commissioner for Egypt and Sudan following the war; b. April 23, 1861, Nottinghamshire, England; d. May 14, 1936, London.

Allenby was educated at the Royal Military College at Sandhurst. He married Mabel Chapman, and by all accounts the marriage was an exceptionally happy one. They had one child, a son, Horace Michael Hynman (Michael), who was killed in action in France on July 29, 1917.

Allenby's first commission, in 1882, was with the Sixth Inniskilling Dragoons who were stationed in South Africa during the Second Boer War. He earned a reputation there for strict discipline, uncompromising integrity, and military efficiency, that would remain with him for the rest of his life and earn him the nickname, "The Bull."

When World War I broke out in Europe in 1914, Allenby initially served in France. In 1917 he was selected to replace General Sir Archibald Murray as Commander in Chief of the Egyptian Expeditionary Force. Allenby arrived in Cairo on June 28, 1917, where his characteristic strict disciplinary requirements, resolute bearing, and immediate presence among his men quickly earned him their respect and loyalty.

After successfully driving the enemy from Gaza and Beersheba in November 1917, Allenby focused his attention on the city of JERUSALEM, which had been in the hands of the Turks since 1517. Before arriving in PALESTINE, Allenby had studied the history of the area in depth and was intimately familiar with the failed strategies of the CRUSADES and of Richard Coeur de Lion. He decided that success could be achieved only if the advance continued unabated without allowing the enemy time to prepare a defense. Allenby's offensive continued unabated until Jaffa, the seaport of Jerusalem, was taken on November 16.

Allenby desired to avoid fighting in Jerusalem itself; therefore, rather than advance directly on the holy city, he instead ordered his troops to surround the city and force an evacuation. Jerusalem was evacuated and surrendered by the Turks on December 9, 1917. Allenby entered the city on foot, and in his official proclamation to the city's inhabitants he stated that under his command "every sacred building, monument, holy spot, shrine, traditional site, endowment, pious bequest or customary place of prayer of whatsoever form of the three religions will be maintained and protected according to the existing customs and beliefs of those to whose faiths they are sacred." (Gardner 1965, p. 162.)

In addition to being a man of large stature and commanding presence, Allenby delighted in drawing and sketching, literature, poetry, the study of language, history, archeology, and zoology. While not himself a religious man, he nevertheless harbored a lifelong curiosity about religion and especially the Catholic faith, as two of his closest friends, Fr. Knapp, his Boer War chaplain, and a French mother superior, were Catholic.

Upon Allenby's death in 1936, the New York Times wrote: "In the history of the human race his name will be permanently written as Allenby, the deliverer of the Holy Land. It is likely that in the English-speaking world no name among those of all who held high command will be so long remembered."

Allenby died on May 14, 1936, and his ashes are buried at Westminster Abbey.

SEE ALSO OTTOMAN TURKS; PALESTINE, PAPAL POSITION TOWARD.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

David F. Burg and L. Edward Purcell, Almanac of World War I (Lexington, Ky. 1998).

Brian Gardner, Allenby of Arabia (New York 1965).

Matthew Hughes, Allenby and British Strategy in the Middle East 1917–1919 (London 1999).

Spencer C. Tucker, The Great War 1914–18 (Bloomington, Ind. 1998).

Jeremy Wilson, Lawrence of Arabia: The Authorized Biography of T. E. Lawrence (New York 1990).

Susan A. Maurer
Instructor, Department of History,
Political Science, and Geography
Nassau Community College,
Garden City, N.Y. (2010)

ALLENDE, SALVADOR

Chilean president, 1970–1973; b. Valparaiso, Chile, July 26, 1908; d. Santiago, Chile, September 11, 1973.

Salvador Allende was a Socialist leader from an upper-middle class background. He had already a long career in Chilean politics at the time of his election to the presidency in 1970. In 1933 he founded the Chilean Socialist Party, and four years later, in 1937, he was elected to the Chamber of Deputies. In 1943 he was elected secretary general of the Socialist Party. He ran for president in 1952 as a candidate for the Socialist Party, but he lost to Carlos Ibañez. In 1958 he ran for president again, but this time he lost to Jorge Alessandrini, the Conservative-Liberal candidate. Six years later, in 1964, a third attempt ended in defeat when the Christian Democrat Eduardo Frei was elected president.

In October 1969, Allende created the organizational committee of Unidad Popular (UP, or Popular Unity), an alliance of Marxist and leftist political parties. Three months later he was named the presidential candidate of the alliance. In September 1970 Allende finally won the presidency, and a month later the Congress ratified his election.

Soon after assuming power, Allende launched a series of socialist reforms, including the nationalization of the copper mining companies, private banks, and a number of industries. There were strong negative reactions to these reforms, both nationally and internationally. In December 1971, reacting to the internal social unrest, the government decreed a state of emergency and instituted a curfew in the Chilean capital of Santiago. Truckers, traders, and professional workers went on strike in August 1973 in an attempt to force Allende to resign. Only a month later, however, on September 11, 1973, the Chilean military, under the leadership of General Augusto Pinochet, orchestrated what Brian Loveman has called a "well-coordinated, brutal and highly successful military movement that ended the UP government and resulted in the death of President Allende" (Loveman 2001, p. 257).

Allende and the Church. Prior to Allende's election, the Catholic bishops of Chile were conflicted about the prospects of an Allende government. Many were optimistic about the idea of a democratic socialism that respected all forms of religious beliefs and defended the rights of the poor. At the same time, however, many were unsure about the intentions of the Marxist members of Allende's coalition, who were essentially anticlerical and atheist. While there was no open endorsement by the Church hierarchy, there were sectors of the Church that voted for Allende and openly collaborated with the government. Similarly, while there was no open condemnation from the Church's hierarchy, nor any confrontation between the Church and Allende's government, conflicts between them inevitably arose.

One of the issues that created conflict between the Church and Allende's government was the issue of education in public schools. The Church reacted strongly against the government's initiative to supervise Catholic schools that received funds from the state, and it also argued against an initiative of educational reform called Escuela Nacional Unificada (Unified National School), which was announced in March 1973. The Church complained that the initiative did not take into consideration the values of the majority of Chileans, who were overwhelmingly Christian and rejected any type of ideologization of the educational system. The government responded by saying that the plan was designed by experts who were Marxist, Christian, and Rationalist, thus guaranteeing its pluralistic nature. In the end, the many other problems facing the government led Allende to abandon the initiative and avoid conflict with the Church.

During the time of Allende's presidential term, the Chilean Conference of Catholic Bishops made several statements on various issues, such as the participation of priests in politics; the position of the Church toward Cristianos por el Socialismo (Christians for Socialism), an association of radical Catholic priests and lay people; the differences between Christianity and Marxism; and various conflicts dominating Chilean society. Specifically, there was an elaborate document called "Gospel, Politics and Socialisms," which became internationally famous and was translated into four languages. This document symbolized the progressiveness of the Chilean Church, while at the same time it made clear the Church's rejection of any kind of totalitarian Marxist regime.

The Church hierarchy was aware of the social conflicts that the new government created in Chilean society, and it called upon Chileans to avoid any kind of civil war or confrontation that would jeopardize the peace in the country. In particular, Raul Cardinal Silva Enriquez, the archbishop of Santiago, stood as a powerful voice of the Church. His actions and declarations had a profound impact on public opinion and Chilean Catholics.

Initially some Catholic bishops reacted favorably to the military coup that ended Allende's government, believing that it meant the end of the Marxist threat. Once they became aware of the systematic repression and brutal nature of the subsequent regime, however, which included the arrest, torture, and execution of Catholic priests, most Chilean bishops openly rejected Pinochet's government.

SEE ALSO CHILE, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; LATIN AMERICA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; POLITICS, CHURCH AND; MARX, KARL; RATIONALISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

James D. Cockcroft, ed., Salvador Allende Reader: Chile's Voice of Democracy (New York 2000).

Anthony Gill, Rendering unto Caesar: The Catholic Church and the State in Latin America (Chicago 1998).

Brian Loveman, Chile: The Legacy of Hispanic Capitalism, 3rd ed. (New York 2001).

Brian Smith, The Church and Politics in Chile: Challenges to Modern Catholicism (Princeton, N.J. 1982).

Marlen Velasquez Almonacid, Episcopado chileno y Unidad Popular (Santiago, Chile 2003).

Miguel A. León
Professor
State University of New York at Oneonta (2010)

ALLOCUTION, PAPAL

Allocution comes from the Latin word, allocutio, which means an address, a speech, or a discourse. As used by the ancient Romans, it denoted a speech given by a military commander to his troops. In reference to papal addresses, it has both a more formal and less formal usage. In its more formal usage, a papal allocution is an address given by the POPE to the cardinals gathered together in a secret CONSISTORY. Although given in secret by the pope to the cardinals, these formal allocutions are often later made public.

Historically, some of these formal papal allocutions have concerned serious matters of state: for example, PIUS XII's 1802 allocution on the French Concordat and his 1808 allocution on Napoleon's policies toward the Church (Fanning 1907, p. 325). PIUS IX's allocution to the College of Cardinals of April 29, 1848, is also historically significant. In this address he made it clear that he would not allow the Papal States to join in the war against Austria. BENEDICT XV's allocution to the cardinals of December 24, 1917, likewise deserves mention as an eloquent papal plea for peace. Although many of these formal papal allocutions have concerned political matters, some have concentrated on moral issues. For example, in his allocution to the College of Cardinals of December 23, 1933, PIUS XI warned of the dangers of the growing use of sterilization in various countries.

In its less formal usage, the term allocution has been applied to any address given by the pope for a special purpose or to a specific audience. Thus, PAUL V's July 26, 1611, discourse to the legate of the King of Spain is referred to in Latin as Allocutio legato regis hispaniae destinata (Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 1997a). This particular allocution was not given in a consistory of cardinals, but delivered to the Spanish monarch's legate to explain the liberty permitted in teaching matters concerning the aids of GRACE, following the conclusion in 1607 of the famous Congregatio de auxiliis that examined the competing Jesuit and Dominican positions on grace, divine foreknowledge, and PREDESTINATION.

In the twentieth century the PONTIFF most associated with important allocutions is PIUS XII. Among his better-known allocutions were those given to newlyweds in the years 1939 to 1942 in which he underscored the indissolubility of marriage, and he warned of the dangers of DIVORCE. Pius XII also gave important allocutions to the Roman Rota in 1940, 1941, 1944, and 1946, in which he also emphasized the indissolubility of marriage and the need for rigor in determining cases of marital invalidity.

In his 1968 ENCYCLICAL Humanae vitae, PAUL VI cites several of the more prominent allocutions given by his predecessor, Pius XII. Among these are Pius XII's allocution to the Italian medico-biological union of St. Luke (November 12, 1944), his allocution to the Conference of the Italian Catholic Union of Obstetricians and the Italian Catholic Union of Midwives (referred to as the Allocution to the Midwives (October 29, 1951), and his allocution to the National Congress of the Union of Catholic Jurists (December 6, 1953).

The 1951 Allocution to the Midwives of Pius XII is one of the most frequently cited papal allocutions. In this address the pontiff reinforces Catholic condemnations of ABORTION, sterilization, and CONTRACEPTION. He accepts the "lawful" restriction of conjugal relations to "the natural sterile periods" for serious motives arising from "medical, eugenic, economic, and social 'indications'" (Byrnes 1963, no. 622, p. 419). Pius XII points to procreation and the education of children as the primary end of marriage "as an institution of nature" (come istizuzione naturale), but he notes that the conjugal act between husband and wife cannot be reduced "to a mere organic function" (Byrnes 1963, no. 637, p. 427). Moreover, he goes on to say that the Creator has decreed that husband and wife "should experience pleasure and happiness of body and spirit" in the marital act (Byrnes 1963, no. 643, p. 430).

Today, papal allocutions are more commonly referred to as addresses, discourses, or speeches in English, and equivalent terms (e.g., Ansprachen, discours, discorsi, and discursos) are used in other vernacular languages. Although papal allocutions, whether delivered before the College of Cardinals or some other audience, normally do not receive as much attention as papal constitutions, exhortations, or encyclicals, they still are authentic expressions of the ordinary papal Magisterium. Thus, the Congregation for the DOCTRINE OF THE FAITH in its Commentary on its August 1, 2007, Responses to Certain Questions of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops Concerning Artificial Nutrition and Hydration cites JOHN PAUL II's March 20, 2004, Address to the Participants in the International Congress on Life-Sustaining Treatments and Vegetative State: Scientific Advances and Ethical Dilemmas as an authoritative document of the HOLY SEE that provides moral guidance on the issue in question.

SEE ALSO APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTIONS; APOSTOLIC EXHORTATION; CARDINALS OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH; CONCORDAT OF 1801 (FRANCE); CONGREGATIO DE AUXILIIS; DOMINICANS; JESUITS; MAGISTERIAL DOCUMENTS; MARRIAGE LEGISLATION (CANON LAW); NAPOLEON I; TEACHING AUTHORITY OF THE CHURCH (MAGISTERIUM).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Michael J. Byrnes, trans., Papal Teachings: Matrimony (Boston 1963).

Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Commentary to Responses to Certain Questions of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops Concerning Artificial Nutrition and Hydration, available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/congregations/cfaith/documents/rc_con_cfaith_doc_20070801_risposte-usa_en.html (accessed November 29, 2008).

Henrich Denzinger and Peter Hünermann, Enchiridion symbolorum, definitionem et declarationem de rebus fidei et morum, 40th ed. (Freiburg im Breisgau 2005).

William H.W. Fanning, "Allocution," in The Catholic Encyclopedia, vol. I (New York 1907), 325.

Paul VI, Humanae vitae, Of Human Life (Encyclical, July 25, 1968), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/paul_vi/encyclicals/index.htm (accessed December 2, 2008).

John Paul II, Address to the Participants in the International Congress on Life-Sustaining Treatments and Vegetative State: Scientific Advances and Ethical Dilemmas (Papal Address, March 20, 2004), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/speeches/2004/march/documents/hf_jp-ii_spe_20040320_congress-fiamc_en.html (accessed December 2, 2008).

Pius XII, Allocution to Midwives (Papal Allocution, October 29, 1951), available from http//www.ewtn.com/library/PAPALDOC/P511029.HTM (accessed December 2, 2008).

Stephanus Sipos, Enchiridion iuris canonici, revised by Ladislaus Galos (Rome 1954), 163.

Denis Mack Smith, ed., The Making of Italy 1796–1870 (London 1968, repr.1988), 150–152.

Robert L. Fastiggi
Professor of Theology
Sacred Heart Major Seminary, Detroit, Mich. (2010)

ALPANDEIRE, LEOPOLDO DE, BL.

Known in religion as Leopoldo de Alpandeire Sánchez Márquez and as Leopoldo from Alpandeire; also known as Francisco Tomás Márquez Sánchez and Francisco Sánchez Márquez; professed lay brother; b. June 24, 1866, Alpandeire, Málaga, Spain; d. February 9, 1956, Granada, Spain; beatified by Pope BENEDICT XVI, September 12, 2010.

Baptized Francisco Tomás Márquez Sánchez, Leopoldo de Alpandeire grew up in the village of Alpandeire in Spain. His parents, Diego Sanchez Marquez and Jerome Francisco Tomás, had several children, including some who died young. This farming family raised their children in the FAITH and provided an example of humility. Young Francisco modeled his parents' Christian virtues and was known for his good heart and kindness to the poor.

At the age of thirty-three, he left his birthplace and traveled to Granada, where he joined the Order of Friars Minor Capuchin on November 16, 1899, and took the name Leopoldo. He dedicated himself to meditation and imitation of the CROSS and PASSION of Christ. The following year he made his first profession, and he took his vows on November 23, 1903. During this time he served as a gardener in the orchard, where he spent time in prayer. He was also known as a beggar for the poor as he went throughout Granada, collecting and distributing alms and praying for those he met.

Although he suffered from various ailments, including a hernia and bleeding feet, pain did not hold him back from his charitable duties. He continued to serve in this way until the age of eighty-nine, when, after suffering a fractured femur, he could walk only by leaning on two canes. He died a few years later at ninety-two.

Several miracles attributed to Fray Leopoldo by those who visited his tomb led to the process for his BEATIFICATION, which began in 1961. He was declared VENERABLE on March 15, 2008. On December 19, 2009, Pope Benedict XVI approved the decree recognizing a miracle, and the recognition of beatification was scheduled for September 12, 2010. Known for his humility, simplicity, kindness, and mercy, Fray Leopoldo provided a model for others to encourage them to follow the path of goodness.

SEE ALSO CANONIZATION OF SAINTS (HISTORY AND PROCEDURE); FRIARS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Fr. Alfonso Ramirez Peralbo, "Venerable Fray Leopoldo," Vicepostulación de Fray Leopoldo (Capuchinos–Granada), available from http://www.frayleopoldo.org/biografia.htm (accessed January 6, 2010).

"Francisco Tomás Márquez Sánchez (Leopoldo from Alpandeire)," The Hagiography Circle, December 17, 2009, available from http://newsaints.faithweb.com/year/1956.htm (accessed January 6, 2010).

"The 21 Decrees of the Congregation for Saints' Causes," Coo-ees from the Cloister, December 20, 2009, available from http://coo-eesfromthecloister.blogspot.com/2009/12/21-decrees-of-congregation-for-saints.html (accessed January 6, 2010).

"Venerable Francisco Sánchez Márquez," Saints.SQPN.com, December 20, 2009, available from http://saints.sqpn.com/venerable-francisco-sanchez-marquez/ (accessed January 6, 2010).

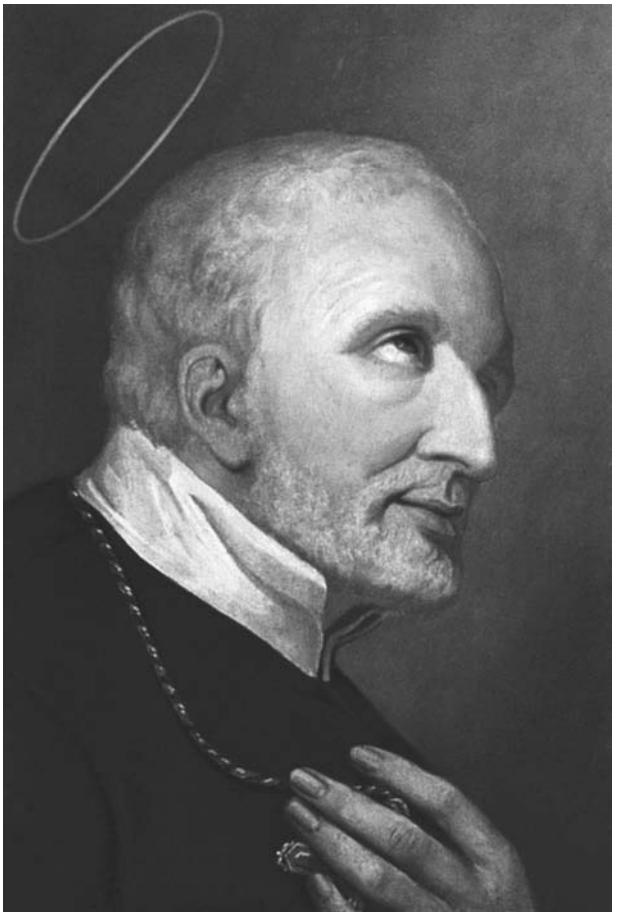
Laurie J. Edwards
Independent Scholar
Reidsville, N.C. (2010)

ALPHONSUS DE LIGUORI, ST.

Theologian, founder of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, bishop, DOCTOR OF THE CHURCH; b. Marianella, near Naples, Sept. 27, 1696; d. Pagani, near Salerno, Aug. 1, 1787.

Evangelization of the poor is what constituted the very heart of the life of Alphonsus de Liguori. He never tired of deepening his own perception of the merciful love of the Redeemer, and took for himself the viewpoint of the poor and abandoned. He then outlined a proposal for Christian living that accentuates the universal call to HOLINESS.

Life. Alphonsus was the eldest son of Giuseppe de Liguori, of a noble and ancient Neapolitan family and an officer of the royal navy, and Anna Cavalieri. After receiving his early education at home under the care of tutors, he was enrolled in 1708 at the University of Naples, where he studied until January 21, 1713, when at the age of sixteen he received his doctorate in utroque jure. He practiced at the bar for some years, leading all the while an exemplary Christian life under the direction of the ORATORIANS.



When charged in 1723 with the defense of the interests of the Duke of Gravina against the Grand Duke of Tuscany, he lost confidence in the justice of his client's cause, perhaps in consequence of intrigues. Shocked by this experience, he renounced the world and put on clerical dress, on October 23, 1723. He began his theological studies at home under the direction of Don Giulio Torni and joined a group of secular priests (the Congregation of the Apostolic Missions), in whose missionary activities he took part from 1724.

Ordained on December 21, 1726, he devoted himself in a special way to the work of hearing confessions and PREACHING. In 1727 he was among those who promoted the Evening Chapels (Cappelle Serotine), an association of workers and artisans formed for the purpose of mutual assistance, religious instruction, and works of apostolic zeal. In 1729 he left his home and took up residence in the College of the Holy Family, known also as the Chinese College, founded in Naples by Matteo Ripa. There he devoted himself to the pastoral ministry by giving missions and working in the church connected with the college.

After a sojourn at Scala and providential meetings with Thomas Falcoia (1663–1743) of the society of Pii Operarii, who was made bishop of Castellamare di Stabia in 1730, and with Sister Maria Celeste Crostarosa (1696–1755), he took an effective part in the foundation at Scala of the Institute of the Most Holy Savior. This institute, an order of contemplative nuns who envisioned their lives as being a living memory of the Savior's Love, was approved by BENEDICT XIV in 1750.

On November 9, 1732, Alphonsus founded at Scala, under the direction of Bishop Falcoia, a congregation of priests under the title of the Most Holy Savior (known, after 1749, as the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer). It was intended as an association of priests and brothers living a common life and sharing a desire to follow Jesus CHRIST, continuing his mission of preaching the divine word above all to the poor and abandoned. This congregation was formed with a special view to the needs of country people, who so often lacked the opportunities of missions, catechetical instruction, and spiritual exercises. Therefore Alphonsus placed his congregation's houses among the poor and abandoned.

Alphonsus gave himself to the work of the missions, to the organization of his congregation, and to the composition of his rule. His first companions deserted him, but he stood firm and before long vocations increased in number and new foundations multiplied; among the earliest were Villa Liberi (1734), Ciorani (1735), Pagani (1742), Deliceto (1745), and Materdomini (1746).

Liguori, St. Alphonsus de (1696–1787). This Doctor of the Church centered his work on the evangelization of the poor and abandoned. © INTERFOTO/ALAMY

On February 25, 1749, Benedict XIV by his brief Ad pastoralis dignitatis fastigium approved the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer. Alphonsus was elected superior general for life at the general chapter held that same year. In consequence of the hostility of Marquis Tanucci and of the government, which was opposed to religious orders, Alphonsus could not obtain the royal exequatur in Naples to the brief of Benedict XIV. A royal decree of December 9, 1752, gave limited assurance to the future of the institute, which at the time was extending its activity in the Papal States and in Sicily. Alphonsus governed his congregation, preached missions, and busied himself in writing and other apostolic work.

Alphonsus was appointed bishop of Sant'Agata dei Goti and was consecrated in Rome, on June 20, 1762. As a bishop he soon distinguished himself for his work of reform. He put a stop to abuses, restored churches, fought for the liturgy, reformed his seminary, visited his diocese, promoted missions and often took a personal part in them, and exercised charity toward all, especially during the great famine of 1763–1764. He kept an eye on the government of his congregation, which at the general chapter of 1764 adopted the completed constitutions, and continued with his writing. He was stricken in 1768 with a painful illness that made the pastoral ministry difficult; he offered his resignation from his see, and it was accepted by Pius VI in 1775.

Alphonsus then retired to Pagani, where he devoted himself to the governing of his congregation. Troubles concerning the rule caused by authorities of the Kingdom of Naples saddened his last years. The future of the congregation seemed precarious after the suppression of the JESUITS. He negotiated through an intermediary with the government to obtain its approbation, but the rule approved by the king and imposed on the congregation—the Regolamento—differed notably from the rule approved by Benedict XIV. The HOLY SEE, in its struggle with the Kingdom of Naples, took their canonical status away from the houses in the kingdom and gave to the houses in the Papal States their own superior. Alphonsus died before the reunion of the two branches of his congregation, which subsequently expanded to the whole world.

Beatified on September 15, 1816, by PIUS VII, canonized May 26, 1839, by GREGORY XVI, and declared Doctor of the Church by PIUS IX in 1871, Alphonsus was finally made patron of confessors and moralists by PIUS XII, on April 26, 1950.

The Man. Ardent, of delicate sensibility, tenacious of will, and profoundly intelligent, Alphonsus was given more to practical thinking than to pure speculation. He had to a rare degree an awareness of the concrete, a sense of the practical. In his relationship with others he combined nobility of manner with smiling good humor and affability and benevolence toward all, especially the poor.

The WILL OF GOD, obeyed even in its most crucifying demands, was the only rule of his life. His PRAYER attained the summit of union with God, but it also expressed itself in apostolic action. He could in fact be described as a mystic of action. All his activity is explained by his determination to consecrate himself to the work of the Redemption and to the salvation of men. In this cause he employed all his artistic gifts. He was a talented musician and composed, in the style of the great Neapolitan school of the eighteenth century, a duetto of merit called Duetto tra l'anima e Gesù Cristo. He composed Tu scende dalle stelle, the lovely Christmas hymn that is still the most popular of Italian carols. In his Canzoncine spirituali he expressed in authentic poetry the sentiments of his mystical soul. An excellent picture of his psychology and intimate life can be gathered from the three volumes of his letters (Rome 1887–1890).

Missions. Popular missions were for Alphonsus the means par excellence of procuring the salvation of souls. As a member of the Congregation of Apostolic Missions he took part in missionary work before he was a priest. His apostolate intensified with his ordination, and still more with the foundation of his congregation, which was dedicated above all to the care of the poor and abandoned. It is estimated that he gave no fewer than 150 missions, and he himself once acknowledged that he had had thirty-four years of missionary experience. As a bishop he promoted missions in his diocese, and until his death he remained interested in the work.

Alphonsus borrowed many of the elements of existing systems of conducting missions, but two features marked his own: (1) its concern that in the general structure of the mission and in the plan of the sermons there should be a continual adaptation to the concrete situation of the faithful; and (2) its effort to assure the perseverance of the participants by putting a major stress upon the love of God as the principal motive for conversion, and by calling for "renewals of the mission" to be preached some months after a mission. In order better to achieve these two special features, Alphonsus wanted the houses of his congregation to be located among the poor and abandoned.

Writing. No complete listing of the literary productions of St. Alphonsus is possible. Between 1728 and 1778 there appeared 111 works, and in addition to these there were posthumous publications. As to editions and translations, Maurice De Meulemeester in 1933 counted 4,110 editions of the original texts (402 appeared before the death of Alphonsus) and 12,925 editions of translations into sixty-one languages. Since that time the number has continued to grow.

Works on Preaching. Alphonsus's principal work in this field was his Selva di materie predicabili (1760), a complete treatise on sacerdotal perfection, the pastoral work of the missions, and the substance and form of preaching. In addition to this he published Lettera ad un religioso amico ove si tratta del modo di predicare (1761), in which he insisted on the necessity of preaching the gospel in a simple manner, without superfluous ornamentation, so that all, even the simplest of men, could understand the preacher. Mention should also be made of his sermons, and especially the Sermoni compendiati per tutte le domeniche del anno (1771), which were much admired by Newman.

Spiritual Works. Alphonsus's spiritual works were markedly ascetical in character, but were solidly founded upon theology. They were the fruit of his interior life and of his preaching. The point of departure for his spirituality was the revelation of the love of God for man. Contrary to the teaching of the Jansenists, Alphonsus asserted that God offers to every man the possibility of SALVATION and of sanctification. This consists essentially in the loving response that man makes to the gift of God's love.

To man turning toward God and detaching himself from creatures and the disordered impulses of CONCUPISCENCE, Alphonsus presented the themes proposed by St. Ignatius in the First Week of the Spiritual Exercises: death, judgment, heaven, and hell. Such was the subject of his Apparecchio alla morte (1758) and of the Via della salute (1766). But the supreme motive of the Christian's love for God is Christ, the perfect revelation of God's love for man.

The spirituality of St. Alphonsus was resolutely Christocentric. In his works devoted to the mysteries of Christ—Santo Natale (1758), Riflessioni ed affetti sopra la passione di Gesù Cristo (1761), Riflessioni sulla passione di Gesù Cristo (1773), and Novena del Cuore di Gesù (1758)—it is always the love of Christ that is emphasized, a love that man must requite by loving Christ in return. The most perfect synthesis of this spirituality is to be found in the Pratica di amar Gesù Cristo (1768), written in the manner of a commentary on the hymn of charity of St. Paul (1 Cor ch. 13).

The love of God is not authentic if it does not express itself—here one can recognize the characteristically Alphonsian propensity for concreteness—in doing the will of God in the state and condition to which one is called. Hence the importance of the choice of state. Alphonsus developed this doctrine for all the states of life in his little work Uniformità alla volontà di Dio (1755). A fortiori, this principle is applicable to particular vocations: sacerdotal, as in the above mentioned Selva; and religious, as in Avvisi spettanti alla vocazione (1749) and La vera sposa di Gesù Cristo (1760–1761), a complete treatise on religious perfection.

What means did God give to Christians to attain holiness? The Sacraments, first of all. Alphonsus insisted particularly upon PENANCE and the EUCHARIST. In his volume Del sagrificio di Gesù Cristo (1775) he studied the essence of the MASS and the means of participating in it fully. Against the Jansenists he recommended frequent Communion. Devotion to the Blessed Sacrament occupied a place of prime importance in his spirituality. His book Visita al SS. Sacramento (1745) became a best seller and went through forty editions during his lifetime. It gave to the practice of the visit a form that thenceforth became classic and definitive, and by means of it generations of Christians have come to find the nourishment of their daily prayer in the Eucharistic presence.

Prayer has a place of central importance in the economy of salvation and sanctification. Alphonsus gave magisterial treatment to the topic in what was, from the theological point of view, his most important work, Del gran mezzo della preghiera (1759). The first, and ascetical, part shows the absolute necessity of prayer for salvation. The second, and theological, part is directed against the Jansenist teaching on salvation and predestination. God wills the salvation of all men; Christ died for all; God gives to all the grace necessary for salvation, and one will certainly be saved if one corresponds with it.

Faced with Jansenism and the teaching of the different theological schools, Alphonsus expounded his own understanding of GRACE. On the one hand there is an efficacious grace necessary for salvation; normally this acts by a kind of moral movement, determining infallibly by its own intrinsic power the consent of man's will, but leaving his liberty intact. But there is also a sufficient grace, which is truly active and gives man the power to perform psychologically easy acts in the order of salvation, such as that of imperfect prayer. One who corresponds with this sufficient grace will necessarily obtain efficacious grace. But sufficient grace is fallibly active. Man can fail to correspond with it and so in effect deprive himself of it. How is this grace fallibly active? St. Alphonsus never pretended to resolve this question explicitly; it is a point upon which one is simply referred to the conclusions of the commentators. F. MARIN-SOLA, OP, and J. Maritain have proposed possible metaphysical extensions of the Alphonsian doctrine.

As in other matters, St. Alphonsus was inspired by a number of authors and incorporated their teaching into his own view of the problem. But if, in fact, he often cited H. NORIS and Claude-Louis de Montaigne, the continuator of H. TOURNELY, he went back beyond these and other immediate sources to the scholasticism of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries and to St. AUGUSTINE. In regard to this last-mentioned source, F. Cayré wrote in Patrologie et histoire de la théologie (vol. 3, Paris 1944): "Never did anyone bring together so compactly and so accurately the thought of St. Augustine on prayer and its necessity. The bishop of Sant'Agata was only an echo of the bishop of Hippo on this subject. ... He had the genius to read with surprising clarity what the intellectual Jansenists had neglected in the writings of St. Augustine" (p. 294).

The object of Christian prayer was first the love of God—that is, the fulfillment of His will—then perseverance in that love, and finally the grace to pray always. Among the forms of prayer recommended by the saint were liturgical prayer (for which in 1774 he edited an Italian translation of the psalter Traduzione de' Salmi e Cantici) and mental prayer. For him mental prayer was morally necessary to assure the effective practice of prayer and consequently for perseverance in the grace of God, progress in charity, and union with God. The extremely flexible and easy method of mental prayer described in a number of his works led to the little masterpiece Modo di conversare continuamente ed alla familiare con Dio (1753). Alphonsus would not hesitate to lead a disciple who corresponded with the grace of God to the height of mystical union with God by means of infused prayer.

The Virgin Mary appears in all the spiritual works of Alphonsus. To her he devoted the most elaborate of his books, Le glorie di Maria (1750), which is one of the great works of Catholic Mariology. Replying to L.A. Muratori's criticism of the deviation of Marian devotion, Alphonsus firmly established the role of Mary in the history of salvation and solidly based devotion to her on theology. By the grace of the Redeemer immaculate in her conception (by his argumentation Alphonsus helped prepare the way for the definition of this dogma by PIUS IX), Mary directly cooperated in the redemption of the world effected by Jesus on Calvary; she is the Co-Redemptress and consequently the universal, but not exclusive, mediatrix of grace. Through her one obtains especially the grace of prayer, and thus prayer to Mary leads to Jesus. St. Alphonsus considered authentic devotion to Mary an assurance and sign of salvation. Le glorie di Maria had an enormous influence on the nineteenth century and contributed to the great development of Marian devotion at that time.

In the development of his spiritual teaching Alphonsus was inspired by the spiritual writers of the sixteenth to the eighteenth centuries and freely incorporated things gathered from them into his own writings. In the Biblioteche predicabili and the Prontuarii he drew abundantly from these writers, the authors most frequently cited being the Jesuits Alfonso RODRIGUEZ, G.B. SCARAMELLI, and J.B. SAINT-JURÉ, who transmitted to him the spirituality of the Exercises of St. Ignatius, and the spiritual doctrine of SS. TERESA OF AVILA, FRANCIS DE SALES, and, in lesser measure, John of the Cross.

Dogmatic Works. Alphonsus's dogmatic works were composed for the most part during his episcopate, and are principally works of controversy. With a pastoral end in view, Alphonsus refuted the principal errors of his time and addressed himself to unbelievers for the purpose of showing them the truth of the Catholic religion. He resorted to psychological and moral as well as to intellectual arguments, wishing to reach the whole man.

His Verità della fede (1767) is divided according to a threefold purpose, a structure not common in apologetical works of the time. For materialists he sought to prove, against the arguments of HOBBES, LOCKE, and SPINOZA, the existence of a personal God and the spirituality of the SOUL; for theists, he showed both the necessity of a revealed religion and the truth of the Christian religion; for Christians separated from the Church, he argued that the Catholic Church was the only Church of Christ authenticated by the signs of truth. He stressed the necessity of a supreme authority in the Church provided with the privilege of INFALLIBILITY. This theme was developed in the Vindiciae pro suprema pontificis potestate contra Febronium, printed in 1768 under the pseudonym of Honorius de Honoriis. He brought decisive support to the doctrine of the infallibility of the pope, which VATICAN COUNCIL I was to recognize.

His Opera dommatica contro gli eretici pretesi riformati (1769) took the canons and decrees of the Council of Trent and expounded their theological import as opposed to Protestant doctrine. These studies show that Alphonsus was an excellent dogmatic theologian. In his Trionfo della Chiesa ossia istoria delle eresie colle loro confutazioni (1772) he traced the history of heresies and their refutation through the centuries from antiquity to Jansenius and Molinos.

In his Condotta ammirabile della divina Providenza (1775) he expounded his views on the history of salvation and on the unity and perpetuity of the Church in the manner of the Discours sur l'histoire universelle of Bossuet, but in a fashion that made his thought much more accessible to the generality of Christians.

Moral Works. A third of the writing of Alphonsus was devoted to MORAL THEOLOGY, and this fitted smoothly into place in the ensemble of his pastoral and spiritual thought. Writing with an eye on the daily pastoral necessities of the ministry, he elaborated his moral theology for the use of his religious and of priests engaged in pastoral work, especially that of the confessional. It complemented his spiritual doctrine inasmuch as it searched out the will of God in all the circumstances of life.

His great work in the moral field was his Theologia moralis, which began as simple annotations on the Medulla theologiae moralis of H. BUSENBAUM (1st ed., 1748); in the second edition (1753–1755) it became more properly the work of Alphonsus himself, although it adhered to the plan of the Medulla and the Institutiones morales. With the appearance of the third edition (1757), the Theologia moralis in three volumes took on its definitive aspect. Alphonsus, however, labored unceasingly to perfect the successive editions (4th ed., 1760; 5th, 1763; 6th, 1767; 7th, 1772; 8th—which Alphonsus considered definitive—1779; 9th, 1785). From 1791 to 1905, the date of the critical edition by P. Gaudé, there were sixty complete editions.

In 1755 Alphonsus published his Pratica del confessore per ben esercitare il suo ministero, which constituted the soul, so to speak, of his great work on moral theology. The Istruzione e pratica per un confessore (1757), translated into Latin under the title Homo apostolicus, was an original work, the most perfect, perhaps, of all the writings of the saint for its unity of tone and the firmness of its thought; it was intended as an example of what a manual of moral theology ought to be. Il confessore diretto per le confessioni della gente di compagna (1764) was written by the bishop of Sant'Agata for the priests of his diocese.

A series of notes and "dissertations," eighteen in all, devoted to probabilism and the exposition of Alphonsus's system of morality, was published between 1749 and 1777. The most important of these was entitled Dell'uso moderato dell'opinione probabile (1765). Certain of these papers were written against the theories of Giovanni Vincenzo Patuzzi, OP, with whom Alphonsus engaged in vigorous controversy.

The work of St. Alphonsus contained numerous citations, as did all the works of moral theology of the time. In the Theologia moralis more than 800 authors were cited, and the number of citations amounted to 70,000. All could not have been made at firsthand. No moralist after 1550 escaped Alphonsus's attention. His work, therefore, provides a complete panorama of the literature of moral theology of that time. His most immediate sources were St. THOMAS AQUINAS, LESSIUS, SANCHEZ, Castropalao, LUGO, LAYMANN, Bonacina, Croix, Roncaglia, Suarez, SOTO, Collet, CONCINA, and most especially the Cursus moralis of the Salmanticenses.

Equiprobabilism. Alphonsus gave much time to the elaboration of a system of his known as EQUIPROBABILISM, which sought to steer a middle course between PROBABILISM and PROBABILIORISM. Having used F. Genet (1640–1703), a probabiliorist, as his guide at the beginning of his missionary experience, Alphonsus was won over to ordinary probabilism in practice. But he was not satisfied with it. Beginning in 1749 he wrote a series of dissertations on the subject. His thought became definitively fixed between 1759 and 1765, during his controversy with Patuzzi, which proved to be a fruitful experience for Alphonsus and provided him with an occasion for the consolidation of his thought. From 1767 to 1778, when his literary activity came to an end, he was constrained to veil his thought somewhat because of the anti-Jesuit persecutions, but he did not modify it substantially.

Equiprobabilism, opposed to both lax and rigorous moral positions, was not a compromise between the two poles, but a higher equilibrium. In recognizing the obligation of the certainly more probable opinion in favor of the law, Alphonsus recognized also the law as a moral value. Rejecting probabilism as a universally valid and mechanically applicable solution for cases of conscience, Alphonsus proclaimed the necessity of a personal decision of CONSCIENCE. In cases in which two equiprobable opinions, one favoring the law and the other liberty, are presented, Alphonsus left man free to make his own decision, and at the same time affirmed the moral value of human liberty. MAN, who is created to the image of God, imitates his Creator in doing good freely. In support of his system, St. Alphonsus appealed to E. AMORT and St. Thomas. A.G. Sertillanges, in La Morale de saint Thomas d'Aquin (Paris 1942), has said of it: "Equiprobabilism, properly understood, can rightly pass for a Thomist solution" (p. 401).

In Alphonsian moral theory the study of the concrete circumstances of action rules out the mechanical application of a system, however sound it may be. Always disposed to prefer reason to the authority of moralists, he resolved most of his cases in terms of intrinsic evidence and in the light of Christian charity and prudence. In this way, as JOHN PAUL II mentioned in Spiritus Domini, his 1987 apostolic letter commemorating the 200th anniversary of the death of the saint, Alphonsus is "responsible for the renewal of moral theology; through contact with the people he encountered in the confessional, especially during his missionary preaching, he gradually and with much hard work brought a change in his mentality, progressively achieving a correct balance between rigorism and liberty" (L'Osservatore Romano, English edition [August 17, 1987]: 4).

Influence. The influence of St. Alphonsus on moral theology has proved durable, and the practical direction traced by him has been substantially adopted by the Church. Among the major events in the history of the Church in the nineteenth century was the progressive rallying of moralists and of the clergy to the moral thinking of St. Alphonsus. In eliminating RIGORISM, in facilitating access to the Sacraments, Alphonsus infused a new youth into Christianity. In France the penetration of Alphonsian thought was perhaps more rapid than elsewhere. Among its propagators in that country were Jean Marie de Lamennais; Bruno LANTERI, the apostle of Turin; and Cardinal Gousset, Archbishop of Reims, who evoked in 1831 a response by the Sacred Penitentiary favorable to Alphonsian moral theology. The Curé d'Ars mitigated his rigor after coming to know Liguorian principles. At the same time the Swiss, Belgians, Germans, and Spaniards welcomed Alphonsian moral doctrine, with the proclamation of St. Alphonsus as a Doctor of the Church lending encouragement to the movement. To the criticism of the system by A. BALLERINI, S.J., the Redemptorists responded with a voluminous dossier, Vindiciae alfonsianae (1873). Among the manuals of moral theology written by Redemptorists were those of J. AERTNYS, C. Marc, and, in the United States, A. KONINGS. Many of the manuals used in the seminaries of Europe and America either adopt the Alphonsian system or are marked by its influence in their solutions of cases.

It can be said that the influence of St. Alphonsus on Catholicism in the nineteenth century was very generally and very deeply felt. What he had written contributed to the definition of the dogmas of the Immaculate Conception and of the infallibility of the pope. He did much to shape the form that popular devotion took, especially devotion toward the Eucharist and the Virgin Mary. His teaching on prayer reached even beyond the Church to thinkers such as Kierkegaard. He defended the Church against rationalism and enlightened despotism. Above all, he gave Jansenism in its practical form a blow from which it could not recover. His spirituality recalled the great message of the love of God for all men; his moral doctrine, inspired by the Gospel, made it possible for Christians everywhere to deal with perplexities that had to be faced if they were to adjust successfully to the world in which they found themselves.

SEE ALSO ASCETICISM; BEATIFICATION; DOGMATIC THEOLOGY; HOLINESS, UNIVERSAL CALL TO; IGNATIAN SPIRITUALITY; IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA, ST.; JANSENISM; MISSION AND EVANGELIZATION IN CANON LAW; MISSION AND EVANGELIZATION, PAPAL WRITINGS ON; MISSION AND MISSIONS; MISSION HISTORY, I: CATHOLIC; RECONCILIATION, MINISTRY OF; RULE OF FAITH; SERMON.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The complete bibliography of the works of St. Alphonsus and of studies about him has been compiled by Maurice De Meulemeester and his collaborators in Bibliographie générale des écrivains Rédemptoristes, vols. 1 and 3 (Louvain, Belgium 1933–1939), and has been continued in the publication Spicilegium Historicum Congregationis Sanctissimi Redemptoris, first by Andreas Sampers—1 (1953): 248–271; 19 (1971): 410–448; 22 (1974): 437–443; 26 (1978): 478–489—and then by Adam Owczarski: 44 (1996): 499–565 and 48 (2000): 329–392.

Works by St. Alphonsus

The Complete Ascetical Works, translated and edited by E. Grimm, 24 vols. (New York 1886–1894).

Lettere, edited by F. Pitocchi and F. Kuntz, 3 vols. (Rome 1887–1890).

Theologia moralis, edited by L. Gaudé, 4 vols. (Rome 1905–1912).

Opere ascetiche, 10 vols. (Rome 1933–1968).

Carteggio, vol. 1, 1724–1743, edited by G. Orlandi (Rome 2004).

Works about St. Alphonsus

Alfonso V, Amarante, Evoluzione e definizione del metodo missionario redentorista (1732–1764) (Materdomini-AV 2003).

Domenico Capone, La proposta morale di Sant'Alfonso: Sviluppo e attualità, edited by S. Botero Giraldo and S. Majorano (Rome 1997).

F. Chiovaro, ed., The History of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, vol. 1, The Origins (1732–1793), translated by J.R. Fenili (Liguori, Mo. 1996).

Frederick M. Jones, Alphonsus de Liguori (Liguori, Mo. 1999).

Noel A. Londoño, Se entregó por nosotros: Teología de la Pasión de Cristo en San Alfonso de Liguori (Rome 1997).

Théodule Rey-Mermet, Saint Alphonsus Liguori, Tireless Worker for the Most Abandoned, translated by J.M. Marchesi (New York 1989).

Théodule Rey-Mermet, Moral Choices: The Moral Theology of Saint Alphonsus Liguori, translated by P. Laverdure (Liguori, Mo. 1998).

Studia et subsidia de vita et operibus S. Alfonsi M. de Ligorio (Rome 1990).

Hamish F.G. Swanston, Celebrating Eternity Now: A Study of the Theology of Saint Alphonsus Liguori (Liguori, Mo. 1995).

Antonio Tannoia, Della vita ed istituto del ven. servo di Dio, Alfonso M. de Liguori, 3 vols. (Naples 1798–1802).

Raimundo Tellería, San Alfonso María de Ligorio, 2 vols. (Madrid 1950–1951).

Marciano Vidal, Frente al rigorismo moral, benignidad pastoral. Alfonso de Liguori (1696–1787) (Madrid 1986).

Rev. Louis Vereecke CSSR
Emeritus Professor
Accademia Alfonsiana, Rome

Rev. Sabatino Majorano CSSR
Professor of Theology
Accademia Alfonsiana, Rome (2010)

ALUMBRADOS (ILLUMINATI)

A number of groups in history have been referred to as illuminati or "the illumined ones," including groups from the eighteenth-century Enlightenment. The term Alumbrados, however, is given to the adherents of a Spanish pseudo-mysticism of the sixteenth century and deriving from their claim to act always under the immediate ILLUMINATION of the Holy Spirit. The name was first so used in a letter from a Franciscan friar to Cardinal XIMÉNEZ DE CISNEROS in 1494. The movement itself was but a recurrence of the bizarre parody of true MYSTICISM that is never long absent from the Church in the world. Proximately, its sources would most probably be found in the VOLUNTARISM of medieval Teutonic theology and in the Averroistic strains of Arabian mysticism, as well as in Reformation ANTICLERICALISM. The movement was confined mostly to the Dioceses of Cadiz, Seville, and Toledo. Its doctrines, which are known in later times chiefly in the form of opinions condemned by the INQUISITION in 1525, 1574, 1578, and 1623, seem to have infected all classes of people.

In sixteenth-century Spain many were intrigued by visions, ECSTASY, and other unusual phenomena. The Alumbrados, however, favored a form of "mystical passivity" known as dejamiento or abandonment (Kavanaugh 1989, p. 73). The original leaders of the Alumbrados were the Franciscan sister Isabel de la Cruz and her lay assistant, Pedro Ruiz, who began organizing devotional centers in Alcalá, Toledo, and other Spanish cities. Isabel and Pedro were arrested in 1524 on suspicions of HERESY and possible sympathies to LUTHERANISM, which the Inquisitors in Spain were determined to suppress. It was believed "that Lutheranism and Illuminism, though fundamentally different, were closely connected since both movements emphasized internal religion at the expense of outward ceremony" (Kavanaugh 1989, p. 73). In 1525 the Inquisition in Toledo condemned a list of forty-eight propositions of the Alumbrados. In 1529 the book Diálogo de doctrina cristiana, by Juan de VALDÉS (c. 1490–1541), was condemned for supposed "Illuminist" traits. Valdés left Spain for Naples, Italy, where he formed a circle of like-minded "Spiritualists," including the one-time Franciscan, Bernardino OCHINO (1487–1564).

Suspicions of possible Alumbradismo affinities in St. IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA (c. 1491–1556) led to his being both interrogated "for Illuminist practices and forbidden to preach for three years" (Kavanaugh 1989, p. 73). During the time of the Council of TRENT (1545–1563), the Dominican theologian Melchior CANO (c. 1509–1590) was particularly concerned with protecting authentic Catholic spirituality from the Illuminist dangers found chiefly in the "rejection of vocal prayer and meditation," a total passivity of the mind and the soul during contemplation, and a repudiation of meditation "on Christ and the creation" (Sluhovsky 2007, p. 109). In addition, there was widespread suspicion of immorality, fueled by the "antinomian" tendencies of some of the Alumbrados, which gave them a sense of liberty from the moral law (del Carmen 1971, p. 1383). The accusation of antinomianism would later surface with respect to the QUIETISM of Miguel de MOLINOS (1628–1696).

It is important to distinguish an authentic affirmation of the spiritual path of illumination from the aberrations of the Alumbrados. For the latter, perfection consisted in a form of abandonment that considered "vocal prayer, rites and ceremonies, the use of images, and the religious life" as either "hindrances or useless" (Kavanaugh 1989, p. 73). The great Catholic mystics have never repudiated such practices. The basic flaw in the teaching of the Alumbrados lay in the exaggerated importance they attached to mental prayer. They held that mental prayer is commanded by divine law, and that in it all other precepts are fulfilled. Thus not even attendance at Mass, obligations arising from CHARITY, or obedience to lawful authority must be allowed to impede the existence of mental prayer. This devotion was described simply as the recollection of God's presence, in which there is no discursive movement of the mind, no meditation properly so called, and no reflection on mental images such as the Sacred Passion or humanity. It is by the practice of this quietistic prayer of nothingness that the soul arrives at a state of perfection in which its faculties are so submerged that the soul can no longer act. To one constituted in this highest degree of spirituality, there comes the ravishment of the Spirit, so that in ecstasy the soul sees the divine essence, beholds the Blessed Trinity even as the elect in heaven do. When this beatifying vision has been achieved, all the properties of beatitude logically follow. The soul is freed from the weakness of wounded nature; it is rendered impeccable; it is, in short, consciously confirmed in grace. Thus elevated, a man does not act as of himself; willingly or unwillingly he is moved by the illumination of the Spirit.

In the moral order, such principles could lead only to catastrophe. The investigations of the Inquisition provide a sordid account of the grossest carnal sins indulged in by the "perfect" under the guise of "communications of the Holy Spirit and divine love between souls." As a result of these shocking disclosures, it is not surprising that the Inquisition's judgment of the type of mysticism practiced by the Alumbrados was extremely unfavorable. Certainly the hypercritical attitude of some of the theologians of the next century toward even true spirituality was a result in no small degree of the aberrations of the Alumbrados.

Some have linked the rejection of Alumbradismo to "the growing unease" in sixteenth century Spain over "the participation of unlettered and unsupervised laymen and laywomen in the new forms of interiorized interactions with the divine" (Sluhovsky 2007, p. 108). While there might be some truth to this, it is more likely that the Alumbrados were condemned for their claims of exemption from works of penitence, ASCETICISM, the practice of the virtues, meditation on the humanity of Christ, and the need for submission to ecclesiastical authority (del Carmen 1971, p. 1385). Many Catholic mystics have counseled the need for abandonment to God (e.g. Jean-Pierre de CAUSSADE, 1675–1751), but the Alumbrados, like the later Quietists, fell into the dangers of antinomianism and spiritual elitism, which are signs of pseudo-mysticism rather than authentic spirituality.

SEE ALSO ANTINOMY; BEATIFIC VISION; FRANCISCAN SISTERS; GOD (HOLY SPIRIT); SPAIN, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Vicente Beltrán de Heredia, "La Beata de Piedrahita no fué alumbrada," Ciencia tomista 63 (1942): 294–311.

Fulbert Cayré, Manual of Patrology and History of Theology, translated by H. Howitt, 2 vols. (Paris 1936–1940), 2:790.

Eulogio de la Virgen del Carmen, "Illuminisme et Illuminé," Dictionnaire de Spiritulaité, Ascétique et Mystique, vol. 7 (Paris 1971), 1367–1392.

Kieran Kavanaugh, "Spanish Sixteenth Century: Carmel and Surrounding Movements," in Christian Spirituality: Post-Reformation and Modern, edited by Louis Dupré and Don E. Sailers (New York 1989), 69–92.

Ronald A. Knox, Enthusiasm: A Chapter in the History of Religion (New York 1950), 241–242.

Pierre Pourrat, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. Alfred Vacant, 15 vols. (Paris 1903–1950; Tables générales 1951–), 13.2:1552–1554.

Moshe Sluhovsky, Believe Not Every Spirit: Possession, Mysticism & Discernement of Spirits in Early Modern Catholicism (Chicago 2007).

Ralph J. Tapia, The Alumbrados of Toledo: A Study in Sixteenth Century Spanish Spirituality (Park Falls, Wisc. 1974).

Rev. Thomas K. Connolly OP
Dominican House of Studies Washington, D.C.

Robert L. Fastiggi
Professor of Systematic Theology
Sacred Heart Major Seminary, Detroit, Mich. (2010)

AMERICA

Once the Jesuit community in the United States had agreed to establish a weekly magazine, and that its headquarters would be on Washington Square West, in New York City, it then needed to determine the name of the publication. After hundreds of predictable but unacceptable proposals, Rev. Thomas Gannon, S.J., a former Provincial, suggested the name America, which was "immediately adopted," according to Rev. John LaFarge, S.J., in his memoir, The Manner Is Ordinary.

The Mission of the Journal. The first issue of America appeared on April 17, 1909. An "Editorial Announcement" outlined the scope, objective and character of the magazine as a national Catholic weekly that would meet the needs of the time. The new publication replaced an American monthly, the Messenger, and it was intended as an American version of an English Catholic weekly, the Tablet. The "Editorial Announcement" also stated:

> Among these needs are a review and conscientious criticism of the life and literature of the day, a discussion of actual questions and a study of vital problems from the Christian standpoint, a record of religious progress, a defense of sound doctrine, an authoritative statement of the position of the Church in the thought and activity of modern life, a removal of traditional prejudice, a refutation of erroneous news, and a correction of misstatements about beliefs and practices which millions hold dearer than life.

In the inaugural issue, the editors of America also stated that the weekly was begun "at the earnest solicitation of members of the Hierarchy and of prominent priests" and Catholic laymen, "and not a few non-Catholic." "It goes without saying," they concluded, "that loyalty to the Holy See, and profound respect for the Wishes and views of the Catholic Hierarchy, will be the animating principle of this Review." For much of its history, this pledge of loyalty and profound respect did indeed constitute America's animating principle.

Finally, the weekly promised not only to record Catholic achievement, but also to discuss questions of the day affecting religion, MORALITY, science, literature, and the arts. The editors also vowed to suggest principles that might help find solutions to the vital problems "constantly thrust upon our people."

As a major part of its mission, America undertook the defense of the doctrines and institutions of the Church. In the 1920s, the weekly was apprehensive that prohibition (the Eighteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution) might prevent the use of wine at the Mass. These fears proved groundless, however.

The KU KLUX KLAN was another matter. Curiously, America at first dismissed the Klan as a threat in its issue of October 1, 1921. But then Oregonians elected a Klan-backed governor, and passed a Klan-supported referendum that required all the state's students to attend public schools. In effect, all private schools, including religious schools, military academies, and others, would be forced to close their doors. However, in 1925 the Supreme Court declared the Oregon school law unconstitutional.

The threat to Catholic schools reappeared after World War II in the guise of an organization called Protestants and Other Americans United for Separation of Church and State (now called Americans United for Separation of Church and State, and hereafter referred to as Protestants United). The organization was founded in 1947, and it charged that the Catholic Church maintained a theory of the relation between church and state that was "incompatible with the American ideal." The group's statement was laced with barbs against the Church's "aggressions," "assaults," and "encroachments" on the principle of separation of CHURCH AND STATE.

America's editors responded to these charges in the January 24, 1948, issue by asking Protestants to "give up the scare-technique" and "the appeal to fear." They also reminded Protestants to appreciate the real enemy of American democracy, which they identified as the "progressive secularization of American society." Finally, America averred that the Protestant group's "entire case" was based on an "unwarranted and biased" interpretation of the Constitution's first amendment. What especially irked Protestants United was the appointment of an American representative (Myron C. Taylor) to the Vatican, and that Catholic school children in some states shared bus transportation and free textbooks with other school children.

Aside from warding off assaults on Church doctrines and institutions, America, inspired in good measure by Pope Leo XIII's encyclical Rerum novarum "On Capital and Labor" (1891), followed a progressive path on domestic political issues. Actually, aside from affirming the right of workers to join unions (May 25, 1912), and favoring New York's pioneering Workmen's Compensation Act (December 27, 1913), the weekly largely ignored the early twentieth-century reform era.

However, America's largely laudatory obituary of President Franklin D. Roosevelt (April 28, 1945) offers evidence that the weekly embraced the New Deal. After reciting a long list of New Deal reforms—including the National Labor Relations Act, the Social Security Act, the Fair Labor Standards Act, and the Home Owners Loan Corporation Act—America concluded that, but for Roosevelt, these laws "would not be in existence." It was also averred that such legislation was "the concrete realization of American society's corporate obligation to practice the Seven Corporal Works of Mercy."

The Post–World War II Era. In post–World War II America, the Jesuit weekly resumed its progressive journey, approving of compulsory health insurance (January 15, 1949) and, in general, supporting President Harry S. Truman's domestic program (January 8, 1949). Moreover, America endorsed the attainments of President Lyndon B. Johnson's administration (as well as those of the 89th Congress). Among these achievements were an elementary and secondary school assistance law, an aid-to-Appalachia measure, and Medicare. America also applauded the passage of the 1965 Voting Act (August 21, 1965). In addition, America stayed true to its initial goals by discussing literature, science, and the arts. Moral considerations weighed at least as heavily in these discussions as artistic or informational merit.

On its fortieth anniversary, in 1949, America received a congratulatory telegram from Pope PIUS XII, as well as letters of commendation from both the members of the American hierarchy and the Superior General of the Society of Jesus. But a half century later, with Rev. Thomas J. Reese as editor-in-chief, this acclaim was transformed into disapproval.

Under Reese, America published articles on both sides of a variety of subjects, including sensitive Church issues such as gay priests, embryonic stem-cell research, and the responsibility of Catholic politicians in dealing with ABORTION and same-sex unions. As far as members of the American hierarchy and the Congregation for the DOCTRINE OF THE FAITH (then under Cardinal RATZINGER) were concerned, such topics were not debatable. The upshot was that Reese was asked to resign, which he did in June 2005. His resignation has been widely interpreted as a result of pressure from Rome.

Editors-in-chief of America

Rev. John J. Wynne, S.J. 1909–1910
Rev. Thomas J. Campbell, S.J. 1910–1914
Rev. Richard H. Tierney, S.C. 1914–1925
Rev. Wilfrid Parsons, S.J. 1925–1936
Rev. Francis X. Talbot, S.J. 1936–1944
Rev. John LaFarge, S.J. 1944–1948
Rev. Robert C. Hartnett, S.J. 1948–1955
Rev. Thurtson Davis, S.J. 1955–1968
Rev. Donald R. Campion, S.J. 1968–1975
Rev. Joseph A. O'Hare, S.J. 1975–1984
Rev. George W. Hunt, S.J. 1984–1998
Rev. Thomas J. Reese, S.J. 1998–2005
Rev. Drew Christiansen, S.J. 2005–

SEE ALSO JESUITS; MODERN MEDIA AND THE CHURCH; RERUM NOVARUM; TABLET, THE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Gregory H. Dunne, Religion and American Democracy: A Reply to Paul Blanshard's American Freedom and Catholic Power (New York 1949).

Robert A. Hecht, An Unordinary Man: A Life of Father John LaFarge, S.J. (Lanham, Md. 1996).

John LaFarge, The Manner Is Ordinary (New York 1954).

David Southern, John La Farge and the Limits of Catholic Interracialism, 1911–1963 (Baton Rouge, La. 1996).

Richard Harmond
Professor Emeritus of American History
St. John's University, New York (2010)

AMERICAN CIVIL WAR, PAPAL STANCE TOWARD

The VATICAN was formally neutral during the Civil War (1861–1865), although Pope PIUS IX was prepared to offer his services to mediate a conflict he rightly judged as horrendously destructive. (In 1860, in a total white population of roughly twenty-eight million, 638,000 Union and Confederate fighting men lost their lives—more than 2 percent of the total white population.) Moreover, as the conflict persisted, opinion, as expressed in segments of the Roman press, conveyed a suspicion of the Lincoln administration's intentions, while showing sympathy for the Confederacy. Even Pius IX, perhaps motivated by frustration more than anything else, chastised the Union. Thus, in late 1863, the Pope rebuked the North for failing to make the requisite concessions to "restore peace and tranquility"(Lalli and O'Connor 1971, p. 22). That having been said, there was little chance that the Vatican would have recognized the Confederacy.

The central objective of Union diplomacy during the Civil War was to avert foreign interference that might result in the partition of the United States. This policy targeted principally Great Britain and France. Still, Union Secretary of State William H. Seward (1801–1872) did not neglect lesser powers. In particular, Seward saw special value in approaching the Vatican, because he was convinced that "Rome, to a degree hardly comprehended in this country, is protected by a veneration of large portions of mankind for his Holiness as the expander of faith and the guardian of religion" (Alvarez 1983, p. 227). Doubtless, Seward was also aware that more than three million Catholics lived in the sundered nation.

The Union and the Vatican. At the beginning of the conflict in America, the Vatican supported the Union. In September 1861 Cardinal Giacomo ANTONELLI, the Vatican secretary of state, told the United States minister to ROME that Catholics, as loyal American citizens, harbored a natural concern for the internal discord in their nation. Again, in June 1862, Pius IX remarked approvingly of the mission of Archbishop John HUGHES of New York to promote the Union cause throughout Europe. In taking this position, both the HOLY SEE and cardinal may well have had in mind the loss of the bulk of the Papal States in the 1859–1860 war of Italian unification. The pope observed, for example, that "it had been the maxim of the Catholic Church to support constituted authority and just laws" (Alvarez 1983, p. 229). As the North fought to restore the Union, so the pope lamented this confinement to Rome and its immediate environs.

North versus South. Fighting at the battle of Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, July 3, 1863. HULTON ARCHIVE/GETTY IMAGES

The Vatican and Lincoln administration were linked, too, by their mutual opposition to the Maximilian regime in Mexico. In June 1862, the French government, under Emperor Louis Napoleon Bonaparte III, installed Maximilian (1832–1867), archduke of Austria, as Mexico's monarch. To the Lincoln administrators, when France placed Maximilian in power, it violated the Monroe Doctrine (1823). During the Civil War the Union government could do little more than issue tame protests, and, of course, reject Napoleon's entreaties to recognize the Maximilian emperorship. After the Confederacy defeat in 1865, the United States protested more vigorously, and in March 1867 the last of the French troops departed Mexico.

The pope's problem with the Maximilian regime was not resolved as successfully. At first Maximilian attempted to win over Mexican liberals. He retained many of the reforms of the previous Republican government. At the outset, differences between the imperial government and Rome seemed irreconcilable. The Holy See, as Arthur Blumberg points out in "The Mexican Empire and the Vatican, 1863–1867," demanded the "renunciation of the Law of Reform," "the reestablishment of the religious orders," "the restitutions of churches and of convents" and of "ecclesiastical property which had been taken," and "full liberty of the church in the exercise of its rights and of its sacred ministry" (1971, p. 4).

Maximilian's counterproposals made Catholicism the state religion and provided that the nation would pay the clergy. The emperor, however, required the church to transfer to the state all property previously nationalized by the republic. Other issues, such as which of the religious orders, previously suppressed, were to be revived, Pius IX and Maximilian would decide jointly. And there matters rested. Months of further negotiations proved fruitless. When Maximilian finally realized that he could not satisfy Mexican liberals, he shifted to the right and accepted Pius IX's demands. But the emperor had waited too long. With the demise of the Confederacy, Maximilian's days, as the Holy See recognized, were numbered, and the Vatican ignored his "conservative solutions," as Blumberg has observed. Blumberg concludes his article by remarking: "There was to be no peace with the church for Maximilian of Mexico" (p. 19).

The Confederacy and the Vatican. In any event Cardinal Antonelli coupled his favorable view of the Union with a careful avoidance of any act that the Lincoln administration might understand as lending support to the Confederacy. Occasional misunderstandings arose. Thus, Pius IX, when answering a letter from Jefferson Davis (1808–1889), president of the Confederacy, addressed him as the "illustrious and Honorable Jefferson Davis," some Americans concluded that the pope was offering recognition to the Confederacy. This was not Pius IX's intention. As Judah P. Benjamin (1811–1884), the Confederate secretary of state, appreciated, the pope was merely being courteous. And Rufus King (1814–1876), the Union representative in Rome, assured Secretary of State Seward that the pope's reply was "a simple act of courtesy and devoid of any political design or significance" (Stock 1933, p. 287). Actually, Confederate diplomacy at the Vatican had two goals: to lessen or, better still, eliminate Union recruitment of Irish Catholics for the Union army (The recruits were lured by bonuses of $500, $600, and $700); and, of course, to win papal recognition of the Confederacy.

Ambrose D. Mann (1801–1889), a Virginian and veteran diplomat, was sent to Rome to deal with the recruitment issue. The pope was shocked when Mann told him that Catholic recruits were situated in the most exposed places, where they were massacred. Pius IX and Cardinal Antonelli were also dismayed at the "unchristian" way immigrants were lured into the Union army. Mann judged his effort a success. "I have reason to believe," he wrote to Judah P. Benjamin, "that what I have said in high places in relation to Irish emigration to New York were words in season." Mann, however, had badly misjudged the situation. As Kerby A. Miller points out in Emigrants and Exiles, "in 1863–1864, poor harvests, rural distress and political unrest in Ireland combined with voracious American demands for soldiers and wartime laborers" inspired "a dramatic resurgence of departures; in each year over 94,000 Irish sailed to the United States" (1985, p. 347).

Following Mann, the Confederacy sent Bishop Patrick LYNCH of Charleston, South Carolina, as its representative to the Vatican. As recounted by David C.R. Heisser in "Bishop Lynch's Civil War Pamphlet on Slavery," Judah Benjamin instructed Lynch, a committed Confederate, to seek recognition, and to enlighten "opinions" and "mold impressions" of European rulers (1998, p. 681). Lynch's monthly stipend was $1,000, plus $500 for travel expenses. Lynch was a recognized leader of the American Catholic Church. He had studied for the priesthood in Rome and had also achieved a doctorate there. Slipping past the Union naval blockade, he arrived in Rome in June 1864 and, in an interview with Cardinal Antonelli, disclosed the Confederacy wish for recognition. On July 4 Pius IX received the bishop as a church official, but not as a Confederate emissary. The pope offered his services as a mediator and voiced opposition to immediate emancipation. Still, Pius IX hoped "something might be done" about an "improvement [in the slaves' position] and [progress] to a gradual preparation for their freedom at a future opportune time" (Heisser 1998, p. 682). Lynch, it might be added, made no progress toward recognition.

Lynch's major achievement was to publish a pamphlet (in French, German, and Italian) defending SLAVERY and the Confederacy. Lynch, a slaveholder himself (he possessed ninety-five slaves; other Southern Catholic and Protestant churchmen also owned slaves) had to overcome strong anti-slavery feelings in England (where, in 1772, a judicial decision abolished slavery) and elsewhere in Europe. The bishop depicted slavery as an institution of mutual obligation between masters and slaves, with the former having Christian obligations toward their slaves. Among those duties were to furnish their bondsmen with food and shelter, and to foster and support their slaves' marriages as well as their "families' integrity" (Heisser 1998, p. 684).

Lynch believed that visitors to the South, including travelers, novelists, "philanthropists and fanatics," had misrepresented the facts about the South. The poorly informed thought of the South as a "slumbering volcano" on the verge of a slave uprising. The progression of the war had shown otherwise. Even after the Emancipation Proclamation (1863), the slaves largely continued to work for their owners. "I do not believe that five out of a thousand," wrote the bishop, "have voluntarily gone over to the Yankee armies." Moreover, in Lynch's view, the slaves were better off in the New World than in Africa. In America the bondsmen could "at least obtain a knowledge of the true God, and might save their souls." And, insisted Lynch, the way to their salvation was through the Catholic Church (Heisser 1998, p. 684).

The bishop's tract caused a debate, although not as great as he had anticipated. Actually, the pamphlet received mixed reviews. But whether his booklet was praised or condemned, Lynch decided his assignment in Rome was completed, and on December 24, 1864, he resigned. Both Mann and Lynch had failed as diplomats, because Pius IX had not recognized the Confederacy nor, despite his willingness to do so, had the pontiff been called upon to mediate the conflict. Whether the bishop's tract changed any minds is an open question.

Lynch's pamphlet does not seem to have had much effect on Pius IX or his secretary of state. The pope was not only opposed to slavery, but, at least initially, was partial to the Union. In June 1862 he remarked that "it has been the maxim of the Catholic Church to support constituted authority and just laws." The pontiff was also pleased "that under the Constitution of the United States all forms of religious worship are placed under equality" (Stock 1933, p. 321). And, in late 1864, Rufus King, the resident Union minister in Rome, quoted the pope as saying that "he could never as a Churchman and the head of the Catholic Church, lend any sanction or countenance to the system of African Slavery" (Stock 1933, p. 321).

As for Cardinal Antonelli, in October 1862 he insisted on "his conviction that in rejecting all ideas of concessions or compromise" with its "domestic enemies, this government [of the United States] is pursuing its proper and necessary policy." In May 1864 the cardinal also asserted "that he as a Catholic must wish that slavery was abolished, but that it must be done by slow degrees." And in August 1864 the secretary of state perceived that the "so-called Confederate states had sought an unconstitutional remedy for their alleged wrongs, and were endeavoring to dissolve by force, a union consecrated by law" (Stock 1933, p. 260).

The Response of the Roman Press. Nonetheless, certain portions of the Roman press criticized the Union. As Alvarez points out, when news of the Emancipation Proclamation reached Rome, the response was distinctly unfavorable. The unofficial newspaper of the Vatican, L'Osservatore Romano, viewed the proclamation as a reckless and dishonest war measure that liberated no slaves but encouraged a slave insurrection in the South. Moreover, L'Osservatore Romano and the prestigious Jesuit journal, La Civiltà Cattolica, portrayed the Civil War as a desperate and faithless struggle by the North to chasten the South. And according to Alvarez, "the Roman press reflected sentiments that were spreading in ecclesiastical circles" (Alvarez 1983, p. 240).

Conversely, for European powers, specifically Great Britain and France, the Emancipation Proclamation changed the nature of the Civil War from a conflict to restore the Union to one to eradicate slavery. From that point on, diplomatic recognition of the Confederacy by these powers became improbable.

The Union effort was depicted by L'Osservatore as an "unjust war" waged on "unfair terms" for "uncivilized motives." The United States, according to the publication, was no longer battling to sustain the Union, but rather was seeking vengeance—even the "extermination of the South." And after 1863, L'Osservatore contrasted the Confederate army as "perfectly disciplined" and the Union army as "discouraged, disorganized and decimated by disease and desertions." The generals of the rival armies were also contrasted: Ulysses S. Grant (1822–1885), the Union general, was compared to Attila, "the scourge of God," and Robert E. Lee (1807–1870), the Confederate general, as the "Scorpio of the South," as cited in Lalli and O'Connor (1971, p. 33).

The unfavorable attitude in L'Osservatore remained unshaken by the progress of the Union forces. The newspaper misunderstood the implications of the Union victories at Vicksburg and Gettysburg in July 1863. These two triumphs represented a turning point in the Civil War. That they were followed by further Union—albeit bloody—victories in 1864 did not affect L'Osservatore's pro-Confederate posture, though, according to Rufus King, the Union representative in Rome, the "fighting qualities displayed by our troops in Virginia have made a wonderful impression upon the public mind in Europe" (Stock 1933, p. 306). Even news from New York, describing the retreat of the army of Northern Virginia in March 1865 before the relentless advance of the Union army, L'Osservatore derided as based on reports by Northern newsmen with lively imaginations. As a result, when Lee surrendered to Grant at Appomattox Courthouse on April 22, 1865, the editors of the publication were dumbfounded at the "enigmatic" manner in which the Union had triumphed in a war they had expected the Confederacy to win. Needless to say, the Roman press was out of touch with reality.

The Vatican's Response to the War. The Vatican did not make the same error. It is true that Pius IX was deeply disturbed at the appalling loss of life and was disappointed when the Lincoln administration rejected his offer of mediation. Both of these concerns explain his periodic bouts of irritation with the Union. But because of his respect for the constitutional integrity of the United States and his abhorrence of slavery, no real likelihood existed that Pius IX would have recognized the Confederacy.

The Papacy on Slavery. Finally, it is worth noting that neither the Holy See nor his secretary of state had taken a public position on slavery at the outset of the Civil War, although Pope GREGORY XVI in his 1839 encyclical, "In supreme apostolatus fastigio," had expressed criticism of the slave trade. The Civil War prompted Pius IX to declare his opposition to slavery. However, fearful of the racial turmoil that might attend the immediate freeing of the slaves, Pius IX favored gradual emancipation.

SEE ALSO NAPOLEON III; WAR, MORALITY OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

David Alvarez, "The Papacy in the Diplomacy of the American Civil War," Catholic Historical Review 69 (April 1983): 227–248.

Arnold Blumberg, "The Mexican Empire and the Vatican, 1863–1867," The Americas 28, no. 1 (July 1971): 1–19.

Frank J. Coppa, "Italy, the Papacy and the American Civil War," La Parola del Papalo (November–December 1967).

David C.R. Heisser, "Bishop Lynch's Civil War Pamphlet on Slavery," Catholic Historical Review 84, no. 4 (October 1, 1998): 681–696.

Anthony B. Lalli and Thomas H. O'Connor, "Roman Views on the American Civil War," Catholic Historical Review 40 (April 1971): 21–41.

Kerby A. Miller, Emigrants and Exiles: Ireland and the Irish Exodus to North America (New York 1985).

Frank Lawrence Owsley, King Cotton Diplomacy: Foreign Relations of the Confederate States of America, 2nd ed., revised by Harriet C. Owsley (Chicago 1959).

Leo Francis Stock, ed., United States Ministers to the Papal States: Instructions and Dispatches, 1848–1868 (Washington, D.C. 1933).

Richard Harmond
Professor Emeritus of American History
St. John's University, New York (2010)

AMERICAN REVOLUTION, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH AND

Roman Catholicism was one of the favorite bugbears of the American Revolutionary era. Boston, the cockpit of revolt, was founded by Puritans, and there in particular a fascination with "popery" and its villainies was firmly linked to a more appropriate but still exaggerated fear of Britain's imperial despotism and moral rot. John Adams (1735–1826), in his Dissertation on the Canon and the Feudal Law (1765), argued that the hated Stamp Act discouraged reading and was therefore an attempt to degrade literate Yankees to the level of Europe's Catholic peasantry. On "Pope's Day," neighborhood boys put aside their ritual torments of Guy Fawkes to vandalize the homes of tax collectors. The king's concessions to his French Canadian subjects in the Quebec Act (1774) were regarded by his very English but increasingly difficult subjects south of Canada as intolerable measures.

The animosity was genuine—and so intense as to dominate our understanding of relations between the young United States and the HOLY SEE. But any such understanding would be incomplete to the point of falsehood. The animosity was rather one-sided. The Catholic hierarchy took a milder view of the United States; it saw in North America an opportunity for the Church to grow without the political encumbrances typical of European states, Catholic or Protestant. Moreover, American animosity itself ebbed as well as flowed. In the early national period, anti-Catholicism was necessarily abstract: Catholics were but one percent of the population. The abstraction could be trotted out in gaudy array at moments of stress—at the approach of the Revolution, for example—but the satisfactory conclusion of America's contest with Britain allowed certain fears to be closeted.

Rome's View of America. Peace, and the confirmation of American independence, came in 1783. Pope PIUS VI's instructions to Giuseppe Maria Doria Pamphili (1751–1816), his nuncio in Paris, were optimistic. He hoped that, at the urging of King Louis XVI (1754–1793) of France, language protecting the "free exercise and the maintenance of the Catholic religion" might be included in the treaty that formally ended America's Revolutionary War. The instructions further speculated that the extended deployment of French troops in North America had improved its people's opinion of the Church. The next year saw significant connections forming between the republic and the VATICAN. The ports of the Papal States were opened to vessels flying the Stars and Stripes, and Fr. John CARROLL (1735–1815) became the prefect responsible for the care of Roman Catholics living in the United States. The latter step deserves special attention. The grounds for the decision say much about Rome's view of America generally, and the decision, once made, moved early national Catholicism in a definite direction, one that ran comfortably parallel to the trajectory of North America's civic and religious traditions.

Before the Revolution, Roman Catholics living in Britain's American colonies were under the supervision of the vicar apostolic in London. Unlike their compatriots in Parliament and Whitehall, the holders of that office in the crucial decades of the eighteenth century, the Bishops Benjamin Petre (1672–1758) and Richard Challoner (1691–1781), were more than ready to cede authority to an American wing of the hierarchy. That a distinctly Anglo-American episcopacy remained a dream in the colonial period is no surprise: Americans successfully resisted the installation of an Anglican (and thus Protestant) bishop in their midst; a Catholic bishop, especially one countenanced by an aggressive imperial government, would not have enjoyed a warm welcome. This is why Britain's support, via the Quebec Act, of Bishop Jean-Olivier Briand (1715–1794) and Canadian Catholicism was so offensive to Yankee sensibilities. And yet, from the perspective of Rome and the Congregation of the Propaganda Fide, Canada was a promising model for a Church that needed to manufacture strengths from seeming weakness.

France lost Canada when it lost the Seven Years' War (1756–1763). French Canadians became the subjects of a Protestant king, yes, but one who could afford to be forgiving, at least at the colonial margins of his empire. In this situation, the focus of the Church and its adherents was necessarily (and, to the missionaries of the Congregation, refreshingly) spiritual. The Roman hierarchy would have similar hopes for the United States, which were Protestant by confession and culture but, at the national level (and that was a key qualification), constitutionally tolerant.

Cold Crossing. George Washington, first president of the United States of America following the victory in the War of Independence, pictured crossing the Delaware River on a boat en route to the Battle of Trenton. POPPERFOTO/GETTY IMAGES

The Role of John Carroll. John Carroll inclined to moderation as well, and, for this and other reasons, the Church in the United States was fortunate to have him as its first prefect, bishop, and then archbishop. Carroll was born to privilege in Maryland, the only colony in mainland British America other than Quebec where Catholics had social and numerical weight. Educated by JESUITS at home and abroad, Carroll joined the Society of Jesus as a novice in 1753 and was ordained a priest in 1761. He spent nearly fifteen years studying and teaching at Jesuit colleges in Liège, Bruges, and Bologna. Many of his pupils were English gentry and nobility, and he chaperoned one young Catholic squire on his grand tour of Europe. With the suppression of his order in 1773, Carroll took refuge in the castle of Lord Arundell, the Catholic peer, before returning to Maryland in 1774. This was not the background of a revolutionary firebrand, and Carroll's connections with England would survive the crisis then looming. When, for example, Carroll was raised to the episcopacy in 1790, he chose to stage the ceremony in the private chapel of another great house, Lulworth Castle in Dorset.

Carroll was, nevertheless, a good patriot when the time came to make a choice about America's independence from Britain. In 1776 he accompanied Benjamin Franklin (1706–1790) to Canada, where it was thought Catholic inhabitants, so recently subject to the British, might rise in rebellion alongside their American neighbors. These appeals fell on deaf ears, in part because British rule proved so gentle, as indeed American rule over its Catholic citizens would prove to be after the war's end. Failing in its original purpose, the mission to Canada had one noteworthy result: Franklin came to like the priest and recommended him when the American Church needed a leader.

In 1784 Franklin was in Paris, enjoying a brilliant success in social and diplomatic circles. He had played a chief role in negotiating an end to the Revolutionary War. Now the papal nuncio approached the American about what was to be done for Catholics in the young republic. They could no longer be led from London. Might they be directed by Frenchmen? There is some evidence that such a policy was contemplated by the Church hierarchy, by Franklin, and—not at all surprisingly—by the arch-intriguer Charles-Maurice de TALLEYRAND-PÉRIGORD (1754–1838). In short order, however, a different line was taken and a native prefect, John Carroll, was named. The Congregation of the Propaganda Fide and its head, Leonardo Cardinal Antonelli (1730–1811), saw the wisdom of choosing a superior from among the people to be served. Rome could not hope to revive its temporal glories in North America; it had to adapt itself to the landscape. John Carroll understood this and followed a conciliatory path, but this American strategy was guided from the beginning by the missionary instincts of Pius VI's papacy.

The turbulent period ahead would find many continental Catholics peering wistfully across the Atlantic, to an overwhelmingly Protestant nation where Catholicism could nonetheless be safely practiced (and even expand) without legal hindrance, Jacobinical hatred, or Bonapartist manipulation. Pius VI was of course one victim. The United States placed its first consul in the Papal States just before Pius's final humiliation. Giovanni Battista (or, as he was known in America, John Baptist) Sartori arrived in Baltimore, Carroll's diocese, with a letter of introduction from Cardinal Antonelli. He then risked the good favor of his patrons by marrying a Shaker girl from Pennsylvania—an unorthodox move, but this was an unorthodox country. Bishop Carroll smoothed the situation over, assuring the head of the Congregation of the Propaganda Fide that all proper forms had been observed. In 1797 Sartori was back in Italy, as first U.S. consul in lands governed by the Holy See. Within months, that government collapsed before the ambitions of the French and their puppet Roman Republic. The U.S. secretary of state, Timothy Pickering (1745–1829), wrote Sartori to tell him that, though Americans were the republican sort who respected the right of self-government, it was not at all clear that authority in Rome extended beyond the range of French cannon. This circumspection was typical of official American opinion about the Papal States and their rivals during those difficult times.

Back in the United States, John Carroll's career and the career of his Church continued their steady progress. While the attitudes of the Propaganda Fide were aligned with those that came naturally to Carroll—a Maryland cleric devoted to the separation of church and state—he was at first wary of the oversight the Congregation claimed over him. He feared that it would be confused with foreign intrusion. For similar reasons, he was pleased that his appointment to the episcopacy was delayed; his elevation in 1790 was, however, largely unattended by controversy in the dominant Protestant culture, as was his appointment as archbishop in 1808. Most of his arguments were with Catholics: difficult priests and lay trustees who held Church property. To promote Catholic education, Carroll encouraged SULPICIANS, DOMINICANS, and his still-suppressed fellow Jesuits to establish colleges and seminaries in the United States. He effected a partial restoration of the Jesuit order in 1805, well in advance of its redemption worldwide.

By doing so, and by maintaining—across the Revolutionary divide—useful links to the English Catholic community, Carroll demonstrated a sympathy with geopolitical trends that brought Catholic concerns into at least occasional harmony with those of Anglo-American statesmen. These men were anxious to combat French power, and to the extent that Roman Catholics were similarly inclined, the Church might be of use. This was the period when King George III (1738–1820) and his government decided to subsidize Henry Cardinal York (1725–1807), the last Stuart pretender to the English throne. By this generosity, a great schism in British politics was healed. The safely Protestant Hanoverians had displaced the Catholic Stuarts; now they paid their bills and eased the embarrassments Cardinal York shared with his pontiff. The conduit for the funds, Sir John Coxe Hippisley (1746–1825), curried favor with the once and future Jesuits gathered in Italy, in the hope that such men might be deployed in Spanish America, first against the decadent Bourbons and then against the French menace that held Spain, Rome, and—it seemed—half the world in its grip. In these plots, the British were joined, at the end of the eighteenth century, by adventurers in the United States who calculated that a war with the Franco-Spanish regime might open South America to commercial exploitation and to political reform modeled, conveniently, on the Anglo-American example of balanced representative government.

Of course, the collapse of the Bonapartes restored Catholic confidence in ways not always acceptable to Americans. Fears that the Holy Alliance might try to quash the republican rebellions in Spanish America contributed to the promulgation of the Monroe Doctrine in 1823. The United States need not have worried. Its declaration of hemispheric independence was guaranteed by British interests and naval might, and the repeated victories of republican armies discouraged direct interference from abroad. Popes LEO XII, PIUS VIII, and GREGORY XVI were conservatives, but they were in the end realistic about Spanish American developments. The Vatican began to erect distinctly national ecclesiastical structures in the republics well before its official recognition of those states in 1835.

Catholicism and Anti-Catholicism in Boston. The United States was changing as well. Here again, the case of Boston is instructive. No colonial town was more determined in its anti-Catholicism, and the onset of the American Revolution promised to confirm Yankees in their prejudices. But the war and its aftermath provoked new thoughts. A rising generation of politicians and intellectuals were not intimidated by the "Romish" mystique. At Harvard College, a circle of friends that included Rufus King (1755–1827), the future senator and ambassador to Great Britain, Royall Tyler (1757–1826), America's first successful playwright, and John Trumbull (1756–1843), whose paintings grace the Capitol rotunda, found time between their poems and tipples to wonder about the exotic characters passing through Cambridge. Some of them, they hoped, were proscribed Jesuits plotting their return to influence. These young Yankees, along with a great many others, joined the Continental Army and fought at the side of their French allies—Catholics almost to the last man—whose aid was indispensable to the American cause.

At war's end, there was anxiety about the nation's weakness and wayward purpose, but there was also a lightening of mood. The spartan rhetoric of the 1760s and 1770s was set aside, and a broad cross section of elites adopted a more cosmopolitan perspective. In Massachusetts, the longstanding ban on theatrical entertainment was at last allowed to expire. One reason for this change was that Boston needed to appeal to visiting strangers, to citizens of the world accustomed to a more open society. This was the Boston that proved so hospitable to Jean-Louis Lefebvre de CHEVERUS (1768–1836), who arrived as a missionary priest in 1796 and left—unhappily but at the insistence of King Louis XVIII (1755–1824)—in 1823, by which time he had been a bishop, New England's first, for fifteen years.

Cheverus and his flock benefited from a confluence of circumstance: Bostonians, and in particular the wealthiest and most articulate, were shedding their parochial attitudes; the outrages of the French Revolution made traditional Catholicism quite attractive by comparison; and Catholics were still too few in number to frighten anyone. Cheverus was on excellent terms with Boston's better Protestant clergy and its Federalist intelligentsia. At the turn of the century, a new home for the town's Catholics was constructed under the supervision of Charles Bulfinch (1763–1844), the star architect of the Federal era and the designer of the Massachusetts State House. Boston's Church of the Holy Cross was built with money collected in parishes up and down the Atlantic coast, but Protestant Yankees contributed a quarter of the necessary sum. Congressmen, ministers, and China merchants graced the list of donors. And at the top of the subscription was President John Adams, who gave $100. In his Dissertation, he had vilified Catholics for their slavish ignorance; thirty-five years later, he had become their patron.

Cheverus was particularly beloved by Boston's privileged women, and around him gathered a circle of Yankee bluestockings. These were the ladies who entrusted their Protestant children to the care of Catholic religious, who came to New England to build on Cheverus's strong foundation. Of course they also came to serve the swelling numbers of Catholic immigrants. This demographic shift signaled an end to the era of moderation. Yankee workers feared that they would lose their jobs to cheap Irish labor, and they despised the mollycoddling of Catholicism by the upper middle classes. This resentment led to the burning of the Ursuline Convent outside Boston in 1834 (the convent school was full of Protestant girls from "good" families) and to the explosive nativism of the Know-Nothings.

Strengthening of United States–Vatican Relations. As anti-Catholic sentiment swept through the United States, the papacy again faced a stern test at its very heart. When the Roman Republic was proclaimed in 1849, the American consul, Nicholas Brown, enthused about its prospects and its "love of liberty." Brown's replacement, Lewis Cass Jr. (1814–c.1879), was already on his way. He carried with him ministerial rank and a cautious set of instructions from the secretary of state, James Buchanan (1791–1868). Echoing his predecessor Pickering fifty years before, Buchanan urged Cass to withhold his support from the Roman Republic. In 1850 PIUS IX returned to his palace, and he personally thanked the American ambassador for the considerable aid, both moral and financial, that he and his Church had received from the United States and its citizens. The pope knew that, while the nation remained Protestant in its leadership and orientation, more and more of its people were of his faith. In the United States, Catholics could increasingly exercise republican power.

SEE ALSO ANTI-CATHOLICISM (UNITED STATES); CHURCH AND STATE IN THE UNITED STATES (LEGAL HISTORY); UNITED STATES RELATIONS WITH THE PAPACY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Joseph Agonito, "Ecumenical Stirrings: Catholic-Protestant Relations during the Episcopacy of John Carroll," Church History 45, no. 3 (September 1976): 358–373.

Jules A. Baisnée, France and the Establishment of the American Catholic Hierarchy: The Myth of French Interference (1783–1784) (Baltimore, Md. 1934).

Robert Stewart, Viscount Castlereagh, Memoirs and Correspondence of Viscount Castlereagh, Second Marquess of Londonderry, 12 vols. (London 1848–1853).

Luca Codignola, "Roman Catholic Conservatism in a New North Atlantic World, 1760–1829," William and Mary Quarterly 64, no. 4 (October 2007): 717–756.

Peter Guilday, "The Appointment of Father John Carroll as Prefect-Apostolic of the Church in the New Republic (1783–1785)," Catholic Historical Review 6 (July 1920): 204–248.

Robert H. Lord, "Jean Lefebvre de Cheverus, First Catholic Bishop of Boston," Proceedings of the Massachusetts Historical Society 65 (January 1933): 64–79.

J. Lloyd Mecham, "The Papacy and Spanish-American Independence," Hispanic American Historical Review 9, no. 2 (May 1929): 154–175.

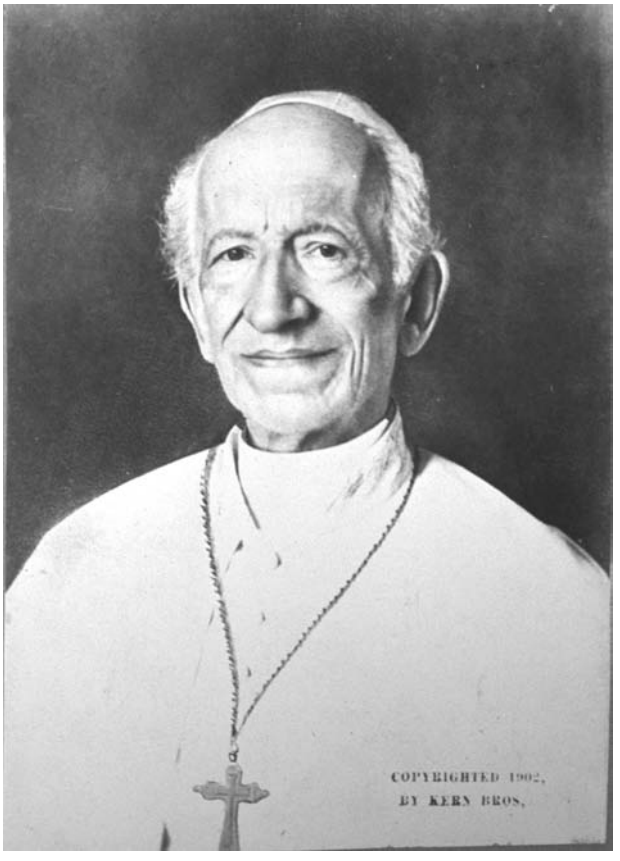
Annabelle M. Melville, "John Carroll of Baltimore: A Bicentennial Retrospect," Catholic Historical Review 76 (January 1990): 1–17.

Leo Francis Stock, "The United States at the Court of Pius IX," Catholic Historical Review 9, no. 1 (April 1923): 103–122.

Leo Francis Stock, "American Consuls to the Papal States, 1797–1870," Catholic Historical Review 15, no. 3 (October 1929): 233–251.

John Trumbull, The Autobiography of Colonel John Trumbull, Patriot-artist, 1756–1843, edited by Theodore Sizer (New Haven, Conn. 1953).

Timothy A. Milford
Associate Professor, Department of History
St. John's University, New York (2010)



AMERICANISM

Americanism is the name given to certain ideas criticized by Pope LEO XIII in his 1899 apostolic letter Testem benevolentiae nostrae (Witness to Our Good Will).

As early as the 1860s a group of New York priests calling itself the Accademia met regularly to discuss the future of the Church. They were frustrated by what they considered its foreign and outdated characteristics and to some extent looked to the Episcopal Church as a model for adapting Catholicism to American culture. They doubted, for example, the relevance of MONASTICISM and wanted a vernacular liturgy.

The Accademia had no direct affect on the Church in America, but by the 1880s American bishops and priests were divided between those who advocated greater Catholic participation in American public life and conservatives who thought America was Protestant and tainted with the liberalism condemned in the SYLLABUS OF ERRORS of Pope PIUS IX.

The so-called Americanist movement was led by Archbishop John IRELAND of St. Paul, Minnesota; Bishops John Joseph KEANE of Richmond, Virginia; John Lancaster SPALDING of Peoria, Illinois; and Denis Joseph O'CONNELL, rector of the North American College in Rome. The leaders of the conservatives were Archbishop Michael Augustine CORRIGAN of New York City; Bishop Bernard John MCQUAID of Rochester, New York; and the German bishops of Wisconsin. Cardinal James GIBBONS of Baltimore endeavored to keep peace between the two groups, although he was inclined toward the Americanists and regularly extolled the virtues of American society.

Pope Leo XIII (1878–1903). Born Count Vincenzo Gioacchino Raffaele Luigi Pecci, as pope, he led the charge against Americanism. THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

The division extended to the faculty of the new CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA, of which Keane in 1888 became the first rector. The chief conservatives at the university were Monsignor Peter Joseph SCHROEDER and Abbé Georges Périès, and the liberals included Thomas Joseph BOUQUILLON, who wrote a pamphlet defending the American system of education; Charles P. Grannan (1846–1924); and Edward Aloysius PACE.

In the press, the New York Freeman's Journal, the Northwestern Chronicle of St. Paul, and the Western Watchman of St. Louis supported Ireland. The Review of Chicago (later of St. Louis), edited by Arthur PREUSS; Church Progress, edited by Condé Benoist PALLEN of St. Louis; and most of the German Catholic newspapers opposed the Americanists.

Ethnic Divisions. On one level the split was along ethnic lines. In 1886 certain German priests, led by Father Peter M. ABBELEN of Milwaukee, presented a petition to the VATICAN protesting the treatment of foreign language groups and national parishes in the United States. Ireland and Keane published a refutation of the petition. Gibbons called a meeting of archbishops to protest it, and it was rejected by the Vatican. (The overwhelming majority of American bishops at the time were Irish. Only in the province of Milwaukee were Germans regularly appointed.)

In 1890–1891 certain European societies interested in immigrants to the United States, under the chairmanship of Peter Paul CAHENSLY, petitioned Rome for better representation of foreign nationalities in the American hierarchy. Archbishop Ireland, who thought Germans were unsuited to hold episcopal office, again protested.

However, the division was not simply between foreign-born and native-born: Except for Spalding, all the Americanist leaders had been born in Ireland, whereas Corrigan was a native of Newark, New Jersey.

Massive immigration had both vastly increased the size of American Catholicism and provoked a nativist backlash. Ireland felt intensely frustrated by the Church's immigrant character, even to the point of longing for the early days of the Republic, when the Church had been much smaller but also more American. The Americanists minimized anti-Catholic sentiment, especially as it existed in the Republican Party, and discouraged organized Catholic efforts to combat it.

Democracy. Americanism was elusive because in some ways it was a matter of mood or personality. The Americanists, especially Ireland, tended to be exuberant and optimistic, formulating ambitious plans, while their opponents often showed conventional ecclesiastical caution.

Behind this lay a judgment about American culture itself. The Americanists viewed the country with sometimes extravagant hope, as admittedly Protestant and liberal but as also ripe for conversion, if the appropriate methods were used. America was the guiding star of the modern world, showing the way to more backward European nations. The Americanists sometimes maximized the differences between the Old World and the New, as when Keane and Spalding forcefully denied that medieval ideas still had relevance.

In a way, the movement developed into a religious version of the political doctrine of Manifest Destiny, as when O'Connell hailed Ireland: "For this you were born ... to be the instrument in the hands of Providence to spread the benefits of a new civilization over the whole world" (O'Connell 1988, p. 392).

One of the most controversial aspects of the Americanists' program was their enthusiasm for the American system of separation of church and state, something that Pius IX had seemingly condemned. That enthusiasm aroused particular suspicion because they urged the American solution on European Catholics and seemed to ignore the way in which liberalism on the Continent was often openly hostile to the Church.

Despite his devotion to the idea of church-state separation, Ireland was a skilled navigator of political waters. He became involved in secular politics to achieve his ecclesiastical goals when, over Corrigan's vehement objections, he openly supported a priest's candidacy for public office in New York State.

At a meeting of the National Educational Association in 1890, Ireland praised the public schools and expressed regret that there had to be separate Catholic schools. When he inaugurated the Stillwater Plan and FARIBAULT PLAN to get state aid, he was accused of being opposed to parochial schools, which had been mandated by the Fourth Provincial Council of Baltimore. He had to go to ROME to clarify his position.

Ireland openly supported the Republican Party, partly to counter the loyalty of so many Catholic immigrants to the Democrats but mainly because the Republicans were the party of an expansive capitalism that Ireland saw as the engine of dynamic growth in the nation.

Because of the Civil War, the Republicans were also, in the eyes of many, the party of patriotism. (Ireland had been a Union chaplain in the war.) In the presidential campaign of 1884 a prominent Republican hurled the famous accusation that the Democrats were the party of "rum, Romanism, and rebellion," but Ireland continued to support the Republicans. He strongly endorsed the Spanish-American War in 1898, despite efforts by the HOLY SEE to avert it, although afterward he protested what he thought were efforts by the American government to hamper the Church in the Philippines.

Americanism in Rome. At the archbishops' meeting in 1892, the papal legate, Archbishop Francesco SATOLLI, endorsed Ireland's program for Catholic schools. The next year Satolli announced the formation of the APOSTOLIC DELEGATION to the United States in Washington, with himself as the first delegate—a move that a number of bishops disapproved, including the conservative leader Corrigan.

Later in 1893 Satolli appeared in Ireland's company at the World's Fair (Columbian Exposition) in Chicago, although he refused to take part in the World's Congress of Religions, in which Ireland, Keane, Gibbons, and other Catholics participated against the wishes of the conservatives. But two years later the delegate announced that Rome had forbidden Catholic participation in further such ecumenical activity.

Satolli gradually turned against the Americanists. In 1895 O'Connell was forced to resign as rector of the NORTH AMERICAN COLLEGE, followed the next year by Keane's enforced resignation from the rectorship of the CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA. Keane's supporters in the university in turn brought about the resignation of Schroeder, whom they accused of being the chief factor in the rector's removal.

Americanism in France. Progressive Catholics in France admired Ireland and Gibbons, and in 1894 Abbé Félix Klein (1862–1953) published a translation of Ireland's speeches. Ironically, it was in France where the Americanist movement came to a climax, through another book, The Life of Father Hecker, by Walter ELLIOTT.

Isaac Thomas HECKER, the son of German immigrants, was born a Lutheran but became a spiritual seeker who explored several religious movements, including New England TRANSCENDENTALISM. Eventually he became a Catholic, entered the REDEMPTORISTS order (from which he was dismissed on charges of disobedience), and then founded his own religious community (without vows), the PAULISTS.

As their name indicated, the Paulists were devoted to the evangelization of American society. Hecker thought that the Catholic doctrine of freedom of the will, in contrast to the pessimism of classical LUTHERANISM and CALVINISM, would appeal to Americans. However, he also thought the Church needed to adapt itself in certain ways to American culture.

Elliott, himself a Paulist, published his biography of Hecker, The Life of Father Hecker, in 1891, with an introduction by Ireland. In 1897 a French translation included an enthusiastic preface by Klein, who called Hecker the priest of the future and lauded the American Catholic way of life. In a speech in Switzerland around the same time, O'Connell, serving as the Roman agent for the Americanist bishops, also extolled Hecker's Americanism, stressing his acceptance of American democracy and of relations between church and state.

Elliott's book received wide notice in French religious circles, and there followed a series of sermons in Paris by JESUITS who attacked what they considered certain dangers to the Church, especially "Father Hecker's Americanism." Articles along the same line appeared in the conservative Catholic press, which ridiculed the claim that Hecker exemplified the priest of the future. Abbé Charles Maignen (b. 1858) found further evidence of Americanist doctrines in Keane's 1893 address to the Congress of Religions in Chicago.

Maignen then published Études sur l'Américanisme, Le Père Hecker, est-il un Saint? (Studies in Americanism, Is Father Hecker a Saint?), for which he obtained the IMPRIMATUR of the Master of the Sacred Palace in Rome. Some interpreted this as papal approval of the book. The controversy spread also to Belgium, Germany, and Italy, where it became implicated in the dispute over the temporal power of the PAPACY.

Condemnation. Leo XIII opposed the move to put the Hecker biography on the Index of Forbidden Books and instead appointed a committee of cardinals to study the question; the committee reported adversely on Americanism. The pope softened the report so that no specific person was accused of holding the condemned doctrines, and ordinary political and social Americanism were exempted from disapproval. Although Gibbons and Ireland both tried to prevent it, Testem benevolentiae nostrae was officially issued on January 22, 1899.

The Hecker biography was withdrawn from sale. Ireland, Keane, and Klein immediately submitted but denied that they held the condemned doctrines. Gibbons, to whom the letter was addressed, denied that any educated American Catholic held them, while the conservative bishops in the United States thanked the pope for saving the American Church from dangerous ideas.

Although the papal letter was a setback, the Americanist bishops continued to have influence for two more decades. Keane became archbishop of Dubuque, Iowa, and O'Connell became rector of the Catholic University and later bishop of Richmond, Virginia.

The basic principle of the censured Americanism was that the Church should modify her doctrines to suit modern civilization and to attract converts, passing over some less attractive doctrines and adapting the Church's teachings to popular theories and methods. Leo summarized five specific errors: that external spiritual direction was no longer necessary; the extolling of natural over SUPERNATURAL, and active over passive, virtues; religious vows were not compatible with Christian liberty; and that a new method of apologetics had to be adopted.

Significance of Americanism. Leo XIII never called Americanism a heresy, nor did its proponents intend any attack on Catholic doctrine. Leo also did not condemn separation of church and state but warned that it should not be absolutized. The pope carefully excluded from condemnation the legitimate use of the word Americanism to signify "the characteristic qualities which reflect honor on the people of America" (Acta Sanctae Sedis, XXXI (1899), p. 474).

As much as anything, Americanism was controversial because its proponents were in the habit of making grand rhetorical gestures whose precise meaning was left uncertain, as in Spalding's rousing exhortation "Church and Age, unite!" (Appleby 1992, p. 8). Clearly they wanted some kind of adaptation of the Catholic faith to American culture, but they did not have a carefully thought out program and were vague as to what was or was not subject to legitimate change.

Neither did they have a theology. Ireland and Spalding once met the French modernist priest Alfred LOISY, who was disappointed that the two American prelates seemed to have no ideas beyond that of the separation of church and state. Ireland had invited Loisy to teach at his seminary, but after the French abbé was condemned as a modernist, the Minnesota prelate strongly supported the Holy See.

There was a bridge between Americanism and theological MODERNISM in that both movements urged openness to the world and dismissed aspects of Catholicism as outmoded hindrances to the Church's credibility. Most Americanists did not cross that bridge, but several American priests of that era became modernists. The Paulist William Sullivan (d. 1944), the Jesuit William Fanning (d. 1920), and the pioneer Josephite John R. Slattery (1851–1926) all came to doubt particular Church teachings and left the priesthood, Sullivan becoming a Unitarian minister.

Testem benevolentiae nostrae has sometimes been seen as destroying a golden opportunity for the Church in America. Ironically, however, it came at precisely the moment when the Church was entering its period of greatest growth and influence, a period that would last into the 1960s and that in many ways was sustained by precisely the things, such as ULTRAMONTANISM, that the Americanists found most frustrating.

This growth occurred above all because, while attracting large numbers of converts, the Church successfully catechized the immigrants and over time helped to assimilate them to their new country, whereas—usually unspoken and perhaps largely unthought—the Americanist program aimed to reach a cultural elite and thereby to convert the nation from the top down (many of the early Paulists, for example, were converts from distinguished Protestant families).

Americanism perhaps had a lasting effect in terms of American Catholics' deep conviction that their faith and their citizenship were fully compatible—the "superpatriotism" for which later they would sometimes be criticized.

SEE ALSO CHURCH AND STATE IN THE UNITED STATES (LEGAL HISTORY); CHURCH MEMBERSHIP, U.S.; TESTEM BENEVOLENTIAE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

R. Scott Appleby, Church and Age Unite! The Modernist Impulse in American Catholicism (Notre Dame, Ind. 1992).

Robert D. Cross, The Emergence of Liberal Catholicism in America (Cambridge, Mass. 1958).

Robert Emmett Curran, Michael Augustine Corrigan and the Shaping of Conservative Catholicism in America, 1878–1902 (New York 1978).

Walter Elliott, The Life of Father Hecker (New York 1891).

John Tracy Ellis, The Life of James Cardinal Gibbons: Archbishop of Baltimore, 1834–1921, 2 vols. (Milwaukee 1952).

Gerald P. Fogarty, The Vatican and the Americanist Crisis: Denis J. O'Connell, American Agent in Rome, 1885–1903 (Rome 1974).

James Hitchcock, "Americanism: The 'Phantom Heresy' Revisited," in The Battle for the Catholic Mind: Catholic Faith and Catholic Intellect in the Work of the Fellowship of Catholic Scholars, 1978–95, ed. William E. May and Kenneth D. Whitehead (South Bend, Ind. 2001), 236–247.

Leo XIII, Testem benevolentiae nostrae, Concerning New Opinions, Virtue, Nature and Grace, with Regard to Americanism (Apostolic Letter, January 22, 1899), available from http://www.ewtn.com/library/PAPALDOC/L13TESTE.HTM (accessed March 5, 2008).

Thomas Timothy McAvoy, The Great Crisis in American Catholic History, 1895–1900 (Chicago 1957).

Marvin R. O'Connell, John Ireland and the American Catholic Church (St. Paul, Minn. 1988).

David Francis Sweeney, The Life of John Lancaster Spalding, First Bishop of Peoria, 1840–1916 (New York 1965).

Rev. Thomas T. McAvoy CSC
Professor of History and Archivist
University of Notre Dame, Notre Dame, Ind.

James Hitchcock
Professor, Department of History
St. Louis University, St. Louis, Mo. (2010)

ANACLETO GONZÁLEZ FLORES AND NINE COMPANIONS, BB.

Mexican martyrs; d. 1927–1931; beatified November 20, 2005, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

On November 20, 2005, at Jalisco Stadium in Guadalajara, Cardinal José Saraiva Martins, the prefect of the Congregation for the Causes of Saints, celebrated the BEATIFICATION of thirteen Mexican martyrs, including Anacleto González Flores and nine companions. Pope Benedict XVI appeared via video and said of the martyrs, "They are a permanent example for us, an encouragement to give concrete testimony of our own faith in today's society."

Anacleto González Flores. Anacleto González Flores, born in Tepatitlán, Jalisco, in 1888, was a Mexican journalist, lawyer, organizer of Catholic lay action, and a Third Order Franciscan. As a young man, Anacleto taught history and literature while organizing worker groups on Catholic social principles. From 1914 to 1916, he formed a series of Catholic study circles inspired by various thinkers, including Mahatma GANDHI. By 1916, Anacleto had become a local leader, known as El Maestro, in the Asociación Católica de la Juventud Mexicana (ACJM) or the Catholic Association of Mexican Youth, a national organization aimed at restoring a Christian social order in Mexico.

After the government closed the Conciliar Seminary of Guadalajara, Anacleto organized a group, called the Catholic Committee of Defense, to defend endangered religious institutions. The group was reestablished in 1925 as Unión Popular, or United Front. He also edited the weekly Gladium, which had a circulation of 100,000.

When in 1926 the national government under President Plutarco Elías Calles (1877–1945) enforced laws intolerant to the exercise of religion, Anacleto, in the national newspaper El País, called upon Catholics to passively resist these regulations. He then led the ensuing protests. Calles responded with redoubled violence and persecution of Catholics. Anacleto assisted the Liga Nacional Defensora de la Libertad Religiosa (National League for the Defense of Religious Freedom), which spearheaded the Cristeros Rebellion, so-called from the cry of the Catholic guerrilla warriors, "Viva Cristo Rey" (Long live Christ the King). Anacleto worked from the home of the Vargas González family, who were ACJM associates, but he was discovered and arrested on April 1, 1927. After being brutally tortured, he was bayoneted and shot.

His Companions. José Dionisio Luis Padilla Gómez (b. Guadalajara, Jalisco, December 9, 1899), a member of ACJM, was arrested, beaten, and sentenced to execution on April 1, 1927, along with Anacleto and others. Luis knelt in prayer as he was shot.

The brothers Jorge Vargas González (b. Ahualulco de Mercado, Jalisco, September 28, 1899) and Ramón Vargas González (b. Ahualulco de Mercado, Jalisco, January 22, 1905) were members of ACJM. The Vargas González family helped protect priests and seminarians, and had given refuge to Anacleto González Flores. On April 1, 1927, Jorge and Ramon were arrested, tortured, interrogated, and executed, along with Anacleto.

José Luciano Ezequiel Huerta Gutiérrez (b. Magdalena, Jalisco, January 6, 1876) was an organist and remarkable singer, and a father of ten children. He and his brother Salvador (b. Magdalena, Jalisco, March 18, 1880), a mechanic and a father of twelve, were arrested on April 2, 1927, after visiting the body of Anacleto González Flores. The police tortured Ezequiel into unconsciousness when he refused to divulge the location of priests who were in hiding. The next day, he and his brother were taken to the cemetery of Mezquitán and killed.

Miguel Gómez Loza (b. Tepatitlán, Jalisco, August 11, 1888), a member of ACJM, had established a national congress of Catholic industrial, commercial, and agricultural workers. Miguel advocated nonviolent resistance to the persecution. After Anacleto's execution, Catholic leaders appointed him governor of Jalisco. On March 21, 1928, he was arrested and executed.

Luis Magaña Servín (b. Arandas, Jalisco, August 24, 1902) was a member of ACJM. He loved the Church, studied social issues, and joined an artisan union. As a pacifist, Luis offered spiritual and material assistance to the resistance. On February 9, 1928, Luis's brother was arrested. Luis voluntarily took his brother's place as prisoner and was executed.

José Sánchez del Río (b. Sahuayo, Michoacán, March 28, 1913) was captured during a battle on February 5, 1928, when he was fourteen years old. Soldiers tortured him by cutting the skin off his feet and forcing him to walk on salt. José was commanded to deny his faith, but the teenager shouted back: "Long live Christ the King!" He was executed in Sahuayo, Michoacán, on February 10, 1928.

Fr. Ángel Darío Acosta Zurita (b. Naolinco, Veracruz, December 13, 1908) was ordained in April 1931 in Veracruz. He taught children and was dedicated to the Sacrament of Penance. On July 25, 1931, Fr. Darío was shot in Assumption, Veracruz, by soldiers operating under the "Tejeda Law," which restricted the number of priests. Fr. Darío was martyred only three months after his ordination.

Feast: April 1 (Anacleto González Flores).

SEE ALSO GUADALAJARA (MEXICO), MARTYRS OF, SS.; MEXICO (MODERN), THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ann Ball, Faces of Holiness: Modern Saints in Photos and Words, vol. 2 (Huntington, Ind. 2004).

Congregation for the Causes of Saints, "Santa Misa de Beatificación de 13 Mártires Mexicanos: Homilía del Card. José Saraiva Martins," Vatican Web site, November 20, 2005, available (in Spanish) from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/congregations/csaints/documents/rc_con_csaints_doc_20051120_beatificazioni_sp.html (accessed November 21, 2009).

Antonio Gómez Robledo, Anacleto González Flores: El maestro, 2nd ed. (Mexico City 1947).

José Herrera Rossi, Cinco retratos (Mexico City 1949).

Jean Meyer, comp., Anacleto Gonzalez Flores (1888–1927): El hombre que quiso ser el Gandhi Mexicano (Mexico City 2002).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "José Anacleto González Flores and Eight Companions," Vatican Web site, November 20, 2005, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_lit_doc_20051120_anacleto-gonzalez_en.html (accessed November 21, 2009).

Antonio Ríus Facius, Méjico cristero: Historia de la ACJM, 1925 a 1931 (Mexico City 1960).

Joseph H. Schlarman, Mexico, a Land of Volcanoes: From Cortés to Alemán (Milwaukee, Wisc. 1950).

Rt. Rev. James A. Magner
Vice Rector for Business and Finance and Assistant Treasurer
The Catholic University of America

Joseph M. Keating
The Catholic University of America (2010)

ANAGNI

Located on a hill, 1,500 feet above sea level and thirty-five miles south of ROME in the Lazio region, Anagni had been the favorite summer resort of several Roman emperors seeking to escape the heat and disease of the city; in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, it became a secondary papal residence. A walled town in the Roman imperial period, Anagni gained from the popes its Romanesque cathedral, built between 1071 and 1105, and a papal palace. The town rose in importance during the High MIDDLE AGES, as it was the birthplace of four popes—INNOCENT III (1198–1216), GREGORY IX (1227–1241), ALEXANDER IV (1254–1261), and BONIFACE VIII (1294–1303). The only English pope, ADRIAN IV (1154–1159), died there, and the town was also the setting for several important events in the struggle between papacy and empire.

In 1160, Pope ALEXANDER II excommunicated the Holy Roman Emperor, Frederick Barbarossa, in Anagni's cathedral; it was there also, in 1176, that a reconciliation was begun with the Pactum Anagninum (the Agreement of Anagni), which was the prelude to the Peace of Venice in 1177. Lotarius di Conti, of the powerful Conti family, became Pope Innocent III and made Anagni the first stop on an impressive "quasi-regal progress" throughout the Patrimony, which was intended to reassert papal power and ensure peace between important cities (Bolton 2005, p. 41).

Another member of the Conti family, Ugolino di Conti, became Pope Gregory IX and, in a spectacular ceremony on September 29, 1227, in Anagni cathedral, excommunicated the Holy Roman Emperor FREDERICK II on the grounds that he had abandoned his crusade; torches were shaken, cast down, and finally extinguished by the prelates. The reconciliation between Gregory IX and Frederick II in September 1230 also took place at Anagni, after the emperor had secured JERUSALEM, NAZARETH, and BETHLEHEM for Christianity through negotiation with the Egyptian sultan, Al-Kamil (1180–1238). Rinaldo de Jenne, another Anagni native and nephew of Gregory IX, who became Pope Alexander IV, won fame for his canonization at Anagni in 1255 of CLARE OF ASSISI.

Benedetto GAETANI, a member of a minor noble family of Anagni, served as a canon in the cathedral, eventually becoming Pope Boniface VIII. His elevation met opposition from French cardinals; the French king, PHILIP IV (the Fair; 1285–1314); and the powerful COLONNA family, strong supporters of the previous pope, CELESTINE V, whom Boniface had imprisoned after his abdication. When Philip granted himself the right to tax the French clergy, Boniface promulgated his famous papal bull, Unam Sanctam of 1302, which declared papal supremacy. Philip reacted first by calling an assembly, which issued twenty-nine inflammatory accusations against the pope, including magic, heresy, infidelity, immorality and causing the death of Celestine V, and then by sending an expedition to Anagni to arrest Boniface and remove him from office. The king's advisor, Guillaume de Nogaret (c. 1265–1313), along with Sciarra Colonna (d. 1329) and 2,000 mercenaries, attacked the palaces of the pope and his nephew on September 7, 1303, in what has been called the Outrage at Anagni. The pope was captured and was reportedly slapped by Sciarra Colonna, an episode that became known as Schiaffo di Anagni (Anagni's Slap). The capture of the pope inspired Dante to write in the Divine Comedy: "the new Pilate has imprisoned the Vicar of Christ" (Purgatory XX, vv. 85–93). The people of Anagni expelled the invaders and released the pope but, elderly and distraught, he died in Rome in October 1303.

The outrage at Anagni saw the beginning of a decline not only for the doctrine of papal supremacy—what C. Warren Hollister called "the antithesis of Canossa"—but also of the town itself, especially after the transfer of the papal court to AVIGNON (Hollister and Bennett 2006, p. 263). Anagni once again became the battlefield between a pope and a secular ruler in 1556, when it was besieged, bombarded, and sacked during the conflict between Pope PAUL IV and King PHILIP II of Spain; the town walls were then refortified by Pope PIUS IV in 1564.

SEE ALSO DANTE ALIGHIERI; FREDERICK I BARBAROSSA, ROMAN EMPEROR; UNAM SANCTAM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

ON PAPAL ITINERATION, SEE:

Brenda Bolton, "'The Caravan Rests': Innocent III's Use of Itineration," in Omnia Disce: Medieval Studies in Memory of Leonard Boyle, O.P. (Church, Faith and Culture in the Medieval West), edited by Anne J. Duggan, Joan Greatrex, and Brenda Bolton (Aldershot, Hampshire, U.K. 2005), 41–62.

On the treasure and art of Anagni cathedral and catacombs, see:

Lorenzo Cappelleti, Gli affreschi della cripta anagnina: Inconologia, (Rome 2002).

Luisa Montari, Il Tesore della Cattedrale di Anagni (Rome 1963).

On the Outrage at Anagni, see:

Dante Alighieri, Divine Comedy (1308–1321), available in Italian from http://www.divinecomedy.org/divine_comedy.html (accessed October 27, 2009).

C. Warren Hollister and Judith M. Bennett, Medieval Europe: A Short History, 10th edition (New York 2006), 263.

Richard A. Newhall, "The Affair of Anagni," The Catholic Historical Review 7 (October 1921): 277–295.

Teofilo F. Ruiz, "Reaction to Anagni," The Catholic Historical Review 65 (1979), 385–401.

Tracey-Anne Cooper
Department of History
St. John's University, Jamaica, N.Y (2010)

ANGLICANORUM COETIBUS

On November 9, 2009, the HOLY SEE made public the APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTION Anglicanorum coetibus of Pope BENEDICT XVI, providing a canonical structure for Anglicans wishing to enter into full communion with the Catholic Church. The constitution, dated November 4, 2009 (the memorial of St. Charles BORROMEO), was preceded by an October 20, 2009 "Note" of the Congregation for the DOCTRINE OF THE FAITH (CDF) explaining that the Apostolic Constitution was a response by the Catholic Church "to the many requests that had been submitted to the Holy See from groups of Anglican clergy and faithful in different parts of the world who wish to enter into full visible communion." Since the early 1980s such requests had been previously handled under a pastoral provision approved by JOHN PAUL II in 1980 that allowed small groups of Anglicans to form parishes (and in one case a diocese) that celebrated Mass according to a special Anglican use of the Roman MISSAL. This pastoral provision likewise allowed some former Anglican married clergy to be dispensed from the requirement of celibacy and be ordained Catholic priests.

In the years preceding Anglicanorum coetibus, petitions for full Catholic communion on the part of Anglicans had been growing considerably, including requests from some twenty to thirty Anglican bishops (Catholic News Service, October 20, 2009). The reasons for these requests include decisions on the part of some Anglicans to ordain women to the priesthood and the episcopacy as well as "departures from the common biblical teaching on human sexuality ... by the ordination of openly homosexual clergy and the blessing of homosexual partnerships" (CDF Note, October 20, 2009). According to the CDF, the purpose of Anglicanorum coetibus is to provide the more stable structure of Personal Ordinariates, "which will allow former Anglicans to enter into full Catholic communion while preserving elements of the distinctive Anglican spiritual and liturgical patrimony" (CDF Note, October 20, 2009).

On October 20, 2009, the same day as the CDF's "Note" was issued, Vincent Gerard Nichols, the Catholic archbishop of Westminster, and Rowan Williams, the Anglican archbishop of Canterbury, issued a joint statement making clear that the Apostolic Constitution would not hinder the commitment of the Catholic Church and the ANGLICAN COMMUNION to the ongoing dialogue and work of the ANGLICAN/ROMAN CATHOLIC INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION (ARCIC) and the International Anglican Roman Catholic Commission for Unity and Mission (IARCCUM). This joint statement likewise noted that the Apostolic Constitution was "further recognition of the substantial overlap in faith, doctrine and spirituality between the Catholic Church and the Anglican tradition."

John Paul II originally established something like the canonical structure of Personal Ordinariates, provided by Anglicanorum coetibus and its Complementary Norms, for the pastoral care of members of military forces via his 1986 Apostolic Constitution, Spirituali militum cura. According to Fr. Gianfranco Ghirlanda, S.J., a canon lawyer and rector of the Pontifical GREGORIAN UNIVERSITY, Personal Ordinariates are "specific ecclesiastical jurisdictions which are similar to dioceses" that are set up for "the spiritual good" of certain groups of the faithful (Ghirlanda, November 9, 2009). In the case of Anglicanorum coetibus, the Personal Ordinariates are meant to provide pastoral care for "lay faithful, clerics and members of Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life, originally belonging to the Anglican Communion and now in full communion with the Catholic Church, or those who receive the Sacraments of Initiation within the jurisdiction of the Ordinariate" (Anglicanorum coetibus, [AC] I no. 1). Those who are baptized Catholics outside of these Ordinariates "ordinarily are not eligible for membership, unless they are members of a family belonging to the Ordinariate" (AC, Complementary Norms, article 5 no. 1).

The canonical structure of a Personal Ordinariate is not the same as a Personal Prelature because the latter is made up of only "priests and deacons," and lay people may only dedicate themselves "to the apostolic works of a personal prelature by agreements entered into with the prelature" (Code of Canon Law, 1983, canon 296). The Personal Ordinariates set up in light of Anglicanorum coetibus likewise cannot be compared to particular ritual Churches such as the Eastern Catholic Churches because "the Anglican liturgical, spiritual and pastoral tradition is a particular reality within the Latin Church" (Ghirlanda, November 9, 2009). With regard to liturgical celebrations, Anglicanorum coetibus stipulates: "Without excluding liturgical celebrations according to the Roman Rite, the Ordinariate has the faculty to celebrate the Eucharist, the other Sacraments, the Liturgy of the Hours and other liturgical celebrations according to the liturgical books proper to the Anglican tradition, which have been approved by the Holy See" (AC, III). The liturgical celebrations of the Ordinariates will, therefore, be Anglican adaptations of the LATIN RITE, similar or identical to those already used by some existing groups of former Anglicans since the pastoral provision of 1980.

The canonical structures made possible by Anglicanorum coetibus go beyond the Pastoral Provision of 1980 because the Personal Ordinariates will possess what in canon law is known as a "public juridic personality," and they will be comparable in most respects to dioceses (cf. AC, I no. 3). These Ordinariates will be governed by an "Ordinary appointed by the Roman Pontiff," who will function like a bishop of a diocese, though he can be a priest and not a bishop (AC IV). Those who ministered as Anglican deacons, priests, and bishops can petition for Catholic ordination, and their ordinations will be absolute, not conditional, following the ruling of the 1896 Bull, Apostolicae curae, of Pope LEO XIII on the invalidity of Anglican ordinations. The discipline of clerical celibacy of the Latin Church will be retained as a rule (pro regula), but petitions can be directed to the Roman PONTIFF, "as a derogation from can. 277 no. 1, for the admission of married men to the order of presbyter on a case by case basis, according to objective criteria, approved by the Holy See" (AC, VI no. 2). Ministers who are unmarried must submit to the norm of clerical celibacy, following canon 277 no. 1 of the 1983 Code of Canon Law (AC, VI no. 1). Former Anglican bishops who are married can petition for ordination as Catholic priests but not as bishops because of the ancient and long-standing tradition of both the Catholic Church and the separated EASTERN CHURCHES. Former Anglican bishops, however, can petition to participate in meetings of conferences of bishops "with the equivalent status of a retired bishop," and they can request permission "from the Holy See to use the insignia of the Episcopal office" (Complementary Norms, article 11 nos. 3–4).

The Personal Ordinariates for former Anglicans who have entered into full Catholic communion "are erected by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith within the confines of the territorial boundaries of a particular Conference of Catholic Bishops in consultation with that same Conference" (AC, I no. 1). The Catechism of the Catholic Church serves as "the authoritative expression of the Catholic faith professed by members of the Ordinariate" (AC, I no. 5). The Personal Ordinariates are subject to the CDF "and the other dicasteries of the Roman Curia in accordance with their competencies" (AC, II). They are governed by "the norms of universal law," the constitution Anglicanorum coetibus and its Complementary Norms "as well any specific Norms given for each Ordinariate" (AC, II).

The power (potestas) of the ordinary of the Personal Ordinariates is, according to canonical language, ordinary, vicarious (i.e., exercised in the name of the Roman pontiff), and personal (AC, V). This power is "to be exercised jointly with that of the local Diocesan Bishop in those cases provided for in the Complementary Norms" (AC, V). Thus, the ordinary "must maintain close ties of communication with the Bishop of the Diocese in which the Ordinariate is present in order to coordinate its pastoral activity with the pastoral program of the Diocese" (Complementary Norms, article 3). After consulting with the local diocesan bishop and with the consent of the Holy See, the ordinary may erect "personal parishes for the faithful who belong to the Ordinariate" (AC, VIII no. 1). The ordinary is assisted by a "Governing Council" consisting of at least six priests (AC, X, nos. 1–2). He "is a member of the respective Episcopal Conference" (Complementary Norms, article 2 no. 2), and he is required to go to ROME every five years for an ad limina Apostolorum visit to the Roman Pontiff and the Holy See (AC, XI).

In terms of clergy, the ordinary is responsible for presenting to the Holy See requests for "the admission of married men to the Ordinariate" (Complementary Norms, article 6 no. 1), but those "who have been previously ordained in the Catholic Church and subsequently have become Anglicans, may not be accepted for Holy orders in the Ordinariate" (Complementary Norms, article 6 no. 2). Candidates for priestly ordination in the Personal Ordinariates "will receive their theological formation with other seminarians at a seminary or theological faculty" in consultation with the local diocesan bishop or bishops concerned (Complementary Norms, article 10 no. 2), but provisions should be made, either by a special seminary program or house of formation, "for the purpose of transmitting Anglican patrimony" (Complementary Norms, article 10 no. 2).

Many have praised Anglicanorum coetibus as an important ecumenical step toward the full reconciliation of Anglicans with the Catholic Church. Others have been more guarded in their assessment because of concerns over how the Constitution might affect current Catholic-Anglican relations (Catholic News Service, October 22, 2009). The Swiss theologian, Hans KÜNG, in a published editorial, condemned the Constitution as an example of "the Vatican thirst for power" and an effort to restore "the Roman imperium" (The Guardian, October 27, 2009). The VATICAN newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano, denounced Küng's editorial as inaccurate and "far from reality" (L'Osservatore Romano, October 29, 2009).

SEE ALSO AD LIMINA VISIT; ANGLICANISM; APOSTOLICAE CURAE; CANON LAW, 1983 CODE; CATECHISM OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH; CURIA, ROMAN; LITURGY OF THE HOURS; ROMAN RITE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Benedict XVI, Anglicanorum coetibus, For Anglicans Entering into Full Communion with the Catholic Church (Apostolic Constitution, November 4, 2009), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/benedict_xvi/apost_constitutions/documents/hf_ben-xvi_apc_20091104_anglicanorum-coetibus_en.html (accessed November 12, 2009).

Canon Law Society of America, Code of Canon Law: Latin-English Edition (Washington, D.C. 1984); also available in English from http://www.vatican.va/archive/ENG1104/_P10.HTM.

Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, "Note about the Personal Ordinariates for Anglicans Entering the Catholic Church," Vatican Web site, October 20, 2009, available from http://212.77.1.245/news_services/bulletin/news/24513.php?index=24513&lang=en (accessed November 4, 2009).

Gianfranco Ghirlanda, S.J., "The Significance of the Apostolic Constitution Anglicanorum Coetibus," Vatican Web site, November 4, 2009, available from http://212.77.1.245/news_services/bulletin/news/24626.php?index=24626&lang=en (accessed November 9, 2009).

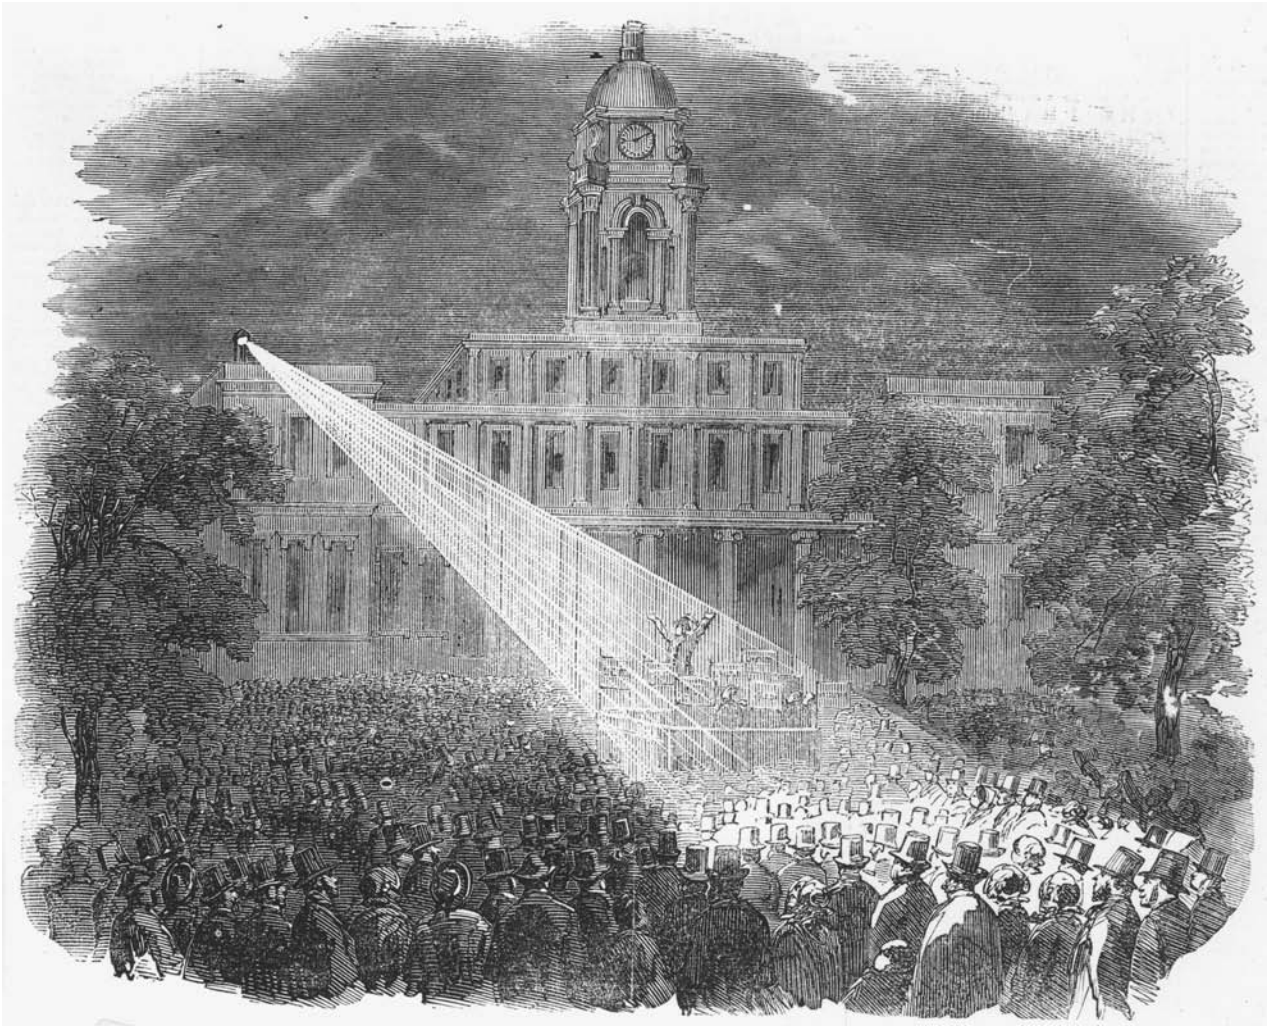
Hans Küng, "The Vatican Thirst for Power Divides Christianity and Damages Catholicism," The Guardian, October 27, 2009, available from http://www.guardian.co.uk/commentisfree/belief/2009/oct/27/catholicism-pope-anglicanism-church (accessed November 4, 2009).

Vincent Gerard Nichols and Rowan Williams, "Joint Statement by the Archbishop of Westminster and the Archbishop of Canterbury," Vatican Web site, October 20, 2009, available from http://212.77.1.245/news_services/bulletin/news/24514.php?index=24514&lang=en (accessed November 4, 2009).

Giovanni Maria Vian, "Lontano della realtà," L'Osservatore Romano, October 29, 2009, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/or/or_quo/editoriali/29_10_2009.html (accessed November 4, 2009).

Cindy Wooden, "Pope Establishes Structure for Catholics Uniting with Rome," Catholic News Services, October 20, 2009, available from http://www.catholicnews.com/data/stories/cns/0904673.htm (accessed November 4, 2009).

Carol Zimmerman, "Vatican Decision to Receive Anglicans Prompts US, Canadian Reaction" Catholic News Services, October 22, 2009, available from http://www.catholicnews.com/data/stories/cns/0904725.htm (accessed November 4, 2009).



Robert L. Fastiggi
Professor of Systematic Theology
Sacred Heart Major Seminary, Detroit, Mich. (2010)

ANTI-CATHOLICISM (UNITED STATES)

Although the United States has long prided itself on its separation of church and state and its tradition of religious freedom, it has always suffered from various forms of bigotry, including anti-Catholicism and ANTI-SEMITISM. Anti-Catholicism, as well as nativism, was inherited from England, where it had long flourished, particularly in light of the many wars that nation had with France and Spain. The result was that, in almost all the American colonies, Catholics were the victims of discriminatory laws. In general, they were excluded from the suffrage (voting) and from holding political office.

Colonial History. In a 1974 book, the historian Ray Allen Billington (1903–1981) highlighted an 1842 Virginia law that disenfranchised all Catholics and threatened any priest who entered the colony with expulsion after five days. Even in Maryland, which was founded by the Catholic Lord Calvert in 1632 and was originally open to all, by 1675 only Protestants were allowed to hold office. Massachusetts barred all Catholics, particularly singling out the JESUITS, who were threatened with execution if they returned after having been expelled, and in 1659 the colony forbade the celebration of the hated Catholic holiday of Christmas.

The Glorious Revolution of 1688 in England, with its anti-Catholic Bill of Rights prohibiting the ascension of Catholic kings, strengthened the anti-Catholic movement in the colonies. In New York, the Duke of York appointed the Catholic Thomas Dongan as governor in 1682, who signed a charter of Liberties granting religious toleration. Following the Glorious Revolution, in 1689 the Protestant population in New York rose up, and Jacob Leisler, a bitter anti-Catholic, seized power and called an assembly that expelled all non-Protestants from office and passed a law denying the suffrage to their coreligionists. Though Leisler was superseded by the new governor, Henry Sloughter, the latter continued the anti-Catholic rules. Further, at the end of the century, laws were passed threatening any priest coming into the colony with life imprisonment, while those sheltering such priests were liable to a fine of 250 pounds and three days in the pillory.

Know-Nothings. A torchlight meeting of the Know-Nothings in New York City. Formally called the American Party, the Know-Nothings received their name from their practice of secrecy, claiming to "know nothing" when questioned about their politics. The party discriminated against immigrants and Roman Catholics, opposing all foreign influences. MPI/HULTON ARCHIVE/GETTY IMAGES

In New Hampshire, according to a 1680 law, only Protestants could vote, and in 1696 all inhabitants were required to take an oath that included a declaration against the pope and the doctrines of the Roman Catholic religion. In North Carolina, in 1896, toleration was extended to all Christians except Papists. Rhode Island and Pennsylvania constituted exceptions, but even in Pennsylvania, after the Glorious Revolution and upon the order of the new English government, an oath was imposed upon office holders requiring them to specifically abjure the doctrine of TRANSUBSTANTIATION, the adoration of MARY and the saints, and the sacrifice of the Mass (the celebration of the Eucharist consisting of wine and bread, the blood and body of Jesus Christ). Though the legislature protested, it was forced to comply. In addition, the order, which was repeated in 1701 and 1703, barred Catholics from holding office.

During the eighteenth century, wars with France and Spain stiffened the anti-Catholic prejudice. In 1701, New Jersey proposed that only Catholics should not be exempt from penal laws concerning religion. In Delaware, only Protestant organizations, including churches, could receive or hold real estate. In Maine, a Roman church was burned, and in Maryland, a 1704 act forbade any Catholic priest from exercising his duties and levied a tax of 20 shillings on Irish servants imported into the colony. In 1743, Connecticut denied toleration to Papists, and many colonies disarmed them.

The Revolutionary Period. The influence of the Enlightenment on the American Revolution and the arrival of the French as allies during the Revolution caused enough of a decline in bigotry to enable the writers of the U.S. Constitution, in the First Amendment, to forbid Congress from interfering with religious liberty. Nevertheless, several states still included anti-Catholic provisions in their own constitutions, with Massachusetts and Connecticut not abolishing their Congregational state religion until 1818 and 1834, respectively. Meanwhile, the Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798, passed during the so-called Quasi-War with France, gave the president the right to expel foreigners. Moreover, the period required for naturalization was extended from five years to fourteen years.

Bigotry reached new heights in the 1830s. Numerous anti-Catholic publications appeared at this time, the most notorious of which was the Awful Disclosures of the Hotel Dieu Nunnery of Montreal by Maria Monk, the alleged story of a girl mistreated in a Montreal convent. Samuel F.B. Morse, the inventor of the famous code, published anti-Catholic letters in which he charged that European monarchies wanted to send Catholic immigrants to the West to subvert American democracy. Lyman BEECHER, a clergyman famed for his oratory (and the father of Harriet Beecher Stowe), echoed these accusations in A Plea for the West (1835), in which he also denounced the influence of Catholic schools on American children. In the meantime, anti-Catholicism had turned violent. In 1834 a mob burned the Ursuline Convent in Charleston, Massachusetts, after a rumor spread that a nun was being held at the cloister against her will.

Immigration and the Know-Nothings. The growth in immigration, especially of Irish Catholics, tended to increase the existing bigotry against their faith. This manifested itself particularly in connection with a struggle over the reading of the BIBLE in schools, with Catholics objecting to the use of the King James Version. As a result of this controversy, the American Republican Party was founded in New York in 1843. The new party advocated a series of anti-Catholic laws, including the lengthening of the naturalization period to a twenty-one-year probationary period, the repeal of an 1842 law allowing each city ward to select its own education commissioners, and the election and appointment of none but native-born citizens to public office. The party spread to several other places, notably Philadelphia, where a riot broke out in 1844, resulting in the destruction by fire of two Catholic churches.

The increase in immigration also led to the establishment of the Order of the Star Spangled Banner, a secret organization whose members came to be called "Know-Nothings" because their usual answer to questions about the group was "I know nothing." Taken over by a similar group, the Order of United Americans, the organization grew rapidly. Its members had to be native-born American Protestants and believe in resisting Catholic influence. The group got involved in politics in 1853 and 1854, supporting candidates who shared its views, and by 1855 it openly called itself the American Party, though it was commonly known as the Know-Nothing Party. It achieved considerable success, particularly after the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska Act in 1854, when it attracted many former Whigs, especially in the South.

In 1854 the Know-Nothings captured the legislature and governorship of Massachusetts, and by 1855 all of New England except Maine and Vermont was under its control. Hoping to win the presidency in 1856 on a Union-saving platform, the party nominated the former president Millard Fillmore, but many of its antislavery members deserted to join the Republican Party. Though Fillmore captured over 21 percent of the vote, the party gradually declined after the election.

During the lead-up to the Civil War, sectionalism became a stronger force than nativism, though the latter never disappeared entirely. In the postwar period there was a revival of nativist sentiments, though during Reconstruction the original KU KLUX KLAN was more concerned with blacks and white Republicans than Catholics or Jews. The AMERICAN PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION (APA) was founded in Clinton, Iowa, in the 1880s. The organization quickly expanded, claiming some half a million members in 1893, after William J. Traynor became the leader of the order. Members had to take an oath pledging they would never vote for any Catholic, and the group's propaganda included a forged encyclical by Pope LEO XIII that allegedly absolved all Catholics from loyalty to their countries. Meant to prove the existence of a popish plot, which had long been a fear of the nativists, this forgery led to riots in 1894. Despite this early success and growth, the APA soon lost influence, and it had passed out of existence by 1911.

The Twentieth Century. Nativism took on a racial perspective during the twentieth century, so that nativist factions often tended to classify those from various Catholic nations, such as Italians and Poles, as inferior. In 1915, William J. Simmons founded a new Ku Klux Klan near Atlanta, Georgia. Like the original Klan, Simmons's group directed their ire against Negroes, but they soon expanded their attacks to include Catholics and Jews. The Klan grew rapidly in the 1920s, and by 1923 it had reached a membership of some three million. Its influence was so strong that delegates at the 1924 Democratic Convention were afraid to condemn it.

This was a period of extreme nationalism that saw the passage of various immigration restriction acts. The Immigration Restriction Act of 1921 set up a quota of only 3 percent of the total number of each immigrant group living in the nation, based on the 1910 census. The 1924 Immigration Act, which replaced the temporary 1921 law, reduced quotes still further, to 2 percent of the number of each group in the nation in 1890, and quotas were now to be based on national origin. The total annual quota was reduced from 358,000 to 164,000. These quotas finally went into effect in 1929, and they only increased the discrimination against Catholics and Jews. Although it had been argued that the very nomination of a Catholic for president in 1928 was a sign of a decline in bigotry, there is no question that Alfred E. Smith was defeated in part because of his religion.

After 1929, anti-Catholicism began to decline. This trend culminated in the 1960 presidential election, which saw a Catholic, John F. KENNEDY, elected president of the United States. Nevertheless, it has been estimated that Kennedy lost a million and a half votes because of his religion.

The survival of anti-Catholicism in the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries has been characterized as a liberal aberration. In his book The New Anti-Catholicsm: The Last Acceptable Prejudice (2003), Philip Jenkins argues that it is especially prevalent among academics and scholars connected with colleges, universities, or other institutions of learning, and among some important journalists, for example, Tony Kushner, George Seldes, and Daniel J. Goldhagen, and others. Its extent and impact are questionable, however, and the surviving branches of the Ku Klux Klan tend to be anti-Semitic rather than anti-Catholic. To combat anti-Catholicism, Father Virgil C. Blum, a Jesuit, founded the Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights in 1973. The organization is dedicated to the right of Catholics to participate in American public life without defamation or discrimination.

The main supporters of nativism have historically been lower middle-class or skilled working-class people, although the twenty-first century manifestation has attracted academics and social leaders. The fears upon which the nativists relied in the past were generally ideas of a popish plot and the alleged submission of Catholics to the Vatican rather than to Washington. The presence of such sentiments throughout U.S. history demonstrates that the nation has never been as free from bigotry as is sometimes assumed.

SEE ALSO AMERICANISM; ANTICLERICALISM; ANTI-JUDAISM; CATHOLIC LEAGUE; KNOW-NOTHINGISM; NATIVISM, AMERICAN; UNITED STATES CONFERENCE OF CATHOLIC BISHOPS (USCCB); UNITED STATES RELATIONS WITH THE PAPACY; URSULINES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Tyler Anbinder, Nativism and Slavery: The Northern Know Nothings and the Politics of the 1850's (New York 1992).

David H. Bennett, Party of Fear: From Nativist Movements to the New Right in American History (Chapel Hill, N.C. 1988).

Ray Allen Billington, The Origins of Nativism in the United States 1800–1844 (New York 1974).

Catholic League Web site, available from http://www.catholicleague.org (accessed March 3, 2008).

David M. Chalmers, Hooded Americanism: The History of the Ku Klux Klan, 3rd ed. (Durham, N.C. 1987).

John Higham, Strangers in the Land: Patterns of American Nativism 1860–1925, 2nd ed. (New Brunswick, N.J. 1988).

Michael F. Holt, "The Antimasonic and Know Nothing Parties," in History of U.S. Political Parties, edited by Arthur M. Schlesinger Jr., 4 vols. (New York 1973), 575–737.

Philip Jenkins, The New Anti-Catholicism: The Last Acceptable Prejudice (New York 2003).

Donald L. Kinzer, An Episode in Anti-Catholicism: The American Protective Association (Seattle 1964).

Dale T. Knobel, "America for the Americans": The Nativist Movement in the United States (New York 1996).

Hans L. Trefousse
Distinguished Professor Emeritus, Department of History
Brooklyn College and Graduate Center, City University of New York (2010)

ANTI-JUDAISM

Anti-Judaism is prejudice against Jewish peoples based on their distinctive religious practices, resulting in political and legal measures against the practice of JUDAISM and the social and civil rights of Jews. Dating back to the pre-Christian Greco-Roman world, some scholars understand it as a precursor to—but distinctive from—ANTI-SEMITISM, the term coined in the writings of German journalist Wilhelm Marr in 1879 to describe hostility toward Jews on the basis of supposed biological (or racial), political, cultural, and economic differences between Jews and their Gentile neighbors in an increasingly secularized Europe. Other scholars argue that centuries-old anti-Judaism and nineteenth-century-born anti-Semitism, while distinctive from one another in the root causes of their anti-Jewish animosity, differ not at all in their deadly effect on Jews.

While singular instances of anti-Judaic prejudice and polemics can be found in pre-Gospel Greek and Roman literature, systematic hostility toward Jews dates back to differing interpretations of the CRUCIFIXION, at Roman hands and in the Roman form of CAPITAL PUNISHMENT, of the Jewish RABBI Jesus of Nazareth on Golgotha. According to the Christian New Testament in the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, written circa AD 65 to 95—and this particular account comes from the Book of Matthew—the Jewish rabbi Jesus of Nazareth was arrested by "a large crowd armed with swords and clubs, [who had been] sent from the chief priests and the elders of the people" (Matthew 26: 47, NIV Study Bible).These CHIEF PRIESTS and elders of the people would likely have come from two Jewish sects: SADDUCEES, the Jewish priestly ARISTOCRACY in Roman-occupied PALESTINE; and PHARISEES, the rabbinical and scribal class of legal experts. During the lifetime of Jesus of Nazareth, Palestine was ruled by HEROD ANTIPAS, TETRARCH of Galilee and Perea. The provinces of Samaria, Judea, and Idumea were ruled by a Roman prefect. Pontius PILATE was one such prefect, ruling over Judea. Ultimate authority lay with ROME. Sadducees and Pharisees struggled with one another and also against other sects within Judaism, including that led by John the Baptist in Perea (the Baptism Movement) and Jesus of Nazareth in Galilee (the Kingdom Movement), for supremacy. The young religious leader and rabbi Jesus of Nazareth was taken before the Sanhedrin, a Jewish legal body of that day, who, according to the Book of Matthew, "came to the decision to put him to death" (Matthew 27:1, NIV Study Bible).

Unauthorized to carry out capital punishment, the Sanhedrin brought him before the Roman governor of Judea, Pontius Pilate. The following is an account from the Book of Matthew:

> While [the Roman judge] Pilate was sitting on the judge's seat, his wife sent him this message: "Don't have anything to do with that innocent man..." but the chief priests and the elders persuaded the crowd to ... have Jesus executed... "What shall I do, then, with Jesus who is called Christ?" Pilate asked. They all answered, "Crucify him!" "Why? What crime has he committed?" asked Pilate. But they shouted all the louder, "Crucify him!" When Pilate saw that he was getting nowhere ... he took water and washed his hands in front of the crowd. "I am innocent of this man's blood," he said. "It is your responsibility." All the people answered, "Let his blood be on us and our children!" (Matthew 27:19–25, NIV Study Bible).

As is well known, what followed was the crucifixion, at Roman hands, of the Jewish rabbi Jesus of Nazareth on Golgotha. This particular rendering of the death of Jesus of Nazareth contained the kernels of what some scholars have traditionally called "Christian anti-Judaism," or prejudice against the Jewish peoples based on the false charge of deicide, the murder of Jesus of Nazareth.

Verbal assaults on the Jews as a whole people date to the first century AD and first appeared as a pattern in the Gospel of John and the writings of Saint Paul. Gathering force over the first three centuries, the writings of Saint AUGUSTINE of Hippo (AD 354–430) and other Church fathers demonstrate clear animosity toward Jews and Judaism. Attacks on Jews as a notable pattern of Christian behavior date to the fourth century AD, during the rule of the Roman Emperor Constantine, and for politically expedient reasons. The fourth century also marked the birth of the SERMON genre known as Adversus Judeaos, pitting Christian against Jew and claiming the Church as the true Israel and best characterized by Saint John CHRYSOSTOM (AD 349–407), patriarch of CONSTANTINOPLE and Father and DOCTOR OF THE CHURCH. Ritualized Christian violence against Jewish peoples dates to the First Crusade, the military expedition bound for the Holy Land in the spring of 1096. The Crusades marked both mass murder of entire Jewish communities, especially in the Rhineland, and an intensified anti-Jewish polemic that colored the next millennium. Europeans in the medieval era commonly believed that Jews were "servants of the Devil." All over Europe, Gentiles expelled Jews: from England in 1290, from France in 1394, from Prague in 1400, from Vienna in 1421, from Spain in 1492, and from Portugal in 1497. In 1516 the Papal States were the first to establish a Jewish GHETTO, the term ghetto itself named after an unused foundry near which Venetian Jewry was required to settle. Mass murder of Jews took place in northern France and Germany in 1096, during the Black Plague between 1348 and 1350, in Spain in 1391, in Ukraine between 1648 and 1656, and in a series of pogroms in Russia from 1871 to 1906, to cite only some examples.

At the same time, Christian doctrine taught that Jews were not to be forcibly converted, but were to exist as a witness to the truth of Christianity (exceptions to this include some forms of the INQUISITION). Pope GREGORY I decreed that Jews "ought to suffer no injury in those things that have been granted to them." In short, Christian doctrine promoted the survival of Jews, but under restricted and usually poor conditions. By the MIDDLE AGES, accusations were commonplace against Jews as the cause of Christian misfortunes—as devotees of an illegitimate RELIGION, as perjurers, as extractors of excessive interest from Christian clients in the disdained occupation of money-lending, as not fully human (examples being Christian imaginings of Jews as having hooves, horns, or tails), or as murderers of Christian children and drinkers of their blood. The first accusation of ritual murder (that Jews required the blood of a Christian child for ritual purposes, especially for the baking of matzo at Passover) arose in Norwich, England, in 1150. Accusations of ritual crucifixions, cannibalism, profanation of the Host, and, by the time of the Black Plague, poisoning of wells, were not officially supported by the PAPACY at this time, but certain steps taken by the HOLY SEE in Rome facilitated their acceptance. For example, the Fourth Lateran Council of 1215 decreed distinctive clothing for Jews and instituted the Inquisition, directed against Christian heretics, including those Jews who had freely or had been forcibly converted to Christianity but then returned to their original FAITH (Los conversos or Marranos).

After the eleventh century, increased enforcement of the prohibition against Christian engagement in USURY (interest taking) and the growth of artisan guilds exclusive to Christians placed Jews outside of the economic mainstream and forced them into frowned-upon occupations such as money-lending. Reformation leader Martin LUTHER, disappointed in his failure to convert Jews to Protestantism, published On the Jews and Their Lies in 1543, repeating medieval anti-Jewish notions but also explicitly preaching violence. The Catholic COUNTER REFORMATION saw the revival of the Inquisition, which addressed the supposed danger of the MARRANOS, Jews who (often forcibly) had been converted to Christianity but were suspected of (or were) continuing to be faithful to Judaism. The Jesuit order, founded in 1534 to spearhead the defense of the Roman Catholic Church, instituted the "purity of blood" test, restricting membership in their order to those of proven Christian parentage.

In the year 1791, in the course of the FRENCH REVOLUTION, Jews in France and French-occupied territories were, for the first time in modern European history, granted full civil rights. The French Revolution marks the onset of a critical turning point in the history of Jew-hatred. As the ENLIGHTENMENT, SECULARISM, and the movement for Jewish equality moved from west to east in Europe and emancipation spread, Jews began, for the first time, to enter Christian society. Systematic anti-Semitic literature appeared first in France, published not only by anti-revolutionary Catholic conservatives but also by left-wing anti-capitalist radicals. With the outbreak of the revolutions of 1848, anti-Semitism became a pan-European phenomenon that equated Jews with economic dominance, political radicalism, as controlling of the media, as engaged in a world conspiracy, and as culturally and even racially distinct. Organized anti-Semitism in the form of mass politics emerged in this atmosphere, meaning, specifically anti-Semitic political parties.

Whatever its label, all anti-Jewish teaching in the Catholic Church was formally repudiated under the Second Vatican Ecumenical Council (Vatican II), opened under Pope JOHN XXIII on October 11, 1962, and closed by Pope PAUL VI on December 8, 1965. The Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions (Nostra aetate), one of sixteen documents emerging from Vatican II, decreed "the Church... decries hatred, persecution, displays of anti-Semitism, directed against Jews at any time and by anyone" (4).

The views expressed are the author's alone and do not necessarily represent those of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum or any other organization.

SEE ALSO ANTI-SEMITISM; CHURCH, HISTORY OF, II (MEDIEVAL); CONSTANTINE I, THE GREAT, ROMAN EMPEROR; CONVERTS AND CONVERSION; CRUSADES; EPISTLES, NEW TESTAMENT; FATHERS OF THE CHURCH; GENTILES; GREEK PHILOSOPHY; GREGORY (THE GREAT) I, ST. POPE; HOLOCAUST (SHOAH); JESUITS; JEWISH-CATHOLIC RELATIONS; JEWS, POST-BIBLICAL HISTORY OF THE; JOHN, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO; JOHN THE BAPTIST, ST.; LATERAN COUNCILS; LUKE, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO; MARK, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO; MATTHEW, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO; NEW TESTAMENT BOOKS; PASSOVER, FEAST OF; PAUL, APOSTLE, ST.; REFORMATION, PROTESTANT (ON THE CONTINENT); RESPONSA, JEWISH; VATICAN COUNCIL II.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

John Dominic Crossan, Who Killed Jesus? Exposing the Roots of Anti-Semitism in the Gospel Story of the Death of Jesus (San Francisco 1996).

Edward H. Flannery, The Anguish of the Jews: Twenty-Three Centuries of Antisemitism Rev. and updated ed. (New York 2004 [1965]).

Gavin I. Langmuir, History, Religion, and Antisemitism (Berkeley, Calif. 1990).

Marvin Perry and Frederick M. Schweitzer, Antisemitism: Myth and Hate from Antiquity to the Present (New York 2002).

Léon Poliakov, The History of Anti-Semitism, vol. 1, From the Time of Christ to the Court Jews, translated by Richard Howard (Philadelphia 2003).

Léon Poliakov, The History of Anti-Semitism, vol. 2, From Mohammed to the Marranos, translated by Natalie Gerardi (Philadelphia 2003).

Peter Schäfer, Judeophobia: Attitudes toward the Jews in the Ancient World (Cambridge, Mass. 1997).

Vatican Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews, "Guidelines and Suggestions for Implementing the Conciliar Declaration Nostra Aetate, No. 4" (Rome 1974). Also available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/pontifical_councils/chrstuni/relations-jews-docs/rc_pc_chrstuni_doc_19741201_nostra-aetate_en.html (accessed March 26, 2008).

Vatican Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews, "Notes on the Correct Way to Present the Jews and Judaism in the Preaching and Catechesis of the Catholic Church" (Rome 1985). Also available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/pontifical_councils/chrstuni/relations-jews-docs/rc_pc_chrstuni_doc_19820306_jews-judaism_en.html (accessed March 26, 2008).

Vatican Council II, Nostra aetate, On the Relation of the Church to Non-Christian Religions (Declaration, October 28, 1965), available from http://www.vatican.va/archive/hist_councils/ii_vatican_council/documents/vat-ii_decl_19651028_nostra-aetate_en.html (accessed March 26, 2008).

Suzanne Brown-Fleming
United States Holocaust Memorial Museum,
Center for Advanced Holocaust Studies
Washington, D.C. (2010)

ANTI-SEMITISM

Anti-Semitism in its broadest sense is a prejudice against Jewish peoples that has existed since the separation of Christianity from JUDAISM. Prior to its nineteenth-century forms (political, economic, cultural, racial, eliminationist), anti-Jewish prejudice is defined as disdainful, religion-based, and sometimes politically and legally enforced ANTI-JUDAISM. Other scholars argue that centuries-old anti-Judaism and nineteenth-century-born anti-Semitism, although distinctive from one another in the root causes of their anti-Jewish animosity, differ not at all in their deadly effect on Jews.

French Revolution: A Turning Point. In the year 1791, during the course of the FRENCH REVOLUTION, Jews in France and French-occupied territories were, for the first time in modern European history, granted full civil rights. The French Revolution marks the onset of a critical turning point in the history of Jew hatred. As the ENLIGHTENMENT, SECULARISM, and the movement for Jewish equality spread from west to east in Europe, and as emancipation grew, Jews began for the first time to enter Christian society as equals. Systematic anti-Semitic literature appeared first in France, published not only by antirevolutionary Catholic conservatives but also by left-wing anticapitalist radicals.

Anti-Semitism as a Phenomenon. With the outbreak of the revolutions of 1848, anti-Semitism became a pan-European phenomenon that equated Jews with economic dominance, political radicalism, as controlling of the media, as engaged in a "world conspiracy," and as culturally and even racially distinct.

Organized anti-Semitism in the form of mass politics emerged in this atmosphere, meaning anti-Semitic political parties. The term anti-Semitism first appeared in the writings of German journalist Wilhelm Marr (1819–1904) in 1879 to describe hostility toward Jews on the basis of what he considered irreconcilable racial differences between Jews and their neighbors in an increasingly secularized Europe. Two important books, David Kertzer's The Popes Against the Jews (2001), and Frank J. Coppa's The Papacy, the Jews, and the Holocaust (2006), describe the print campaigns against Jews during the pontificate of Pope LEO XIII and carrying on in milder form through the eve of World War II. Journals closely associated with the HOLY SEE, L'Osservatore Romano and La Civiltà Cattolica, as well as some forty major Catholic newspapers and periodicals, published writings about Jews characterized by modern forms of political, economic, cultural, and racial anti-Semitism. Coppa notes that Popes Leo XIII and PIUS X did not encourage the clerical print campaign against Jews and worked successfully to soften it; distanced themselves from statements or demonstrations of open hostility toward Jews; and harbored few such sentiments personally. Yet, Kertzer argues that Leo XIII allowed his secretary of state, Mariano RAMPOLLA DEL TINDARO to actively support the Austrian Christian Social Party, which was heavily characterized by its anti-Semitism. Neither Pope LEO XII nor Pope Pius X publicly repudiated the again-popular blood libel charge, even when approached to do so.

Twentieth Century and the Holocaust. In the twentieth century, the Great Depression and the simultaneous rise of European fascism and Nazism in Germany (although anti-Semitism was by no means absent in communist-ruled countries) opened the door to the use of anti-Semitism as a rallying cry for the disaffected. It was a ladder by which ambitious members of the lower middle and middle classes could further their careers and economic circumstances in regimes ruled by right-wing dictators. It was also a political platform on which those who agreed on little else could agree on their distaste for Jews.

Nor were Christians immune to anti-Semitism. The killing grounds of the HOLOCAUST (SHOAH) were predominantly Roman Catholic and Orthodox Christian territories: Austria, the Balkans, Byelorussia, Czechoslovakia, France, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Poland, Romania, Ukraine, and Yugoslavia. Christians, then, were guilty of more than anti-Semitic notions; they were also guilty of participation in the murder process itself.

In his quantitative study of 1,581 men and women involved in the Nazis' attempted GENOCIDE, Michael Mann (2000) concluded that among Holocaust perpetrators, a majority came from Catholic regions. Historian Aleksander Lasik's (1994) study of Auschwitz Schutzstaffel (SS) men showed that Catholics were more likely to become perpetrators than were their Protestant counterparts. Doris Bergen (1996) notes that Protestants and Orthodox Christians, too, served in the SS alongside Catholics and anti-Christian neo-pagans. They took part in mass shootings of Jewish and Slavic civilians, worked as guards in concentration camps, and, as bureaucrats, coordinated expulsions, imposed mass starvation, and ordered deadly labor assignments. In the postwar period, a massive campaign for clemency, spearheaded by members of the Catholic and Protestant hierarchy in Germany and supported by the Holy See in ROME, tried to argue that such men did not deserve the punishments meted out to them in postwar war crimes trials. They were "good men," argued thousands of letters, caught up in a criminal regime, but not criminals themselves.

Regarding the response of the Holy See to Nazism and its anti-Semitism specifically, knowledge is not yet conclusive due to ongoing research in the recently released Vatican Secret Archives for the 1922–1939 period (fully opened in 2006) and the still-sealed materials for the wartime and postwar period spanning the papacy of Pope PIUS XII. Even so, debate has raged since 1963, the year marking the appearance of Rolf Hochhuth's (1931–) play Der Stellvertreter (The Deputy). Here, historians will have to await the proper scrutiny of the documentation to render a proper history of the Holy See, the European churches, and the Nazi and Axis regimes with regard to their anti-Semitic ideology and concrete disenfranchisement, incarceration, ghettoization, and murder processes.

Repudiation of Vatican II. Whatever its label, all anti-Jewish teaching in the Catholic Church was formally repudiated under the Second Vatican Ecumenical Council (Vatican II), opened under Pope JOHN XXIII on October 11, 1962, and closed by Pope PAUL VI on December 8, 1965. VATICAN COUNCIL II's Nostra aetate (Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions), of 1965, is understood by some scholars as the culmination of changes that began as early as the Holy Office's 1928 condemnation of Friends of Israel, which stated explicitly that the Holy See "particularly reproves hatred against a people once chosen by God, known as anti-Semitism" (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 20 (1928): 103–4, cited in Coppa, p. 147).

In the encyclical Humani generis unitas (The Unity of the Human Race), drafted in 1938 during the papacy of Pope PIUS XI but never issued, the authors made the following statement admonishing faithful Roman Catholics not to "remain silent" in the face of racism: "The struggle for racial purity ends by being uniquely the struggle against the Jews" (galley copies of La Farge's copy of Humani generis unitas, cited in Coppa 2006, pp. 169–170).

In what has now become a famous audience with a group of pilgrims from the Belgian Catholic Radio in September 1938—and moving away from decades-earlier prejudiced commentary about Jews evident in his correspondence while serving as papal nuncio to Poland—Pope Pius XI would utter the famous phrase, "Anti-Semitism is a hateful movement, with which we Christians must have nothing to do.... Through Christ and in Christ we are the spiritual descendents of Abraham.... Spiritually, we are all Semites" ("La Libre Belgique," September 14, 1938, cited in Cavaglion and Romagnani 1988, pp. 130–131; Zucottti 2000, p. 45). Nostra aetate, one of sixteen documents emerging from Vatican II, decreed "the Church ... decries hatred, persecution, displays of anti-Semitism, directed against Jews at any time and by anyone"(section 4, paragraph 7, Nostra aetate: Declaration On the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions, 1965).

Although anti-Semitism as a specifically Christian phenomenon linked to pre-Vatican II Christian history has declined markedly since the late 1960s, it is again resurgent in the world today, in both secular and religious circles. Contemporary anti-Semitism is often expressed in the vilification of the state of ISRAEL as a "Nazi" state that does not have the right to exist.

The views expressed are the author's alone and do not necessarily represent those of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum or any other organization.

SEE ALSO CIVILTÀ CATTOLICA, LA; HUMANI GENERIS UNITAS; JEWISH-CATHOLIC RELATIONS; JEWS, POST-BIBLICAL HISTORY OF THE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Doris L. Bergen, Twisted Cross: The German Christian Movement in the Third Reich (Chapel Hill, N.C. 1996).

Alberto Cavaglion and Gian Paolo Romagnani, Le Interdizioni del Duce: A cinquant'anni dalle leggi razziali in Italia (1938–1988) (Turin 1988).

Frank J. Coppa, The Papacy, the Jews, and the Holocaust (Washington, D.C. 2006).

Bernard Harrison, The Resurgence of Antisemitism: Jews, Israel, and Liberal Opinion (Lanham, Md. 2006).

David I. Kertzer, The Popes Against the Jews: The Vatican's Role in the Rise of Modern Antisemitism (New York 2001).

Aleksander Lasik, "Historical-Sociological Profile of the Auschwitz SS," in Anatomy of the Auschwitz Death Camp, edited by Israel Gutman and Michael Berenbaum (Bloomington, Ind. 1994), 274, 279–280.

Michael Mann, "Were the Perpetrators of Genocide 'Ordinary Men' or 'Real Nazis'? Results from Fifteen Hundred Biographies," Holocaust and Genocide Studies 14, no. 3 (Winter 2000): 331–366.

Georges Passelecq and Bernard Suchecky, The Hidden Encyclical of Pius XI, translated from the French by Steven Rendall (New York 1997).

Peter G.J. Pulzer, The Rise of Political Antisemitism in Germany and Austria, rev. ed. (Cambridge, Mass. 1988).

Kevin P. Spicer, ed., Antisemitism, Christian Ambivalence, and the Holocaust (Bloomington, Ind. 2007).

Vatican Council II, Nostra aetate, On the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions (Declaration, October 28, 1965), available from http://www.vatican.va/archive/hist_councils/ii_vatican_council/documents/vat-ii_decl_19651028_nostra-aetate_en.html (accessed May 12, 2008).

Robert S. Wistrich, Antisemitism: The Longest Hatred (New York 1991).

Susan Zucotti, Under His Very Windows: The Vatican and the Holocaust in Italy (New Haven, Conn. 2000).

Suzanne Brown-Fleming
Center for Advanced Holocaust Studies
United States Holocaust Memorial Museum,
Washington, D.C. (2010)

APOSTOLIC DELEGATE

Since the Council of ARLES, in 314, and that of Nicea in 325, popes have occasionally appointed clergymen as legates (from the Latin legare, meaning to send) as agents to secure the interests of the HOLY SEE and act as their representatives to secular regimes; to Churches outside ROME; and to ecclesiastical and political assemblies, congresses, and councils. As a result of this long-established appointment of representatives to secular and ecclesiastical bodies, the PAPACY has a diplomatic tradition reaching back more than 1,600 years.

Official papal relations were maintained on and off with a series of secular rulers throughout the MIDDLE AGES and the early RENAISSANCE. Later, when a balance of power emerged first in Italy and then in Europe, with the papacy also taking part in the development of diplomacy to monitor events in the other states, the role of papal representation was regularized and clarified. Soon after the outbreak of the FRENCH REVOLUTION in 1789, Pope PIUS VI reasserted this right of the Roman PONTIFF to delegate ecclesiastics to places the pontiff could not go, where they could exercise authority on his behalf.

Legates and Nuncios. Papal agents were gradually differentiated on the basis of the tenure of their appointment. Some—in the past always a CARDINAL—were legates assigned the limited task of attending a council, conference, celebration, or other activity, representing the POPE personally as though they came from his side (a latere). The legates a latere have traditionally been charged to undertake a specific purpose—for example, Cardinal Costantino Patrizi was dispatched to France to baptize the Prince Imperial in 1856 on behalf of the pope—but others were assigned a more permanent role at one of the courts or countries. Pope ALEXANDER VI is generally credited with the establishment of permanent representatives. With the passage of time another division was concretized during the pontificate of Pope GREGORY XIII. It differentiated between legates whose responsibilities were not only ecclesiastical but also political and diplomatic (in rank corresponding to secular ambassadors) and those who were officially assigned to purely religious matters. The first were labeled nuncios (from the Latin Nuntius, or envoy), and the latter were christened apostolic delegates; they were dispatched to countries unwilling to have diplomatic relations with the papacy.

Although the religious unity of Europe was disrupted by the course of the THIRTY YEARS' WAR (1618–1648) and the Peace of WESTPHALIA (1648), which terminated the war, the Church's sovereignty in international relations was recognized and the privileged position of its diplomatic representatives, or nuncios, preserved. This was confirmed by a protocol of the Congress of Vienna in June 1815, which established that the nuncio, irrespective of his seniority, took precedence over other ambassadors and served as dean of the diplomatic corps. This privilege was mitigated somewhat by the 1961 Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, sponsored by the UNITED NATIONS. Article 16 of this agreement allowed, but did not mandate, making the papal nuncio the dean of the diplomatic community, even when others were his seniors in service. Whatever their rank, through these nuncios, the popes had direct access to the heads of the various governments. This access allowed them, over the centuries, to exchange ambassadors with the independent dynastic and national states, participate in international affairs and congresses, and mediate international disputes from time to time. It recognized only in part the sovereignty and supremacy that Pope PIUS XI posited in Quas primas (December 1925), in which he proclaimed that the Vicar of the Redeemer rightfully exercised authority not only over Catholics but also over all nations and societies in making laws and governing peoples to provide for their SALVATION.

Envoys Extraordinary. Pius XI lamented that this right was too often forgotten. Indeed, after Westphalia not all the countries that preserved diplomatic relations with Rome proved willing to recognize the precedence of the papal representatives, which the Church then regarded as an established right sanctioned and supported by the international community. To convey its displeasure, the Holy See initially responded by terming its representative to these "recalcitrant states" that did not recognize their primacy as "envoys extraordinary," revealing that Rome regarded the situation as temporary and looked forward to a change of course. Unfortunately, the title of envoy extraordinary was used to describe papal representatives assigned a limited and specific task as well as apostolic delegates assigned both a political and a religious role. In an attempt to clarify matters, a 1916 directive of the Vatican Secretariat of State replaced the term envoy extraordinary to describe a nuncio not recognized as head of the diplomatic corps, calling for such a representative to be listed as an internuncio—still indicating to some that he was waiting for official recognition of his privileged status. Unfortunately, the new terminology created additional confusion because internuncio was also used to describe a transitional or temporary head of a nunciature while awaiting a permanent replacement.

Another attempt at clarification occurred after 1965 when the term pronuncio was attached to these papal representatives not accorded priority. However, because this term had formerly been used to describe the representatives to the "great" nunciatures of Paris, Madrid, and the Imperial Court when their terms expired, some confusion and consternation continued. Clarification occurred only after 1991, when the Vatican abandoned its special terminology for nuncios not accorded precedence. Finally concluding that some states would not recognize the privileged position of their representatives, and perhaps even questioning the advantage of exercising this diplomatic deanship, the use of such descriptions as envoys extraordinary, internuncios, and pronuncios previously applied to some nuncios, was dropped in favor of the generic nuncio.

Apostolic Delegates. No such clarification was needed in the nomenclature, if not the practice, of the representatives sent to countries that did not have formal diplomatic relations with the Holy See, which at the end of the nineteenth century represented the majority of states. These papal agents are described in canon law as delegati sedia apostolicae, or apostolic delegates. They have been most often dispatched as papal representatives to the Church and bishops of countries without official relations with the Holy See and therefore are without official status in its diplomatic corps. There was a real need for an alternative form of representation in 1878 following the death of Pope PIUS IX, who had come into conflict with the modern diplomatic world by his Syllabus of Errors (1864), his encouragement and support for the Vatican Council's Proclamation of Papal INFALLIBILITY (1870), and his self-imposed imprisonment in the Vatican (1870–1878). Indeed, at his death the Holy See preserved diplomatic relations with only fifteen states: seven in Europe (including Bavaria, which was no longer an independent state but part of united Germany) and the remaining eight in South America. The Holy See did not have diplomatic representatives in London, Berlin, St. Petersburg, or Washington, D.C.

Refusing to recognize the Kingdom of Italy (the Counter-Risorgimento), embroiled in conflict with anticlerical forces in Republican France, and troubled by Bismarck's KULTURKAMPF, the new pope, LEO XIII, sought to end the Vatican's diplomatic isolation and to do so had recourse to the broader use of apostolic delegates.

Because the apostolic delegate is officially and technically charged only with internal ecclesiastical affairs, he does not require state sanction, although Leo XIII's Vatican always prudently sounded out governmental reaction as well as that of the national hierarchy before appointing an apostolic delegate. This cautious procedure has been followed by most of his successors. In the past apostolic delegates, like nuncios, have been titular archbishops without residential sees. Most have been named cardinals, as have the ten apostolic delegates to the United States from Francesco Cardinal SATOLLI (1893–1896) to Pio Cardinal LAGHI (1980–1984). However, under the most recent revision of the Code of Canon Law (canons 362–367), the office of apostolic delegate need not be filled by an archbishop.

Unlike nuncios, who exercise both political and religious functions, technically the sole responsibility of the apostolic delegate pertains to ecclesiastical issues on behalf of the Holy Father. Among other things, these delegates assess the progress of the Church in the area of their supervision, providing reports and suggestions to the pope for improvement, and present candidates for the episcopate to the Holy See. However, without papal authorization these agents have no power to intervene in local Church affairs or take action against individual prelates. Apostolic delegates, like the nuncios, receive their training in the Pontifical Ecclesiastical Academy, which prepares the diplomats of the Holy See. (This academy was founded in 1701 by Pope CLEMENT XI as the Academy of Noble Ecclesiastics and is often deemed the West Point of the Vatican Civil Service.) They thus have the training, if not the legal mandate in most instances, to involve themselves in diplomatic matters. However, on occasion the Holy See has dispatched apostolic delegates to deal with a specific problem or issue in countries with which it has diplomatic relations but chooses for any of a number of reasons to bypass the nuncio. Assigned both an ecclesiastical and a political role, these delegates are given the added title of envoy extraordinary and accredited to the government as well as the Church.

Over the years a number of these apostolic delegates exercising a dual role have been dispatched to South American countries. For example, Pietro GASPARRI, papal secretary of state from 1914 to 1930, when he earlier served as papal delegate in Peru, Bolivia, and Ecuador, exercised a diplomatic as well as a religious role. Some believe that the fact that the archives of the apostolic delegations have remained closed for some eight decades, as have most papers of the nunciatures, reflects the sensitive political responsibilities of the former as well as the latter.

In turn the traditional apostolic delegates have been assigned to countries where the Catholic population is small, such as states whose population is largely served by the Oriental Churches; to localities where the Church remains officially in a missionary stage, true until recently for a number of African territories; and to countries that do not recognize the Church's membership in the international community, which was true of the United States until 1984, when the United States and the Holy See established full diplomatic relations. Unlike the nuncios, who report to the Holy Father by means of the Cardinal Secretariat of State and the Congregation for Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs, apostolic delegates first report to the congregation in charge of the affairs of the country to which they have been sent. A number of delegates report to the Sacred Congregation for the EASTERN CHURCHES, whereas the remaining delegates fall under the supervision of Congregation for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH, subsequently named the Congregation for the EVANGELIZATION OF PEOPLES.

Although the traditional apostolic delegates were established to deal with internal religious issues, from time to time the papacy has employed them as well to deal with political matters. For example, Francesco Satolli, appointed apostolic delegate to the United States in 1893 at the direction of the papal secretary of state, Cardinal Mariano RAMPOLLA DEL TINDARO, engaged in correspondence between Mexico, Guatemala, and the Holy See to resolve differences between these states. He acted as a diplomatic emissary rather than simply as a papal representative to the Church and the faithful of the United States. The success of his efforts encouraged the introduction of apostolic delegations in Guatemala, Mexico, and Canada during the course of the following decade. Thus in 1899 Pope Leo XIII dispatched an apostolic delegate to Canada with instructions to seek a reconciliation between the largely conservative Catholic hierarchy and the liberal Canadian regime. His efforts, however, proved futile. Equally unsuccessful were the attempts of the apostolic delegates to the United States, Pietro Fumasoni Biondi (1922–1933) and Amleto CICOGNANI (1933–1959) at the behest of Pius XI, to silence the anti-Semitic "radio priest" Charles COUGHLIN in the 1930s. This failure once again revealed the limitations of papal authority within the civil sphere. Other political efforts of the apostolic delegates have been more successful, including the February 1971 approval by the respective apostolic delegates to the United Kingdom and the United States of the Vatican's ratification of the International Treaty Limiting the Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons.

Expanded Presence of the Papacy. These and other activities of the nuncios and apostolic delegates reveal that the successors of Pius IX have enhanced and expanded the international presence of the papacy. This was especially true during and after World War II. Although the United States had had an apostolic delegate in Washington since 1893, at the war's outbreak President Franklin D. Roosevelt called for closer relations with the Holy See. Unable to establish full diplomatic relations because of the prevailing anti-Catholicism in the country, Roosevelt dispatched a personal representative to Pope PIUS XII, who the pope likened to an envoy extraordinary. Roosevelt's representative proved useful in keeping the pope from denouncing American cooperation with the Soviet Union in the war against Nazi Germany, while providing papal support for the United Nations envisioned by the American president.

In the postwar period following Pope JOHN XXIII's opening of VATICAN COUNCIL II (1962–1965), his call for aggiornamento, or updating of the Church, and efforts at reconciliation with the modern world, combined to improve the international image of the papacy. This positive picture continued during the long pontificate of the popular first Polish pope, JOHN PAUL II, and provided dividends in the extraordinary expansion of the papacy's diplomatic outreach. At the opening of the new millennium it had nunciatures in some 170 states as well as the European Union. The Holy See also had representation to more than two dozen international groups and nongovernmental organizations, such as the Arab League and the United Nations. In Africa alone the Holy See had over fifty nunciatures, from Algeria to Zimbabwe, with another fifty in Europe, from Albania to the Ukraine. The remaining nunciatures are found in the Americas, Asia, and Oceania. Only a few states, some Muslim and others communist, either for religious or ideological reasons had no formal relations with the Holy See. This extraordinary expansion was achieved at the expense of the apostolic delegations, whose number decreased, even if their role and importance did not.

SEE ALSO AGGIORNAMENTO; ANTI-CATHOLICISM (UNITED STATES); DIPLOMATICS, ECCLESIASTICAL; EUROPEAN UNION AND THE PAPACY; LEAGUE OF NATIONS AND THE PAPACY; LEGATES, PAPAL; NICAEA I, COUNCIL OF; NUNCIO, APOSTOLIC; PONTIFICAL ACADEMIES; QUAS PRIMAS; SYLLABUS OF ERRORS; UNITED STATES RELATIONS WITH THE PAPACY; VICAR OF CHRIST.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Pierre Blet, Histoire de la représentation diplomatique du Saint Siège: des origines à l'aube du XIXe siècle (Vatican City 1982).

Frank J. Coppa, Pope Pius IX: Crusader in a Secular Age (Boston 1979).

Lamberto de Echeverria, "The Pope's Representatives," in The Roman Curia and the Communion of Churches, edited by Peter Huizing and Knut Walf (New York 1979), 94–103.

Edward L. Heston, "Papal Diplomacy: Its Organization and Way of Acting," in The Catholic Church in World Affairs, edited by Waldemar Gurian and M.A. Fitzsimons (Notre Dame, Ind. 1954), 33–47.

Kevin E. McKenna, The Battle for Rights in the United States Catholic Church (New York 2007).

Francis X. Murphy, "Vatican Politics: Structure and Function," World Politics 26, no. 4 (July 1974): 542–559.

David M. O'Connell, "Legates, Papal," in Encyclopedia of the Vatican and Papacy, edited by Frank J. Coppa (Westport, Conn. 1999), 260–262.

Pope Pius XI, Quas primus, On the Feast of Christ the King (Encyclical, December 11, 1925), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/pius_xi/encyclicals/documents/hf_p-xi_enc_11121925_quas-primas_en.html (accessed August 31, 2008).

Vatican Council II, The Conciliar and Post Conciliar Documents, rev. ed., edited by Austin Flannery (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1992).

Frank J. Coppa
Professor of History
St. John's University, New York (2010)

ARAFAT, YASSER

Palestinian political leader, b. August 24, 1929, in Cairo, Egypt; d. November 11, 2004, in Clamart, France.

Commonly known as Yasser (or Yasir) Arafat, Abd al-Rahman Abd al-Rauf Arafat al-Qudwa al-Husseini was born in Cairo, Egypt. However, for some time he claimed that he had been born in JERUSALEM. Controversy, even regarding his place of birth, characterized the life and political career of Yasser Arafat.

In Kuwait, on October 10, 1959, Arafat and other supporters of the movement to create an independent Palestinian state following the 1948 creation of the state of ISRAEL formed an organization named Harakat al-Tahrir al-Filastiniyya. The first initial of each word in the organization's name, taken in reverse, spells "Fatah" (meaning "conquest"). However, in an effort to be as inclusive as possible of all Palestinians, Fatah was to be commonly named or referred to as the "Palestinian Liberation Movement." This preceded the creation of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO).

In May 1964, with the sponsorship of Egyptian President Gamal Abdel Nasser, the PLO was formed. Its charter was adopted as its constitution, and with it came the creation of the Palestine National Council (PNC), as well as the creation of a PLO treasury and military. Ahmad Shuqeiri, who came from a wealthy Palestinian family and who had previously served in the governments of more than one Arab regime, was picked by Nasser to be the first leader of the PLO. However, Arab infighting within the PLO, along with Egypt's defeat by the Israelis in the 1967 Six-Day War, ultimately afforded Arafat the opportunity to gain control of the chairmanship of the PLO's Executive Committee at the February 1969 meeting of the PNC. Chairman Arafat would remain head of the PLO until his death.

In 1971 Arafat made Lebanon, specifically Beirut, his and the PLO's base of operations. Throughout the 1970s the PLO engaged in repeated military conflicts with Israel. U.S. Secretary of State Henry Kissinger (1973–1977), along with Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin (1974–1977 and 1992–1995) would not negotiate with Arafat concerning peace in the Middle East as long as the PLO continued to engage in terrorist attacks upon Israel and refused to accept U.N. Resolution 242 of November 1967, which called for Israel to return all of the territories it had captured during the Six Day War as well as "a just and lasting peace in which every state in the area [could] live in security" along with "a just settlement of the refugee problem." Arafat and the PLO continued to refuse to recognize the state of Israel's right to exist until the negotiation of the Oslo Accords in 1993.

In June 1982, believing that the PLO had been behind the assassination attempt of an Israeli government official, Israel launched a military invasion into southern Lebanon that resulted in the deaths of several thousand people living in the area. The invasion became an issue of grave concern to Pope JOHN PAUL II. On September 14, 1982, in spite of an apparent U.S. and U.N. negotiated settlement of the conflict, a random bomb explosion killed the Christian president-elect of Lebanon along with seven colleagues. The following day, September 15, 1982, Pope John Paul II became the focus of worldwide attention when he invited Arafat, who was in Rome at the time, to a meeting with him at the Vatican. The two men met for thirty minutes. After the meeting, Arafat and the pope issued a joint statement condemning the use of terrorism. The meeting of the two men was highly controversial. In the view of many, Arafat did not appear to believe the PLO attacks on Israel were actually acts of terrorism. Israel also vehemently denounced the pope's meeting with Arafat as akin to what it perceived as questionable papal actions during the HOLOCAUST. Violence once again erupted across southern Lebanon as Israeli troops reentered the area. By the end of September 1982, U.S. President Ronald Reagan sent U.S. Marine forces into southern Lebanon in yet another attempt to end the violence within the region. However, no lasting peace was achieved in the region by this action.

Vatican Visit. Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) Chairman Yasser Arafat poses with Pope John Paul II during an audience at the Vatican. © GIANNI/SYGMA/CORBIS

Through their meetings, Yasser Arafat and Pope John Paul II worked together to forge a historic bond between Catholics and Palestinians. The pope met with Arafat a total of twelve times before Arafat's death in November 2004. After their initial meeting in 1982, most notable was the pope's visit to Arafat's headquarters in Bethlehem as part of his 2000 pilgrimage to the Holy Land. At that meeting Arafat presented the pope with a special medal in recognition of the pope's support for Palestinian independence. The two men met for the last time in October 2001, at which time the pope counseled Arafat that all parties should lay down their weapons and continue to engage in negotiations in order to settle their existing conflicts.

During his May 2009 visit to the Holy Land, Pope BENEDICT XVI stated his solidarity with "all the homeless Palestinians who long to be able to return to their birthplace, or live permanently in a homeland of their own." Alongside the West Bank security wall, the pope added, "In a world where more and more borders are being opened up—to trade, to travel, to movement of peoples, to cultural exchanges—it is tragic to see walls still being erected.... How we long to see the fruits of the much more difficult task of building peace!"

Shortly after meeting with Pope John Paul II for the last time in October 2001, Arafat's Ramallah compound was surrounded by Israeli tanks. Arafat lived the remaining years of his life virtually imprisoned there. After becoming ill and falling into a coma in late 2004, he was taken to France. He died in a hospital outside Paris, in Clamart, France, on November 11, 2004. He was seventy-five.

SEE ALSO PALESTINE; PALESTINE, PAPAL POSITION TOWARD.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Rachel Donadio and Sharon Otterman, "In Bethlehem, Pope Laments Israeli Wall," The New York Times (May 13, 2009), available from http://www.nytimes.com/2009/05/14/world/middleeast/14pope.html (accessed September 10, 2009).

Jonathan Kwitny, Man of the Century: The Life and Times of Pope John Paul II (New York 1997).

Barry Rubin and Judith Colp Rubin, Yasir Arafat: A Political Biography (New York 2003).

John Thavis, "Moral support: Despite criticism, pope met with Arafat 12 times," Catholic News Service Web site, available from http://www.catholicnews.com/data/stories/cns/0406196.htm (accessed September 10, 2009).

John A. Donnangelo II
Adjunct Assistant Professor, Department of History
Bronx Community College of the City University of New York, New York, N.Y. (2010)

ARCHE, L'

The term l'arche is French for "the ark" and refers to Noah's Ark. This is an appropriate name because L'ARCHE is an international federation of faith-based communities where people with and without intellectual disabilities share life together. The "ark" also represents a place of safety in societies that are unwelcoming of people with disabilities.

L'ARCHE was founded by Jean VANIER, a Canadian honored for his social and spiritual leadership. In 1964, wanting to respond to the suffering of people with intellectual disabilities who were shut away in institutions, often in terrible conditions, Vanier invited two men with intellectual disabilities to live with him in a small house in the village of Trosly-Breuil, France. Thus, L'ARCHE was at the beginning of the de-institutionalization movement. This pioneering gesture also reflected a new vision of living together in community that emerged with Vatican II.

Growth and Vision. Vanier's little community grew quickly as young people came to help as live-in assistants, as more homes were opened, and as more people with intellectual disabilities were welcomed. Vanier and the assistants recognized that the people whom they came to help had particular gifts. The conviction that relationships in such communities are mutually enriching remains central to the CHARISM of L'ARCHE.

New communities were founded as assistants returned to their home countries. In 1972 L'ARCHE Erie became the first L'ARCHE community of Vanier's communities to be established in the United States. In 1974 the International Federation of L'ARCHE Communities was formed. As of 2008 there were more than 130 of these communities in 35 countries on 6 continents including 44 communities in the United States and Canada.

While L'ARCHE communities reflect their local cultural milieu, they are united by the same vision and what the L'ARCHE charter describes as "the same spirit of welcome, sharing, and simplicity." They share a common commitment to help each person grow to full potential and to ensure that those who have intellectual disabilities can have a legitimate place in society and contribute their gifts—gifts that can break down barriers and help to build a more compassionate society. Each community is autonomous with its own board of directors and with policies that abide by local government regulations. Regional, national, and international L'ARCHE offices provide support and ensure that the communities are operating according to the values of the L'ARCHE charter. The sixteen communities of L'ARCHE in the United States receive varying amounts of government funding and are separately registered charities.

Five years after its founding, an Anglican couple started a L'ARCHE community in Toronto, Canada. A year later, a group of Hindus and Christians formed a board and opened the first L'ARCHE in India. Thus, while founded in the ROMAN CATHOLIC tradition and maintaining strong Roman Catholic connections, it soon became clear that L'ARCHE would be ecumenical and interfaith in ways representative of the composition of local populations around the world.

The spirituality of L'ARCHE is lived out simply in day-to-day relationships where assistants frequently encounter the presence of GOD in those who are poor in worldly terms but often rich in the gifts of the heart. These communities are faith-based but open to people of any faith or of no particular faith. The charter stresses that each person should be supported to grow in his or her own faith tradition. The faith expression of individual communities is lived out locally in relationships with churches and other faith groups from which its members come. At the international level L'ARCHE maintains a regular dialogue on mutual concerns with church representatives from Protestant, Anglican, and Roman Catholic communities. A L'ARCHE delegation meets annually with the Pontifical Council for Christian Unity, the Pontifical Council for Inter-religious Dialogue, the Pontifical Council for the Laity, and recently, the Pontifical Council for Pastoral Care and Health. The Pontifical Council for the Laity ratifies the nomination of a bishop as a formal liaison with L'ARCHE.

From the beginning L'ARCHE has been rooted in relationships and in creating family-like homes. Learning new skills, participating in society, and engaging in meaningful and dignified work or day program activities are recognized as important aspects of developing self-esteem. The communities also create around them mutually enriching larger communities of friends, families, and supporters.

Community Life. Members of L'Arche Vancouver preparing lunch. COURTESY OF L'ARCHE CANADA

While maintaining its own unique charism over the years, L'ARCHE has incorporated best practices in the field of social services for people with intellectual disabilities including normalization, social role valorization, inclusion, and asset-based thinking, which focuses on the ways a city or a neighborhood benefits from the presence of people with disabilities, seeing them as assets and not liabilities. Its excellence as a service provider is widely recognized. L'ARCHE is held up as a model and invited to contribute to policy development.

In March 2006, the results of a Canadian government two-year study of housing options for people with developmental disabilities appeared in Research Highlights, a bulletin of Canada's national housing agency (the Canadian Mortgage and Housing Corporation [CMHC]), and named L'ARCHE as "the only group home that was identified as a best practice" (p. 3). Later that year a Washington Post article referred to L'ARCHE as operating "what many in the mental disabilities field consider some of the planet's best and most humane group homes" (Fisher 2006). At the same time L'ARCHE is gaining recognition not only as a social service but also as a movement that, through living out its vision and values, helps shape both church and society for the better. In response to requests from educators, some L'ARCHE entities, such as L'ARCHE Canada, have prepared educational packages that teach about inclusion and appreciation of diversity, for use in high school civics and social studies classes, guidance, and for church adult and young people's groups.

SEE ALSO MERCY, WORKS OF; PERSON (IN PHILOSOPHY); PERSON (IN THEOLOGY); PONTIFICAL COUNCILS; VATICAN COUNCIL II.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Canadian Mortgage and Housing Corporation, "Housing for Adults with Intellectual Disabilities" Research Highlights (2006) Socio-economic Series 06-008, p. 3, available from http://www.cmhc-schl.gc.ca/odpub/pdf/65011.pdf (accessed March 31, 2008).

Bill Clarke, S.J., Enough Room for Joy: The Early Days of L'ARCHE (Toronto 1974; re-released: Ottawa 2006).

Marc Fisher, "The District Bureaucracy Bears Down on a Dream," Washington Post, December 5, 2006.

L'ARCHE Charter, available from http://larche.org/charter-of-the-communities-of-l-arche.en-gb.43.3.content.htm (accessed March 31, 2008).

L'ARCHE Educational Resources, available from http://www.larche.ca/en/resources/curriculum_materials/ (accessed March 31, 2008).

L'ARCHE Identity and Mission Statements, available from http://larche.org/identity-and-mission-statements.en-gb.43.60.content.htm (accessed March 31, 2008).

L'ARCHE International Official Web site, available from http://www.larche.ca (accessed March 31, 2008).

Henri J.M. Nouwen, Adam: God's Beloved (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1997).

Henri J.M. Nouwen, The Road to Daybreak: A Spiritual Journey (New York 1988).

Kathryn Spink, The Miracle, The Message, The Story: Jean Vanier and L'ARCHE (Toronto 2006).

Jean Vanier, Community and Growth, Rev. ed. (Mahwah, N.J. 1991).

Jean Vanier, An Ark for the Poor: The Story of L'ARCHE (Ottawa 1995).

Jean Vanier, Becoming Human (New York 1998).

Jean Vanier, Our Life Together: A Memoir in Letters (Toronto 2007).

L'ARCHE® is registered in U.S. Patent and Trademark Office

Elizabeth Porter
Director of Educational Initiatives and Publications
L'ARCHE Canada, Richmond Hill, Ontario (2010)

ARMY OF MARY

The Army of Mary, an association excommunicated by the Catholic Church in 2007, originated as a pious association in Quebec, Canada, in the early 1970s. Its foundress, Marie-Paule Giguere of Lac-Etchman, Quebec, believed that she was the reincarnation of the Blessed Virgin Mary. Giguere claimed to receive inner locutions informing her that the Virgin Mary in her being was "coeternal with God," and that although once a historical person, the Mother of Jesus had now been reincarnated and was dwelling in Giguere herself. The foundress inordinately joined her false Marian beliefs to the legitimate apparitions of the Lady of All Nations in the Netherlands, which were declared to be of supernatural origin (constat de supernaturalitate) by Bishop Josef M. Punt of Haarlem-Amsterdam on May 31, 2001.

In its self-description, the Army of Mary states that its goal is to "bring together souls of good will resolved to live, with Mary, the Christian Life to its perfection in all the demands of the duties of their state." The association was originally established in Canada, and it went on to expand into the United States and Central America.

Cardinal Louis-Albert Vachon of Quebec revoked the Army of Mary's approval as a Catholic association in 1987, after a committee of theologians investigated the group's writings. In 2001 the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops issued a doctrinal note confirming that the teachings promoted by the Army of Mary were contrary to fundamental doctrines of the Church. In 2003 the HOLY SEE appointed pontifical commissioners for the priests associated with the Army of Mary, in efforts of seeking reconciliation. In March 2007 Canadian Cardinal Marc Ouellette issued an official warning that the Army of Mary had excluded themselves from the Catholic Church, that several of their doctrinal teachings were false, and that the association was not to be supported by the Catholic faithful.

On July 11, 2007, the Vatican Congregation for the DOCTRINE OF THE FAITH issued a declaration of EXCOMMUNICATION to all participants of the Army of Mary, after extensive consultations with the Canadian bishops and the Holy See's Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life. Despite repeated warnings by the Canadian bishops, including the local ordinaries of particular members, some members of the Army of Mary had recently participated in invalid ordinations and liturgical rites.

SEE ALSO CANADA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; OUR LADY OF ALL NATIONS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

"Army of Mary Incurs Excommunications," Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops Web site (September 12, 2007), available from http://www.cccb.ca/site/content/view/2519/1062/lang,eng/ (accessed October 13, 2009).

Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, "Doctrinal Note of the Catholic Bishops of Canada concerning the Army of Mary" (August 15, 2001), available from http://www.cccb.ca/site/Files/armyofmary.html (accessed October 13, 2009).

Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, "Regarding the Movement 'The Community of the Lady of All Nations,' and of Its Works: 'The Army of Mary,' 'The Family and Communities of the Sons and Daughters of Mary,' 'Les Oblats-Patriotes,' 'L'Institut Marialys'" (Declaration, July 11, 2007), available from http://www.cccb.ca/site/images/stories/pdf/decl_excomm_english.pdf (accessed October 13, 2009).

"The Community of the Lady of All Peoples: Introduction," Army of Mary Web site, available from http://www.communaute-dame.qc.ca/CD_introduction_communaute_AN.htm (accessed October 13, 2009).

Mark Miravalle
Full Professor of Theology and Mariology
Franciscan University of Steubenville (2010)

ARNÁIZ BARÓN, RAFAEL, ST.

Trappist OBLATE mystic; b. April 9, 1911, Burgos, Spain; d. April 26, 1938, San Isidro de Dueños, Palencia, Spain, April 26, 1938; beatified September 27, 1992, by Pope JOHN PAUL II; canonized October 11, 2009, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

Rafael Arnáiz came from a socially prominent family and was the eldest of four children. As a boy, he was educated by the JESUITS, and from a young age he manifested an interest in art and spirituality. During a summer he spent with his uncle and aunt, the duke and duchess of Maqueda, he was introduced to the Trappist (Ordo Cisterciensium Reformatorum seu Strictioris Observantiae) Monastery of San Isidro de Dueñas in Palencia. In 1930 he went to Madrid to study architecture. After being dismissed from military service, he gave up architectural studies, and in 1933 he joined the TRAPPISTS.

Rafael chose this path not because of hardship or failure, but out of positive devotion to God, who had bestowed on him so many gifts. Just four months after entering the monastery, diabetes mellitus forced him to leave and return home for treatment. Between 1935 and 1937, amid the strife of the Spanish Civil War (1936–1939), Rafael made several trips between his home and the monastery. Due to his health problems, Rafael was not permitted to become a monk when he finally returned to the monastery; he was made an oblate instead. Another attack of the same disease brought about his death at the age of twenty-seven. He is remembered for his continual search for unity with God and for his spiritual writings, which have attracted pilgrims to his grave at San Isidro.

In 1989, at the World Youth Day in Santiago de Compostela, Pope John Paul II pointed to Br. Rafael as a contemporary model for young people. The same pope beatified him in Rome on September 27, 1992. In his HOMILY, the pope commented that during Bl. Rafael's brief but intense monastic life, he provided an example "of a loving and unconditional response to the divine call." Pope Benedict XVI canonized Rafael on October 11, 2009, and in his homily he referred to the many letters Br. Rafael wrote during his time at the monastery. They provide great insight into the spiritual journey of the young man who, in the pope's words, "continues with his example and actions to offer us an attractive path, especially for young people who are not content with little but aspire to the full truth, the ineffable happiness which is attained through God's love."

Feast: April 26.

SEE ALSO RELIGIOUS (MEN AND WOMEN); SPAIN (THE CHURCH DURING THE SPANISH REPUBLIC AND THE CIVIL WAR: 1931–1939).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Jesús Alvarez, Rafael (Burgos, Spain 1952).

Rafael Arnáiz Barón, Vida y escritos de Fray María Rafael Arnáiz Barón, edited by Mercedes Barón, 10th ed. (Madrid 1974).

Benedict XVI, "Eucharistic Celebration for the Canonization of Five New Saints, Zygmunt Szczesny Felinski (1822–1895), Francisco Coll y Guitart (1812–1875), Jozef Damiaan de Veuster (1840–1889), Raphael Arnaiz Baron (1911–1938), Marie de la Croix (Jeanne) Jugan (1792–1879)" (Homily, October 12, 2009), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/benedict_xvi/homilies/2009/documents/hf_ben-xvi_hom_20091011_canonizzazioni_en.html (accessed October 25, 2009).

Antonio Cobos Soto, La "pintura mensaje" del hermano Rafael: Estudio crítico de la obra pictórica del venerable Rafael Arnáiz Barón, "monje trapense" (Burgos, Spain 1989).

Terry H. Jones, "Saint Rafael Arnáiz Barón," Patron Saints Index, available from http://saints.sqpn.com/saint-rafael-arnaiz-baron/ (accessed October 25, 2009).

Leopoldo Maqueda, Un secreto de la Trapa, 2nd ed. (Burgos, Spain 1993).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "St. Rafael Arnáiz Barón (1911–1938)," Vatican Web site, October 11, 2009, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/2009/ns_lit_doc_20091011_arnaiz_en.html (accessed October 25, 2009).

"On the Canonization of 5 Saints," Zenit, October 11, 2009, available from http://www.zenit.org/article-27157?l=english (accessed October 25, 2009).

Katherine I. Rabenstein
Senior Credentialing Specialist
American Nurses Association, Washington, D.C.

Elizabeth C. Shaw
Independent Scholar
Washington, D.C. (2010)

ASCENSIÓN DEL CORAZÓN DE JESÚS, BL.

Baptized Ascensión Nicol Goñi, also known as Florentina Nicol Goñi; cofoundress of the Dominican Missionary Sisters of the Rosary; b. March 14, 1868, Tafalla, Navarre, Spain; d. February 24, 1940; beatified May 14, 2005, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

As a teen Ascensión Nicol Goñi, the youngest in a family of four, attended St. Rose of Lima, a Dominican boarding school, where she experienced a desire to become a religious. She waited a year to enter the novitiate at the monastery of St. Rose in Huesca, Spain, because she wanted to be sure of God's call. A year later she professed her vows and became a teacher.

In 1913, after the Spanish government took over the school where she worked and expelled the teachers, the forty-five-year-old Mother Ascensión embarked on a new venture that took her to the wilds of Peru. A group of sisters traveled to South America, and Mother Ascensión and two other sisters spent almost four weeks trekking the Andes and sailing down dangerous rivers to reach their destination. They were the first to make this perilous journey. After they arrived, they opened a girls' school. In addition to teaching children, they aided the sick and helped the poor and needy at the jungle mission of Porto Maldonado. The sisters traveled by canoe or mule to reach the people they served, and Mother Ascensión's heart went out to the women she served. She worked to aid them and assist in their advancement.

On October 5, 1918, Mother Ascensión and Bishop Ramon Zubieta, O.P., founded the Dominican Missionary Sisters of the Rosary. Mother Ascensión was appointed superior general and served in that capacity for twenty-one years, making many apostolic trips to Peru and Europe, as well as one to China.

Along with Mother Marianne COPE, Mother Ascensión was declared "Blessed" on May 14, 2005, and Pope Benedict XVI called them both "exemplary witnesses of the charity of Christ." Cardinal José Saraiva Martins presided over the BEATIFICATION and praised Mother Ascensión's missionary endeavors, particularly her self-sacrifice and willingness to endure hardship for the sake of apostolic fruits. He also emphasized that her charity and heart for others had been passed on to her religious daughters. The ceremony took place on the eve of PENTECOST, so Mother Ascensión's actions were compared to those of the apostles who, having received the gifts of the Holy Spirit, went forth and proclaimed the GOSPEL to every nation.

Feast: February 24.

SEE ALSO DOMINICAN SISTERS; PERU, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; SPAIN, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

"Ascensión del Corazón de Jesús Nicol Goñi y Mariana Cope, 'ejemplares testigos de la caridad de Cristo,'" Radio Vaticano, May 16, 2005, available (in Spanish) from http://www.radiovaticana.org/spa/Articolo.asp?c=37004 (accessed October 22, 2009).

Congregation for the Causes of Saints, "Mass of Beatification for the Servants of God, Ascensión Nicol Goñi and Marianne Cope: Homily of Cartdinal José Saraiva Martins," Vatican Web site, May 14, 2005, available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/congregations/csaints/documents/rc_con_csaints_doc_20050514_beatifications_en.html (accessed October 22, 2009).

"Dominican Missionary Sisters of the Rosary: Mother Ascension Nicol, Co-foundress of the Dominican Missionary Sisters of the Rosary," Dominicans in India Web site, available from http://www.dominicansindia.com/History/guju%20sis.htm (accessed October 22, 2009).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Bl. Ascensión of the Heart of Jesus Nicol Goñi (1868–1940)," Vatican Web site, May 14, 2005, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_lit_doc_20050514_nicol_en.html (accessed October 22, 2009).

Laurie J. Edwards
Independent Scholar
Reidsville, N.C. (2010)

ASSOCIATION OF CATHOLIC COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES

The Asssociation of Catholic Colleges and Universities (ACCU) was organized by Rt. Rev. Msgr. Thomas James CONATY, rector of the CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA. Fifty-three delegates from among the 102 Catholic colleges in the United States attended the first meeting, which was held April 12 to 13, 1899.

This first conference set the tone for those to follow. After a Mass at St. James Church in Chicago, the assembled delegates met for a day and a half to discuss in a candid manner the curricular core of Catholic higher education, its place in society, its relationship to business interests, and the problem of students drifting toward secular colleges. In an executive session the association appointed Conaty as its president and only officer and named a standing committee of six presidents (all priests) to draw up a constitution and bylaws and to consider options for unifying admission criteria, curricula, and teaching methods.

At this time most Catholic colleges were fragile institutions. Of the 129 Catholic men's colleges founded in the United States before 1875, 64 percent had ceased operations by 1899. An additional 14 colleges founded after 1875 had failed by the time of the association's inaugural meeting, mostly because of low enrollment, financial shortfalls, and growing governmental pressures on private colleges. The delegates adopted a resolution, "to condemn all unwarranted State interference with private rights and privileges" ("The Conference of Catholic Colleges" 1899, pp. 121–123).

Conaty similarly organized Catholic seminaries and parochial schools, and in 1904 the Catholic Educational Association (later the NCEA) was formed, with the Association of Catholic Colleges and Universities embedded as the College Department. From 1918 to 1929 the College Department became the Department of Colleges and Secondary Schools. In 1935, no longer a part of secondary education, it became the College and University Department. After a period of dramatic growth in Catholic higher education, in 1978 the association reclaimed its original name while remaining under the auspices of the NCEA. Finally, in 2000 the association resumed independent status as a separate tax-exempt association headquartered in Washington, D.C.

The History. Kathleen Mahoney has written that the association's history is divided into three periods ("One Hundred Years," 1999). The first two decades focused on internal collegiate affairs including purposes, curricula, viability, pastoral concerns, and tensions between Catholic colleges and universities. By the middle of this period the association was equally concerned that more than twice as many Catholics were attending non-Catholic colleges as Catholic institutions. Nevertheless, the Church hierarchy declined to direct Catholics toward Catholic colleges as it had done for Catholic schools. A spurt of colleges founded by women's religious congregations led the College Department to establish a section on Catholic Colleges for Women in 1917.

The association's second period, from World War I to the early 1960s, emphasized relationships with the broader academic community, the federal government, and Catholic secondary education. Responding to a national drive toward uniform accreditation standards, the College Department determined in 1918 that only thirty-eight Catholic men's colleges and fourteen women's colleges met its own standards and that most institutions remained small. In 1920 Catholic institutions were educating 5.6 percent of the nation's college students, but as late as 1926 only eighteen Catholic colleges had three hundred or more undergraduate students. At the same time, from 1923 to 1927, graduate enrollment increased by 70 percent at the master's level and 83 percent at the doctoral level, leading the College Department in 1927 to form a Committee on Graduate Studies.

Concerns about quality remained throughout this middle period of the association. By 1938, 76 percent of Catholic colleges met secular accreditation standards, and this achievement allowed the College and University Department to abandon its own accreditation process but not its concern about Catholic curricular content. By 1950 Catholic institutions were educating 11 percent of the nation's college students and in many respects had joined the mainstream of American higher education. However, as Msgr. John Tracy Ellis concluded in 1955, Catholic colleges and universities were not yet of a standard sufficient to make significant contributions to society's intellectual life.

The third period of the association, which is still in progress, is one of dramatic expansion coupled with pronounced self-scrutiny. VATICAN COUNCIL II, concurrent with a period of civic unrest, ushered in an era of unprecedented change in Church, society, and higher education. The College and University Department responded vigorously to the challenges and opportunities of LAICIZATION, rapid growth, secularization, competition, government regulation, and several high-profile academic-freedom cases. In 1966, on the heels of the Reverend Charles Curran case at The Catholic University of America, the College and University Department established a Committee on Academic Freedom. The next year Reverend Theodore M. Hesburgh, CSC, president of the University of Notre Dame, convened a group of twenty-six leading Catholic educators and bishops to draft a paper titled "The Nature of the Contemporary Catholic University." Popularly known as the "Land O'Lakes Statement," the paper asserted that Catholic universities must enjoy "autonomy and academic freedom in the face of authority of whatever kind, lay or clerical, external to the academic community itself" (Gallin 1992, p. 7). The International Federation of Catholic Universities encoded this principle in its 1972 document "The Catholic University in the Modern World," which the Holy See's Congregation for Catholic Education received with reservations.

Government and Church oversight of Catholic higher education mounted during the 1970s and beyond. Federal largesse, fueled by the Higher Education Act of 1965, brought extensive new regulation. In addition, several states, notably New York, threatened to withdraw funding for church-related colleges. The College and University Department responded by providing legal counsel and legislative advocacy. Soon after, Church authorities began to systematically push back against SECULARIZATION. In 1983 the new Code of Canon Law brought all Catholic colleges, even those established with civil charters, under the authority of the Church hierarchy. Led by Alice Gallin, O.S.U. (1980–1992), and later Monika K. Hellwig (1996–2005), the Association of Catholic Colleges and Universities organized regional, national, and international conversations about the mission and autonomy of its member institutions. These dialogues at times became strained, especially in connection with juridical elements of Pope JOHN PAUL II's apostolic letter Ex corde ecclesiae (1990) and the process to devise norms for its implementation in the United States. The dialogue continued from the mid-1980s, when Ex corde ecclesiae first circulated in draft form, through 2000, when implementation guidelines for the United States were approved by the Holy See. Some contentiousness remained thereafter, but structured dialogue with the Holy See essentially ended in 2000. Much of the history of this period is contained in the association's journal, Current Issues in Catholic Higher Education, published since 1980.

Today the association represents 200 of the nation's Catholic colleges and universities plus nearly two dozen international affiliate universities. Through its annual conference, peace and justice initiatives, Rome Seminar, workshops for faculty and administrators, research and consultation services, quarterly online newsletter Update, and Web site, the association strengthens Catholic higher education in the United States and serves as its collective voice.

SEE ALSO CURRAN, CHARLES; EDUCATION (PHILOSOPHY OF); EDUCATION, CATHOLIC (HIGHER) IN THE UNITED STATES; EDUCATION, CATHOLIC (K THROUGH 12) IN THE UNITED STATES; ELLIS, JOHN TRACY; HESBURGH, THEODORE MARTIN; NATIONAL CATHOLIC EDUCATIONAL ASSOCIATION (NCEA).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Association of Catholic Colleges and Universities Official Web site, available from http://www.accunet.org (accessed March 31, 2008).

"The Conference of Catholic Colleges." Woodstock Letters 28 (1899): 121–123.

John Tracy Ellis, "American Catholics and the Intellectual Life," Thought 30 (Autumn 1955): 351–388.

Alice Gallin, O.S.U., ed., American Catholic Higher Education: Essential Documents, 1967–1990 (Notre Dame, Ind. 1992).

Alice Gallin, O.S.U., ed., Ex corde ecclesiae: Documents concerning Reception and Implementation (Notre Dame, Ind. 2006).

International Federation of Catholic Universities, "The Catholic University in the Modern World" (Rome 1972).

"Land O'Lakes Statement on the Nature of the Contemporary Catholic University" Position Paper adopted July 20–23, 1967, by seminar participants at Land O'Lakes, Wisc., available from http://consortium.villanova.edu/excorde/landlake.htm (accessed April 1, 2008).

Kathleen A. Mahoney, "One Hundred Years: The Association of Catholic Colleges and Universities," Current Issues in Catholic Higher Education 19, no.2 (Spring 1999): 3-46.

Edward J. Power, A History of Catholic Higher Education in the United States (Milwaukee, Wisc. 1958).

Tracy Schier and Cynthia Russett, eds., Catholic Women's Colleges in America (Baltimore 2002).

Richard A. Yanikoski
President/CEO
Association of Catholic Colleges and Universities (2010)

ASSUMPTION, RELIGIOUS OF THE

(Religieuses de l'Assomption, RA; Official Catholic Directory #3390) The Religious of the Assumption is a congregation of teaching sisters with papal approbation (1888), founded in 1839 by St. Mother MARIE EUGÉNIE DE JÉSUS (Anne Eugénie Milleret de Brou, d. 1898, beatified February 9, 1975 by Pope Paul VI; canonized June 3, 2007 by Pope Benedict XVI) at Paris, France, where the Generalate is located.

The congregation is semicontemplative, combining elements of prayer with an active ministry of the transformation of society through Christian education, catechetical, and mission work. In the lifetime of the founder, the congregation grew from a single community of five young women in Paris to become a well-recognized and robust religious order, establishing itself in France, England, Spain, Italy, the Philippines, Nicaragua, and El Salvador. The sisters arrived in the U.S. in 1919, establishing the first community in Pennsylvania, where the provincialate is located. In the U.S., the congregation is engaged in education, spiritual direction, youth formation, counseling, campus ministry, and pastoral and social outreach. In 2009 there were 1,198 sisters in 165 houses located in 34 countries in Europe, Africa, Asia, and the Americas (Catholic Almanac 2010, p. 487).

SEE ALSO ASSUMPTION OF MARY; RELIGIOUS (MEN AND WOMEN).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Gäetan Bernoville, Les Religieuses de l'Assomption (Paris 1948).

Helene-Marie Bories, St. Marie Eugenie Milleret: A Woman's Spiritual Search in 19th Century France (1992).

Alice Lady Lovat, Life of Mère Marie Eugénie Milleret de Brou (London 1925).

Cyril Charlie Martindale, The Foundress of the Sisters of the Assumption (London 1936).

Religious of the Assumption Official Web site, available from http://www.assumptionsisters.org/ (accessed October 2, 2009).

Mother Marie-Denyse Blachère RA
Superior General
Institut de l'Assomption, Paris, France

EDS (2010)

ATOMIC ENERGY

The turn of the twentieth century witnessed the first scientific research into the potential of atomic energy. Discoveries by Marie Curie (1867–1934), Ernest Rutherford (1871–1937), and Albert EINSTEIN advanced the understanding of atomic structure, radioactivity, and quantum mechanics and raised hopes that the controlled splitting of the atom would bring great benefits to humankind. Naturally occurring radioactive elements such as uranium and various isotopes, if properly mined, processed, and concentrated, held the promise of releasing great quantities of energy that might provide for many human needs.

But military applications preceded any civilian benefits when various powers participating in the Second World War attempted to develop an atomic bomb for combat. In the end, the United States pioneered the process of successful nuclear fission. American scientists in 1939 engineered the first self-sustaining chain reactions and contributed to the secret Manhattan Project. This led to the testing and subsequent deployment of atomic bombs against Japan at Hiroshima and Nagasaki in August 1945. The nuclear explosions over those two cities killed hundreds of thousands of civilians and concluded WORLD WAR II. Later military uses of atomic energy included the development of nuclear submarines as well as advanced hydrogen and neutron bombs. Beyond the days of the nuclear rivalry between the United States and the former Soviet Union, more countries joined the formerly exclusive "nuclear club" by testing nuclear warheads and long-range delivery systems.

Dawn of the Atomic Age. The atomic age dawned in earnest in the 1950s, with a tide of optimism regarding many possible civilian applications for nuclear technologies: for low-cost power generation to replace fossil fuels, for medical purposes such as X-rays and radiation therapy, and for industrial uses such as the preservation of foods through irradiation.

In subsequent decades enthusiasm diminished as the dangers of nuclear energy came to the fore with the 1979 accident at Pennsylvania's Three Mile Island nuclear power plant and the 1986 release of radioactive fallout at the Chernobyl nuclear reactor in Ukraine. Although neither incident involved the nightmare scenario of a full-scale nuclear meltdown, critics of the nuclear industry pointed to each mishap as evidence of a systemic breakdown in safety and evacuation procedures. Subsequent decades have witnessed far less ambitious plans for the growth of nuclear power, with a marked reluctance on the part of all nations in the nuclear club to locate atomic plants near heavily populated areas. Ongoing concerns about exposure to nuclear radiation, the uncontrolled production of fissionable materials, and the storage and disposal of radioactive waste products with extremely long half-lives prompts significant opposition to the nuclear industry.

Worldwide anti-nuclear protests garnered much attention throughout the 1970s and 1980s, as a populist movement emphasized the short-term hazards and long-term risks of continued reliance on nuclear power plants. In response, advocates of atomic power continue to tout nuclear energy as cleaner and more reliable than fossil fuels such as coal, petroleum, and natural gas, and less likely to contribute to global climate change. As scientific evidence of global warming due to carbon dioxide emissions mounted after the turn of the twenty-first century, many nations supported the use of non-fossil fuels such as nuclear materials. A key phrase in all such debates on alternative energy sources is environmental sustainability. Commentary on the crucial issue of providing for burgeoning world energy needs has increasingly employed this new metric in evaluating the merits of nuclear power and its proper place in generating electricity for residential and commercial use. Debates over national and international energy planning have generally hinged upon perceived trade-offs between safety concerns and ecological preservation. Some energy experts are eager to include nuclear energy among the eco-friendly alternative technologies, while others sharply oppose nuclear energy as neither sustainable nor renewable in the same sense as solar and wind-generated power. So far, international opinion has arrived at no clear consensus on the wisdom of greater reliance on nuclear energy to meet growing world demand.

Ethical Considerations. Ethical treatments of the topic of atomic energy tend to distinguish sharply between civilian and military uses, and Catholic social teaching on the topic follows this pattern. Regarding nonmilitary purposes, official Church voices generally express measured enthusiasm for the peaceful employment of nuclear energy. For instance, Pope JOHN XXIII's 1961 encyclical Mater et magistra listed "the discovery of atomic energy" as a key sign of human progress in our age (no. 47). Catholic leaders in many countries have also expressed reservations about potential dangers of unchecked nuclear technology, particularly health effects of exposure to radiation due to mishaps in the nuclear industry.

The two categories of military use of nuclear weapons are actual use and deterrence. The criteria of the just war theory appear to rule out any justifiable use of nuclear weapons. Like all weapons of mass destruction, nuclear bombs fail the traditional moral tests of proportionality and noncombatant immunity. The difficulty of containing the effects of nuclear weapons and the great likelihood of escalation of any nuclear conflict suggest the inherent immorality of crossing the nuclear threshold in combat. The Vatican II document Gaudium et spes (no. 80) expresses the Church's "unequivocal and unhesitating condemnation" of any acts of war or any weapons that are incapable of discriminating between military and civilian targets. Even the use of smaller, tactical nuclear weapons appears inherently indiscriminate and therefore morally objectionable because of their destructive effects on civilian populations and the natural environment. The nuclear bomb earns its name as the ultimate weapon and renders obsolete many traditional categories for justifying the limited use of force.

But if the actual use of such weapons is morally out of bounds, can society still justify the deployment of nuclear bombs and missiles as deterrents against aggression? Can a nation threaten to do what it is morally forbidden to do? Especially in the context of the Cold War, Catholics frequently referred to the matter of nuclear deterrence policy as the hardest question of all, because the seeming success of such an approach in preventing shooting wars was matched by its inherent character as a balance of terror. Ever since the ROMAN EMPIRE relied upon the dictum, "if you seek peace, prepare for war," people of conscience have found morally unsatisfying the argument that true peace can be based on shared fears of annihilation, as the Cold War doctrine of "mutually assured destruction" (M.A.D.) professed.

Catholic Church Stance. When the UNITED STATES CONFERENCE OF CATHOLIC BISHOPS studied these questions, it reached conclusions that constituted a sharp critique of American foreign and defense policy. Thus, the 1983 Pastoral Letter The Challenge of Peace: God's Promise and Our Response offered a strictly conditioned acceptance of any deterrence strategy that routinely targets civilians. Such practices may be tolerated only as long as good-faith efforts are proceeding to eliminate the necessity of nuclear weapons. In light of their follow-up document, The Harvest of Justice Is Sown in Peace (1993), and several other prominent statements supporting arms control and reductions in nuclear weaponry, the U.S. bishops have staked out a highly principled stance as consistent advocates for drastic changes in the nuclear status quo.

The VATICAN has also contributed to the ongoing debate over the morality of nuclear deterrence. Pope PAUL VI pleaded for arms reductions throughout his pontificate, sending extraordinary messages to special sessions of the United Nations General Assembly that dealt with nuclear disarmament in 1965 and 1978. JOHN PAUL II also frequently offered appeals for arms control, both before and after the fall of COMMUNISM in 1989. The HOLY SEE and Vatican commissions have frequently called attention to the scandal of the arms race that robs the poor of desperately needed resources. Other Catholic voices echo their concerns. For example, the prominent American monk Thomas MERTON was an early advocate of nuclear disarmament and wrote eloquently against the waste of valuable resources by stockpiling nuclear warheads. Catholic pacifists, such as Gordon Zahn (1918–2007) and James Douglass, and activist organizations, such as Pax Christi and the Catholic Worker, have advocated the reduction and even elimination of nuclear weapons.

Differing Opinions Among Catholic Scholars. By way of contrast, the community of Catholic scholars is rather divided between doves and hawks. Certain theologians exhibit great aversion to the continued use of nuclear weapons as deterrents, while others appear more comfortable with the nuclear status quo. Representatives of the former category include David Hollenbach, Thomas A. Shannon, and Joseph Fahey, who emphasize the imperative of active peacemaking and the dangers of reliance on deterrence, even after the Cold War. In the latter category are Michael Novak and George Weigel, who promote the model of a balance of power as the best guarantor of stability and protection for the freedoms of Western society. They emphasize nations' rights to self-defense and are suspicious of the internationalist idealism displayed by the "peace bishops" and by Pope John XXIII in his 1963 encyclical Pacem in terris.

The seeming clash of opinions among Catholic scholars regarding the deterrent effects of nuclear weapons should not obscure underlying points of agreement. Nobody sincerely espousing a worldview shaped by Catholic social teaching wishes to see a single nuclear warhead unleashed anywhere in the world, with either offensive or defensive intention. Similarly, even considering the range of legitimate opinions on the use of force in general, no parties to the conversation within the Catholic community would deny the basic principle that nations possess a right to self-defense and self-determination as well as immunity from intimidation at the hands of aggressors. Any nation possessing nuclear weapons will, ipso facto, incorporate some degree of nuclear deterrence into its defense posture. Finer questions naturally arise regarding the active targeting of nuclear missiles at the territories and even cities of potential aggressor nations, as well as the official rhetoric surrounding national defense strategies.

Beyond divergent theological analyses of the morality of the bluff and how it relates to a nation's actual intentions to use the weapons in its possession, much of the disagreement within Catholic circles centers on matters related primarily to ecclesiology, particularly to reflection on the proper role of the Church in society. The Catholic debate over the ethics of nuclear deterrence reflects larger and deeper disagreements regarding preferences in the Church position on all public policies that inherently involve moral compromises. Is the proper role of the Church consistently to cling to the moral high ground, even at the sacrifice of some measure of realism in its policy recommendations? Or is it allowable for Church voices to lend legitimacy to a defense strategy that contains major ethical compromises, justified in the name of necessity? For Catholic voices to remain credible and constructive, they must maintain a careful balance between the prophetic and the practical, as the U.S. bishops achieve in The Challenge of Peace. Neither excessive capitulation to considerations of realpolitik nor an exaggerated sentimentalism in defense policy will serve the Church and the world well. While it is not hard to forge agreement on the eventual goals of disarmament and a world free of nuclear weapons, the Catholic theological community will likely continue to display a variety of interim ethics on the subject of nuclear deterrence.

International Atomic Energy Association. Since 1957, the UN-sponsored International Atomic Energy Association (IAEA) has promoted the safe and peaceful uses of nuclear energy. The IAEA has spearheaded worldwide cooperation for nuclear safety and security involving nations and non-state actors alike. The Catholic Church has frequently expressed its support for the work of this international agency in recent decades, perhaps most notably in Pope BENEDICT XVI's ANGELUS Address of July 29, 2007, which celebrates the fiftieth anniversary of the IAEA. The following year, Archbishop Dominique Mamberti (in his capacity as secretary for the Holy See's Relations with States) delivered a groundbreaking address at the 52nd General Conference of the IAEA, held in Vienna. In his statement on behalf of the Vatican delegation, Archbishop Mamberti linked the work of the IAEA to the Catholic social teaching principle of solidarity ("a more lively sense of belonging to the one human family") and the more recently articulated obligation regarding the "responsibility to protect" (no. 1). The hopes of Catholics and all people of good will for a future free of nuclear destruction lie with such international agencies that advocate for nuclear nonproliferation, test-ban treaties, and strategic arms limitation agreements. Such initiatives may move society closer to the vision of a world where atomic power is used exclusively for peaceful purposes.

SEE ALSO ATOMIC WEAPONS "NUCLEAR," HISTORY AND MORAL QUESTIONS CONCERNING; ATOMISM; CATHOLIC WORKER MOVEMENT; CHALLENGE OF PEACE, THE; COLD WAR AND THE PAPACY; COMMON GOOD AND CATHOLIC SOCIAL TEACHING, THE; MATER ET MAGISTRA; PACEM IN TERRIS; PAX CHRISTI INTERNATIONAL; VATICAN COUNCIL II.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

William A. Au, The Cross, the Flag and the Bomb: American Catholics Debate War and Peace, 1960–1983 (Westport, Conn. 1985).

Joseph J. Fahey, War and the Christian Conscience: Where Do You Stand? (Maryknoll, N.Y. 2005).

Edward J. Gratsch, The Holy See and the United Nations 1945–1995 (New York 1997).

David Hollenbach, Nuclear Ethics: A Christian Moral Argument (New York 1983).

John XXIII, Mater et magistra, On Christianity and Social Progress (Encyclical, May 15, 2003), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_xxiii/encyclicals/documents/hf_j-xxiii_enc_15051961_mater_en.html (accessed November 24, 2009).

Dominique Mamberti (Secretary for the Holy See's Relations with States), Statement at the 52nd General Conference of the International Atomic Energy Agency, Vienna, Vatican Web site, September 29, 2008, available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/secretariat_state/2008/documents/rc_seg-st_20080929_mamberti-iaea_en.html (accessed November 24, 2009).

Thomas J. Massaro and Thomas A. Shannon, Catholic Perspectives on Peace and War (New York 2003).

Michael Novak, Moral Clarity in the Nuclear Age (Nashville, Tenn. 1983).

Paul VI, Gaudium et spes, On the Church in the Modern World (Pastoral Constitution, December 7, 1965), available from http://www.vatican.va/archive/hist_councils/ii_vatican_council/documents/vat-ii_cons_19651207_gaudium-et-spes_en.html (accessed November 24, 2008).

Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace. The International Arms Trade: An Ethical Reflection (Vatican City 1994).

William H. Rauckhorst, "The Ethics of Energy Choice: On the Moral Demands of Environmental Policy," America, 201, no. 1 (July 6, 2009): 19–21.

George Weigel, The Peace Bishops and the Arms Race: Can Religious Leadership Help in Preventing War? (Chicago 1982).

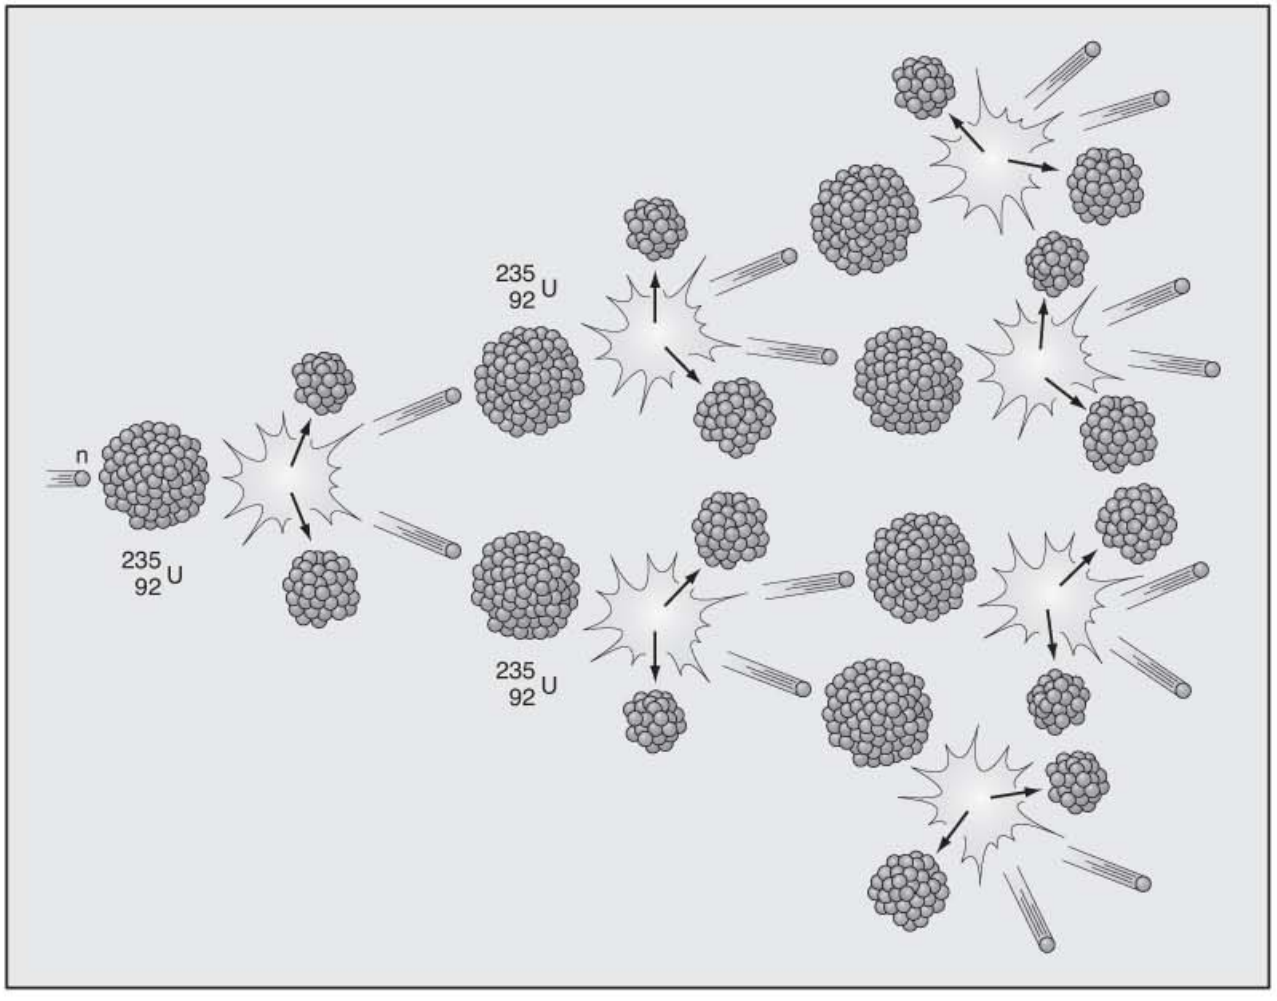
Thomas J. Massaro SJ
Boston College School of Theology and Ministry
Chestnut Hill, Mass.

ATOMIC WEAPONS, "NUCLEAR," HISTORY AND MORAL QUESTIONS CONCERNING

The adjective nuclear means "pertaining to the nucleus of an atom." A nuclear bomb is a weapon that derives its destructive power from energy released from an atom's nucleus through either fission or fusion. Nuclear fission is the process by which an atom splits into smaller fragments, and nuclear fusion the process by which multiple atomic nuclei fuse together to form a heavier nucleus. In both cases energy is released. In harnessing this energy for use in a weapon of mass destruction, hundreds of trillions of nuclear fissions or fusions must be made to occur within a very short period of time.

The first generation of nuclear weapons were fission bombs. In the atomic bomb dropped on Hiroshima (nicknamed "Little Boy"), uranium-235 (U^{235}) was used (the number 235 because its nucleus contains 143 neutrons and 92 protons). The Nagasaki bomb (nicknamed "Fat Man") used plutonium-239 (PU^{239}). U^{235} and PU^{239} were chosen because of their propensities to undergo fission (the nuclei of other elements are more stable and do not easily split).



Consider fission in U^{235}. If a single free neutron penetrates the U^{235} nucleus, the nucleus splits releasing fragments that include two or three more free neutrons plus 200 MeV (million electron volts) of energy: (U^{235} + n → fission + 2 or 3 n + 200 MeV). The two or three free neutrons then collide with two or three more U^{235} atoms, causing each nucleus to split. With each generation the number of fissions increases exponentially. In eighty generations about 6×10^{23} fissions (or one mole) occur if a self-sustaining chain reaction can be generated. This releases approximately 2.3×10^{13} joules of energy, equivalent to about 5,500 tons of TNT. A chain reaction in a piece of U^{235} the size of a grain of rice can generate energy equivalent to three tons of coal or fourteen barrels of oil. The Little Boy atomic bomb contained 64 kilograms of U^{235}. (Fat Man contained 6.2 kg of enriched plutonium.)

After WORLD WAR II, a second generation of more powerful nuclear weapons was developed using energy released through nuclear fusion. The process of fusion involves combining, or fusing, multiple nuclei of lighter elements, such as the hydrogen isotopes tritium and deuterium, into more stable heavy elements. Corresponding to the generation of the new, more stable nucleus is the liberation of significant amounts of energy. But extremely high temperatures are required to drive the fusion process. And so fusion weapons, also called thermonuclear weapons (or hydrogen bombs), combine in rapid succession both fission and fusion reactions. An initial, or primary, fission stage generates the necessary high temperatures to ignite the secondary fusion stage, which in turn liberates more neutrons to fuel further fission reactions. The yield of energy of this type of weapon is theoretically limitless. Whereas the two bombs dropped on Japan each had yields of 15,000–20,000 tons of TNT, thermonuclear weapons can generate explosive yields equivalent to hundreds of millions of tons of TNT.

History of Nuclear Weapons. In 1898 French physicist Pierre Curie and his Polish wife, Marie Curie, discovered the radioactive elements radium and polonium. They found the elements radiated energy at a rate greater than any chemical process could account for. In 1905 German physicist Albert EINSTEIN (1879–1955) published his Special Theory of Relativity, which helped explain the relationship between mass and energy. He proved that the amount of energy in an object equals its mass multiplied by the square of the speed of light (186,282 miles per second) showing that a small amount of matter can yield an enormous amount of energy.

In 1932 British physicist James Chadwick, assistant to the famous experimental physicist Ernest Rutherford, confirmed the existence of the neutron: it possessed no electrical charge and so could pass through the electrical barriers of a nucleus and penetrate the nucleus itself. Atomic physics was turning to the question of how to compel the nucleus to give up its enormous energy. According to the account of historian Richard Rhodes, that same year Leó Szilárd, a Hungarian-American physicist, who later was assigned to work on the Manhattan Project, wrote: "If I wanted to contribute something to save mankind, then I would probably go into nuclear physics, because only through the liberation of atomic energy could we attain the means which would enable man not only to leave the earth but to leave the solar system" (Rhodes 1986, p. 25). Two years later, Szilárd submitted the first patent for a method for generating a self-sustaining nuclear chain reaction (i.e., a nuclear explosion). In 1938 three German scientists, Otto Hahn (1879–1968), Lise Meitner (1878–1968), and Fritz Strassmann (1902–1980), demonstrated that when a uranium atom is bombarded by a single free neutron the atomic nucleus splits; in the process it emits additional free neutrons (nuclear fission).

On August 2, 1939, on the eve of the start of World War II, Albert Einstein reluctantly sent a letter to President Roosevelt informing him of rapid advances in German attempts to purify uranium-235 and its potential for producing a super-bomb. The letter prompted Roosevelt to form a committee to investigate the military implications of atomic research. In September 1942 the president formed the Manhattan Project to secretly build an atomic bomb before the Germans did. He placed it under the directorship of Robert Oppenheimer. In December 1942 two members of the project, Enrico Fermi and Leo Szilárd, demonstrated the first self-sustaining nuclear chain reaction in a lab under the squash courts at the University of Chicago. Oppenheimer, though encouraged by the project's success, is said to have quoted the Bhagavad Gita: "I am become Death, the destroyer of worlds." Kenneth T. Bainbridge, the gruff physicist and director of the test, told Oppenheimer, "Now we're all sons of bitches." Two and a half years later during the dawn of July 16, 1945, the first atomic bomb, named Trinity, was detonated at a remote site near Alamogordo, New Mexico, illustrating in horrifying graphics the validity of Einstein's famous equation, $E = MC^2$.

A Nuclear Chain Reaction. Shown here is the successive fissioning of ever-increasing numbers of uranium-235 atoms. ILLUSTRATION BY ARGOSY. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION OF GALE, A PART OF CENGAGE LEARNING

Three weeks later, on August 6, 1945, the B-29 Superfortress bomber named Enola Gay dropped a four-ton atomic bomb ("Little Boy") on the Japanese city of Hiroshima. The one bomb killed an estimated 90,000 people. Three days later, on August 9, a bomb ("Fat Man") containing several pounds of plutonium was dropped on Nagasaki. It left 40,000 dead. In both cities, the overwhelming majority of dead were civilians. Six days later, on August 14, Japan surrendered to the Allied Powers, officially ending the Pacific Campaign and hence World War II.

Over the next forty-five years, the United States and its allies challenged the Soviet Union and its allies in a race to create the most nuclear weapons. At its peak in the 1960s, the United States had approximately 32,000 nuclear weapons in its arsenal. On July 1, 1968, a Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons (NPT) was signed at Washington, London, and Moscow, and it entered into force in 1970. Its three main provisions included commitments to nonproliferation, disarmament, and the peaceful use of nuclear technology. The NPT contains the only international, multilateral agreement with any binding commitment to nuclear disarmament. It was extended indefinitely at its twenty-five-year review conference in 1995. The next review conference is scheduled for May 2010. Presently there are 189 countries party to the treaty, five of which possess nuclear weapons: the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Russia, and China (the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council). Israel, India, and Pakistan each possess nuclear weapons, and none is an NPT signatory. North Korea withdrew from the NPT in 2003. With the dissolution of the Soviet Union in the late 1980s, the process of decommissioning rapidly accelerated, although thousands of nuclear weapons still exist.

Catholic Teaching. The Catholic Church has steadfastly opposed the spread and use of nuclear weapons. Catholic

Fat Man. A mushroom cloud towers 20,000 feet above Nagasaki, Japan, following a second nuclear attack by the United States on August 9, 1945. The bombing—which took place three days after the first nuclear attack on Hiroshima—was followed by Japan's surrender on August 14, bringing an end to World War II. © BETTMANN/CORBIS opposition began even before the bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki. As early as February 1943, PIUS XII expressed the Church's grave concern about weapons of a type that could cause "a dangerous catastrophe for our entire planet" (February 21, 1943). The Church's explicit advocacy for abolition of nuclear weapons began soon after World War II. In 1953 Pius XII, while acknowledging the principle of the legitimate self-defense of nations, called for an international agreement to "proscribe" (proscrire) "ABC warfare" (i.e., atomic, biological, and chemical warfare) (October 19, 1953). He repeated the call in his Easter address of 1954. Turning his attention to the "new, destructive armaments unheard of in their capacity for violence," he wrote: "But, if everything is peace and joy in heaven, here on earth the cold hard facts are quite otherwise." He warned that such weapons "could cause the total extermination of all life, animal and vegetable, and of all the works of man over ever-widening regions." And he vowed to "tirelessly endeavor to bring about, by means of international agreement … the effective proscription and banishment of atomic, biological and chemical warfare" (April 18, 1954).

In September 1954 Pope Pius asked whether warfare using atomic bombs is "permissible as a matter of principle." His affirmative answer was qualified by four normative conditions: just grounds, necessary self-defense, last resort, and discriminate use. A nation has just grounds when it is faced with "an obvious, extremely serious, and otherwise unavoidable violation of justice." Even still, it cannot be justified unless and until recourse to this type of war "is deemed absolutely necessary as a means of self-defense"; further still, "every possible effort must be made to avert it through international agreements"; finally, its use must be strictly limited to defense against injustice and necessary safeguarding of "legitimate possessions"; if it ends as "the pure and simple annihilation of all human life within the radius of action," then "its use should be rejected as immoral" (September 30, 1954). The fourth principle, discriminate use, has carried most weight in the Church's subsequent moral analyses of nuclear weapons.

In his Christmas Radio Message of 1955, Pope Pius called on nations and their leaders—as "an obligation in conscience"—to support international conventions that will advance a threefold aim: (1) "renunciation of experimentation with atomic weapons"; (2) "renunciation of the use of such"; and (3) "general control of armaments." He starkly described a future where such conventions are eschewed:

> This is the spectacle offered to the terrified gaze as a result of such use: entire cities, even the largest and richest in art and history, wiped out; a pall of death over pulverized ruins, covering countless victims—their limbs burnt, twisted and scattered—while others groan in their death agony. Meanwhile the specter of a radioactive cloud hinders survivors from giving any help, and inexorably advances to snuff out any remaining life. There will be no song of victory, only the inconsolable weeping of humanity which in desolation will gaze upon the catastrophe brought on by its own folly (December 24, 1955). (cf. Benedict XVI, January 1, 2006)

Pius's successor, Pope JOHN XXIII, in his famous social encyclical of 1963, Pacem in terris, criticized the enormous global expenditure on armaments by developed countries—the "vast outlay of intellectual and material resources"—which ends up diverting needed social assistance away from underdeveloped countries (PT, 109; see also Mater et magistra, nos. 203–204). He rejected the belief that a balance of nuclear arms is the only means of assuring peace (PT, 110). Although he reluctantly agreed that "the monstrous power of modern weapons does indeed act as a deterrent," he said he feared "that the very testing of nuclear devices for war purposes can, if continued, lead to serious danger for various forms of life on earth" (no. 111). Following his predecessor, Pope John taught that "nuclear weapons must be banned" by a "general agreement … on a suitable disarmament program" and an "effective system of mutual control" (no. 112). He famously stated that because of the "terrifying destructive force" of modern weapons, "it no longer makes sense to maintain that war is a fit instrument with which to repair the violation of justice" (no. 127). In October 1965 Pope PAUL VI, repeating the message of his two predecessors, called on the member states of the United Nations to support comprehensive disarmament of "the terrible weapons that modern science has given you" (October 4, 1965) (cf. Address of Benedict XVI, April 10, 2008).

In 1965, drawing on Pius XII's teaching on necessary self-defense, Vatican II maintained in Gaudium et spes (GS) that the "massive and indiscriminate destruction" threatened by the new "scientific weapons" goes "far beyond the bounds of legitimate defense" (no. 80). The Council condemned "bellum totale" ("total war"), which it defines as "any act of war aimed indiscriminately at the destruction of entire cities or of extensive areas along with their population." To intend such destruction, the Council taught, "is a crime against God and man himself. It merits unequivocal and unhesitating condemnation" (no. 80; cf. CCC, no. 2314, Wilton Gregory, August 6, 2004).

Early in his pontificate, in June 1982, Pope JOHN PAUL II, following his predecessors as well as a 1981 recommendation of the Pontifical Academy of Sciences, urged an assembly at the United Nations to follow through with a nuclear arms reduction plan that is "balanced, simultaneous and internationally controlled" (June 7, 1982, no. 8); see PAS, October 7–8, 1981). To further support progressive disarmament, the HOLY SEE, in its capacity as a Permanent Observer to the United Nations, ratified the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty on February 25, 1971; it ratified the Comprehensive Nuclear-Test-Ban Treaty on July 18, 2001. In 1997, Archbishop Renato Martino, representing the Holy See, urged the U.N. Committee on Disarmament, in the Vatican's strongest admonition to date, to renew its effort in favor of nuclear disarmament:

> Nuclear weapons are incompatible with the peace we seek for the 21st century. They cannot be justified. They deserve condemnation. The preservation of the Non-Proliferation Treaty demands an unequivocal commitment to their abolition.... This is a moral challenge, a legal challenge and a political challenge. That multiple-based challenge must be met by the application of our humanity (October 15, 1997).

The U.S. bishops addressed nuclear weapons in their 1968 Pastoral Letter Human Life in Our Day, their 1976 statement To Live in Christ Jesus: A Pastoral Reflection on the Moral Life, and their 1983 Pastoral Letter The Challenge of Peace God's Promise and Our Response. In Human Life in Our Day, the bishops lament the "anti-life direction of technological warfare" illustrated in the destructive capacity of nuclear weapons, which "would leave entire cities intact, but totally without life" (no. 103). Recalling Pius XII and Vatican II's condemnation of total war, they reaffirmed the Council's call for "reciprocal or collective disarmament" (no. 107). In To Live in Christ Jesus they taught that the "first imperative" on those with nuclear weapons "is to prevent their use" (p. 34, quoted in Weigel, Tranquillitas Ordinis, p. 258). In the Challenge of Peace the bishops condemned "counter-population warfare," what Pius XII and Vatican II called "total war" (no. 147). They likewise condemned any "retaliatory action" using nuclear weapons that would not discriminate against the lives of the innocent (no. 148). On initiating a war using nuclear weapons, they stated: "We do not perceive any situation in which the deliberate initiation of nuclear warfare, on however restricted a scale, can be morally justified" (no. 150). They expressed grave skepticism on the question of a "limited" strategic use of nuclear weapons because of their uncertainty as to whether such weapons could ever be used without indiscriminately killing the innocent (no. 179).

In August 2005 William S. Skylstad, president of the UNITED STATES CONFERENCE OF CATHOLIC BISHOPS (USCCB), in a letter on the sixtieth anniversary of the bombings of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, wrote: "No matter how noble the ends of a war may be, they cannot justify employing means or weapons that fail to discriminate between noncombatants and combatants" (August 2, 2005). Bishop Howard Hubbard, addressing the U.S. Secretary of State in April 2009, went a step further: "Nuclear war is rejected in Church teaching because the use of nuclear weapons cannot insure noncombatant immunity" (April 8, 2009). Although what consistently has been rejected has not been nuclear war per se, but its indiscriminate use, his statement does express the increasing unconditional opposition within the American hierarchy toward the use and possession of nuclear weapons.

The Holy See on Nuclear Deterrence. The Catholic Church has never explicitly condemned the build up of nuclear weapons and provisional targeting of hostile nations for purposes of deterring acts of alien aggression. It has, however, been a constant antagonist against the logic of nuclear deterrent strategy; GS, n. 81, gives a clear expression of this position: "the arms race is an utterly treacherous trap for humanity" (Vatican II, GS, no. 81). We should also note that in condemning the type of retaliation that nuclear deterrent strategy usually threatens (e.g., in GS, n. 80, "the destruction of entire cities", GS, no. 80) Church teaching justifies a moral rejection of deterrent strategy under most concrete circumstances.

In June 1982 Pope John Paul II stated that nuclear deterrent strategy as a stage in a process toward complete disarmament "may still be judged morally acceptable." He insisted, however, that this is no more than a minimum "which is always susceptible to the real danger of explosion" (June 7, 1982, no. 8). The Catechism of the Catholic Church, after repeating Vatican II's condemnation of total war (no. 2314), taught that accumulating arms as a means of ensuring peace risks aggravating the causes of war, increases the danger of escalation, impedes efforts to aid countries in need, and thwarts international development (no. 2315; cf. 2329). In May 2005, the Holy See, again addressing the United Nations, said that "the time has come to re-examine the whole strategy of nuclear deterrence." Further:

> When the Holy See expressed its limited acceptance of nuclear deterrence during the Cold War, it was with the clearly stated condition that deterrence was only a step on the way towards progressive nuclear disarmament. The Holy See has never countenanced nuclear deterrence as a permanent measure, nor does it today when it is evident that nuclear deterrence drives the development of ever newer nuclear arms, > thus preventing genuine nuclear disarmament. (Celestino Migliore, May 4, 2005)

The United States Bishops on Nuclear Deterrence. The U.S. bishops have also long been critics of nuclear deterrence strategy. In Human Life in Our Day, without condemning the deterrent, they "seriously question[ed] ... the advantage to be gained by nuclear superiority" which only causes an escalation of the weapons resulting in a situation which is neither more stable nor secure (no. 113). The bishops pledged a "united effort toward forming a climate of public opinion for peace" and called on Catholics and all people of good will to pray for peace (nos. 114, 116). In 1979 John Cardinal Krol, on behalf of the U.S. bishops' conference, taught that, "Catholic dissatisfaction with nuclear deterrence and the urgency of the Catholic [ethic] demand that the nuclear arms race be reversed."

The bishops' most developed reflections on deterrence are made in their Pastoral Letter The Challenge of Peace. They stated that, "although we acknowledge the need for deterrence, not all forms of deterrence are morally acceptable." In particular they rejected policies that violate the principle of noncombatant immunity: "It is not morally acceptable to intend to kill the innocent as part of a strategy of deterring nuclear war" (no. 178). In light of the principle, they question the legitimacy of U.S. deterrent policy. Accepting uncritically the reply of "government officials" that U.S. policy does not target civilian populations as such, and conditioning their response on the grounds that the deterrent policy is practically consistent with the principle of proportionality, the bishops concluded: "These considerations of concrete elements of nuclear deterrence policy ... lead us to a strictly conditioned moral acceptance of nuclear deterrence." They followed their statement with a caveat: "We cannot consider it adequate as a long-term basis for peace" (no. 186; see also note 81).

In November 1993, on the tenth anniversary of The Challenge of Peace, the U.S. bishops wrote: "We must continue to say No to the very idea of nuclear war. A minimal nuclear deterrent may be justified only to deter the use of nuclear weapons" (November 17, 1993; no. E, 9, a, 1). Nearly five years later, in June 1998, seventy-five U.S. bishops, speaking for themselves and not for the conference, published a statement flatly rejecting U.S. deterrent policy:

> This [present deterrent policy] is clearly not the interim policy to which we grudgingly gave our moral approval in 1983.... We cannot delay any longer. Nuclear deterrence as a national policy must be condemned as morally abhorrent because it is the excuse and justification for the continued possession and further development of these horrendous weapons (June 1998).

Although this unconditional judgment was never explicitly adopted by the bishops' conference, some have argued that the logic in their statement in To Live in Christ Jesus, that "not only is it wrong to attack civilian populations, but it is also wrong to threaten to attack them as part of a strategy of deterrence" (p. 34, quote from Weigel, Tranquillitas Ordinis, 258), implies as much for the effective U.S. deterrent policy of the past several decades.

As recently as July 2009, the Archbishop of Baltimore, Edwin O'Brien, publicly reaffirmed the now twenty-six-year-old judgment of The Challenge of Peace on the limited acceptability of nuclear deterrent strategy: "[D]eterrence only has moral meaning in light of the goal of deterring the use of nuclear weapons as we work for a world without nuclear weapons" (July 29, 2009).

In The Challenge of Peace, the bishops referred to what they called the "political paradox of deterrence." They rhetorically asked: "May a nation threaten what it may never do? May it possess what it may never use?" (no. 137) Some have argued that had they pressed the moral logic of these questions, they might have been stricter in their opposition to the deterrent. One threatens what one wants another to believe one will do if the other does what one uses threats to avoid. Unless one is bluffing, one is ready to do what one threatens. But if doing something is immoral, then threatening to do it is immoral if one is prepared to act on the threat. Since U.S. deterrent policy is clearly no elaborate bluff, the United States is ready to obliterate extensively populated regions of the enemy's territory, which is never legitimate to do. How, then, can threatening to do this be legitimate, even as a stage toward nuclear disarmament? The French bishops responded elliptically in 1983 that "threat is not use," and the German bishops in the same year that an "emergency set of ethics" might justify temporarily tolerating a threat that would be immoral to carry out (Hollenbach 1989, pp. 59–60).

Moral Theology. Catholic theology too has analyzed the problem of nuclear war from the principle of noncombatant immunity. The influential Jesuit moral theologian John C. Ford, S.J., in an important essay published in 1944 in Theological Studies, set forth a practical conclusion central to any ethical deliberation over the legitimacy of military intervention: "the obliteration of great sections of cities ... means the abandonment of that distinction [between combatants and noncombatants]" (Ford 1970, p. 39); Ford, consequently, condemned the allied decision in World War II to carpet-bomb civilian German cities. Following a similar logic, Ford's predecessor in moral theology at

The Catholic University of America, Redemptorist theologian Francis J. Connell, C.Ss.R., harshly condemned the bombing of Hiroshima: "The destruction or maiming of hundreds of thousands of innocent persons," he wrote, "has inflicted a permanent blot of shame on the United States" (pp. 47–48). David Hollenbach has argued that the allied decision in World War II to subject civilian centers to obliteration bombing "provided a precedent for the development of strategies of counter-population nuclear warfare" (Hollenbach 1989, p. 63).

In 1961 the eminent Protestant ethicist Paul Ramsey likewise argued that intent to kill innocents was at the center of the moral analysis of nuclear war: "all-out nuclear war [Pius's "total war"] would be both directly willed and directly done as a means"; this, Ramsey maintained, "is murder" (Ramsey 1961, p. 51). John Courtney MURRAY in the same year agreed that if war includes an "unlimited use of nuclear force," as would be the case in a policy of final retaliation, then its use "is immoral" (Murray 1961, p. 14); but he was still confident at the time that skillful statesmen could craft a policy of genuinely "limited war" using nuclear weapons (Murray 1961, p. 15). In his 1985 book, The Logic of Deterrence, the Oxford moral philosopher Anthony Kenny argued that some use of nuclear weapons might be consistent with the principle of noncombatant immunity. Nevertheless, the risk of escalation posed by every use is too high to justify any use.

The American theologian who exercised most influence over the views on nuclear weapons expressed in The Challenge of Peace (COP) was Rev. J. Bryan Hehir, the associate secretary of the United States Catholic Conference's Office of International Justice and Peace from 1973 to 1984. Hehir supported a rejection of the use of nuclear weapons against civilian populations, as well as any national nuclear first-strike policy. He also shared the bishops' "extreme skepticism" that, given the danger of imminent escalation, even the use of small yield nuclear weapons could ever be morally legitimate; but, with the bishops, he drew short of nuclear pacifism. In the view of George Weigel, Hehir's influence over the COP epitomized in the bishops' statement: "We believe it is necessary, for the sake of prevention, to build a barrier against the concept of nuclear war as a viable strategy for defense" (no. 140), in other words, prevention is the first imperative.

Weigel, who has shifted the center of moral analysis over the permissibility of nuclear weapons from the principle of noncombatant immunity to the "larger context" of what he has referred to as "the interpenetration of morality and politics," harshly criticized Hehir's influence over the bishops' views on nuclear war. In his 1987 book Tranquillitas Ordinis, Weigel argued that their pastoral letter:

> represented a continuation of the abandonment of the classic Catholic heritage [on just war theory].... "The Challenge of Peace" was a decisive moment in that process, because it involved the adoption, by the National Conference of Catholic Bishops, of key themes of abandonment that had become pervasive in American Catholicism in the years following the Second Vatican Council. (p. 280)

A most grievous offense against the Catholic heritage, as conceived by Weigel, was Hehir's and the bishops' altering of the primary locus of moral consideration over the legitimacy of nuclear weapons: from a discussion of the duties of public authority to maintain the "tranquility of order" within the community of sinful men and women whose common good it is charged with upholding, to a "survivalist" approach that begins with the destructive capacity of the weapons themselves. The idea that physical human survival is the highest good to be pursued—the view that Weigel has charged the bishops, influenced by Hehir, with holding—"is not a theme compatible with Catholic ethics" (p. 281); he refered to it as "a survivalist antiethic" (p. 282), which leads to a naively "unilinear approach" to resolving complex problems of international conflict. According to Weigel, "Given Hehir's influence on the American hierarchy, his thought and work have been the crucial vessel through which the abandonment of the heritage was completed, not by activists or intellectuals or journalists, but by the Catholic bishops of the United States and their public policy agency, the United States Catholic Conference" (p. 324).

Michael Novak made similar criticisms of COP in his 1983 essay Moral Clarity in the Nuclear Age. According to Novak, the bishops presented a naively optimistic view of the international situation, failed to incorporate a frank assessment of the communist threat, and were unwilling to see that given real world conditions, the use of nuclear weapons might sometimes be justifiable. Additionally, their vocal call to public authorities for immediate bilateral agreements to "halt the testing, production, and deployment of new nuclear-weapons systems" (COP, no. 191, §1), pertained to prudential matters beyond their authoritative competency to teach, which is limited to matters of faith and morals: "[I]f the bishops voted for halt, they did so precisely not as bishops but as U.S. citizens." Consequently, Novak asserted that U.S. Catholics "are fully entitled to dissent" (p. 110). He believed that acting upon the bishops' admonition would be tantamount to abandoning the duty to the innocent and to the U.S. Constitution.

Perhaps the most systematic philosophical treatise on the problem of nuclear war was proposed by John Finnis, Joseph Boyle, and Germain Grisez (hereafter FBG) in their 1987 volume, Nuclear Deterrence, Morality and Realism. Here the central moral question considered is whether U.S. and U.K. deterrent policies are consistent with the exceptionless moral norm that it is never morally legitimate to intentionally kill the innocent: Do the U.S. and U.K. nuclear threats entail an intent to kill the innocent? "Innocent," they said, is not construed as morally "guiltless," but rather as pertaining to noncombatants. Combatants are those whose behavior, because involved in a gravely unjust threat to a just social order, Western common morality assimilates "to the behavior of those guilty of capital crimes." Innocents, therefore, are those who, on account of their behavior, are not subject to capital retribution:

> During warfare, members of the enemy society are engaged in many and diverse behaviors. Some of those could not be used to help verify the proposition, 'That society is at war with us'. Those engaged only in such performances are clearly non-combatants. Combatants are part of the remaining members of the enemy society. (p. 89)

FBG have argued that the Western deterrent, on account of its integral threats of "city swapping" and "final retaliation," includes necessarily a wrongful conditional intention to kill innocents:

> In any case where those who threaten ... are not bluffing, what they intend to do is what they threaten to do, and what they threaten to do is what they desire the other to fear from the actions they are threatening to carry out. Massive destruction of people including non-combatants is part of Western leaders desire the Soviet leadership to fear and take steps to make it fear. Since what they desire the other side to fear is what they threaten, and (unless they are bluffing) what they threaten is what they intend, they intend the killing of innocents. (p. 92)

Reflecting realistically on the consequences of the alternative, FBG have argued that because maintaining the deterrent entails maintaining the immoral intent to kill innocents, the United States (and the United Kingdom) "ought to renounce nuclear deterrence. They should do so at once. They should do so even though their unilaterally initiated renunciation would almost certainly go unreciprocated by the Soviets" (p. 329). In this they have followed the moral judgment against population targeting articulated by G.E.M. Anscombe in "Christians and Nuclear Weapons" (p. 238). Confronting the commonsense objection that their argument is perverse and unrealistic and makes the norm against killing innocents "a blackmailer's charter" (pp. 329–330), FBG have replied:

> The objections ... mistake the human significance of strict negative precepts. These are grounded in the dignity of the human person, for they protect the well-being—for example, the lives, the fidelity to basic commitments, and other goods—of real people. They do so ... by requiring unconditional respect for it on the part of anyone whose chosen act might directly destroy or harm that well-being in some basic aspect. Those who have adhered to these precepts have always been liable to destruction by the ruthless and unscrupulous who could be resisted or appeased only by atrocities. (330)

Although this conclusion seems harsh, it can be argued that this is no more than an implication of the moral truth, taught by St. Paul (e.g., Rom 3:8) and the whole Catholic moral tradition (until the advent of proportionalism), that evil should never be done so that good may come of it (see Rom 3:8). As John Courtney has written in his 1961 essay "Morality and Modern War": "a general annihilation, even of the enemy ... would be worse than injustice; it would be sheer folly.... If it means an honorable defeat, surrender may be morally tolerable... In contrast, annihilation is on every count morally intolerable." (p. 13)

SEE ALSO Catechism of the Catholic Church; Pacem in Terris; Paul, Apostle, St.; Proportionality, Principle of; Vatican Council II.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Background and History

Jeremy Bernstein, Nuclear Weapons: What You Need to Know (Cambridge, U.K. 2008).

Joseph Cirincione, Bomb Scare: The History and Future of Nuclear Weapons (New York 2007).

Federation of American Scientists, "Special Weapons Primer: Weapons of Mass Destruction. Nuclear Weapons Design," available from http://www.fas.org/nuke/intro/nuke/design.htm (accessed September 17, 2009).

Richard Rhodes, The Making of the Atomic Bomb (New York 1986).

Richard Rhodes, Dark Sun: The Making of the Hydrogen Bomb (New York 1995).

Robert Serber, The Los Alamos Primer: The First Lectures on How to Build an Atomic Bomb, edited by Richard Rhodes (Berkeley, Calif. 1992).

Ecclesiastical Statements (itemized chronologically)

Holy See

Pius XII, Address to Seventh Annual Meeting of the Pontifical Academy of Sciences, February 21, 1943, see: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 35 (1943): 75.

Pius XII, Speech to the members of the Sixteenth International Congress of Military Medicine, October 19, 1953, see: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 45 (1953): 749.

Pius XII, To the People Assembled in St. Peter's Square: The Threat of ABC Warfare, April 18, 1954, see: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 46 (1954): 212–14 (Latin); The Pope Speaks 1, no. 2 (1954): 133–34 (English).

Pius XII, Address to Participants in the Eighth Congress of the World Medical Association: The Doctor's Role in War and Peace, September 30, 1954, see: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 46 (1954): 589 (Latin); The Pope Speaks 1, no. 4 (1954): 349 (English).

Pius XII, Christmas Radio Message to the Whole World: Coexistence: Its Meaning and Its Future, December 24, 1954, see: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 47 (1955): 15 ff. (Latin); The Pope Speaks 2, no. 1 (1955): 3–16 (English).

Pius XII, Christmas Radio Message to the Whole World: The True Basis for Peace and Security, December, 24, 1955, see: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 48 (1956): 26 ff. (Latin); The Pope Speaks 2, no. 4 (Winter 1955–56): 311–312 (English).

John XXIII, Pacem in terris, On Establishing Universal Peace in Truth, Justice, Charity, and Liberty (Encyclical, April 11, 1963), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_xxiii/encyclicals/documents/hf_j-xxiii_enc_11041963_pacem_en.html (accessed September 17, 2009).

Paul VI, Address to the United Nations, October 4, 1965, see: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 57 (1965): 877–885.

Vatican Council II, Gaudium et spes, On the Church in the Modern World (Pastoral Constitution, December 7, 1965), available from http://www.vatican.va/archive/hist_councils/ii_vatican_council/documents/vat-ii_cons_19651207_gaudium-et-spes_en.html (accessed September 17, 2009).

Pontifical Academy of Sciences, Statement of the Consequences of the Use of Nuclear Weapons, October 7–8, 1981 (Vatican City 1981).

John Paul II, Message to the Second Special Session of the United Nations for Disarmament, June 7, 1982 available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/speeches/1996/documents/hf_jp-ii_mes_07061982_gen-assembly-onu_en.html (accessed September 17, 2009).

Pontifical Academy of Sciences, Declaration on Prevention of Nuclear War, September 23–24, 1982 (Vatican City 1982).

Catechism of the Catholic Church (1997), nos. 2314–15, 2328–29, available from http://www.vatican.va/archive/catechism/ccc_toc.htm (accessed September 17, 2009).

Renato Martino, Statement of the Holy See before the First Committee of the 52nd Session of the United Nations General Assembly, October 15, 1997, quoted in the Vatican's October 19, 1998 and October 14, 1999 statements, available from http://www.wagingpeace.org/articles/1998/10/19_martino-statement.htm and http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/secretariat_state/documents/rc_seg-st_doc_14101999_disarmament_en.html (accessed September 17, 2009).

Renato Martino, Statement of His Excellency Archbishop Renato R. Martino Apostolic Nuncio, Permanent Observer of the Holy See to the United Nations on Landmines, October 19, 1998, available from http://www.wagingpeace.org/articles/1998/10/19_martino-statement.htm (accessed September 17, 2009).

Renato Martino, Statement By H.E. Arch. Renato R. Martino, Apostolic Nuncio, Permanent Observer of the Holy See, before the First Committee of the General Assembly on Item 76, General and Complete Disarmament, October 14, 1999; available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/secretariat_state/documents/rc_seg-st_doc_14101999_disarmament_en.html (accessed September 17, 2009).

Pietro Parolin, Intervention By the Holy See at the Third Conference on Facilitating the Entry into Force of the Comprehensive Nuclear-Test-Ban-Treaty, September 4, 2003, available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/secretariat_state/2003/documents/rc_seg-st_20030904_ctbt_en.html (accessed September 17, 2009).

Celestino Migliore, Holy See's Address on Nuclear Disarmament to the 7th Review Conference of the States Parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons (NPT), May 4, 2005, available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/secretariat_state/2005/documents/rc_seg-st_20050504_migliore-npt_en.html (accessed September 17, 2009).

Benedict XVI, Message of His Holiness Pope Benedict XVI for the Celebration of the World Day of Peace, January 1, 2006, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/benedict_xvi/messages/peace/documents/hf_ben-xvi_mes_20051213_xxxix-world-day-peace_en.html (accessed September 17, 2009).

Celestino Migliore, Intervention by the Holy See at the First Commission of the 62nd Session of the General Assembly of the United Nations on: "General Debate on All Disarmament and International Security Agenda Items," October 16, 2007, available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/secretariat_state/2007/documents/rc_seg-st_20071016_disarmament-security_en.html (accessed September 17, 2009).

Benedict XVI, Letter of His Holiness Benedict XVI to Cardinal Renato Raffaele Martino on the Occasion of the International Seminar Organized by the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace on "Disarmament, Development and Peace. Prospects for Integral Disarmament," April 10, 2008, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/benedict_xvi/letters/2008/documents/hf_ben-xvi_let_20080410_pc-justice-peace_en.html (accessed September 17, 2009).

United States Catholic Conference of Bishops (USCCB)

National Conference of Catholic Bishops, "Pastoral Letter Human Life in Our Day (November 15, 1968)," in Pastoral Letters of the American Hierarchy 1792–1970, edited by Hugh J. Nolan (Huntington, Ind. 1971).

National Conference of Catholic Bishops, To Live In Christ Jesus: A Pastoral Reflection on the Moral Life (Washington, D.C. 1976).

John Cardinal Krol, "Testimony on Salt II," Origins (1979): 197.

National Conference of Catholic Bishops, "The Challenge of Peace: God's Promise and Our Response: A Pastoral Letter on War and Peace," Origins 13, no. 1 (May 19, 1983): 1–32.

United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, "The Harvest of Justice Is Sown in Peace," in A Reflection of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops on the Tenth Anniversary of The Challenge of Peace (Washington, D.C. 1994).

"75 U.S. Catholic Bishops Condemn Policy of Nuclear Deterrence, June 10, 1998," available from http://www.wagingpeace.org/articles/1998/06/10_catholic-bishops.htm (accessed September 17, 2009).

United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, Funding for New Nuclear Weapons Research, April 21, 2004, available from http://www.usccb.org/sdwp/international/alert404.shtml (accessed September 17, 2009).

Wilton D. Gregory, A Statement on Nuclear Weapons, August 6, 2004, available from http://www.usccb.org/sdwp/international/nwstatement.shtml (accessed September 17, 2009).

William S. Skylstad, Letter to Bishop Nagoya on 60th Anniversary of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, August 2, 2005, available from http://www.usccb.org/sdwp/international/hiroshima0805.shtml (accessed September 17, 2009).

Howard J. Hubbard, Letter to the Honorable Hillary Clinton, Secretary Of State, April 8, 2009, available from http://www.usccb.org/sdwp/international/2009-04-08-hubbard-nonproliferation-letter-hclinton.pdf (accessed September 17, 2009).

Edwin O'Brien, Nuclear Weapons and Moral Questions: The Path to Zero, July 29, 2009, available from http://www.usccb.org/sdwp/international/nuclear_weapons_and_moral_questions-obrien-2009.pdf (accessed September 17, 2009).

Ethics

G.E.M. Anscombe, "Christians and Nuclear Weapons Designed for the Destruction of Cities," in Faith in a Hard Ground: Essays on Religion, Philosophy, and Ethics by G.E.M. Anscombe, edited by Mary Geach and Luke Gormally (Exeter, U.K. 2008), 234–238.

G.E.M. Anscombe, "War and Murder," in War and Morality, edited by Richard A. Wasserstrom (Belmont, Calif. 1970), 42–53.

Francis J. Connell, C.Ss.R., Morals in Politics and Professions: A Guide for Catholics in Public Life (Westminster, Md. 1946).

James E. Dougherty, Bishops and Nuclear Weapons: The Catholic Pastoral Letter on War and Peace (Hamden, Conn. 1984).

John Finnis, Joseph Boyle, and Germain Grisez, Nuclear Deterrence, Morality and Realism (Oxford, U.K. 1987).

John C. Ford, S.J., "The Morality of Obliteration Bombing," in War and Morality, edited by Richard A. Wasserstrom (Belmont, Calif. 1970), 15–41; first published in Theological Studies 5 (1944): 261–309.

David Hollenbach, S.J., "Ethics in Distress: Can There Be Just Wars in the Nuclear Age?" in Ethics in the Nuclear Age: Strategy, Religious Studies, and the Churches, edited by Todd Whitmore (Dallas 1989), 59–78.

Anthony Kenny, The Logic of Deterrence: A Philosopher Looks at the Arguments For and Against Nuclear Disarmament (Chicago 1985).

John Courtney Murray, "Morality and Modern War," in The Moral Dilemma of Nuclear Weapons: Essays from Worldview: A Journal of Religion and International Affairs (New York 1961), 7–16.

Michael Novak, Moral Clarity in the Nuclear Age (Nashville, Tenn. 1983).

Paul Ramsey, "Right and Wrong Calculation," in The Moral Dilemma of Nuclear Weapons: Essays from Worldview: A Journal of Religion and International Affairs (New York 1961), 47–54.

George Weigel, Tranquillitas Ordinis: The Present Failure and Future Promise of American Catholic Thought on War and Peace (Oxford 1987).

E. Christian Brugger
Professor
St. John Vianney Theological Seminary,
Denver, Colo. (2010)

AUBERT, ROGER

Scholar, historian; b. January 16, 1914, Ixelles, Belgium.

A foremost contemporary Catholic scholar, historian, and leading authority on the history of Catholic social teaching, Canon Roger Aubert was born in Ixelles, Belgium, on January 16, 1914. He completed his secondary school studies in Greek and Latin at the Institut Saint-Boniface (today the Institut Saint-Boniface-Parnasse) in 1929 at the age of fifteen. He received his doctorate in History in 1933 from the University of Louvain and then pursued studies in theology at the Major Seminary in Malines, where he was ordained a priest in 1938. Between 1939 and 1945 Aubert earned the titles of bachelor, master, and doctor in theology at Louvain and became a canon in 1951. He was, in succession, a professor at the Major Seminary in Malines and at Louvain University, where, as of 2010, he was professor emeritus. An unequaled specialist in the history of the Church in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, Aubert has published more than 500 books, articles, and encyclopedia entries. A tireless scholar, who also helped edit the extensive Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique, he has been made doctor honoris causa by numerous universities, including Nimègue, Milan, Tübingen, and Graz.

Aubert's Publications. In 1952 the revered Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique came under the aupices of Professor Aubert, who ensured both its academic expansion and financial development. Published by the University of Louvain, the Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique is considered the standard for all scholarly work in Church history. Covering the entire history of Christianity, the Revue has a voluminous bibliography of more than 60,000 notices. Much of the success of the Revue is due to Aubert's leadership.

Aubert's writings and syntheses include such significant publications as The Church in a Secularized Society (1978), The History of Vatican I (1964), and his major contribution to the monumental Histoire de l'église, titled "Le Pontificat de Pie X" (1952). His 800-page work, Catholic Social Teaching: An Historical Perspective, is considered the most comprehensive written on that subject. An authority on Joseph Cardinal Mercier (Le Cardinal Mercier (1851–1926): Un prelat d'avant-garde; Les deux premiers grands conflits du Cardinal Mercier avec les autorites allemandes d'occupation), he has also written about Giacomo Cardinal ANTONELLI.

It has been noted that the best overview of historical theology remains Aubert's Handbuch fur Kirchengeschichte (1973), and also much acclaimed is his overview of nineteenth century LIBERALISM, "The Church in the Age of Liberalism" (1981) in The History of the Church (vol. 8). Indeed, no other historian in Catholic circles enjoys the reputation of Aubert. Some of his other major and notable works in French and English include: Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (1999), La fonction de l'origine en sciences humaines (1983), The Christian Centuries: A New History of the Catholic Church, The Church between Revolution and Restoration, The Church in a Secularized Society, The Church in the Industrial Age (1981), Historical Problems of Church Renewal, and Prophets in the Church.

Aubert's Contributions. Described as theologically liberal and ecclesiastically moderate, Aubert served as a theologian for the Second Vatican Council. During and after that Council, and later with Avery Cardinal DULLES and John Courtney MURRAY as well as a host of others, he defended the view that the council document Dignitatis humanae (Declaration on Religious Freedom) was a harmonious adaptation of, rather than a correction of, previous Catholic teaching. As the leading historian on Catholic social teachings, Aubert, beginning particularly with his studies on the background of Pope LEO XIII's encyclical Rerum novarum, has posited that such teachings rest on two fundamental anthropological principles: the dignity and sacredness of the human person, and the social nature of the person. In tracing the background to Rerum novarum, Aubert sees the beginnings of modern Catholic social teaching in earlier Catholic writings (pre-Leonine—before the beginning of the pontificate of Leo XIII in 1878), with antecedents as far back as the eighteenth century and then particularly in the nineteenth century, with such writers as Félécité Lamennais (Aubert has put forth, too, that, had the First Vatican Council not been interrupted in 1870, it might have taken up the social question). In that context Aubert emphasizes the initial teaching of "all for the people, nothing by the people," which underscores an earlier paternalistic approach to social questions (in citing Lamennais's journal, L'Avenir, Aubert notes that the writers should have been more careful in presenting the principles of democracy and liberty for assimilation into Church doctrine). Aubert has also demonstrated that an important starting point for nineteenth century Catholic social teaching was in Germany with the bishop of Mainz, Wilhelm Emmanuel, Baron von Ketteler, who wrote the significant The Worker Question and Christianity in 1864. An authority on Bishop von Ketteler, Aubert has demonstrated how that cleric was the first to present the social question as a problem of justice, not charity, and even to face the necessity of basic reform.

Catholic Social Teaching. Aubert sees modern Catholic social teaching as being articulated through papal, conciliar, and episcopal documents and, in his voluminous writings, a number of distinct areas or major themes clearly emerge. In accord with Aubert's interpretation, the bishops of the United States in a June 1998 statement expressed these themes thusly:

Emphasizing the life, sanctity, and dignity of the human person to underscore all the principles of social teaching, making this a statement against materialism, cloning, and capital punishment.

Appealing to family and community participation as a corrective to excessive individualism and as an affirmation of the role of government and other institutions in protecting human life and dignity and promote the common good.

Upholding rights and responsibilities, insisting that according to Catholic tradition both are necessary.

Providing options for the poor and the vulnerable, especially in contemporary society where divisions between rich and poor are deepening. This is in accord with the scriptural text of Matthew 25.

Upholding the dignity and rights of workers, particularly their right to engage in productive work, to receive decent and fair wages, to organize and unionize, to own private property, and to exercise economic initiative.

Believing in the solidarity of the human race, in spite of national, ethnic, ideological, and economic differences. The writings of Pope JOHN PAUL II (Sollicitudo Rei Socialis No. 38) especially emphasize this aspect of Catholic social teaching.

Caring for and protecting GOD's creation, particularly in a time of environmental conflict. Such care and protection of the Earth and all its inhabitants is indeed cited as an article of Catholic faith.

Aubert also posits that papal encyclicals and writings on Catholic social teaching that began with Rerum novarum, the principles of which were reiterated in Pope PIUS XI's Quadragesimo anno (1931), had already become more democratic during the pontificate of Pope BENEDICT XV (Annus iam pelnus, 1920), who authorized the establishment of the Italian Popular Party. This change was evident during the reign of Pope PIUS XII, who opened the door somewhat to democratic participation, and particularly during those of Popes JOHN XXIII (Mater et Magistra, 1961), PAUL VI (Populorum progressio, 1967), and JOHN PAUL II (Sollicitudo rei socialis, 1987). It continued, too, in the writing of Pope BENEDICT XVI, as put forth especially in his 2009 encyclical, Caritas in veritate, on social justice.

Sometimes classified as a thinker who is theologically liberal and ecclesiastically moderate, Aubert has also insisted in his writings on the need for a wide understanding of Socialism and the Socialist Movement, so as to better understand the Catholic Social Movement of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Even though a few may have questioned some of his conclusions (one cannot, however, fault Aubert, who in 1950 put forth Catholic society of Quebec as a model for a modern Catholic social order, for not foreseeing the rapid secularization of that region in the 1960s and 1970s), his erudition remains beyond reproach and his influence on more than one generation of Catholic historians and thinkers clearly must be acknowledged.

SEE ALSO CARITAS IN VERITATE; KETTELER, WILHELM EMMANUEL VON; LAMENNAIS, HUGUES FÉLICITÉ ROBERT DE; MATER ET MAGISTRA; MERCIER, DÉSIRÉ JOSEPH; POPULORUM PROGRESSIO; QUADRAGESIMO ANNO; RERUM NOVARUM; SOLLICITUDO REI SOCIALIS; VATICAN COUNCIL I; VATICAN COUNCIL II.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Roger Aubert, The Church in A Secularized Society (Glen Rock, N.J. 1977).

Roger Aubert, Historical Problems of Church Renewal (Glen Rock, N.J. 1988).

Roger Aubert, The Christian Centuries: A New History of the Catholic Church, vol. 5, translated by Janet Sondheimer, selected and annotated by Peter Ludlow (Glen Rock, N.J. 2000).

Roger Aubert, Catholic Social Teaching: An Historical Perspective, edited by David A. Boileau (Milwaukee, Wisc. 2003).

Roger Aubert et al., Church between Revolution and Restoration, vol. 7, edited by Hubert Jedin and John Dolan (New York 1998).

William Roberts
Professor of History and Social Sciences
Fairleigh Dickinson University, Teaneck, N.J. (2010)

AUSCHWITZ-BIRKENAU

Auschwitz was the principal Nazi concentration camp where Jews, Poles, Slavs, and Gypsies were killed during World War II. It was located near the Polish village of Oświęcim, about 33 miles from Kraków.

Establishment and History of Camp. When established in 1939, Auschwitz functioned primarily as a transit center for some 10,000 Poles who were to be sent to Germany as forced laborers. On April 27, 1940, Schutzstaffel (SS) leader Heinrich Himmler (1900–1945) ordered the construction of the concentration camp. In 1941, Himmler directed Rudolf Höss (1900–1947), who had gained experience at the Dachau and Sachsenhausen camps, to enlarge Auschwitz into the major camp for the Final Solution (Hitler's plan to annihilate the Jews of Europe) because of its ready railroad connections and its isolation from populated areas. Auschwitz played a unique role in the Nazi policy of mass murder. The five other death camps were Chelmno, Belzec, Sobibor, Majdanek, and Treblinka.

Auschwitz was soon expanded to include Birkenau, where most of the killing was to take place. The first thirty prisoners were German criminals whose job it was to control the future inmates. The first 728 Polish political prisoners arrived on June 14, 1941. The technical problems that arose in the creation of physical facilities to kill so many people led to experimentation with gas vans and the improvement of crematoriums. In September 1941, the first test of gassings using a pesticide known as Zyklon B (hydrogen cyanide) occurred, after which the SS had crematoriums built. Opened in October 1941, Birkenau became one of the three main camps in the Auschwitz complex. The first of forty subsidiary camps, it became known as Auschwitz II. In January 1942, the killing of Jews began at Birkenau, initially in two gas chambers located in converted houses. By spring 1943, four new gas chambers went into operation at Birkenau, producing 6,000–8,000 corpses in 24 hours. It is estimated that some two million people were killed at Auschwitz-Birkenau between 1942 and 1944. Through 1943 and 1944, more than 90 percent of the hundreds of thousands of Jews brought to Auschwitz were sent to the gas chambers. As trainloads of Jews arrived at the camp, two SS doctors examined the prisoners, making immediate decisions about which were fit to work and which were condemned to be gassed. After undressing and being told that they were to be deloused, the condemned were gassed to death in less than 15 minutes. Their bodies were stripped of valuables and burned in the crematoriums.

For those who lived, each day was a nightmare. Inmates arose at 5 A.M., the food was meager and caused diarrhea, and prisoners were worked to death. Guards laughed when they shot at women carrying children, and they taunted prisoners, saying that death would be their only way out of Auschwitz. Prisoners were routinely rousted from their barracks for medical inspections presided over by the notorious Dr. Josef Mengele (1911–1979), who arrived in May 1943 to become the camp physician. At the inspections he could send to the gas chambers those who showed weakness or disease. He also performed heinous medical experiments.

Moment of Prayer. Pope Benedict XVI prays in front of the monument for the victims of the Auschwitz-Birkenau concentration camp in Oświęcim, Poland, Sunday, May 28, 2006. AP IMAGES

Auschwitz was part of a vast industrial complex that included hundreds of German factories in the industrial region of Upper Silesia. Satellite camps came into existence, and the network included as many as three dozen locations. The German business I.G. Farben established factories where it produced synthetic oil and rubber. After the SS itself, I.G. Farben was the second-largest employer at Auschwitz; the Upper Silesian Hydrogenation Works was third, followed by Krupp industries. Employed in the I.G. Farben factories were camp laborers, hired Poles, and British prisoners of war. As many as 150,000 slave laborers died there.

As the Russian army approached in August 1944, the Nazis began to dismantle the camp, evacuating prisoners to Germany. On October 7, 1944, Jewish prisoners revolted and managed to blow up Crematorium IV; 450 were killed.

The total number of prisoners sent to Auschwitz was more than 1.3 million, out of which some 200,000 survived. About 90 percent of those who died at Auschwitz were Jews, including 46,000 from Czechoslovakia, 69,000 from France, 55,000 from Greece, 438,000 from Hungary, 60,000 from the Netherlands, and 300,000 from Poland. The remaining non-Jewish victims included 75,000 Poles, some 20,000 Gypsies, 15,000 Soviet prisoners of war, and 25,000 people of other nationalities.

Atrocities Revealed. There was reluctance among the Allies, the VATICAN, and the Jews themselves to believe the reports of Nazi atrocities in the extermination camps. As the Final Solution entered into full swing in 1942 in the camps of Auschwitz, Majdanek, and Treblinka, it took some months before the first information began to reach the West. In the summer of 1942, Myron Taylor (1874–1959), the U.S. envoy to the Vatican, informed Pope PIUS XII that Jews were being massacred in Eastern Europe. At first, the Vatican expressed skepticism that such barbarous behavior was true. The most important source for information of the atrocities at Auschwitz came through an escaped Jewish prisoner, Rudolf Vrba (1924–2006), whose detailed report—known as the Ausch-witz Protocol—revealed the horrors of Auschwitz to U.S. president Franklin Roosevelt (1882–1945), British prime minister Winston Churchill (1874–1965), and Pius XII. When the Soviet Red Army liberated Auschwitz-Birkenau on January 27, 1945, the Nazis abandoned the camp, leaving behind some 7,000 survivors and considerable evidence of their crimes, which made the death camp the symbol of the Nazi attempt to extinguish European Jewry.

Auschwitz-Birkenau as Symbol. The memory of Auschwitz became complicated in the following decades as it changed within a cultural and political framework. Not only was Auschwitz the site of Germany's most heinous crimes against the Jews, but also against Poles, Gypsies, Russians, and others. Liberated by the Soviets and located behind the Iron Curtain, Auschwitz also became a socialist shrine honoring the socialist hero and resistance fighter. For the Jews, the German name Auschwitz became the symbol of the HOLOCAUST (SHOAH), whereas the Polish name Oświęcim became a core symbol of Polish martyrdom, representing the attempt by the Nazis to physically and culturally annihilate the Polish nation. Finally, a Christian meaning was given to the memory of Auschwitz, through which the pope reframed it as a national Catholic symbol.

Pope John Paul II and Reconciliation. During the pontificate of JOHN PAUL II, Christian-Jewish relations were dramatically improved through his efforts at reconciliation. These efforts began with his visit to Auschwitz-Birkenau during his historical pilgrimage to Poland in June 1979. At the pope's Mass at Birkenau he described the camp as Poland's Golgotha, which emphasized a Polish national and Catholic perception of the past. The pope appropriated a Christian triumphalist interpretation that the Jews had died there shouldering Christ's CROSS. He also proclaimed the universal lessons of Auschwitz in a Christian framework that conflicted with Jewish interpretations of Auschwitz. The visit initiated Polish Catholic and Jewish conflicts, which started a battle of symbols, a virtual star-and-cross war that lasted into the 1990s. Nevertheless, the pope reverently halted before the monuments to the victims inscripted in many languages and in prayerful meditation commended them to divine mercy.

The Children of Auschwitz-Birkenau. This tragic image, taken from a post–World War II Soviet film, shows a group of captive Jewish children standing between two rows of barbed-wire fence in the concentration camp. UNITED STATES HOLOCAUST MEMORIAL MUSEUM (USHMM)

The picture of John Paul II kneeling before the Jewish memorial recognizing their tragic experiences in Auschwitz was an important step in raising Christian esteem for the Jewish people. He also honored the memory of Catholics martyred there, such as the Franciscan priest St. Maximilian KOLBE, who gave up his life for another prisoner in August 1941, and Edith STEIN, the Jewish convert who became a Carmelite nun and was canonized a saint in 1998. Stein had died because she had been born a Jew, but the pope claimed her as both a Jew and a Christian martyr of charity. Although the pope pleaded for ATONEMENT, he did not accept any responsibility for the Church and its popes for the Holocaust. Nonetheless, it signified his deep commitment to reconciliation between the Catholic Church and the Jewish people.

The pope expressed the wish that a place of PRAYER and penance could be established to atone for the murder of 1.5 million Jews, in addition to a quarter of a million non-Jewish Poles. In response, a CONVENT of Carmelite nuns was established at the gate of Auschwitz as a sign of atonement, and a 25-foot-high cross, which the pope had used when he celebrated Mass there, was planted. Not surprisingly, these were found to be offensive to Jewish sensibilities.

Pope John Paul II, however, continued his efforts to improve relations with the Jewish people. On numerous occasions he admitted the Church's historic responsibility for the persecution of the Jews. In 1986 he met the chief RABBI of ROME, Elio Toaff (1915–). He became the first pontiff to visit a SYNAGOGUE and deplored discrimination against the Jews by earlier popes. In his meetings with Jewish leaders he reiterated his condemnation of ANTI-SEMITISM and emphasized his fraternal SOLIDARITY with Jews as "elder brothers." In 1994 he prompted the Vatican's recognition of ISRAEL. That year he hosted the Papal Concert to Commemorate the Holocaust, to which he invited some 200 Holocaust survivors.

Vatican Remembers. In 1998 the Vatican Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews released its report We Remember: A Reflection on the Shoah, which called the HOLOCAUST (SHOAH) an "unspeakable tragedy that cannot be forgotten." The report was part of the pope's efforts to prepare the Church for the celebration of the millennium and an expression of sorrow and repentance for past sins. In the preface the pope expressed hope that the document would "help to heal the wounds of past misunderstandings and injustices." We Remember admitted that the prejudices of Christians probably made Nazi persecution of the Jews easier, admitted to the failures of Christians "to give assistance" to persecuted Jews, and generally repented for the "errors and failures" of Catholics. The document correctly did not assign blame for the Shoah to the Church as an institution, refusing to follow the example of earlier explicit apologies made by German and French bishops that acknowledged what the Germans called "the Church dimension" of the cataclysm (We Remember: A Reflection on the Shoah, IV).

Many Jews were disappointed that the Church did not take more responsibility and were saddened by the ringing defense of Pope Pius XII and his diplomacy during the war. Nonetheless, such criticisms of Pius XII tended to ignore the postwar thanks that Jewish leaders expressed to the pope for the thousands of Jewish lives that were saved through his efforts.

During John Paul II's pilgrimage to the HOLY LAND in March 2000, the pontiff broke new ground, both theologically and politically. When visiting Yad Vashem, the Jewish memorial of the Shoah, John Paul II continued his prayer "begging forgiveness and the conversion of hearts" (John Paul II, Message, p. 2).

Along with many other bishops who joined in the prayers of Pope John Paul II at Auschwitz in 1979 was Archbishop Joseph RATZINGER of Munich-Freising. He decided to come again on a pilgrimage of remembrance and reconciliation when he became Pope BENEDICT XVI to implore the grace of reconciliation from GOD and then from all those who suffered at Auschwitz. The pope recalled the anguish of the biblical psalmist DAVID and the victims of the Holocaust who cried out, asking how God could have permitted the slaughter and evil of the Shoah. Benedict called on all mankind to implore God to bring out the goodness and love in men's hearts and peace in the world. The pope ended his pilgrimage of remembrance and reconciliation to the "Valley of Darkness" with a prayer, the Twenty-Third Psalm of David.

SEE ALSO ANTI-JUDAISM; GENOCIDE; GERMANY, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; HITLER, ADOLF; JEWISH-CATHOLIC RELATIONS; JOHN PAUL II AND INTERRELIGIOUS DIALOGUE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Luigi Accattoli, When a Pope Asks Forgiveness: The Mea Culpa's of John Paul II, translated by Jordan Aumann (Boston 1998).

Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews, We Remember: A Reflection on the Shoah (Rome 1998), available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/pontifical_councils/chrstuni/documents/rc_pc_chrstuni_doc_16031998_shoah_en.html (accessed March 31, 2008).

Debórah Dwork and Robert Jan van Pelt, Auschwitz: 1270 to the Present (New York 1996).

David Gibson, The Rule of Benedict: Pope Benedict XVI and His Battle with the Modern World (San Francisco 2006).

Yisrael Gutman and Michael Berenbaum, eds., Anatomy of the Auschwitz Death Camp (Bloomington, Ind. 1994).

Jonathan Huener, Auschwitz, Poland and the Politics of Commemoration, 1945–1979 (Athens, Ohio 2003).

John Paul II, Message of His Holiness John Paul II on the Sixtieth Anniversary of the Liberation of the Prisoners of the Auschwitz-Birkenau Death Camp (Rome 2005), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/messages/pont_messages/2005/documents/hf_jp-ii_mes_20050127_auschwitz-birkenau_en.html (accessed March 31, 2008).

Emma Klein, The Battle for Auschwitz: Catholic-Jewish Relations under Strain (Portland, Ore. 2001).

Walter Laqueur, ed., The Holocaust Encyclopedia (New Haven 2001).

Anthony R.E. Rhodes, The Vatican in the Age of the Dictators, 1922–1945 (New York 1973).

Carol Rittner and John K. Roth, eds., Memory Offended: The Auschwitz Convent Controversy (New York 1991).

George Weigel, Witness to Hope: The Biography of Pope John Paul II (New York 1999).

Geneviève Zubrzycki, The Crosses of Auschwitz: Nationalism and Religion in Post-Communist Poland (Chicago 2006).

Joseph A. Biesinger
Professor Emeritus, Department of History
Eastern Kentucky University, Richmond (2010)

AVE MARIA TOWN, AVE MARIA UNIVERSITY

Ave Maria University is a coeducational institution of higher education in the Catholic tradition with a main campus in the southwestern Florida town of Ave Maria, situated in a rural area between the cities of Naples and Immokalee. It also has a branch campus in San Marcos, Nicaragua. As of 2010, the Florida campus of Ave Maria featured an undergraduate education with a liberal arts core and offered degrees in the liberal arts disciplines as well as biology, economics, and political science; it also had a graduate program in theology. The university had plans to develop programs offering preprofessional training at its Florida campus. As of 2010, the Nicaragua campus provided undergraduate students with a set of core courses and offered degrees in the liberal arts disciplines, along with courses and degrees in the psychological and social sciences and business administration. From its founding, Ave Maria has made its strong Catholic identity a priority, taking special guidance from Pope JOHN PAUL II's apostolic constitution on Catholic universities, Ex corde ecclesiae (1990). According to its mission statement, Ave Maria aims at "creating and maintaining an environment in which faith informs the life of the community and takes expression in all its programs." The university has also adopted the 1989 "profession of faith," formulated and issued by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, in which the NICENE CREED is reaffirmed and a commitment to abide by Church teaching in faith and morals is stated.

Founding in Michigan and First Few Years. On March 19, 1998, Ave Maria Institute was founded in Ypsilanti, Michigan, and began offering classes in September of the same year, with an enrollment of forty full- and part-time students and five faculty members. From the very beginning to the present day, the school has received a significant amount of its funding from Thomas S. Monaghan, the founder and former chief executive officer of Domino's Pizza, Inc.

So that the institution could begin awarding baccalaureate degrees, Ave Maria Institute soon became Ave Maria College, and a four-year program was developed. The Nicaragua campus was acquired in 2000 from the University of Mobile in Alabama, as a means of promoting Catholic higher education in Central America.

That same year an agreement was reached with St. Mary's College in Orchard Lake, Michigan, that made the latter a part of a new institution to be called Ave Maria University, which would also encompass Ave Maria College. The agreement, organized in part with the apparent goal of accelerating the institution's accreditation process, gave the board of Ave Maria effective control of St. Mary's and provided the Orchard Lake school with needed financial support. For various reasons, however, this arrangement proved to be short-lived. Ave Maria College was never fully integrated into the proposed university and eventually the relationship with St. Mary's was dissolved.

In 2001 members of the theology department at the Michigan campus of Ave Maria College founded the Aquinas Center for Theological Renewal, with the purpose of helping to reinvigorate Catholic academic theology by drawing on the thought of St. THOMAS AQUINAS in new ways and with an interest in promoting ecumenical dialogue. Through its conferences and publications, the Aquinas Center has significantly contributed toward a stimulating intellectual environment at Ave Maria.

Also in 2001 Ave Maria launched the Institute for Pastoral Theology, which offers graduate studies at the master's level at various sites throughout the United States. The program's faculty travel to several cities, including St. Louis, Phoenix, and Minneapolis, to teach monthly courses in theology. The Institute's first administration and faculty members had run a similar program at the University of Dallas, until they felt pressured by the administration there to leave and subsequently resigned from their positions.

Between 2001 and 2002 the college submitted various proposals to the Ann Arbor Township planning commission in efforts to move the Michigan campus from

The Oratory. Located at the center of Ave Maria University, the Oratory's distinct architecture can be seen from just about everywhere on the AMU campus. COURTESY OF AVE MARIA UNIVERSITY

Ypsilanti to Domino's Farms, a large corporate office park owned by Monaghan in nearby Ann Arbor. After the commission rejected the proposals, Monaghan and college officials and advisors began considering other locations for the campus, and eventually settled on southwest Florida.

Move to Florida. The decision to move the Michigan campus to Florida was made after Paul J. Marinelli, the head of Barron Collier Companies, a southwest Florida landowner and developer, heard that Monaghan was looking for a new site for the school and contacted him, offering to donate 750 acres of farmland between Naples and Immokalee. The offer was eventually accepted. While the new site of the institution was being constructed, the college relocated to a small interim campus in Naples, where it began holding classes in the fall of 2003.

Also in 2003 Ave Maria College officially changed its name to Ave Maria University. In order for the university to receive a license from the State of Florida to operate under this new title, the Institute for Pastoral Theology was moved to the interim campus in Naples, and the university began a master's program in education. While the education program was discontinued in 2004, that same year a new graduate theology program launched, offering both master's and doctoral degrees.

In the summer of 2007 the university moved operations to the 1,000-acre permanent campus in the town of Ave Maria. A large three-story library, an academic building with classrooms, laboratories, and faculty offices, a student union, five dormitories, and a central utility plant make up the campus as of 2010. The design of the campus buildings is inspired by the prairie style of the famous American architect Frank Lloyd Wright, whose work is greatly admired by Monaghan.

The university received full accreditation from the American Academy of Liberal Education in June 2008, and in December of that year it was awarded candidate status by the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools. As of 2009, Ave Maria had not yet received recognition as a Catholic institution by the Diocese of Venice, Florida, under whose jurisdiction it falls. At the time of the printing of this entry, Ave Maria was in discussions with the local ordinary, Bishop Frank Dewane, to gain such recognition.

Enrollment at the Florida campus increased steadily between 2003 and 2009. At the beginning of the 2009–2010 academic year a little over 700 undergraduate and graduate students were enrolled, not including 111 students enrolled in the Institute for Pastoral Theology. The number of full-time faculty teaching at the Florida campus at the beginning of the 2009–2010 academic year was forty-six, with forty-five possessing doctoral degrees in their fields.

In its current organizational structure the university is governed by a board of trustees. A chancellor, appointed by the board, functions as the institution's chief executive officer. The chancellor in turn appoints a president, who functions as the chief operations officer, along with a chief academic officer and a chief financial officer. Monaghan currently serves as Ave Maria University's chancellor and Nicholas J. Healy Jr., a former maritime lawyer and administrator at Franciscan University in Steubenville, Ohio, serves as president. John E. Sites is the university's chief academic officer and Paul Roney, a former corporate treasurer of Domino's Pizza, Inc., is its chief financial officer.

Controversies. Not unlike many institutions of higher education, especially younger ones, Ave Maria has had its share of controversies. The following two are the perhaps among the more significant ones.

The move to Florida was a source of considerable wrangling, as it was not supported by a number of students and faculty members, some of whom alleged that Monaghan had an obligation to keep the Michigan campus open indefinitely because the move to Florida was not part of the institution's original plan. Polemics over the issues surrounding the move found their way into the Catholic press and even caught the attention of the secular national media, being reported in such publications as the New York Times. To accommodate students who wished to complete their studies in Michigan, the campus in Ypsilanti was kept open with a reduced staff until the spring of 2007.

Perhaps even more controversial than the move to Florida was the sudden firing in March 2007 of the university's provost, Fr. Joseph D. Fessio, a well-known Jesuit priest and friend and former student of Pope BENEDICT XVI, due to what a university press release characterized as "irreconcilable differences over administrative policies and practices." Possibly responding to widespread protest among students, faculty, and benefactors, the day after Fessio was fired, the university rehired him to serve in a nonadministrative capacity, as "theologian-in-residence." This affair also received a good deal of attention in Catholic and secular media, probably owing to Fessio's prominence. Fessio was dismissed from the university again in July 2009.

The Town of Ave Maria. When Paul Marinelli contacted Monaghan in 2002 to offer land for a new campus, he told Monaghan that the Barron Collier Companies would also be interested in building a town around the university. In 2001 the Florida legislature established the Rural Land Stewardship Area program to meet the growing needs for residential development in the state's rural areas in a way that would be environmentally sensitive and not imperil Florida's agricultural industry. Marinelli hoped to develop several thousand acres of land owned by the Barron Collier Companies between Naples and Immokalee along the lines provided by the program. He saw the new university as a possible catalyst for the growth of a new town.

Monaghan had originally planned to build the university in north Naples but was unable to do so because the spotting of an eagle's nest on the proposed site prompted concerns about wildlife protection laws. He initially turned down Marinelli's offer because the new site seemed too far inland. But after further study he decided to accept the offer and join with Barron Collier Companies in building the new town.

The official groundbreaking ceremony for the town and university took place on February 17, 2006, and a first phase of construction was completed in the summer of 2007, when the town's first residents arrived and its first businesses opened.

While the 2008 nationwide real estate crash seemed to have some effect on the town's growth, residential and commercial construction continued, albeit at a slower pace.

In 2009 the town had six different residential areas, two parks, a golf course, over a dozen private businesses, an emergency medical facility, a commercial park, and a grammar and college preparatory school, the Rhodora J. Donahue Academy of Ave Maria.

The town's center, a mixture of residential and commercial property, is constructed around an oratory. The 120-foot tall church has a stone façade and steel flying buttresses and roof. It is based on a traditional basilica form and seats 1,100. The church's cornerstone was laid on March 25, 2006, and it was dedicated by Bishop Dewane of Venice on March 31, 2008. The Diocese of Venice, which administers the oratory, has conferred on it the status of a "quasi-parish."

As of 2009 the town of Ave Maria had approximately 550 residents, not including the students of Ave Maria University.

SEE ALSO EDUCATION, CATHOLIC (HIGHER) IN THE UNITED STATES; EX CORDE ECCLESIAE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ave Maria University Catalogue 2009–2010 (Ave Maria, Fla. 2009).

Jenna Buzzacco-Foerster, "Ave Maria Breaks Ground," Naples Daily News, February 18, 2006.

Alan Cooperman, "Magnate's Decisions Stir Controversy," Washington Post, March 25, 2007.

Jennifer Cox, "In the Beginning: A University Town," Naples Daily News, August 20, 2007.

Faculty Handbook: Interim Version (Ave Maria, Fla. 2009).

Dawson James, "My Goal Is to Help as Many People as Possible to Get to Heaven," Gulfshore Life (April 2006), available from http://www.gulfshorelife.com/Articles/Gulfshore-Life/2006/04/My-Goal-Is-to-Help-as-Many-People-as-Possible-Get-to-Heaven.asp (accessed December 5, 2009).

Tamar Lewin, "A Catholic College, a Billionaire's Idea, Will Rise in Florida," New York Times, February 10, 2003.

The Newman Guide to Choosing a Catholic College (Manassas, Va. 2009).

Joseph G. Trabbic
Assistant Professor, Department of Philosophy
Ave Maria University (2010)

AVENIR, L'

The French newspaper L' Avenir (The Future), which first appeared on October 16, 1830, was founded by the liberal thinker and cleric Hugues Félicité-Robert de LAMENNAIS (1782–1854). It was published in collaboration with others who were drawn to his ideas. Known as the Congrégation de St. Pierre this group met at Lamennais's estate at La Chênaie and included such clerics and laymen as Prosper GUÉRANGER (1805–1875), a religious priest; Charles de COUX (1787–1864), an instructor at the University of Louvain; René ROHRBACHER (1789–1856), a Church historian; Henri LACORDAIRE (1802–1861), who helped restore the Dominican Order in France; Charles de MONTALEMBERT (1810–1870) a future parliamentary leader during the July Monarchy; Olympe-Philippe GERBET (1798–1864), the bishop of Perpignan; and Alexis-François Rio (1797–1874), the author of De la poésie chrétienne (1836).

The masthead of L'Avenir bore the phrase "Dieu et la Liberté" (God and Liberty), and in its pages the Abbé de Lamennais (he had been ordained a priest in 1816) defended Catholicism against the encroachments of the government. He also supported ULTRAMONTANISM against GALLICANISM, and he pushed his own system of thought, which espoused "the common sense of humanity" over rationalistic philosophy.

In their articles, Lamennais and his collaborators also called for the separation of CHURCH AND STATE, freedom of the press, freedom of association, freedom of CONSCIENCE (including freedom of religious choice), universal suffrage, and a limitation on workers' hours. They sought, in their own words, "the Christian emancipation of the people." On church and state relations, the editors noted in the issue of December 7, 1830, that "we firstly ask for the freedom of conscience or the freedom of full universal religion without distinction or without privilege; and by consequence, in what touches us, we Catholics, for the total separation of Church and State."

In a real sense, L'Avenir represented not only the philosophic and theological positions of Lamennais, but also the spirit of LIBERALISM of the era. The year 1830 saw the July Revolution in France, which brought the liberal Orleans monarchy into power, and the Belgian Revolution, which brought about that nation's independence in the name of liberty and national freedom. Both events inspired Lamennais to found L'Avenir, and it is in that context that the thought and writings of Lamennais and his colleagues—who were sometimes known collectively as the "L'Avenir movement"—should be understood. Their newspaper was to be the voice of an international coalition of active Catholics, or, as they wrote in L'Avenir, a "Holy Alliance of Peoples."

The July Revolution began in 1830 with the "Three Glorious Days" of July 27, 28, and 29, which put an end to the reign of the reactionary King Charles X and led to the proclaiming of the July Monarchy of King Louis-Philippe. Under the regime of Charles X, freedom of the press, among other rights, was suppressed. In particular, the restrictions of the Ordinances of Saint-Cloud, or the July Ordinances, which were signed into law on July 25, 1830, brought the political crisis to a peak. In defiance of these restrictions, banned newspapers were published and uprisings, many led by journalists, workers, and students, occurred throughout Paris.

In Belgium, meanwhile, in August of that same year, the Belgian Revolution erupted. Aided by French intellectuals as well as armed forces, the Belgians rose up against the Protestant Dutch king, William I. The leading forces behind this revolution were the Belgian Catholic clergy and Belgian liberals. At first they simply called for greater autonomy, but the Belgian Revolution soon became a national struggle for full independence. International pressure helped Belgium become an independent state, and a constitutional monarchy was established.

In France, meanwhile, Lamennais rejoiced in the departure of the Bourbon king, Charles X. Lamennais would have preferred a republic, but he was hopeful that the new July Monarchy would uphold the rights of the Church and support his own struggle against Gallicanism. Lamennais also hoped to achieve a social triumph for the Catholic Church in France by allying it with the causes of social justice and public liberties. He had already, in the Congrégation de St. Pierre, established a religious society whose purpose was to uphold Catholic THEOLOGY and support Rome.

In a book titled Progrès de la Révolution et de la guerre contre l'Eglise, which he published in 1829, Lamennais attacked the king and the bishops, the latter for their Gallicanism and their compromises with opponents of the Church (p. 26). In breaking with the monarchy, Lamennais sought the attainment of political liberty and equal rights. He called this liberty a "catholicizing liberalism," and he believed it was essential for bringing about the triumph of the truths of SALVATION (p. 30). Lamennais's statements in Progrès de la Révolution et de la guerre contre l'Eglise upholding religious freedom and a Church free of state interference were also used to support the revolution in Catholic Belgium against the Protestant Dutch monarchy.

Following the bold statements made in L'Avenir, however, particularly those in support of liberal Christianity and the separation of church and state, Lamennais's orthodoxy became suspect. To rectify this, he went to ROME in November 1831, accompanied by Lacordaire and Montalembert, to bring his case before Pope GREGORY XVI. He had been welcomed there in 1824, when Pope LEO XII had considered making Lamennais, who was then arguably the most celebrated cleric in France, a cardinal. Now, however, to appease Rome until the matter was settled, he suspended publication of L'Avenir before departing for the HOLY SEE. After waiting four months and receiving no definite response, he left Rome in March 1832. In time, however, the pope responded with the encyclical Mirari vos, which was promulgated on August 15, 1832. Without expressly naming Lamennais, the pontiff condemned the ideas that had been put forth in L'Avenir, particularly freedom of the press, freedom of conscience, the need to regenerate Catholicism, the right to revolt against monarchs, DEMOCRACY achieved through revolution, and the emphasis on "natural" virtues. The pope called these ideas "absurd, and extremely dangerous for the Church" (Maclear 1995, p. 55).

Lamennais's philosophy and apologetics, as put forth in L'Avenir and his other writings, were seen by the pope as favoring skepticism and denying the validity of individual reason, with the emphasis given instead to general reason. The Catholicism that Lamennais sought to create was viewed by Rome as a different religion. His theology was seen as being based on the ideas of Jean-Jacques ROUSSEAU, which were derived from an Enlightenment concept of naturalism. In addition, Lamennais's theology was thought to be based on a palingenesist concept of "renewal" founded on the vision of a new era for mankind beginning in the modern age, which was labeled the "Third Age of Humanity." This concept had already gained popularity in the nineteenth century, particularly among positivists such as Henri de Saint-Simon (1760–1832), Charles Fourier (1772–1837), Barthélemy Enfantin (1796–1864), and Auguste COMTE (1798–1857). The revolutionary and nationalist Giuseppe Mazzini (1805–1872) had also called on Lamennais to lead the regenerated priesthood that would be the vanguard of this new era.

Mirari vos also condemned religious pluralism and religious indifferentism. Later popes would cite the encyclical in their condemnations of freemasonry, and the document has been seen as the first papal statement against MODERNISM. The ideas put forth by the Abbé de Lamennais are also considered to have re-emerged in the liberal Catholicism of the 1850s and 1860s, in the French Sillon movement of the 1890s and 1900s, and in the integral HUMANISM of the 1930s. The palingenensist evolutionism of Teilhard de CHARDIN (1881–1955) has been viewed as representative of this system of thought, and the LIBERATION THEOLOGY of the mid- to late twentieth century is also considered by some to be based on activist theories similar to Lamennais's original theses.

Following Rome's condemnation, Lamennais stated that, out of deference to the pope, he would not resume the publication of L'Avenir. He returned to his retreat at La Chênaie, but in his private correspondence he continued to profess the ideas that had been put forth in his earlier published writings. In response, Rome demanded full adherence to Mirari vos. Lamennais refused to submit, and by December 1833 he had abandoned most of his clerical role and duties. Eventually, he would forgo all outward signs of a profession to Christianity. In May 1834, in response to the encyclical, he published Paroles d'un croyant. Arguing strongly against the established order, he denounced what he called the "conspiracy of kings and priests against the people" (Maclear 1995, p. 44). Pope Gregory XVI quickly condemned this work in the encyclical Singulari nos, in which he called the book "small in size, but immense in wickedness" (Maclear 1995, p. 57). He also censured Lamennais's philosophical system of thought. Singulari nos was in fact a direct condemnation both of Lamennais, who was excommunicated, and his writings and philosophical system. The pontiff was also troubled by Lamennais's vision of a church-state separation. Instead of a liberated Church, Rome believed such theories would lead to the control of both the secular and religious by secularist demagogic forces.

Abandoned by most of his colleagues, Lamennais still continued to write, particularly articles for the liberal journals Revue des Deux Mondes, Revue du Progès, and Le Monde. He also published a series of pamphlets, including Le Livre du peuple (1839), L'Esclavage moderne (1839), and Du passé et de l'avenir du peuple (1841), and others. In these writings, he criticized the authorities and the establishment and put forth his views on the future of democracy. For another work, Le Pays et le Gouvernement (1840), he was sentenced to a year's imprisonment.

Between 1841 and 1846, Lamennais published a treatise on metaphysics titled Esquisse d'une philosophe, in which he proposed that God, man, and NATURE be studied only in the light of reason, rejecting the divinity of Christ and the concepts of eternal punishment and the SUPERNATURAL order. The section on AESTHETICS is considered one of his best pieces of writing. Lamennais was also inspired by the revolutionary happenings of 1848, and he was elected as a deputy for Paris in the Constituent and Legislative Assemblies. He also briefly published a revolutionary newspaper, Le Peuple constituant. The coup d'état of 1851, however, ended his political career, and he died in 1854, still unreconciled with the Church.

SEE ALSO BENEDICTINES; DOMINICANS; FRANCE, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; FRENCH REVOLUTION; PRIESTHOOD IN CHRISTIAN TRADITION; RATIONALISM; SECULARISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Roger Aubert, The Church in the Age of Liberalism (New York 1981).

Félicité Robert de Lamennais, Progrès de la Révolution et de la guerre contre l'Eglise (Paris, 1829).

James Livingston, Modern Christian Thought: From the Enlightenment to Vatican II (New York 1971).

J.F. Maclear, Church and State in the Modern Age: A Documentary History (New York 1995).

William Roberts
Professor of History and Social Sciences
Fairleigh Dickinson University (2010)

AVIAT, FRANCESCA SALESIA, ST.

Baptized Léonie (Leonia); educator, co-founder of the Sister Oblates of St. Francis de Sales; b. September 16, 1844, Sezanne, France; d. January 10, 1914, Perugia, Umbria, Italy; beatified by Pope John Paul II, September 27, 1992; canonized by Pope John Paul II, November 25, 2001.

Léonie Aviat was born in the French region of Champagne and educated at a school of St. FRANCIS DE SALES, the Monastery of the Visitation in Troyes, which was the source of her lifelong commitment to Salesian spirituality. Léonie wanted to join the VISITATION NUNS, but her family opposed her vocation. In 1858 her spiritual director, Father Louis Alexander Alphonse BRISSON, opened in Troyes a center to educate young women working in the industrialized textile mills, and he was inspired to invite Léonie to join him in these efforts.

While visiting a factory in her native city, Sezanne, Léonie, too, was inspired by God with a desire to counsel and guide young workers. She joined Father Brisson in 1866, and in turn he suggested that she found a women's religious congregation. In 1868 the young Léonie moved in this direction as she took the habit and received the name Francesca Salesia.

The first sisters of the new community took their vows in 1871, the same year in which Sister Francesca prayerfully wrote in her personal notes: "Saint Francis de Sales, you have chosen me to be at the head of this little group; give me your spirit, your heart.... Grant me a share of your union with God and of that interior spirit which knows how to do everything in union with Him and nothing without Him." The following year she was elected Superior General of the new congregation that would be known as the Sister OBLATES OF ST. FRANCIS DE SALES.

Under Mother Aviat's guidance, the Sister Oblates grew both in their numbers and their works. They established several parochial schools and a boarding school for young women in Paris, which Mother Aviat led for eight years. In the last decade of the nineteenth century, Mother Aviat also labored to expand and develop the congregation across Europe and in South Africa and Ecuador.

Due to anti-Church legislation adopted in France at the turn of the twentieth century, in 1903 Mother Aviat moved the headquarters of the congregation to Perugia, Italy, where she began the order anew, composed its constitution, and in 1911 received the approval of Pope Saint PIUS X. She died at sixty-nine.

She was declared venerable in 1978 and beatified in 1992. At her beatification Pope JOHN PAUL II noted that Mother Aviat "dedicated her life to educating young working women." The miracle approved for her canonization involved the spontaneous cure of a fourteen-year-old Pennsylvania girl's paralyzing spinal cord condition, after a novena prayed by local sisters of her order. Pope John Paul II canonized her, along with three others, in Rome on November 25, 2001, and in his homily he emphasized her dedication to prayer as the source of her power "to persevere to the end of her life in the life of faith, desiring to be led by the Lord: 'O my God, let my happiness be found in sacrificing my will and my desires for you!'"

Feast: January 11.

SEE ALSO RELIGIOUS (MEN AND WOMEN); SALESIANS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Margaret Bunson and Mathew Bunson, John Paul II's Book of Saints (Huntington, Ind. 2007), 97–98.

Marie-Aimée D'Esmauges, Leonie Aviat, Mutter Franziska Salesia, die Gründerin der Oblatinnen des hl. Franz von Sales (Eichstatt 1993), translated from Italian Leonie Aviat Madre Francesca di Sales (Padua 1992).

John Paul II, "Canonization of Four Blesseds," (Homily, November 25, 2001), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/homilies/2001/documents/hf_jp-ii_hom_20011125_canonization_en.html (accessed July 27, 2009).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Léonie Françoise de Sales Aviat (1844–1914)," Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_lit_doc_20011125_de-sales-aviat_en.html (accessed July 27, 2009).

Katherine Rabenstein
Senior Credentialing Specialist
American Nurses Association, Washington, D.C.

Elizabeth C. Shaw
Independent Scholar
Washington, D.C. (2010)

B

BADANO, CHIARA, BL.

Also known as Luce Badano; laywoman; b. October 29, 1971, Sassello, Savona, Italy; d. October 7, 1990, Sassello, Savona, Italy; declared VENERABLE by Pope BENEDICT XVI, July 3, 2008.

The only child of truck driver Ruggero Badano and his wife, Maria Teresa Caviglia, Chiara Badano enjoyed sports and outdoor activities. As a nine-year-old, she joined the FOCOLARE MOVEMENT. In 1988 the teenaged Chiara supervised a group of children going to Rome for a Gen 4 meeting. Around this time, she changed her name to Luce, meaning "light."

Not long afterward, she learned she had cancer in her shoulder. She was still determined to become a missionary, but once the cancer invaded her spine, she could not walk. Realizing that she would not be able to travel, she did her missionary work at home by praying for her family and friends. She refused medication so that she could share Christ's pain on the CROSS.

She died a few weeks before turning nineteen. As reported by the Focolare Movement, shortly before her death she encouraged others: "Don't cry for me. I am going to Jesus. At my funeral I don't want people to cry, but rather to sing with all their voices." To this end, she helped her mother plan her funeral in the style of a wedding celebration.

Pope Benedict XVI declared her venerable on July 3, 2008. The following year, on December 19, he issued a proclamation of a miracle attributed to her intervention, which was requisite for her subsequent beatification in 2010. At the time of the publication of this entry, a date had not been set for her beatification.

SEE ALSO BEATIFICATION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

"Chiara Badano (Luce)," The Hagiography Circle, December 17, 2009, available from http://newsaints.faithweb.com/year/1990.htm#Badano (accessed January 6, 2010).

"Chiara Luce Badano: Sainthood at the Age of 18," Focolare Movement, March 27, 2000, available from http://focolare.org/En/sif/2000/20000323e_b.html (accessed January 6, 2010).

"The 21 Decrees of the Congregation for Saints' Causes," Coo-ees from the Cloister, December 20, 2009, available from http://coo-eesfromthecloister.blogspot.com/2009/12/21-decrees-of-congregation-for-saints.html (accessed January 6, 2010).

"Venerable Chiara Badano," Saints.SQPN.com, December 20, 2009, available from http://saints.sqpn.com/venerable-chiara-badano/ (accessed January 6, 2010).

Laurie J. Edwards
Independent Scholar
Reidsville, N.C. (2010)

BAKER, DAVID AUGUSTINE

Mystic and spiritual writer; b. David Baker, December 9, 1575, Abergavenny, Monmouthshire, Wales; d. August 9, 1641, London.

Raised in an Anglican family of Catholic sympathies, Baker attended OXFORD and became a lawyer and the recorder of Abergavenny; but by his own account he was a "practical atheist" who lived a somewhat debauched life until 1600, when he was saved from plunging off a collapsed bridge by what he regarded as a miracle.

After careful study of religious questions he became a Catholic in 1603, his parents soon following. Having met several BENEDICTINES, and because he wished to follow a way of life of "moderate severity," he entered that order, making his NOVITIATE at Padua, where he was professed in 1605 and took the name Augustine (Austin) after the apostle of the English. He moved back and forth between England and the Continent and was ordained at Rheims in 1613.

For a time he was chaplain to a nobleman in England. In London he met Siegbert Buckley, an elderly monk who had belonged to the Marian Benedictine establishment of WESTMINSTER ABBEY and had recently been released after many years in prison. It was through Buckley that the exiled monks on the Continent retained their link with the Marian foundation, and in the 1620s Baker researched the history of the English Benedictines in order to demonstrate that connection. For that purpose he was given access to the manuscripts of Sir Robert Cotton, which later became the basis of the British Museum, and in the process he became acquainted with some of the leading antiquaries of the day—John Selden, Henry Spelman, and William Cambden. His research resulted in the valuable historical study Apostolatus Benedictorum in Anglia.

While in England he also gave legal advice to the poor and to his fellow Benedictines, and he made some converts, not through theological disputation but simply by urging individuals to pray and seek the will of God earnestly. But Baker himself felt keenly that he was not living as he was supposed to live.

When the English Benedictine congregation was officially restored in 1619, he was the first to affiliate with St. Laurence at Dieulouard, France, the continuation of the Westminster community that eventually became Ampleforth Abbey. Over time he had connections with three of the forerunners of modern English Benedictine life—Dieulouard, where he spent little time; St. Gregory's, Douai, which became Downside Abbey; and the convent of English nuns at CAMBRAI, the forerunners of Stanbrook Abbey.

While chaplain in a country house, he spent as much as six hours a day in prayer but, as he later complained, had no spiritual guidance and was not at all sure that he was on the right path. After one experience of what he called "passive contemplation," he suffered from prolonged spiritual aridity and spent some years following set prayer formulae that he found unsatisfying. Even in monasteries, the Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius Loyola dominated spiritual direction at the time, and it was this structured approach that Baker found deficient.

He was a chaplain to the nuns at Cambrai from 1624 to 1633, and it was during that period that for the first time he began to write about the spiritual life and serve as a director of souls. Stating that the nuns lacked adequate spiritual books in English, he translated the Cloud of Unknowing and the works of Jan van RUYSBROECK, Johannes TAULER, THOMAS À KEMPIS, Richard ROLLE DE HAMPOLE, and Walter HILTON, books that apparently legitimized for him the kind of prayer that he had fleetingly experienced but then abandoned. Now he taught the nuns that the highest prayer requires going beyond all words, images, and conscious thoughts, and he drew on both his own experiences and those of the nuns to produce a flood of practical guides to the spiritual life, especially the disciplining of the WILL.

Most of the nuns, notably Gertrude More, a descendant of St. Thomas More, were strongly drawn to Baker's approach. But others were resistant, supported by the convent's official chaplain, Francis Hull (also a Benedictine), who promoted the structured kind of prayer that Baker considered unsuitable for contemplatives, while Hull in turn thought that Baker encouraged too much reliance on an "inner light." In 1633 the English Congregation of the Benedictines formally investigated Baker's approach and vindicated him.

Despite this vindication, tensions remained, and Baker and Hull were both transferred. Baker was sent to Douai, where he wrote formal theological defenses of contemplation and received a stream of visitors interested in that life. In 1636 he wrote a book arguing that missionary activity created difficulties for the monastic life, a book that was used by the president of the English Congregation, Rudisind BARLOW, to support his own misgivings about the mission. But when Baker attempted to distance himself from Barlow's position, misunderstandings arose between them. At both Cambrai and Douai there were also tensions over what was regarded as Baker's aloofness from community life, his propensity for spending most of his time in his cell and not participating in general community activities.

All his life Baker suffered from ill health, including consumption and a stomach ailment that prevented him from eating properly. But in 1638 the poverty of the Douai monastery, because of the THIRTY YEARS' WAR, led to Baker's assignment to the English mission that both he and Barlow had questioned, an assignment that was possibly a vindictive act by his superiors. He returned to London, but news of the Douai conflict caused the English Benedictine provincial to ignore him. Baker lived in various private houses, barely evading the pursuivants, as CHARLES I's somewhat relaxed policy toward Catholics was replaced by Puritan aggressiveness. He died almost alone, as he had said he wished to do.

Baker left behind an immense body of somewhat disorganized writings, so that most published editions of his work are compilations made by others. He was perhaps the last representative of the English mystical tradition, although more than two centuries separated him from that tradition's great age. Aside from personality conflicts, he was at odds with some of his contemporaries because he consciously represented the medieval mystical tradition as against the prevailing COUNTERREFORMATION spirituality, and later in the seventeenth century he was suspected of QUIETISM. His work remains to some extent controversial.

SEE ALSO ANGLICANISM; CONTEMPLATION; CONVERTS AND CONVERSION; DIRECTION, SPIRITUAL; DOUAI (DOUAY); IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA, ST.; MORE, GERTRUDE; MORE, SIR THOMAS, ST.; MYSTICISM; PURITANS; SPIRITUAL EXERCISES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

WORKS BY BAKER

Apostolatus Benedictorum in Anglia (Douai 1626).

Sancta Sophia, edited by Serenus Cressy (New York 1857).

The Confessions of the Venerable Father Augustine Baker, edited by Justin McCann (London 1922).

Memorials of Father Augustine Baker and Other Documents, edited by Justin McCann and Hugh Connolly (London 1933).

Holy Wisdom, edited by Gerard Sitwell (London 1964).

STUDIES ON BAKER

James Gaffney, Augustine Baker's Inner Light (Scranton, Pa. 1989).

David Knowles, The English Mystical Tradition (London 1961).

Anthony Low, Augustine Baker (New York 1970).

Peter Salvin and Serenus Cressy, The Life of Father Augustine Baker, O.S.B. (Salzburg 1997).

James Hitchcock
Professor, Department of History
Saint Louis University, St. Louis, Mo. (2010)

BALICKI, JAN (JOHN), BL.

Baptized John Adalbert; rector and professor of theology at Pontifical GREGORIAN UNIVERSITY; b. January 25, 1869, Staromiescie, Poland; d. March 15, 1948, Przemysl, Poland; beatified August 18, 2002, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

John Adalbert Balicki was born into a poor family, but his parents had strong faith and moral values. He completed twelve years of schooling in his hometown and went on to the diocesan seminary, Przemysl of the Latins, in 1888.

After his ordination on July 20, 1892, Fr. Balicki spent about a year as assistant pastor in the parish of Polna before attending the Pontifical Gregorian University. There, he took classes in the morning and devoted his afternoons and evenings to prayer and inspirational readings, particularly the works of St. THOMAS AQUINAS. He completed his studies at the university in 1897 and became a theology professor as well as prefect of studies at Przemysl.

In 1927 Fr. Balicki, a humble man, did not want to accept the position of vice-rector at Przemysl, but he obeyed a request that he do so. The following year he was appointed rector. He prayed about every decision and carefully considered each candidate. Fr. Balicki readily followed the steps he recommended to others for a more saintly life: taking life seriously, being self-critical and constantly open to self-improvement, and having unshakable confidence in prayer, a joyful spirit, a love of SUFFERING, and praise for God's MERCY.

Health problems led him to resign in 1934, but, for the next five years, Fr. Balicki heard confessions and counseled those in need of spiritual guidance. Many were touched by his gentleness and open heart.

WORLD WAR II divided the city in 1939. Fr. Balicki chose to remain in the more dangerous side occupied by the Soviets. He hoped to keep the seminary going but instead ended up living in a room in the bishop's residence, where he remained after the war ended and the city was reunited in 1941. Six years later, Fr. Balicki died of pneumonia and tuberculosis.

Polish immigrants lauded his HOLINESS, and those who asked John Adalbert to intercede for them said their prayers were answered. On December 22, 1975, Cardinal Wojtyła requested that Pope PAUL VI acknowledge Fr. Balicki as an example for other priests. Fr. Balicki was venerated on December 19, 1994, by Pope John Paul II. On August 18, 2002, Fr. Balicki was beatified along with twelve other religious. Cardinal José Saraiva Martins, prefect of the Congregation for the Causes of Saints, praised these beati as a "gift of the Spirit for our time."

Feast: March 15.

SEE ALSO BEATIFICATION; DIRECTION, SPIRITUAL; INTERCESSION; KAROL WOJTYŁA: EARLY YEARS; POLAND, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Alan Butler and Paul Burns, Butler's Lives of the Saints: The Third Millennium (New York 2005).

Eternal Word Television Network, "Bl. John Adalbert Balicki (1869–1948)," available from http://www.ewtn.com/library/mary/bios2002.htm#Balicki (accessed October 22, 2009).

Terry H. Jones, "Blessed John Adalbert Balicki," Patron Saints Index, available from http://saints.sqpn.com/saintjey.htm (accessed October 22, 2009).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Jan Balicki (1869–1948)," Vatican Web site, August 18, 2002, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_lit_doc_20020818_balicki_en.html (accessed October 22, 2009).

"Recognition of Miracles Means 8 New Blessed Will Be Proclaimed," Zenit, July 5, 2002, available from http://www.zenit.org/article-4848?l=english (accessed October 22, 2009).

Laurie J. Edwards
Independent Scholar
Reidsville, N.C. (2010)

BALTIMORE CATECHISM

The Baltimore Catechism (1885) was the first catechism endorsed by the Catholic hierarchy for use in parishes throughout the United States. Archbishop James Cardinal GIBBONS, its chief proponent, hoped that it would replace a multitude of catechisms used in immigrant communities. The Baltimore Catechism became the standard teaching text for children in most dioceses. A revised version was issued in 1941, but it fell out of use after Vatican II.

History of Catechisms. The catechism first took shape in the late Middle Ages as a printed set of instructions to priests for offering oral instruction in church teachings to their parishioners. The Roman Catechism (1566), promulgated by the Council of TRENT (1545–1563), attempted to establish a uniform and orthodox set of teachings approved by the pope. By the nineteenth century, the Roman Catechism was one of at least one hundred in use throughout the Catholic world despite the fact that Popes BENEDICT XIV and CLEMENT XIII recommended the adoption of a uniform catechism for all Catholics. Empress MARIA THERESA OF AUSTRIA imposed a single catechism throughout Austria and Bohemia, and NAPOLEON I did the same in France. Thus, questions over standard catechisms became linked to linguistic and cultural traditions, the central authority of the papacy, and the development of the nation-state.

At the first Vatican Council (1869–1870), bishops from around the world considered establishing a single text for teaching, although a strong minority defended diversity. Jean Pierre Marcellin Augustin VEROT, the sole American to participate in these discussions, favored a single catechism for the United States. Like him, the vast majority of Catholics in America were recent immigrants, and he hoped that a single catechism would draw them together into a more unified community. However, he admitted that bishops in the United States had so far been unable to agree upon a standard text.

The earliest catechism published in the United States was written by John CARROLL, the first Catholic bishop there. The Carroll Catechism (1785) adopted Richard CHALLONER's 1759 abridgement of the Doway Catechism (1649) written by Henry Tuberville (c. 1607–1678), a member of the community of British Catholics in exile in Douai. The Doway Catechism had set the pattern for future catechisms written in English by taking the form of questions and answers and by addressing the challenges of being Catholic in a predominantly Protestant society. While Carroll drew from British precedents, many bishops and priests in the newly independent United States were French, German, or Irish. Like their parishioners, immigrant clergy members brought their own catechisms with them to America. In the Southwest, Spanish and Latin American catechisms predominated.

Gibbons, James Cardinal (1834–1921). This Archbishop and first Chancellor of The Catholic University of America was the driving force behind the creation of the Baltimore Catechism.
THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

The bishops who met in the First Provincial Council of Baltimore, for two weeks in October 1832 to set standards throughout the United States, deplored the "promiscuous" use of "unapproved catechisms and prayer books" (quoted in Marthaler 1995, p. 113). Seeking to impose homogeneity on a diverse set of Catholic practices, they directed the preparation of a new American catechism to be approved by the pope. However, the decree was not implemented and American bishops continued to publish and use a variety of catechisms. Further attempts to create a single, American catechism were made by the First Plenary Council of Baltimore (1852) and the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore (1866) but they, too, failed.

The Baltimore Catechism. In 1884 Archbishop Gibbons, the director of the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore, convened a committee of bishops to study the issue. The committee recommended the adoption of a standard catechism in English, to be translated into foreign languages as necessary. The report further recommended that whenever possible, the catechism be taught to children in English.

Monsignor Januarius DE CONCILIO, pastor of St. Michael's Church in Jersey City, New Jersey, prepared the catechism in cooperation with Bishop John L. SPALDING of Peoria, Illinois. The final text was approved on April 6, 1885, by Archbishop John Cardinal MCCLOSKEY of New York and Archbishop Gibbons of Baltimore and published that year as A Catechism of Christian Doctrine, Prepared and Enjoined by the Order of the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore.

Drawing from existing catechisms in circulation in America, the seventy-two-page Baltimore Catechism posed and answered 421 questions organized under three broad headings: Creed, Sacraments, and Commandments. Several months later, Spalding published an abridged version, known as the Baltimore Catechism No. 1.

The Baltimore Catechism generated little enthusiasm among the American priests and bishops who were to use it as the basis for religious education. The most pointed criticisms came in a series of articles in Pastoral Blatt, a German-language monthly from St. Louis, which characterized the Baltimore Catechism as dull, monotonous, and weak in its theology. The anonymous author further complained that the catechism had been published prior to receiving approval from the Congregation for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH and that the final version had not been sent to the bishops for review. Despite these criticisms (and the continued publication of new catechisms), most dioceses adopted the Baltimore Catechism and generations of Catholic schoolchildren committed its questions and answers to memory in preparation for their first communion.

The Revised Catechism. Revisions of the catechism, under official discussion since 1896, were undertaken in the 1930s under the direction of Reverend Francis J. CONNELL, a professor of moral theology at the CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA. A Catechism of Christian Doctrine was issued in June 1941. This revised version of the Baltimore Catechism expanded the number of questions to 499 and added a chapter on the LORD'S PRAYER. It also reordered the sequence of presentation to Creed, Code, and Cult. An updated version of Baltimore No. 1 was issued several months later. An expanded version for use by adults known as Baltimore No. 3 appeared in 1949.

The revised Baltimore Catechism met with criticism, especially for its failure to take into account changing approaches to the Scriptures, the rise of the liturgical movement, and the evolution of the understanding of the sacraments. Many parishes began supplementing or replacing the Catechism of Christian Doctrine with alternative catechisms, or dispensing with the genre entirely by encouraging learners to pose their own questions about the meaning of faith and the practice of Catholicism.

The Baltimore Catechism had a strong influence in the creation of an American Catholic culture. It fell out of use after Vatican II (1962–1965), which embraced diversity in Catholic teachings and shifted the emphasis of religious education away from memorization of questions and answers toward more individual explorations of faith. However, additional catechisms continued to be published in the United States and throughout the Catholic world. In 1992 Pope JOHN PAUL II introduced a new Catechism of the Catholic Church to bring greater unity to Catholic teachings, while recognizing the ongoing value of local catechisms for religious instruction.

SEE ALSO CATECHISM OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH; CATECHISMS; CREED; CULT (WORSHIP); DOGMA; LITURGICAL CATECHESIS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Mary Charles Bryce, Pride of Place: The Role of the Bishops in the Development of Catechesis in the United States (Washington, D.C. 1984).

Michael Donnellan, "Rationale for a Uniform Catechism: Vatican I to Vatican II" (Ph.D. diss., Catholic University 1972).

John Tracy Ellis, The Life of James Cardinal Gibbons: Archbishop of Baltimore, 1834–1921 (Milwaukee, Wisc. 1952).

Berard L. Marthaler, The Catechism of Yesterday and Today: The Evolution of a Genre (Collegeville, Minn. 1995).

James Emmett Ryan, "Sentimental Catechism: Archbishop James Gibbons, Mass-Print Culture, and American Literary History," Religion and American Culture 7, no. 1 (Winter 1997): 81–119.

Lara Vapnek
Assistant Professor, Department of History
St. John's University (2010)

BATIFFOL, PIERRE

Catholic Church historian and theologian; b. Toulouse, France, Jan. 27, 1861; d. Paris, France, Jan. 13, 1929.

Pierre Batiffol studied at the Seminary of Saint-Sulpice in Paris from 1878 to 1882. In 1884 he was ordained to the priesthood. He continued his studies at the Université Catholique de Paris (now the Institut Catholique de Paris), an institution founded by Monseignor Maurice d'Hulst (1841–1896) in 1875, and at the École des Hautes Études. He was a student of Louis DUCHESNE, whose philological and historical-critical approaches (cf. Liber Pontificalis) deeply impressed Batiffol. During this period, Batiffol's sympathy for this approach resulted in a sincere friendship with Marie Joseph LAGRANGE, who would become the founder of the École Biblique at Jerusalem. For a short period, Batiffol also studied at Berat (Albania) and ROME (1887–1889), where he was influenced by the ideas of the archaeologist Giovanni Battista de ROSSI. During his stay at Rome, Batiffol was the chaplain of Saint-Louis des Français.

When the historical-critical approach to the Bible was influencing Catholic exegesis, Batiffol started his academic career, while also serving as a chaplain at the Parisian Collège Sainte-Barbe. The new approach was marked by a return to the study of original languages and considered aspects of such disciplines as archaeology and philology. Within the context of these developments, Batiffol, who aimed at rediscovering the Patristic foundations of theological teaching, concentrated on the history of the Early Church, with a special interest in the history of the LITURGY and the PAPACY. From 1889 to 1892, he published his doctoral dissertations L'Abbaye de Rossano, contribution à l'histoire de la Vaticane and Quaestiones Philostorgianae. During the same period, his Studia patristica appeared. Batiffol's Histoire du bréviaire romain (1893), a critical reconstruction of the BREVIARY's historical development, methodologically much in line with Duchesne's Les origines du culte chrétien (1889), became a standard study in the field and was translated into English.

However, Batiffol's Eucharistie, published in 1905, is better known. Although the book was written as a critique of Protestant theologians such as Friedrich Loofs (1858–1928), it was put on the INDEX OF PROHIBITED BOOKS in 1907. After thorough revision and, finally, with ecclesiastical approval, the book was republished in 1913. Because of his Histoire du bréviaire romain, Batiffol was appointed as rector of the Institut Catholique de Toulouse in 1898, and because of this appointment, he became a domestic prelate of the POPE in 1899. But he had to withdraw from this position in 1907, and he returned to the Parisian Collège Sainte-Barbe. Although his work was condemned in the anti-Modernist sphere of Pope PIUS X, Batiffol was firmly opposed to the Modernist movement and one of its leading figures, Alfred LOISY, professor at the Institut Catholique de Paris when Batiffol studied there.

At Paris, Batiffol, who, in a sense, was rehabilitated when appointed as a titular canon of the Cathedral of Notre Dame, continued to teach (not only in Paris, but also in Strasbourg) and publish. He maintained an effort to hold together historical and theological approaches, a position which, at the time, was not evident (in Catholic circles, separation of the two approaches was considered to be the safest position; Batiffol believed in the development of a so-called positive THEOLOGY). Publications such as L'Église naissante et le catholicisme (1909), La paix constantinienne (1914), and Le catholicisme de saint Augustin (1920) received international appreciation. Batiffol also participated in the MALINES CONVERSATIONS and represented the pope at the conference on historical sciences at Oslo in 1928. Batiffol was also one of the co-founders, or first collaborators, of academic journals such as Bulletin de littérature ecclésiastique. When Batiffol was rector of the university at Toulouse, this journal clearly preferred a historical approach to theological research over a speculative one. Batiffol also helped to found Bulletin d'ancienne littérature et d'archéologie chrétiennes (founded in 1910; its publication was interrupted by World War I) and Revue biblique (explicitly invited by Lagrange).

SEE ALSO CATHOLIC BIBLICAL EXEGESIS SINCE VATICAN II; CHURCH, HISTORY OF, I (EARLY); EXEGESIS, BIBLICAL; LIBER PONTIFICALIS; PATRISTIC THEOLOGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

WORKS BY PIERRE BATIFFOL

Pierre Batiffol, Studia patristica: Etudes d'ancienne littérature chrétienne (Paris 1889–1890).

Pierre Batiffol, L'Eucharistie, la Présence réelle, et la Transsubstantiation (Paris 1905).

Pierre Batiffol, Histoire du bréviaire romain, 3rd ed. (Paris 1911).

Pierre Batiffol, Le catholicisme de saint Augustin (Paris 1920).

Pierre Batiffol, La paix constantinienne et le catholicisme, 5th ed. (Paris 1929).

Pierre Batiffol, L'Église naissante et le catholicisme, new ed. (Paris 1971).

Works about Pierre Batiffol

Marcel Becamel, "Comment Mgr. Batiffol quitta Toulouse à la Noël 1907," Bulletin de littérature ecclésiastique 72 (1971): 258–288; 74 (1973): 109–138.

Louis Duchesne, Les origines du culte chrétien (Paris 1889). Translated by M.L. McClure as Christian Worship: Its Origin and Evolutions; A Study of the Latin Liturgy up to the Time of Charlemagne (New York 1903).

L. Hell, "Batiffol, Pierre," in Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche II, 3rd ed. (Freiburg, Germany 1994), 82.

B. Joassart, "Mgr. Pierre Batiffol et les Bollandistes: Correspondance," Analecta Bollandiana 114 (1996): 77–108.

A.-G. Martimort, "À propos du départ de Toulouse de Mgr. Batiffol," Bulletin de littérature ecclésiastique 84 (1983): 198–216.

A.-G. Martimort, "Mgr. Pierre Batiffol et la liturgie," Bulletin de littérature ecclésiastique 96 (1995): 5–18.

B. Montagnes, "L'amitié Batiffol-Lagrange," Bulletin de littérature ecclésiastique 98 (1997): 3–20.

J. Rivière, Monseigneur Batiffol: 1861–1929 (Paris 1929).

L. Saltet, "Monseigneur Pierre Batiffol," Bulletin de littérature ecclésiastique 30 (1929): 7–18; 49–62; 126–141.

C.J.T. Talar, "Newman in France during the Modernist Period: Pierre Batiffol and Marcel Hébert," Newman Studies Journal 2 (2005): 45–57.

J.F. White, "Batiffol, Pierre," in Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart I, 4th ed. (Tübingen, Germany 1998), 1165.

Rev. Francis Xavier Murphy CSSR
Professor of Patristic Moral Theology, Accademia Alfonsiana, Rome, Italy
Staff Editor for Patrology, Early Church History, and Byzantine Church History, New Catholic Encyclopedia, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.

Mathijs Lamberigts
Full Professor of Church History
Faculty of Theology
K.U. Leuven (2010)

BATTHYÁNY-STRATTMANN, LÁSZLÓ, BL.

Also known as Ladislao or Ladislaus; layman and surgeon; b. January 20, 1870, Dunakiliti, Hungary; d. January 22, 1931, Vienna, Austria; beatified March 23, 2003, by JOHN PAUL II.

The sixth of ten boys, Ladislaus Batthyány was born into a family of the Hungarian nobility; he later inherited the title prince and the name Strattmann. When he was six years old, his family moved to Austria because of flooding in Dunakiliti. His parents divorced when he was young. At age nine, he was sent to a Jesuit boarding school. Three years later his mother died.

As a small boy, Ladislaus dreamed of becoming a doctor and helping the poor. When he was old enough, he wanted to enter medical school, but his father suggested he study subjects that would help him maintain the family property. He complied by taking agriculture and science classes, so he did not begin his medical coursework until 1896, at the age of twenty-six.

On November 10, 1898, he married a countess, Maria Teresa (Theresia) Coreth, with whom he had thirteen children. In 1900 he graduated from the University of Vienna with a medical degree. Two years later he opened a small hospital, where he worked first as a general practitioner, then as a surgeon and eye doctor.

During WORLD WAR I, the hospital was enlarged to accommodate wounded soldiers. After he inherited his uncle's castle and the title of prince in 1915, Ladislaus converted one wing of the castle into an ophthalmology hospital. Although he was highly recognized as a specialist in the field, he not only provided free treatment to those who could not pay but also paid for their prescriptions and even gave additional financial assistance to those in need. He helped many patients but considered himself only an instrument in the process. He gave God the glory for his patients' healing. Each of his patients received a free book about the faith, Open Your Eyes and See, and a picture of our Lord. His patients, whom he cared for as well as his own family, often called him a saint.

Near the end of his life, he was hospitalized with cancer. Though he was in constant pain, he continued to thank God for his many blessings. Batthyány-Strattmann died on January 21, 1931, one day after his sixty-first birthday. "In fidelity and charity" had been his life's motto.

On March 23, 2003, in the presence of Pope John Paul II, Cardinal José Saraiva Martins praised Batthyány-Strattmann as a "good Samaritan to hundreds of sick people" during the BEATIFICATION of eight people from the countries of Poland, Italy, Spain, and Hungary.

Feast: January 22.

SEE ALSO HUNGARY, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; JESUITS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ferdinand Holböck, Married Saints and Blesseds: Through the Centuries (San Francisco 2002), 429–432.

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "László Batthyány-Strattmann, M.D. (1870–1931)," Vatican Web site, March 23, 2003, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_lit_doc_20030323_batthyany_en.html (accessed October 22, 2009).

"Recognition of Miracles Means 8 New Blessed Will Be Proclaimed," Zenit, July 5, 2002, available from http://www.zenit.org/article-4848?l=english (accessed October 22, 2009).

Laurie J. Edwards
Independent Scholar
Reidsville, N.C. (2010)

BATTISTA DA VARANO, CAMILLA, ST.

Also known as Camilla da Varano and Battista Varano and Battista Varani; foundress of the monastery of St. Clare in Camerino, Italy; b. April 9, 1458, Camerino, Macerata, Italy; d. May 31, 1524, Camerino, Macerata, Italy; cultus confirmed by Pope GREGORY XVI, April 7, 1843; beatified by Pope BENEDICT XVI, December 19, 2005.

Baptized Camilla, Battista da Varano was the daughter of Prince Giulio Cesare da Varano and his young wife, Cecchina di Mastro Giacomo. An intelligent child, she loved singing and dancing, but after a sermon on the PASSION touched her, she determined to shed a tear every Friday. Thus began her remembrance of GOOD FRIDAY and Christ's suffering.

Though her parents initially opposed her vocation, twenty-three-year-old Camilla eventually entered the POOR CLARES of Urbino on November 14, 1481. A few years later she made her profession, taking the name of Sr. Battista on January 4, 1484. She founded the monastery at Camerino, which her father funded. After founding another monastery in Fermo in 1505, she returned to Camerino.

Her faith was greatly tested by physical suffering and temptations, but the greatest trial was the death of her relatives during Cesare BORGIA's revolt in 1502; she prayed, nonetheless, for those who had killed them. Mystical experiences and visions comforted her, and she recorded her religious thoughts in prose and verse. Rather than dictating these to others, she wrote them out herself. The pages reveal her great learning, her nostalgia for court life, and her passion for the divine. Some of her recollections were published as True Devotion to the Passion from the Writings of Battista Varani in London in 1924.

When she died in 1524, her funeral was held in the courtyard of her father's palace. Pope Benedict XVI issued a proclamation of a miracle attributed to her INTERCESSION on December 19, 2009, leading to her canonization in 2010. At the time of the publication of this entry, a date had not been set for her beatification.

SEE ALSO CANONIZATION OF SAINTS (HISTORY AND PROCEDURE); RELIGIOUS (MEN AND WOMEN).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

"Beata Camilla Battista da Varano," Rai Libro, available (in Italian) from http://www.railibro.rai.it/articoli.asp?id=462 (accessed January 6, 2010).

"Beata Camilla Battista da Varano," Santi, Beati, & Testimoni, available (in Italian) from http://www.santiebeati.it/dettaglio/90666 (accessed January 6, 2010).

"Blessed Camilla Battista Varani," Saints.SQPN.com, December 20, 2009, available from http://saints.sqpn.com/blessed-camilla-battista-varani/ (accessed January 6, 2010).

Enid M. Dinnis, ed., True Devotion to the Passion from the Writings of Battista Varani (London 1924).

Filippo Maria Salvatori, The Lives of St. Veronica Giulinai, Capuchin Nun; and of the Blessed Battista Varani, reprint of 1874 edition (Whitefish, Mont. 2008).

"The 21 Decrees of the Congregation for Saints' Causes," Coo-ees from the Cloister, December 20, 2009, available from http://coo-eesfromthecloister.blogspot.com/2009/12/21-decrees-of-congregation-for-saints.html (accessed January 6, 2010).

Laurie J. Edwards
Independent Scholar
Reidsville, N.C. (2010)

BEATIFICATION

Beatification refers to a papal declaration that permits a particular diocese, region, nation, religious institute, or group to venerate publicly a person who has died with a reputation for HOLINESS. A beatified person is granted the title "Blessed," and can be venerated with a public cult, which usually consists of a MASS and office in the person's honor, which may sometimes even be permitted for the universal Church. However, beatification is limited in its effects; for example, a blessed may not be the titular patron of a church except by apostolic indult (see USCC, Norms Governing Liturgical Calendars, 1984, p. 47).

Formal beatification is a positive declaration, following a canonical process, that a person did practice heroic virtue, or suffered a true martyrdom, and after death worked authentic miracles upon being invoked in prayer. Besides witnesses' testimony to the person's virtues, evidence of a first-class miracle is required, though this requirement may be waived in the case of a MARTYR. Equivalent beatification is the silent consent of the Church, aware of, yet not opposing, the public cult given one of its children over a long period of time.

Beatification may be understood as a preliminary step toward canonization as a saint, though not all those beatified are canonized. The process of beatification, therefore, falls under the same ecclesial legislation that pertains to the causes of the saints. Originally, beatification was not distinguished from canonization except by the limits imposed on the public cult. When the veneration of the holy person had spread beyond a local region and had become universal, the tacit or express consent of the pope to the public veneration became "ipso facto canonization" (Ortolan 1923, p. 494).

Development of the Beatification Process since the Middle Ages. In the MIDDLE AGES, the process of canonization became more formal and centralized, and Pope ALEXANDER III (r. 1159–1181), in 1171, "reserved the process of canonization to the Holy See" (Bunson 2009, p. 132). The decree of Alexander III also applied to the process of beatification, which had earlier been handled by local bishops. In 1588 Pope SIXTUS V (r. 1585–1590) established the Sacred Congregation of Rites, and he gave this congregation the authority to oversee the processes of beatification and canonization. Pope URBAN VIII (r. 1623–1644) promulgated more precise rules, and Pope BENEDICT XIV (r. 1740–1758) provided even more detailed procedures and theological analysis in his five-volume work titled, De servorum Dei beatificatione et de beatorum canonizatione [On the Beatification of the Servants of God and the Canonization of the Blessed]. This monumental work served as the principal guide for the Sacred Congregation of Rites for close to two centuries, and its basic points were incorporated into the 1917 Code of Canon Law. Pope PIUS XI (r. 1922–1939) established a "historical section" of the Sacred Congregation of Rites in 1930, which was entrusted with examination of "historical cases" of saints and blesseds—that is, those for which there were no living witnesses to testify to the person's sanctity and heroic virtue. In 1969 Pope PAUL VI (r. 1963–1978), by virtue of his 1969 apostolic constitution, Sacra Rituum Congregatio, divided the Sacred Congregation of Rites into two distinct dicasteries, the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Congregation for the Causes of Saints, with the latter authorized to deal with the processes of beatification and canonization.

Beatification Ceremony. Celebrated inside St. Peter's Basilica, this ceremony was in honor of the beatification of a group of African beati, Rome, Italy, 1965. © DAVID LEES/CORBIS

In 1983 Pope JOHN PAUL II (r. 1978–2005) promulgated his apostolic constitution, Divinus Perfectionis Magister, which was accompanied by the New Laws for the Causes of Saints, issued by the Congregation for the Causes of Saints. These documents provided clear procedures for the role and duties of bishops regarding causes for beatification and the competence of the Congregation for the Causes of Saints with respect to these causes. The New Laws also specified the roles of the petitioner for the cause (the one who advances or promotes the cause for beatification and/or canonization) and the postulator (the one who follows the course of the inquiry with diocesan or eparchial authorities and who must reside in Rome during "the Roman phase" of the cause). In 2007 the Congregation for the Causes of Saints issued its instruction, Sanctorum Mater, which provided even more detailed norms for conducting diocesan or eparchial inquiries into the causes of the saints. Greater clarity was given into the processes for ancient as opposed to recent causes, as well as the roles of episcopal delegates, promoters of justice, notaries, medical experts, witnesses, and theological censors.

The Procedure for Beatification. Basically, the process for beatification begins with the gathering of evidence of heroic virtue and sanctity regarding a person recognized as having these qualities during his or her life. Ordinarily, the petition for beatification cannot be presented until five years after death, and it is the bishop of the diocese in which the individual died who should make the petition. Once the petition has been initiated, the person under consideration is called a "Servant of God." After the Congregation for the Causes of Saints issues a formal decree of heroic virtue, the Servant of God is honored by the title "Venerable." The Congregation can also issue formal decrees recognizing martyrdom. At least one miracle must be verified before a Venerable can be beatified, though, as noted above, the requirement for a miracle can be waived in the case of martyrs.

Once a decree recognizing a miracle has been given, a date for the beatification can be set. John Paul II wished all beatifications to have the Roman Pontiff presiding, either in Rome or during an apostolic visit of the pope. Pope Benedict XVI (r. 2005–), however, approved a communiqué issued by the Congregation for the Causes of Saints on September 29, 2005, which changed this policy. Henceforth, the pope will preside at all canonizations, but beatifications ordinarily will take place in the diocese of the newly beatified or some other suitable place (though beatifications can still take place in Rome for special reasons). The liturgy and rite of beatification "will be celebrated by a representative of the Holy Father who will normally be the Prefect of the Congregation for the Causes of Saints."

The Question of Infallibility. Traditionally, canonizations have been judged to be definitive and, therefore, infallible declarations of the pope pertaining to "secondary objects of infallibility" (see Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Commentary on the Concluding Formula of the Professio Fidei, 1998, no. 11). Beatifications, though, have usually not been understood as infallible for two reasons: first, because the Roman Pontiff is only permitting veneration on a limited scale rather than mandating it for the universal Church, and second, because (according to the former process) a new examination of the cause takes place prior to canonization (Ortolan 1923, p. 495). Traditionally, therefore, a beatification was not understood to be infallible, but it would involve moral certainty of its truth, and to deny it would at least be temerarious. With the more rigorous requirements now in place for beatifications, the argument might be made that beatifications are also protected by the Holy Spirit and, therefore, infallible. After all, would the Holy Spirit allow the Church to confirm a miracle and authorize veneration of a Blessed in heaven in an erroneous fashion?

SEE ALSO INTERCESSION; CANONIZATION OF SAINTS (HISTORY AND PROCEDURE); RITES, CONGREGATION OF; SAINTS AND BLESSEDS; VENERABLE; VIRTUE, HEROIC.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Matthew Bunson, ed., Our Sunday Visitor's 2010 Catholic Almanac (Huntington, Ind., 2009).

Congregation for the Causes of Saints, New Laws for the Causes of Saints (February 7, 1983), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/congregations/csaints/documents/rc_con_csaints_doc_07021983_norme_en.html (accessed December 16, 2009).

Congregation for the Causes of Saints, Communiqué (September 29, 2005), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/congregations/csaints/documents/rc_con_csaints_doc_20050929_comunicato_en.html (accessed December 16, 2009).

Congregation for the Causes of Saints, Sanctorum Mater: Instruction for Conducting Diocesan or Eparchial Inquiries in the Causes of Saints (May 17, 2007), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/congregations/csaints/documents/rc_con_csaints_doc_20070517_sanctorum-mater_en.html (accessed December 16, 2009).

Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Commentary on the Concluding Formula of the Professio Fidei (June 29, 1998), available from http://www.ewtn.com/library/CURIA/CDFADTU.HTM (accessed December 16, 2009).

John Paul II, Apostolic Constitution: Divinus Perfectionis Magister (January 25, 1983), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/apost_constitutions/documents/hf_jp-ii_apc_25011983_divinus-perfectionis-magister_en.html (accessed December 16, 2009).

T. Ortolan, "Beatification," in Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, edited by Alfred Vacant et al., vol. 2 (Paris 1923), 493–497.

United States Catholic Conference (USCC), Liturgy Documentary Series 6: Norms Governing Liturgical Calendars (Washington, D.C., 1984).

Rev. Austin Edward Green OP
Novice Master for Laybrothers and
Professor of Church History
Aquinas Institute, River Forest, Illinois

Robert L. Fastiggi
Professor of Systematic Theology
Sacred Heart Major Seminary, Detroit, Michigan (2010)

BEAURAING (BELGIUM), APPARITIONS OF OUR LADY OF

The apparitions of Our Lady of Beauraing in the Walloon (French-speaking) province of Namur, southern Belgium, emphasize the need for constant PRAYER, the value of sacrifice, and the Blessed Virgin Mary's ongoing INTERCESSION for the conversion of sinners. The central focus of this series of thirty-three apparitions is the golden heart of the Immaculate Virgin Mary as a symbol of unfailing heavenly love.

Five children from two families testified that Mary had appeared to them nearly every evening from November 29, 1932, until and including January 3, 1933. At the time of the visions, none of the seers had reached the age of majority: Andrée Degeimbre was fourteen, her sister, Gilberte nine; Fernande Voisin was fifteen, her sister Gilberte thirteen, and their brother, Albert, eleven. The reports of the apparitions faced vigorous opposition, aimed primarily at the seers themselves who, far from devout, actually were known for their pranks. That none of them entered religious life in adulthood also invited later criticism, especially in view of the path taken by St. Bernadette SOUBIROUS (1844–1879), seer of LOURDES (1858), and Sr. Lúcia de Jesus Rosa Santos (1907–2005), principal seer of FÁTIMA (1917).

The First Apparition. Gilberte Voisin attended an academy of the Religious of Christian Doctrine. The other four children used to meet, then go together to the academy to walk home with Gilberte after dismissal at 6:30 each evening. The children, often given to high spirits and mischief, were known to play pranks along their way, ringing doorbells and on one occasion even starting up an automobile parked in the street. On the evening of November 29, 1932, just after ringing the bell at the academy, Albert Voisin turned away from the door to speak to the girls; he noticed beyond the trees in the school garden a luminous shape hovering in the air above the railway bridge across the road from the school gate. Immediately, he cried out: "Look! The Virgin is walking along the bridge!" This direct identification, by a child seer, of the vision with the Blessed Virgin Mary is altogether unusual. Nevertheless, Albert himself and the other three children insisted, when carefully questioned shortly thereafter, that these were the words he had spoken. Other children similarly favored by Marian apparitions did not at once recognize the figure as the Virgin Mary.

Turning to the place indicated by Albert, the three girls saw a woman walking back and forth above the bridge. She had joined her hands, and as she walked, the children noticed the outline of her knees beneath her white tunic. A cloud supporting the woman eighteen inches above the bridge concealed her feet. The children excitedly rang the bell again and pummeled the door with their fists. The portress, Sr. Valeria, expressed her annoyance, but the children pointed to the walking figure. The sister saw nothing. Gilberte Voisin then emerged from the school, and claimed without any prompting by the other children to see the lady walking atop the bridge. Now frightened, the children ran home, first to the Degeimbre house, where their tale was dismissed as another prank. The Voisin children proceeded to their own residence, where they too faced ridicule upon reporting their tale. That evening, Gilberte Degeimbre, according to her widowed mother, talked in her sleep, remarking, "How lovely she is!"

Subsequent Apparitions. The next evening the four children went to collect Gilberte Voisin from school, but refrained from the usual games of doorbell-ringing. All five children, upon arriving home, reported the same vision, again claiming that they had seen Our Lady. The parents greeted the report with skepticism, and the mother of the Degeimbre girls, Germaine Degeimbre, announced that she would accompany them on the following evening. In fact, she accompanied them with another daughter and five other people. Once the four children, walking ahead of the group, had reached the gate of the school, they began shouting that they saw Our Lady, this time standing nearly on the ground beside a hawthorn inside the school gate. Golden rays shone as from a diadem on the Lady's head. In disbelief, Mrs. Degeimbre thrashed about the bushes with a stick; finding nothing there, she directed the children to approach the door of the school. Once Gilberte emerged from the school, the five children claimed to see the Blessed Virgin by a holly bush. They reported that the Lady spread her arms toward them in the manner of the priest at Mass turning to the congregation with the greeting "Dominus vobiscum" (the Lord be with you). She then disappeared. As the group was leaving, the children saw her again over the shrubbery.

Upon their return home, Mrs. Degeimbre invited the Voisin children's mother, Marie Louise Voisin, to go with her to the school to see whether she could see anything. They and three of the children proceeded to the school. Arriving there around 8:00 p.m., December 1, the children reported seeing the Virgin standing on an arched branch of the hawthorn. Seemingly thrown to their knees, they prayed several Hail Marys in high-pitched voices quite different from their normal ranges. Now favorably disposed to the report and to the attitude of the children, Mrs. Voisin approached the parish priest and dean, Leon Lambert, and related the story.

The headmistress and superior, Mother Theophile Lannoy, S.D.C., forbade the children from collecting Gilberte Voisin from school on December 2. Instead, the superior herself escorted Gilberte home. On returning to the academy, she locked the gates and turned two ferocious dogs loose in the yard. Later that evening, Marie Louise and her husband, Hector Voisin, joined by two friends, came to the school with the five children. Just outside the locked gate, the children knelt down and prayed as they beheld the Virgin standing in the hawthorn tree. Prompted by the adults, Albert asked, "Are you the Immaculate Virgin?" He reported that the vision nodded and extended her arms. Upon asking her, "What do you want of us?" Albert said that the Lady replied, "Be very good." The children assured the figure in glowing terms that they would do as she asked. Meeting an employee of the school on their way home, the group returned to the school gate. On arrival, the children saw the Lady and prayed several Hail Marys while kneeling on the cobblestones on the street. The same dialogue took place between Albert Voisin and the Lady of the vision, with the Lady probing the sincerity of Albert's reply that he really would be good.

On December 3, the superior of the school forbade the children to return to the school that evening. The children complied with the ban, but by the next day, under pressure from the parents, the superior lifted the ban. The children turned up at 6:30 p.m. on December 4. This time, the Lady awaited them. In response to Albert's request that the Lady heal a paralytic friend, Joseph Degoudenne, and the blind uncle of Andrée and Gilberte Degeimbre, she directed them to bring the afflicted to the schoolyard on the feast of the Immaculate Conception, four days later. To Fernande's query concerning whether a chapel ought to be built on the site, the vision replied in the affirmative. Later that evening, Albert returned to the school gates with a Mr. Joseph Dereppe, who carried his ten-year-old daughter Paulette. The girl suffered from an ulcerated leg. At Albert's request for a cure of the poor girl, the Lady smiled and vanished. For weeks the girl experienced no change, but by February 15, 1933, her sores had disappeared and she walked without pain.

During an apparition on December 6, Albert mentioned that the Lady was wearing a rosary on her right arm, but that the beads were partially hidden in the folds of her dress; neither was the cross visible. On this occasion the children actually prayed a rosary during the vision, something they had not done heretofore. The other seers likewise reported seeing the rosary suspended from the Lady's right arm. Thereafter the rosary would figure in the apparitions of Beauraing. Although according to the seers the Lady made no mention of the rosary in her remarks to them, they took its presence on her arm as a sign of its importance. They did not always pray the rosary during the apparitions, but often prayed it while awaiting the appearance of the Lady.

Meanwhile, various solicitors and priests began to question the seers after subsequent visions. Crowds accompanied the children to the school grounds on December 8, the feast of the Immaculate Conception. By 6:30 p.m., a crowd of approximately fifteen thousand surrounded the site of the apparitions. The Lady appeared and stayed for the length of a ROSARY. No miracles took place, but the children for the first time fell into a state of ECSTASY. Physicians tried various means of inflicting pain or distracting their attention, but the children remained motionless. The Lady gave no utterance. Nor did she appear again until December 13 and 14, saying nothing on either occasion. After a lapse of several days, the Lady appeared once again. At the prompting of the clergy, the children asked the Lady on December 17 what she required of the priests. The reply consisted of only two words: "a chapel."

She appeared again on December 19 and 20. To the question posed on December 21 regarding her identity, the Lady replied, "I am the Immaculate Virgin." Albert did not see her on the following two occasions (December 22 and 23), although the other children reported seeing the Lady. On the latter occasion, Fernande asked the purpose of the apparitions; the answer came, "So that people will come here on pilgrimage." On Christmas Eve, the Lady remained silent to the question, "Why will you not give us proof if you are the Immaculate Virgin?" Although she appeared neither on Christmas nor on December 26, the Lady did appear on December 27, and on December 28 she announced that "Soon it will be my last visit."

During the apparition on December 29, the Lady opened her arms before disappearing. Fernande reported a golden heart on the Lady's breast surrounded by rays of light. The rest of the children reported seeing the golden heart during an appearance on December 30. Fernande recalled that on the second manifestation of the golden heart, the Lady told her, "Pray, pray often." Henceforth, the golden heart featured in the remaining apparitions.

On December 31, 1932, the Lady appeared three times to the children, first at the usual time, but twice more when the children returned later to the school garden. On January 1, 1933, Gilberte Voisin reported that the Lady had told her, "Pray continually." During the vision of January 2, the Lady promised that she would entrust a private message to each of the children on the following day.

The Final Apparition. A crowd of some twenty-five thousand turned up on January 3, for what was assumed to be the last apparition at Beauraing. Fernande, however, reported that she did not see the Lady on that occasion. The other children did not disclose the private message that the Lady allegedly had confided to them. She uttered further remarks, however, to two of them. To Andrée Degeimbre, the Lady stated: "I am the Mother of God, the Queen of Heaven. Pray continually." To Gilberte Voisin, the Lady said, "I will convert sinners." After the Lady disappeared, Fernande, feeling excluded, remained behind as the other four made a visit to the Lourdes shrine elsewhere on the grounds. Upon hearing a sudden explosion like a thunderclap and seeing a flash of light, Fernande fell to her knees. The Lady reappeared and asked her, "Do you love my Son? Do you love me?" Upon Fernande's affirmative reply, the Lady commanded, "Then sacrifice yourself for me."

This was the last of the visions. To each of them individually the Lady had bidden farewell. One of the children concluded that, "The lovely days are over."

Official Recognition of the Apparitions. Accounts of cures and conversions circulated. Among the first conversions were Mr. and Mrs. Hector Voisin, who had neglected the sacraments for years. Perhaps the most dramatic was that of the editor of the Belgian Communist daily, Le Drapeau Rouge (The Red Flag), who became a Dominican tertiary and brought the LEGION OF MARY to Belgium. In 1935 the diocese of Namur established a commission to investigate the events reported at Beauraing. In 1943 the bishop of Namur, André-Marie Charue, authorized the cult of Our Lady of Beauraing and allowed religious ceremonies to take place on the site of the apparitions. He reserved his final judgment on the authenticity of the apparitions. In 1949 Bishop Charue officially recognized the apparitions of Our Lady to the five children of Beauraing. The decision, approved by the Holy Office, rested on the scientific investigation of the healing of two women suffering from incurable diseases. The visions of Beauraing constitute the second series of Marian apparitions in the twentieth century to be recognized officially by the Catholic Church. (Those at Fatima in 1917 mark the first; those in 1933 at Banneux, southeast of Liège in Belgium, mark the third.)

In 1947 the first stone of the chapel requested by the Lady was laid on land adjoining the site of the apparitions. Although the school grounds remain the center of the devotion, most of the ceremonies related to Our Lady of Beauraing take place at the Domain of Mary. This large parkland had been the site of the Chateau de Beauraing, destroyed by fire in the nineteenth century. The park accommodates the crowds of pilgrims too numerous for the modest site of the apparitions.

The feast of Our Lady of Beauraing is August 22. This date, the octave of the Assumption, was assigned in 1944 by Pope PIUS XII as the feast of the Immaculate Heart of Mary, to commemorate his consecration of the world to Mary's Immaculate Heart on that day in 1942. The feast of the Immaculate Heart of Mary afforded a fitting occasion to commemorate Our Lady of Beauraing, renowned for her golden heart. Nevertheless, in 1969 Pope PAUL VI transferred the feast of the Immaculate Heart of Mary to the Saturday following the moveable solemnity of the Sacred Heart of Jesus. Instead, August 22 henceforth would mark the feast of the queenship of Mary. This coincides well with Beauraing in view of Mary's self-identification there as "queen of heaven."

All five seers married and raised families, a fact frequently used against the authenticity of the Beauraing apparitions. Nevertheless, they lived faithfully their vocation to marriage and family life. On May 18, 1985, Pope JOHN PAUL II visited Beauraing, meeting Gilberte Voisin and Andrée and Gilberte Degeimbre. He thereby confirmed his own approval of the apparitions and of the later vocations of the visionaries. Albert Voisin died on December 23, 2003.

The Messages of Our Lady of Beauraing. The messages of Beauraing are threefold: prayer, sacrifice, and the conversion of sinners. The Marian dimensions of the apparitions include Mary's utter freedom from sin as the Immaculate Virgin, her love symbolized by the golden heart, and her powerful intercession as queen of heaven for the conversion of sinners. The last aspect particularly underscores her role as mediatrix of graces, understood in subordination to Christ her Son, the sole mediator between God and humanity.

SEE ALSO BELGIUM, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; HAIL MARY; IMMACULATE HEART OF MARY; MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, DEVOTION TO; MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, QUEENSHIP OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Mary Amatora, The Queen's Heart of Gold: The Complete Story of Our Lady of Beauraing, 4th ed. (New York 1972).

John Beevers, "The Golden Heart," in The Sun Her Mantle (Dublin 1953), 182–189.

Arthur Monin, Notre-Dame de Beauraing: Origines et développements de son culte, 2nd ed. (Beauraing, Belgium 1952).

Don Sharkey, "The Virgin with the Golden Heart," In A Woman Clothed with the Sun: Eight Great Appearances of Our Lady in Modern Times, edited by John J. Delaney (New York [1961] 2001), 181–200.

Don Sharkey with Joseph Debergh. Our Lady of Beauraing: The Complete Story of Our Lady's Appearances (New York 1958).

Fernand Toussaint with Camille-Jean Joset, Beauraing (1932–1982) (Bruges, Belgium 1981).

Rev. Neil J. Roy
University of Notre Dame (2010)

BELTRAME QUATTROCCHI, LUIGI AND MARIA CORSINI, BB.

First married couple beatified together; Luigi: b. January 12, 1880, Catania, Italy; d. November 9, 1951, Rome; Maria: b. June 24, 1884, Florence, Italy; d. August 26, 1965, Serravalle, Italy; beatified by Pope JOHN PAUL II in Rome on October 21, 2001.

The beatification of Luigi and Maria Corsini Beltrame Quattrocchi was the first joint beatification of a married couple in the history of the Church. The couple was married for fifty years and had four children, two of whom became priests (and concelebrated the Mass of BEATIFICATION with the pope) and one of whom became a religious sister. Husband and wife died at different times, and so John Paul II, in another historic move, declared that their feast day would be the date of their wedding anniversary. Luigi was a lawyer who rose to the highest levels of the Italian legal system. Maria was a teacher, nurse, writer, and catechist. Both were active in Catholic lay organizations. Together, they also actively engaged in helping those in need.

In addition to creating a family life marked by an atmosphere of peace and regular Catholic devotion, the couple heroically risked the death of Maria Corsini by refusing to abort a medically hazardous pregnancy that threatened her life. Through the intercession of the couple a young Italian man with a circulatory disorder was healed, and John Paul II recognized this event as the requisite beatification miracle.

John Paul II's homily of beatification stressed how Luigi and Maria concretely anticipated the universal call to HOLINESS, which would later be strongly emphasized in the Second Vatican Council, by educating their children on the path of following Jesus Christ and by engaging in a rich spiritual life. The pope articulated the historic nature of this joint beatification:

> The riches of faith and love of the husband and wife Luigi and Maria Beltrame Quattrocchi, are a living proof of what the Second Vatican Council said about the call of all the faithful to holiness, indicating that spouses should pursue this goal, "propriam viam sequentes," "following their own way" (Lumen gentium, n. 41). Today the aspiration of the Council is fulfilled with the first beatification of a married couple: their fidelity to the Gospel and their heroic virtues were verified in their life as spouses and parents.

Cardinal José Saraiva Martins, then prefect of the Congregation of the Causes of Saints, noted that the couple "made their family an authentic domestic Church, open to life, prayer, witness of the Gospel, the social apostolate, solidarity with the poor, and friendship."

Feast: November 25.

SEE ALSO APOSTOLATE AND SPIRITUAL LIFE; HOLINESS, UNIVERSAL CALL TO; ITALY, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; VATICAN COUNCIL II.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

"Blessed Luigi Beltrame Quattrocchi," Patron Saints Index, available from http://saints.sqpn.com/saintl54.htm (accessed August 6, 2009).

"Blessed Maria Corsini," Patron Saints Index, available from http://saints.sqpn.com/saintm1x.htm (accessed August 6, 2009).

"For First Time, Married Couple Is Beatified Together: Pope Fulfills a Personal Wish," Zenit (October 21, 2001), available from http://www.zenit.org/article-2696?l=english (accessed August 6, 2009).

John Paul II, "Beatification of the Servants of God Luigi Beltrame Quattrocchi and Maria Corsini, Married Couple" (Homily, October 21, 2001) Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/homilies/2001/documents/hf_jp-ii_hom_20011021_beltrame-quattrocchi_en.html (accessed August 6, 2009).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Luigi Beltrame Quattrocchi (1880–1951) e Maria Corsini vedova Beltrame Quattrocchi (1884–1965)," (October 21, 2001) Vatican Web site, available (in Italian) from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/documents/ns_lit_doc_20011021_quattrocchi_it.html (accessed August 6, 2009).

J.C. Roma, "When Sanctity Is a Conjugal Matter," available (in Spanish) from http://www.archimadrid.com/alfayome/menu/pasados/revistas/2001/sep2001/num271/testimo/testimo.htm (accessed August 6, 2009).

Oswald Sobrino
Editor, Catholic Analysis
http://CatholicAnalysis.blogspot.com (2010)

BENEDICT XIV-I AND BENEDICT XIV-II, ANTIPOPES

Two men assumed this name in the years following the end of the Great Schism or Avignon Residency (1378–1417) at the Council of CONSTANCE. They were Bernard Garnier (1425–c. 1429) and Jean Carrier (1430–1437). Technically speaking, Garnier and Carrier were counterantipopes, for they both contested the standing of an established ANTIPOPE. Minor figures even in their own day, they represented a continuing line of succession of antipopes in Avignon that began with the elections of the antipopes CLEMENT VII (1378–1394) and BENEDICT XIII (1394–1423), but which split following the election of Antipope CLEMENT VIII (1423–1429).

The careers of Bernard Garnier and Jean Carrier must be set against the complicated last phase of the Great Schism (1378–1417). As recognition for him waned across Europe, Benedict XIII ended his days in exile in the castle of Peñsicola in Valencia, under the protection of King Alfonso V of Aragon. The day before his death on May 23, 1423, Benedict XIII appointed four loyal followers as cardinals to perpetuate the Avignon succession. Such appointees by antipopes are today referred to as pseudo-cardinals. They were Julián Lobera y Valtierra, a chaplain and scribe of Apostolic Letters in the diocese of Tarazona; Ximeno Dahe, an auditor of the papal chamber; Domingo de Bonnefoi, a Carthusian and prior at the monastery of Montealegre near Barcelona; and Jean Carrier, the man most instrumental in electing Bernard Garnier as the first Antipope Benedict XIV, and who later took up the same mantle and name.

Jean Carrier was probably from Espalion in the Pyrenees. Trained as a canon lawyer, Carrier became involved in a 1406 uprising against the archbishop of Toulouse, Vital de Castelmourou. On September 1, 1412, Benedict XIII gave Carrier right to the revenues from the Priory of Cabannes in the diocese of Tortosa; he also held a post as priest in the diocese of Albi. In 1413 Carrier became a councilor to Bernard VII, count of Armagnac; in time, Carrier became chaplain for the count's successor, Jean I. He also received control of the church in Lombers, and then the archdeaconate of Saint-Antonin in the diocese of Rodez on March 28, 1413, after Benedict XIII ousted the incumbent, Michel del Bès, for supporting Antipope JOHN XXIII at the Council of Pisa. In January 1415 Carrier received the office of apostolic collector in the dioceses of Auch and Rodez, where Bernard Garnier worked as his assistant. On December 31, 1417, Benedict XIII gave Carrier the right to receive the oath of office for Vital de Mauléon, named as the new bishop of Rodez; he also showered additional clerical offices and favors on Carrier, such as the Priories of Lédergues and Balsac. Carrier's active support of Benedict XIII earned him a condemnation by Pope MARTIN V on July 24, 1420. Carrier sought protection in the count's castle in Tourène, which nuncios sent by Martin V besieged, but to no avail. Along with three others, Carrier received from the dying Benedict XIII for his loyalty the cardinal's mitre with the title of Saint-Étienne-le Rond and a post as priest of S. Stefano al Monte Celio.

Carrier was unable to attend the conclave that elected the Antipope Clement VIII on June 10, 1423, due to the siege of Tourène. He finally escaped in December and made his way to Peñíscola. He refused to recognize Clement VIII on the grounds of corruption and SIMONY; Clement VIII in turn imprisoned him briefly in Peñíscola until the count of Armagnac asked for his return to France. Carrier continued his machinations by assembling several theologians and canon lawyers in Toulouse to contest Clement VIII's election, declaring that he alone had the authority to appoint the pope. On November 12, 1425, he brought a notary and several witnesses together in Armagnac to help him name and consecrate Bernard Garnier as Benedict XIV.

Bernard Garnier was a minor clergyman in the diocese of Rodez. He is first mentioned in the record on July 15, 1412, when he received an apostolic benefice. The next year he became vicar of the archdeacon of Millau, Guirard Calhol. In 1414 he showed up at the papal court in Avignon as the legal representative of Bertrand Déodat to settle a dispute over revenues attached to the Priory of Saint-Saturnin de Creissels. Antipope Benedict XIII granted him additional favors, such as the Priory of Saint-Martin des Faux on November 20, 1418, and the privilege to choose his own confessor. In 1419 the antipope designated him as Jean Carrier's assistant apostolic collector. Martin V condemned him along with Carrier as schismatics in July 1420. In 1425 Garnier became SACRISTAN in the cathedral chapter of Rodez and received from Jean I, count of Armagnac, an office responsible for managing comtal properties in Rouergue just two days before his secret election as pope on November 16, 1425, by Carrier. The first Benedict XIV became known as the "hidden pope" because Carrier did not initially disclose his action to anyone. He and Garnier took shelter in the castle of Jalenques under the protection of the count, who was excommunicated and stripped of his lands. Carrier divulged the existence of Antipope Benedict XIV to the count on January 29, 1429, who, in turn, mentioned him in a letter to JOAN OF ARC. Garnier abandoned his claim to the papacy in 1429 and disappeared until 1437, when he reappeared in the diocesan register as a church beadle and as sacristan. In 1450 Jean d'Estaing, a churchman from Lyon, contested his office as sacristan before the Parlement of Toulouse due to his past support of Jean Carrier. Garnier denied the charge completely, stating that he only served the count of Armagnac. He lost anyway.

Before Garnier abdicated in 1429, he elevated four men to serve as pseudo-cardinals. One was Jean Farald, while the other three remain obscure. These four pseudo-cardinals met in 1430 as a conclave to elect Jean Carrier as Garnier's successor. Carrier took the name of his predecessor, who he effectively rendered illegitimate, and thus became the second Antipope Benedict XIV. Jean Carrier in turn created six pseudo-cardinals. They included Pierre Tifane and Pierre Tranier. After he reconciled with Pope Martin V, the count of Armagnac expelled Carrier from Jalenques. Carrier then took refuge in Puylaurens until his capture in 1433 by the count of Foix, who imprisoned him in the comtal castle in Foix until his death in 1437.

The pseudo-cardinals created by Carrier met in 1437 to designate his successor. These reputed successors are sometimes referred to as the "imaginary antipopes" of the Viaur, a remote region of grottoes and gorges in southern Languedoc. The first was Pierre Tifane, who took the name Benedict XV from 1437 to 1470, and Jean Langlade, who supposedly served as Benedict XVI from 1470 to 1499. It is clear that Jean Farald, along with Jean Moysset and Guilhem Noalhac de Jouqueviel, longtime supporters of Antipope Benedict XIII, preached in the Viaur valley into the 1450s. Pierre Tranier's father, Jean, a blacksmith, came to be considered a PROPHET by their followers among the peasantry. They were particularly active in the hamlet of Flauzins in the parish of Lescure-Jaoul. Farald came on occasion to hear confession and give communion. Authorities in Rodez finally cracked down on these dissidents, who were arrested at a clandestine meeting in a mill in Soulayrié in 1467. Tried and convicted as heretics, they perished at the stake in Rodez. So ended the movement, such as it was, associated with the Antipopes Benedict XIV.

SEE ALSO AVIGNON PAPACY; CARTHUSIANS; WESTERN SCHISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Mathieu Desachy, "L'Église du Viaur: Les dernier partisans de l'obédience avignonnaise dans le Midi (1420–1470)," 126e congrès national des Société historiques et scientifiques (Toulouse 2001), 47–61.

Le Midi et le grand schisme d'occident, edited by H. Millet (Toulouse 2004).

Noël Valois, La prolongation du grand schisme d'occident au XVe siècle dans le midi de la France (Paris 1899).

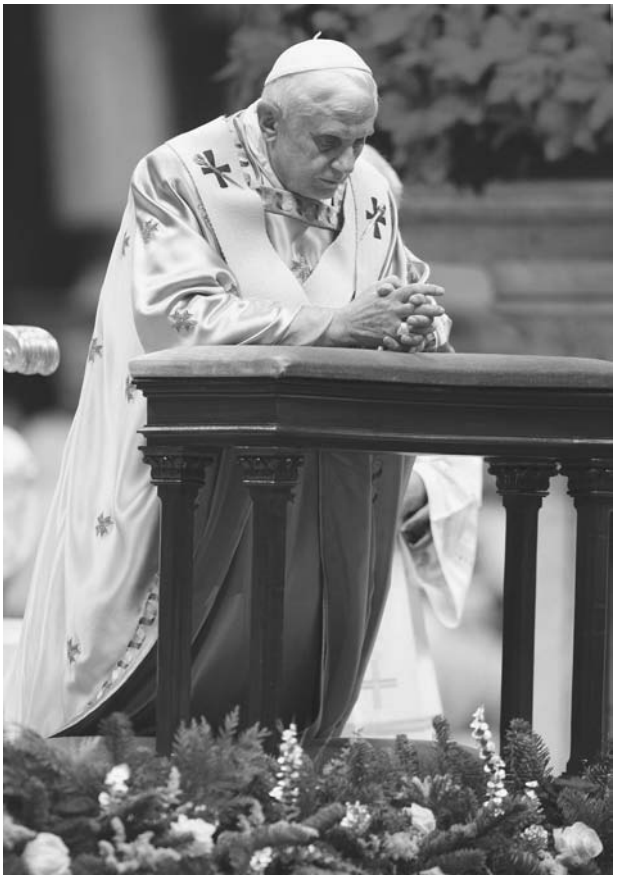
Michael Wolfe
Professor of History
St. John's University, Queens, N.Y. (2010)

BENEDICT XVI, POPE



Pope, theologian; b. Joseph RATZINGER, Marktl am Inn, Germany, April 16 (Holy Saturday), 1927; elected pope April 19, 2005.

Benedict XVI grew up in Bavaria as the youngest of three children of a police commissioner. His family was opposed to Adolf HITLER's Nazi ideology, and his father took an extended sick leave so as not to be required to implement Nazi regulations. Ratzinger's school teachers were also inclined to take an anti-Nazi stance, and he was later to write that it seemed to him that an education in Greek and Latin antiquity, such as his teachers had, created a mental attitude that resisted seduction by totalitarian ideology.

In 1939 Ratzinger entered the minor seminary of St. Michael in Traunstein, something he found difficult because he was not made for regimented boarding-school life, and, as the youngest of the students, he was also the least able sportsman. However, the seminary was soon converted into a military hospital, the playing fields were lost, and in lieu of field sports, the boys were taken on hikes and fishing trips which were more appealing to his contemplative nature.

At the age of fourteen he was signed up as a member of the Hitler Youth by his seminary superiors, though he was never required to attend meetings, and the Nazi ideology occupied nothing but a negative place in his intellectual formation. In 1943, at the age of sixteen, he was called up for military service. He spent the last two years of WORLD WAR II in various military appointments, first at an antiaircraft battery near Munich, then as an infantryman on the Hungarian border, and finally as an American prisoner-of-war near Ulm. Ratzinger has written that he never fired a single shot during this period of military service, and he actually deserted the army prior to his being taken prisoner by the Americans. He narrowly escaped execution for desertion by SS officers who allowed him safe passage because they believed him to be wounded. He was carrying one of his arms in a sling.

After the war Ratzinger entered the seminary of Freising, and in 1947 he began theological studies at the Herzogliches Georgianum associated with the University of Munich. During this period of his life, the writers who influenced him included Romano GUARDINI, Josef

Midnight Mass. Pope Benedict XVI kneels to pray as he celebrates the Christmas Midnight Mass in St. Peter's Basilica at the Vatican, early Monday, December 25, 2006. AP IMAGES

Pieper, Peter Wust, Theodor Häcker, and John Henry Cardinal NEWMAN. He also studied the thought of Martin HEIDEGGER, Karl JASPERS, Friedrich NIETZSCHE, Ludwig Klages, Henri BERGSON, Theodore Steinbüchel, and Martin BUBER. He has described the encounter with Buber's PERSONALISM as a spiritual experience that left an essential mark, especially as it resonated with his studies of St. AUGUSTINE.

On the Feast of Sts. Peter and Paul in 1951 he was ordained a priest, along with his brother Georg. His doctoral dissertation, defended in 1953, was titled "The People and the House of God in Augustine's Doctrine of the Church"; and his postdoctoral thesis, or Habilitationsschrift, offered an examination of St. BONAVENTURE's theology of history. The latter was the subject of some internal faculty controversy as it was highly critical of the then-dominant Suárezian account of revelation.

Vatican II. In his thirties Ratzinger attended the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965) as a peritus (theological consultant) to Josef Cardinal Frings of Cologne. In those years he was representative of a younger generation of scholars who were frustrated by what they called the Roman school of theology, a form of neoscholasticism that did not allow much room for the use of conceptual frameworks built on other than scholastic categories. Ratzinger was never enchanted by preconciliar scholasticism, which he found to be too dry and impersonal. In contrast, he found that within the works of St. Augustine, "the passionate, suffering, questioning man is always right there, and you can identify with him" (Ratzinger 1997, p. 61). His former seminary prefect, Alfred Läpple, has said that SCHOLASTICISM "wasn't his beer" (Valente and Azzardo 2006, p. 60).

At the Council, Ratzinger played an important role in the drafting of Dei Verbum, which in part can be read as a vindication of arguments made in his controversial thesis on the theology of history. He was also a member of the subcommission responsible for drafting Articles 22 and 23 of Lumen gentium and a member of the team responsible for redrafting the schema on the Church's missionary activity. It is suspected that he drafted the speech delivered by Cardinal Frings on November 8, 1963, in which the cardinal was strongly critical of the procedures of the then Holy Office, which was subsequently reorganized and renamed the Sacred Congregation for the DOCTRINE OF THE FAITH by PAUL VI.

During these years he was associated with other young periti who were also critical of the Roman schools of theology. These included Karl RAHNER, S.J., Hans KÜNG, and Edward SCHILLEBEECKX, O.P. He collaborated with Rahner on Dei Verbum, and in 1966 they jointly published Revelation and Tradition. However, this alliance was short lived and did not survive the 1960s.

Papal Blessing. Pope Benedict XVI blesses the faithful during the Angelus noon prayer from the balcony of his summer retreat of Castel Gandolfo in the hills overlooking Rome, Sunday, July 29, 2007. AP IMAGES

By the early 1970s a definite cleavage had developed between two groups of leading theologians, which came to be associated with the names of the journals in which they published. One group, centered around the journal Concilium, included: Rahner, Küng, Johann Baptist Metz, Yves CONGAR, O.P, Schillebeeckx, Paul Brand, Franz Böckle, and Gustavo GUTIERREZ. Ratzinger was for a time a member of the Concilium board. He has described it as an attempt to establish itself, on the model of the ancient rights of the Sorbonne, as the true center of teaching and teachers of the Church. He believes that this aspiration was buried at the fifth anniversary congress in Brussels in 1970 when divisions began to appear among Rahner, Congar, Schillebeeckx, and Küng. The second group was centered around the Swiss theologian Hans Urs von BALTHASAR, Henri de LUBAC, M.J. Le Guillou, Louis Bouyer, Jorge Medina, and Ratzinger. Together in 1972 they founded the Communio journal, which came to be published in sixteen languages. This involvement with the establishment of Communio followed upon the success of his first book, Introduction to Christianity, which was a bestseller published in 1968 and later translated into seventeen languages.

In 1969, in Herbert Vorgrimler's Commentary on the Documents of the Second Vatican Council, Ratzinger published an extensive critique of the treatment of freedom and anthropology in the Conciliar document Gaudium et spes. He argued that while the document offered a daring new theological anthropology which was to be celebrated, the presentation of the anthropology was poor, and indeed he went so far as to observe that some of the language in the section on FREE WILL was "downright Pelagian" (p. 138). The sections of the document he strongly affirmed were those owing their inspiration to the work of Henri de Lubac, particularly de Lubac's Catholicism, which he described as "a key reading event" that gave him "a new way of looking at theology and faith as such" (Ratzinger 1998, p. 98).

Academic Posts and the Episcopacy. As one of the most prolific theologians of his generation, Ratzinger held positions at the University of Bonn (1959–1963), the University of Münster (1963–1966), the University of TÜBINGEN (1966–1969), and the University of Regensburg (1969–1977), and in 1992 he was appointed an associate member of the Académie Française in the section for moral and political sciences. However, his life as a full-time professor came to an end in 1977 when he was made a bishop and cardinal by Paul VI.

As Archbishop of Munich-Freising (1977–1981), Ratzinger was a prominent defender of the dignity and sacredness of human life. He delivered many homilies against ABORTION, and he also took part in street demonstrations against the treatment of workers and intellectuals associated with the Polish anti-Communist trade union, SOLIDARITY. He was active on ecumenical fronts, respected by Lutheran scholars, and he was also interested in the problems of the Church in Latin America. He assisted with raising money for the missions in Ecuador, he organized conferences with nonbelievers, and he extended hospitality to the local Jewish community. Every year on the Feast of St. Korbinian he presided at a meeting with young people who were invited to question him about the Church's teachings.

The Prefect. In 1981 he was called to Rome by Pope JOHN PAUL II to become the prefect for the Sacred Congregation of the Doctrine of the Faith, the President of the INTERNATIONAL THEOLOGICAL COMMISSION, and the President of the PONTIFICAL BIBLICAL COMMISSION. In 1985 he participated in the Synod called to reflect upon the reception of the Council, and out of this meeting came the decision to publish a new Catechism or compendium of Catholic teaching. Ratzinger played a major role in its composition and presided over its release in 1992. In 1985 he allowed himself to be interviewed by the journalist Vittorio Messori, and this collection of very frank reflections on the state of the Church in the postconciliar era, marketed as The Ratzinger Report, became another international bestseller.

Ratzinger's early years as prefect were dominated by the problems of the Church in Latin America and the general influence of the Latin American liberation theologians. He was especially critical of the CHRISTOLOGY of those associated with the LIBERATION THEOLOGY movement, and this culminated in the release of two documents, the "Instruction on Certain Aspects of the 'Theology of Liberation'" (1984) and the "Instruction on Christian Freedom and Liberation" (1986).

Ratzinger's concern to defend the ontological priority of the universal Church over that of the local church was manifest in his "Letter to the Bishops of the Catholic Church on Some Aspects of the Church Understood as Communion" (1992). Questions about the nature of the Church flowing from some terminology of the conciliar documents were also addressed in the document Dominus Iesus, presented by Ratzinger in 2000. This declaration began with the observation that the Church's missionary proclamation is endangered by relativistic theories that seek to justify religious pluralism. It declares that the Catholic faithful are required to profess that there is historical continuity—rooted in the APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION—between the Church founded by Christ and the Catholic Church. Moreover, the Church, constituted and organized as a society in the present world, subsists in the Catholic Church, governed by the successor of Peter and by the bishops in communion with him. The words "subsists in" come from the Conciliar document Lumen gentium. In Dominus Iesus, it is stated that with this expression the Second Vatican Council sought to harmonize two doctrinal statements: on the one hand, that the Church of Christ, despite the divisions which exist among Christians, continues to exist fully only in the Catholic Church; and on the other hand, that outside of her structure, many elements can be found of sanctification and truth—that is, in those churches and ecclesial communities which are not yet in full communion with the Catholic Church.

In 1994 John Paul II's Ordinatio sacerdolatis: Apostolic Letter on Reserving Priestly Ordination to Men Alone was released with the strong support of Ratzinger. In his many references to this issue, he emphasizes that the Jews stood out in the Old Testament world as being the only religious group without priestesses, and he believes that this is theologically important. In 1995 Ratzinger issued a response to questions about the doctrine contained in Ordinatio Sacerdotalis, stating that the teaching belongs to the deposit of the faith and has been taught infallibly by the ordinary and universal Magisterium and confirmed by the pope.

Prominent theologians whose works were the subject of warnings by the Sacred Congregation during his period as prefect include: Schillebeeckx, who promoted the idea that nonpriests might in some circumstances be able to validly perform a consecration; Charles CURRAN, who rejected the teaching against CONTRACEPTION and who was subsequently removed from his post at The CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA; Tissa Balasuriya, O.M.I., who rejected the doctrine of ORIGINAL SIN, supported the ordination of women, and held heretical views on Christ's redemptive role; and Roger Haight, S.J., whose works were held to contain errors in Christology. Archbishop Marcel LEFEBVRE was also excommunicated for ordaining bishops without the consent of the pope.

Of the many documents released by the Sacred Congregation during Ratzinger's prefecture, the more prominent ones addressed problems in the area of sexual morality. These included: a "Letter to the Bishops of the Catholic Church on the Pastoral Care of Homosexual Persons" (1986); an "Instruction on Respect for Human Life in Its Origin and on the Dignity of Procreation" (1987), clarifying the Church's position on assisted fertilization techniques and other biomedical issues, and reaffirming the teaching that an embryo is human from the moment of conception and that conception is moral only in the context of sexual intercourse within marriage; a "Note Regarding the Moral Rule of Humanae vitae and Pastoral Duty" (1989), stating that couples who find the teaching difficult to follow are deserving of love and respect, but nonetheless contraception is always an "intrinsically disordered act"; "Some Considerations Concerning the Response to Legislative Proposals on Nondiscrimination of Homosexual Persons" (1992), saying that it is not unjust to take sexual orientation into account in certain situations such as adoption, service in the military, and the employment of teachers.

In 1994 he issued a "Letter to Bishops Regarding the Reception of Holy Communion by Divorced and Remarried Members of the Faithful," affirming that those who are divorced and remarried cannot receive Holy Communion. In 2003 he issued "Considerations Regarding Proposals to Give Legal Recognition to Unions Between Homosexual Persons," reaffirming Church teaching requiring compassion for homosexuals, but opposing legal recognition of homosexual unions.

Also in 2003 he issued a "Doctrinal Note on the Participation of Catholics in Political Life," in which he held that while Catholics are free to choose among the various strategies offered by political parties for promoting the common good, they may not claim that such a freedom permits them to support abortion or EUTHANASIA.

While prefect for the Sacred Congregation, Ratzinger continued to publish academic works, including The Feast of Faith (1986), A New Song for the Lord (1996), and The Spirit of the Liturgy (2000); and as chairman of the Pontifical Biblical Commission he presided over the drafting of two significant documents: "The Interpretation of the Bible in the Church" (1993) and "The Jewish People and their Sacred Scriptures in the Christian Bible" (2002). These built on principles set out in Dei Verbum, as well as the encyclical Providentissimus Deus of LEO XIII and Divino afflante Spiritu of PIUS XII.

Benedict XVI. On April 19, 2005, Ratzinger was elected pope after a short conclave, and he took the name Benedict XVI. His first encyclical, Deus caritas est (2005), began with a reiteration of the central theme of his thesis on the theology of history, that being Christian is not the result of an ethical choice or a lofty idea, but the encounter with an event, a person, who gives life a new horizon and a decisive direction. He also developed the theological understanding of the relationship between eros and agape and launched an assault on the Nietzschean claim that Christianity had killed eros. While not adding anything substantially new to the Church's social teaching, the encyclical nonetheless made the point that love must always be a component of Christian social welfare.

A second encyclical, Spe salvi, was released in 2007. It offered a reflection on the theological virtue of hope and contemporary secularist variations on this theme, including the Marxist and liberal notions of progress and scientific rationality. According to these secularist versions of hope, redemption is no longer expected from faith, but from a newly discovered link between science and praxis. There is now a faith in progress itself, where progress is interpreted as the application of scientific principles to overcome various forms of human dependency. This change has in turn given rise to new conceptions of reason and freedom which appear to hold out the hope of a new and perfect human community. Pope Benedict stated that it is not science, but love, that redeems humanity, and thus salvation is a social enterprise. Henri de Lubac's ecclesiological masterpiece, Catholicism, is cited as a source of understanding of this point. Pope Benedict also used the encyclical as an opportunity to reaffirm the Church's teaching on the existence of an intermediate state between heaven and hell, usually called PURGATORY. Here he affirmed the idea of some recent theologians that the fire which both burns and saves is Christ himself, the Judge and Savior.

The inadequacy and errors of a secularist notion of progress was also a central theme of the third encyclical of the pontificate, released in July 2009. Entitled Caritas in veritate, it offered a synthesis of the Trinitarian anthropology of Gaudium et spes and the subsequent social teaching of Paul VI and John Paul II, and it called for a reform of the United Nations and the economic institutions of international finance. The core theological ideas were all present in Ratzinger's essay on the notion of human dignity in *Gaudium et spe*s, written in the late 1960s. The intellectual center of the encyclical is found in the statement that "a humanism which excludes God is an inhuman humanism" since "life in Christ is the first and principal factor of development." Secularist notions of development have fostered government policies which are hostile to the more spiritual elements of human life, including relationships of reciprocal self-giving in love. The pope lamented that in the name of human development abortion is encouraged and international aid is linked to the acceptance of contraceptives. He argued that there exists a "human ecology" which links the life issues to the issues commonly associated with social justice.

Benedict's first apostolic visit was to Cologne for the August 2006 WORLD YOUTH DAY celebrations attended by an estimated one million pilgrims. A collection of his homilies delivered on the occasion was published in God's Revolution: World Youth and Other Cologne Talks (2006). Later in 2006 he returned to Germany and delivered an academic address at the University of Regensburg titled "Faith, Reason and the University: Memories and Reflections." Although the lecture was critical of both the place accorded to religion in Western liberal theory and the place accorded to reason in Islamic thought, and although the subtext of the speech was that both Western liberalism and Eastern Islam share a common voluntarist philosophical starting point (for one the will of the individual, for the other the will of Allah), the response of many Muslims was to treat the speech as a direct attack on Islam. From Islamic quarters there was almost no acknowledgement that the pope had been equally critical of Western liberalism and was imploring all peoples of good will to critically examine the relationship between religion and reason. These themes were central to a collection of his essays published as Truth and Tolerance: Christian Belief and World Religions (2004).

Further apostolic visits have included a trip to Brazil in May 2007 for the Fifth General Conference of the Latin American and Caribbean Bishops and the canonization of the first Brazil-born native saint, Fr. Antônio de Sant'Ana GALVÃO; a trip to the United States in April 2008, which included an address to the United Nations and a meeting with the leaders of the Jewish community in New York; a trip to Sydney in July 2008 for the second World Youth Day of his pontificate; a visit to LOURDES in September 2008 to commemorate the 150th anniversary of the apparitions of the Virgin to St. Bernadette; and in March 2009 he made his first papal visit to Africa, traveling to Cameroon and Angola to meet with political and Church leaders and visit centers of charitable work. The international media coverage of this African trip was dominated by the pope's statements on HIV/AIDS, to the effect that this tragedy cannot be overcome by money alone or through the distribution of condoms, but rather what is required is a spiritual and human awakening and friendship for those who suffer. In May 2009 the pope visited the Holy Land, including Christian sites in Jordan. This trip also included a Mass at Mt. Precipice in Nazareth, Vespers in the Grotto of the Annunciation, and visits to the Basilica of the Holy Sepulchre and the Armenian Apostolic Church in JERUSALEM, and a meeting with the Greek Orthodox Patriarch of Jerusalem.

In Sacramentum caritatis (2007), his first apostolic exhortation, he took up themes in his prepapal liturgical works. He stated that "participation [in the Mass] does not refer to mere external activity during the celebration but to a greater awareness of the mystery being celebrated" and "active participation is not equivalent to the exercise of a specific ministry." He also stated that "everything related to the Eucharist should be marked by beauty" (II, 41).

In a prepapal essay, Benedict had stated that all rock music should be excluded from the liturgy, "not for aesthetic reasons, not out of reactionary stubbornness, not because of historical rigidity but because of its very nature," while in The Feast of Faith (1986) he argued that "utility music"—that is, music promoted for its popularity and pedagogical usefulness—is unworthy of use for liturgical purposes.

In line with his many statements on the problems of postconciliar liturgical practices, on July 7, 2007, Benedict issued the motu proprio, Summorum pontificum, which contained the ruling that the Roman Missal promulgated by Paul VI is to remain the ordinary expression of the Lex orandi (Law of prayer) of the Catholic Church of the Latin rite, but nonetheless, the Roman Missal promulgated by St. PIUS V and reissued by Pope JOHN XXIII is to be considered as an extraordinary expression of that same Lex orandi, and must be given due honor for its venerable and ancient usage.

Visit to the Holy Land. Pope Benedict XVI visits the Western Wall, Judaism's holiest prayer site, in Jerusalem's Old City on May 12, 2009. The Pope visited holy sites in Jerusalem at the heart of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. © RONEN ZVULUN/EPA/CORBIS

Relationship to John Paul II. On all the major issues during the quarter-century pontificate of John Paul II, the pope and Ratzinger, as prefect for the Sacred Congregation of the Doctrine of the Faith, stood shoulder to shoulder. However, while anthropology and the meaning and purpose of human sexuality and human dignity might be regarded as key themes in the papacy of John Paul II, with Benedict XVI it is more likely that the key themes will be ECCLESIOLOGY, liturgy, and revelation. Benedict has taken on board his predecessor's accounts of what went wrong with contemporary conceptions of truth and goodness, and he adds to them an account of the contemporary predicament of beauty and the relationship between truth and love. The two papacies are likely to provide a study in harmonious contrasts.

In January 2009 Pope Benedict released from the penalty of EXCOMMUNICATION the four bishops who had been illicitly ordained in 1988 by Archbishop Lefebvre, the leader of traditionalist groups who opposed the liturgical changes of the pontificate of Paul VI and doctrinal elements of the teaching of the Second Vatican Council. This gesture did not mean a return to full communion with the Church of the traditionalist groups since, as Pope Benedict stated in the motu proprio, Ecclesiae unitatem of July 2009, "doctrinal questions remain and until they are clarified the Society [of St. Pius X] has no canonical status in the Church and its ministers cannot legitimately exercise any ministry." In lifting the decrees of excommunication the pope was intending to remove all possible pretexts for infinite arguing in his negotiations with leaders of the Society of St. Pius X. In the process he suffered the humiliation of discovering after the event, that one of the four bishops, Richard Williamson, is a HOLOCAUST (SHOAH) denier. In an apologetic letter to the bishops of the world the pope wrote that a gesture of reconciliation to one ecclesial group had turned into its very antithesis, "an apparent step backwards with regard to all the steps of reconciliation between Christians and Jews taken since the Council—steps which my own work as a theologian had sought from the beginning to take part in and support." He added that the pain caused to the Jewish people by this event is something he could only "deeply deplore."

In 2007 the pope published the first volume of his work Jesus of Nazareth. He emphasized that this was a private academic work that did not carry with it magisterial authority. In the introductory section he offered some reflections on the general theme of scriptural hermeneutics, which was taken up again in 2008 at the SYNOD OF BISHOPS on the Word of God. He emphasized that scriptural exegesis is not only a literary phenomenon, but a movement of one's whole existence under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. In 2008 he also announced a special Pauline Year to encourage the study of Pauline scripture and theology. This was followed in 2009–2010 by the Year of the Priest in celebration of the 150th anniversary of the birth of St. John VIANNEY, the patron saint of parish priests.

SEE ALSO ANTHROPOLOGY, THEOLOGICAL; CARITAS IN VERITATE; CATECHISM OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH; CATHOLIC-MUSLIM DIALOGUE; COMMUNIO; DEUS CARITAS EST; DOMINUS IESUS; GERMANY, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; HERMENEUTICS, BIBLICAL; HOMOSEXUALS, PASTORAL CARE OF; JEWISH-CATHOLIC RELATIONS (PUBLIC); LITURGICAL MUSIC, HISTORY OF; LITURGICAL MUSIC, THEOLOGY AND PRACTICE OF; NEOSCHOLASTICISM AND NEOTHOMISM; PELAGIUS AND PELAGIANISM; REVELATION, THEOLOGY OF; SOCIAL THOUGHT, PAPAL; SPE SALVI; SUMMORUM PONTIFICUM; TEACHING AUTHORITY OF THE CHURCH (MAGISTERIUM); VATICAN COUNCIL II.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

BOOKS BY BENEDICT XVI

Volk und Haus Gottes in Augustins Lehre von der Kirche (Munich 1954).

Der Gott des Glaubens und der Gott der Philosophen (Munich 1960).

The Episcopate and the Primacy, with Karl Rahner (New York 1962).

Christian Brotherhood, translated by W.A. Glen-Doepel (London 1966).

Das Problem der Dogmengeschichte in der Sicht der katholischen Theologie (Cologne 1966).

Revelation and Tradition, with Karl Rahner, translated by W.J. O'Hara (New York 1966).

Theological Highlights of Vatican II (New York 1966).

"Das Menschenbild des Konzils in seiner Bedeutung für die Bildung in Christliche Erziehung nach dem Konzil," in Berichte und Dokumentationen, edited by Kulturbeirat beim Zentralkomitee der deutschen Katholiken (Cologne 1967), 4:33–65.

"Commentary on the Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation," in Commentary on the Documents of Vatican II, vol. 3, edited by Herbert Vorgrimler (New York 1968).

"Kommentar zu Art. 11–22 der Pastoralkonstitution uber die Kirche in der Welt von heute," in Lexikon fur Theologie und Kirche, vol. 3 (Freiburg, Germany 1968), 313–354.

Das neue Volk Gottes: Entwurfe zur Ekklesiologie (Dusseldorf, Germany 1969).

"The Dignity of the Human Person," Commentary on Chapter I: Part I of Gaudium et spes, in Commentary on the Documents of Vatican II, vol. 5, edited by Herbert Vorgrimler (New York 1969).

Demokratie in der Kirche. Moglichkeiten, Grenzen, Gefahren (Limburg, Germany 1970).

Faith and the Future (Chicago 1971).

Daughter Zion (San Francisco 1983).

The Ratzinger Report, with Vittorio Messori, translated by Salvator Attanasio and Graham Harrison (San Francisco 1985).

Behold the Pierced One, translated by Graham Harrison (San Francisco 1986).

"In the Beginning...": A Catholic Understanding of the Story of Creation and the Fall, translated by Boniface Ramsey (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1986).

Principles of Christian Morality, with Heinz Schürmann and Hans Urs von Balthasar, translated by Graham Harrison (San Francisco 1986).

The Feast of Faith, translated by Graham Harrison (San Francisco 1986).

Principles of Catholic Theology, translated by Mary Frances McCarthy (San Francisco 1987).

Church, Ecumenism and Politics (New York 1988).

Eschatology, Death and Eternal Life, translated by Michael Waldstein (Washington, D.C. 1988).

The Theology of History in St. Bonaventure, translated by Zachary Hayes (Chicago 1989).

Introduction to Christianity, translated by J.R. Foster (San Francisco 1990).

The Yes of Jesus Christ: Exercises in Faith, Hope, and Love, translated by Robert Nowell (New York 1991).

The Nature and Mission of Theology, translated by Adrian Walker (San Francisco 1995).

A New Song for the Lord, translated by Martha M. Matesich (New York 1996).

Gospel, Catechesis and Catechism: Sidelights on the Catechism of the Catholic Church (San Francisco 1997).

Salt of the Earth: The Church at the End of the Millennium (San Francisco 1997).

Milestones: Memoirs 1927–1977 (San Francisco 1998).

Many Religions, One Covenant, translated by Graham Harrison (San Francisco 1999).

"Answers to Main Objections to Dominus Iesus," Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung (September 22, 2000).

God and the World, translated by Henry Taylor (San Francisco 2000).

The Spirit of the Liturgy, translated by John Saward (San Francisco 2000).

Pilgrim Fellowship of Faith: The Church as Communion, edited by Stephan Otto Horn and Vinzenz Pfnür, translated by Henry Taylor (San Francisco 2002).

God Is Near Us: The Eucharist, the Heart of Life, edited by Stephan Otto Horn and Vinzenz Pfnür, translated by Henry Taylor (San Francisco 2003).

Introduction to Christianity, translated by J.R. Foster and Michael J. Miller (San Francisco 2004).

On the Way to Jesus Christ, translated by Michael J. Miller (San Francisco 2004).

The End of Time?: The Provocation of Talking about God, with Johann Baptist Metz, Jurgen Moltmann, and Eveline Goodman-Thau, edited and translated by J. Matthew Ashley (Mahwah, N.J. 2004).

Truth and Tolerance, translated by Henry Taylor (San Francisco 2004).

Christianity and the Crisis of Cultures, translated by Brian McNeil (San Francisco 2006).

The Dialectics of Secularization: On Reason and Religion, with Jürgen Habermas, translated by Brian McNeil (San Francisco 2006).

God's Revolution: World Youth Day and Other Cologne Talks (San Francisco 2006).

Handing on the Faith in an Age of Disbelief, with others, translated by Michael J. Miller (San Francisco 2006).

Images of Hope: Ventures into the Church's Year (San Francisco 2006).

On Conscience (San Francisco 2006).

Values in a Time of Upheaval, translated by Brian McNeil (San Francisco 2006).

What It Means to Be a Christian (San Francisco 2006).

Without Roots, with Marcello Pera (New York 2006).

Jesus of Nazareth (New York 2007).

Other Documents by Benedict XVI
(listed chronologically)

Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Libertatis nuntius, On Certain Aspects of the "Theology of Liberation" (Instruction, August 6, 1984), available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/congregations/cfaith/documents/rc_con_cfaith_doc_19840806_theology-liberation_en.html (accessed September 26, 2009).

Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Libertatis conscientia, On Christian Freedom and Liberation (Instruction, March 22, 1986), available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/congregations/cfaith/documents/rc_con_cfaith_doc_19860322_freedom-liberation_en.html (accessed September 26, 2009).

Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Homosexualitatis problema, On the Pastoral Care of Homosexual Persons (Letter to the Bishops of the Catholic Church, October 1, 1986), available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/congregations/cfaith/documents/rc_con_cfaith_doc_19861001_homosexual-persons_en.html (accessed September 26, 2009).

Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Donum vitae, On Respect for Human Life in Its Origin and on the Dignity of Procreation (Instruction, February 22, 1987), available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/congregations/cfaith/documents/rc_con_cfaith_doc_19870222_respect-for-human-life_en.html (accessed September 26, 2009).

Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Note Regarding the Moral Rule of Humanae vitae and Pastoral Duty (February 16, 1989).

Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Donum veritatis, On the Ecclesial Vocation of the Theologian (Instruction, May 24, 1990), available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/congregations/cfaith/documents/rc_con_cfaih_doc_19900524_theologian-vocation_en.html (accessed September 26, 2009).

Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Communionis notion, On Some Aspects of the Church Understood as Communion (Letter to the Bishops of the Catholic Church, May 28, 1992), available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/congregations/cfaith/documents/rc_con_cfaith_doc_28051992_communionis-notio_en.html (accessed September 27, 2009).

Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Some Considerations Concerning the Response to Legislative Proposals on Nondiscrimination of Homosexual Persons (July 23, 1992), available from http://www.ewtn.com/library/curia/cdfhomol.htm (accessed September 27, 2009).

Pontifical Biblical Commission, Preface to "The Interpretation of the Bible in the Church" (March 18, 1994), available from http://www.ewtn.com/library/CURIA/PBCINTER.htm (accessed September 27, 2009).

Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Annus Internationalis Familiae, Letter to Bishops Regarding Reception of Holy Communion by Divorced and Remarried Members of the Faithful (September 14, 1994), available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/congregations/cfaith/documents/rc_con_cfaith_doc_14091994_rec-holy-comm-by-divorced_en.html (accessed September 27, 2009).

Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Dominus Iesus, On the Unicity and Salvific Universality of Jesus Christ and the Church (Declaration, August 6, 2000), available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/congregations/cfaith/documents/rc_con_cfaith_doc_20000806_dominus-iesus_en.html (accessed September 27, 2009).

Pontifical Biblical Commission, Preface to The Jewish People and Their Sacred Scriptures in the Christian Bible (May 24, 2001), available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/congregations/cfaith/pcb_documents/rc_con_cfaith_doc_20020212_popolo-ebraico_en.html (accessed September 27, 2009).

Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Doctrinal Note on Some Questions Regarding the Participation of Catholics in Political Life (January 16, 2003), available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/congregations/cfaith/documents/rc_con_cfaith_doc_20021124_politica_en.html (accessed September 27, 2009).

Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Considerations Regarding Proposals to Give Legal Recognition to Unions Between Homosexual Persons (July 31, 2003), available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/congrgations/cfaith/documents/rc_con_cfaith_doc_20030731_homosexual-unions_en.html (accessed September 27, 2009).

Benedict XVI, Deus caritas est, On Christian Love (Encyclical, December 25, 2005), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/benedict_xvi/encyclicals/documents/hf_ben-xvi_enc_20051225_deus-caritas-est_en.html (accessed September 27, 2009); also available (in Latin) from Acta Apostolicae Sedis 98 (2006): 217–252.

Benedict XVI, Sacramentum caritatis, On the Eucharist as the Source and Summit of the Church's Life and Mission (Post-Synodal Apostolic Exhortation, February 22, 2007), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/benedict_xvi/apost_exhortations/documents/hf_ben-xvi_exh_ 20070222_sacramentum-caritatis_en.html (accessed September 27, 2009).

Benedict XVI, Summorum pontificum, Motu proprio on the Missal of Blessed John XXIII (Apostolic Letter, July 7, 2007), L'Osservatore Romano, English edition (July 11, 2007): 8–9; also available (in Latin) from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/benedict_xvi/motu_proprio/documents/hf_ben-xvi_motu-proprio_20070707_summorum-pontificum_lt.html (accessed September 27, 2009).

Benedict XVI, Spe salvi, On Christian Hope (Encyclical, November 30, 2007), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/benedict_xvi/encyclicals/documents/hf_ben-xvi_enc_20071130_spe-salvi_en.html (accessed September 27, 2009).

Benedict XVI, Caritas in veritate, On Integral Human Development in Charity and Truth (Encyclical, June 29, 2009), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/benedict_xvi/encyclicals/documents/hf_ben-xvi_enc_20090629_caritas-in-veritate_en.html (accessed September 27, 2009).

Benedict XVI, Ecclesiae unitatem, Motu proprio Concerning the Pontifical Commission Ecclesia Dei (Apostolic Letter, July 2, 2009), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/benedict_xvi/apost_letters/documents/hf_ben-xvi_apl_20090702_ecclesiae-unitatem_en.html (accessed September 27, 2009).

Works about Benedict XVI

Lawrence Paul Hemming, Benedict XVI: "Fellow Worker for the Truth": An Introduction to His Life and Thought (London 2005).

Joseph A. Komonchak, "The Church in Crisis: Pope Benedict's Theological Vision," Commonweal 132, no. 11 (June 3, 2006): 11–14.

Aidan Nichols, The Theology of Joseph Ratzinger: An Introductory Study (Edinburgh 1988).

Tracey Rowland, Ratzinger's Faith: The Theology of Pope Benedict XVI (Oxford 2008).

James V. Schall, The Regensburg Lecture (South Bend, Ind. 2007).

Gianni Valente and Pierluca Azzardo, "That New Beginning That Bloomed among the Ruins: Ratzinger as a Student at Freising and Munich," 30 Days, nos. 1/2 (2006): 60.

Tracey Rowland
Dean and Permanent Fellow in Political Philosophy and Continental Theology
John Paul II Institute for Marriage and Family (Melbourne) (2010)

BENEDICT OF NURSIA, ST.

Monk, saint; name also given as Benedict of Norcia (or Nursia); b. Norcia, Italy, c. 480; d. Monte Cassino, Italy, c. 547–554.

Considered the father of Western MONASTICISM, Benedict was born in the Umbrian town of Norcia, Italy, the son of a noble family. His twin sister, Scholastica, also became a famous figure in the history of the Catholic religious orders.

Like most boys of his status and time, Benedict was sent to ROME for his education, the focus of which was rhetoric. He left school because the morals of his classmates disgusted him, and left the city lest its morally degrading environment infect him as well. For the next several years, he lived in small villages in the Umbrian hillsides. Near the village of Subiaco, Benedict encountered a hermit named Romanus, who became his spiritual counselor. Benedict remained in semiseclusion with Romanus for three years. Over this time, Benedict's reputation for holiness spread throughout the region.

The community of monks at Vicovaro, sited on a cliff overlooking the Anio (now Aniene) River, invited Benedict to succeed their ABBOT, who had just died. Benedict at first refused, convinced that they would resent his firm leadership. They persisted and he agreed. His insistence on obedience angered them, and they attempted to murder Benedict, but failed. He returned to Subiaco.

His celebrity continued to grow, and young men who wanted to become monks came to settle near his cave. Young men from all walks of life—rich and poor, young and old, Roman and barbarian—desired to learn HOLINESS from him. Benedict seems to have become more sure that the cenobitic (in community), rather than the eremitic (hermitic), life was best for Christian monks, and so he built twelve wooden buildings, each with space for twelve brothers, to serve as residences for his followers. He abandoned this project after a priest named Florentius joined the band and tried to subvert his authority. He decided that his followers must obey him without question, and that meant a change in the structure of his MONASTERY.

Sometime around 530, Benedict moved his monks from the neighborhood of Subiaco to the promontory of Monte Cassino, where locals still worshipped at an ancient temple to the Roman god Apollo. He destroyed the temple and erected a Christian monastery on the site. Unlike the numerous dwellings at Subiaco, Monte Cassino had but one residence, under the supervision of a PRIOR and deans. In addition to ruling his monastery, Benedict also preached to the local citizens and ministered to the sick and poor of the district.

Benedict probably began to write down his famous monastic rule (Rule of St. Benedict) after the move to Monte Cassino, although the prologue to the rule clearly indicates that he had been thinking about the best life for Christian contemplatives all along. He was convinced that monks should live closely together (a rejection of some earlier, Eastern models), and that their lives should be committed to obedience to the abbot, regular PRAYER, and manual labor, all of which were to inculcate the indispensable virtue of HUMILITY, the foundation of all other Christian virtues. Benedict insisted on strict obedience to the abbot. Ironically, the authority he invested in abbots also gave the rule its famous flexibility. He repeatedly enjoined the abbot to consider carefully the dispositions and circumstances of each individual brother and tailor his ministrations to him accordingly. Other officers of the monastery, such as the prior, the gatekeeper, and the cellarer, helped the abbot and relieved him of some of the monastery's responsibilities.

Dream of St. Benedict. Fresco, Eremiti Church, Padua, Italy. THE ART ARCHIVE/DAGLI ORTI/ THE PICTURE DESK, INC.

Of course, constant prayer also cultivated the virtue of humility. Thus, the Divine Office "before which nothing else should come" Benedict called the OPUS DEI (work of God). The Divine Office consisted of the recitation of all 150 Psalms each week, over the course of MATINS, LAUDS, prime, tierce, sext, nones, VESPERS, and COMPLINE—the eight meetings for communal prayer—each day and night in the monastery. Readings from "uplifting" texts accompanied each meal.

Besides prayer, Benedict's monks were to work, earning their living by the sweat of their labor. They tilled, sowed, and reaped their lands and tended their herds. They maintained their own kitchens and workshops.

Medieval biographers believed that Benedict died around the year 547, but twentieth-century scholarship has speculated that he may have lived another decade. He was buried on the site of the altar of Apollo that he had destroyed when he first arrived at Monte Cassino. His sister, the nun Scholastica, preceded him in death; the two were buried side by side.

The spread of Benedict's Rule took some time. Of course, monasteries in central Italy soon followed it, and a number of Frankish monasteries adopted a hybrid of his rule and that of the Irish missionary Columban (c. 543–615). Benedict's Rule became the standard in Western monasticism following the great CAROLINGIAN REFORM movement, which was initiated by Emperor Louis the Pious (778–840) and his associate BENEDICT OF ANIANE. At the Synod of Aachen (816–817), Louis declared that all monasteries in his realm should follow Benedict's Rule. Benedict of Aniane enforced the emperor's decree. Another era of invasions interrupted this reform, but by about the year 1000, Benedict's Rule had replaced other rules in the Frankish kingdoms. Fidelity to Benedict's Rule, furthermore, served as the linchpin of most monastic reform movements, such as the Cluniac and the Cistercian, until the turn of the thirteenth century.

The Catholic Church has commemorated Benedict on two dates, March 21 and July 11, the latter being his current feast day in the Roman calendar of saints. The monks of Monte Cassino had since about 720 commemorated Benedict on March 21. July 11 commemorates the supposed translation of his RELICS to the Abbey of Fleury in France. There is no agreement now about where his true relics may be. In 1964, Pope PAUL VI named him the patron saint of Europe, and on his election to the PAPACY in 2005, Joseph RATZINGER opted for the regnal name of BENEDICT XVI, almost certainly in honor of the great MONK.

SEE ALSO BENEDICTINE ABBEYS AND PRIORIES IN THE U.S.; BENEDICTINE RULE; BENEDICTINES; CISTERCIANS; CLUNIAC REFORM; MONTE CASSINO, ARCHABBEY OF; PATRON SAINTS; SUBIACO, MONASTERIES OF; SYNODS, EARLY CHURCH.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

St. Benedict, RB 1980: The Rule of St. Benedict in Latin and English with Notes and Thematic Index, edited by Timothy Fry, Imogene Baker, et al. (Collegeville, Minn. 1981).

Ildefonso Schuster, St. Benedict and His Times (St. Louis, Mo. 1951).

Adalbert de Vogüé, The Life of St. Benedict—Gregory the Great, translated by Hilary Costello and Eoin de Bhaldraithe (Petersham, Mass. 1993).

Robert W. Shaffern
Professor of History
University of Scranton (2010)

BENEDICTINES, OLIVETAN

(OSB, Official Catholic Directory #0200) A monastic order whose Latin title is Congregatio Sanctae Mariae Montis Oliveti Ordinis Sancti Benedicti. The Olivetan Benedictine monks, easily distinguished by their white habits, have belonged to the Benedictine Confederation since 1959. They were established in the 14th century by St. Bernard TOLOMEI (canonized on April 26, 2009, by Pope Benedict XVI) along with two companions, Ambrogio Piccolomini and Patricio Patrici, in 1313. Tolomei wanted to withdraw from the world and its distractions in order to be able to give himself more fully to God. He decided to settle in a place of solitude called Accona (about 12 miles from Siena, Italy), where he later founded the Abbey of Mount Olivet, so named to remind those who lived there of Christ's sorrowful Passion.

St. Tolomei advocated a very austere asceticism, to the point that he was called to Avignon for an audience with Pope John XXII (1249–1334) to answer to a charge of HERESY. He was found innocent of the charge, but was given the BENEDICTINE RULE to follow in place of his own unique brand of asceticism. Tolomei lived by that Benedictine rule faithfully for the rest of his life. The congregation was approved by Clement VI (Jan. 21, 1344).

The monks, most of whom are priests, profess solemn vows and pursue a semicontemplative, monastic life, giving special attention to liturgical solemnities. They also engage in active ministry, particularly in teaching and retreat work. The monasteries of the congregation, each ruled by an elected abbot or a prior, are independent of one another, but are subject to the abbot general, who is also the abbot of the motherhouse, the Abbey of Mount Olivet.

The Olivetans came into existence during a period of decline in Benedictine monasticism, adopted a form of government suitable for the correction of abuses, and restored a rigorous observance of the rule. The reform spread rapidly, first in Tuscany, then in all of Italy, where, by the end of the 14th century, some 50 Olivetan monasteries were flourishing under the protection of popes and bishops. While the growth of the congregation continued into the 17th century, when there were nearly 2,000 monks in about 100 monasteries, monastic discipline deteriorated, especially because noblemen entered the monasteries without true vocations. The political disturbances and suppressions of the 18th and 19th centuries brought grave harm to the order, but from these misfortunes there emerged some outstanding monks who worked for a restoration of the congregation in Italy. Foundations, never before successful, were established outside of Italy, first in France (late 19th century), then in Austria, Brazil, and Lebanon (early 20th century). Houses were founded in Belgium, England, and Mexico. The U.S. foundations include Holy Trinity Monastery (St. David, AZ), Our Lady of Guadalupe Abbey (Pecos, NM) and the Benedictine Monastery of Hawaii (Waialua).

SEE ALSO BENEDICTINE ABBEYS AND PRIORIES IN THE U.S.; BENEDICTINES; MONASTICISM; RELIGIOUS (MEN AND WOMEN).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Valerio Cattana, "La preghiera alle origini della tradizione olivetana," La preghiera nella Bibbia e nella tradizione patristica e monastica (Rome 1964): 703–731.

John Paul II, "Message to the Abbot General of the Olivetans" (Letter, August 1, 1998), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/speeches/

1998/august/documents/hf_jp-ii_spe_19980801_olivetanos_en.html (accessed October 2, 2009).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Bernardo Tolomei (1272–1348)," Vatican Web site, April 26, 2009, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/2009/ns_lit_doc_20090426_tolomei_en.html (accessed October 2, 2009).

Giorgio Picasso, "Aspetti e problemi della storia della Congr. Benedettina di Monte Oliveto," Studia Monastica 3 (1961): 383–408.

Modesto Scarpini, I monaci benedettini di Monte Oliveto (Alessandria 1952).

Rev. Giorgio Picasso OSBOliv
Monk of the Abbey of Seregno (Milan)

EDS (2010)

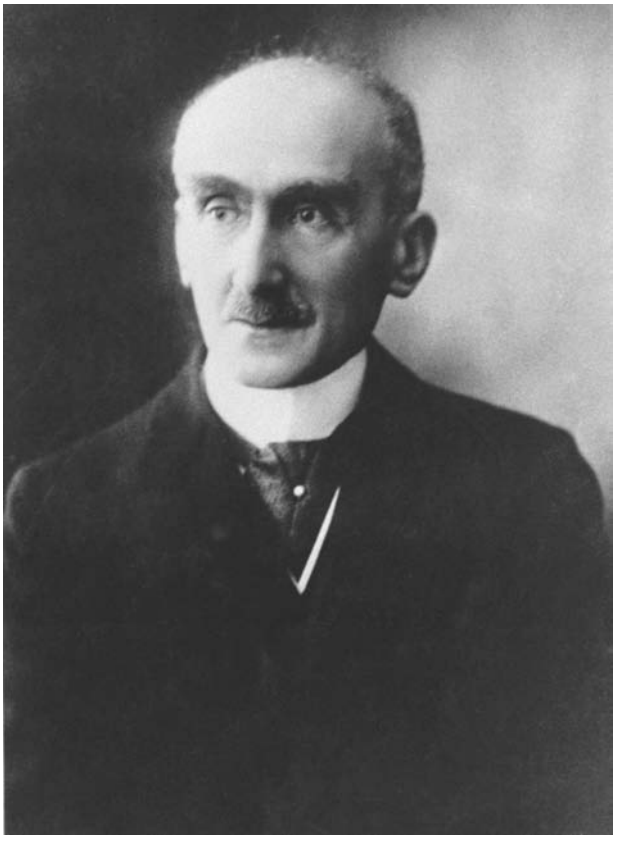
BERGSON, HENRI LOUIS

French philosopher who rejected the exaggerated scientism and mechanistic evolutionism of the nineteenth century and advanced a new theory of EVOLUTION acknowledging the spiritual dimension of man; b. Paris, October 18, 1859; d. Paris, January 4, 1941.

Educated at the Lycée Condorcet and the École Normale Supérieure, where he distinguished himself in mathematics and physics, Henri Louis Bergson turned to PHILOSOPHY, receiving the agrégé (a degree qualifying a teacher for the highest positions) in 1881. After teaching at Angers and Clermont-Ferrand, he returned to Paris in 1888 to teach at the Lycée Henri Quatre and the École Normale Supérieure. At the Collège de France he held the chair of the history of philosophy from 1900 to 1921, attracting huge crowds to his lectures by the beauty and eloquence of his language and by the extraordinary appeal of his message. In 1917 he had a lengthy talk with Woodrow Wilson urging him to intervene in World War I. He became a member of the Académie Française in 1918, was elected president of the International Commission for Intellectual Cooperation after World War I, and received the Nobel Prize for literature in 1927.

Although born of Jewish parents, Bergson grew up without RELIGION and began his philosophical career as an enthusiastic follower of Herbert SPENCER. However, his attempts to give a full and accurate account of REALITY led him to abandon Spencer's evolutionary theory, and the subsequent development of his thought brought him closer and closer to Catholicism. In his will he confessed his moral adhesion to the Catholic Church and revealed that he would have become a convert had he not felt obliged to remain with his Jewish brethren, then being persecuted under HITLER. Shortly before his death he arose from his sickbed to appear for the registration of Jews in Paris. A Catholic priest said the prayers at his funeral, as he had requested.

Philosophy. Although deeply influenced by evolutionism and EMPIRICISM, Bergson rejected the narrow conception of MAN and of the world characteristic of scientific POSITIVISM, and sought to continue the tradition of MAINE DE BIRAN and Félix Ravaisson (1813–1900). His philosophy constitutes a defense of spirit against MATERIALISM, INTUITION against RATIONALISM, FREEDOM against DETERMINISM both physical and biological, creativity against MECHANISM, and philosophy against SCIENTISM. Beginning with the "intuition of duration" (time as a lived experience which cannot be measured), which is the dominant idea in his philosophy, Bergson offered a renovated empiricism and a new and profoundly original doctrine of evolution



Bergson claimed people have an immediate knowledge of their own CONSCIOUSNESS; in this they intuit a reality that is always in process. By spending time with an other they can develop a similar knowledge of (feel for) this other. In contrast, their SENSES and INTELLECT work only with the outer appearance of things. This gives them the practical knowledge they need to survive, that is, science. But this practical knowledge should not be the basis of philosophy/METAPHYSICS. SCIENCE knows in terms of BEING, of the common properties of things, and of what can be repeated. While the immediate data of consciousness knows a reality that is always BECOMING, always unique (no individual's mind is the same as another's), and can never repeat (people cannot have the same experience twice as the memory of the first stays with them). Mechanism and determinism are seen as philosophies based only on the intellect and so have no ability to elucidate what humankind knows immediately: life, one's self, FREE WILL, becoming, and GOD.

The true philosophy dispenses with all ready-made concepts to come to an intuition of one's self enduring in TIME. To communicate this intuition the philosopher must invent new words and employ those images best suited to suggest the inexpressible. Although Bergson rejected the prevailing empiricism, it was not because it placed too high a value on experience. Bergson believed that all philosophical problems must be solved according to the experimental method, since only experience can give CERTITUDE. An integral empiricism, however, must admit not only the knowledge of matter, but also all that man knows through INTROSPECTION, all the vague suggestions of consciousness, all that is revealed in the intuition of duration.

To start with the intellect's view of reality meant for Bergson to attempt a reconstruction of life and movement out of concepts appropriate only to inert matter. He sought to reverse the order and to start with life and movement grasped in intuition. Life (or consciousness) is then seen to be the primordial reality, and matter but its degradation. From this fresh perspective, reality appears to be ever moving and growing, a ceaseless flux. It is essentially dynamic, qualitative, creative, and unpredictable. To know existing things as they really are is to grasp them intuitively, that is, sub specie durationis. The implications of this approach to reality so impressed William JAMES that he hailed it as a new Copernican revolution comparable in its significance for philosophy to that of G. BERKELEY or I. KANT.

Principal Works. Bergson's leading ideas are encompassed in four principal works. In Time and Free Will he showed that free will is the most evident of facts and that its denial follows upon the confusion of succession with simultaneity, duration with intensity, and quality with quantity. In Matter and Memory he proved that spirit as well as matter exists. By demonstrating that consciousness is not identical with cerebral activity, he paved the way for a PROOF of the survival of the SOUL after DEATH. In Creative Evolution, his most famous work, he showed that the mechanistic interpretation of evolution is not justified by the facts. Viewing the data of evolution in the light of his intuition of duration, he described the evolutionary process as the forward thrust of a great spiritual force, the life impulse (élan vital), rushing through time, insinuating itself into matter, and producing the various living forms culminating in man. Its movement is not predetermined but creative, ever generating novel and unpredictable forms. The Two Sources of Morality and Religion represents the full flowering of Bergson's thought. MORALITY and religion are traced back to their double source in the evolutionary process. Bergson distinguished two separate moralities and religions—the open and closed moralities, the static and dynamic religions. Closed morality pertains to social cohesion. It is static and rooted in social pressure, the morality of a group enclosed upon itself. It represents a halt in the evolutionary process. Open morality transcends the group to unite all mankind in a common brotherhood. It is progressive and creative, a forward thrust of the élan vital. Whereas closed morality and static religion originate in the instinct for survival, open morality and dynamic religion are inspired by the moral heroes, saints, and mystics, those superior representatives of the human race who, like a new species, foreshadow the future condition of man. They draw man upward to a higher spiritual level by their vision of human destiny and of God, the source of all LOVE. It is in the experience of the mystics that Bergson found the most convincing evidence for the existence of God.

Bergson, Henri (1859–1941). This Frenchman was a Nobel Prize winner and well-respected intellectual. THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

Influence and Critique. Bergson's manner of philosophizing—his repugnance for DEFINITION and for a technical vocabulary and his method of attacking each problem separately—did not lend itself to the formation of a Bergsonian school. Yet his influence on twentieth-century thought has been profound. Among the philosophers whose works reflect a significant influence of Bergson are Édouard LE ROY, Maurice BLONDEL, Max SCHELER, Maurice Pradines (1874–1958), and Jean Paul SARTRE. Many Catholic scholars, notably Jacques MARITAIN, Étienne GILSON, Pierre TEILHARD DE CHARDIN, and Gabriel MARCEL, though voicing disagreements, acknowledged with GRATITUDE his great inspiration. Bergson's influence is also discernible in the thought of numerous scientists, including Alexis Carrel (1873–1944), Pierre Lecomte du Noüy (1883–1947), and Ilya Prigogine (1917–2003; Nobel in Chemistry in 1977); in many literary works, including those of Marcel Proust (1871–1922), Charles PÉGUY, George Bernard Shaw (1856–1950), Nikos Kazantzakis (1883–1957); in some schools of painting (e.g., Henri Matisse [1869–1954]); and in music. From the start his books gained unprecedented fame. Appealing to a wide reading public, they were translated into many languages; however, after the middle of the twentieth century his works were not widely read.

Acclaimed by many of his contemporaries as the long-awaited liberator from the tyranny of materialism, mechanism, and determinism, Bergson was criticized by some for stopping short of the Christian conception of God, CREATION, the human soul, and free choice. From the viewpoint of Christian doctrine, Bergson's philosophy remains at best—and in spite of his intentions perhaps—ambiguous and incomplete. For the primacy of being as a reality accessible to intellect, he substituted the primacy of becoming as a reality accessible only to intuition. His depreciation of reason necessitated the denial that the existence of God can be rationally demonstrated. Man's approach to God can be only through the intuitive experience of the mystic, he said. God is described as Love and Creative Energy, but since the relationship between Creative Energy and the élan vital is never clearly defined, the distinction between God and creatures remains blurred. The depreciation of rational knowledge also led Bergson to base one source of morality on social pressures and the other source on inspirational individuals. He allowed to reason no essential role in moral obligation, seeing its function as merely to formulate and coordinate moral rules and to assure their logical consistency.

Furthermore, giving priority to becoming over being forced Bergson to deny the substantiality of the soul and to define soul as a duration or PARTICIPATION in the élan vital. While upholding the distinction between soul and body, he was unable to avoid a dualistic position in fixing their mutual relationship. A champion of free will, Bergson rejected all forms of determinism, yet he regarded freedom not as the rational determination of a human act but as the spontaneous bursting forth of vital energy from the depths of the SELF, a creative but nonrational ACT expressive of the total PERSONALITY. To the Catholic philosopher or theologian such points of criticism, together with a misunderstanding of the SUPERNATURAL character of Christian MYSTICISM, represent important deficiencies in Bergson's thought. Yet no evaluation of his philosophy that is limited to pointing out its metaphysical inadequacies will render it full JUSTICE. It must also be seen as the sincere and arduous endeavor of a great soul to discover the TRUTH, a spiritual itinerary from materialistic mechanism to the God known and loved by the Christian mystics.

SEE ALSO LIFE PHILOSOPHIES; PHILOSOPHY AND SCIENCE; THEOLOGY, NATURAL; TIME.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

WORKS BY HENRI LOUIS BERGSON

Time and Free Will: An Essay on the Immediate Data of Consciousness (Essais sur les données immédiates de la Conscience, 1889) translated by Frank L. Pogson (New York 1910, repr. 1950).

Matter and Memory (Matière et mémoire, 1896), translated by Nancy Margaret Paul and W. Scott Palmer (New York 1911).

Creative Evolution (L'évolution créatrice, 1907) translated by Arthur Mitchell (New York 1911).

Mind-Energy: Lectures and Essays (L'énergie spirituelle, 1919), translated by H. Wildon Carr (New York 1920).

The Two Sources of Morality and Religion (Les deux sources de la morale et de la religion, 1932), translated by R. Ashley Audra and Cloudsley Brereton (Notre Dame, Ind. 1935).

The Creative Mind: An Introduction to Metaphysics (La pensée et le mouvant, 1934), translated by Mabelle L. Andison (New York 1946). Collected essays.

Oeuvres, edited by Henri Gouhier and André Robinet (Paris 1959). A critical edition of Bergson's major works.

WORKS ABOUT HENRI LOUIS BERGSON

Lydie Adolphe, La Philosophie religieuse de Bergson (Paris 1946).

Ian W. Alexander, Bergson: Philosopher of Reflection (New York 1957).

Jacques Chevalier, Henri Bergson, translated by Lillian A. Clare (New York 1928)

Léon Husson, L'intellectualisme de Bergson: Genèse et développement de la notion Bergsonienne d'intuition (Paris 1947).

Alan Robert Lacey, Bergson (New York 1989).

Édouard Le Roy, The New Philosophy of Henri Bergson, translated by Vincent Benson (New York 1913).

Maurílio Teixeira-Leite Penido, La méthode intuitive de M. Bergson (Paris 1918).

Ben-Ami Scharfstein, Roots of Bergson's Philosophy (New York 1943).

FOR EVALUATION OF BERGSON'S THOUGHT FROM THE CATHOLIC VIEWPOINT, SEE ESPECIALLY:

Étienne H. Gilson, The Philosopher and Theology, translated by Cecile Gilson (New York 1962).

Jacques Maritain, Bergsonian Philosophy and Thomism, translated by Mabelle L. and J. Gordon Andison (New York 1955).

For the effect of Bergson in Catholic Circles, see:

Robert C. Grogin, "The Catholic Revival," in The Bergsonian Controversy in France, 1900–1914 (Calgary 1988), 139–174.

Idella Jane Gallagher
Assistant Professor of Philosophy
Boston College, Chestnut Hill, Mass.

Rev. Thomas M. King SJ
Professor, Department of Theology
Georgetown University, Washington, D.C. (2010)

BERKENBROCK, ALBERTINA, BL.

Virgin and MARTYR for chastity; b. April 11, 1919, São Luís, Imaruí, Santa Catarina, Brazil; d. June 15, 1931, São Luís, Imaruí, Santa Catarina, Brazil; beatified October 20, 2007, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

In a tragic replay of the martyrdom of St. Maria GORRETTI, Blessed Albertina was a twelve-year-old Brazilian girl of German descent murdered in the course of an attempted rape. In the case of Blessed Albertina, the assailant was an employee of her father who, by trickery, lured her into an isolated wooded area. She resisted so strongly that the assailant slit her throat. The assailant eventually confessed that he had murdered Blessed Albertina because she resisted his rape attempt. He was sentenced to life imprisonment. A midwife who examined Albertina's body confirmed that the rape was effectively resisted.

Her devout family provided the religious instruction in which Albertina excelled and a Christian environment that fostered purity and kindness, thus serving as the foundation for her youthful courage and heroism. She had special devotions to the Virgin Mary and St. ALOYSIUS GONZAGA, the patron of youth. She endured childish teasing with patience and kindness. She spoke of the occasion of her first Holy Communion as "the happiest day of her life." In multiracial Brazil, Albertina befriended other children regardless of skin color and also shared her food with the poor, including her future murderer and his children.

The Mass of BEATIFICATION was celebrated in Brazil by Cardinal José Saraiva Martins. In his homily the cardinal noted the background that led to such strength of character and devotion to purity: "Her family, persons of profound faith and sincere devotion, educated her from the very beginning in the truths of the faith and in the principles of Christian morality, infusing in her a lively sense of closeness to Jesus and to a virtuous life." The cardinal also noted that her short life speaks forcefully to our times:

> Our innocence, our belonging to God, our holiness, need today the strong and tenacious voice of Blessed Albertina, who told her murderer: "I do not want sin." She did not want to lose her most precious possession; she could not trade it for the great good of her own life; she could not betray the One who had called her into existence.

If canonized, Blessed Albertina would be the first native-born saint from Brazil, where her tomb is already a pilgrimage site.

Feast: June 15.

SEE ALSO Brazil, The Catholic Church in; Mary, Blessed Virgin, Devotion to.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

"Blessed Albertina Berkenbrock," Patron Saints Index, available from http://saints.sqpn.com/blessed-albertina-berkenbrock/ (accessed August 6, 2009).

Congregation for the Causes of Saints, "Homilía del Cardenal José Saraiva Martins en la Santo Misa de Beatificacíon de la Sierva de Dios Albertina Berkenbrock," Vatican Web site, October 20, 2007, available (in Spanish) from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/congregations/csaints/documents/rc_con_csaints_doc_20071020_beatif-berkenbrock_sp.html (accessed August 6, 2009).

Joan Carroll Cruz, Saintly Youth of Modern Times (Huntington, Ind. 2006).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Bl. Albertina Berkenbrock (1919–1931)," Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_lit_doc_20071020_berkenbrock_en.html (accessed August 6, 2009).

Oswald Sobrino
Editor, Catholic Analysis
http://CatholicAnalysis.blogspot.com (2010)

BERNADETTE OF LOURDES, ST.

Saint; Marie-Bernarde Soubirous, called Bernadette, Sister Marie-Bernarde; b. Lourdes, France, January 7, 1844; d. Nevers, France, April 16, 1879.

Bernadette Soubirous was the eldest child of a peasant family in LOURDES, a small village in the Occitan region of France. She is best known for the eighteen apparitions she reported the Blessed Virgin Mary made to her from February to July 1858, and which are the source of the great veneration of Our Lady of Lourdes and the major pilgrimage site of the same name.

Family Life and Education. Bernadette, as she was always known, was the daughter of a poor miller, François Soubirous, and his wife Louise, a laundress. There were five other children. This was a time of economic hardship in the region. Droughts had destroyed the harvest and a cholera epidemic ravaged the area, almost claiming Bernadette's life (she was never really a healthy child). All in the family sought employment, especially after the mill closed and they had to move to a much humbler dwelling. Bernadette herded sheep and sometimes waited tables in her Aunt Bernarde's tavern.

In January 1858, she began attending the school run by the Sisters of Charity in Lourdes and Catechism classes in preparation for her First Holy Communion. Many hagiographers report her difficulty with her studies, but this could have been due to the fact that all the classes were in French rather than the local dialect, with which Bernadette was more familiar.

Visions at the Grotto. The Fortnight of Apparitions, as it is sometimes known, and which formed the central event of Bernadette's life, began on February 11, 1858, while she was gathering firewood with her sister and a friend at the grotto of Massabielle outside Lourdes. At that time, Bernadette, after crossing the stream at the site, heard a sound that she described as a gust of wind. She then had a vision of what she termed was "a beautiful young lady," clad in white with a blue band and golden roses at her feet, standing in a niche in the rock. The lady beckoned Bernadette to come closer, and together, with their rosaries, the lady and Bernadette each made the sign of the cross and prayed. The vision lasted about fifteen minutes. The others present stated that they saw nothing.

Bernadette reported the vision to her family; her mother tried to dissuade her from returning, but then relented. The second apparition, on Sunday, February 14, Bernadette, accompanied by the other two girls, brought a bottle of holy water. Again, while praying, Bernadette saw the lady. She sprinkled the holy water, saying: "If you are from God, stay. If not, go away." The lady continued to smile lovingly. At the third apparition, on February 18, Bernadette was accompanied by some people from the village. She again saw the lady, who told her, "I promise to make you happy, not in this world, but in the next." The lady also said that she wished to see many others come to the site. The fourth apparition occurred on February 19, at which time Bernadette was accompanied by her aunt and several others. On February 20, with a larger group, Bernadette had her fifth vision of the lady. On Sunday, February 21, at the sixth apparition and before a crowd of about 100 people, Bernadette was told by the lady to "pray for sinners." Later that day, Bernadette endured a long interrogation by the local police commissioner, Jacomet, and her father made her promise never to return to the grotto.

St. Bernadette Soubirous (1844–1879). Born to a peasant family, Bernadette is one of the most well-known Catholic visionaries in the world.

On February 23, after her confessor told her that no one can stop her from returning, her father relented and Bernadette had her seventh vision. At that time, the lady instructed her: "Go to the priests and tell them that I want a chapel built here." During the eighth apparition on February 24, with 200 to 300 people present, Bernadette appeared very sad and, on her knees, repeated the word penance, doing so, as the lady instructed, as penance for sinners.

Spring Begins to Flow. At the ninth apparition, on February 25, the lady, Bernadette said, told her "one last secret." The lady then told her to go and drink in the spring and eat the grass growing nearby, while pointing to the floor of the grotto. Bernadette saw only muddy water, and tried with her hands to dig deeper. She found water and washed and ate some grass. Some there, seeing her do this and being covered with mud, thought she was mad or perhaps a fraud, but soon the spring flowed copiously and in time, its waters would be called miraculous. Later that day, Bernadette had to undergo an intense interrogation by the public prosecutor, but she stood by her words.

At the tenth apparition, on February 27, some 800 people were present, and Bernadette again drank the spring's water and ate the grass growing nearby. The eleventh apparition occurred on February 28, at which time 1,150 people were present, including the chief of the Gendarmerie from Tarbes, who was impressed. In the afternoon there was another interrogation by the Imperial Procurator. For the first time, a priest was also present; he later stated that this was truly a spiritual experience. The headmaster of the local senior school also questioned her and concluded that she did have the VISIONS. On March 1, the twelfth apparition took place. An estimated 1,500 people were present and watched Bernadette again drink and wash at the spring. At the thirteenth apparition, on March 2, with approximately 1,650 people present, the lady requested that Bernadette "go and ask the priests to build a chapel," saying, "I want the people to come here in procession."

The Lady's Name. Bernadette's pastor, Father Peyramale, was so scornful that she forgot to mention the chapel and told him only of the request for the procession. She returned later that evening to tell him and the other priests there, at which time Father Peyramale told her that she must first ask the lady her name. Early on the morning of March 3, from 3,000 to 4,000 people assembled at the grotto, but nothing occurred. That afternoon, however, with perhaps 100 present, Bernadette saw the lady. She asked her name, as the parish priest had requested, but the lady smiled and said nothing.

Bernadette returned to the priest who, although still scornful, repeated his request. March 4 was the date of the last of the fifteen days mentioned at the third apparition. This time, approximately 20,000 had come to the grotto. The police, with local reinforcements, were there to keep order. Bernadette remained for three quarters of an hour and then went to the parish priest to tell him that the lady only smiled when asked her name and again made her request for a chapel to be built. After this, Bernadette did not return to the grotto for 20 days, feeling no strong desire to do so. She spent the time studying at school and preparing for her FIRST COMMUNION.

On Thursday, March 25, she returned, having felt the urge to do so. She was accompanied by members of her family and the chief of police. Bernadette remained entranced as she looked at the lady, and this time, after asking three times, was finally given her name. The lady's reply was, "I am the immaculate conception." Although this was a clear confirmation of the doctrine that had been proclaimed in 1854 by Pope PIUS IX, the phrase itself was most likely unknown to Bernadette.

On April 7, Bernadette came again to the grotto and carried, as usual, a lighted candle. In her RAPTURE upon seeing the lady, she let the flames touch her hand. But, as was testified by the local physician, Dr. Dozous, who was present, there was no sign of pain, burns, or injury. He was convinced that the visions were real. After this, there was a long pause in the apparitions until July 16. On that day, Bernadette again felt a great longing to go to the grotto and arrived at about 8 p.m. The area, meanwhile, had been fenced off by the authorities. Bernadette knelt, with her aunt Lucille, on the opposite bank of the Gave River, which flowed in front of the grotto area. Some say she was in a state of ECSTASY, and she later told her aunt that she had seen the lady, who never had appeared so beautiful.

Joins Sisters of Charity. After the Fortnight of Apparitions, fatigued by being the center of much unwanted attention, Bernadette returned to the Sisters of Charity hospice school, where she continued her schooling. She remained an honest, devout, and humble person who endured with great patience all investigations of her statements and visions by clerical and secular authorities.

Later, at age 22, Bernadette joined the Sisters of Charity at Nevers under her given name as Sister Marie-Bernarde. Before she left Lourdes and her family, she visited the grotto of Massabielle one more time. Bernadette spent the rest of her brief life at Nevers, serving as an assistant in the infirmary—she had said that she loved to care for the sick—and then as SACRISTAN, while continuing her life of piety, humility, and prayer. She also took great joy in embroidering beautiful altar cloths and vestments for the clergy. Forbidden to speak of her visions within the community, she was given humble and menial tasks by her Mother Superior. She accepted these humiliations cheerfully. But, always weak, she later had a severe asthma attack and asked for water from the spring of the Lourdes grotto. Her symptoms disappeared and never again returned.

Illness, Death, Canonization. Later, when she suffered from tuberculosis of the bone in her right knee she did not ask for the healing waters. This illness would eventually take her life.

While at Lourdes, Bernadette had observed the pilgrimages already being made to the grotto, but after coming to Nevers she did not return for the major event of the consecration of the Basilica of the Immaculate Conception, which took place in 1876.

After her death, in 1879, Bernadette was interred at the convent at Nevers. In 1909, the Church and the Bishop of Nevers allowed her body to be exhumed in the presence of representatives of the postulators of the cause for her canonization, as well as physicians and a representative of her religious community. They found the body to be incorrupt. Bernadette's body was reinterred. In 1925, after another such exhumation, Bernadette was beatified. She was canonized in 1933 by Pope PIUS XI, who cited her exemplary life of piety, simplicity, and prayer. Her feast day is celebrated on April 16 and in France on February 18. Saint Bernadette is the patron of Lourdes and of the ill.

SEE ALSO IMMACULATE CONCEPTION; MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, ARTICLES ON; MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, ICONOGRAPHY OF; MYSTICISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ruth Cranston, The Miracle of Lourdes, updated and expanded by the Medical Bureau of Lourdes (New York 1988).

René Laurentin, Bernadette of Lourdes: A Life Based on Authenticated Documents, translated by John Drury (Minneapolis, Minn. 1979).

William Roberts
Professor of History and Social Sciences
Fairleigh Dickinson University (2010)

BERNARD OF CORLEONE, ST.

Baptized Philip (Filippo) Latini; Capuchin lay brother; b. February 6, 1605, Corleone, Sicily; d. January 12, 1667, Palermo, Sicily; beatified by Pope Clement XIII, April 29, 1768; canonized by Pope John Paul II in Rome, June 10, 2001.

Philip was the third of six children born to Leonardo and Francesca Latini, who owned a small vineyard and raised a virtuous family. He received no formal schooling and supported his widowed mother as a cobbler. In a town garrisoned by mercenaries employed by Spain, he learned swordsmanship so well that his name became legendary throughout Sicily. He wielded the sword, however, only in what he called Christian causes, especially the defense of women and poor peasants oppressed by the town's soldiers. His conversion to the religious life was occasioned when, at the age of twenty-seven, he gravely wounded an adversary who had repeatedly challenged him to a duel. Shaken by the incident, he begged the man's forgiveness, and the two went on to become friends.

Philip entered the novitiate of the Capuchin Order at Caltanissetta on December 13, 1631, as a lay brother, taking the name Bernard. He lived in several friaries in the province, where he attended to a number of duties, including cooking, laundry, and caring for the sick. He was devoted to the Blessed Sacrament and would often visit the tabernacle at night and stay until the other friars arrived in the morning.

Although endowed with gifts of contemplation and miracles, he is best remembered for heroic penance. His fasts and macerations recall the desert fathers. He is frequently depicted burning his mouth with a brand snatched from the kitchen fire, a penalty he inflicted on himself for an unkind word to a confrere. He spent the last fifteen years of his life in Palermo, where he died at sixty-one. Many miracles have been reported at his gravesite.

Bernard was beatified by Pope CLEMENT XIII on April 29, 1768. On July 1, 2000, a miracle attributed to his intercession was approved, opening the way for his canonization, which ultimately occurred in ROME on June 10, 2001. In his homily, Pope JOHN PAUL II noted Bernard's exceptional life of prayer: "Those who knew him agreed in testifying that 'he was always at prayer,' 'never ceased to pray,' 'prayed constantly'.... From such an uninterrupted conversation with God, which found in the Eucharist its ongoing impulse, he drew the lifeblood for his courageous apostolate, responding to the social challenges of the time, with all their tensions and disquiet."

Feast: January 12.

SEE ALSO FRANCISCANS, FIRST ORDER; RELIGIOUS (MEN AND WOMEN).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Alban Butler, The Lives of the Saints, edited by Herbert Thurston and Donald Attwater, 4 vols. (New York 1956), 1:124.

John J. Delaney, "Latini, Bl. Bernard," Dictionary of Saints (New York 2005), 367.

Dionigio da Gangi, Dalla spada al cilicio: Profilo del beato Bernardo da Corleone (Tivoli 1934).

John Paul II, "Canonization of Five Blesseds," (Homily, June 10, 2001), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/homilies/2001/documents/hf_jp-ii_hom_20010610_canonizzazione_en.html (accessed July 27, 2009).

Lexicon Capuccinum (Rome 1951).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Bernardo da Corleone (1605–1667)," Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_lit_doc_20010610_ber-da-corleone_en.html (accessed July 27, 2009).

B. Von Mehr, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, edited by Josef

Hofer and Karl Rahner, 10 vols., 2nd new ed. (Freiburg 1957), 2: 243.

Rev. Thaddeus MacVicar OFMCap
Lector in Church History, Franciscan History, and Liturgy
Mary Immaculate Friary, Glenclyffe, Garrison, N.Y.

Elizabeth C. Shaw
Independent Scholar
Washington, D.C. (2010)

BÉRULLE, PIERRE DE

Cardinal, diplomat, theologian, mystic, spiritual writer, founder of the French Oratory, leading figure in the French school of spirituality; b. Chateau de Sérilly, between Sens and Troyes, France, February 4, 1575; d. Paris, October 2, 1629.

Born of an old and distinguished family, Bérulle was brought up from infancy in a deeply religious environment in which he developed with such remarkable precocity that at the age of seventeen he was considered a master of the spiritual life. He was educated by the JESUITS and at the Sorbonne, and he was ordained June 5, 1599. That same year he was named honorary almoner of King HENRY IV. In 1607 the king proposed to make him tutor to the Dauphin, but Bérulle declined. He also refused repeated and pressing offers of commendatory prelacies and bishoprics, preferring to devote himself entirely to spiritual direction, controversy with Protestants, and the promotion of reform among religious communities. The AUGUSTINIANS, BENEDICTINES, and FEUILLANTS were among the beneficiaries of his efforts in this last sphere. In his zeal for a spiritual restoration, Bérulle undertook long and difficult negotiations to introduce the Carmelite nuns of the Teresian reform into France. He, together with André Duval and Jacques Gallemant, was put in charge of these religious by PAUL V, but in spite of his spiritual influence upon them, he encountered difficulties and resistance with regard to disciplinary matters and the vow of servitude.

After 1605 Bérulle took an interest in the decrees of the Council of TRENT concerning the education of the clergy. This led him to found in Paris the Oratory of Jesus, usually known as the French Oratory, modeled after the Oratory of St. Philip NERI. This undertaking was a great success, and the Oratory quickly spread to other places. By the time of Bérulle's death he had established seventeen colleges, and his engagement in this work brought him into much disagreeable conflict with the university and the Jesuits.

As confidant and counselor of Queen Marie de Médicis and as friend of Louis XIII, he was a powerful influence for good at court. Besides his work as peacemaker (he effected a reconciliation between the queen and her son, Louis XIII, in 1620), he engaged in political activity of importance and conducted a number of diplomatic missions for the king. In this he was motivated chiefly by religious rather than nationalistic considerations. He desired to reunite Christians in an effective struggle against Protestantism. Hoping for the conversion of England, Bérulle supported the marriage of Henriette, sister of Louis XIII, to the Prince of Wales, the future CHARLES I of England, conducted the negotiations with Rome for the dispensation for the marriage, and accompanied the queen to Great Britain. He refused in 1629 to sign the treaty of alliance with England and the Low Countries because he could not abide the thought of France entering into a compact with Protestants against Catholic Spain. Nevertheless, the policy of alliance with the Protestants prevailed, and this put an end to Bérulle's political activity. He fell into disgrace, and Cardinal RICHELIEU wanted to have him sent from France.

Although he was deeply involved in political affairs, Bérulle remained essentially a contemplative, as is apparent in the many spiritual works that he composed. For the most part these were composed for the occasion, were hastily written, and have the appearance of being unfinished drafts. They are discourses and effusions that express the ardor of his faith rather than treatises in the strict sense. He was eminently a man whose orientation was spiritual; his speculation was joined with prayer in an indistinguishable act of adoration (see M. Dupuy, Bérulle, une spiritualité d'adoration, Tournai 1964). His principal works were Discours de l'état et des grandeurs de Jésus (1623, 2^{e} partie 1629); Élevations à Jésus-Christ sur sa conduite ... vers S. Madeleine (1625); Bref discours de l'abnégation intérieure (1597); La Vie de Jésus (1629), and the collected Oeuvres de piété (184 opuscula, ed. G. Rotureau, Paris 1944).

The spirituality of Bérulle is a rich synthesis of various mystical currents: the via negativa of the Rheno-Flemish School, the Carmelite emphasis on interior purification, the devout humanism of St. FRANCIS DE SALES (1567–1622), and the Ignatian focus on the concrete events of Christ's life. These influences combined with a deep Augustinian sense of human brokenness and dependence on God to produce what is sometimes called "the French School" of spirituality. This school revolves around a number of dominant themes:

1. the human sense of servitude before the grandeur and glory of God, the most Holy Trinity;

2. the consequent obligation to render adoration to God;
3. the INCARNATION as the supreme mystery of divine glory and self-abasement;
4. adherence to the mysteries of Christ's life;
5. mystical subsistence in Christ, the head of the Mystical Body;
6. Christ as priest and victim and the need for priestly HOLINESS; and
7. devotion and servitude to Mary in order to facilitate the most intimate adoration of her divine Son.

Bérulle's emphasis on the intimate union of Jesus and Mary prompted him to encourage the members of the Oratory to take a special vow of servitude or slavery (esclavage) to Jesus and Mary (cf. O'Carroll 2000, p. 80). This vow involves a complete offering of self to Jesus and Mary, entrusting one's soul to their care in a spirit of servitude and humility. St. Louis-Marie GRIGNION DE MONTFORT (1673–1716), influenced by the Oratorians, promoted a similar vow. For Bérulle, Mary exemplifies the qualities of HUMILITY and adoration by her perfect submission to the will of God. It is Christ, however, who provides the most sublime example of adoration when, as supreme high priest, he offers himself historically at CALVARY and eternally in heaven by his everlasting sacrifice to the Father. Christians, therefore, must renounce themselves and adhere to Christ, by undergoing self-abnegation or anéantissement (the process of being made into nothing).

Bérulle had an enormous influence on French spirituality of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Those influenced by him directly include his fellow Oratorians, François BOURGOING (1585–1662), Charles de CONDREN (1588–1641), Guillaume GIBIEUF (1591–1650), Jean-Baptiste Masillon (1663–1742), and also St. John EUDES (1601–1680), who was an Oratorian until he founded the Congregation of Jesus and Mary in 1643. Jean Jacques OLIER (1608–1657), the founder of the SULPICIANS, had Bérulle's disciple, Charles de Condren as his spiritual director, and Louis TRONSON (1622–1700), the Sulpician spiritual writer, was a follower not only of Olier but also of Condren and Bérulle. The French Carmelites, Madeleine de Saint-Joseph (1578–1637) and Marie de L'Incarnation (of France not Quebec, 1599–1672), were close associates of Bérulle. Others influenced by Bérulle include St. VINCENT DE PAUL (1581–1660), St. Margaret Mary ALACOQUE (1647–1690), Jacques Bénigne BOSSUET (1627–1704), François FÉNELON (1651–1715), Nicolas MALEBRANCHE (1638–1715), Louis THOMASSIN (1619–1685), St. Louis-Marie Grignion de Montfort (1673–1716), and St. Jean-Baptiste DE LA SALLE (1651–1719).

Many people who knew Bérulle testified to his holiness. Bourgoing noted that "God was with him in all his ways; Jesus Christ was speaking and acting in him" (Molien 1937, p. 1579). Madeleine de St. Joseph observed that "it seemed he could only act for Jesus Christ, thinking and speaking only of him and his mysteries" (Thompson 1989, p. 193). St. Vincent de Paul described Bérulle as "one of the holiest men I have known,"(Cochois 1963, p. 61) and St. Francis de Sales proclaimed that Bérulle is "all that I would desire myself to be"(Cochois 1963, p. 61). Pope URBAN VIII (r.1623–1644) greatly admired Bérulle and once said of him: "This is not a man but an angel" (Molien 1937, p. 1579). Urban VIII also made Bérulle a cardinal in 1627 and praised him as "the apostle of the Incarnate Word" (Pereira and Fastiggi 2006, p. 206).

Cardinal Bérulle reportedly asked God to allow him to die in service at the altar. This request was granted when he collapsed and died while celebrating Mass on October 2, 1629, prompting Bourgoing to proclaim: "His death was the consummation of his perpetual sacrifice" (Molien 1937, p. 1579). Bourgoing, who become the superior of the French Oratory in 1641, introduced Bérulle's cause for BEATIFICATION in 1648, during the pontificate of INNOCENT X (r.1644–1655). A total of forty-five miracles were attributed to Bérulle's INTERCESSION, but subsequent allegations of ties to JANSENISM interrupted the process. The Jansenists not only made use of some writings of Bérulle; they also inscribed his name on their devotional calendar, which likewise included the names of Francis de Sales, Jane Frances de CHANTAL, and Bishop Bossuet (Molien 1937, p. 1579). Bérulle's friendship with the young Jean DUVERGIER DE HARURANNE (1581–1643), the Abbé de Saint-Cyran and future Jansensist leader, might have been a factor. Defenders of Bérulle, however, note that he died over a decade before the Jansenist controversy erupted in the 1640s, and he can hardly be blamed for the way others used his writings. Moreover, close disciples of Bérulle, such as Bourgoing, were among the strongest opponents of Jansenism. In light of these factors, some have suggested that the cause for Bérulle's beatification should be revived.

SEE ALSO CARMELITE SISTERS; CONTEMPLATIVE LIFE; DIRECTION, SPIRITUAL; MYSTICAL BODY OF CHRIST; SPIRITUALITY, FRENCH SCHOOL OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Alfred Baudrillart, ed., Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912–), 8:1115–1135.

R. Bellemare, Le Sens de la créature dans la doctrine de Bérulle (Ottawa 1959).

"Bérulle," in Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique, edited by Marcel Viller (Paris 1937), 1:1539–1581.

Pierre de Bérulle, Oeuvres complètes, ed. Jacques-Paul Migne (Paris 1856).

Pierre de Bérulle, Correspondance, 3 vols., ed. Jean Dagens, (Paris 1937–1939).

Paul Cochois, Bérulle et l'école française (Paris 1963).

Joseph H. Crehan, A Catholic Dictionary of Theology (Edinburgh 1962), 1:263–266.

Jean Dagens, Bérulle et les origines de la restauration catholique (Bruges 1952).

Michel Dupuy, Bérulle, une spiritualité d'adoration (Tournai 1964).

Andre George, L'Oratoire (Paris 1928).

Wayne J. Hankey, "From St. Augustine and St. Denys to Olier and Bérulle's Spiritual Revolution," Laval Théologique et Philosophique 63, no. 3 (October 2007): 515–559.

Michel Houssaye, M. de Bérulle et les carmélites de France (Paris 1872).

Michel Houssaye, Le Père de Bérulle et l'Oratoire de Jésus (Paris 1874).

Michel Houssaye, Le Cardinal de Bérulle et le Cardinal de Richelieu (Paris 1875).

Berta Kiesler, Die Struktur des Theozentrismus bei Bérulle und de Condren (Berlin 1934).

Giovanni Moioli, Teologia della devozione B. al Verbo Incarnato (Varese 1964).

Auguste Molien, "Bérulle", in Dictionnaire de spiritualité, ascétique et mystique, ed. Marcel Viller, S.J. Vol. 1 (Paris, 1937): 1539–1581.

Auguste Molien, Le Cardinal de Bérulle, 2 vols. (Paris 1947).

Jean Félix Nourrisson, Le Cardinal de Bérulle: Sa vie, ses écrits, son temps (Paris 1856).

Michael O'Carroll, C.S.Sp., Theotokos: A Theological Encyclopedia of the Blessed Virgin Mary (Eugene, Ore. 2000), 79–80.

Jean Orcibal, Le Cardinal de Bérulle: Évolution d'une spiritualité (Paris 1965).

Jose Pereira and Robert Fastiggi, The Mystical Theology of the Catholic Reformation: An Overview of Baroque Spirituality (Lanham, Md. 2006), 193–219.

Christian Raab and Harry Hagan, eds., The Tradition of Catholic Prayer (Collegeville, Minn. 2007), 89–105.

Myles Reardon, "Pierre Bérulle's Apostleship of the Incarnate Word," Irish Theological Quarterly 72, no. 2 (2007): 187–200.

Claude Taveau, Le Cardinal de Bérulle, maître de la vie spirituelle (Paris 1933).

William M. Thompson, ed., Bérulle and the French School: Selected Writings, translated by Lowell M. Glendon (New York 1989).

Marcel Viller, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique (Paris 1932–), 1:1539–81.

Rev. Antanas J. Liuima SJ
Professor, History of Spirituality
Gregorian University, Rome, Italy

Robert L. Fastiggi
Professor of Systematic Theology
Sacred Heart Major Seminary, Detroit, Mich. (2010)

BESSETTE, ANDRÉ, ST.

Baptized Alfred; thaumaturgist and member of the Brotherhood of the Holy Cross; b. Saint-Gregoire d'Iberville (southeast of Montréal), Québec, Canada, August 9, 1845; d. Montréal, January 6, 1937.

Alfred, the eighth of twelve children of Isaac Bessette and Clothilde Foisy, was sickly and left orphaned by the age of twelve. He unsuccessfully attempted various occupations as a smith, cobbler, and baker. During the U.S. CIVIL WAR, he did manual labor in mills and on farms in New England, where he learned English. He returned to Montréal in 1867 and was accepted as a Holy Cross postulant despite his precarious health and illiteracy. With the help of Bishop BOUGET of Montréal, Brother André professed his vows on December 27, 1870.

Bessette gained a reputation as a healer during his many decades as porter of Notre Dame College (Montréal). His devotion to St. Joseph, patron of the Universal Church, led him to build St. Joseph's Oratory atop Mont Royal in Montréal, using only the money he had collected himself to fund the project. The first small chapel (15' by 18') erected in 1904, was enlarged in 1908 and 1910. The cornerstone for a new crypt church—to hold 1,000 people—was laid in 1917, but the roof was not added until 1936. The oratory, where Blessed André served as guardian for thirty years and is buried, was solemnly dedicated as a minor basilica in 1955. He was beatified by Pope JOHN PAUL II on May 23, 1982. On December 19, 2009, following the approval of a miracle, the Holy See announced that Bessette would be canonized by Pope BENEDICT XIV. As of the printing of this entry, a canonization date had not been set.

Feast: January 6 (U.S.A.).

SEE ALSO HOLY CROSS, CONGREGATION OF; JOSEPH, ST., DEVOTION TO; RELIGIOUS (MEN AND WOMEN).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Acta Apostolicae Sedis 75 (1983): 14–16.

Laurent Boucher, Brother André: The Miracle Man of Mount Royal (Montréal 1997).

Katherine Burton, Brother André of Mount Royal (Notre Dame, Ind. 1952).

Jean-Guy Dubuc, Le frère André (Saint-Laurent, Québec 1996), Eng. tr. R. Prudhomme, Brother André (Quebec 1999).

Hector Grenon, Le frère André (Montréal 1981).

Micheline Lachance, Le frère André (Montréal 1979).

C. Bernard Ruffin, The Life of Brother André: The Miracle Worker of St. Joseph (Huntington, Ind. 1988).

L'Osservatore Romano, English edition, 24 (1982): 6–7.

Alden Hatch, The Miracle of the Mountain: The Story of Brother André and the Shrine on Mount Royal (New York 1959).

Saint Joseph's Oratory of Mount-Royal Official Web site, available in English from http://www.saint-joseph.org/en_1007_index.asp (accessed January 4, 2010).

Susan T. Stein, The Tapestry of Saint Joseph: Chronological History of St. Joseph and His Apostle, Blessed Brother André (Philadelphia, Pa. 1991).

Katherine Rabenstein
Senior Credentialing Specialist
American Nurses Association, Washington, D.C.

EDS (2010)

BETANCUR (BETHANCOURT), PEDRO DE SAN JOSÉ (PETER OF ST. JOSEPH), ST.

Franciscan tertiary, missionary, founder of charitable institutions and the Hospitaler Bethlehemites; b. May 16, 1619, Villaflores, Chasna, Tenerife Island, Spain; d. April 25, 1667, Guatemala City, Guatemala; beatified by Pope John Paul II, June 22, 1980; canonized by John Paul II, July 30, 2002.

Although Pedro was descended from Juan de Bethencourt (c. 1360–1422), one of the Norman conquerors of the Canary Islands, his immediate family was very poor, and his first employment was as the shepherd of the small family flock. In 1650 he left for Guatemala, where a relative had preceded him as secretary to the governor general. His funds ran out in Havana, and Pedro paid for his passage from that point by working on a ship. He landed in Honduras and walked to Guatemala City, arriving there on February 18, 1651. He was so poor that he joined the daily bread line at the Franciscan friary. In this way he met Friar Fernando Espino, a famous missionary, who befriended him and remained his lifelong counselor. Through Friar Fernando, Pedro was given work at a local textile factory, which enabled him to support himself, but which also employed criminals condemned by the courts.

In 1653 he entered the local Jesuit college of San Borja in the hopes of becoming a priest. Because he lacked the ability to study, he was soon forced to give up this dream. In the college, however, he met Manuel Lobo, S.J., who became and remained his lifelong confessor.

Friar Fernando invited him to join the Franciscan order as a lay brother, but Pedro felt God was calling him to remain in the world. Hence, in 1655 he joined the Third Order of St. Francis and took the tertiary habit as his garb. By this time his virtues were widely recognized in the city. In 1658 María de Esquivel's hut was given to him, and Pedro, remembering the experiences of his first desperate days in Guatemala, immediately began a hospital for the convalescent poor (Nuestra Señora de Belén, Our Lady of Bethlehem), a hostel for the homeless, a school, and an oratory. From then on all his time was dedicated to alleviating the sufferings of the less fortunate. He begged alms with which to endow MASSES to be celebrated by poor priests; he also endowed Masses that were celebrated at unusually early hours so the poor would not have to miss Mass because of their dress. He also had small chapels erected in the poorer sections, where children received instruction. Each year on August 18, he gathered the children and had them sing the Seven Joys of the Franciscan Rosary in honor of the Blessed Mother, a custom that passed to Spain, but today remains only in Guatemala. He inaugurated the Christmas Eve custom of imitating St. Joseph in search of lodgings for the Blessed Mother. Throughout his life, Pedro's spiritual meditation centered on the Child of BETHLEHEM.

In his works he was joined by men and women who were similarly inspired by the charity of Christ to give aid and comfort to the sick, the poor, and the less fortunate. These individuals formed the communities of the Bethlehemite Brothers and the Bethlehemite Sisters, for which Pedro formulated a Rule that was dedicated to active service and centered on the practices of prayer, fasting, and penance.

The gentle, kind man known as "St. Francis of the Americas" died peacefully in his hospital at the age of forty-one, hoping that his companions would carry on the many works he had begun. He is entombed in the Church of San Francisco in the old section of Guatemala City. Interest in his cause was renewed by the 1962 publication of his biography by Francisco VÁZQUEZ DE HERRERA.

Pope JOHN PAUL II honored Pedro's joyful service and humility by beatifying him in ROME on June 22, 1980. The same pope canonized him in Guatemala City twenty-two years later on July 30, 2002. In his homily the Holy Father commented on the intersection of contemplation and action evident in his life:

> Brother Pedro modeled his spirituality in this way, particularly in contemplation of mysteries of Bethlehem and of the Cross. If, in the birth and childhood of Jesus, he immersed himself deeply in the fundamental event of the Incarnation of the Word—which led him to discover spontaneously, as it were, the face of God in man—then, in meditating on the Cross, he found the strength to practise mercy heroically with the lowliest and most deprived.

Feast: April 26.

SEE ALSO BETHLEHEMITES; FRANCISCANS, THIRD ORDER SECULAR; JESUITS; NORMANS, THE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Acta Apostolicae Sedis 73 (1981): 253–258.

Julián Arriola C., Los milagros del venerable siervo de Dios, hermano Pedro de San José de Betancourt, efectuados en su vida y después de su muerto y su digno sucesor fray Rodrigo de la Cruz (Guatemala City 1983).

Francisco Antonio de Montalvo, Vida admirable y muerte preciosa del venerable hermano Pedro de San José Betancur, fundador de la Compañía Bethlemítica en las Indias Occidentales, modernized by Augustín Estrada Monroy (Guatemala City 1974).

David de Vela, El Hermano Pedro (en la vida y en las letras) (Guatemala City 1961).

Augustín Estrada Monroy, Breve relación de la ejemplar vida del venerable siervo de Dios, Pedro de San Joseph Betancur (Guatemala City 1968).

Gracias, Matiox, Thanks, Hermano Pedro: A Trilingual Anthology of Guatemalan Oral Tradition, edited and translated by Maria Cristina Canales and Jane Frances Morrissey in collaboration with Miguel Morales Jimenez and Rafael Coyote Tum (New York 1996).

Teresa Fernández Hall de Arévalo, El apóstol de la campanilla (Guatemala City 1980).

John Paul II, "Canonization of Brother Pedro de San José de Betancurt," (Homily, July 30, 2002), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/homilies/2002/documents/hf_jp-ii_hom_20020730_canonization-guatemala_en.html (accessed July 27, 2009).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "St. Peter de Betancurt (1626-1667)," Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_lit_doc_20020730_betancurt_en.html (accessed July 27, 2009).

L'Osservatore Romano, English edition, n. 26 (1980): 10–11.

Máximo Soto-Hall, Pedro de San José Bethencourt, el San Francisco de Asís Americano, 3rd ed. (Guatemala City 1981).

Francisco Vázquez De Herrera, Vida y virtudes del venerable hermano Pedro de San José de Betancur, edited by Lázaro Lamardrid Jimémez (Guatemala City 1962).

Rev. Lázaro Lamadrid OFM
Historical Advisor for the Cause of Beatification of the Venerable Pedro de San José Betancur

Elizabeth C. Shaw
Independent Scholar
Washington, D.C. (2010)

BEYZYM, JAN (JOHN), BL.

Servant of the lepers of Madagascar; b. May 15, 1850, at Beyzymy Wielkie in present-day Ukraine (formerly Poland); d. October 2, 1912, in Fianarantsoa, Madagascar; remains moved to Krakow, Poland, in 1993; beatified August 18, 2002, by Pope JOHN PAUL II in Krakow, Poland.

Blessed Jan began his work as a Jesuit priest teaching in Jesuit schools in Poland for seventeen years. In middle age he received and responded generously to a call from God to become an apostle to the lepers of Madagascar, a large island off the southeastern coast of Africa. Reminiscent of the life of Blessed Teresa of Calcutta, he left at the age of forty-eight the secure and familiar life of teaching in Catholic schools and began an entirely new apostolate for those living in the most miserable conditions. In Madagascar he found the lepers living in horrible conditions of isolation and suffering premature death due to poor diet and hygiene. The official Vatican biography records that "[s]everal times he fainted" when he began his work for the lepers. Through prayer he eventually overcame his strong repulsion at the sight of the sick to whom he ministered: "One must be in constant union with God and pray without respite. One must get used little by little to the stench, for here we don't breathe the scent of flowers but the putrefaction of bodies generated by leprosy."

Around 1903 he began efforts to build a hospital for lepers on the island. By 1911 the hospital was built, in spite of numerous obstacles. He was able to raise the needed funds from donors in Europe. The hospital still serves lepers today and is dedicated to Our Lady of Czestochowa. His Vatican biography fittingly describes Blessed Jan as "a contemplative in action in the style of St. Ignatius" for both men combined tireless action to meet organizational challenges with a life of prayer. Blessed Jan was also particularly devoted to the Virgin Mary in his apostolate. In his BEATIFICATION homily, John Paul II emphasized the integration of Blessed Jan's spirituality and his works of mercy: "The charitable work of Blessed Jan Beyzym was an integral component of his fundamental mission: bringing the Gospel to those who do not know it. This is the greatest gift of mercy: bringing people to Christ and giving them the opportunity to know and savour his love."

Feast: October 2.

SEE ALSO APOSTOLATE AND SPIRITUAL LIFE; IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA, ST.; JESUITS; MADAGASCAR, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, DEVOTION TO; MOTHER TERESA OF CALCUTTA, BL.; POLAND, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

"Blessed Jan Beyzym," Patron Saints Index, available from http://saints.sqpn.com/blessed-jan-beyzym/ (accessed August 6, 2009).

Dom Antoine Marie, OSB, "Blessed Jan Beyzym, S.J., Missionary (1850 Ukraine–1912 Madagascar)," available from http://www.clerus.org/clerus/dati/2009-06/25-13/EN_Beyzym.html (accessed August 6, 2009).

John Paul II, "Holy Mass and Beatifications: Zygmunt Szczęsny Feliński, Jan Balicki, Jan Beyzym, Sancja Szymkowiak," (Homily, August 18, 2002), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/homilies/2002/documents/hf_jp-ii_hom_20020818_beatification-krakow_en.html (accessed August 6, 2009).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Jan Beyzym (1850–1912)," Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_lit_doc_20020818_beyzym_en.html (accessed August 6, 2009).

Oswald Sobrino
Editor, Catholic Analysis
http://CatholicAnalysis.blogspot.com (2010)

BIRAGHI, LUIGI, BL.

Monsignor, cofounder of the Institute of the Sisters of Saint Marcellina (Marcellina Sisters), Cernusco sul Naviglio, Italy; b. November 2, 1801, Vignate (Milan), Italy; d. August 11, 1879, Milan; beatified April 30, 2006, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

Luigi, the fifth of eight children, entered the seminary at Castello sopra Lecco at the age of twelve. He went on to distinguish himself in studies at the seminaries in Milan and Monza. Fr. Biraghi was ordained in Milan on May 28, 1825, and he subsequently taught at the seminaries in Castello sopra Lecco, Monza, and Seveso. He became the spiritual director of the Milan seminary in 1833.

A highly intelligent, well-educated historian and archeologist, one of Msgr. Biraghi's great achievements was the creation of the Institute of the Sisters of Saint Marcellina (Marcellina Sisters). Believing that the family was the foundation of society and that women anchored the family, he advocated a theory that emphasized education in science and culture combined with religious studies. Collaborating with Marina Videmari, who was his spiritual student and would become the first mother superior of the Institute, Msgr. Biraghi opened a college for young women in Cernusco sul Naviglio in 1838. Students who could pay, did so; however, an education was available to applicants from even the poorest families. The institute was placed under the protection of St. Marcellina, sister of St. AMBROSE, to whom Msgr. Biraghi was deeply devoted. The method of study proved so successful that in 1841 a second college opened in Vimercate. Msgr. Biraghi dedicated himself to the growth of the colleges and mentored students and teachers alike.

In addition to the accomplishments associated with the institute, Msgr. Biraghi's talents as a scholar and diplomat were recognized throughout his life. In 1841 he became a founder and editor of the periodical L'amico cattolico, established in Milan. In 1855 he was named a doctor of the famed Biblioteca Ambrosiana and an honorary canon of the Basilica of Saint Ambrose, both in Milan; he became Vice-Prefect of the Ambrosiana in 1864. Upon the request of Pope PIUS IX, Msgr. Biraghi acted as a mediator among factions of clergy in Milan who were at odds over support for a united Italy. In 1873 the monsignor was named DOMESTIC PRELATE to Pope Pius IX; he learned of the appointment as he was planning the opening of the sixth Marcellina college in Chambéry, France. Marcellina Sisters have also established their presence with schools and other charitable institutions across the globe, including in Switzerland, England, Albania, Canada, Mexico, and Benin. The Congregation numbers about 850.

Feast: August 11.

SEE ALSO BEATIFICATION; DIRECTION, SPIRITUAL; ITALY, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; RELIGIOUS (MEN AND WOMEN).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

"Blessed Luigi Biraghi," Patron Saints Index, available from http://saints.sqpn.com/saintl2w.htm (accessed August 6, 2009).

Ennio Apeciti, Come il nardo (Milan 2006).

Angelo Majo, Monsignor Luigi Biraghi (Milan 1997).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Luigi Biraghi (1801–1879)," Vatican Web site, April 30, 2006, available (in Italian) from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_lit_doc_20060430_biraghi_it.html (accessed August 6, 2009).

Elizabeth Inserra
Independent Scholar
New York, New York (2010)

BISMARCK, OTTO VON

German statesman, known as the "Iron Chancellor," who played a major role in the unification of Germany; b. Schönhausen (near Magdeburg), Prussia, April 1, 1815; d. Friedrichsruh (near Hamburg), Germany, July 30, 1898.

Otto von Bismarck's father was a Prussian Junker (nobleman), and his mother was a member of a bourgeois family that had served the Prussian monarchy. Baptized in the Protestant faith, he was indifferent to religion in his youth. As an adult, he became an adherent of a pietistic form of LUTHERANISM. In 1832 he began studies at the University of Göttingen, and he later went on to the University of Berlin, but he faired poorly at both institutions.

After serving in the Prussian Diet and as ambassador to Russia, Bismarck was appointed as the Prussian prime minister and foreign minister by King Wilhelm I on September 22, 1862. He maneuvered Denmark, Austria, and France into a series of three wars (the last being the Franco-Prussian War of 1870–1871) that secured Prussian expansion. With the unification of Germany in 1871, Wilhelm I of Prussia became the Kaiser (emperor) of Germany, Bismarck became the German chancellor, and Prussia became the dominant region within the German Reich (empire).

Called a "White Revolutionary" by the German historian Lothar Gall, Bismarck brought about sweeping changes while preserving the power of the crown and Prussia in changing times. A master strategist, he pursued ever-changing domestic and foreign alliances. He established the "League of Three Emperors," consisting of Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Russia, in 1872. In domestic affairs, he relied on liberal support until about 1880. He relentlessly endeavored to isolate and weaken those groups that he saw as enemies of the empire, notably socialists and Catholics. His tactics could be enlightened, as in the introduction of the first comprehensive system of health insurance and other benefits, or autocratic, as in the antisocialist laws and the Kulturkampf laws, which were aimed at Catholics. Bismarck served briefly as chancellor under Wilhelm I's successors, Friedrich III and Wilhelm II. Bridling under Bismarck's heavy hand, the latter dismissed Bismarck in 1890.

Relations with the Papacy and with German Catholics. Bismarck's relations with the PAPACY were molded by a fear of both Catholic resurgence and papal alliance with Austria and Polish minorities. The beleaguered papacy was involved in a struggle to confront challenges on various fronts, notably the Risorgimento (unification of Italy) and the dissolution of the Papal States, as well as growing secularization across Europe. Pope PIUS IX (1846–1878) promulgated the ENCYCLICAL Quanta cura, which contained the famous "SYLLABUS OF ERRORS," on December 8, 1864, and the doctrine of papal INFALLIBILITY (defined at Vatican I) on July 18, 1870. Bismarck saw these as a threat to state power in Prussia, where the Catholic Church had greater freedom than elsewhere in Europe.

Bismarck, like many other Germans, feared ULTRAMONTANISM, a political current that placed papal doctrine above temporal authority. The formation of the Catholic-based CENTER PARTY in 1858 was worrisome to Bismarck, particularly because he saw it as a center of resistance to Prussian rule in southern and southwestern Germany. He saw the Center Party as pro-Austrian and an ally of particularism among Polish subjects of Germany and the inhabitants of (previously French) Alsace-Lorraine. The emergence of Catholic labor unions was an additional worry. Between 1868 and 1871, he appealed to the pope to use his influence to halt Catholic "subversion" and to rein in the Center Party.

The Kulturkampf. The Kulturkampf, a series of discriminatory measures aimed at Catholics and the Catholic Church, has been attributed not only to a questioning of Catholic loyalty to the German Empire, but also to cultural factors and political opportunism. Liberals coined the term Kulturkampf (culture war) to describe the struggle between liberals defending the "achievements of modern culture" and Catholics who were supposedly resisting progress. Bismarck was swayed, not so much by liberal convictions, but by political opportunism and the prospect of winning liberal and bourgeois support.

Open hostility between Bismarck and the pope arose on May 2, 1872, when the latter refused to accept Cardinal Gustav von Hohenlohe of Bavaria as ambassador to the Vatican. Hohenlohe had once been in the pope's good graces, but he emerged as an opponent of papal infallibility. In response, Bismarck declared, "Have no fear, we are not going to Canossa, either in body or in spirit" (Chadwick 1998, p. 261), a reference to the subjugation of the Holy Roman Emperor to papal authority in the Middle Ages.

A broad palette of anti-Catholic legislation was enacted between 1871 and 1875. Some of these laws affected the entire empire, while some were restricted to Prussia. The first laws, notably those dictating state inspections of private schools and compulsory civil marriage, merely guaranteed the separation of CHURCH AND STATE. Others ensured state supremacy over the Church. Clergymen could be imprisoned for two years for political statements "endangering public peace," for example. The JESUITS and other orders were expelled from Germany at this time. Under the "May Laws" of 1873, clergymen were required to be German, to attend a university, and to pass state examinations. In addition, appointments to ecclesiastical offices had to be approved by provincial governors, and Church officials could be fined, imprisoned, or removed from office by the state.

Between Berlin and Rome. Bismarck and Pope Leo XIII playing chess, 1875. © BILDARCHIV PREUSSISCHER KULTURBESITZ/ART RESOURCE, NY

Catholics put up steadfast resistance to this onslaught. Bishops closed seminaries; ecclesiastical office were left vacant; churchmen refused to conform and were imprisoned; confiscated Church property was repurchased by loyal Catholics, who donated it back to the Church; and there were Catholic riots and demonstrations. Support for the Center Party increased dramatically. On February 5, 1875, Pope Pius IX issued an encyclical, Quod nunquam, declaring the May Laws invalid and urging clergy to obey God, not man. In response, the German state suspended most of its annual subsidy to Catholic dioceses and clerics unless Church officials pledged to abide by Kulturkampf legislation, autonomous administration and the right to communicate with ROME and to make ecclesiastical appointments were denied the Church, and all religious orders not engaged in hospital work or teaching were abolished. Bismarck forced through these draconian laws over the resistance of members of the Prussian government, who feared the laws could be turned against Protestants.

The Kulturkampf lost momentum in the 1870s, when Bismarck turned against a new foe: the socialists. Pius IX died in 1878, and most of these laws were rescinded under an agreement with the new pope, LEO XIII. In the end, Bismarck was unable to force either German society or the Catholic Church to bow to his will. However, some believe that the Kulturkampf set the stage for later state-sponsored persecution of minorities, notably the Jews.

SEE ALSO AUSTRIA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; GERMANY, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; KULTURKAMPF; RISORGIMENTO.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Owen Chadwick, A History of the Popes, 1830–1914 (Oxford, U.K. 1998).

Lothar Gall, Bismarck, the White Revolutionary, translated by J.A. Underwood, 2 vols. (London 1986).

Michael Gross, The War against Catholicism (Ann Arbor, Mich. 2004).

Otto Pflanze, Bismarck and the Development of Germany, 2nd ed., 3 vols. (Princeton, N.J. 1990).

Dolores Augustine
Professor of History
St. John's University, New York (2010)

BLACK MASS

The Black Mass is the central ceremony of the phenomenon known as SATANISM. This "mass" may be defined as the adoration of the figure known in the BIBLE as the DEVIL or SATAN, though of course its "religious" nature has been disputed by some scholars. Modern Satanism was created at the Versailles court of LOUIS XIV (1638–1715), in the circle operating around Catherine La Voisin (d. 1680) and the defrocked Catholic priest Father Guibourg (1603–1683; his first name is not mentioned in the seventeenth-century sources). La Voisin and Guibourg invented both the term and the reality of the Black Mass, which was devised as a parody of the Roman Catholic Mass. La Voisin was burned at the stake in 1680 and Guibourg died in jail in 1683. Small rings celebrating Black Masses by imitating what they had read of the Paris group were subsequently discovered in France, Italy, and Russia in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

In the 1880s, the reporter Jules Bois (1868–1943) and the novelist Joris-Karl Huysmans (1848–1907) explored the French occult underworld, and in 1891 Huysmans (who later converted to Catholicism) published his best-selling novel on Satanism, Là-bas (Down There), which included one of the most famous literary descriptions of a Black Mass. The work may have been based on the novelist's real-life experiences with small Satanist groups in both France and Belgium. Most subsequent Black Masses of the twentieth century are derived from Huysmans's novel, rather than from an alleged tradition of pre-nineteenth century Satanic groups. Indeed, no complete ritual of a Black Mass precedent to the publication of Là-bas has survived.

Several modern groups have introduced new and quite creative elements in their Black Masses, most of them derived from the writings and ceremonies (which included a "Gnostic Mass") of the British magus Aleister Crowley (1875–1947). Crowley occasionally made use of Satanic imagery and is still regarded by many as the founding father of contemporary Satanism. He was, however, a "magical atheist" who did not believe in the actual existence of Satan. Thus, although he has been influential on later Satanic movements, he cannot be regarded as a Satanist in the most technical sense of the term.

Anton Szandor LaVey (1930–1997), who founded the Church of Satan in San Francisco on April 30, 1966, had joined a Crowleyan group in 1951, and through this milieu he came into contact with movie director Kenneth Anger (b. 1927). In 1961, they established an organization known as the Magic Circle, which gradually evolved into the Church of Satan. After LaVey's death in 1997, the Church of Satan split into half a dozen separate organizations, whose combined worldwide membership was less than 1,000 at the beginning of the twenty-first century.

LaVey's Church did not literally believe in the existence of the Devil. It was more an idiosyncratic and militantly anti-Christian human potential movement, and it was devoted to the exaltation of human beings, who, having been freed from religious superstitions and the false Christian notion of SIN, would eventually be able to enjoy life and flourish. LaVey's Black Mass was a sort of psychodrama in which, through various profanations of Christian symbols and transgressive sexual activities, participants symbolically affirmed that sin does not exist. The use of a naked woman lying on a table as an "altar" and the desecration of a Catholic host were already central features of the Black Mass described by both the judges in the Guibourg-La Voisin case and by Huysmans. In addition to these elements, LaVey added many sexual features. While LaVey claimed not to encourage the theft of consecrated hosts (the hosts were instead "magically" consecrated by LaVey himself), other Satanic groups have been persuasively accused of stealing hosts from Catholic churches. What remains central in all Black Masses is a systematic "inversion" of the Catholic pre–Vatican II ritual, whereby Jesus Christ is derided and insulted rather than praised, and all praise is reserved for Satan. Only a handful of Satanic groups, however, still celebrate the Black Mass in Latin.

During what sociologists called the "ritual abuse scare" of the 1980s (as many as two thousand cases of Satanic ritual abuse of children were investigated between 1983 and 1992, with only a handful of convictions), the theory of a secret Satanic network celebrating thousands of Black Masses and connected with Masonic lodges emerged. In 1994, two official reports—one by the National Center on Child Abuse and Neglect, and one by the sociologist Jean S. La Fontaine on behalf of the U.K. government—concluded that stories of Satanic (or "Masonic-Satanic") ritual abuse were largely figments of the accusers' imaginations. In subsequent years, the number of court cases involving allegations of ritual abuse during Black Masses sharply decreased.

The debate on the ritual abuse scare should not be confused with discussions of adolescent Satanism. There is little doubt that there are gangs of teenagers performing some sort of homemade Black Mass (copied from comics, books, or movies, or downloaded from the Internet), which often involve drugs and occasionally involve serious violence. In these cases, it is difficult to determine whether drug- and gang-related violence or Satan worship are mostly responsible for crimes perpetrated within the context of these juvenile "Black Masses," which are very different from the elaborate rituals of the Church of Satan and other similar organizations.

SEE ALSO ATHEISM; COMMUNION UNDER BOTH SPECIES; EUCHARIST IN CONTEMPORARY CATHOLIC TRADITIONL; GNOSTICISM; JESUS CHRIST (IN THEOLOGY); OCCULTISM; TRIDENTINE MASS; WITCHCRAFT.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Massimo Introvigne, Enquête sur le satanisme: Satanistes et antisatanistes du XVIIe siècle à nos jours (Paris 1997).

James T. Richardson, Joel Best, and David G. Bromley, eds., The Satanism Scare (New York 1991).

Massimo Introvigne
Managing Director
Center for Studies on New Religions (CESNUR),
Turin, Italy (2010)

BOCCARDO, LUIGI, BL.

Priest, founder of the Sisters of Christ the King, Torino, Italy; b. August 9, 1861, Moncalieri, Italy; d. June 9, 1936, Torino; beatified April 14, 2007, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

The seventh of nine children, Luigi was the younger brother and godson of Giovanni Maria BOCCARDO (beatified May 24, 1998, by Pope JOHN PAUL II), also a priest. In 1875 Luigi began religious training in Torino (Turin), and he was ordained on June 7, 1884.

As a seminary student, Luigi was mentored by his older brother, who was spiritual director of the seminary's philosophy students, and by Giuseppe ALLAMANO, founder of the CONSOLATA MISSIONARIES (beatified October 7, 1990, by Pope John Paul II). In an early assignment, Fr. Boccardo witnessed a devastating cholera outbreak in Pancalieri while working with Giovanni Maria, who had become a parish priest there. In the aftermath, the elder Boccardo founded the Congregation of the Poor Sisters of Saint Gaetan to assist the stricken populace. In 1886 Fr. Boccardo was assigned to the Ecclesiatical Boarding School of OUR LADY OF GOOD COUNSEL in Torino, where he was reunited with Giuseppe Allamano; the priests worked together for thirty years. Among his many duties as vice-rector and spiritual director for the school, Fr. Boccardo counseled and advised newly ordained priests from all parts of the diocese on issues of MORAL THEOLOGY.

In January 1914, upon the death of Giovanni Maria, Fr. Boccardo became the superior general of the order his brother had established. The priest who had principally worked as an academic mentoring and teaching seminary candidates and priests now supervised the activities of hundreds of women, assigned to dozens of convents, who served children, the elderly, and the sick in schools, hospitals, and other public facilities. Fr. Boccardo met this difficult challenge of leadership and, in December 1919, was also assigned the task of running the Institute for the Blind, which was in serious financial straits. Through his efforts, the institution recovered and thrived.

In 1934 Fr. Boccardo founded the Sisters of Christ the King, an offshoot of the Poor Sisters of Saint Gaetan, for a group of women who had been refused admission to other religious societies because they were blind. The newly formed contemplative group prayed for the Church, clergy, and those in need. The elderly priest also embarked on the great mission of constructing a church near the two institutions he directed. The Shrine of Christ the King was consecrated on October 24, 1934.

In addition to his other achievements, Fr. Boccardo was a prodigious letter writer. His correspondence with clergy and laypersons fills seven volumes and spans thirty-five years.

Feast: June 9.

SEE ALSO BEATIFICATION; CONTEMPLATIVE LIFE; DIRECTION, SPIRITUAL; ITALY, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; RELIGIOUS (MEN AND WOMEN).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

"Blessed Luigi Boccardo," Patron Saints Index, available from http://saints.sqpn.com/saintl3d.htm (accessed August 6, 2009).

Congregation for the Causes of Saints, "Rite of Beatification of Luigi Boccardo: Greeting of Cardinal José Saraiva Martins at the Conclusion of Mass," Vatican Web site, April 14, 2007, available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/congregations/csaints/documents/rc_con_csaints_doc_20070414_beatif-boccardo_en.html (accessed August 6, 2009).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Luigi Boccardo (1861–1936)," Vatican Web site, April 14, 2007, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_lit_doc_20070414_boccardo_en.html(accessed August 6, 2009).

Elizabeth Inserra
Independent Scholar
New York, N.Y. (2010)

BOLSHEVISM

Bolshevism is the ideology of the Russian revolutionary party that overthrew the Provisional Government in October 1917, and established the world's first Communist government. The origins and development of Bolshevism are closely linked to the work of Vladimir Lenin (1870–1924), a lawyer and professional revolutionary active in the Russian Social Democratic Labor Party (RSDLP), a revolutionary party inspired by the ideas of Karl MARX. Marxist or Social Democratic ideas had first entered Russia in the 1880s, leading to a small, clandestine movement that took overt political form with the foundation of the RSDLP in 1898. At the Second Congress of the RSDLP held in London in 1903, the party fragmented into two factions. These factions were thereafter known as Bolsheviks and Mensheviks, based on the roots of the Russian words for majority and minority. After several attempts at reunification failed, the split was formalized in 1912, when a separate Bolshevik party was formed.

Bolshevism and Menshevism shared a common Marxist belief in an inevitable proletarian revolution that would create a stateless communist society, but the philosophies differed in important ways. Shaped by Lenin's prolific writings, especially the influential pamphlet What Is to Be Done?, finished in 1902, Bolshevism came to be identified with the advocacy of a centralized and highly disciplined party of professional revolutionaries, a different entity than the loosely organized mass revolutionary party defended by Mensheviks. Bound by the principle of democratic centralism, which Lenin defined as "freedom of discussion, unity of action," the party was to serve as a revolutionary vanguard to lead the working classes toward power. The Bolshevik party was indeed more cohesive than its socialist rivals, the Mensheviks or the Social Revolutionaries. But it would be erroneous to see the Bolshevik party as rigidly controlled by Lenin or devoid of internal ideological controversies. From the disputes among the Bolshevik émigré community of the pre-1917 period, featuring accomplished Bolshevik theoreticians, such as Aleksandr Bogdanov (1873–1928), to the Worker's Opposition that questioned Lenin during the early years of Soviet power, ideological disputes were a hallmark of Bolshevism. Yet, they were also accompanied by an ultimate deference to Lenin's position as leader of the party.

Revolutions of 1905 and 1917. The revolutionary consciousness of urban workers and peasants during the revolution of 1905 caught both Bolsheviks and Mensheviks by surprise. At the height of the revolution, workers created a self-governing institution, the soviet (workers' council), while across large areas of Russia, peasants rose and seized their landlords' estates. Although the revolution ultimately failed in overthrowing the Russian monarchy, it created a legacy of worker self-rule that would be revived after the successful revolution of February 1917. It also provided Bolshevism with another important ideological tenet relevant to a country that was still overwhelmingly peasant: the belief in the possibility and necessity of a revolutionary alliance between workers and peasants, which went against traditional Marxist contempt for the revolutionary potential of the peasantry.

The February revolution of 1917 that led to the abdication of Nicholas II (1868–1918) was not expected by revolutionaries, but this time they were better prepared to seize a favorable political opportunity. Through a revived Petrograd Soviet, workers and their advocates became a de facto shadow government. But whereas the moderate socialist parties ended up as major partners in the Provisional Government that succeeded the deposed tsar, Lenin guided the Bolsheviks away from this policy of "dual power," insistently calling for the proletariat to overthrow the Provisional Government. Whereas the moderate socialists found themselves tangled in the defense of an unpopular war, the Bolsheviks gained great popularity through their steady opposition to WORLD WAR I, the ongoing war that had hastened the end of the Russian monarchy. The Bolsheviks' consistent opposition to the war gave them an issue that resonated with the Russian urban masses in the summer and fall of 1917.

Under simple but effective banners such as Land, Peace, and Bread! and All Power to the Soviets!, the Bolsheviks gained popular support, especially in the urban centers of Moscow and Petrograd (St. Petersburg), and obtained majorities in the soviets of these two cities. On November 7, 1917, claiming to act on behalf of the soviets, they overthrew the Provisional Government in Petrograd and moved to consolidate control throughout the vast Russian Empire. Opposition came from many quarters—monarchists, businessmen, liberals, even socialists—and it was only after three years of a bloody and cruel civil war that the Bolsheviks were able to establish themselves as rulers of Russia.

As the Russian Civil War raged and the Bolsheviks desperately held on to power, Bolshevism took on increasingly authoritarian, even militaristic, overtones. Popular positions from 1917 were diluted or abandoned. Worker control of factories gave way to party control of factories; soviet democracy as represented by various socialist parties gave way to a one-party state, and a powerful secret police grew from a supposedly temporary feature of Bolshevik rule. Party leaders and activists defended these changes as necessary for political survival. Critics of the Bolsheviks argued that these were logical conclusions of the authoritarian tendencies inherent in Lenin's view of an elite revolutionary party leading the masses. The authoritarian urge eventually spread to the party itself, and in 1921 the Tenth Party Congress banned factions within the party.

Bolshevism and Religion. Despite a few initial nods in the direction of religious tolerance, the Bolsheviks followed a policy of extreme SECULARISM. In 1918 the new Soviet government allowed the election of a new patriarch to lead the Orthodox Church, the first since Peter the Great (1672–1725) had abolished the patriarchate in the early 1700s. However, following the death of Patriarch Tikhon in 1925, the government prevented the election of a new patriarch until 1943, when WORLD WAR II compelled the government to temporarily relax its anti-religious policies. Throughout the 1920s churches were closed or nationalized to serve as worker clubs, museums, or storage sites. Propaganda posters played on deep-seated and widespread anticlerical feelings in Russian society and regularly depicted gluttonous priests working together with capitalists and foreign enemies of the revolution. The late 1920s and early 1930s in particular marked a period of heightened anti-religious persecution, best embodied in the activities of the League of the Militant Godless. All major religions alike—Orthodox, Protestant, and Catholic Christianity, JUDAISM, ISLAM, and BUDDHISM—felt the wrath of the government's persecution.

Rise of Leninism. With the Bolsheviks in power, the term Bolshevism gradually gave way to the term Communism in Russian political usage. In 1919, at a time when the new regime was fighting for its very survival, the Bolshevik Party was renamed All-Russian Communist Party, a conscious break with the social democratic roots that the party shared with the Mensheviks and the international socialist movement. In 1925 the party became known as the All-Union Communist Party (Bolshevik), a reflection of the multi-ethnic nature of the recently established Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Lenin's death in 1924 at a relatively early age deprived Bolshevism of its leading theoretician and pragmatic leader. It ushered in an increasingly bitter power struggle for succession among his closest collaborators, especially Leon Trotsky (1879–1940), Nikolai Bukharin (1888–1938), and Josef STALIN. By the end of the 1920s, Stalin had outmaneuvered his rivals and positioned himself as Lenin's heir by identifying his political platform with the set of ideas now known as Leninism, which was elevated to the level of political dogma.

As the revolutionary struggles of 1917 to 1921 receded, Bolshevism became increasingly identified with the pre-revolutionary period or the early years of the Soviet Union. As Stalin consolidated his power, older party members were perceived to be a threat to the highly suspicious, if not paranoid, dictator. Known as Old Bolsheviks, they were prominent targets of the mass political repression and executions that devastated Soviet society in the mid and late 1930s. Stalin cast prominent party members and former rivals—such as Bukharin, as well as Lev Kamenev (1883–1936) and Grigorii Zinoviev (1883–1936), two veteran Bolsheviks—as prominent villains in the show trials of the 1930s and sentenced them to death. Exiled in Mexico, Trotsky was assassinated by a Stalinist agent in 1940. Nevertheless, the term Bolshevik was not removed from the ruling party's official name until the Nineteenth Communist Party Congress of 1952, when it was dropped in favor of the designation, Communist Party of the Soviet Union (CPSU).

Khrushchev and Brezhnev. Following Stalin's death in March 1953, his successor, Nikita Khrushchev (1894–1971), sought to disassociate the CPSU from the excesses of Stalinist rule, while preserving the basic foundation of Communist rule. After the closing ceremonies of the Twentieth Communist Party Congress in February 1956, he delivered a secret speech to a group of specially selected delegates, where he publicly criticized the repression of Old Bolsheviks and the extensive system of labor camps known later as gulags, labeling them as deviations from Communist principles and blaming them on Stalin's efforts to build a "cult of personality." An inconsistent campaign of de-Stalinization followed, aimed at reducing Stalin's mark on COMMUNISM and the Communist party, while restoring Lenin and Leninist ideals to their previous primary positions. While Khrushchev's reform was welcomed by some elements of Soviet society, especially the intelligentsia, influential members of the Communist party saw it as erratic and ultimately removed him from leadership in October 1964, and replaced him with Leonid Brezhnev (1906–1982).

By the 1960s the ideological debates that had been a hallmark of Bolshevism in the pre-revolutionary period and of Communism in the first decade of Soviet power had long disappeared from Russian and Soviet political life. During Brezhnev's long tenure as General Secretary (1964–1982), an aging leadership consolidated its hold on key levels of power in the Communist Party and state bureaucracies. It successfully blocked an overdue reform of the Soviet economy and political system suffering from the strains of a costly arms race with the United States, low economic productivity, nationalist pressures in the non-Russian republics, and generational tensions similar to those faced by Western countries.

Four Bolshevik Leaders. Lenin's successors in power in the Soviet Union, on their way to a meeting of the Central Executive Committee of the Comunist Party, are seen in June 1925, in Moscow. From left are: Josef Stalin, Alexei Rykov, Lev Kamenev, and Gregory Zinoviev. AP IMAGES

Decline of Communism. It fell to Brezhnev's eventual successor, Mikhail Gorbachev (1931–), a reformist younger leader who ruled from 1985 to 1991, to preside over a period of rapid and dramatic change in the Soviet Communist system that ultimately led to its demise. Timid and unsuccessful economic reforms known as restructuring (perestroika) were accompanied by a more far-reaching political and cultural openness (glasnost). Although non-Communist political parties were not yet legalized, nationalist, reformist, and democratic coalitions took shape in Russia and many of the other Soviet republics. Their very existence questioned the foundations of Communist rule as defined by Lenin in the revolutionary era: one-party rule and a leading role in Soviet society. A final attempt by conservative forces in the Communist party and the state security apparatus in August 1991 to reverse the momentum of change by overthrowing Gorbachev was poorly executed and defeated, opening the way for the emergence of Boris Yeltsin (1931–2007), a reformist Communist who had been elected president of the Russian republic of the Soviet Union.

The dissolution of the Soviet Union in December 1991 marked the end of formal Communist rule in the lands of the former Soviet Union. In many former Soviet republics, Communist leaders weathered the transition to post-Soviet life by reinventing themselves as nationalist or democratic leaders. In Russia proper, Communists, now under the banner of the Communist Party of the Russian Federation (CPRF), went into opposition as the single largest party, contesting several elections in the 1990s, but never gaining a majority of votes. In matters of religion, the end of Communist rule led to a period of relative religious freedom. The Russian Federation redefined itself as a multi-confessional state of four major faiths (Russian Orthodoxy, Islam, Judaism, and Buddhism). Previous restrictions on religious practice were either abolished or relaxed, churches and temples were rebuilt or reopened, and seminaries were once again allowed to train religious in unrestricted numbers. This religious pluralism, however, did not extend equally to all religious denominations. Non-Orthodox Christians, in particular Catholics and members of evangelical Protestant denominations, complained of limits and restrictions on their ability to practice, although in this case these came not from the ruling party or the state, but rather from religious authorities zealous to protect their newly restored powers.

SEE ALSO MARXISM; ORTHODOX AND ORIENTAL ORTHODOX CHURCHES; RUSSIA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; TIKHON, PATRIARCH OF MOSCOW.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Moshé Lewin, Lenin's Last Struggle, translated by A.M. Sheridan Smith (Ann Arbor, Mich. 2005).

Lars T. Lih, Lenin Rediscovered: What Is to Be Done? In Context (Leiden, The Netherlands 2006).

Robert Service, Lenin: A Biography (Cambridge, Mass. 2000).

Alan I. Wildman, The Making of a Workers' Revolution: Russian Social Democracy, 1891–1903 (Chicago 1967).

Robert C. Williams, The Other Bolsheviks: Lenin and His Critics, 1904–1914 (Bloomington, Ind. 1986).

Mauricio Borrero
Professor, Department of History
St. John's University (2010)

BONHOMME, PIERRE, BL.

Priest, founder of the Congregation of the Sisters of Our Lady of Calvary, Gramat, France; b. July 4, 1803, Gramat; d. September 9, 1861, Gramat; beatified March 23, 2003, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

A pious and scholarly child, Pierre was called to his vocation at an early age. He began religious training in 1818 and was ordained on December 23, 1837, at the major seminary of Cahors. The Church faced great challenges in the aftermath of the FRENCH REVOLUTION; its political influence had waned, and the number of clergy had declined. Young Fr. Bonhomme understood the need to revitalize the relationship between the Church and the community. Returning to Gramat, and ultimately assuming the duties of parish priest, his early work included establishing secular schools for boys as well as an academy for those preparing to enter the seminary. He created a group called the Children of Mary to support and encourage the community's young women, whose members in turn performed many social services in the town. To further address the great need of the sick and elderly in Gramat, Fr. Bonhomme established a facility to care for them. In 1933 he founded the Congregation of the Sisters of Our Lady of Calvary to staff this institution; members of the Children of Mary were among the order's first initiates. The diocese of Cahors granted approval for the order in 1834.

While continuing his work at the parish in Gramat, Fr. Bonhomme, a gifted speaker, preached throughout the surrounding region, convincing many young women to join the congregation he had established. In 1836, after attending a Trappist retreat, Fr. Bonhomme considered joining a contemplative order; the diocese hierarchy refused permission, and the devoted priest continued his community and missionary work. Although tireless preaching and the harsh climate of the Lot region had threatened his voice previously, in 1848 Fr. Bonhomme lost his voice completely and was diagnosed with a disease of the larynx. He could no longer speak in public, but he continued the work of the congregation by setting up new communities throughout France. These groups established schools for deaf children and deaf-mutes (including those in Mayrinhac-Lentour and Paris) and worked among the mentally ill and the poor. Fr. Bonhomme dedicated the remainder of his life to completing a Rule for the congregation and identifying opportunities for the sisters to expand their work.

From a humble start, the congregation has expanded its presence to France, Brazil, Argentina, Guinea, Ivory Coast, and the Philippines, and it presently has about 250 members.

Fr. Bonhomme is the first priest from the diocese of Cahors to be beatified. At his BEATIFICATION, Pope John Paul II declared, "May Fr. Bonhomme encourage us to become familiar with Scripture, to love our Savior in order to be his untiring witnesses by our words and our life."

Feast: September 9.

SEE ALSO FRANCE, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; RELIGIOUS (MEN AND WOMEN); TRAPPISTS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

"Blessed Pierre Bonhomme," Patron Saints Index, available from http://saints.sqpn.com/saintp5h.htm (accessed August 6, 2009).

Paul Burns, Butler's Lives of the Saints: The Third Millennium (London 2005).

John Paul II, "Cappella Papale for the Beatification of 5 Servants of God" (Homily, March 23, 2003), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/homilies/2003/documents/hf_jp-ii_hom_20030323_beatif_en.html (accessed August 6, 2009).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Fr Pierre Bonhomme (1803–1861)," Vatican Web site, March 23, 2003, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_ lit_doc_20030323_bonhomme_en.html (accessed August 6, 2009).

Elizabeth Inserra
Independent Scholar
New York, N.Y. (2010)

BONIFACIO (DI PIRANO), FRANCESCO GIOVANNI, BL.

Priest and MARTYR; b. September 7, 1912, Piran, Istria (now Croatia); d. September 11, 1946, Villa Gardossi, Istria (now Croatia); beatified October 4, 2008, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

The second of seven children born to a poor family, Francesco entered the seminary at Capodistria at the age of twelve. He was ordained a priest in the Cathedral of San Giusto in Trieste on December 27, 1936. Don Francesco became parochial vicar in Cittanova soon after, and in 1939 was appointed to Villa Gardossi, a town of about 1,300 people situated between Buie and Grisignana. The community was very poor; Don Francesco worked tirelessly to provide for the spiritual and temporal welfare of the people.

On September 8, 1943, Italy announced its surrender to the Allied forces. Istria, which had remained largely unaffected by the war, became a key location in the struggle between the German occupying army and remnants of the Italian fascists and the Communist partisans of the Yugoslav Liberation Front, led by Josip Broz Tito. When the war ended in 1945, the Communist government of Yugoslavia claimed most of the area. Don Francesco had spent the difficult years between 1943 and 1945 protecting the population from aggression from both the fascists and the partisans. With the end of the war and the rise of COMMUNISM, the Catholic Church came under attack. Don Francesco continued his ministry and his work with the lay organization Azione Cattolica (CATHOLIC ACTION). His unwavering faith and vocal objection to the repression of the Communist regime made him a target of the new government.

There is little known about the actual events surrounding Don Francesco's murder. He disappeared on the night of September 11, 1946. It is believed that he was killed that night and his body disposed of in a foiba (a kind of sinkhole found in the area). The foibe massacres, as they are commonly called, were murders committed in Istria in the years following the Italian surrender. Much about the killings remains unresolved and uninvestigated; indeed, there is no consensus on facts as basic as the number of victims. Since there were no direct witnesses to Don Francesco's death or abduction, some have questioned Pope Benedict XVI's decision to grant BEATIFICATION.

Despite controversy surrounding the manner of Don Francesco's death, there is no doubt as to his devotion to the Church and dedication to the people he served. At the beatification ceremony, which took place in the Trieste cathedral in which he was ordained, Archbishop Angelo Amato invoked the sacrifices of modern day martyrs living under oppressive regimes throughout the world. Don Francesco's brother Giovanni, eighty-six, was present to witness Don Francesco's elevation.

Feast: September 11.

SEE ALSO CROATIA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; FASCISM;WORLD WAR II.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

"Blessed Francesco Giovanni Bonifacio," Patron Saints Index, available from http://saints.sqpn.com/blessed-francesco-giovanni-bonifacio/ (accessed August 6, 2009).

Rita Corsi, "Beatificazione di don Bonifacio: La cronaca," Vita Nuova (October 9, 2008), available from http://www.vitanuovatrieste.it/index.php?option=content&task=view&id=2073 (accessed August 6, 2009).

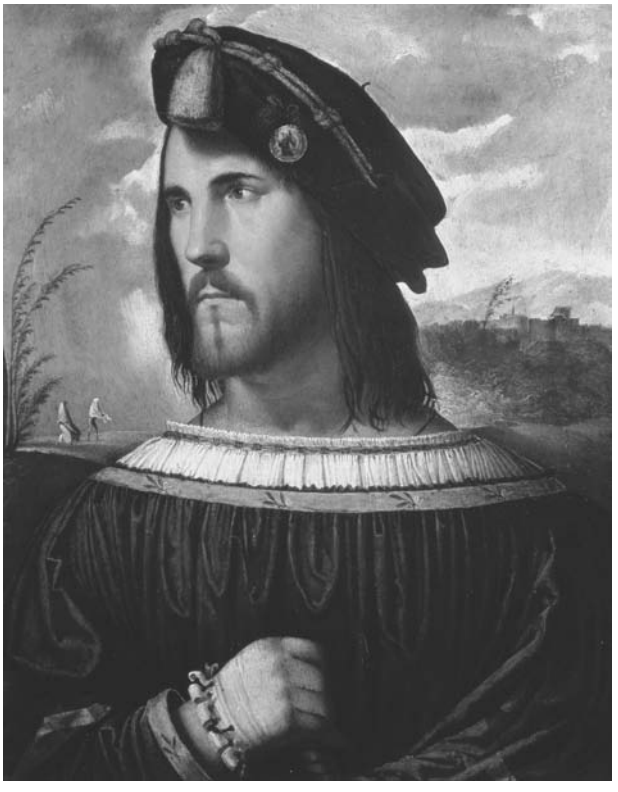
Sergio Galimberti, "Biografia di don Francesco Bonifacio," Vita Nuova (July 4, 2008), available from http://www.vitanuovatrieste.it/content/view/1720/35/ (accessed August 6, 2009).

Chris Hedges, "In Trieste, Investigation of Brutal Era Is Blocked," The New York Times (April 20, 1997), available from http://www.nytimes.com/1997/04/20/world/in-trieste-investigation-of-brutal-era-is-blocked.html?scp=1&sq=In%20Trieste,%20Investigation%20of%20Brutal%20Era%20Is%20Blocked&st=cse (accessed August 6, 2009).

"Il martirio di don Bonifacio ora è nella storia: Folla, applausi e commozione a San Giusto," Il Piccolo (October 5, 2008), available from http://ricerca.quotidianiespresso.it/ilpiccolo/archivio/ilpiccolo/2008/10/05/nz_23_apre.html (accessed August 6, 2009).

Elizabeth Inserra
Independent Scholar
New York, N. Y. (2010)

BORGIA, CESARE



Duke of Valentinois and Romagna, model for MACHIAVELLI's The Prince; b. circa 1475, likely in Rome; d. March 12, 1507, Viana, Navarre, Spain.

Cesare Borgia led a colorful, often violent life that sheds light on the RENAISSANCE papacy. Cesare's career reflects the prominent role of familial interests at the papal curia and the more secular orientation of its ambitions. Cesare was the illegitimate son of Cardinal Rodrigo de Lanzol y Borja, who became Pope ALEXANDER VI in 1492, and Vannozza de' Cattenei, a longtime mistress about whom little is known. He was brother to Gioffre Borgia and Giovanni Borgia, both of whom also served in papal government, as well as the notorious Lucrezia Borgia, and he was half-brother to Pedro Luis de Borja and Girolama de Borja.

The Borgia family came from Spain to Italy in the mid-fifteenth century when the Aragonese took control of the Kingdom of Naples. After studying law in Perugia and Pisa, Cesare embarked on a career in the Church. He became bishop of Pamplona by age fifteen and cardinal three years later. In 1497 Cesare's brother Giovanni, who was captain general for the papacy, suddenly died. Suspicions fells on Cesare, who had a dalliance with his sister-in-law, Sancha of Aragon. The next year, Cesare became the first person ever to resign from the cardinalate in order to pursue a military career. He soon became a brilliant mercenary warlord (condottiero). Louis XIII of France named him duke of Valentinois in return for his support during the French invasion of Italy in 1499. The duchy earned him the enduring sobriquet "Valentino." Cesare cemented his ties with France through marriage with Charlotte d'Albret, sister of John III, king of Navarre, on May 10, 1499. They had a daughter, Louise Borgia (1500–1553), while Cesare fathered no fewer than eleven illegitimate children with other women.

Alexander VI initially supported Ferdinand of Aragon, whom Cesare, acting as papal legate, crowned king of Naples in 1497. Despite his priestly office, Cesare even hoped to marry Ferdinand's daughter, Carlotta, but was cruelly rejected. But the pope soon played a double game by also currying favor with the French. French intervention in Italian affairs in the 1490s had led to the collapse of the MEDICI regime in Florence in 1494, and then the ouster in 1499 of the duke of Milan, Ludovico SFORZA. As a result, a vacuum of power was created in central and northern Italy that Pope Alexander VI hoped his family could fill. Accordingly, Alexander and Cesare set out on a policy both to expand the Papal States and create a territorial base for the Borgia family under Cesare's tutelage. Alexander used his powers of appointment to depose all the bishops in Romagna and the Marche in order to clear the way for men loyal to him. He also stacked the College of Cardinals with new cardinals for a price that helped Cesare hire leading mercenary condottieri, such as Oliverotto da Fermo, Gian Paolo Baglioni, Vitellozzo Vitelli, and Giulio and Paolo ORSINI. Cesare also later hired Leonardo da Vinci as a military engineer to consult on fortification construction and sieges. Alexander entrusted Cesare with command of the papal army. He set his sights on conquering the towns of Imola and Forlì, ruled by Caterina Sforza, in the Romagna just southeast of Bologna to secure the main road to Rimini. His success led to his appointment to the lucrative post of gonfaloniere of justice for the Papal States.

Borgia, Cesare (1475–1507). Ruthless and cunning, Cesare served as the inspiration for Machiavelli's ideal of the qualities necessary to be a great ruler. ALTOBELLO MELONI/THE BRIDGEMAN ART LIBRARY/GETTY IMAGES

This initial momentum set the stage for Cesare's phenomenal rise that so astounded Machiavelli and his contemporaries. Cesare drove Giovanni Sforza, who was married to his sister Lucrezia, out of Pesaro and later had him murdered; he also ousted Pandolfo MALATESTA from Rimini, and forced Astorre III Manfredi to surrender Faeza. Cesare soon had Manfredi murdered, too. These vicious victories secured Cesare's lines of communication and control across Romagna, over which his father made him duke in 1501. Cesare's administration, while often harsh, nonetheless brought order to this unruly region and won the admiration of Machiavelli, who convinced Piero Soderini, the gonfaloniere of Florence, to hire Cesare to besiege Piombino, a key port town near the island of Elba. Rather than hand Piombino over when it fell in 1502, Cesare claimed the lordship as his own as he eyed the conquest of Tuscany. Meanwhile, Louis XII of France gave Cesare command of the main French expeditionary force sent to drive the Aragonese out of southern Italy. In June 1501 he defeated forces under Prospero and Fabrizio Colonna at the sieges of Naples and Capua. With his grateful French allies controlling lands to the south of the Papal States and a weakened and isolated republican regime in Florence, little stood in the way of Borgia control of all of central Italy except for the tiny independent lordships, such as the Montefeltros in Urbino and Varanos in Camerino in the Marche. In June 1502 Cesare captured these places by stealth rather than force, and soon set his sights on the main prize in Romagna, the city of Bologna, nominally under the papacy. However, several of his condottieri, such as Oliverotto da Fermo and Vitellozzo Vitelli, conspired with local deposed lords to foment revolts against Cesare's domination. In December 1502, facing imminent defeat, Cesare famously tricked them into agreeing to a meeting at the castle of Senigallia to discuss reconciliation. They arrived, and on New Year's Eve he had them strangled—a masterpiece of deceit singled out by Machiavelli in chapter seven of The Prince.

Machiavelli saw in Cesare's meteoric career the precarious nature of worldly success based on good fortune and bravura. Cesare owed his success primarily to the papal patronage dispensed by his father. Just as he planned to invade Tuscany in summer 1503, Cesare suffered a double stroke of bad luck when both he and his father fell gravely ill. Alexander VI died on August 18, while Cesare remained bedridden in the CASTEL SANT'ANGELO. The ensuing conclave of cardinals was fairly evenly divided between Borgia clients and an opposition faction led by Cardinal Giuliano DELLA ROVERE, a longtime enemy of the Borgias. Still weakened by his illness, Cesare agreed in late September both to the election of a compromise candidate, Cardinal Francesco Todeschini Piccolomini, who took the name Pope PIUS III, and to quit Rome to return to Romagna to quell a revolt. However, Pius III died three weeks later, which paved the way for the elevation of Della Rovere as Pope JULIUS II, nicknamed Il Papa Terribile. Julius II wasted no time in eliminating Cesare from the scene and confiscating his lands for the Papal States. Cesare was soon arrested near Perugia in Umbria by his erstwhile lieutenant, Gian Paolo Baglioni. Exiled to Spain in 1504, Cesare was briefly imprisoned but soon escaped in 1506 to take up a military post under his brother-in-law, King John III of Navarre. On March 12, 1507, Cesare died a soldier's death at the siege of Viana; he was a mere thirty-one years of age. Even the disposition of his remains aroused controversy in the centuries ahead. They were initially entombed beneath the altar of the Church of Santa Maria in Viana until the local bishop had them exhumed in 1537 for reburial in an unconsecrated site for notorious sinners outside the church. There they remained until 2007, when the Archbishop of Pamplona, the diocese Cesare held as a teenager in absentia, finally consented to moving them inside the church where they now attract the attention of tourists and history enthusiasts curious about this iconic Machiavellian prince.

SEE ALSO CARDINALS OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH; CHURCH, HISTORY OF, III (EARLY MODERN: 1500–1789); CURIA, ROMAN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Sarah Bradford, Cesare Borgia: His Life and Times (London 1976).

Ivan Cloulas, The Borgias, translated by Robert Gilda (New York 1989).

Christopher Hibbert, The Borgias and Their Enemies, 1431–1519 (Boston 2008).

Michael E. Mallett, The Borgias: The Rise and Fall of a Renaissance Dynasty (New York 1969).

Michael Wolfe
Professor of History
St. John's University, Queens, N.Y. (2010)

BOSSILKOV, EVGENIJ, BL.

Bishop, first blessed of Bulgaria, and first martyr of the Communist era; b. Belene, Bulgaria, Nov. 16, 1900; d. Sofia, Bulgaria, Nov. 11, 1952; beatified on March 15, 1988 by Pope John Paul II.

Given the name Vincent at birth by his LATIN-RITE family, he took the name Evgenij (Eugene) after receiving the habit of the Passionist congregation in Ere (Belgium) in 1919 where he had gone for novitiate and further seminary studies after his minor seminary years in Oresh and Rousse in Bulgaria. He was ordained to the presbyterate in 1926 and sent to Rome for further education at the Pontifical Institute for Eastern Church Studies (P.I.O.S.) where he received a doctorate after defending the thesis "The Union of the Bulgarians with the Church of Rome at the Beginning of XIII Century" (1931). Bossilkov returned to Bulgaria, where he was assigned first to the office of Bishop Damian Theelen of Nicopolis (Rousse) and later put in charge of St. Joseph's parish in the large Catholic village of Bardarski Gheran (1934). Bossilkov initiated a new style in dealing with parishioners, often going well beyond strictly spiritual needs, reaching out toward non-Catholics, especially among the intellectual and professional leaders throughout the country. He played soccer with the youth (for which petition has been made to name him patron of soccer) and hunted in the countryside with the adults.

After the Communist takeover in September of 1944, Bossilkov suffered the limitations imposed by the atheistic regime on the country and on the Church in particular. Documents indicate that he was shadowed by the intelligence service of the Communist underground long before the end of the war. When Bishop Theelen died in 1946, Bossilkov was appointed an administrator of the diocese. The following year he was named bishop. During this period, he worked closely with the apostolic delegate, Francesco Galloni, until the latter's expulsion from the country in December of 1948. At that point, persecution of the Church was escalated; all Catholic institutions were separated from the Church, religious orders were disbanded, and many priests and religious were arrested, questioned, and sent to prison. In 1952 a series of trials, some behind closed doors, deprived the Church of practically all able clergy.

In one of the trials, held September 30 to October 4, thirtyseven ecclesiastics were sentenced to prison, while four—Bl. Kamen VITCHEV (beatified May 26, 2002 by Pope John Paul II), Bl. Pavel DJIDJOV (beatified May 26, 2002 by Pope John Paul II), Bl. Josaphat CHICHKOV (beatified May 26, 2002 by Pope John Paul II, and Bishop Bossilkov—received death sentences. The evidence brought up during the examination of Bossilkov's cause shows that the real grounds for his harsh sentence was his refusal to head a schismatic national church. Half a century elapsed before documents could be produced (1992) that proved the execution had been carried out late in the night of Nov. 11, 1952. Bossilkov's grave is unknown, though his blood-stained shirt and pectoral cross were later returned to his family.

The canonization process was initiated in the West by the order of the Passionist Fathers in 1985. However, the regime in Bulgaria, not having recovered from the international uproar over their alleged connection with the attempt on the life of the pope (May 13, 1981), put great pressure on the Bulgarian bishops in the country. They in turn convinced church authorities in Rome to suspend the process (December 1985). When the political climate changed and normal diplomatic relations were established between Bulgaria and the Holy See in the summer of 1991, Bishop Samuil Djoundrin of Bossilkov's native diocese made formal petition that the process be resumed. Bossilkov was beatified March 15, 1988, by Pope John Paul II.

In his Homily during the Mass of Bossilkov's beatification, John Paul II said that this holy man,"became the Church's radiant glory in his country. A fearless witness to the Cross of Christ, he is one of the many victims sacrificed by atheistic communism in Bulgaria and elsewhere, in its plan to destroy the Church."

Feast: November 13.

SEE ALSO BULGARIA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; COMMUNISM; PASSIONISTS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Paul Burns and Alban Butler, Butler's Lives of the Saints: The Third Millenium; Supplement of New Saints and Blesseds (London: Burnes & Oates, 2003), 526-528.

Canonizationis seu Declarationis Martyrii Servi Dei Eugenii Bossilkov, C.P. Positio super Martyrio (Rome 1993).

Pierluigi Di Eugenio, Beato Eugenio Bossilkov. Morire per la fede (Teramo 1998).

Giorgio Eldarov, Bossilkov. Collection of articles in: Archivio cattolico bulgaro di Roma (Bulgarian Catholic Journal) 3 and 4 (1998) (in Bulgarian).

Victor Hoagland, CP, "A Modern Christian Martyr: Bishop Eugene Bossilkov, C.P.," available from http://www.cptryon.org/cpexams/bossilkov/bio.html (accessed October 5, 2009).

John Paul II, "Beatification of Three Servants of God," (Homily, March 15, 1998), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.net/holy_father/john_paul_ii/homilies/1998/documents/hf_jp-ii_hom_19980315_beatificazione_en.html (accessed July 7, 2009).

Rev. Giorgio Eldarov OFMConv
Director
Archivio cattolico bulgaro di Roma (Rome)

EDS (2010)

BOURGET, IGNACE

Second bishop of Montreal, Canada; b. October 30, 1799, Saint-Joseph-de-Lévis, Canada; d. June 8, 1885, Montreal.

Bourget attended secondary school in Quebec and began his work in theology there, finishing it in Montreal under J.J. Lartigue, the auxiliary bishop to whom he was secretary. When Montreal became a diocese (1836), Bourget was named vicar-general; the following year he was consecrated coadjutor bishop, and in 1840 he succeeded to the see.

His first concern was to obtain the priests and institutions needed in Montreal. He entrusted the direction of its Grand Seminary to the SULPICIANS. In 1841 he went to Europe and obtained the services of several OBLATES OF MARY IMMACULATE (1841), JESUITS, and Religious of the Sacred Heart (1842), and nuns of the Good Shepherd from Angers (1844). He also made arrangements for the introduction of other religious institutes: the Clerics of St. Viator and the Fathers, Brothers, and Sisters of Holy Cross (1847). He founded two institutes of charity—the SISTERS OF PROVIDENCE (1843) and the SISTERS OF MERCY (1847)—and two institutes of instruction: the Sisters of the Holy Names of Jesus and Mary (1844) and the Sisters of St. Anne (1848). He also welcomed into the diocese the Brothers of Charity of Gand (1865). He embraced and fostered the work of two earlier Canadian foundations: the Congrégation de Notre Dame (1698) and the GREY NUNS (1738).

Although a decisive man of action, Bourget was a great believer in prayer; he himself led a life of regular, meditative prayer and collaborated in the foundation of a Canadian contemplative institute, the Sisters of the Precious Blood (1861). He also established the Carmelites of Reims in Montreal (1875). His zeal was not limited to his own diocese, and he sent out to the poorest of the dioceses, and especially to the missions of the Pacific coast, numerous secular priests, monks, and nuns. "The best means of preserving the Faith," he said, "is to propagate it far and wide."

In concord with many bishops of his time, he favored ULTRAMONTANISM, or papal supremacy, and he had to withstand heavy attacks from liberals and the supporters of GALLICANISM of the period. When the Cathedral of St. James the Greater burned down, he purchased property closer to the new business center of the burgeoning city and erected in its stead a one-third-size replica of St. Peter's in the Vatican. Between 1868 and 1870 he raised four regiments of Papal Zouaves for the defense of Pope PIUS IX during the RISORGIMENTO.

Ten years after the foundation of Laval University at Quebec (1852), he tried to obtain an independent Catholic university for his episcopal city. Although his fifteen-year effort was unsuccessful in the short term, he advanced all the arguments that ultimately led to the establishment of the independent University of Montreal (1920).

Bourget recognized and defended the crucial role played by the Catholic faith in shaping and maintaining the cultural and political identity of French Canada as a distinct society within an increasingly Anglo-Protestant nation. His robust leadership, particularly in the areas of education, health care, and even the law, guaranteed the autonomy of the Catholic Church against those influences seeking to enforce assimilation in the wake of confederation (1867). His vision gave rise to a characteristically French-Canadian Catholicism that flourished in the civil province of Quebec until the late 1960s and the so-called Quiet Revolution.

No less important was the struggle he waged for the spiritual well-being of Montreal. By virtue of a privilege dating from the seventeenth century, which he himself had confirmed in 1843, the Seminary of Montreal was empowered to minister in perpetuity to the entire city as a single parish. Because of the rapid increase in the city's population (to 100,000 in 1860), this privilege became more burdensome than useful. In 1865 ROME granted Bourget the right to establish new parishes in the city in accordance with the needs of the faithful, thus enabling the Diocese of Montreal to progress at the same rate as the rest of the country during the second half of the nineteenth century. The dramatic rise in church attendance from roughly 30 percent in 1840 to well over 90 percent by the time of his death in 1885 can largely be credited to his zeal and industry. The prestige and the reputation for sanctity that accrued to him during his lifetime did not cease with his death; in 1903 a monument was erected to him in front of the cathedral, and his remains are interred in a marble tomb in the center of the bishops' mortuary chapel. Despite various informal initiatives over the twentieth century to promote his candidacy for BEATIFICATION and canonization, a formal cause has yet to be introduced by the Archdiocese of Montreal.

SEE ALSO CANADA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; CARMELITES; HOLY NAMES OF JESUS AND MARY, SISTERS OF THE; NOTRE DAME, SISTERS OF THE CONGREGATION DE; PRECIOUS BLOOD SISTERS; ST. ANNE, SISTERS OF; ST. PETER'S BASILICA; VIATORIANS; ZOUAVES, PAPAL.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Danielle Boisvert, Inventaire sommaire d'une collection de mandements, lettres pastoralres, et circulaires de Msgr. Ignace Bourget (1840–1858) (Montreal 1979).

Ignace Bourget, The Journal of the Bishop of Montreal, during a Visit to the Church Missionary Society's North-West America Mission, 2nd ed. (London 1849).

Frédéric Langevin, Mgr. Ignace Bourget, deuxième évêque de Montréal (Montreal 1931).

Adrien Leblond de Brumath, Monseigneur Bourget, archévêque de Marianapolis ancien, évêque de Montréal (Montreal 1885).

Roberto Perin, Ignace de Montréal: Artisan d'une identité nationale (Montreal 2008).

Léon Pouliot, Monseigneur Bourget et son temps, 5 vols. (Montreal 1955–1977).

Rev. Léon J. Pouliot SJ
Historical Researcher
Collège Sainte Marie, Montreal, Canada

Rev. Neil J. Roy
University of Notre Dame
Notre Dame, Ind. (2010)

BOY SCOUTS

The Boy Scouts—the most successful voluntary association of the twentieth, or American, century—was in fact a creature of the British Empire. Of course, so too was the United States of America, where scouting became a characteristic activity of youth. The founder of the organization was Robert Baden-Powell. Although later raised to the peerage, Baden-Powell was not born into a baronial family. Indeed, he was not even born a Baden-Powell (he was born Robert Stephenson Smyth Powell), but his mother thought the hyphenated surname suited her social ambitions. Her son Robert was not so grasping, but his social unease certainly informed the character of the Scouts. The old language of rank and deference did not ring true in modern ears, but young working-class and lower middle-class boys were still in need of discipline. Progress, though welcome, brought with it decay, and this was further complicated by the international crises that defined the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.

Baden-Powell's birth and death years were critical moments in British history: He was born in 1857, the year of the Indian Mutiny, when the British Empire faced down its greatest challenge, and he died in 1941, when the imperial mantle was passed on to American shoulders. Baden-Powell was a scholarship boy at Charterhouse, one of the kingdom's best public schools and one of its formative upper-class institutions. He thrived there but failed his OXFORD entrance exams. He went straight into the army, receiving a lieutenancy in the 13th Hussars, one of its poshest regiments. Baden-Powell's background and abbreviated education were liabilities, and he chafed against extravagant regimental tradition. Postings in India and Africa encouraged him to propose and practice a more flexible style of soldiering, one suited to the frontier but also to modern manners. His Aids to Scouting was published in 1899, when he was commanding the garrison in besieged Mafeking, South Africa. The siege lasted over two hundred days, and news of Baden-Powell's successful resistance was one of the highlights of an otherwise dispiriting Boer War.

Much of the Boy Scouts' prodigious growth can be attributed to Baden-Powell's celebrity, for Mafeking had made him a national hero. He did not invent the Scouts out of whole cloth, however. Boys' Brigades, often sponsored by churches, were already mustering in British cities, and the urban demand for frontier reinvigoration must be recognized as a key to scouting's appeal. Some of these brigades, along with select branches of the YMCA, began to use Aids to Scouting as an organizational tool. Hearing of this, the author thought he might patent his own brand of demilitarized scouts. He developed the brand in conversations with other youth organizers, including Ernest Thompson Seton, the nature illustrator and leader of the Woodcraft movement. Seton would be the first chief scout of the Boy Scouts of America, though he quickly became disillusioned with Scouting's continued martial aspect.

Baden-Powell's Scouting for Boys was published in 1908. Both it and the organization for which it was scripture were galloping successes. The Boy Scouts offered hierarchy without the seemingly antiquated trammels of class. Not for nothing are Scouts' achievements marked by "merit badges." In an age of decay, the Scouts were to be models of hygiene, efficiency, and patriotism. Observers wondered—and wonder still—if Scouting was a cousin to the uniformed, right-wing parties of interwar Europe. Baden-Powell admired the early MUSSOLINI, but then so did Winston Churchill. The founder of the Scouting movement resisted attempts to turn it into a cadet branch of national service, however. The organization eventually outgrew its military roots, and by the eve of the Second World War there were 5 million Boy Scouts and "Girl Guides."

This growth would continue after the war, especially in the United States, but challenges loomed. The Boy Scouts were members of a private corporation that assumed a public role. The relationship of public and private was now described by the language of rights and adjudicated by litigation. The Scouts were tested by this scrutiny, just as most religious bodies would be. Some Roman Catholics had been suspicious of Scout religiosity, but a greater number were enthusiastic about an organization that combined discipline (the better for maintaining ethnic and religious identity) with a vague but unimpeachable patriotism.

Those associations—like the Scouts and the churches—that tried to be representatively American while following restrictive and exclusionary policies have become increasingly controversial. For churches, the contentious issues have been their schools and the public money routed into them by subsidized busing and the vouchers attractive to many educational reformers. For the Boy Scouts, the issue has been discrimination. Can they, for example, keep acknowledged homosexuals out of their leadership ranks? The U.S. Supreme Court, in Boy Scouts of America v. Dale (2000), has said that they can. To some observers, such attention creates an image very different from that of the Scouts of yesteryear. Others, even more critical, have used the Court's decision to question the Scouts' ability to be what they once assuredly were: the representatives of a vigorous modernity.

SEE ALSO CATHOLIC YOUTH ORGANIZATION; HOMOSEXUALS, PASTORAL CARE OF.

Jamboree. Thousands of Boy Scouts render the Scout salute as they recite the Pledge of Allegiance during the Boy Scout Jamboree, Sunday, July 31, 2005, at Fort AP Hill in Bowling Green, VA. AP IMAGES

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Michael Rosenthal, The Character Factory: Baden-Powell and the Origins of the Boy Scout Movement (New York 1986).

Kathleen M. Sullivan, "The New Religion and the Constitution," Harvard Law Review 116, no.5 (2003): 1397–1421.

Timothy A. Milford
Associate Professor, Department of History
St. John's University, New York (2010)

BOYS TOWN

Fr. Edward FLANAGAN (1886–1948) founded a home for abandoned boys in Omaha, Nebraska, in 1917, which quickly grew to become known as Boys Town, one of the largest and most influential childcare facilities and programs in American history. The original site, a rundown mansion that initially housed only five boys, was replaced by a bigger home within a year and then a much larger 160-acre farm in 1921. The program's success and rapid expansion led the state of Nebraska to incorporate Boys Town as an independent village in 1936, at which time it received its own post office. The Hollywood movie Boys Town followed in 1938, giving Fr. Flanagan's mission international recognition. In the years following World War II, the Nebraska facility continued to grow, new programs were launched throughout the United States, and Fr. Flanagan became a renowned international figure, influencing the creation and identity of new programs for orphaned and abandoned children around the world. In the 1970s Boys Town began to admit girls in crisis, who soon comprised about half its population, and it also diversified its services to meet the changing needs of abandoned, abused, neglected, and otherwise troubled children. In the twenty-first century Boys Town continues to provide a variety of important residential and non-residential services directly to thousands of children and families each year, as well as sponsoring training and educational programs that indirectly influence hundreds of thousands more.

Early History. Edward J. Flanagan was born in Roscommon, Ireland, in 1886 and immigrated to the United States in 1904. He was ordained a Catholic priest in 1912 and was assigned to St. Patrick's Church in

Roughhousing. Father Flanagan, founder and director of Boys Town settlement (2nd row, 2L), crouching over to enjoy watching visitor Jack Dempsey putting up dukes with a little boy resident, as a huge group of boys watch from above on steps. ARAL/PIX INC./TIME LIFE PICTURES/GETTY IMAGES

Omaha, Nebraska, the following year. It was there, as a young priest, that he observed the enormous hardship and vile social conditions experienced by disenfranchised agricultural workers, who often ended up unemployed and homeless in cities like Omaha. He also observed that significant numbers of newly arriving immigrants were in similarly dire straits—many, like himself, from Ireland. Flanagan quickly focused on the need to help the children of these two groups, particularly the troubled boys who frequently became juvenile delinquents. Throughout his life Fr. Flanagan asserted that love could overcome hatred and often philosophized that "I have never really met a boy who wanted to be bad." In this regard he was quite a progressive social reformer, continually emphasizing the importance of environmental factors and the need for early intervention in solving pressing social problems.

Fr. Flanagan borrowed ninety dollars from an anonymous donor to purchase a dilapidated mansion in downtown Omaha in 1917. His work began with five orphaned boys that he rounded up from the neighboring streets, and he quickly developed an open-door policy, welcoming homeless and severely troubled boys regardless of their religious, ethnic, or racial identities. The boys attended school during the day and, after school, athletic and musical programs kept them out of trouble. Only a year later, finding that he needed a larger facility, Father Flanagan moved to yet another aging building, this one a former boarding house. Again, demand quickly dictated the need for a larger site, and in 1921 he obtained the former Overlook Farm, a 160-acre site on the outskirts of Omaha that had several buildings and extensive farmland, which could be used to grow food to feed the boys. Despite enormous financial challenges, Boys Town had become a reality.

In the 1930s Boys Town's population grew into the hundreds, leading the state of Nebraska to create Boys Town as an official village. Fr. Flanagan refused to surround his facility with fences, insisting repeatedly that it was a home, not a prison. As success stories spread far and wide, Hollywood producers approached Fr. Flanagan in 1937 about making a movie about the home. At first he was skeptical and rejected initial offers but, when presented with the script of the movie that would be made in 1938, he finally accepted. MGM studios donated 5,000 dollars to Boys Town for the rights to Fr. Flanagan's story. The movie told the tale of Whitey Marsh, a fictional character mélange who ended up transformed by his Boys Town experience. Mickey Rooney (1920–), an established star, played Whitey, and an even mightier Hollywood icon, Spencer Tracy (1900–1967), played Fr. Flanagan. Shot on site, the film became an instant box-office blockbuster that remained popular with audiences seven decades later. Tracy followed Fr. Flanagan in his daily activities for a week to study and impersonate him as accurately as he could. The phenomenal success of the movie contributed enormously to the recognition of Boys Town and to the far-reaching influence of its philosophy.

The Mission Expands. At the conclusion of World War II, President Truman called on Fr. Flanagan to aid in global reconstruction. While continuing to direct Boys Town, Father Flanagan traveled to Asia and Europe to advise in American and international efforts to establish quality care for the millions of children orphaned and impoverished by the horrors of war. Exhausted from overwork, Fr. Flanagan suffered a fatal heart attack in Berlin in 1948. He was buried in Boys Town, and his funeral drew international sorrow. President Truman visited his grave a few days later.

Msgr. Nicholas Wegner succeeded Fr. Flanagan as director (1948–1973) and oversaw the expansion of facilities and programs at Boys Town; among the most innovative was the Boys Town National Research Hospital. By the early 1970s Boys Town had a residential population of approximately 900 boys, and its ideas and practices were being emulated throughout the world.

The 1970s brought new needs and trends to the care of America's most troubled children, and once again Boys Town was on the cutting edge of innovation and progress. Under the directorship of Msgr. Robert Hupp (1973–1985), dormitories were replaced by smaller units, designed to replicate a family-home environment, in which married couples managed each unit of boys. In 1979 Boys Town began admitting girls. Under the direction of Fr. Valentine Peter (1985–2005), programs were created in fourteen states and the District of Columbia. In addition to maintaining residential programs, a plethora of services were also created for troubled youths and their families, and vast training and educational programs for both families and professionals were launched. Fr. Stephen Boes succeeded Fr. Peter as director in 2005.

SEE ALSO ADOPTION (IN THE BIBLE); FILM, THE CHURCH AND; NEBRASKA, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; MISSION AND MISSIONS; ORPHAN (IN THE EARLY CHURCH); SOCIAL JUSTICE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Boys Town, Boys Town: Saving Children, Healing Families, available from http://www.boystown.org (accessed April 12, 2008).

Charles P. Graves, Father Flanagan: Founder of Boys Town (Champaign, Ill. 1972).

Terry L. Hyland and Kevin Warneke, Dreams Fulfilled: Successful Stories from Boys Town, edited by Val J. Peter and Ron Herron (Boys Town, Neb. 1992).

James R. Ivey, Boys Town: The Constant Spirit (Chicago 2000).

Barbara A. Lonnborg and Thomas J. Lynch, eds., Father Flanagan's Legacy: Hope and Healing for Children (Boys Town, Neb. 2003).

Fulton Oursler and Will Oursler, Father Flanagan of Boys Town (Garden City, N.Y. 1949).

Fr. Val J. Peter, ed., What Makes Boys Town So Special: A Description of the Boys Town Family Home Program (Boys Town, Neb. 1986).

Robert R. Tomes
Professor of History
St. John's University, Jamaica N.Y. (2010)

BRADER, MARÍA CARIDAD, BL.

Foundress, Congregation of the Franciscan Sisters of Mary Immaculate, Tùquerres, Colombia; b. August 14, 1860, Kaltbrunn, Switzerland; d. February 27, 1943, Pasto, Colombia; beatified March 23, 2003, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

The only child of Joseph Sebastian Brader and María Anna Karolina Zahner, María Josefa Karolina grew up in a home that valued both devotion to God and secular education. Highly intelligent, her parents enrolled her in the best schools possible. She excelled first in her hometown and later at the Maria Hilf Institute in Alstätten, run by the Sisters of the Third Order Regular of St. Francis, where she ranked first among the intermediate students. Though encouraged to pursue further studies, in 1880 she entered the cloistered convent at the Maria Hilf Institute, taking the name Mary Charity of the Love of the Holy Spirit, or Sister Caritas. On August 22, 1882, she professed her final vows.

Because of her advanced education, Sister Caritas was assigned to the convent school, where she taught until she was presented with the opportunity, newly available to cloistered nuns, to do missionary work. Among the first and most enthusiastic of the volunteers, on June 19, 1888, the young nun, with a group of six others led by the convent's mother superior Maria Bernarda BÜTLER (canonized by Pope BENEDICT XVI on October 12, 2008), left Switzerland for Chone, Ecuador. Sister Caritas taught catechism to the children of that area until 1893, when she was transferred to a mission in Tùquerres, Colombia. The physical area was vast, including many types of terrain and climate; the majority of the population lived in abject poverty. Recognizing the need for more missionaries to serve the region adequately, that same year Sister Caritas and German priest Fr. Reinaldo Herbrand founded the Congregation of the Franciscan Sisters of Mary Immaculate in Tùquerres.

Originally composed of young Swiss women, members of the local population soon joined the new order. Reflecting her own upbringing, Mother Caritas, leader of the new congregation, encouraged the sisters to get the best training and education possible so as to serve the community to the greatest extent possible. She emphasized the need to balance an active life in the world by prayerful devotion to God and absolute acceptance of the Franciscan precept of poverty. Mother Caritas served as mother superior to the congregation from 1893 to 1919, and again from 1928 to 1940. The Holy See granted approval to the Franciscan Sisters of Immaculate Mary in 1933. The sisters continue their work in South America, Central America, the United States, Switzerland, Romania, Mali, and Benin.

At Mother Caritas's BEATIFICATION, Pope John Paul II stated that her life was a "[b]eautiful lesson of a missionary life dedicated to the service of God and of neighbor."

Feast: February 27.

SEE ALSO COLOMBIA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; FRANCISCANS, THIRD ORDER REGULAR; FRANCISCAN SISTERS; POVERTY, RELIGIOUS; RELIGIOUS (MEN AND WOMEN).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Paul Burns, Butler's Lives of the Saints: The Third Millennium (London 2005).

"Holy Father to Beatify Caritas Brader, Apostle of Latin American Indians," Zenit (March 21, 2003), available from http://zenit.org/article-6148?l=english95 (accessed August 6, 2009).

John Paul II, "Cappella Papale for the Beatification of Five Servants of God," (Homily, March 23, 2003), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/homilies/2003/documents/hf_jp-ii_hom_20030323_beatif_en.html (accessed August 6, 2009).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Mother María Caridad Brader (1860–1943)," Vatican Web site, March 23, 2003, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_lit_doc_20030323_brader_en.html (accessed August 6, 2009).

Elizabeth Inserra
Independent Scholar
New York, N.Y. (2010)

BRANDO, MARIA CRISTINA, BL.

Baptized Adelaide; foundress of the Sisters, Expiatory Victims of Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament (Oblation Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament), Casoria (Naples), Italy; b. May 1, 1856, Naples; d. January 20, 1906, Casoria; beatified April 27, 2003, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

Born to a wealthy Neapolitan family, Adelaide Brando was the daughter of Giovanni Giuseppe and Maria Concetta Marrazzo. Her early life was marked by tragedy, as her mother died days after Adelaide's birth. Uninterested in material things, the devout child attended Mass daily, took a vow of perpetual CHASTITY at the age of twelve, and openly articulated her desire to become a saint. Adelaide was prevented from following an early vocation, first by her father's refusal to grant permission for her to enter the convent, and later by her own poor health, which included chronic bronchitis. In 1876, with the approval of her father, she entered the monastery of the SACRAMENTINE NUNS and assumed the name Sister Maria Cristina of the IMMACULATE CONCEPTION. Soon after, poor health forced her to leave the monastery and return to the care of her family.

This setback did not deter Maria Cristina from her vocation. In 1878 she and her half-sister Concetta, who had left the POOR CLARES, moved into a house run by the Teresiane Sisters of Torre del Greco. There Maria Cristina worked to found a new religious order that reflected her devotion to the Blessed Sacrament. Thus was born the Congregation of the Sisters, Expiatory Victims of Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament, dedicated to the perpetual adoration of the Blessed Sacrament. In 1892 Maria Cristina and seventy-six adherents founded what would become their mother house in Casoria, north of Naples. She built a small cell next to the church where she spent each night, seated in a chair, praying and being close to the Blessed Sacrament. On July 20, 1903, the Vatican granted approval to the congregation, and later that year, Maria Cristina, now mother superior, took perpetual vows along with many of her sisters.

The congregation, also known as the Oblation Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament, is dedicated to service and charity for all those in need, especially children. Mother Maria Christina wrote that love of God and of others formed "two branches that originated from the same trunk." In addition to practicing contemplative devotion of the Blessed Sacrament, the sisters have established schools and orphanages, and they provide care to children and the elderly and infirm in Italy, Brazil, Columbia, Indonesia, and the Philippines.

At her BEATIFICATION, Pope John Paul II declared, "Her desire to take part in Christ's passion, as it were, 'overflowed' into educational works, for the purpose of making people aware of their dignity and open to the Lord's merciful love."

Feast: January 20.

SEE ALSO ITALY, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; RELIGIOUS (MEN AND WOMEN).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

"The Blessed Maria Cristina: Fallen in Love with the Eucharist," Oblation Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament Web site, available from http://www.beatamariacristina.org/mce1.htm (accessed August 10, 2009).

Paul Burns, Butler's Lives of the Saints: The Third Millennium (London 2005).

John Paul II, "Beatification of 6 Servants of God," (Homily, April 27, 2003), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/homilies/2003/documents/hf_jp-ii_hom_20030427_beatification_en.html (accessed August 10, 2009).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Maria Cristina Brando (1856–1906)," Vatican Web site, April 27, 2003, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_lit_doc_20030427_brando_en.html (accessed August 10, 2009).

Elizabeth Inserra
Independent Scholar
New York, N.Y. (2010)

BREVIARY

The breviary is the liturgical book containing the psalms, chants, readings, and orations (prayers) that constitute the Divine Office or canonical hours. Breviaries were used by monks and clergy in the West since the eleventh century and continued to be produced as manuscripts and later as printed books until the reforms following the Second Vatican Council, when the reformed Breviarium Romanum was published as the Liturgia Horarum (Liturgy of the Hours in the English version). The term breviary has also been used in an extended sense to designate the Divine Office itself. Using this sense of the term, general histories of the breviary may describe the structure of the Office and trace its history from its formative period before the sixth century to its standardization as the secular (or Roman) Office, normally observed by clergy, and the monastic Office. The focus of the present entry is the breviary in its strict sense as a liturgical book.

Breviaries bring together texts and sometimes music that had originally been found in diverse books used for the observance of the hours in the secular and monastic Office traditions: psalters containing the psalms, canticles, and other components of the ordinary Office; hymnaries and antiphonaries containing the chants used at the individual hours over the course of the year; various books containing the readings from Scriptures, patristic homilies, and saints' lives; and collectars containing the orations and short readings. These diverse Office books continued to serve a purpose and were still produced after breviaries began to appear, but the emergence of the breviary enabled all the components of the Office to be integrated in a single book.

Through examinations of large numbers of manuscripts, scholars in the past century have refined some of the earlier views concerning the breviary's original function, but there is still some uncertainty and some disagreement about which surviving books should be called breviaries. Although the Latin term breviarium means an abridgment or summary, in medieval usage it could refer to any compilations, and, conversely, other terms were often used for books that are now classified as breviaries. One usage of the term found in southern Italy by the beginning of the twelfth century is notable: a group of manuscripts containing various combinations of Office books also include an ordinal labeled breviarium sive ordo officiorum per totam anni decursionem, which concisely indicates the chants, readings, and orations used at the hours during the course of the year. The ordinal is not a breviary in what would become the standard sense, but both provide a means of setting out all the elements of the hours in context. An ordinal, however, contains only cues indicating the psalms, chants, readings, and prayers; in breviaries these are written out in full.

Diversity in the form and organization of early breviaries can make it difficult to compare their contents, since they may present similar repertories of chants and readings in fundamentally different ways. Certain primitive breviaries kept in distinct sections what had originally been found in separate books, but the fully formed breviaries that began to appear in the eleventh and twelfth centuries had all the elements integrated and presented as they were to be recited during the individual hours over the course of the year. This includes chants, readings, and orations proper to particular days in the liturgical year as well as items repeated each day or week (as part of the distribution of the 150 psalms and ordinary chants over the course of the week) and items shared by a number of saints' feasts (Commune sanctorum). Different arrangements could be used for combining proper and repeated items in a single volume.

Consequently, while some differences among breviaries reflect differences in their intended usage or in the actual selection of texts sung or recited at the hours, others simply reflect the diverse ways in which breviaries could be organized.

The most complete breviaries include a calendar indicating the dates of the fixed feasts, tables for determining the dates of the moveable observances, a Psalter containing the psalms and ordinary or seasonal material, a Temporale presenting the proper texts for the hours in the liturgical year (normally beginning with Saturday VESPERS before the first Sunday of ADVENT), a Sanctorale presenting the proper texts for saints' feasts of the year, and the Commune sanctorum as well as some additional contents. The Temporale and Sanctorale may be divided into winter and summer parts to form two-volume breviaries, and modern breviaries have separate volumes for winter, spring, summer, and autumn.

The more significant differences among breviaries pertain to their usage. Since the ninth century, the Roman and Benedictine Offices had become the standard traditions throughout much of the West for the observance of the hours by clergy and monks respectively. These two Office traditions for the most part used the same texts and both had the psalms distributed over the week at Nocturns, LAUDS, Prime, Terce, Sext, None, Vespers, and COMPLINE, but the psalms were distributed in different manners and the structure of the hours was not the same (for instance, at Nocturns on Sundays and feasts, the monastic Office has twelve lessons and responsories instead of nine). A monastic breviary can therefore be easily distinguished from a secular breviary. Within each tradition, some breviary manuscripts include music with the text of each chant while others supply just the text, and some are large choir breviaries while others are small portable breviaries. The latter often entailed the omission of some material and shortened readings, and it has been associated with the growth of the private recitation of the Office.

Further changes in the Roman Office were made possible by the production of reformed breviaries, in particular the thirteenth-century Breviary of the Roman Curia, adopted and developed by the FRANCISCANS; the Breviary of Pius V (1568); and the Breviary of Pius X (1911), which instituted a new weekly distribution of the psalms, superseded in turn by the four-week distribution over the five hours of the Liturgia Horarum (1971).

As the breviary had become synonymous with the Office per se, by the end of the MIDDLE AGES it began to be used even in Office traditions that had never utilized this type of book. In Milan, Ambrosian breviaries first appeared during the fifteenth century, and the revival of the Old Spanish Office in Toledo was made possible by the 1502 publication of a breviary compiled from early libri mistici of the Old Spanish rite.

SEE ALSO AMBROSIAN RITE; ANTIPHON; BOOK, THE PRINTED; CANTICLES, BIBLICAL; CHANT BOOKS, PRINTED EDITIONS OF; CURIA, ROMAN; FEASTS, RELIGIOUS; HOMILY; HYMNARY; LITURGICAL BOOKS OF THE ROMAN RITE; LITURGICAL CALENDAR, I: CATHOLIC; LITURGICAL MUSIC, THEOLOGY AND PRACTICE OF; LITURGICAL YEAR IN ROMAN RITE; LITURGY OF THE HOURS; PIUS V, POPE, ST.; PIUS X, POPE, ST.; PRAYER; PSALMS, BOOK OF; PSALTERS, METRICAL; VATICAN COUNCIL II.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

MONASTIC

Chrysogonus Waddell, ed., The Primitive Cistercian Breviary (Fribourg 2007).

The Monastic Breviary of Hyde Abbey, Winchester, edited by J.B.L. Tolhurst, 6 vols., Henry Bradshaw Society 61–71, 76, 78, 80 (London 1932–1942).

Breviarium Monasticum, 2 vols. (Turin 1963).

SECULAR

Breviarium ad usum insignis ecclesiae Sarum, edited by F. Procter and C. Wordsworth [from the 1531 edition], 3 vols. (Cambridge 1882; rpt. Westmead 1970).

Breviarium Romanum. Editio Princeps (1568) reprint edition, edited by Manlio Sodi and Achille Maria Triacca (Vatican City 1999).

OLD SPANISH

Breviarium secundum regulam beati Isidori, edited by A. Ortiz (Toledo 1502); revised edition by F.A. de Lorenzana, Breviarium Gothicum (Madrid 1775), reprinted in J.P. Migne, Patrologia Latina (Paris 1844–1864): 86.

STUDIES

Stanislaus Campbell. From Breviary to Liturgy of the Hours: The Structural Reform of the Roman Office, 1964–1971 (Collegeville, Minn. 1995).

Enrico Cattaneo, Il breviario Ambrosiano: Note storiche ed illustrative (Milan 1943).

S.J.P. van Dijk and J. Hazelden Walker, The Origins of the Modern Roman Liturgy: The Liturgy of the Papal Court and the Franciscan Order in the Thirteenth Century (Westminster, Md., and London 1960).

Handbook for Liturgical Studies, vol. 5, Liturgical Time and Space, edited by Anscar J. Chupungco (Collegeville, Minn. 2000).

John Harper, The Forms and Orders of Western Liturgy from the Tenth to the Eighteenth Century (Oxford 1991).

Andrew Hughes, Medieval Manuscripts for Mass and Office: A Guide to Their Organization and Terminology (Toronto 1982).

V. Leroquais, Les bréviaires manuscrits des bibliothèques publiques de France, 5 vols. and plates (Paris 1934).

Mario Righetti, Manuale di storia liturgica, vol. 2, L'anno liturgico; Il breviario (Milan 1955).

Pierre Salmon, The Breviary through the Centuries, translated by Sister David Mary (Collegeville, Minn. 1962).

Pierre Salmon, L'Office divin au moyen âge: Histoire de la formation du bréviaire du IX^e^ au XVI^e^ siècle (Paris 1967).

Pierre Salmon, Les manuscrits liturgiques latins de la Bibliothèque Vaticane, vols. 1 and 5 (Vatican City 1968–72).

Robert Taft, The Liturgy of the Hours in East and West (Collegeville, Minn. 1986).

Rev. Jonathan Black
Editor, Mediaeval Studies
Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies (2010)

BUCKLEY, WILLIAM F., JR.

American conservative author, commentator, and political activist; b. New York City, November 24, 1925; d. Stamford, Connecticut, February 27, 2008.

One of America's great Roman Catholic conservative icons, William Frank Buckley Jr. was a versatile public figure who helped create modern conservatism as an intellectual and political movement, and did so with wit and charm. His goal was to make conservative ideas respectable and politically persuasive, which he accomplished by way of his biweekly journal, National Review, his syndicated newspaper column, On the Right, his weekly television program, Firing Line, some fifty volumes of writings, and his political activism. He was a controversial critic of liberalism and a defender of individualism, religion, and capitalism. Buckley received numerous and diverse awards for his work, including the Presidential Medal of Freedom (1991).

Born the sixth of ten children in a well-off family of English-Irish descent, Buckley enjoyed an intense private Catholic education in Mexico, England, and France. He loved music, the outdoors, and especially sailing. After high school and two years in the army, Buckley entered Yale University in 1946 to study political science, economics, and history, and graduated with a B.A. with honors. In 1950 he married Patricia Austin Taylor (1926–2007), and fathered one son, Christopher.

Buckley's intellectual career began in earnest in 1951 with his first book, God and Man at Yale, in which he criticized his alma mater's curriculum as collectivist and antireligious and contrary to a true liberal education. At the same time, he began a two-year stint with the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) as a political-action specialist in Mexico City.

It was Russell KIRK's The Conservative Mind (1953) that greatly inspired Buckley's conservative vision. Shortly after its publication, in 1955, Buckley founded and began editing National Review, an exceedingly popular magazine intended to fuse a diverse spectrum of principled conservative viewpoints, including those of traditionalists, Catholic intellectuals, libertarians, constitutionalists, free marketers, and ex-Communists. These writers sought to engage modern liberal collectivism, make conservative ideas respectable, and influence national affairs in a more intellectual and public manner. This effort succeeded in the 1960s as conservatism shifted from an intellectual to an organized political movement that promoted the presidential candidacies of Barry Goldwater (1909–1998), Richard Nixon (1913–1994), and Ronald Reagan (1911–2004). In the process, Buckley launched a national student activist group, Young Americans for Freedom (1960), founded the New York Conservative Party (1961), began a popular and long-running syndicated column, On the Right (1962), and ran for mayor of New York City (1965).

Buckley returned anew to his role as conservative commentator with the launching of his famous public affairs television show, Firing Line (1966–1999). Each week Buckley, with a strong intellectual bent, interviewed prominent intellectuals and public figures in a leisurely yet robust manner. This forum exemplified Buckley's notion that in order to convince, one needed to debate and not merely preach. The program ran for over thirty-three years and won conservatism a wide and diverse audience.

Buckley was a devout Catholic. Though critical of the liturgical reforms (especially music) brought about after VATICAN COUNCIL II, his love of the faith never waned, as he revealed especially in his book Nearer, My God: An Autobiography of Faith (1997). In this late work, Buckley offers an erudite and moving personal reflection on Roman Catholicism and his own lifelong Christian pilgrimage.

SEE ALSO MODERN MEDIA AND THE CHURCH; POLITICS, CHURCH AND.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

WORKS BY WILLIAM F. BUCKLEY

God and Man at Yale: The Superstitions of Academic Freedom (Chicago 1951).

Nearer, My God: An Autobiography of Faith (New York 1997).

Miles Gone By: A Literary Autobiography (Washington, D.C. 2004).

STUDIES

Richard Brookhiser, Right Time, Right Place: Coming of Age with William F. Buckley Jr. and the Conservative Movement (New York 2009).

Priscilla L. Buckley, Living It Up with National Review: A Memoir (Dallas, Tex. 2005).

Jeffrey Hart, The Making of the American Conservative Mind: National Review and Its Times (Wilmington, Del. 2005).

John B. Judis, William F. Buckley, Jr., Patron Saint of the Conservatives (New York 1988).

James Gaston
Associate Professor of History; Director, Humanities and Catholic Culture Program Franciscan University of Steubenville, Ohio (2010)

BUDDHISM

The complex of religious beliefs and philosophical ideas that has developed out of the teachings of the Buddha (Sanskrit, "the Enlightened One"), the honorific title of the founder of Buddhism, the north Indian prince Siddhārtha Gautama. Beginning as a contemplative discipline for human deliverance from suffering, it acquired the characteristics of a nontheistic religious system with a message of transcendent insight for both laity and monastics. The claim that Buddhism is more a philosophy along the lines of STOICISM than a religion seems not to correspond to the richness of early Buddhist culture. Both archeological and textual evidence tends to support the view that Buddhism always had monasticism, a cult of relic veneration, and a doctrine of supramundane liberation accessible through moral and meditative praxis. Various schools emerged from an early date, largely as a result of debates within the monastic communities over the rules of monastic conduct, differences in assessing spiritual attainment, and ways of describing the subject of spiritual experience (the person).

Beginning in the first century BC, a complex of lay and monastic movements coalesced into a new form of Buddhism that referred to itself as the Bodhisattvayāna ("vehicle of the bodhisattvas") or MAHĀYĀNA ("great vehicle"), in contrast to the earlier set of schools (traditionally numbered as eighteen) referred to disparagingly as the HĪNAYĀNA ("little vehicle"). One of the early "Eighteen Schools," the Sthaviravāda ("doctrine of the elders"), survived over the centuries to become the Theravāda, to this day the bearer of the Pali canonical tradition in south and Southeast Asia. Buddhism is primarily a system of SOTERIOLOGY in which a broad spectrum of spiritual practices can be employed to bring about enlightenment (bodhi). The characteristic symbol of Buddhism is the "Wheel of the Law" (Dharma-Cakra), which symbolizes the basic teachings of the Buddha.

The geographic expansion of Buddhism in many regions of ancient India, the Himalayas, China, Southeast Asia, Korea, central Asia, and Japan coincided with its ideological evolution in response to the inculturation of the earliest Buddhist teachings. The emergence of sectarian movements, the appearance of the Great Vehicle, the proliferation of lay and monastic practices, the development of systematic thought including logic and ethics, and the embrace of some forms of tantrism in the Buddhist Vajrayāna ("vehicle of the thunderbolt," sometimes considered a "third yāna") reflect the richness of historical Buddhism. Since the Buddhism of each country assumed various forms and characteristics, it is helpful to treat them on a regional basis.

INDIA

Even before the lifetime of the historical Buddha (c. 563–483 BC) Indian society and religion were undergoing extensive transformations. A sudden population increase, urbanization, the rise of a monetary economy, and the founding of centralized kingdoms in place of traditional tribal and clan society led many to question the traditional religious sacrifices of the Vedas. Many began thinking about the fate of the individual after death, leading to various attempts to formulate the doctrines of REINCARNATION and KARMA, in order to explain how conduct in a previous lifetime could bear fruit in the sufferings or advantages of the present lifetime. These speculations gave rise to new religious movements, of which Buddhism and JAINISM are the most noteworthy institutional survivors. The proponents of these new ways of thinking were wandering mendicants who renounced the normal system of family and social ties in order to devote themselves to MEDITATION and philosophical discourse. Not all of these movements accepted religious or nonmaterial explanations for human destiny; some entirely denied the existence of karmic consequences, reincarnation, and the soul.

Buddha. During the same period, from perhaps the ninth to the sixth century BC, Brahmanical Vedism showed its own capacity for development and adaptation by inspiring esoteric or symbolic interpretations of the ancient sacrificial system. The earliest Upaniṣads, such as the Chandogya, build upon the system of Vedic commentarial literature (the Brahmaṇas) to elaborate an overarching theological system. However, some pre-Vedic intellectual currents of thought revived in the Indian subcontinent, nurturing new forms of critical thinking based on the notion of liberation from cyclic or infracosmic existence. These systems taught that even the gods were within the cosmic cycle of rebirth driven by previous conduct (karma) and that true liberation can only be attained outside cyclic existence (saṃsāra).

In this way, Indian thinkers articulated their own discovery of TRANSCENDENCE and SALVATION. According to tradition, one of these systems of salvation was discovered by Gautama Siddhārtha (c. 563–483 BC), the son of Śuddhodana and Māyā Gautama, born at Lumbinī in what is now southern Nepal. At twenty-nine, having encountered the "Four Signs" (an old man; a dying man; a corpse; a world-renouncing wanderer) that thrust him into a profound interior crisis, he renounced his princely rank, his wife, and his child to seek deliverance from the suffering inherent to human existence. After six years of practicing both extreme self-mortification and deep meditation in the Upaniṣadic mode, he decided to chart his own path and sat under the Bodhi Tree at Bodh Gayā, where he reached both enlightenment and liberation from the endless round of birth and rebirth (samsāra) by discovering the origin of suffering and the way to conquer it. Once recognized by disciples as an enlightened being, he came to be known as the sage of the Śākya clan (Śākyamuni), the "Awakened One" (Buddha).

Yogic Songs. Milarepa holding a yak horn. COURTESY OF FRANCIS TISO

In the course of forty years of teaching before his passing (parinirvāna) at Kuśinagara, the Buddha formulated his doctrine and the rules for his orders of monks and nuns. He taught that suffering could be conquered by the knowledge and practice of the "Four Truths that Pertain to the Noble Ones" (caturāryasatya, erroneously but commonly translated as "The Four Noble Truths"): (1) Human existence is suffering, which (2) is caused by desire, and (3) can be overcome by the elimination of desire which is achieved (4) by means of the practice of the "Eightfold Path." The Path consists in (1) right knowledge of the Four Truths; (2) right resolve to curb malice; (3) right speech, true and kind; (4) right action, meaning to refrain from killing, stealing, and sexual misconduct; (5) right livelihood, which meant that one could not earn one's living in a trade that by its nature involved bringing harm to others, such as the sale of weapons, poisons, slaves, livestock, and so on; (6) right effort; (7) right mindfulness, or awareness, of the body, of feelings, of the state of mind, and of phenomena; (8) right meditation, which consists of four steps: isolation resulting in joy, meditation causing inner peace, concentration producing bodily happiness, and contemplation coming to maturity in habitual detachment from contrasting mental states, such as happiness and sorrow.

The Buddha remained faithful to the prevailing thought of his day by affirming the reality of rebirth in higher or lower states of life based on the moral quality of one's accumulated karma. However, he denied the existence of a permanent, unchanging self (ātman) that goes from body to body and life to life. It was self-contradictory, he said, to assert that the true self is an indivisible entity ensconced within the body which nevertheless is swept along in a sequence of rebirths by the force of accumulated karma. It was better not to think of the human person as an ongoing entity at all, but as an interdependent dynamic process whose relation to its own previous lives was one of continuity rather than identity. Thus, his followers came to see all living beings as aggregations of processes, both physical and mental (the five "skandhas": bodily form, consciousness, sensation, cognition, and mental constructions) that, just as firewood keeps the fire going, are kept self-perpetuating by desire. Thus, the point of spiritual practice is to end the process (a goal called "nirvāṇa," or "extinguishing") by subverting its root cause.

Early Order and Councils. According to the Vinaya (the monastic rule, constituting one of the oldest bodies of legislation still in force), any male who was not sick, disabled, a criminal, a soldier, a debtor, or a minor lacking parental consent could enter the order as a monk. The initiation ceremony comprised the renunciation (pabbajja), the arrival, and the pledge to keep the four prohibitions against sexual intercourse, theft, taking life, and boasting of superhuman perfection. The initiated was bound to observe the ten abstentions, that is, from killing, stealing, lying, sexual intercourse, intoxicants, eating after midday, worldly amusements, accepting gold or silver, and using cosmetics and adornments, and luxurious mats and beds. Initiation, abstentions, and vows bind a monk for the time he remains in the order. In practice, there are monks who keep the vows for life, and there are many Buddhist laymen who have lived the monastic life temporarily in accordance with custom. Daily exercises of the monks comprise morning recitation of the Buddha's teachings (originally from memory), outdoor begging, morning study sessions, a midday meal followed by rest and meditation, and evening chanting. Fortnightly exercises consisted, for laity, in observing the eight ascetic precepts (uposatha), and, for the monastics, in making a private confession of sins to another monk, followed by the penitential recitation of the Patimokkha Sutta (Sanskrit: Pratimokṣa).

At the entreaty of his foster mother, Mahāprajāpatī, Buddha founded a second order for nuns. Moreover, he established a third order, this one for lay people, who were obliged only to abstain from killing, stealing, lying, intoxicants, and fornication. But they were exhorted to practice kindness, clean speech, almsgiving, religious instruction, and the duties of mutual family and social relations. Lay followers may take up these vows and practices either during restricted periods of retreat or for life.

According to traditional sources, sectarian tendencies gave rise to diversity of views. To resolve the disagreements, a first council was held at Rājagrha shortly after the Buddha's passing, where the authorized version of the Buddha's discourses (buddhavacana), Dhamma and the Vinaya, were fixed. A hundred years later a second council took place at Vaiśālī to attempt a settlement of ten questions concerning monastic discipline, which led to the first major schism in the Buddhist order. In the centuries that follow, Pali and early Sanskrit traditions report on the existence of at least eighteen early Buddhist sects, the surviving representative of which is called the Theravāda, the "doctrine of the elders" which is prevalent in Sri Lanka and Southeast Asia. Northern Buddhist tradition holds that a fourth council was held at Jālandhara in Kashmir about AD 100 to authorize the addition of Sanskrit scriptures to the canon (the Theravāda tradition speaks of a Fourth Buddhist Council held in Tambapanni, Sri Lanka, a century earlier to preserve the Pali Canon).

Aśoka, Apostle of Buddhism. Conscience-stricken at the horrors of a war for the unification of northern India, King Aśoka (273–231 BC) embraced Buddhism. He then abolished the royal hunt and meat at court banquets. He also issued a series of edicts carved on stone pillars or highly visible rock sites embodying Buddhist rules of conduct and justice, spread the Buddhist faith through embassies, governed with piety and wisdom, and convened a third council at Pāṭaliputra in 247. In 240 he became a monk, but without abdicating his royal office. He required his officials to give moral training to their subordinates, to promote piety among people of all sects, and to prevent unjust punishments. He sent his brother (or son) Mahinda and other missionaries to spread the faith in Sri Lanka and another group to western Asia, Macedonia, and Epirus (north of Greece along the Adriatic). Only the mission in Sri Lanka was successful. However, it is important to note that during the latter part of the Hellenistic period, Buddhist thought subsequently exerted some influence on the Gnostic and Manichaean sects. ASCETICISM and missionary movements left an enduring mark in India, whence Buddhism spread throughout Eastern Asia.

Rise of Mahāyāna. Following the lifetime of Aśoka, the ideal of the Buddhist teacher/missionary gained ascendancy in the expanding world of the DHARMA. The movement known as Mahāyāna (the "Great Vehicle") developed the early Buddhist ideal of the bodhisattva, a being who is actively engaged in the path to becoming a fully enlightened Buddha, a world-teacher. The Great Vehicle exalts the heroism of such a being, who compassionately vows to liberate all beings using a variety of skillful means. Mahāyāna philosophers also elaborated a new approach to the nature of reality, emphasizing the radical impermanence and interconnectedness of all things as "voidness" or "emptiness" (śūnyatā). The early Buddhist Arhat, who attains nirvāṇa by focusing on single-minded effort, is not forgotten. In fact, the Arhats are venerated by Mahāyāna Buddhists. However, for the Mahāyāna, the path to Buddhahood is held up as a nearly universal ideal. Gautama was regarded as one of a series of enlightened manifestations of cosmic Buddhahood, each of whom accumulated merit related to both wisdom and compassion so as to liberate other beings. Buddhas and bodhisattvas became, in some instances, the objects of ritual veneration, often because of their vows to provide Pure Lands for devotees after death where enlightenment will be attained more easily under their direct guidance. Hence, the adherents of the new doctrine called it the Mahāyāna (Great Vehicle) to salvation, to distinguish it from early Buddhism's focus on the liberation of the ascetic individual. Monasteries were the home of sectarian movements and scholarly debate within the spectrum of Buddhist culture. In some monasteries, as reported by Chinese pilgrims to India, the early Buddhist Vinaya would govern observance for all monks, while some monks focused on the earlier teachings on meditation and others on the Mahāyāna approach. As the survey of regional Buddhism illustrates, exclusive sectarian adherence was a feature favored by political interference, and not by monastic communities left to pursue their own regimen.

In the second century AD Nāgārjuna founded the School of the Middle Path (Mādhyamika) to provide a dialectically powerful line of reasoning supportive of the view of the Great Vehicle. Since all phenomena are impermanent and interdependent, there are no permanent substrates to perceived objects. Everything that exists does so in relation to other existent things, never in isolation. This radical "openness" of phenomena is called śūnyatā ("voidness" or "emptiness"), by which is meant radical mutual dependency, not nihilism. To realize this in contemplative practice is to "awaken" to enlightenment. Enlightenment thus encompasses and transcends both Nirvāṇa and cyclic existence (saṃsāra). In this understanding, a Buddha is not restricted to the dimension of Nirvāṇa. Rather, a fully enlightened Buddha (samyaksaṃbodhi) can act compassionately within cyclic existence. The Yogācāra ("Practice of Mental Discipline") School, founded by Asaṅga and Vasubandhu in the fourth and fifth centuries, propounded that all phenomena are received in the mind through eight kinds of awareness bound to the bodily and mental systems of sense perception. This school explored the psychology of perception in considerable detail. Thus, there is the object of sense perception, the organ that is capable of perceiving the object, the internal receptacle that receives the stimulus of perception, and the mental faculty that identifies the object. Finally, the mental faculties associated with each of the five senses are coordinated by a superior mental faculty that integrates the data of perception. The Yogācāra (also known as Cittamatra, "In Accordance with Mind Alone") provides yogic training manuals for the meditator, that establish a coherent system of spiritual practice, based on this model of the mind, maturing in fully enlightened Buddhahood for the benefit of all beings. Full enlightenment manifests in a dimensional triad (the Trikāya: The Triple Body of the Buddha) consisting of the absolute in itself (Dharmakāya), the absolute as sublime communion among Bodhisattva forms (Saṃbhogakāya), and the absolute as embodied in earthly Buddhas (Nirmāṇakāya). Aśvaghoṣa (first century AD) developed the system in a form that greatly influenced China and Japan. For him the essence of things consists in the oneness of the totality of things; ignorance of the totality results in being grasped by the illusory phenomenal world, while recognition of the vision of totality actualizes the only true reality, Buddhahood, awakening from the "embryo of the Enlightened One" (Tathāgatagarbha) present in all beings possessing sense perceptions. As understood by the later Chinese and Japanese traditions, salvation in Aśvaghoṣa's system is attained by faith in the Buddha Amitābha ("having infinite light"), allowing rebirth in his Pure Land after bodily death.

Prayer Wheels. Tibetan Buddhist prayer wheels, Rumtek Monastery, Gangtok, Sikkim, India. © JEREMY HORNER/CORBIS

Decline in India. In the eleventh century Buddhist institutions were still strong in Kashmir, Orissa, and Bihar, but with the establishment of the Muslim power in 1193, and the destruction of major monastic centers of learning such as Nālanda and Vikramaśīla, these disappeared from north central India. Some elements survived in parts of eastern and northern India under the Pala Dynasty, and some teaching centers may have been active as late as the sixteenth century, when Tibetan masters sponsored expeditions to locate masters and texts. There is considerable debate on the sociology and demographics of the historic decline of Buddhism in India. There is fragmentary evidence to support ongoing tension with the Hindu majority, such as the historic memory of dramatic public debates between Hindu and Buddhist scholars. In addition, tantric masters such as the "Eighty Four Mahāsiddhas" seem to have been conversant with Shaivite and Buddhist ritual and yogic traditions; these trends flourished in Nepal, central Asia, and Tibet, but may have blurred the distinction between Hindu and Buddhist identity. Newari Buddhism in the valley of Nepal may represent a survival of the kind of Buddhism present in Pala Dynasty-India in the high medieval period: monasticism and scholarship reliant on the sponsorship of wealthy patrons within a caste-defined population of devotee families, often of artisan and merchant status.

SRI LANKA

The narrative reproduced here is derived almost wholly from the fifth-century BC chronicle, the Mahāvaṃsa, and later supplements composed up until modern times, often known collectively as the Cūlavaṃsa. Recent scholarship has suggested that these texts promote the perspective of one of the sects (nikāya), the Mahāvihāra fraternity, which sought to be the sole voice of Theravāda orthodoxy in Sri Lanka, over and against the allegedly corrupt Abhayagiri and Jetavana communities. Thus, it is prudent to consider these histories to be "traditional" in spirit, rather than scientific. When Mahinda and Sanghamittā, son and daughter of King Aśoka, introduced Buddhism into Sri Lanka about 250 BC, they met King Devanampiya Tissa at a place called Mahindatale (now Mihintale), near the capital Anurādhapura. Having been moved by sermons and portents, the king and his subjects embraced the Buddha's Dharma. Some days later the minister Avittha and his brothers joined the monastic community (saṃgha); when Mahinda's sister arrived from India, she validly admitted many Sri Lankan women to the order of nuns. In his capital King Tissa then erected shrines and monasteries, notably the Mahāvihāra or Great Monastery, which remained the stronghold of orthodoxy for centuries. In compliance with Mahinda's directives, in order to give the Dharma a firm foundation, he convened the council of Thuparama so that the sacred books might be committed to memory and in turn taught by native monks.

While there is little doubt that some Sinhala rulers were exclusively Buddhist and that there were several significant Tamil invasions from south India, it seems that Sinhala kings patronized both religions. Moreover, so-called Hindu gods have been worshipped by Sinhala Buddhists since ancient times. The Mahāvaṃsa's claims that the Sinhalas are the island's "natives" and that the Tamils are always "outside invaders" do not reflect historical reality, since Tamils probably occupied the island at least as far back as the Sinhalas did.

Military operations led by Tamils concluded the first phase of Buddhist rule under the kings Uttiya (207–197 BC), Mahāsiva (197–187 BC), and Suratissa (187–177 BC). The kingdom returned to Buddhist rule under Dutthagamani (177–101 BC), who expelled the invaders, reorganized the island, spread the Dharma (i.e., Buddhist teachings), and built the Lohapaṣada and Mahāthupa monasteries, where a golden image of Buddha and statues of Māra, Brahmā, and many other Hindu deities were displayed. This was followed by a troubled period of invasions, famine, and uprisings that forced many monks to flee to India and Malaya. When the monks returned to their monasteries under King Vattagamani Abhaya (29–17 BC), there was a tendency to favor learning over spiritual practice. The king built the Abhayagiri monastery for Mahātissa and his monks, who had helped to repulse the insurgents, but the monks of the Mahāvihāra reproved Mahātissa for his familiarity with laymen, and a schism ensued within the monastic Sangha. In some respects, historic conflicts and nationalism have contributed to the ferocity of the current civil war between the Singhalese and Tamil populations.

The Pali Canon and Commentaries. The monks of the Mahāvihāra feared that Buddha's teachings, thus far committed only to memory, could perish with the monks in wars, famines, and their attendant miseries, or be altered through deviant mental processes among those monks entrusted with recital. At the rival Abhayagiri monastery, and elsewhere in Sri Lanka, the Mahāyāna school had acquired popularity. Accordingly, 500 monks convened (this is the Pali Fourth Council held at Tambapanni) at the Aluvihāra near Matale to write down the Tipitaka (Three Baskets): Sutta Piṭaka (Buddha's sermons), Vinaya Piṭaka (monastic rules), and Abhidhamma Piṭaka (treatises), the whole forming a canon in Pali of scriptural texts for the Theravāda School (one of the "Eighteen Schools" recognized in early Buddhist sources) which predominated in Sri Lanka; this corpus is the basis for the present Pāli Canon. The writing of the canon at a distance from the king's capital city bespeaks the disciplinary and doctrinal rift between the two rival monasteries. The appearance of the written canon gave rise to further controversies, the compilation of Sinhalese commentaries, and a deeper cleft among rival schools. The context of a dispute between the two groups over the interpretation of the Vinaya, presided over by King Bhatiya (AD 38–66) and settled by a polyglot minister, gives evidence that the Mahāyāna monks at Abhayagiri were already using Sanskrit versions of the canon. Under Vohāratissa (AD 269–291) the Mahāyāna monks upheld the Vaipulya Piṭaka (a classic collection of early Mahāyāna texts) as containing the true teaching of the Buddha, but the king thought otherwise and had their books burned. During the reign of Mahānaman (412–434) Buddhaghosa wrote the Visuddhimagga (The Way of Purification), a thorough exposition of Theravāda Buddhism, and translated most of the Sinhalese commentaries on the canon into Pāli.

Tamil insurgency once again drove the native dynasty and its religion from the northern tip of Sri Lanka. But in the eleventh century King Vijaya Bahu restored the dynasty and requested the Myanmar Buddhists to validate monastic initiation in Sri Lanka. In 1165 his successor called a council to put an end to divisions in the Saṃgha, but after his death the Tamils rose to power. Subsequent occupations by the Portuguese (1505) and Dutch (1658) damaged the position of Buddhism, and in the eighteenth century monastic ordination lineages again died out, only to be revived when the king obtained ten Thai monks to validate the succession and establish the Thai school. Finally, before the British displaced the Dutch in 1802, the Amarapura school was founded through valid initiation in Myanmar. Other revived schools (nikāya) include the Siyam and Rāmañña; forest dwelling monks constitute a separate nikāya. In the late nineteenth century Sri Lankan Buddhists sought for a way to respond to the criticisms of Buddhism coming from aggressive Christian missionaries. After the Panadura controversy, in which Buddhist monk Rev. Migettuwaththe Gunananda Thera performed well in a public debate with a Christian missionary, Sri Lanka was ready for a Buddhist revival. Taking note of these efforts, the American Colonel H.S. Olcott, one of the founders of the Theosophical Society, provided valuable guidance in the institutional renewal and modernization of Sri Lankan Buddhism. His erstwhile disciple, Anagarika Dharmapala, emerged as the chief inspiration of the renewal, the institutional base of which was guaranteed by the creation of two very influential monastic universities, Vidyodaya and Vidyālaṅkara.

Beliefs, Order, and Cult. The religious system of Sri Lanka joins the rigor of monastic observance in accordance with the canon to a wide range of popular traditions and practices. In addition, elements taken from within the canon itself (e.g., such Vedic deities as Indra/Śakra) and from the surrounding Hindu and animist culture continues to influence the Buddhism actually practiced by the people. This hybrid system began to be weakened by Christian influence after the Portuguese colonization in 1505. Hybridization was further weakened by "Theosophical" Buddhism in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, and by public education more recently. In the classic system the world is thought to be protected by the Four Kings (lokapāla) who rule the six heavens immediately above the human world (mānuṣaloka). Yama is the Lord of the Underworld, a realm of eight divisions, each subdivided into many sections. Māra, the tempter, prevents people from attaining virtue. Four evil destinies or "rebirths" (apāya) are the result of humans' succumbing to his temptations: hell beings, animals, hungry ghosts (peta), and titans (asura). Above the human realm are the rebirths among the gods, some of which abide in refined material bodies, and others of which abide in the formless world of the immaterial Brahmās. All these states of existence are within the cosmic cycle, however. The entire purpose of the Dharma and the Vinaya is to liberate beings from the cosmic cycle of karma and rebirth.

The backbone of Buddhism is the order of monks (Saṃgha) adhering to the rules of the Vinaya and able to practice the disciplines of the Dharma. Postulants may enter the novitiate at the age of twelve through the ceremony of tonsure and investiture of the yellow robe (pabbajja). At twenty they may take full monastic profession (upasampada). They spend the day in domestic work, reading the canon, meditating, begging for food, instructing children in the scriptures, healing the sick by charms and chants, and reciting protection sūtras (Paritta) to ward off the malevolent spirits. A monk can set aside his vows without any negative consequences.

There are many forms of popular worship. Objects of veneration include RELICS and images of Buddha. Religious celebrations are marked by the ritual veneration (pūjā) of Buddhist and Hindu deities and spirit-beings. Perhaps the most popular rites today is pūjā to Bodhi trees, believed to be cuttings from the only surviving offshoot of the original Bodhi tree in Bodh Gaya. The Buddhist canon may be recited with the intent to placate or exorcize demonic forces.

Modern educated Sri Lankans associate Buddhism, often layered with scientific commentary and theosophical elaboration, with the greatness of Sri Lanka's past and the national prestige of the present. It is also true that Sinhalese Buddhism as a hybrid system is criticized by certain modernist monks and thinkers who are embarrassed by the elements that they deem to be mere "popular superstition."

CHINA

Buddhism first entered China sometime during the first century AD, probably with foreign traders who came into China via the Silk Road or from the maritime route along the southeastern seaboard. For the first two centuries or so, it existed primarily among immigrant settlements, while slowly making its presence known among the native Chinese population. As interest grew during the second century, a few monks began translating scriptures into Chinese. Notable among these were An Shigao and Lokakṣema.

With the fall of the Han dynasty in the early third century, interest in Buddhism among the Chinese increased as the unstable political situation inspired people to seek for new answers. At the same time, the division of China into kingdoms north and south of the Yangtze River gave Buddhism a different character in these two regions. In the north, greater proximity to the central Asian trade routes to India meant that Buddhism in this region had a greater number of Indian and central Asian monks and meditation teachers, and so it tended to emphasize religious practice over textual study. In addition, from the early fourth century to the late sixth, the north was under non-Chinese rule. These "barbarian" rulers favored Buddhism, and many monks served as court advisors, giving Buddhism in the north a more overtly political character. It was during this period that the central Asian monk Kumārajīva arrived in 402 and opened his translation bureau in the north, producing some of the finest translations from Sanskrit, many of which are still considered the standard. His rendering of Indian Mādhyamika texts led to the foundation of the Sanlun (or "Three Treatise") school that specialized in Madhyamika philosophy.

Many of the literati had fled the troubles of the north and migrated to the Southern Kingdoms, bringing with them their emphasis on literary skill. In addition to this, the Northern Kingdoms blocked their access to the living traditions of India and central Asia, and so the south developed a more literary approach to Buddhist study. During this time, Daoan (312–385) produced the first catalogue of Buddhist scriptures, and he and his disciples worked to produce critical editions of scriptures and treatises, and to develop principles for their translation into Chinese. Also, the dissemination of Buddhist texts and teachings among the educated elite led to a prolonged exchange of ideas between Buddhism and Taoism, during which Buddhism absorbed and modified many Taoist ideas.

Other significant figures of the Northern and Southern Kingdoms period include Daosheng (360–434), a great textual scholar; Lushan Huiyuan (344–416) and Tanluan (476–542), who helped establish the Pure Land teachings; the Sanlun master Sengzhao (374–414); and the great translator Paramārtha (499–569), whose translations of Indian mind-only literature paved the way for the future establishment of the Faxiang school.

China was reunified by the Sui dynasty in AD 581, but the ruling house was quickly toppled by the Tang dynasty in 618. The Tang dynasty held power for almost 300 years, and this period represents one of China's golden ages. Buddhism flourished during the first two centuries of this dynasty, only to suffer severe setbacks after legal proscriptions in 845. Increased affluence and patronage enabled many original thinkers and practitioners to establish schools of Buddhism more in keeping with Chinese cultural and intellectual patterns and less dependent upon preexisting Indian schools of thought. Examples include Zhiyi (538–597), who founded the Tiantai school; Fazang (643–712), who consolidated the Huayan school; and the various meditation masters who established Chan as a separate school that transmitted the Buddha-mind directly from master to disciple "outside of words and scriptures." Daochuo (562–645), Shandao (613–681), and others continued building up the Pure Land movement, extending Tanluan's teaching further. During this time Xuanzang (c. 596–664) traveled in India for sixteen years and brought back many texts, which he translated into Chinese. After Kumārajīva, he is considered the second of the greatest translators in Chinese Buddhist history. He concentrated on Indian Yogācāra thought, and, building on the foundation laid by Paramārtha, founded the Faxiang school.

The Tang period saw great doctrinal innovations. Both the Tiantai and Huayan schools extended the doctrine of universal Buddha-nature from living beings to encompassing all of nature. Thus, even nonsentient things were said to have this aspect, as encapsulated in the slogan "even grass and trees attain Buddhahood." For Tiantai, all of reality manifested the Buddha-mind, which meant that all of nature could be one's teacher. Based on this, it espoused the idea of the complete interpenetration of all particular phenomena with the noumenal substrate of all reality, characterized as the "middle-way Buddha-nature." Unique to the Tiantai school was the idea that this noumenal reality had defiled as well as pure aspects. Zhiyi justified this by asserting that the world needed to manifest genuine evil as well as good for sentient beings to make progress toward Buddhahood. As he put it, a man cannot become a great general without an enemy army.

The Huayan school agreed that the substrate of reality had Buddha-nature; in fact, the world was a manifestation of the primordial Buddha Vairocana. However, it differed from the Tiantai School by denying that ultimate reality could manifest defiled or evil aspects. Evil and impurity were projections of unenlightened minds upon a pristine, luminous substrate that contained no evil at all. Later, during the Song dynasty, some Tiantai scholars adopted this position, leading to a major doctrinal controversy.

Prosperity brought its own difficulties. As the numbers of ordained clergy increased, the government became concerned about the revenue and labor pool that would be lost due to the clergy's tax- and labor-exempt status. In addition, ever since Buddhism's inception in China some traditional Confucian scholars had decried it as a foreign religion that violated basic Chinese values, especially the loyalty that all citizens owed to the state and the filial piety that sons and daughters owed their parents. Also, Taoists sometimes saw in Buddhism an antagonist and competitor rather than a colleague. In the past, the government instituted ordination examinations and state-issued certificates to control the size of the sangha, and twice during the Northern and Southern Kingdoms period the state had suppressed Buddhism (in 446 and 574). In the year 845 the Tang court was incited to suppress Buddhism once again, and for three years it pursued this policy of razing monasteries and temples, forcing clergy back into lay life or even killing them, and burning books, images, and properties. Unlike the previous two persecutions, this suppression happened in a unified China and affected all areas. Scholars are in agreement that this event marked the end of Buddhism's intellectual and cultural dominance, as the sangha never recovered its former glory, though numerically and economically Buddhism recovered and grew. The Tiantai and Huayan schools experienced some revivals thereafter, but lost most of their vigor. The Pure Land and Chan schools, being much less dependent upon patronage and scholarship, fared better and became the two dominant schools of Buddhism in China thereafter. After the persecution, Chan communities experimented with new teaching methods that circumvented conventional teaching and inculcated a dramatic, instantaneous experience of enlightenment. The leading figures in this movement were Huineng (638–713), Mazu Daoyi (709–788), Baizhang Huaihai (749–814), Huangbo (d. 850), Linji Yixuan (founder of the Linji school, d. 866), and the two founders of the Caodong school, Dongshan Liangjie (807–869) and Caoshan Benji (840–901).

After the Tang, the intellectual vigor of Buddhism was eclipsed by the rise of Neo-Confucianism (itself deeply influenced by Buddhist philosophy and practice) in the Song dynasty. Nevertheless, there were significant figures and movements during this time. Many figures worked to reconcile the very different outlooks and methods of the Chan and Pure Land schools, notably Yongming Yanshou (904–975) and Yunqi Zhuhong (1532–1612). The latter was also part of a revival of Chan in the latter half of the Ming dynasty that also included Zibo Zhenke (1543–1603), Hanshan Deqing (1546–1623), and Ouyi Zhixu (1599–1655). All agreed that Pure Land and Chan, though differing in method, strove toward the same goal, though Hanshan and Zibo still tended to define this goal in Chan terms. Zhixu, however, emphasized Pure Land teaching almost exclusively and came to be regarded as one of the patriarchs (zu) of this school.

The Song dynasty also saw the development of Chan and Pure Land into their final forms during the premodern period. During this time, Chan lineages were recorded and standardized, with the authors of the Chan genealogies generally enjoying state or local lay patronage and privileging their own lines of masters. The collections of gong'an (Japanese: kōan) made their appearance and popularized the "Chan master" as a literary character who exhibited a level of wildness and "crazy wisdom" that appealed to an increasingly literate reading public. Comparisons of this literature to known writings of figures such as Mazu Daoyi demonstrate that in reality, Chan masters were very conventional and accomplished monks, but the literary trope took the public's imagination and has held it to this day. In Pure Land many monks, primarily affiliated with the Tiantai school, organized large-scale meetings for the recitation of the Buddha Amitābha's name, bringing the Pure Land school to its greatest efflorescence. Since Chinese Buddhism is largely nonsectarian in nature, Pure Land practice of some kind became normative for almost all Chinese Buddhists, whatever other practices they might undertake.

The Ming and Qing dynasties fostered interest in the Tibetan Vajrayāna traditions, but in general this was a period of reserve for Chinese Buddhist institutions. Buddhism remained strong in the central eastern seaboard. At the end of the nineteenth century there was a revival of Buddhism, then seen as a part of the Chinese heritage that could be brought out to counter Western culture's claims of superiority. During the early years of the twentieth century figures such as Ouyang Jingwu (1871–1943) and the monk Taixu (1889–1947) sponsored new editions of the scriptures and advocated a modernized educational system that would bring Buddhism into alignment with modern currents of thought.

The Communist victory in 1949 cut short the revival of Buddhism, as the new regime tried to undercut all societal support for religion in general. The Cultural Revolution proved a catastrophe for Buddhism during the 1960s and 1970s, as Red Guards destroyed many temples and treasures, and clergy were forced to return to lay status and submit to reeducation. However, after the death of Communist leader Mao Zedong in 1976 and the passing of many of his allies, the government has grown more tolerant, and many monasteries are back in operation. Currently, the Chinese Buddhist Association is a thriving organization, and Chinese universities sponsor the academic study of Buddhism. To what extent Buddhism will recover from the setbacks of the Mao era still remains to be seen.

Although formal schools did exist throughout the history of Buddhism in China as listed above, they rarely came into direct conflict with each other, being seen as alternative "gates" set out for practitioners of differing circumstances and temperaments. The most common form of practice is that of Pure Land, wherein Buddhists invoke the name of Amitābha Buddha in order that they might gain rebirth in his Pure Land, called Sukhāvatī, upon their death. With this as a basis, they might also practice Chan meditation, chanting of scriptures, and other practices in order to build up merit.

In addition, there are popular practices such as the fahui, or "Dharma-meetings" of various sorts. Some are seasonal, such as those that take place at the spring and autumn festivals, and the Ghost Festival that takes place on the fifteenth day of the seventh lunar month in which sūtras are recited for the deceased. Other events are sponsored by private patrons, such as the "Ocean and Land Dharma Meeting" (shuilu fahui) and the "Release of the Burning Mouths" (yuqie yankou), both long and very complicated ceremonies intended to better the circumstances of the patron's deceased ancestors.

JAPAN

Buddhism first arrived at the imperial court in Japan during the sixth century, when a Korean delegation brought a Buddha-image and some scriptures as gifts for the emperor. During the earliest period, the court and aristocratic families understood Buddhism as a variant of their native religion, and used it primarily as a way to cure illnesses and gain supernatural protection for the nation. Prince Shōtoku (572–621) is credited with being among the first to see Buddhist teachings as distinct from the native cults and to have understood Buddhism to some degree on its own terms. He is thought to have composed commentaries to several scriptures, and he fostered a program of rapid temple construction.

The Nara Period (710–794). During the Nara period, Buddhist activity took place on two fronts: The clergy were trying to understand the newly imported texts, while the government put Buddhist rituals and organizations to work for the welfare of the state. As to the first, the so-called Six Schools of Nara Buddhism comprised groups of clergy who concentrated on the texts and thought of six different Chinese schools: (1) the Sanron school focused on Sanlun (Madhyamaka) teachings in the lineage of Nāgārjuna; (2) the Kegon school took up Huayan studies; (3) the Ritsu school concentrated on monastic precepts and ordinations; (4) the Jōjitsu school studied Satyasiddhi doctrines of the fourth-century Indian scholar Harivarman and his lineage (possibly influencing Prince Shōtoku's Sangyō Gisho); (5) the Hossō school dealt with Faxiang (consciousness-only) teachings, which are based on the Yogācāra teachings from later in the career of the late-fourth-century Indian philosopher Vasubandhu; and (6) the Kusha school read the Abhidharmakośa, an encyclopedic summary of Buddhist philosophy in the Sautrāntika tradition expounded early in his career by Vasubandhu. The few scholar-monks who engaged in these studies mostly lived in the capital and were housed in the main temple there, called the Tōji. Outside of this government-sponsored establishment, a few self-ordained practitioners left society and lived in the mountains performing austerities or magical services for ordinary people. In addition to the scholarly activity in the capital, the principle activity of clergy was to perform rituals on behalf of the imperial family and the aristocracy.

The Heian Period (794–1185). The Heian period saw a movement of Buddhism away from government centers and out among the people, although this movement fell far short of a full-scale popularization of the religion. During this time both Saichō (767–822) and Kūkai (774–835) journeyed to China to deepen their knowledge of Buddhism. Saichō went to study Tiantai doctrines, but while waiting for a ship to take him home, he encountered a monk who practiced esoteric (or tantric) rituals. After a short period of training and the conferral of the proper initiation, he returned to Japan and settled on Mt. Hiei, where he established the Tendai school to be a successor to the Chinese Tiantai school. However, because the real patronage came from the performance of esoteric rituals, he divided this new school's focus between the exoteric doctrines of Tiantai and esoteric ritual performance. In addition, he asked for and received permission for his school to ordain its own monks independently of the Ritsu School, making use of a set of "bodhisattva precepts" rather than the usual monastic precepts, a unique Japanese approach that had a long-range impact on the style of monastic life.

Meanwhile, Kūkai went to China exclusively to receive training in esoteric (Vajrayāna) texts and rituals, and the Shingon School that he established on Mt. Kōya upon his return concentrated solely on esoteric Buddhism, and for a time outshone the Tendai school in patronage and popularity.

Modern Japanese Buddhism. Buddhist Peace Shrine, dedicated to the dead of World War II, Kyoto, Japan. © RIC ERGENBRIGHT/ CORBIS

The relationship between Buddhism and its assembly of Buddhas and bodhisattvas and the Shintō pantheon continued to concern many in Japan, and during the Heian period the theory known as honji-suijaku, or "original nature and provisional manifestation," came to dominate. According to this theory, the local kami of Shintō were manifestations of various Buddhas and bodhisattvas that appeared in Japan to teach the people and protect the nation. In this way, both religions could be accommodated in a single institution that incorporated both Buddhist and Shintō personnel and practices (the jingūji, or "shrine-temple").

The Kamakura Period (1185–1333). By the opening years of the Kamakura period, however, the Tendai school was the largest and most powerful of the eight schools in existence at that time, and its broad focus on both doctrinal and esoteric study and practice, as well as its laxity, corruption, and militancy (as seen in its infamous "monk-soldiers," or sōhei), made it the font of reform movements and schools. The following figures emerged from Tendai to establish new schools:

1. Pure Land: Hōnen (1133–1212) founded the Jōdoshū; Shinran (1173–1262) the Jōdo Shinshū; and Ippen (1239–1289) the Jishū.
2. Zen: Eisai (or Yōsai, 1141–1215) founded the Rinzai School, which took its lineage of Dharma-transmission from the Chinese Linjii school; and Dōgen (1200–1253) the Sōtō school, derived from the Chinese Caodong lineage.
3. Nichiren (1222–1282) founded the Nichiren School, which asserted the primacy of the Lotus Sutra (Myōhō Renge Kyō) over all other scriptures and recommended the constant repetition and praise of its title as the sole means of salvation.

In addition to the formal establishment of these schools and their institutions, the tradition of asceticism continued under the name shugendō, or "the way of experiential cultivation." Drawn primarily from the ranks of Tendai and Shingon esoteric clergy, practitioners lived in the mountains and practiced by fasting, austerities, Vajrayāna rituals, and long, arduous journeys through the mountains that covered as much as fifty miles in a single day.

Ashikaga and Tokugawa Periods (1392–1868). By the end of the Kamakura Period, Buddhism was a significant presence at all levels of Japanese society. In the fifteenth century, Jōdo Shinshū (Pure Land sect) adherents formed popular leagues called ikkō ikki, which rose up in rebellion against local aristocratic rule in Kaga and in 1488 took control of the province themselves. In 1571 the shōgun Oda Nobunaga, distrustful of the enormous landholdings and secular power of Buddhist monasteries, attacked and razed the headquarters of Tendai on Mt. Hiei, dispersing its sōhei once and for all. He also suppressed many other Buddhist establishments. Interestingly, the pervasive presence of Buddhist institutions was also employed as a source of strength for the government. For instance, after the ban on Christianity in 1612 and the subsequent expulsion of Christian missionaries, the government required all citizens to register with local Buddhist temples beginning in 1640, effectively coopting these institutions as a census bureau.

Buddhism's close cooperation with and support by the government in this way undermined discipline and purpose in the monastic community, although a few notable figures stand out as masters who are still taken as influential exemplars: Takuan (1573–1645), Bankei Eitaku (1622–1693), and Hakuin (1685–1768) in the Zen school, and Rennyo (1415–1499) and Shimaji Mokurai (1838–1911) of the Pure Land school, to name a few. However, as the Tokugawa period drew to a close in the early nineteenth century, the real locus of religious vitality was in CONFUCIANISM and various intellectual and spiritual renewal movements within Shintō. In addition, the first appearance of the so-called New Religions such as Tenrikyō (founded 1838) offered real competition for the loyalty of the peasants and the middle classes.

The Meiji and Modern Periods (1868–). When the Meiji emperor succeeded in restoring real political and executive power to the imperial family in 1868, one of his first acts was to abrogate the honji-suijaku understanding of the relationship between Buddhism and Shintō, declaring the two systems to be essentially distinct. He declared a persecution of Buddhism during the first decade or so of the Meiji period, but the attack galvanized Buddhists, and they successfully demanded recognition under the new constitution. At the same time, Buddhist chaplains who accompanied Japanese troops in China, Korea, Taiwan, and Southeast Asia, as well as missionaries who traveled to America and Europe to participate in the 1893 World's Parliament of Religions and to settle abroad, gave Japanese Buddhism an international presence. While all schools of Japanese Buddhism came to Hawaii and the American mainland with the large numbers of immigrants at that period, ZEN had the most success in making an impression on Euro-American culture. The expansion of Japanese Buddhism in various forms accelerated after WORLD WAR II through both immigration and conversion among Europeans, Americans, and other non-Japanese.

At the same time, social changes taking place in modern Japan have fostered the development of many Buddhist-derived "New Religions," most of which sprang from offshoots of the Nichiren school and its devotion to the Lotus Sutra. Examples include the Nichiren Shōshū and its now-independent lay branches, the Sōka Gakkai (founded 1930; reorganized 1975), and Risshō Kōsekai (1938).

Contemporary Japanese Buddhism is a combination of the old and the new: Even the most ancient of the Nara schools continues to coexist alongside the newest of the "New Religions." The Sōtō and Jōdo Shinshū schools are the largest of the traditional schools. Although Buddhism remains a vital part of Japanese life and culture, that very integration reflects a certain loss of vitality, particularly of the older schools. Buddhist scholars complain of "shoshiki Bukkyo" or "funeral Buddhism," in which Buddhist adherence is in evidence only at the time of a person's death. Buddhist scholarship remains strong in Japanese universities, and movements such as the "Kyoto School" of philosophy have contributed to Buddhist-Christian dialogue internationally.

TIBET

The form of Buddhism to be described here pervades the entire Tibetan/Himalayan cultural region, an expanse of land that stretches far beyond the borders of the area legally organized as "Tibet" by the government of China, and includes Mongolia (Outer and Inner), Xinjiang Province in China, Nepal, Bhutan, Ladakh, Lahul, Darjeeling, and the Kalmuk and Buryat regions of the former Soviet Union.

The earliest records use the term mi chö (religion of humans) to refer to the practices of the ordinary people, which included shamanistic practices and an animistic worldview, and was aimed at the propitiation of ancestors, deities, and demons that inhabited the natural world. The indigenous religion of this area is referred to as Bön, although the term covers more than one form of religion and may have already incorporated elements of central Asian religions before state sponsorship of Vajrayāna Buddhism in the eighth century. In older records, the word bön indicates a kind of priest who did funerals and ancestor rites, especially for the royal house. In later centuries, the term bön po came to refer to practitioners of a religious tradition that, while distinct from Buddhism (or chö, i.e., Dharma), preserves a very similar approach to meditation, ritual, philosophy, monasticism, and scriptures. The claim of the old chronicles that the Bön religion had already incorporated a fully developed contemplative system before the arrival of Buddhism in Tibet is being taken seriously in recent scholarship, taking into account archeological discoveries of texts and images in central Asia.

Buddhism in Tibet. A pair of stupas at the monastery of Gyantse in Southern Tibet. COURTESY OF FRANCIS TISO

Inception of Buddhism and the "First Dissemination." The Tibetan Buddhist chronicles, or chos 'byung, are a record of the history of Tibetan religion in continuity with the narratives both historical and legendary of Indian Buddhism. Dramatizing this connection, the claim is made that a Sanskrit Buddhist scripture descended from the sky into the court of king Lha Tho tho ri gnyan btsan (pronounced "Lha Totori Nyentsen," b. circa AD 173), although other sources say it arrived with a delegation from India. Better documentation is available for the importation of Buddhism under the great military ruler Srong btsan sgam po (pronounced "Songtsen Gampo," circa AD 618–650). Under his leadership, the Tibetan empire expanded to many areas where Buddhism was already active, and through two of his political marriages to princesses from Nepal and China, Buddhism came into the court as his wives brought their own spiritual advisors with them. It may be debated whether Srong btsan sgam po himself ever "converted" to Buddhism, but he certainly respected his wives' piety and supported their efforts to build temples in key strategic locations. These buildings were intended to consecrate certain geographical features in order to bring the land itself, and the deities of localities, into harmony with Buddhism.

As part of his program to enhance Tibetan culture, Srong btsan sgam po sent emissaries to Kashmir to learn Indian languages and culture. Some of the scholars he sent remained in this region for many years and devised a written script for Tibet based on the northern Indian Gupta script. They also studied and utilized rules of Sanskrit grammar to regularize Tibetan usage. This laid the groundwork for highly accurate translations of Sanskrit Buddhist texts in the ensuing decades.

The first devout Buddhist king was Khri srong lde btsan (pronounced "Trisong Detsen," c. AD 740–798). He invited the Indian Buddhist sage Śāntarakṣita to Tibet, but upon the monk's arrival, a series of natural calamities gave the Bön priests at the imperial court an opportunity to oppose the importation of Buddhism on the grounds that it angered the local guardian deities and presented a danger to the country. As Śāntarakṣita left, he advised the king to call the nonmonastic tantric adept Padmasambhava (reverently referred to as Guru Rinpoche by all Tibetan Buddhists) to court, as the latter's skills as an exorcist could pacify the local deities.

Padmasambhava arrived in Tibet not long afterward and demonstrated his ability to defeat the anti-Buddhist spiritual forces of Tibet, embodied in dramatic geographical sites and in the violent, mutable climate of the plateau that is called "The Roof of the World." With the spirits pacified, Śāntarakṣita was able to return with his disciple Kamalaśīla. With royal sponsorship, the two Indian monks and Guru Rinpoche established the first Tibetan monastery at Samye in AD 775. Shortly after, perhaps in 779, seven Tibetan nobles were ordained as Buddhist monks, an event remembered as the inception of monastic Buddhism in Tibet. With monastic scholarship in place, it became possible to translate Buddhist scriptures systematically into Tibetan under royal sponsorship. King Trisong Detsen sent young monks abroad for language study, and also invited monk-scholars from India, Kashmir, and China to assist with translation efforts.

The presence in the court of monks from these various areas ensured that doctrinal controversies would arise, and so in 792 the king arranged for a debate to be held in Lhasa between proponents of the Indian model of practice that involved a slow and arduous process of removing defilements and errors from the mind over a long period of time, and the Chinese Chan position of "sudden enlightenment" that held that one can break through to enlightenment in an instant. While most scholars doubt that such a debate ever took place or that the issue was settled all at once, the fact remains that in the long run the Indian view prevailed, and Chinese-style Buddhism lost its foothold among the Tibetans, becoming the standard exemplar of erroneous views of enlightenment in Tibetan polemical literature.

It is said that the Tibetan translations preserve many texts no longer extant in their original Sanskrit perfectly, not only because Tibetan grammar had already been systematized along Sanskrit lines, but because under the reign of King Ral pa can (pronounced "Relbachen," reigned 815–836), the translation bureaus operating in Tibet set standards and translation equivalences and revised the grammars, dictionaries, and scripts to facilitate the accurate representation of Sanskrit expressions and concepts. This constitutes the period of the "old dissemination" of Buddhism, and the texts produced in this period continue to be favored by the Nyingma (elders') School.

Ral pa can's lavish support of Buddhism and his lack of skill in government angered many, and he was assassinated by two ministers. His successor Langdarma (reigned 838–841) vigorously persecuted Buddhism, but without much success outside the immediate environs of the capital. He was assassinated in turn, marking the end of Tibet's period of empire.

The "Second Dissemination." Local rulers throughout the Tibetan regions maintained an interest in Buddhism, however, and interchanges with Indian monks continued. During this period, King Btsan po 'khor re (pronounced "Tsenpo Khoré," late tenth century) of the western region of Gugé became a monk and sent many young monks abroad, as well as inviting Indian monks to Tibet, thus beginning the period of the "second dissemination." The greatest of the visitors was the Bengalese monk Atiśa (982–1054), who arrived in 1042. Atiśa was the foremost Buddhist scholar in India, and a master of both monastic and tantric practices. While in Tibet, his personal authority allowed him to correct deviations from Indian standards. He also composed the treatise Lamp for the Path to Enlightenment, a work important for its ordering of both scholastic doctrine and tantric ritual into a single system. His disciples founded the first fully scholastic lineage of Tibetan Buddhism, called the bKa' gdams pa (pronounced "Kadampa") Order. Other monastic orders emerged in this period. The Nyingmapa continued to flourish due to the periodic discovery of treasure texts said to have been hidden by Guru Rinpoche. The Sakyapa carried on some of the Nyingma practices, adding new elements of scholarly rigor to their training program. The Kagyupa were founded by Marpa and Milarepa to propagate the yogic achievements of the Indian Mahāsiddhas.

The period of Mongol suzerainty (roughly spanning the thirteenth century) saw the rise of Buddhism's political power as the khans looked to religious leaders such as Sakya Pandita for advice and mediation with the Tibetan aristocracy. In this period of the ascendancy of the Sakyapa Order, many monasteries began to have their own private armies. The Mongol armies were called upon as allies by warring factions in this and later periods. The Mongol period also saw the compilation of the Tibetan Buddhist Canon, principally under the direction of the great scholar Bu ston (1290–1364). The power of the Sakyapa Order remained strong in southern Tibet, but gave way to the Phag mo dru hierarchs in central Tibet during the fourteenth century. The Phag mo dru set aside the Sino-Mongolian elements of Tibetan polity, substituting the classic native symbolism of the imperial era.

During the late 1300s and early 1400s, the great scholar-yogin Tsong Kha pa (1357–1419) set about reforming Tibetan Buddhism, building upon the structure of the bKa' gdams pa scholars, the esoteric practices of the Kagyu yogins, and the canonical studies of Bu ston. His efforts gave rise to the dGe lugs pa (pronounced "Gelukba"), or "System of Virtue" school. The school's scholarly rigor and strict adherence to monastic discipline soon won it the patronage of the aristocracy; their encouragement of popular religious festivals won over the masses. In 1578 the dGe lugs leader bSod nams rgya mtsho (pronounced "Sönam Gyatso," 1543–1588) visited the Mongol chieftain Altan Khan, who was impressed with him and gave him the Mongolian title Ta le bla ma, pronounced "Dalai Lama," meaning "Ocean-like Guru." It was not uncommon for Chinese and Mongol leaders to grant honorary titles to Tibetan hierarchs from all schools. The Dalai Lama succession is considered to be an incarnation of the bodhisattva of compassion, Avalokiteśvara. Because of the political ascendancy of the dGe lugs Order, the Dalai Lama was the head of state of Tibet, beginning with triumph of the Great Fifth of the line in 1642. All but the Sixth Dalai Lama were monks, ruling a dual bureaucracy consisting of parallel monastic and aristocratic hierarchies. The dGe lugs Order is itself headed by the Ganden Tripa (the abbot of Ganden monastery, near Lhasa).

The latest great turning point for Tibetan Buddhism came with the Communist takeover of China in 1949, followed by the invasion of Tibet in 1951. At first the Chinese Communist Party tried to coopt the current Dalai Lama in order to facilitate control of the territory, but the relationship became impossible to maintain, and the Dalai Lama fled across the border into India in 1959. Since that time, Tibetan Buddhism, which barely survived the Chinese Cultural Revolution, has flourished in diaspora, as monks and nuns in Tibet itself have been imprisoned and tortured and monasteries destroyed. In Tibet today, the monastic life and lay religious observance survives in remarkable variety, along with strong resentment of the forced union with the People's Republic of China. The exile, since 1959, of the Dalai Lama and many other Buddhist lamas and leaders has also enabled Tibetan Buddhism to spread to all parts of the world, and is today one of the most widespread forms of Buddhism among European, Australian, and American adherents.

Practices. Tibetan Buddhism since the time of Padmasambhava has taken Indian Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna Buddhism as its primary sources for doctrine and practice. Influenced by the lineages transplanted to Tibet from the great north Indian monastic universities, each school has created its own systematic mixture of a highly refined meditation system, tantric ritual, and scholastic philosophy. The young monks are trained over a number of years in the ritual practices, and their studies are perfected through the formal practice of debate, usually under the auspices of a monastic community. However, lay practitioners have always been held in high esteem and have made landmark contributions to the development of Himalayan tantric (Vajrayāna) Buddhism. Through rigorous philosophical training, the adept gains understanding of the Middle Way approach of the great Mahāyāna thinkers of the past. Depending on inclination and aptitude, the disciple learns the liturgical texts and ritual gestures of particular tantric systems. The more advanced adept, under the supervision of a guru, carries out the external rituals and internal visualizations to generate his own body-mind complex as a deity (more precisely, as a Saṃbhogakāya form). Having attained a degree of proficiency, the practitioner is able to engage in more demanding psychophysical exercises bringing about one's transformation as a fully enlightened Buddha. In some of the tantric cycles, sexual union is visualized as the Saṃbhogakāya embodiment of the realization of voidness (equivalent to the feminine form of "wisdom") and the fulfillment of skillful means (the male form) as "compassion." The adept will typically make use of painted scrolls on which the various deities and their realms (Pure Lands; mandala palaces) are depicted in order to train the mind to visualize these forms in their entirety. However, once these visualizations of the deity body are stabilized within the adept's own body, more subtle exercises with the energy channels of the yogic body are applied. Ultimately, boundaries are dissolved through formless meditation. All of these spiritual disciplines are employed with the intention of disclosing the Buddha nature inherent in the human body-mind complex to an increasingly thorough degree. In this way, the advanced adept becomes capable not only of attaining enlightenment, but also of generating himself as a saving, compassionate being capable of intervening for the benefit of others along the way. For a fully enlightened Buddha, the boundaries between cyclic existence and enlightenment melt away, enabling decisive soteriological engagement with the world of beings, beyond the limitations and boundaries of any particular form.

Tibetan Buddhism, like other regional expressions of the Dharma, has distinguished itself through the arts, particularly in the context of ritual performances of the various tantric deity cycles. Sacred dance is highly developed and used for major liturgical celebrations. Some specialist Tibetan monks are widely renowned for their chanting, which employs vocal techniques that enable them to sing several overtones simultaneously. Monastic and lay artisans are renowned for techniques in butter sculpture and sand painting, both arts that intentionally employ perishable materials in order to emphasize the impermanence of all phenomena. Finally, there are well-articulated conventions of painting and sculpture in more permanent media, such as gilded bronze and scrolls painted in brilliant tempera colors.

KOREA

Buddhism was introduced into the Korean peninsula when the local tribes were first consolidating into three large kingdoms (Koguryŏ, Paekche, and Silla), and when Chinese religion, writing, calendrics, and so on were making inroads into Korean culture. Official histories give the date of Buddhism's introduction as AD 372, when a Chinese monk arrived in Koguryŏ bringing scriptures and images.

The Unified Silla Period (668–918). Silla came to prominence in the sixth century, and Buddhism became the official court religion under King Beo pheung (reigned 514–539), who used it as part of an ideological campaign to justify the newly established institution of kingship. He strengthened Korean ties with China and sent delegations of young men there to study Buddhism. The Unified Silla period also marked one of the high points of Korean Buddhist art.

During the early Unified Silla period, scholar-monks such as Wŏnhyo (617–686), Ŭisang (625–702), and Wŏnch'uk (631–696) took advantage of the peace and stability to travel to China and work with eminent masters and translators, returning to Korea to share the fruits of their study. Through their efforts, Korean Buddhism absorbed scholastic forms of Buddhist thought such as Huayan (Korean: Hwaŏm), Consciousness-only (Chinese: Weishi; Korean: Yusik), and tathāgata-garbha thought, and also took in more popular forms, most notably Pure Land (Korean: Chŏngt'o). Wŏnhyo in particular contributed to the systematization of scholastic Buddhism into an overarching structure called "t'ong pulgyo" or "unified Buddhism," and disseminated Pure Land practice widely among the masses.

During this period in China, the Chan or meditation school was coming to prominence, and its methods and teachings began filtering into Korea during the seventh century. However, it was during the period of instability and upheaval at the end of the Silla period, beginning about 780, that the Chan School, known in Korea as Sŏn, came into its own. During this period many students of Hwaŏm and other intellectual schools began traveling to China to study Sŏn, while the government established a system of interlinked official temples to foster Sŏn practice.

The Koryŏ Period (918–1392). T'aejo, the founder of the Koryŏ dynasty, was a devout Buddhist and even left instructions to his heirs stating that the success of the nation depended upon the vitality of Buddhism. With governmental backing, the monasteries engaged in extensive economic activity, and even retained private armies to protect their interests. Such extensive material resources permitted the publication of the entire Buddhist canon between 1210 and 1231. When the woodblocks from this first printing were destroyed by Mongol invasions in 1232, a new set of blocks was ordered, which were completed between 1236 and 1251. Some 81,000 of these blocks remain stored at the Haein-sa on Mt. Kaya in southern Korea.

Buddhism's political and economic power was accompanied by increasing worldliness and corruption. In addition, the schools of doctrinal study and meditation had difficulty defining their unity, and they often quarreled very publicly. This situation led monks such as Ŭichŏŏn (dates unknown) and Chinul (1158–1210) to initiate efforts at reform and definition. The former, a prince of the royal court, remained too partial to the doctrinal schools to have much success, but the latter, through both scholarship and meditative attainment, did bring about some degree of unity. He drew upon the Chinese master Zongmi's (780–841) pioneering work to effect his synthesis and also spread the method of kōan practice among Sŏn adherents. Later figures such as T'aego Pou (1301–1382) continued his efforts and strengthened Sŏn. Nevertheless, Buddhism in the latter part of the Koryŏ went into a decline as corruption and decadence worsened, setting the scene for Buddhism's formal suppression.

The Chosŏn Period (1392–1910). The fall of Koryŏ in 1392 and its replacement by the heavily pro-Confucian Yi dynasty spelled the end of Korean Buddhism's golden age and the beginning of a period of persecution and declining influence. Anti-Buddhist measures were adopted, including a halt to new temple construction, restrictions on ordinations, the actual closing of monasteries in urban areas and their gradual isolation to remote mountain sites, and the proscription of travel by monks and nuns. In the end, monastics were forbidden to enter cities altogether. The panoply of doctrinal and meditative schools in existence at the end of the Koryŏ were reduced to only two: doctrinal study and Sŏn. By the early twentieth century, only the latter remained.

The Japanese Annexation (1910–1945). In August 1910 the Japanese government officially annexed Korea. Ironically, this development actually helped bring an end to Buddhism's long suppression. Since the Japanese saw Buddhism as a common element with Korean culture, they demanded the lifting of many of the restrictions imposed on the clergy by the Yi dynasty. Monks and nuns could freely travel and enter cities once again, and new temples could be constructed closer to population centers. However, Japanese favor proved a mixed blessing: The Japanese also exerted pressure on Korean monks and nuns to abandon their distinct ways of life and practice in order to adopt Japanese Buddhist practices, and to give up much of their institutional independence. The most contentious issues concerned clerical marriage and the addition of wine and meat to the diet, trends that had marked Japanese Buddhist life for some time. Some monks (though no nuns) adopted the new style, while others did not, thus setting the stage for the conflicts that ensued during the postcolonial period.

After the War (1945–present). With the Japanese withdrawal in 1945, conflict broke out between monks who had taken wives and abandoned many of the normal monastic precepts, and those who had not. These latter insisted upon the full restoration of celibacy and the strict enforcement of traditional rules, and they further insisted that the former group relinquish control of monastic properties. The reformers, consolidated under the now-dominant Chogye Order, eventually won out after several court battles, legislative victories, and open hostilities. Thus, after a painful transition period, married monks left the monasteries, and monastic life returned to earlier standards.

After that, the Chogye Order has overseen the revival and revitalization of Korean Buddhism. Some bitterness broke out in the late 1980s and early 1990s between Buddhists and Protestant Christians (the latter group having grown dramatically over the previous hundred years), leading to the burning of some temples;

Vietnamese Buddhism. Vietnamese Spring Festival, Hanoi, Vietnam, 1999. AP IMAGES

but overall, Buddhism has once again taken its place as an integral and harmonious part of Korean society.

VIETNAM

The history of Buddhism in the territory now covered by the country of Vietnam dates back at least to the second century AD. Its territory was under Chinese hegemony through the tenth century, but materials relating the history of Buddhism during the period of Chinese dominance are scarce. Stories dating from this period show the presence of monastic Buddhism, and present tales of scripture-chanting, the erection of images, and the miraculous intervention of monks. Early records also indicate that the late Han-dynasty governor of Jiaozhou, Shi Xie (Si Nhiep), had a large number of Chinese and central Asian monks in his entourage. Official Chinese court records speak of eminent and accomplished monks from Jiaozhou who made their way to the northern capitals, showing that there were sufficient resources there for them to receive detailed training in doctrine, scripture, and meditation; there are also records of foreign monks who settled in Jiaozhou to carry out translation activities. The monk Yijing (635–713), a traveler and historian, mentions that several of them, having taken the southern maritime route to and from India, stopped off in Jiaozhou.

In many respects, Buddhism in Vietnam during this period was simply an extension of Chinese Buddhism. However, there was another strain of Buddhism active in the area at this time. Waves of Indian cultural exports had made their way across Southeast Asia, penetrating as far as Indonesia, and Theravāda forms of Buddhism were among these. Many people in the southern part of Vietnam were more influenced by this form of Buddhism than by Chinese Mahāyāna Buddhism, and so Vietnam came to be the meeting place for the two streams: Mahāyāna going north from India along the Silk Road, down into China, then into Vietnam; and Theravāda going south along the seacoasts through Thailand, Laos, and Cambodia, and into Vietnam. Vietnamese Buddhism, as a result, is a unique mixture of Mahāyāna and Theravāda forms.

By the time Vietnam achieved independence from China in the tenth century, Buddhism had been an integral part of the cultural landscape for over 800 years. The first emperor of independent Vietnam, Dinh Bo Linh, put together a system of hierarchical ranks for government officials, Buddhist monks, and Daoist priests after ascending to power in AD 968. Thereafter, Buddhist monks were part of the national administration, serving the ruler as advisors, rallying the people in times of crisis, and attending to the spiritual needs of the masses.

It was the Lý Dynasty (1010–1225) that willingly coopted diverse elements in its task of constructing a national culture and identity. In this climate, many schools of Buddhism were able to exist side-by-side and compete in an open religious marketplace, further facilitating the intermingling of Mahāyāna and Theravāda forms. Archaeological evidence also indicates that tantric Buddhism had also made its way into Vietnam during this time (stelae with mantras inscribed on them have been discovered). During this time, Buddhism also became more widely disseminated among the common people, as monks came into villages and "converted" local deities, ancestors, and culture heroes to the religion and declared them now "protectors" of the Dharma. This move worked to unify the disparate local cults under the Buddhist umbrella, and it aided in the unification of the country.

In return, the Lý kings supported Buddhism lavishly: giving stipends to eminent monks, erecting and refurbishing temples, and sending envoys to China in search of scriptures. In this way, new developments in Chinese Buddhism were noted in Vietnam, particularly with the importation of Chan works. This created a dichotomy between an older form of Buddhism that was highly syncretistic and incorporated many elements and practices under its umbrella, and a newer Buddhism that inclined to a purer Chinese nature, centered mostly on Chan.

Chan study and practice became more entrenched under the Tran dynasty (1225–1400), although the older forms also remained vital. Tran rulers sponsored the establishment of the first actual schools of Buddhism in Vietnam, beginning with the Truc Lam (Bamboo Grove) Chan School founded by the third Tran king. Missionary monks also arrived continuously from China, bringing both the Lin-chi and Ts'ao-tung Schools into Vietnam, and they found a ready audience among the Tran aristocracy.

In the fifteenth century, the Vietnamese began to conquer and absorb parts of Cambodia, strengthening the interchange between the Vietnamese Chan of the elites and the Theravāda teachings and practices of the Cambodians. The country took its current shape during the eighteenth century, and the country's unique blend of schools of Buddhism was fixed from that time. The French occupation of Indochina, which gave the different ethnic groupings of the land a common tongue, facilitated further interchange between different forms of Buddhism.

During the early twentieth century, many educated Vietnamese began abandoning Mahāyāna Buddhism, which seemed superstitious, in favor of Theravāda Buddhism, which, influenced by Sri Lankan modernism, seemed more pragmatic. An instrumental figure in this evolution was Le Van Giang, who studied Theravāda meditation with a Cambodian teacher, took the name Ho-Tong, and came back to Vietnam to build the first formal Theravāda temple near Saigon. From this headquarters he began actively disseminating Theravāda Buddhism in the local language and produced translations of the Pāli scriptures into Vietnamese. The Vietnamese Theravāda Buddhist Sangha Congregation was formally established in 1957, making what had formerly been an element dispersed throughout Vietnamese Buddhism into a formal school to rival the Chinese-style Chan schools.

During the Vietnam War Buddhist monks were active in efforts to bring hostilities to a close, and many of them immolated themselves publicly to protest the war. Others went abroad to propagate Vietnamese Chan, notably Thich Nhat Hanh. With postwar political stability, an uneasy working relationship characterizes Vietnamese Buddhism's present status under the regime.

MYANMAR (BURMA)

By ancient tradition, Theravāda Buddhism was introduced into Myanmar by two of Aśoka's missionaries from India. Centuries later Indian teachers came via Nepal and Tibet to spread Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna. Nevertheless, King Anawrahta (AD 1044–1077), who unified Myanmar, adopted Theravāda as the state religion, placed restrictions on Mahāyāna sectarians, inaugurated the era of temple building, and appointed his religious adviser as superior general of the order. Although disorganized by the Mongol occupation of 1287 and subsequent Shan raids, the order was revived by Dammazedi (1472–1492), who sent monks to Sri Lanka to secure valid monastic investiture. In 1871 King Mindon Min convened the fifth Buddhist council in Mandalay, but with the British annexation of Upper Myanmar in 1885, Buddhism ceased to be the state religion.

Belief. The Burmese and the Shan Buddhists believe in the "Four Truths" of early Buddhist discourse, the requital of actions, the acquisition and sharing of merits, ethics based on the Dharma, rebirth and nirvāṇa, the canon, impermanence, and nonsoul. Typically, they adhere to both the preexisting animistic belief system and cult of the ancestors for assistance with worldly concerns, as well as the Buddhist belief that gods and spirits are of no ultimate soteriological help on the journey to liberation. Traditionally, the Burmese approach to Buddhism is frankly syncretic, leaving considerable room for spiritual and ethical discipline, social activity, and indulging in more personal contact with the spirits to affirm the full round of their religious sensibilities.

Order and Cult. Burmese monasticism is organized according to that of Sri Lanka. Any male over seven years of age may join the order as a novice (koyin). After initiation (upazin) a monk must observe the 227 monastic rules. Every morning young monks and novices go out to beg for their daily food. The monks perform certain daily exercises, assemble fortnightly for their gathering for the confession of faults (uposatha), and in the rainy season (wa) make their annual retreat. Monks well-versed in meditation practices such as vipassana abstain from devotional practices, but may allow the distribution of blessed metallic amulets to their followers.

Buddhism in Myanmar has neither a formal head nor a centralized organization. Every village has a monastery (kyaung) with a monk (pongyi) in charge and a nearby pagoda. Worship at the shrines is reverential, and apart from a few community exercises it is individual. Devotions and private petitions to the Buddha are popular among the masses. Many pray hoping for a blessing in return, and others repeat Buddha's words with a pure heart as a means of acquiring merit. The veneration of images, relics, and spirits is popular. The New Year Feast (Thingyan) celebrates the annual visit of the king of the spirits, Thagyamin. The beginning of the rainy season is marked by devotions, floats of nats (spirits), and a show of Buddha's birth-stories (zat). The end of the season commemorates Buddha's return from the Tawadeintha heaven.

Despite the lack of a central leadership and organization, most Myanmarese are devout Buddhists deeply attached to the monastic order.

THAILAND

Theravāda Buddhism was introduced probably by Aśoka's missionaries some time after 245 BC and superimposed on the native ANIMISM. In the first centuries AD the country was Hinduized, and it was later influenced by Mahāyāna. Since 1057, however, a modified version of early Buddhism, that is, classic Theravāda, has prevailed over Mahāyāna. However, the stele of King Rama Kamheng of 1292 records the presence of two of the early Hīnayāna schools (traditionally numbered at eighteen). About 1360 Rama Thibodi, founder of the Ayuthia monarchy, believing that it was necessary to get a validation of monastic initiation, sent an abbot to Sri Lanka to enter the order and thus secure the valid succession. King Boromoraja II captured Angkor, the Cambodian capital, and brought back its statesmen and brahmans (1431). Twenty-nine years later his successor used these Cambodian leaders to reorganize the national administration and ceremonial and to establish himself as the divine Buddhist king (Buddha rājā), after Cambodia's divine Hindu kings (Devarājā). Buddhism remained the state religion, but it exhibited the marked influence of HINDUISM and animism. After the fall of the Thai kingdom in 1767, its restorer, Rama I (1782–1809), upheld the national religion, showed devotion to the order, displayed zeal in temple building, promoted the revision of the canon, and published the legal corpus, Phra Dharmaśāstra. In its first volume appeared the Indian Code of the patriarch and seer Manu, dealing with the creation of the world, the state of the soul after death, and the customary law concerning religion, caste, and society. Rama IV (1851–1868) strove to rid the Thai version of Theravāda of animistic, Mahāyānistic, and Brahmanic accretions and reorganized the order. Rama VII (1925–1935) established an ecclesiastical board within the ministry of education, and was made "Upholder of the Faith" by the constitution of 1932, a title reaffirmed by subsequent constitutional drafts.

Order and Ritual Practices. Although Thai monasticism had derived inspiration, instruction, and valid succession from the order of Sri Lanka, the order had not been centralized because of the Hinduization of the country and the political absolutism dating back to 1460. However, Rama IV, initiated into Western scholarship by Catholic and Protestant missionaries, introduced a hierarchical structure into the order, patterning it after Catholic religious orders. Accordingly, authority was vested in a patriarch assisted by fifteen councilors, forming together the supreme chapter. Four leaders were provided for the Mahānikaya School and four for the Dharmayuthika School, and under each there were four subdivision leaders. For each of the ten circles there was an administrator, and provincials served the seventy provinces. Superiors were constituted for the 407 districts, abbots for the precincts, and priors for the temples and monks.

Boys of twelve or more could enter the monastery as pupils. Novices were admitted at any age and for any length of time, but could not become monks before twenty. Monks were exempt from military service. They received jurisdiction to initiate others, as well as titles of their own from the ecclesiastical board. Most of the temples had a monastery, and both were generously endowed by the faithful and the government. The initiation rite showed a combination of Mahāyāna, early Buddhist, and animistic elements. Upon initiation each monk received a credential booklet marked with his name; in this he was to keep his own vital statistics, right thumbprint, his picture, the name of his parents, initiator, and teachers, and the records of his transfers, examinations, positions, legal charges, and laicization.

Public worship was conducted by the monks. They were to reserve the morning service to themselves, except on the four uposatha days set for the laity. In formal services a leader addressed an invocation to the devatas (minor deities) and nāgas (serpents) borrowed from Hinduism. The rainy season retreat (vassa) was marked with rites and pageantry of Buddhist and Hindu flavor. Some of the life-cycle rites (birthday, tonsure, wedding, and funeral) contained Brahmanic features but were conducted by Buddhist monks with charms, amulets, invocations for good fortune, and the sprinkling of magic water. Despite the orthodox doctrine of impermanence and impersonality, most people believed that their good deeds and Buddha's grace could be applied for the repose of the souls of the departed. Rites celebrating national holidays are conducted by Brahmans and Buddhists in a mixture of Hinduism and Buddhism.

Buddhist Action. Thai Buddhism, which is well organized and state supported, has at its disposal the schools, the press, and the state broadcasting system. It freely borrows methods of action from other religions, especially Catholicism. In 1928 the king sanctioned the Buddhamāmaka oath, an adaptation of Catholic confirmation, to be taken by students going abroad. The ritual, although inspired by Catholicism, is a mixture of Buddhism and Hinduism. In 1929 Buddhist religious instruction was introduced into all state schools. The Young Buddhists Association (1933), the Buddha Dharma Association (1934), and similar societies promote Buddhist action among the laity. Buddhism is rooted in Thai history, culture, and psychology and remains the soul of the nation.

CAMBODIA

After centuries of rivalry with Hinduism, the religion of the Buddha became established in Cambodia. By the first century AD the inhabitants, known as the Khmers, had been Hinduized under rulers of Indian and Indonesian descent. However, the conservative Buddhism of Myanmar was accepted by the Khmers in the third century and flourished along with sects worshipping the Hindu deities Siva and Vishnu. Moreover, according to an inscription of 791 recording the erection of an image of the Buddhist Lokeśvara (Avalok iteśvara), Mahāyāna had been introduced into Cambodia, probably tinged with Vajrayāna and the influences of the cults of various Hindu deities. Jayavarman II (802–854), the founder of a kingship at Angkor, called his realm Kambudja, established the cult of the divine king (Devarājā), deriving his authority from Siva, and, at the expense of Buddhism, upheld a form of Hinduism based on the Purāṇas, or treatises on cosmogony and Vedic mythology.

Spread of Buddhism. Hinduism continued to be strong when Indravarman (877–889) began the construction of a magnificent capital at Angkor, Siva's linga, a phallic symbol in stone of his divine authority. His son and successor Yasovarman I (889–900) built temples for the various sects of Siva, Vishnu, Brahmanic Yoga, and Mahāyāna. This religious eclecticism gradually disappeared when Jayavarman VII (1181–c. 1200), a devout Mahayanist, turned the Devarājā cult into that of the Buddharājā, the divine Buddhist ruler. In Sri Lanka his son studied Hīnayāna, which he introduced into Cambodia. Because of its popular appeal and the monastic school system, Theravāda eventually became the predominant religion. After 1350 the religious life was so disrupted by Thai invasions that in 1423 Cambodian monks repaired to Sri Lanka to be reinvested, to ensure valid succession and reorganization of the order in accord with orthodox Buddhism. When in 1460 Cambodia lost its independence to Thailand, Theravāda, largely because of Thai influence, remained the dominant religion.

Belief, Order, Cult. Cambodian Buddhism is a fusion of the predominant Theravāda with archaic ancestor and ghost worship, Brahmanism, and Mahāyāna. Its Hindu COSMOGONY, detailed in the sacred books Trey-Phet and Kampi Preas Thomma Chhean, comprises Prohm (Brahmā), the eternal, uncreated, and uncreating absolute; the universe of countless triads of worlds (chakralaveal) and stars that are worshipped as deities; three categories of paradises; and great and small purgatories where the departed atone for their faults and are reborn on earth or in paradise. The pantheon contains four major Buddhas, including Gautama; Mettrey (Maitreya), the Buddha that will come at the end of time; countless Brahmanic deities; and all the heavenly beings. The universe is full of spirit entities that are invoked and propitiated by the Cambodians in time of need or fear. Although the core of Cambodian Buddhism is Theravāda, the monks tend toward a nontheistic approach to the austere śamatha and vipassana meditations, whereas the people are adept at syncretizing elements of all religions that have crossed the land.

The order is territorially divided into two regions and subdivided into provinces, each with from ten to twenty monasteries and temples, under the jurisdiction of a superior general. The monastic rules, exercises, and privileges are the same as those found in the Thai order. The monastery, where most Cambodian males spend some time in study and meditation, forms the center of religious and social activities. Each village has its temple. The cult includes court ceremonies, holiday rites, private devotions, propitiations, exorcisms, and conjurations against sickness and evil.

EUROPE AND AMERICA

Buddhism arrived in Europe and America in two different ways. First, there have been communities of immigrants into the United States, Australia, and the countries of Europe who have brought Buddhism with them and established communities aimed at their needs. Second, there have been Westerners who have converted to Buddhism, or whose writings drew inspiration from Buddhism, thus preparing an intellectual climate favorable to the conversion of others.

Immigrant Groups. Chinese immigrants began coming to the West Coast of the United States during the gold rush of 1848, and later to assist in building the transcontinental railroads. The companies in China that arranged for their transportation and employment also took responsibility for building temples in areas of high Chinese concentration. These temples were typically Chinese temples that encompassed the range of the "three teachings" of Taoism, Buddhism, and Confucianism, and the few monks who came from China served the communities as ritual specialists. By the end of the nineteenth century many buildings in San Francisco, New York, and other cities had a Chinese temple on the top floor.

Japan had been officially closed to all foreign contact since the beginning of the seventeenth century, but after the forced opening of Japan by Commodore Perry in 1854, the government began allowing Japanese to travel abroad. Many went to Hawaii to work on the sugar plantations, and a Jōdo Shinshū priest arrived in 1889 to serve their needs and provide funeral services. Japanese living on the mainland at this time tended to leave Buddhism behind in an effort to adapt. However, as a part of the internment experience of Japanese-Americans during World War II, the Jōdo Shinshū established congregations on the West Coast and in the Midwest, grouped together as the Buddhist Churches of America, which continues to cater principally to Japanese community needs. Many Japanese workers also came to South America, and the first Buddhist temple for Japanese immigrants was established in São Paulo, Brazil, in 1932.

Other groups have also established Buddhist temples and monasteries for the benefit of their people living abroad in the West, such as the Thai monastery (Wat Carolina Buddhajakra Vanaram) in Bolivia, North Carolina, and Vietnamese temples in the United States, Canada, and Europe.

Western Convert Groups. By and large, the majority of native Westerners who convert to Buddhism have embraced one of three traditions: Tibetan (both dGe lugs pa and the older orders such as the Nyingmapas, Kagyupas, and Sakyapas), Japanese (Zen, both Soto and Rinzai; and increasingly, Soka Gakkai, along with some Jodo Shinshu converts), and Theravāda from a variety of Southeast Asian traditions. A wider Western awareness of and interest in Buddhism dates back two centuries, to the colonization of India and the activities of Sanskrit scholars who began making and disseminating translations of classic texts. The ideas sparked interest among Western intellectuals such as Emerson, Thoreau, and other New England transcendentalists, as well as European romanticists such as Friedrich Schlegel, who were influenced by Sir Edwin Arnold's epic poem on the life of the Buddha, The Light of Asia, published in 1879, and the Theosophist Henry Steele Olcott's A Buddhist Catechism, published in 1881. Arnold himself cooperated with Anagarika Dharmapala (1864–1933) to found the Maha Bodhi Society in England and India in 1891 with the intent of reviving Buddhism in India. This partly inspired the movement to bring the Indian dalit castes into Buddhism, led by B.R. Ambedkar (1891–1956).

A real turning point was reached when the World Parliament of Religions opened in Chicago in 1893, bringing several significant Asian Buddhist figures to America, such as Soyen Shaku and Dharmapāla. Several of them remained in America after the close of the Parliament and continued missionary activities in many major cities. Dharmapāla opened the American chapter of the Maha Bodhi Society in 1897.

Early in the twentieth century, a handful of Westerners became sufficiently enthusiastic about Buddhism to travel abroad to seek monastic ordination, while others remained at home and founded Buddhist societies, such as the British Buddhist Society, founded in 1924 as a lodge within the Theosophical Movement, from which it broke free within two years. In the United States, Japanese Zen missionaries began arriving and working among non-Asian American populations, but met with little success until the 1950s, when D.T. Suzuki (1870–1966) began reaching a wide audience through his writings and talks. In Europe, the largest convert groups were to be found in England and Germany, but significant centers are now well-established in France, Switzerland, Italy, and parts of Eastern Europe.

The end of World War II marked a watershed in the dissemination of Asian Buddhism among non-Asian groups. More Asian missionaries came to the West, and Westerners themselves began gaining credentials as teachers and masters within Asian traditions. At this time, Buddhism began making its first inroads into Australia as well. The swelling number of missionaries and teachers meant a growing plurality of styles of Buddhism, and more converts adopted it as a holistic religious commitment rather than as an intellectual alternative. Since the 1970s, the number of Buddhist centers and groups in Western countries has risen dramatically, although it should be noted that, by approximately 1990, only in the United States and Australia did the number of Buddhists exceed 1 percent of the population among Western nations listed in Baumann's 2000 article.

Western Buddhist Movements. In the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries, the dichotomy between immigrant and Western convert groups became blurred. As the children of immigrants become increasingly westernized, and as children of converts are raised as Buddhists, the outlook of the groups tends to converge, leading to forms of Buddhism that are neither simple transplants of Asian traditions nor Western appropriations of such.

Generally, Buddhist groups in the West tend to consist of educated, middle- to upper-class populations. Their generally modernist outlook leads some of them to abandon aspects of traditional Asian Buddhism that strike them as "superstitious," such as rites for the dead, veneration of relics, practices intended to create merit, and the transference of this merit to improve the status of deceased family members, and even the ideas of karma and rebirth, in some circles. They also have abandoned aspects of Buddhist practice that connected it with traditional communities, such as the alms-begging round and monastic ordinations that functioned as coming-of-age rites.

Buddhism has also been adapted by these groups (as well as by many that remain in Asia) for the conditions of modernity. Emphasis is more on lay practice than on the need for monastic vows, leading to the establishment of "meditation centers" rather than monasteries. Much attention has been given to the role of women and the bureaucratization of leadership. Even the tradition of meditation, practiced only by a minority of specialists in traditional Buddhism, has come to the fore among lay practitioners, as Buddhism serves more psychological and therapeutic needs. As a result, Buddhism in the West, and around the world, has a tendency to become less devotional and pietistic, and more intellectual, rational, and therapeutic. However, it is also worth noting that there are strong traditionalist movements that encourage intensive retreat practice, devotionalism, and ritual integrity, particularly among Chinese, Tibetan, and Theravāda lineages.

Globalization. One of the effects of the modern period, with its legacy of colonialism and current ease of travel and contact, is an unprecedented globalization of Buddhism. The organization of this article itself suggests that Buddhism grew in discrete geographical areas within self-contained cultures, and so indeed it has throughout most of its history. However, the modern period has seen Tibetan Buddhists interacting with Chinese Buddhists, Sri Lankan Buddhist monks traveling to Taiwan to study Chinese in order to read and translate Chinese Buddhist classics, and Japanese Buddhists living side-by-side with Western Buddhists who take elements from all previous forms and add some of their own. The result has been the weakening of boundaries and the increase in mutual influence, thus creating a global Buddhism that no longer is defined by boundaries, but by openness. In addition, new attention to the role of women in the monastic life has led some nuns to seek full ordination from Chinese lineages in Taiwan, in order to restore the order in other Buddhist lineages throughout the world.

Aside from the more informal cross-fertilization that modern circumstances helped to foster, the contemporary situation has also led to the establishment of Buddhist organizations with transnational constituencies and aims. The most prominent of these is the World Fellowship of Buddhists, founded in Sri Lanka in 1950. In addition to this umbrella organization, individual Buddhist organizations, once purely local in their operations, have established branch offices and centers in other localities and other countries. Examples include Fo Kuang Shan (Taiwan), the Diamond Sangha (United States), and the Insight Meditation Society (Sri Lanka/United States).

SEE ALSO Bodhisattva; Brahman; Communism; Confucianism and Neo-Confucianism; Daoism (Taoism); Gnosticism; Manichaeism; Nirvāṇa; Pali Canon; Shaman and Medicine Man; Shintoism; Theosophy; Vajrayāna (Diamond Vehicle); Yoga.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Masao Abe, Zen and Western Thought (Honolulu, Hawaii 1985).

Masao Abe and Steven Heine, Buddhism and Interfaith Dialogue (Honolulu, Hawaii 1997).

Martin Baumann, "Global Buddhism: Developmental Periods, Regional Histories, and a New Analytical Perspective," Journal of Global Buddhism 2 (2000): 1–43.

Kenneth K.S. Ch'en, Buddhism in China: A Historical Survey (Princeton, N.J. 1964).

Heinrich Dumoulin, Zen Buddhism: A History (Bloomington, Ind. 2005).

Rick Fields, How the Swans Came to the Lake: A Narrative History of Buddhism in America, 3rd edition (Boston 1992).

Richard F. Gombrich, Theravada Buddhism: A Social History (London 1988).

Peter Harvey, An Introduction to Buddhism (Cambridge, U.K. 1990).

Akira Hirakawa and Paul Groner, A History of Indian Buddhism (Honolulu, Hawaii 1990).

Donald S. Lopez, ed., Buddhism in Practice (Princeton, N.J. 1995).

Donald S. Lopez, Curators of the Buddha: The Study of Buddhism under Colonialism (Chicago 1995).

Alicia Matsunaga and Daigan Matsunaga, Foundation of Japanese Buddhism, 2 vols. (Los Angeles 1976).

Kōgen Mizuno, Buddhist Sutras: Origin, Development, Transmission (Tokyo 1982).

John Powers, Introduction to Tibetan Buddhism (Ithaca, N.Y. 1995).

Koyu Sonoda and Yusen Kashiwahara, Shapers of Japanese Buddhism (Rutland, Vt. 1994).

John S. Strong, The Experience of Buddhism: Sources and Interpretations (Belmont, Calif. 1995).

Donald K. Swearer, The Buddhist World of Southeast Asia (Albany, N.Y. 1995).

Môhan Wijayaratna, Buddhist Monastic Life, translated by Claude Grangier and Steven Collins (Cambridge, U.K. 1990).

Paul Williams, Mahāyāna Buddhism: The Doctrinal Foundations (London 1989).

Charles B. Jones
Associate Dean for Graduate Studies, School of Theology and Religious Studies
The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.

Rev. Antonio S. Rosso OFM
Pontificio Ateneo Antoniano
Rome, Italy

Rev. Francis V. Tiso
Associate Director, Secretariat for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs
United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, Washington, D.C. (2010)

Charles B. Jones
Associate Dean for Graduate Studies, School of Theology and Religious Studies
The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C. (2010)

BUFALO, GASPARE DEL, ST.

Founder of the Missionaries of the PRECIOUS BLOOD (CPPS); b. Rome, Jan. 6, 1786; d. there, Dec. 28, 1837; beatified on December 18, 1904 by Pope Pius X; canonized on June 12, 1954 by Pope Pius XII.

He was educated at the Collegio Romano and while yet a seminarian he catechized, visited hospitals, and reactivated the Santa Galla hospice for homeless men. After ordination (1808) he took as spiritual director Canon Francesco Albertini, known for his devotion to the Precious Blood, and assisted him in establishing a pious union of the Precious Blood in the church of San Nicola in Carcere. As a canon of the church of San Marco, Gaspare was summoned to swear allegiance to NAPOLEON I when the latter gained control of the STATES OF THE CHURCH. For his refusal he spent about four years (1810–1814) in exile and prison. Returning to Rome, he was assigned by PIUS VII to preaching missions in the Papal States. Encouraged by the pope, Cardinal Cristaldi, and others, he established the Society of the Precious Blood (August 15, 1815) and opened its first house in the monastery of San Felice in Giano (Umbria). He also advised St. Maria de MATTIAS (canonized by Pope John Paul II on May 18, 2003) to found the PRECIOUS BLOOD SISTERS. The rest of his life was devoted to preaching, spiritual direction, and defense of his society against the sharp objections that were made because of its title. Outstanding was his missionary activity in the bandit-infested areas of the Papal States and the kingdom of Naples. Among his friends were St. Vincent PALLOTTI and St. Vincenzo STRAMBI. Pope John XXIII called him the greatest apostle of the Precious Blood.

Feast: January 2.

SEE ALSO PRECIOUS BLOOD, III (DEVOTION TO).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

John A. Colacino, CPPS, The Sources of Gasparian Spirituality (New York, 1996).

Luigi Contegiacomo, CPPS, St. Gaspar's Prison Experiences, 1810–1813 (New York, 1988).

Afonso De Santa Cruz, Missionário de Sangue: São Gaspar del Bufalo (Curitiba 1975).

Barry Fischer, CPPS, Strokes of the Pen III: Extracts from the Letters of St. Gaspar del Bufalo Written in the Years 1826–1827 (New York, 1992).

Missionaries of the Precious Blood Official Web site, available from: http://www.mission-preciousblood.org/ (accessed October 5, 2009).

Giorgio Papàsogli, Vita e tempi di San Gaspare del Bufalo (Turin 1977).

Giulio Piccini, L'origine della maschera di Stenterello (Florence 1898, rep. Bologna 1975).

Vincent Sardi, Herald of the Precious Blood: Gaspar del Bufalo, tr. E. G. Kaiser (Minneapolis 1954).

Rev. Andrew J. Pollack CPPS
Assistant Professor of History, Patrology, and Oriental Theology
St. Charles Seminary, Carthagena, Ohio

EDS (2010)

BÜTLER, MARÍA BERNARDA, ST.

Baptized Verena; missionary; foundress of the Franciscan Missionary Sisters of Maria Help of Christians; b. May 28, 1848, Auw, Aargau, Switzerland; d. May 19, 1924, Cartagena, Colombia; beatified by Pope John Paul II in Rome, October 29, 1995; canonized by Pope Benedict XVI in Rome, October 12, 2008.

Verena, born into a Swiss peasant family, completed her education at fourteen and went on to do farm work. As a young woman she fell in love and was engaged to be married, but she heard GOD's call and in turn broke off the engagement. She entered a local convent at eighteen, but returned home when she realized this was not the place God wanted her to be. In her daily activities and prayer, she continued to feel drawn to consecrated life, and, at the suggestion of her pastor, she joined the Franciscan Missionary Sisters of Maria Hilf at Altstätten. She was professed as María Bernarda in 1869 and served as novice mistress. Soon after she was elected superior of the convent, in which capacity she served for nine years.

Her enthusiasm prompted Bishop Schumacher (1839–1907) of Portoviejo, Ecuador, to invite her to establish the community's presence in his country. María Bernarda left Switzerland with six sisters on June 19, 1888. In Ecuador she founded communities of the Franciscan Missionaries of Mary Help of Christians (María Ausiliatrice) in Chone, Santana, and Canoa Ben. In 1985 persecution forced her community into exile in Bahia, Brazil. From there fifteen sisters traveled to Colombia, where they were welcomed by Bishop Eugenio Biffi (1829–1896) of Cartagena, who gave the sisters a wing of the Obra Pia women's hospital. While remaining in Colombia, where she continues to be especially remembered and loved, Mother María Bernarda founded communities in Austria and Brazil. At the age of seventy-five, she died after fifty-six years of religious life serving the poor and sick.

A miracle attributed to her intercession was approved on March 26, 1994. When she was beatified, Pope JOHN PAUL II remarked in his homily that Mother María Bernarda "was convinced that the principal virtue is charity, the soul of all other virtues." On October 12, 2008, she was canonized by Pope BENEDICT XVI, who commended her devotion to the Eucharist as well as her obedience to the WORD of God: "she went everywhere proclaiming that the Lord invites all to his banquet; thus allowing others to participate in the love of God to which she dedicated herself with faithfulness and joy throughout her life." She is the first modern Swiss woman to be canonized.

Feast: May 19.

SEE ALSO CANONIZATION OF SAINTS (HISTORY AND PROCEDURE); RELIGIOUS (MEN AND WOMEN).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Benedict XVI, "Holy Mass for the Canonization of Four New Blesseds: Gaetano Errico (1791–1860), María Bernarda Bütler (1848–1924), Alfonsa of the Immaculate Conception (1910–1946), Narcisa of Jesus Martillo Moran (1832–1869)," (Homily, October 12, 2008), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/benedict_xvi/homilies/2008/documents/hf_ben-xvi_hom_20081012_canonizzazioni_en.html (accessed July 27, 2009).

Margaret Bunson and Mathew Bunson, John Paul II's Book of Saints (Huntington, Ind. 2007), 371–372.

L'Osservatore Romano, English edition, n. 44 (1995): 1–2, 4.

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Mary Bernard (Verena) Bütler (1848–1924)," Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/2008/ns_lit_doc_20081012_verena_en.html (accessed July 27, 2009).

Katherine Rabenstein
Senior Credentialing Specialist
American Nurses Association, Washington, D.C.

Elizabeth C. Shaw
Independent Scholar
Washington, D.C. (2010)

C

CAESAROPAPISM

The term Caesaropapism is a modern usage and has been generally applied to Christian rulers and societies, especially the medieval BYZANTINE EMPIRE. Justus Henning Böhmer (d. 1749), a gifted Protestant canonist who made significant contributions to the history of Catholic canon law, may have been the first to coin it. In his work on Protestant canon law Böhmer discussed two forms of "perverse human long-standing customs" that he considered dangerous for a just society: papo-caesaria, in which the church legislated in matters that pertained to the secular state, and Caesaro-papia, in which a secular sovereigns promulgated laws that invaded territory that should be the proper jurisdiction of the church. He mentioned that an example of Caesaro-papia could be seen in the first book of the Emperor Justinian's book of laws, the Codex. Indeed, the first book of Justinian's Codex contains a long list of imperial constitutions from the Emperor Constantine to Justinian that regulated ecclesiastical affairs. In contrast to Böhmer's measured definition of "Caesaropapism," later scholars and reference works defined the term very narrowly and deformed Böhmer's careful definition. First, they used it primarily to describe the constitutional structure of the Byzantine Empire between the reign of the Emperor Justinian (d. 565) and the fall of the empire to the OTTOMAN TURKS in 1453. Then they argued that the Byzantine state was a regime in which the sovereign was the head of the church and the state, and that he exercised absolute authority and jurisdiction over the ecclesiastical realm. They defined this form of government as Caesaropapist. In response historians have rightly pointed out that no Byzantine emperor ever held absolute authority over the secular and the ecclesiastical institutions of the empire. Although Byzantine emperors did have extensive jurisdictional power over the church, they rarely promulgated legislation that dictated dogmatic norms. A consequence of this historiographic development has been that Caesaropapism has been discredited as a useful concept for historical analysis.

When he coined the term Böhmer did not define Caesaro-papia as a sovereign's absolute authority over ecclesiastical matters, nor did he connect the concept exclusively with Byzantium. He had used Justinian's Codex as an example of what he meant by the term. Following Böhmer, it could still be a useful term to describe the authority of a lay ruler to participate in the governance of the church in a society. THEOCRACY can be used to describe a variety of different governing systems in which religious leaders hold secular political power to varying degrees, but no word exists in English or in other languages to define the opposite system of governance. Böhmer's definition of Caesaropapism could fill that lacuna.

King-Priest. The king (regnum) and the priest (sacerdotium) have always been two centers of power and authority in human society and government. Until modern times the most common form of government in the world unified these two powers in one way or another. In the Judeo-Christian tradition the figure of a priest-king had great antiquity. Melchisedech was a mysterious figure in the book of GENESIS who was described as a priest of the most high God and the king of Salem (Gn 14:18). MOSES was another archetype of the priest-king. Later popes, especially Pope INNOCENT III (1198–1216) and his successors, used Melchisedech to prefigure and to justify papal temporal power. In the high MIDDLE AGES popes did exercise extensive secular power in the papal states (Patrimonium Petri). In those lands the popes were theocratic rulers. In several Muslim lands today theocratic governments are in place.

The figure of the king-priest also had deep roots. In the ancient world rulers often held religious as well as secular duties and powers. For the development of the concept of Caesaropapism, the king-priest, Rome is of great importance. The title and authority of the Pontifex maximus (Great Priest) over Roman religious institutions gradually began to be taken over by secular rulers during the late Roman republic. The first to do so seems to have been Julius Caesar who was elected Pontifex maximus in 63 BC by the Roman senate. As the Roman state was transformed into a monarchy, in addition to their other titles, emperors adopted the title of Pontifex maximus. When the first Christian emperor, Constantine (306–337), decided to engage in the controversy surrounding the heresy of Arianism, he quite naturally considered it within his imperial authority—because he was the Pontifex maximus—to call the Council of NICAEA and to preside over its deliberations. In his mind it was the Christian sovereign's right and duty to guide his Church. Christian emperors continued to use the title of Pontifex maximus until the Emperor GRATIAN refused to accept the title in 376 or 379. No later Eastern emperor used the title, and the last vestige of a Christian emperor's connection with Roman religion vanished. Even though the title died, the idea that the Byzantine emperor should play a large role in ecclesiastical affairs did not. At a very early date the bishops of Rome adopted the title, however, and it remained a papal title until modern times.

Eastern Christian World. Within the Eastern Christian world the tradition of the Eastern Roman emperors exercising considerable jurisdiction over ecclesiastical affairs and institutions that had begun with Constantine continued for centuries. Byzantine emperors did call Church councils and issue extensive legislation that affected the church. The Emperor Justinian (527–565) legislated in many areas of Christian life, most importantly perhaps, in marriage. His laws changed many norms of marriage and divorce. The appointment of the Patriarch of CONSTANTINOPLE needed the emperor's approval. It can be said that in the Eastern Orthodox Christian tradition rulers exercised much more authority and jurisdiction over ecclesiastical affairs than in the West. The Russian czars, for example, traditionally exercised considerable jurisdiction over the Orthodox Church.

Western Christian World. In the West, Christian rulers also legislated in ecclesiastical matters during the early Middle Ages and exhibited some aspects of a limited Caesaropapism. CHARLEMAGNE (Charles the Great, 768–814) issued a large number of capitularies (laws) that touched many areas of Church discipline. He also involved himself in dogmatic and liturgical questions. Until the twelfth century, Charlemagne's relationship to the Church and the relationship of other Western princes to ecclesiastical institutions were not unusual in the West. The border between secular and ecclesiastical authority was blurred. Kings meddled in the affairs of the Church on a regular basis and thought they had the right to do so. The beginnings of a separation of Church and State in Western Christendom began in the eleventh century, during a period that has been called the Investiture Controversy, the GREGORIAN REFORM Movement, or a "papal revolution." A series of popes from Pope LEO IX to Pope GREGORY VII promulgated conciliar decrees and issued papal DECRETALS that established the independence of the clergy and ecclesiastical institutions from the lay jurisdiction. It took almost two centuries before these new principles were generally accepted by European Christian princes.

The high medieval paradigm of an independent Church lasted until the Protestant Reformation. When he broke away from Rome, King HENRY VIII of England assumed the leadership of the Anglican church. He and his successors remain the titular head of the Anglican church until the present day. Other Protestant sovereigns also exercised jurisdiction over their churches. LUTHER's theology of the "two-kingdoms" dictated that the church had no legislative authority and jurisdiction. Consequently, Protestant princes exercised significant jurisdictional and legislative authority over the churches in their realms.

A similar movement occurred in Catholic countries. From the sixteenth century on, European Catholic princes extracted concessions from Rome that enhanced their control of their national churches. In France and Spain kings reached concordats (agreements) with Rome that granted them far more authority over their national churches than they had ever exercised since the Investiture Controversy. With the Concordat of Bologna in 1516, concluded between the French King Francis I and Pope LEO X, the French king and his successors were granted rights over the appointment of clergy. The king could even restrict appeals to Rome. Historians have called the movement in France to restrict papal authority over the French church and to enhance the rights of French bishops and the French king, GALLICANISM. In 1523 Pope HADRIAN II granted the Spanish king the same right to appoint ecclesiastical benefices as the king of France had obtained. In the eighteenth century, the papacy concluded concordats with Savoy, Spain, and Portugal, granting sovereigns significant authority over ecclesiastical institutions. All of these developments in Latin Christendom can be described as examples of Böhmer's definition of Caesaropapism.

SEE ALSO Canon Law, History of; Constantine I, The Great, Roman Emperor; Investiture Struggle; Justinian I, Byzantine Emperor; Orthodox and Oriental Orthodox Churches; Reformation, Protestant (in the British Isles); Reformation, Protestant (on the Continent); Roman Empire.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Justus Henning Böhmer, Ius ecclesiasticum protestantium: Usum hodiernum iuris canonici iuxta seriem Decretalium ostendens et ipsis rerum argumentis illustrans, 5 vols. (Halle-Magdeburg 1756–1789), 1.10–11.

"Caesaropapism," The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church, edited by F.L. Cross (London 1958), 215.

"Caesaropapismus," dtv-Wörterbuch der Kirchen-geschichte, edited by Georg Denzler and Carl Andresen (Munich 1982), 153.

Gilbert Dagron, Emperor and Priest: The Imperial Office in Byzantium, translated by Jean Birrell (Cambridge, U.K. 2003); original title: Empereur et prêtre: Étude sur le "césaropapism" byzantine (Paris 1996).

Deno J. Genakopolos, "Church and State in the Byzantine Empire: A Reconsideration of the Problem of Caesaropapism," Church History 34 (1965): 381–403; reprinted in Byzantine East and Latin West: Two Worlds of Christendom in the Middle Ages and Renaissance: Studies in Ecclesiastical and Cultural History (New York 1966).

Brian Tierney, The Crisis of Church and State, 1050–1300 (New York 1964; reprint, Toronto 1989).

John Witte Jr., Law and Protestantism: The Legal Teachings of the Lutheran Reformation (Cambridge, U.K. 2002).

Kenneth Pennington
Professor
The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.
(2010)

CAGOTS

The Cagots (Agotes in Spanish) were an ethnic minority in the Pyrenees Mountains who were subjected to a popular racism for reasons that still remain shrouded in mystery. For nearly nine centuries, they were repressed as social pariahs throughout southwestern France (the Basque country, Gascony, the valleys of the Pyrenees, and parts of the Languedoc) and northern Spain (Navarre and Aragon). According to the place and the period, the Cagots were also called Chrestians or Chrestiaas (before the sixteenth century); Gézitaings (after the sixteenth century); Gahets or Gafos (in Bordeaux, Landes, and Agen); Agots (in the French Basque provinces); Capots (in Armagnac); and Agotak (in Spanish Navarre). Whereas the clergy sometimes strongly condemned their treatment as outcasts, the aristocracy only fuelled popular resentment by exempting the Cagots from taxation.

During the 1300s, the Cagots were regarded with loathing, and even horror. One of the more common names used for them during this period was Crestia or Chrestiaas or even Christianus. These names are all synonymous with "leper" in the Béarnese language of the Pyrenees. By contrast, the name Chrestians denotes the Christian followers of ARIANISM, the religion adopted by the LOMBARDS, VISIGOTHS, and Ostrogoths before their conversion to Catholicism in 587. It is possible that when the FRANKS vanquished these once all-conquering Germanic peoples, some of them sought refuge among those outcasts afflicted with leprosy. Nevertheless, they did not cling onto any heretical beliefs. In medieval texts the term Christianus is inseparable from leprosus and even used in its place.

To add to the confusion, the Cagots were also called Ghézitaings (or Gézitains), recalling ELISHA's servant Gehazi in the Old Testament. In Bigorre they were labelled Cascarrots whereas in Anjou they were referred to as Capots or "Swamp People" (gens de marais). Finally in Brittany they appear in old documents as Caqueux, Caquins, or Caquous. Many believe that the name Cagot derives from Canis Gothi (Dog of a Goth). This belief was fuelled by the notion that they were the descendants of the Visigoths who once occupied southern Europe. Yet while the etymology of the name remains uncertain, their nickname—"Canards" (ducks)—comes from the curious emblem in the form of a red duck foot that they were forced to wear on their clothing at all times.

In contrast to other discriminations based on race, religion, or even language, the persecution of the Cagots remained local and very arbitrary. Victimized by irrational fear, the Cagots were accused of poisoning wells, practicing sorcery, cannibalism, having webbed hands and feet, and having no ears (or, at the very least, no ear lobes). Believed to emit a noxious odor, they are often described in the literature as blond-haired and blue-eyed with a ruddy complexion. Similar to Jews who were forced to wear a yellow "Star of David" by the Nazis centuries later, the Cagots were obliged to wear a distinctive sign, generally a red duck foot, sewn onto their clothes. Regulations dating from 1396 in the town of Marmande stipulate that the "Gahets" should wear a sign in red material sewn onto the left side of their garments.

In France, the Cagots were not permitted family names; instead "Chrestians" or "Cagot" followed their first names. When they died they were buried in a separate part of the local cemetery, if not in an altogether different spot. Although they were Christians, they were obliged to enter the church through doors so low that they were forced to stoop. Once inside, they were relegated to the back of the congregation. When they were denied access to the church service, the EUCHARIST was handed to them at the end of a long pole.

In Spain, the Cagots were permitted to adopt distinctive family names, although they were forced to remain within their neighborhoods. In fact, they were not spared a single humiliation that the medieval mind could conjure up. Their ghettos, called "Cagoteries," were areas that had formerly been reserved for lepers. They were forbidden from exercising any professions involving earth, fire, and water, yet in an odd twist they often served as healers, surgeons, and midwives. They were permitted to touch wood, and they thus became well known as carpenters. In the days when instruments of torture were made of wood, they also became executioners. They also worked as weavers and rope and basket makers. Until the reign of Louis XIV, they were exempt from paying taxes.

The Cagots' long struggle for dignity and freedom can be traced back to 1513 when a group of Navarran Agotes petitioned Pope LEO X for indulgence. In the document, although there is no evidence that they had clung to their beliefs, they admitted to being descendants of the Albigensian Cathar heretics and asked to be forgiven for the sins of their fathers. The Holy Father answered that they should be treated "with the same compassion as other faithful," and he asked Don Juan de Santa Maria in Pamplona to oversee this.

Despite the backing of the Holy Roman Emperor CHARLES V, improvements for the Cagots were halted by a series of lawsuits. Thus a pattern soon developed: The Cagots would win their lawsuits, often with the backing of the clergy and the aristocracy, only to see progress wither away under the discrimination of the local authorities and the general populace. This phenomenon has been well documented by the Spanish historian Maria del Carmen Aguirre Delclaux in her doctoral dissertation Los Agotes, published by the Principe de Viana Institute in 1977.

As with the Jews and Protestants, lasting progress for the Cagots came only after the FRENCH REVOLUTION and Napoleon. In 1818 the regional Cortes in Pamplona abrogated all of the discriminatory laws dating from the Middle Ages. Finally, it was the Industrial Revolution and the ensuing depopulation of the countryside that led to the real end of this discrimination. The Cagots intermarried with the local populations, and eventually only the term was left as a grim reminder of a nine-hundred-year-old curse.

SEE ALSO ALBIGENSIANS; FRANCE, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; GERMANIC RELIGION; GOTHS; HERESY; LEPROSY (IN THE BIBLE); LOMBARD LEAGUE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Pio Baroja, Las Horas Solitarias (Madrid 1918).

J. Cenac-Moncaut, Histoire des peuples et des états Pyrénéens (Paris 1860).

María del Carmen Aguirre Delclaux, Los Agotes (Pamplona, Spain 1977).

Francisque Michel, Histoire des races maudites: De la France et de l'Espagne (Sala Bolognese, Italy 1986, originally published in 1847).

Osmin Ricau, Histoire des Cagots (Bordeaux, France 1963).

Felix Urabayen, El Barrio Maldito (Madrid 1925).

Christopher Jones
Independent Scholar
Midi-Pyrenees, France (2010)

CAJETAN (TOMMASO DE VIO)

Scholastic philosopher and theologian, biblical commentator; b. Gaeta, Italy, February 20, 1469; d. Rome, August 10, 1534.

Although baptized Giacomo (James) de Vio, Cajetan came to be named for the city of his birth (Il Gaetano; in Latin, Caietanus). At the age of sixteen he entered the Dominican conventual province of Naples at Gaeta, receiving the religious name of Tommaso. He studied in the priory at Naples, where St. THOMAS AQUINAS had entered the order in 1244. Cajetan took up theology in Bologna and went to Padua in 1491 to complete his studies, where he became a lecturer on metaphysics in the priory and on the Sentences at the university (1493). Padua gave him formative contacts with naturalist interpretations of ARISTOTLE and with a Scotist adversary, Antonio TROMBETTA. At the Dominican general chapter at Ferrara in 1494, he held a successful disputation, with an exchange of ideas with Giovanni PICO DELLA MIRANDOLA. This led to Cajetan's promotion to master in sacred theology by the Dominican Master General. At the invitation of Duke Ludovico Sforza he taught at Pavia (1497–1499), lecturing on the Summa of St. Thomas and beginning his monumental commentary on that work. In 1501 Cajetan was called to Rome to serve as procurator general of his Order, with responsibility for the order's dealings with the HOLY SEE. During this time he preached several Advent and Lenten sermons before Popes ALEXANDER VI and JULIUS II. On the death of Master General John Clérée, in 1507, Julius II appointed Cajetan vicar-general of his order. Elected a year later as Master General (1508–1518), Cajetan stressed reform, study, and the common life; settled certain difficulties involving devotees of Girolamo SAVONAROLA; sent the first Dominican missionaries to the New World; and defended the mendicant orders at the Fifth Lateran Council (1512–1517).

From 1508 until his death Cajetan was deeply involved in ecclesiastical affairs. When consulted about the schismatic Council of Pisa (1511), he urged Julius II to convoke a legitimate council. He ordered Dominicans not to support Pisa and he sent friars to the scene to win over the Pisan clergy and people to the pope's cause. Cajetan published treatises on papal authority against French conciliarists, De comparatione auctoritatis papae et concilii (1511), and the Apologia (1512) of this work. At the Fifth Lateran Council in 1512, he spoke at the second session on behalf of a theological notion of the Church in contrast with prevailing political conceptions. He urged ecclesiastical reform, and participated in discussions on AVERROISM and the IMMACULATE CONCEPTION. Cajetan was made cardinal priest of St. SIXTUS on July 6, 1517, and was sent to Germany the following year as legate of Pope LEO X to solicit backing of the German princes for a crusade against the Turks. During his legation to the Augsburg Diet (1518), he was deputed by Pope Leo to bring Martin LUTHER to retract his attack on indulgences. Even though Cajetan prepared for meeting Luther by analyzing the Reformer's theology in fifteen treatises, his effort was unsuccessful. But Cajetan remained in Germany to play a role in the election of the new German emperor in 1519. He first represented to several electors Leo X's opposition to the Habsburg prince, Charles of Spain, but soon after communicated the pope's agreement to his election as Emperor CHARLES V. On March 14, 1519, Cajetan was appointed bishop of Gaeta, his native city. He took part in the consistory of 1520 that prepared Leo X's bull censuring selected assertions by Luther. After the conclave of 1522 elected ADRIAN VI, the new pope sent Cajetan as his legate to Hungary to promote a crusade. After the death of Adrian (September 14, 1523), Cajetan was recalled by Pope CLEMENT VII, who allowed him to devote his full time to study and preparing biblical commentaries. Cajetan experienced the Sack of Rome (May 1527) and, when kidnapped by imperial troops, he borrowed 5,000 ducats to pay the ransom. He went to his diocese until early 1528 to have income for paying the debt incurred. During the last illness of Clement (1534), Cajetan was for some a possible successor, but he himself was gravely ill and died on the morning of August 10, 1534, at the age of sixty-six. He was buried according to his wishes at the entrance of the Dominican church of Santa Maria sopra Minerva so that the faithful might walk over his grave, but since 1666 his remains have been preserved in the sacristy.

Cajetan was a man of prayer and devotion to study, simple and exacting with regard to himself, but broad-minded and generous with regard to others. His sense of the needs of the Church motivated his labors to provide a theology and norms of church reform drawn from St. Thomas and from biblical interpretation based on the original, literal sense of the text.

Giacomo de Vio (1469–1534). Popularly known as Cajetan, this Scholastic philosopher still influences Catholic social and moral thought. THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

Writings. Over 150 works, long and short, came from the pen of Cajetan. Most of them can be dated accurately from his habit of indicating at the end of each work the date and place of composition. Apart from acts and official documents, his writings may be grouped under three headings: philosophical, theological, and exegetical.

Philosophical. The commentaries and treatises were the fruit of Cajetan's teaching at Padua, Pavia, Milan, and Rome between 1493 and 1507. They include commentaries on Porphyry's Isagoge (1497); Aristotle's logical works and De anima (1509, from earlier notes); and on St. Thomas's De ente et essentia (1495). Cajetan's De nominum analogia (1498) remains a much-studied, but controversial, treatment of ANALOGY in logic and metaphysics.

Theological. Between 1507 and 1524, while he was Dominican Master General and papal legate, Cajetan remained theologically productive. In short treatises he spoke to moral issues of the day, such as taking interest on banking transactions, and he published responses on selected issues raised by the Protestant Reformation, especially the Roman Primacy (De divina institutione pontificatus Romani pontificis, 1520, against Luther) and the Eucharistic real presence (Instructio nuntii circa errores libelli de cena Domini, 1525, against Huldrych ZWINGLI). His most important work is the commentary on the Summa theologiae of St. Thomas (Part I, completed in 1507; I–II, completed in 1511; II–II, completed in 1517; III, completed in 1520), which made him the pioneer figure in the second flowering of scholastic thought, with influence on the School of Salamanca and John of St. Thomas. Later treatises on issues of Reformation debate, De sacrificio missae (1531) and De fide et operibus (1532), offer disciplined arguments from Scripture, with the latter work contributing to the Catechism of the Council of TRENT on the influence of Christ the Head on the good works of his members.

Exegetical. Biblical work filled Cajetan's years from 1524 until his death. Setting aside the allegorical and "mystical" interpretations found in patristic and medieval work on the Old Testament, he labored to retrieve the authorial intention, having Jewish assistants explain to him the Hebrew text. For the New Testament, Catejan used the Greek text of ERASMUS. In his exegesis Cajetan rarely mentions Reformation issues or Protestant claims, but regularly contrasts the worldview of scripture with the secularizing Aristotelians who leave no place for God's creation and providential care of humans. Cajetan aimed to foster a "return to the sources" to put theology and preaching on the solid basis of what the mediators of God's revelation actually wrote. Furthermore, biblical examples give Christians, especially religious orders and bishops, numerous admonitions for reforming their lives and ministries. Cajetan's 1527 Psalms commentary, dedicated to Pope CLEMENT VII, includes a new literal translation from the Hebrew into Latin. His commentaries on the Gospels (1527–1528), Epistles (1528–1529), Pentateuch (1530–1531), historical books (1531–1532), Job (1533), and Ecclesiastes (1534) provoked opposition, because he insisted that the Latin Vulgate needed correction in many passages. Cajetan followed St. Jerome not only on the authority of the hebraica veritas but also in not accepting the Deuterocanonical books as authoritative. He questioned the authenticity of Mark 16.9–20 and John 8.1–11, while doubting the apostolic authorship of Hebrews, James, 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, and Jude. Cajetan admitted he did not grasp the literal meaning of Song of Songs and Revelation, leaving these books without commentary. This biblical work was attacked by the Dominicans Ambrosius Catharinus, Bartolomé de Medina, and Melchior Cano. After a denunciation by Catharinus, the University of Paris theology faculty prepared a list of twenty-four errors by Cajetan for censure, but at the request of Clement VII no formal judgment was made. However, someone leaked the text and Luther had it published in Wittenberg (Weimar Ausgabe, vol. 60, pp. 114–130), adding remarks critical of the Parisian theologians so attached to the traditional Vulgate. Over a century passed before Richard Simon reviewed Cajetan's biblical work appreciatively.

Doctrine. Cajetan stands out as a gifted and influential thinker of the Thomistic tradition. He joined other Dominicans in Cologne, Paris, and Salamanca who replaced the Sentences of PETER LOMBARD with the Summa of St. Thomas as the basic text of theological instruction. Cajetan exerted wide influence on modern Thomism, both among followers and those who contested his views, especially after Pope PIUS V ordered the publication of Cajetan's Summa commentary, albeit with selected omissions of untraditional passages, with the complete works of St. Thomas in 1570. LEO XIII had it included in its entirety in the critical edition of the Summa (1888–1906). Little is known about Cajetan's intellectual formation. His polemics with Averroists and Scotists, his sympathy for Renaissance humanism, and his involvement in practical affairs did much to shape his philosophical and theological outlook. His Thomism was not simply a restatement of St. Thomas but a Thomistic approach to problems of his day. Many of the opinions he held are not to be found in St. Thomas but are insights of his own.

In philosophy, Cajetan stressed the Aristotelianism of St. Thomas, at times to the detriment of St. Thomas's originality. Constantly attacking Scotist views of being and abstraction, he presented a concept of being, which though analogical, might be considered too realistic and formalistic, depending as it does on the pseudo-Thomistic Summa totius logicae. Those following Cajetan in metaphysics stressed essence and substance, to the detriment of notions of existence (esse) and participation that came to the fore among twentieth-century Thomists. Cajetan's doctrine of analogy emphasizes the importance of proportionality. For Cajetan, the proper subject of metaphysics is attained by "formal abstraction" from all matter. In the metaphysical constitution of the person Cajetan posited a special modality (subsistentia) to terminate the essence prior to existence. His doctrine of psychological abstraction, while basically Thomistic, he explained in terms of extrinsic illumination of the phantasms by the active intellect, which operates also within the thinking intellect. On moral topics, Cajetan insists on the intrinsic evil, for persons and humankind, of what God forbids, in contrast to Scotist and Occamist accounts which make God's commands and prohibitions the basis of good and evil.

Cajetan came to hold that the immortality of the human soul cannot be demonstrated by reason. In a sermon in Rome in 1503, Cajetan gave reasons for the soul's immortality from the spirituality of intellectual and volitional functions, much as St. Thomas had done. Commenting on the Summa (1a, 75.2) in 1507, he confirmed the validity of St. Thomas's reasoning. But when preparing his De anima for publication in 1509, he admitted with AVERROËS that Aristotle had denied the immortality of the personal thinking intellect because of its dependence on phantasms; consequently only the universal active intellect is immortal and separated. However, Cajetan maintained that the immortality of the individual soul could be demonstrated from Aristotelian principles. But in 1527, commenting on Matthew 22, he asserted that immortality is not rationally demonstrable. He repeated this in his commentary on Romans 9 in 1528, listing immortality among mysteries of faith with the Trinity and Incarnation. Commenting on Ecclesiastes 3 in 1534, he asserted that no philosopher has ever demonstrated the immortality of the soul, and that this truth is known only through Christian revelation. The reason for Cajetan's change of view is still far from certain, but Thomists after Cajetan, beginning with the prolific Bartolommeo Spina (c. 1475–1546), have rejected this view as incompatible with the teaching of St. Thomas and Christian tradition.

In his commentary on the Summa, Cajetan is a faithful expositor of St. Thomas, in spite of the complexities that he adds. In the first two parts, his principal adversaries are DUNS SCOTUS, HENRY OF GHENT, GREGORY OF RIMINI, PETER AUREOLE, and DURANDUS OF ST. POURÇAIN. In sacramental theology, he criticizes Luther and Zwingli on occasion. In Biblical exegesis, Cajetan shows affinities with humanism, while relating texts to major tenets of doctrine. In the spirit of St. Jerome, aspects of his criticism were in advance of his time. While his farsightedness in biblical interpretation and concerning church reform were little appreciated by his contemporaries, his scholastic theology found immediate response in Italy and Spain. Even in the twenty-first century Cajetan is often a stimulating guide to St. Thomas, while his insights can enrich Catholic dialogue with the Reformation and his modernity impresses on many moral and social issues.

SEE ALSO DOMINICANS; LATERAN COUNCILS; SCHOLASTIC METHOD; SCHOLASTICISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

WORKS BY CAJETAN

Opuscula omnia (Lyons, France 1587, reprint Hildesheim, Germany 1995).

In De ente et essentia commentaria, edited by M.H. Laurent (Turin, France 1934).

Commentary on Being and Essence, translated by L.H. Kendrzierski and F.C. Wade (Milwaukee, Wis. 1964).

Scripta philosophica. De nominum analogia. De conceptu entis, edited by N. Zammit and H. Herin (Rome 1934).

The Analogy of Names, translated by E.A. Buchinski (Pittsburgh, Pa. 1953).

Opuscula oeconomica-socialia, edited by N. Zammit (Rome 1934).

"On the Immortality of Minds" (1503 sermon), in Renaissance Philosophy: New Translations, edited by L.A. Kennedy (The Hague, Netherlands 1973), 46–54.

Commentaria in De anima Aristotelis Libri I-II, edited by I. Coquelle, 2 vols. (Rome 1938–1939).

Commentaria in De anima Aristotelis Liber III, edited by G. Picard and G. Pelland (Bruges, Belgium 1965).

De comparatione auctoritatis papae et concilii cum Apologia eiusdem tractatus, edited by V.M.I. Pollet (Rome 1936).

"On the Comparison of the Authority of Pope and Council" and "Apology ... Concerning the Authority of the Pope Compared with That of the Council," in Conciliarism and Papalism, edited and translated by J.H. Burns and T.M. Izbicki (Cambridge, U.K. 1997), 1–133, 201–284.

"Le discourse de Cajetan au Ve concile de Latran," edited and translated by C. Morerod, Revue thomiste 105 (2005): 595–638.

Tractatus de indulgentiis (1517), in Dokumenta zur Causa Lutheri, edited by P. Fabisch and E. Iserloh, 2 vols. (Münster, Germany 1988–1991), 2:142–68.

Cajetan et Luther en 1518: Edition, traduction, et commentaire des opuscules d'Augsburg de Cajetan, edited and translated by C. Morerod, 2 vols. (Fribourg, Germany 1994).

De divina institutione pontificatus Romani Pontificis (1520), edited by F. Lauchert (Münster, Germany 1925).

Instructio Nuntii circa errors Libelli de Cena Domini, edited by F.A. von Gunten (Rome 1962).

Cajetan Responds: A Reader in Reformation Controversy, edited and translated by J. Wicks (Washington, D.C. 1978).

Commentaria in Summam theologicam divi Thomae, in Sancti Thomae de Aquino Opera omnia iussu Leonis XIII P. M. edita (Rome 1882–), vols. 4–12.

Opera omnia quotquot in Sacrae Scripturae expositionem reperiuntur, 5 vols. (Lyons, France 1639, reprint Hildesheim, Germany 2005).

WORKS ABOUT CAJETAN

Claus Arnold, Die römische Zensur der Werke Cajetans und Contarinis (1558–1601). Grenzen der theologischen Konfessionalisierung (Paderborn 2008).

Johannes Beumer, "Suffizienz und Insuffizienz der Hl. Schrift nach Kardinal Thomas de Vio Cajetan," Gregorianum 45 (1964): 816–824.

Anton Bodem, Das Wesen der Kirche nach Kardinal Cajetan (Trier, Germany 1971).

Thomas A. Collins, "The Cajetan Controversy," Amercian Ecclesiastical Review 128 (1953): 90–100.

Thomas A. Collins. "Cardinal Cajetan's Fundamental Biblical Principles," Catholic Biblical Quarterly 17 (1955): 363–378.

Yves M.J. Congar, "Bio-Bibliographie de Cajetan," Revue thomiste 17 (1934–35): 1–49.

Dennis Doherty, The Sexual Doctrine of Cardinal Cajetan (Regensburg, Germany 1966).

Jose A. Dominguez Asensio, "Infalibilidad y potestad magisterial en la polémica anticonciliarista de Cayetano," Communio (Seville) 14 (1981): 3–50, 205–226.

Bernhard Felmberg, Die Ablasstheologie Kardinal Cajetans (Leiden, Netherlands 1998).

Etienne Gilson, "Cajetan et l'existence," Tijdschrift voor Philosophie 15 (1953): 267–286.

Etienne Gilson, "Cajétan et l'humanisme théologique," Archives d'histoire doctrinale et littéraire du moyen âge 22 (1955): 113–136.

Josef F. Groner, Kardinal Cajetan (Fribourg, Germany 1951).

A.F. van Gunten, "La contribution des 'Hébreux' à l'oeuvre exégètique de Cajetan," in Histoire de l'Exégèse au XVIe Siècle, edited by O. Fatio and P. Fraenkel (Geneva 1978).

Barbara Hallensleben, Communicatio: Anthropologie und Gnadenlehre bei Thomas de Vio Cajetan (Münster, Germany 1985).

Joshua P. Hochschild, "The Rest of Cajetan's Analogy Theory: De nominum analogia, Chapters 4–11," International Philosophical Quarterly 45, no. 3 (2005): 341–356.

Ulrich Horst, "Der Streit um die hl. Schrift zwischen Kardinal Cajetan und Ambrosius Catharinus," in Wahrheit und Verkündigung, edited by L. Scheffczyk et al. (Munich, Germany 1967), 1: 551–577.

Álvaro Huerga, "El Cardinal Cayetano ante los problemos theológicos del Neuvo Mondo," in S. Tommaso Filosofo, edited by A. Piolanti (Vatican City 1995).

Thomas Izbicki, "Cajetan on the Acquisition of Stolen Goods in the Old and New Worlds," in Rivista di storia del cristianesimo 4 (2007), 499–509.

Rupert J. Mayer, "Zum 'desiderium naturale visionis Dei' nach Johannes Duns Scotus u. Thomas de Vio Cajetan. Eine Anmerkung zum Denken Henri de Lubacs," Angelicum 85 (2008): 737–763.

Ralph McInerny, "Where Cajetan Went Wrong," in Aquinas and Analogy (Washington, D.C. 1996), 3–29.

Edward P. Mahoney, "Cajetan (Thomas de Vio)," in Routledge Encyclopedia of Philosophy, edited by Edward Craig (London 1998), 2: 171–175.

C. Morerod, "Le prêtre chez Cajetan," Revue thomiste 99 (1999): 245–279.

Marcel Nieden, Die Christologie des Thomas de Vio Cajetan (Leiden, Netherlands 1997).

Michael O'Connor, "Exegesis, Doctrine and Reform in the Biblical Commentaries of Cardinal Cajetan (1469–1534)" (D.Phil. diss., Oxford University, 1997).

Michael O'Connor, "A Neglected Fact of Cardinal Cajetan: Biblical Reform in High Renaissance Rome," in The Bible in the Renaissance, edited by R. Griffiths (Aldershot, U.K. 2001), 71–94.

Michael O'Connor, "Cajetan on Paul," in A Companion to Paul in the Reformation, ed. R. W. Holder (Leiden 2009), 337–362.

Bruno Pinchard, Metaphysique et semantique: Autour de Cajetan (Paris 1987).

Bruno Pinchard and S. Ricci, eds., Rationalisme analogique et humanisme théologique. La culture de Thomas de Vio "Il Gaetano" (Naples, Italy 1993).

Patrick Preston, "Cardinal Cajetan and Fra Ambrosius Catharinus in the Controversy over the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin in Italy, 1515–51," in The Church and Mary, edited by R.N. Swanson (Woodbridge, U.K. 2004).

Franco Riva, Analogia e univocità in Tommaso de Vio "Gaetano" (Milan, Italy 1995).

Eckehart Stöve, "De Vio, Tommaso," in Dizionario biografico degli Italiani (Rome 1960–), 39: 567–578.

Jared Wicks, "Thomism Between Renaissance and Reformation: The Case of Cajetan," Archiv für Reformationsgeschichte 68 (1977): 9–32.

Jared Wicks, Cajetan und die Anfänge der Reformation (Münster, Germany 1983).

Jared Wicks, "Roman Reactions to Luther: The First Year (1518)," Catholic Historical Review 69 (1983): 521–562.

Jared Wicks, "Thomas de Vio, Cajetan (1439–1534)," in The Reformation Theologians, edited by C. Lindberg (Oxford, U.K. 2002).

Jared Wicks, "Cajetan, Tommaso de Vio, O.P. (1439–1534)," in Dictionary of Major Biblical Interpreters, edited by D.K. McKim (Westmont, Ill. 2007): 283–287.

Rev. James Athanasius Weisheipl OP
Associate Professor of History of Medieval Science, Pontifical Institute of Medieval Studies, Toronto, Canada
Director of the Leonine Commission, American Section

Rev. Jared Wicks SJ
Professor, Department of Religious Studies
John Carroll University (2010)

CALL TO ACTION CONFERENCE

The Call to Action Conference was a national assembly sponsored by the Catholic bishops of the United States in connection with the U.S. Bicentennial of 1976. Along with recommendations on social and political issues, the participants, designated by dioceses and Catholic organizations, adopted many concerning issues in the Church. The conference was an important episode in the phenomenon of Catholic questioning and rejection of Church doctrines and laws after the Second Vatican Council, but negative reactions to its methodology and conclusions made it a setback for the ideal of shared responsibility in the Church.

In anticipation of the bicentennial, the National Conference of Catholic Bishops (NCCB) established a committee to plan and direct the bishops' contribution to the observance. Its chairman was Cardinal John DEARDEN of Detroit, former president of NCCB and its sister organization, the United States Catholic Conference (USCC). Staffing at the national level was provided by NCCB/USCC under the direction of its general secretary, Bishop James S. RAUSCH. The Dearden committee proposed a number of bicentennial-related activities, with the principal one a program called "Liberty and Justice for All," envisaged as a platform for advocacy on behalf of justice and peace.

The plan called for national hearings leading up to a national conference designated Call to Action, a title drawn from a document published ten years earlier by Pope PAUL VI on justice in the world. At the start of the consultation process in February 1975, Cardinal Dearden said the purpose was to determine "how the American Catholic community can contribute to the quest of all people for liberty and justice"; Catholics, he added, should contribute to "the economic, political and cultural betterment of all peoples."

The national hearings were held in Washington, D.C.; San Antonio, Texas; Minneapolis, Minnesota; Atlanta, Georgia; Sacramento, California; and Newark, New Jersey, and involved participation by some five hundred persons who made recommendations to panels, including some bishops. Parish discussions also occurred in a number of places as did diocesan and regional hearings. In all, there were 800,000 parish responses, although it is impossible to tell how many people were involved because many responses came from more than one person and many people participated in more than one response. Material from all these sources was reviewed by eight preparatory committees that produced working papers and recommendations for consideration by the Call to Action Conference.

The conference was held October 20–23, 1976, in a Detroit convention center and was attended by some 1,340 delegates appointed either by the ordinaries of 152 of the 167 U.S. dioceses or by 92 national Catholic organizations, with one delegate per organization. Almost a third of the delegates were priests, including 110 bishops, a little more than a third were women, and half were Church employees. The delegates, meeting in small groups, used the working papers and recommendations of the preparatory committees as bases for discussion, but they exercised a free hand in formulating recommendations of their own (for example, a recommendation endorsing the Equal Rights Amendment to the U.S. Constitution). In the end, they produced 29 general recommendations divided into 218 separate items.

By the standards of the time, many of the items struck observers as radical, especially coming from an assembly of Church people gathered under the auspices of the Catholics bishops. Among them were recommendations for returning laicized priests to ministry, ordaining married men and women, accepting lay preachers, allowing freedom of conscience on contraception, adopting a more open attitude toward homosexuality, and letting divorced and remarried Catholics receive communion. Recommendations in the social and political spheres called for amnesty for Vietnam War resisters and for undocumented aliens along with other legislative changes.

Controversy ensued. Archbishop Joseph L. BERNARDIN of Cincinnati, president of NCCB/USCC, said special interest groups had "dominated the conference." Others objected that neither the consultation nor the assembly was representative of American Catholics. Moreover, in devoting so much attention to internal issues in the Church, the conference had gone well beyond the agenda of "economic, political and cultural betterment" originally outlined by Cardinal Dearden. The bishops of NCCB/USCC received the Call to Action recommendations with expressions of appreciation and set up an ad hoc committee to oversee their implementation, but little was ever done.

Unknown to many people, the Call to Action Conference had another purpose besides the stated one: reviving a National Pastoral Council of the Catholic Church in the United States. When the bishops' dual-conference structure, NCCB/USCC, was created in 1966 following VATICAN COUNCIL II, the planners intended that the United States Catholic Conference should evolve into such a body. Significantly, the first president of NCCB/USCC was Archbishop—later, Cardinal—Dearden, who later headed the bicentennial planning. Also part of this development was the National Advisory Council, a body of bishops, clergy, religious, and laity created in 1969 to oversee the civic-political agenda of USCC (and, later, the NCCB as well).

A National Pastoral Council was seen as a body through which a similarly representative group would formulate policy for the Church in the United States in the civic-political arena. The advisory council conducted a feasibility study of the idea culminating in August 1970 in a national conference in Chicago. They concluded that a National Pastoral Council was desirable, but not immediately possible; instead, they recommended that one be in place by the time of the bicentennial.

In January 1973, however, the Vatican's Congregation for the Clergy sent world bishops a letter saying National Pastoral Councils were not opportune. The Call to Action Conference represented an attempt to create a prototype of such a body without calling it that. Negative reactions to Call to Action frustrated the achievement of that goal.

Call to Action subsequently was appropriated by some Catholics as the name of an organization advocating such progressive causes as the ordination of women to the priesthood, an end to mandatory celibacy for priests, the abandonment of Church teaching on various sexual issues, and changes in Church governance.

SEE ALSO DISSENT; MAGISTERIUM, ASSENT TO THE; UNITED STATES CONFERENCE OF CATHOLIC BISHOPS (USCCB).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Msgr. George Anthony Kelly, The Battle for the American Church (Garden City, N.Y. 1981).

Russell Kirk, The Sword of Imagination (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1995).

David J. O'Brien, Public Catholicism (New York 1989).

Russell B. Shaw, Ministry or Apostolate?: What Should the Catholic Laity Be Doing? (Huntington, Ind. 2002).

Joseph Varacalli, Toward the Establishment of Liberal Catholicism in America (Washington, D.C. 1983).

Russell Shaw
Freelance Writer
Washington, D.C. (2010)

CANDELARIA OF ST. JOSEPH, BL.

Baptized Susana Paz Castillo Ramirez; foundress, CARMELITE SISTERS of Mother Candelaria (Altagracia de Orituco (Guarico), Venezuela; b. August 11, 1863, Altagracia de Orituco (Guarico), Venezuela; d. January 31, 1940, Porlamar, Venezuela; beatified April 27, 2008, by BENEDICT XVI.

Susana Paz Castillo Ramirez was the daughter of Francisco de Paula Paz Castillo and María del Rosario Ramírez, a hard-working couple dedicated to providing the best education possible for their children. Susana's father died when she was seven, leaving the family in difficult financial circumstances. When her mother died in 1887, the twenty-four-year-old became head of a family that included siblings, cousins, and her mother's godchildren.

In the early part of the twentieth century, Venezuela experienced both natural disaster and political turmoil. In addition to her family duties, Susana assisted in the care of those injured in the earthquake of 1900, and the victims of violence associated with authoritarian rule in the country. In 1903 two doctors founded St. Anthony's Hospital in Altagracia, and Susana, with the encouragement of the parish priest, Fr. Sixto Sosa, helped to set it up and care for the patients. Over time, other dedicated caregivers joined Susana, working at the hospital and living together in a community. This congregation was officially established on December 31, 1910, as a diocesan institute called the Sisters of the Poor of Altagracia de Orituco. The sisters worked under harsh conditions, sustained only by charity until, in 1916, Mother Candelaria of St. Joseph, as Susana had become known, began actively raising funds to finance their efforts. During this campaign she established two new hospitals: one at Porlamar, on Isla de Margarita, called the Hospice for the Abandoned, and a second at Upata.

In 1922 Carmelite priests established themselves in Porlamar at the parish of St. Nicholas of Bari, with the approval of now Bishop Sosa. On January 1, 1925, Mother Candelaria petitioned the Carmelite General for the affiliation of her community, and the group was accepted as the Tertiary Carmelite Sisters, later becoming the Carmelite Sisters of Mother Candelaria. Mother Candelaria professed perpetual vows in 1927 and guided the community until 1937. Though she was very ill upon turning over her duties to a new superior general, Mother Candelaria continued to serve the community as mistress of novices.

A caregiver to the sick, champion of the poor and powerless, and woman of great faith, Mother Candelaria led and served her community by example until her death. In beatifying her, Cardinal José Saraiva Martins praised her piety and humanity, saying that she truly possessed the "art to console." The BEATIFICATION of Mother Candelaria was the first to take place in Venezuela.

Feast: February 1.

SEE ALSO CARMELITES; RELIGIOUS (MEN AND WOMEN); VENEZUELA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

"Candelaria de San José," Carmelite Order Web site, available from http://www.ocarm.org/pls/ocarm/consultazione.mostra_pagina?id_pagina=659 (accessed August 10, 2009).

Congregation for the Causes of Saints, "Misa de Beatificación de la Madre Candelaria de San José, Homilía del Cardenal José Saraiva Martins," Vatican Web site, April 27, 2008, available (in Spanish) from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/congregations/csaints/documents/rc_con_csaints_doc_20080427_beatif-candelaria_sp.html (accessed August 10, 2009).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Bl. Candelaria of Saint Joseph (1863–1940)," Vatican Web site, April 27, 2008, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/2008/ns_lit_doc_20080427_candelaria-de-san-jose_en.html (accessed August 10, 2009).

Fernando Millan Romeral, Serving Him through the Poor: Letter from the Prior General Fernando Millan Romeral to the Carmelite Family on the Occasion of the Beatification of Mother Candelaria of St. Joseph (Kent, U.K. 2008).

"Venezuelans Celebrate Beatification of Mother Candelaria de José," Catholic News Agency, available from http://www.catholicnewsagency.com/new.php?n=12490 (accessed August 10, 2009).

Elizabeth Inserra
Independent Scholar
New York, N.Y. (2010)

CANONIZATION OF SAINTS (HISTORY AND PROCEDURE)

All mankind was created in the image and likeness of God. Because of ORIGINAL SIN mankind lost the likeness of God in the soul. The mysterious plan of God was gradually revealed first to the people of Israel and through them to all humanity. God would send His Son the God-man, Jesus Christ as MESSIAH and SAVIOR. Only God could make total satisfaction for the original sin, and only a human being could express sorrow and repentance for the sin committed. Christians are called to participate in the plan of God and to conform their lives to that of Christ. Thus, all men and women are called to be saints. The universal call to HOLINESS is extended by the gracious will of God to all mankind in order that, at the end of this earthly pilgrimage, men and women might live forever in heaven with God.

The holiness that is required for canonization, however, is evidenced in the Christian who either has freely given his life in witness to the faith by accepting martyrdom (a MARTYR) or has practiced all the Christian virtues in a heroic manner and has died a natural death (CONFESSOR). The martyr and the confessor are the object of the grace of God given them for a particular moment in the history of the Church and mankind. The canonized saint has conformed his life more closely to that of Christ by responding to this grace. Having discerned the activity of the Holy Spirit in the Christian, the Church proposes to the faithful the saint as a model for the faithful on how to live the faith and an intercessor before God for their moments of difficulty in this life.

The Catechism of the Catholic Church, n. 828, states: "By canonizing some of the faithful, i.e., by solemnly proclaiming that they practiced heroic virtue and lived in fidelity to God's grace, the Church recognizes the power of the Spirit of holiness within her and sustains the hope of believers by proposing the saints to them as models and intercessors" (The Catechism of the Catholic Church, n. 828). This definition makes no reference to the martyr who has followed Christ most closely by imitating the greatest act of love accomplished on CALVARY. A definition more theological in its perspective can be found in the introduction of the Apostolic Constitution The Divine Teacher and Model of Perfection, promulgated by Pope JOHN PAUL II (1978–2005) on January 25, 1983. It states: "From time immemorial the Apostolic See ... has proposed, for the imitation, veneration and invocation by the faithful, men and women who are outstanding in the splendor of charity and other evangelical virtues and, after due consideration, has declared them to be among the Saints in the solemn act of canonization." A definition from a canonical perspective may be found in the entry SAINTS AND BLESSEDS.

History. Soon after its beginning the primitive Church venerated the memory of the Blessed Virgin Mary and the ANGELS, who had participated more closely in the salvific work of Jesus Christ. To this was added the apostles who were his closest collaborators in the preaching and spreading of the Christian faith. The Christian faithful soon venerated also the holy men and women of the Old Testament since they too shared in a particular way in the plan of God for the salvation of mankind through Jesus Christ. The Blessed Mother, the apostles, and figures such as David and Elijah of the Old Testament were given the title of "Saint" simply by popular devotion and general acclamation.

Martyrdom was the primordial experience of Church of the first three centuries, which gave rise to what is called the cult or the veneration of the martyrs. The persecution of the early Christians gave rise to the veneration of those who had given witness to the faith, preferring a violent death to denying the faith. (The Greek word for giving witness is marturein, which is translated in English as the word "martyr.") Because the martyrs had more closely followed Christ and had given their lives in this bloody manner, the early Christians considered them as models for imitation to likewise attain the crown of victory in heaven. They gathered around their tombs in the catacombs in prayer and in celebration of the Eucharist, and they invoked their aid and INTERCESSION before the throne of God. Three elements are common to this early experience. From a moral standpoint, the martyr was considered an object of veneration by the faithful because he was a model for their imitation, and the martyr was invoked as an intercessor because he was now living in the presence of God. From a liturgical standpoint, the memory of the martyr was venerated by the faithful in a liturgical manner.

In AD 313 the experience of the early Church changed radically. The emperor CONSTANTINE I signed the Edict of Milan and proclaimed religious toleration in the Roman Empire. On the heels of its new found freedom, the early Church began to venerate more heroes of the faith. The canonization or proclamation of an individual as a saint was accomplished by the translatio corporis (transfer of the body). The body of the saint was exhumed from the catacombs and solemnly transferred to a BASILICA newly built in his or her honor. There, the RELICS could be preserved and the memory of the saint honored by the faithful in a more dignified and fitting manner. The popular conviction about the holiness of the individual was the deciding factor for his or her canonization. Although there is no historical evidence that any juridical investigation of the sanctity of the individual was conducted by the local bishop, it is safe to conclude that the translatio corporis could and would not have been conducted without his express consent.

Canonization Mass. Pope John Paul II arrives in St. Peter's Square to celebrate the canonization of Spanish priest Josemaría Escrivá de Balaguer y Albás, October 7, 2002. © REUTERS/CORBIS

The vocation of the Christian to follow Christ closely and to attain SALVATION has been a constant in the life of the Church. The Christian is called to practice all the Christian virtues, that is, the theological and CARDINAL VIRTUES, as well as all other virtues connected to them. The Christian worthy of canonization, that is, proposed to the faithful for imitation, intercession, and veneration, is one who has lived all these virtues in a heroic or extraordinary manner. These early centuries saw the beginnings of desert spirituality and monastic life as responses to the vocation to follow Christ in a more radical way, thereby attaining entrance into heaven. St. Benedict, in the West, and St. BASIL, in the East, established rules of Christian living which are still today the keystones of religious life.

From the fifth through the twelfth centuries, canonizations were performed by the local bishop. Some bishops, however, did invite the Bishop of Rome to preside over these ceremonies in order to give greater importance to the saint. It would seem that a parallel theological development occurred. On the one hand, a saint was considered a universal figure because holiness is the vocation common to all Christians. On the other hand, universal jurisdiction in the Church was seen more and more as the prerogative of the Supreme Pontiff alone. It followed logically then that only the Roman Pontiff could canonize or declare someone a saint.

Papal intervention in this area of Church life became necessary also because of the abuses evidenced in the granting of veneration to individuals. Around AD 1180, Pope ALEXANDER III (c. 1100/1105–1181) wrote to a bishop informing him that he had no right to canonize a monk, whom the bishop had declared to be a martyr after his being killed in a bar-room brawl. In this letter Alexander stated clearly that canonization was the prerogative of the Roman Pontiff alone. Soon after the reservation of canonization to the Roman Pontiff became universal Church law in AD 1234, when Pope GREGORY IX (1227–1241) inserted the letter of Alexander III into the Decretals, a collection of laws for the universal Church.

Episcopal canonizations, however, continued unabated for quite some time. On January 22, 1588, Pope SIXTUS V (1585–1590) promulgated the constitution Immensa aeterni Dei and thereby established the Roman Curia to assist him in the governance of the Church. The Congregation of Sacred Rites was charged with overseeing the liturgical or ritual life of the Church that included the canonizations of saints. New procedural norms were decreed. In AD 1642 Pope URBAN VIII (1623–1644) published a collection of decrees under the title Urbani VIII Pontificis Optimi Maximi Decreta servanda in Canonizatione et Beatificatione Sanctorum. Accedunt Instructiones, et Declarationes quas Em.mi et Rev.mi S.R.E. Cardinales Praesulesque Romanae Curiae ad id muneris congregati ex eiusdem Summi Ponitificis mandato condiderunt.

During the seventeenth century, the theological significance of the saint for the Church remained unchanged. The saint is an object of special veneration by the faithful since he or she is a model for imitation and an intercessor before God, as well as an object of veneration in the liturgical life of the Church. The martyrdom or heroic virtues and the miracles attributed to his or her intercesson were to be ascertained by means of a canonical or investigative process. The decrees of Urban VIII organized and regulated the granting of veneration to the saint. They established rules regarding the process which the local bishop was to follow in order to obtain papal, and thereby universal Church, recognition of those who had been the objects of some form of veneration by the local Church.

The decrees also established regulations regarding cult or veneration, which was prohibited in the cases of those individuals who were not the objects of veneration duly authorized by the pope. The decrees required the bishops to eliminate unauthorized veneration. If for pastoral reasons this were not possible, the already existing veneration could be tolerated. It certainly could not be increased without following the specific process ordered by the decrees leading to canonization by the Supreme Pontiff. This last set of regulations regarding cult or veneration is the only legislation recognized as still in force by the new laws in the causes of saints promulgated in 1983.

The activity of the Roman Congregation during this period of history may be found in the magisterial work of Prospero Lambertini, then Promotor General of the Congregation for Sacred Rites, and later Pope BENEDICT XIV (1740–1758). The historiography De Servorum Dei Beatificatione et Beatorum Canonizatione was published in Bologna (Italy) in four volumes in 1725. It describes in detail the canonical procedures in use at the time and presents systematically the theological concepts of martyrdom, heroicity of virtues, the virtues themselves, and miracles.

The twentieth century saw great advancements in historiography and medical science. These developments were incorporated into ecclesiastical legislation in the causes of saints. In 1917 the Code of Canon Law was published, and the laws regarding beatification and canonization were codified in canons 1999–2141. There were two distinct processes to obtain the BEATIFICATION and canonization of Servants of God from the Supreme Pontiff. The first process is covered in canons 2037–2124 and deals with the causes of Servants of God who have never been objects of public and ecclesiastical veneration. The second is dealt with in canons 2124–2141 and regards those causes of Servants of God, traditionally called Blessed, who were objects of such veneration, and which were to proceed per viam cultus or as an exception made by the Decrees of Urban VIII.

In both cases the local bishop initiated the process on his own authority (Ordinary Process). The purpose of this process was twofold: to inform the HOLY SEE (Informative Process) about the existence of an authentic and widespread reputation of holiness (fama sanctitatis) or martyrdom (fama martyrii), as well as any intercessory power (fama signorum) enjoyed by the Servant of God among the faithful, and to verify that there was no preemptive obstacle to the cause in the published writings of the Servant of God. Once these two elements were proven, the Holy See published the Decree of Introduction of the Cause and gave the local bishop the authority to gather the evidence on the martyrdom or heroic virtues of the Servant of God (Apostolic Process). This evidence consisted primarily in eyewitness testimony (de visu) and hearsay or secondhand testimony (de auditu a videntibus). Double hearsay testimony (de auditu ab audientibus) was also admitted, whereas documentary evidence was given secondary or adminincular probative value.

The evidence was sent to the Congregation of Sacred Rites, which was charged with preparing a position paper on either the martyrdom (Positio super Martyrio) or the heroic virtues (Positio super Virtutibus) of the Servant of God. The Positio, as it is commonly called, was examined by the theological consultors of the Congregation and finally by its cardinal members. The results of these discussions were presented to the Supreme Pontiff, who alone made the definitive judgment regarding the martyrdom or the heroic virtues of the Servant of God and granted the title of "Venerable." Miracles were required for the beatification of the Venerable Servant of God, and more miracles, which occurred after the solemn beatification, were required for his or her canonization. The eyewitness evidence for miracles was to be gathered in an Apostolic Process instructed by the bishop where the supposed miracle took place.

On February 6, 1930, Pope PIUS XI (1922–1939) published the Apostolic Letter "Già da qualche tempo," thereby instituting the Historical Section of the Congregation of Sacred Rites. The duty of this office was to study historical causes the proofs of which were taken from documentary evidence alone. On January 4, 1939, the same Pontiff published the "Norms to be observed in constructing the ordinary processes in historical causes." In such historical causes the Ordinary Process, instructed by the local bishop on his own authority, was the only canonical process. The other evidence in the cause was to be gathered under the direct guidance of the Historical Section.

Miracles were to be investigated according to the norms of canon law. Experts in the specific field of the supposedly miraculous occurrence were to be employed. Their role was to ascertain with moral certitude that there was no scientific explanation for what had taken place. In 1948 Pope PIUS XII (1939–1958) reorganized the norms of canon law and established the Medical Board as an integral part of the Congregation of Sacred Rites.

In 1959 Pope JOHN XXIII (1959–1963) established a Pontifical Commission for the reformation of the Code of Canon Law. Since the Code contained canons regarding the causes of saints, this reformation was to include also the manner of instructing causes. Legislative changes were to meet two criteria. First, the needs of experts and the desire of bishops to have a more simple process were to be met. Second, the soundness of the investigation was strictly to be maintained.

On March 19, 1969, Pope PAUL VI (1963–1978) published motu proprio the Apostolic Letter "Sanctitas clarior." He established that, even in recent causes whose proofs are gathered from eyewitness testimony, one process, the Cognitional Process, was to be instructed by the local bishop. In line with the teaching of the Second Vatican Council on SUBSIDIARITY, the local bishop was now able to instruct the Cognitional Process and thereby initiate a case of canonization on his own authority. He could do this, however, only after having first attained permission from the Holy See. On May 8, 1969, Paul VI published the Apostolic Constitution Sacra Rituum Congregatio. In place of the Congregation of Sacred Rites, he esablished two Congregations, that for the Causes of Saints and that for DIVINE WORSHIP AND THE DISCIPLINE OF THE SACRAMENTS.

On January 25, 1983, Pope JOHN PAUL II (1978–2005) promulgated the new Code of Canon Law, in which only canon 1403 deals with causes of canonization. Paragraph 1 simply states that causes of saints are governed by particular pontifical law. Paragraph 2 affirms that procedural norms of the Code are to be applied when the particular pontifical law makes specific reference to it (which the new law never does), or when a question arises about something which, by its very nature, regards the norms of the Code (which it does, and fairly often). In the Code of Canons of the Oriental Churches, which was promulgated seven years later in 1990, only canon 1057 deals with the causes of saints. It states that the special norms established by the Roman Pontiff are to be observed so that Servants of God may be listed among the saints. Thus, the particular law in the causes of saints is the legislation in force for the Latin Church and for all Eastern Churches.

On the very same day, January 25, 1983, the Supreme Pontiff also promulgated the Apostolic Constitution Divinus perfectionis Magister (The Divine Teacher and Model of Perfection; hereafter DPM). This legislation established the procedural norms for the causes of saints and effected an organic restructuring of the Congregation for the Causes of Saints. The pope also gave the Congregation the authority to publish particular norms that would govern the canonical process on the martyrdom or heroic virtues of Servants of God as well as the miracles attributed to their intercession. The Congregation published the Normae servandae in Inquisitionibus ab Episcopis faciendis in Causis Sanctorum (Norms to Be Observed in Inquiries Made by Bishops in the Causes of Saints; hereafter NS) on February 7, 1983.

Procedure. The new legislation presents a number of organic and procedural changes. The terminology employed marks a vast departure from the strictly canonical language of all past legislation. First of all, the process to be instructed by the local bishop is called the "inquiry." This creates the impression that the legislation does not require a juridical process for the attainment of moral certitude regarding the holiness of the Servant of God, but rather a simple administrative act of the bishop. Second, the judge of former legislation is now called the "Episcopal Delegate." This departure from canonical terminology highlights the fact that the sole judge in causes of saints is the Supreme Pontiff. By the very nature of the office, however, the Episcopal Delegate has all the powers given a judge by universal law in any canonical process. Third, the word "tribunal" is never used. The new law instead speaks of the officials nominated by the bishop to instruct the inquiry. Historical causes, as defined by the legislation of Pope Pius XI, are now referred to as "ancient causes" in order to emphasize the fact that all causes, both recent and nonrecent, have a historical element. Finally, the word "beatification" is never used. The framers of the legislation thought that the canonical institute of beatification could be eliminated without having to change the text of the legislation.

The first procedural change regards the norm established by the Apostolic Constitution Sanctitas clarior of Pope Paul VI. DPM 1.1 unequivally affirms: "It is the competence of diocesan Bishops or Bishops of the Eastern Rites and others who have the same powers in law, within the limits of their own jurisdiction … to inquire about the life, virtues or martyrdom and reputation of sanctity or martyrdom, alleged miracles" (DPM I.1). It is, therefore, the right of the local bishop to initiate a cause of canonization without having first obtained the permission of the Holy See to do so. Before he initiates the cause, however, he must verify its theological foundation (fumus iuris), which is the existence of an authentic and widespread reputation of holiness or martyrdom, and of the intercessory power that the Servant of God enjoys among a large portion of the faithful, in accordance with NS 3b. It is the prime duty of the postulator of the cause—that is, the canonical representative of the promoter or petitioner of the cause—to conduct thoroughly the investigations into the fumus iuris and report his findings to the bishop, who only then may make the decision to initiate the cause (NS 3b).

The new legislation reaffirms and thereby definitively establishes that only one inquiry or process is to be instructed by the local bishop. First, the distinction, established by the Code of Canon Law of 1917, between causes that proceeded according to cult and noncult, is abolished. Furthermore, the change, effected by the legislation of Pius XI in 1939 regarding historical or ancient causes, and their extension also to recent causes, ordered by the legislation of Paul VI in 1969, is now definitively required in all causes of saints. A cause of canonization, whether recent or ancient, whether it regards noncult or cult, is now to be instructed in two phases. The first phase, which is called the "diocesan" or "eparchial" phase, takes place in the territory where the Servant of God died, in accordance with NS 5a. There is also one singular procedure to be followed during the inquiry. First, the documentary evidence, which consists of the published writings and the unpublished writings of the Servant of God, as well as all other documents which regard the cause, is collected, in accordance with NS 13 and 14, respectively. Secondly, on the basis of this material the Promoter of Justice of the cause then prepares the questions to be asked of the witnesses, in accordance with NS 15a. This procedure highlights another innovation of the new legislation. In contrast to the Code of Canon Law of 1917, the new legislation places the probative value of documentary evidence on an equal par with the testimony of witnesses.

The second or "Roman" phase of a cause of canonization is composed of two parts. The first part is that during which all of the evidence, gathered by the local bishop during the diocesan or eparchial inquiry, is studied by a relator together with a collaborator who may be either the Roman postulator of the cause or someone qualified for the task. A "relator" is a new juridical figure, created by the legislation of 1983, whose duty it is to prepare the Positio either on the martyrdom or the heroic virtues of the Servant of God. The relator is a member of a College of Relators who represent the major language, and therefore cultural, groups of the world. It is interesting to note that the first Positio written in English was that on the heroic virtues of St. Katherine DREXEL, foundress of the Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament for Indians and Afro-American People. This innovation has also enabled to advance causes from countries with few or no saints, for example, the cause of St. Josephine BAKHITA, a native of Sudan.

The second part of the Roman phase of a cause is that of judgment. Here there is no radical departure from past legislation. If a cause is ancient it must first pass the scrutiny of the historical consultants of the Congregation. All causes, ancient and recent, must be judged by the theological consultants. The results of these meetings are then passed on to the cardinals and bishops who are duly appointed by the Supreme Pontiff as members of the Congregation. If all these results are affirmative, they are brought to the attention of the pope for his final judgment.

His decisions in these matters cover three possibilities. If he declares that the Servant of God either was a martyr for the faith or a confessor of the faith, that is, that he or she practiced all the Christian virtues in a heroic manner, the Decree on Martyrdom or on Heroic Virtues is promulgated by the Roman Congregation, and the Servant of God is granted the title "Venerable Servant of God." It is not to be found in any legislative text but rather simply the practice of the Holy See that, in the case of the martyr, no miracle is required for beatification of the Venerable Servant of God. Likewise, in the case of the confessor, one miracle, that has occurred after the death of the Venerable Servant of God and been judged to have been granted through his or her intercession, is required for beatification.

St. Katherine Drexel (1858–1955). A painting of Philadelphia-born Blessed Mother Katherine Drexel. Canonized by Pope John Paul II on October 1, 2000, she is only the second American-born saint. WILLIAM THOMAS CAIN/GETTY IMAGES

As regards the canonization of all those who are beatified, one miracle, that has occurred after the beatification of the Blessed and been judged to have been granted through his or her intercession, is required for canonization. When all is ready for the canonization according to law, the cause of the Blessed is brought into Consistory. During this solemn celebration, the Supreme Pontiff asks the opinion of the cardinals and bishops who are present in the vicinity of the city of Rome whether he should proceed to the canonization of the Blessed. During one of the Consistories of the early twenty-first century, the canonization of Bl. Damien De VEUSTER, known as Damien of Molokai (Hawaii), a Belgian priest of the Congregation of the Sacred Hearts, was approved. St. Damien was canonized on October 11, 2009, in Rome, where all canonizations are celebrated by the Supreme Pontiff.

On May 17, 2007, the Roman Congregation published an Instruction entitled Mother of the Saints (Sanctorum Mater). According to the canonical nature of an instruction, Mother of the Saints is neither new legislation nor a correction of the already existing norms, but rather a practical guide for the implementation of already existing norms. It is intended for the bishops and for all those who participate in the diocesan or eparchial inquiry. Its introduction clearly states that its goal is to safeguard the seriousness of the inquiry and "to clarify the dispositions of currently existing laws in the causes of Saints, to facilitate their application and indicate the ways of executing them both in recent and in ancient causes."

A few clarifications provided by the Instruction are important to note. First, it maintains the terminology of the legislation of 1983. The words "tribunal," "judge," and "process" are never utilized. Beatification is quite constantly referred to as an integral and intermediate part of the whole process that leads to canonization. Second, it reiterates that the inquiry is an authentic process governed by specific canonical norms contained in universal and particular legislation. It is evident from a simple reading of the text that there is only one process for all causes, whether recent or ancient—despite the confusion created by Article 33, §1, which seems to imply that there is a separate process for causes which require the confirmation of cult according to the Decrees of Urban VIII. The procedure to be employed in the process is also the same for all causes. All documentary evidence in the cause is to be collected before that of eyewitnesses. Third, the Instruction affirms quite clearly that the local bishop has the authority to initiate a cause of beatification and canonization. Thus, the nihil obstat of the Holy See, which is required by NS 15c, is not permission of the Holy See to initiate the cause as was once required by former legislation. It is simply a declaration that there is no obstacle to the cause which perhaps is known only to the Holy See. Finally, the juridical nature of the postulator as an ex parte participant in the process is more clearly presented. The postulator may offer assistance during the inquiry within the limits allowed by law, but, as stated in Article 19, §2, "may not gather in a juridical manner either the documentary proofs or the eventual oral depositions of witnesses in the cause."

The new legislation in the causes of saints has incorporated the developments of the various fields of human knowledge and the theological insights of previous centuries. The necessity to speed up the process and to maintain the seriousness of the investigation is its goal. Through a canonical process the Church interprets the signs of the times and offers men and women, outstanding in charity and in the other evangelical virtues, for the imitation and veneration of, and invocation by, the faithful. As the introduction of DPM states: "Surrounded as we are by so many witnesses, through whom God is present to us and speaks to us, we are drawn to reach His Kingdom in heaven by great virtue"; in short, we are drawn to become saints.

SEE ALSO APOSTLES OF JESUS; BENEDICT OF NURSIA, ST.; CURIA, ROMAN; DECRETALS; DESERT FATHERS; DEVOTIONS, POPULAR; HEAVEN (THEOLOGY OF); MARTYRDOM, THEOLOGY OF; MILAN, EDICT (AGREEMENT) OF; VIRTUE, HEROIC; WITNESS, CHRISTIAN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Congregation for the Causes of Saints, Normae servandae in inquisitionibus ab Episcopis faciendis in Causis Sanctorum, Norms to be Observed in Inquiries Made by Bishops in the Causes of Saints (February 7, 1983), available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/congregations/csaints/documents/rc_con_csaints_doc_07021983_norme_lt.html (accessed September 17, 2009).

Congregation for the Causes of Saints, Sanctorum Mater, Instruction for Conducting Diocesan or Eparchial Inquiries in the Causes of Saints (May 17, 2007), available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/congregations/csaints/documents/rc_con_csaints_doc_20070517_sanctorum-mater_en.html (accessed September 17, 2009).

Prospero De Lambertinis, De Servorum Dei Beatificatione et Beatorum Canonizatione, 4 vols. (Bononiae 1725).

Ludwig Hertling, "Materiali per la storia del processo di canonizzazione," Gregorianum 16 (1935): 170–195.

John Paul II, Divinus perfectionis Magister, The Divine Teacher and Model of Perfection (Apostolic Constitution, January 25, 1983), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/apost_constitutions/documents/hf_jp-ii_apc_25011983_divinus-perfectionis-magister_en.html (accessed September 17, 2009).

Henryk Misztal, Komentarz do Konstytucji Apostolskiej 'Divinus perfectionis Magister,' vol. 6 (Lublin, Poland 1987).

Josef Noval, O.P.,Commentarium Codicis Iuris Canonici, vol. 4 (Rome 1920).

Robert J. Sarno, Diocesan Inquiries Required by the Legislator in the New Legislation for the Causes of the Saints, (Rome 1987).

Robert J. Sarno, "The Integration of Historical Research in the Methodology Used in the Causes of Saints," Appolinaris 61 (1988): 175–204.

Robert J. Sarno, Le Cause dei Santi. Appunti del Corso (Rome 2003).

Fabijan Veraja, "Alcune Proposte per il Rinnovamento delle Cause dei Santi," Monitor Ecclesiasticus 105 (1980): 305–322.

William H. Woestman, ed., Canonization: Theology, History, Process. (Ottawa 2002).

Rev. Msgr. Robert J. Sarno
Study Adjutant, Congregation for the Causes of Saints
Visiting Professor of Canon Law, Pontifical Urbanian University, Rome (2010)

CANOSSA

Canossa is a castle and commune town in the foothills of the Apennines, situated in the northwestern Italian province of Reggio Emilia about eighteen miles from Parma. The castle, which still exists today as ruins, was the famous location of Henry IV's (King of Germany, 1065–1105, Holy Roman Emperor, 1084–1105) extraordinary penance in 1077. Henry stood in the snow for three days waiting for an audience with Pope St. GREGORY VII (1073–1085), in the hope of reversing his EXCOMMUNICATION. The incident was preceded by a flurry of angry letters between the pope and the emperor, and finally each denounced the other at a synod and counter-synod. At issue was the investiture of the clergy, and, ultimately, which of them was to have hegemony in a Christian polity.

Papal Land. Henry IV of Germany, the Holy Roman Emperor (1050-1106), dressed as a penitent, knocks at the gates of the castle of Pope Gregory at Canossa in 1077. HULTON ARCHIVE/GETY IMAGES

When the reformer, Hildebrand, was elected Pope Gregory VII in 1073, he had already been a power behind the papal throne for twenty-four years (1049–1073), serving five successive popes before his own twelve years in office. During this time he had steered the papacy from one of its lowest points to one of its highest. In 1045, the Holy Roman Emperor HENRY III had ended the simultaneous and contested rule of three popes, BENEDICT IX, SYLVESTER III, and GREGORY VI. He then oversaw the election of CLEMENT II, who crowned him emperor. Henry III, however, died in 1056, leaving a six-year-old son, Henry. Hildebrand labored during Henry IV's long minority to improve the standing of the papacy, and, by the time he himself became pope, he was in a position from which to make a bid for papal hegemony. At the 1075 Roman Synod during LENT (February 24–28), Gregory decreed that the pope alone could appoint or depose clergy or move them between sees, and he excommunicated five German bishops for simony. The effect of this ruling would perhaps have been felt most keenly in Germany, where many bishops were also powerful feudal lords.

At first Henry sent away the excommunicated bishops, but growing confident after his defeat of Saxon rebels, the young king recalled them. Henry then started to reassert his rights in Northern Italy, significantly nominating a new archbishop of Milan. Gregory wrote to Henry on December 8, 1075, accusing Henry of breach of oath and complaining that the king still retained councilors who were under excommunication. On January 24, 1076, Henry called a synod at Worms, which found that Gregory had forfeited the papal throne. At a council at Piacenza, disaffected bishops from northern Italy were also persuaded to back the deposition of the pope. On February 22, 1076, at the Lenten synod in Rome, Gregory was informed of the proceedings of the Synod of Worms and not only excommunicated Henry, but also deposed him as king and absolved his subjects of their oath of obedience.

The political climate had changed considerably since 1045. Henry III's deposition of the three popes had been met with considerable popular support, but now it was the emperor who was unpopular, and many German princes were prepared to side with the pope, not least because it furthered their own ambitious anti-regal policies. The German princes met at a diet in Tribur on October 16, 1076, and, although they could not agree on the election of a new German king, they did agree that, if the excommunication was not lifted within a year of its implementation, then Henry's throne would indeed be forfeit. They also asked the pope to come to a diet at Augsburg called for February 2, 1077, to decide the matter.

Henry sent envoys to Gregory, but to no avail, so he decided to appeal in person and set off across the Alps to intercept the pope on his way to Augsburg. Gregory was unsure of the king's intentions and took refuge with his old friend and ally, MATILDA OF TUSCANY, in her strong fortress at Canossa. The fortifications of Canossa were unnecessary, however, because Henry's intentions were not belligerent, but penitential. He may have adopted the penitential hair shirt on his January trek over the Alps, but the notion that he walked barefoot has now been generally dismissed by historians. Henry arrived at Canossa on January 25, 1077, less than a month before the anniversary of his excommunication and permanent forfeiture of his throne. The pope ordered that Henry be refused admittance to the castle, so the king stood outside for three days as a penitent. Although the king's action was severe and almost certainly did involve standing for considerable periods of time in the cold and wearing the penitential garb, there is disagreement regarding whether Henry was permanently on vigil at the gate and whether he was barefoot as well as bareheaded. Many historians now believe that he spent at least some of those three days in the village at the foot of the hill upon which Canossa castle stood. It is important to note that Henry's was a personal humiliation; it was not a formal penance ordered by the pope. Finally, on January 28, 1077, the pope permitted Henry entrance, in part because of the entreaties of Matilda of Tuscany, the king's mother-in-law Adelaide, and Abbot Hugh of Cluny, and in part because he may have been moved by the king's penitential show, but also because his religious obligations meant he could not deny a penitent re-entrance into the Church, whatever his personal misgivings may have been. Contemporary reports say that the king knelt and begged forgiveness and Gregory absolved Henry and received him back into the Church. That evening the absolution was formalized when Gregory, Henry, and Matilda shared Communion in the cathedral of St. Nicholas within the walls of Canossa. Though this Communion signaled the end of Henry's excommunication, it left the matter of his deposition from the throne unresolved.

In March 1077, a small group of powerful German magnates, including the archbishops of Mainz, Magdeburg, and Salzburg, met at Forcheim and repudiated the Salian dynasty and its right of hereditary rule, in favor of election. They then elected Duke Rudolph of Swabia (1025–1080), Henry's brother-in-law, which forced Henry into a civil war. The pope remained somewhat neutral in the civil war until Rudolph's victory at Flarchheim on January 27, 1080, when he decided to excommunicate and depose Henry for a second time. Henry, however, won the civil war, and invaded Rome, forcing Gregory to flee and replacing him with the anti-pope, Clement III, who crowned Henry Holy Roman Emperor in 1084. Gregory died in forced exile in Salerno, withdrawing all his excommunications, except those on Henry and Clement III.

The events of Canossa in 1077, dramatic as they have been, need to be looked at in the context of the wider struggle between papacy and empire, which consumed not just Henry's and Gregory's lives, but those of the men who held those offices for the next two generations. The events of Canossa had a long afterlife and became a defining moment in the nationalist histories of both Italy and Germany. "To go to Canossa" is an expression in several European languages, meaning to submit, often with the connotation of coercion.

SEE ALSO CHURCH AND STATE; HENRY IV, ROMAN EMPEROR; HOLY ROMAN EMPIRE; INVESTITURE STRUGGLE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

FOR A GOOD OVERVIEW OF THE HISTORICAL CONTEXT, SEE:

Brian Tierney, The Crisis of Church and State, 1050–1300 (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1964).

FOR BROADER CULTURAL IMPLICATIONS, SEE:

Christoph Stiegeman and Matthias Wemhoff, eds. Canossa 1077: Erschuetterung der Welt: Geschichte, Kunst und Kultur am Aufgang der Romanik (Munich 2006).

FOR THE LETTERS BETWEEN GREGORY AND HENRY, SEE:

Milton Viorst, The Great Documents of Western Civilization (Philadelphia 1965).

ON KEY FIGURES IN THE DISPUTE, SEE:

Uta-Renate Blumenthal, Gregor VII.: Papst zwischen Canossa und Kirchenreform (Darmstadt 2001).

DAVID J. HAY, The Military Leadership of Matilda of Canossa, 1046–1115 (MANCHESTER 2008).

I.S. ROBINSON, Henry IV of Germany, 1056–1106 (CAMBRIDGE 2003).

Tracey-Anne Cooper
Dept. of History
St. John's University, Jamaica, N.Y (2010)

CARDINAL NEWMAN SOCIETY

Founded in 1993, the Cardinal Newman Society for the Preservation of Catholic Higher Education is a national organization to renew and strengthen the Catholic identity of Catholic colleges and universities in the United States. The society focuses its work on assisting students, alumni, and school officials; urging fidelity to the Magisterium of the Catholic Church; and researching activities both on campus and in the classroom. It is supported by a broad membership of Catholics in the United States—more than 20,000 in 2007.

The philosophy of the Venerable John Henry Cardinal NEWMAN and Pope JOHN PAUL II guide the Cardinal Newman Society's activities. In The Idea of a University (1854), Cardinal Newman argued that the university is dedicated to seeking and transmitting all truth, including the fundamental truths revealed by CHRIST through His Church. In 1990 Pope John Paul II issued Ex corde Ecclesiae, the 1990 APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTION on Catholic Universities, which established norms required of all Catholic institutions of higher education.

The Cardinal Newman Society seeks to reverse secularizing trends in U.S. Catholic colleges and universities apparent since the late 1960s. In the 1967 Land O'Lakes Statement, twenty-six representatives of nine major Catholic universities argued for "true autonomy and academic freedom in the face of authority of whatever kind, lay or clerical, external to the academic community itself." Efforts to improve Catholic colleges' reputation in academic circles and to secure state and federal funding, in addition to the increasing numbers of non-Catholic students and faculty and conformity to a broad definition of academic freedom, led to a loss of a distinctive Catholic identity at colleges nationwide.

The society publishes The Newman Guide to Choosing a Catholic College, which profiles colleges that it considers to be models of faithful Catholic higher education. The Guide is one project of the Center for the Study of Catholic Higher Education, the society's research and publication division. The society also advocates CHASTITY on campuses through its Love and Responsibility Program, sponsors campus displays of the Vatican's International Exposition "The Eucharistic Miracles of the World," and promotes Eucharistic adoration for students and faculty.

It is also well-known as a vocal critic of most historically Catholic colleges for perceived patterns of SECULARIZATION evident since the late 1960s. The society has publicly supported the HOLY SEE and the U.S. bishops in the implementation of Ex corde Ecclesiae. It advocates THEOLOGY programs that genuinely reflect Catholic teaching and has opposed scandals on Catholic campuses, including those involving dissident speakers and faculty.

The Cardinal Newman Society was founded by Patrick J. Reilly, a 1991 graduate of Fordham University in New York City. In the 1990s, the society supported the U.S. bishops as they developed guidelines to implement Ex corde Ecclesiae, publicly countering critics including the Association of Catholic Colleges and Universities and the Catholic Theological Society of America. In the early twenty-first century, the society's efforts brought attention to dissident commencement speakers, prompting the U.S. bishops' ban on Catholic institutions providing "awards, honors or platforms" to "those who act in defiance of our fundamental moral principles" (Catholics in Political Life 2004). The Cardinal Newman Society helped reduce Catholic campus performances of The Vagina Monologues (from 32 in 2003 to 20 in 2008). The society's complaints about the choice of commencement speakers for two New York institutions, Marist College and Marymount Manhattan College, led these institutions to abandon claims to a Catholic identity.

The society is headquartered in Manassas, Virginia. More information is available on the society's Web site.

SEE ALSO ASSOCIATION OF CATHOLIC COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES; EDUCATION, CATHOLIC (HIGHER) IN THE UNITED STATES; EDUCATION, CATHOLIC (K THROUGH 12) IN THE UNITED STATES; TEACHING AUTHORITY OF THE CHURCH (MAGISTERIUM).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

James Tunstead Burtchaell, The Dying of the Light: The Disengagement of Colleges and Universities from Their Christian Churches (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1998).

Cardinal Newman Society Web site, available from http://www.cardinalnewmansociety.org (accessed February 29, 2008).

Joseph A. Esposito, ed., The Newman Guide to Choosing a Catholic College: What to Look For and Where to Find It (Washington, D.C. 2007).

Philip Gleason, Contending with Modernity: Catholic Higher Education in the Twentieth Century (New York 1995).

John Paul II, Ex corde Ecclesiae, On Catholic Universities (Apostolic Constitution, August 15, 1990), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/apost_constitutions/documents/hf_jp-ii_apc_15081990_ex-corde-ecclesiae_en.html (accessed March 7, 2008).

"Land O'Lakes Statement: The Nature of the Contemporary Catholic University (1967)," in American Catholic Higher Education: Essential Documents: 1967–1990, edited by Alice Gallin (Notre Dame, Ind. 1992).

George M. Marsden, The Soul of the American University: From Protestant Establishment to Established Nonbelief (New York 1994).

John Henry Newman, The Idea of a University (Dublin 1854).

Patrick J. Reilly, "Are Catholic Colleges Leading Students Astray?" The Catholic World Report (March 2003).

Peter M.J. Stravinskas and Patrick J. Reilly, eds., Newman's Idea of a University: The American Response (Mt. Pocono, Pa. 2002).

U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, Catholics in Political Life (2004), available from http://www.usccb.org/bishops/catholicsinpoliticallife.shtml (accessed March 7, 2008).

U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, The Application of Ex corde Ecclesiae for the United States (2000), available from http://www.usccb.org/bishops/application_of_excordeecclesiae.shtml (accessed March 7, 2008).

Patrick J. Reilly
President, Cardinal Newman Society
Manassas, Va. (2010)

CARDINAL SECRETARY OF STATE

The cardinal secretary of state (the Vatican's secretary of state is always a CARDINAL) is the individual who is appointed by, and works most closely with, the Supreme PONTIFF in the exercise of his universal mission. Correspondingly, the Secretariat of State itself is the most important dicastery of the Roman Curia.

The origins of the Secretariat of State go back to the fifteenth century. In 1487 the APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTION Non Debet Reprehensibile established the Secretaria Apostolica, comprising twenty-four apostolic secretaries, the most preeminent of whom bore the title of secretarius apostolica. During the early sixteenth century, Pope LEO X established another position, the secretarius intimus, to assist the cardinal who had control of the affairs of state and to attend to correspondence in languages other than Latin, chiefly with the apostolic nuncios who were then developing into permanent diplomatic representatives. However, at this point, the secretarius intimus was something of a minor functionary in that the then expanding papal administration was actually led by the "cardinal nephew," one of the pope's relatives elevated to the cardinalate for reasons of pietas, or a sense of familial duty, and also to serve as a counterweight to the "crown cardinals" who represented the interests of the various monarchs of the period. Within time, the role and duties of the secretarius intimus were absorbed into those of the cardinal nephew who took that title.

It was only in the mid-seventeenth century, at the beginning of the pontificate of Pope INNOCENT X, that a person who was already a cardinal and not a member of the pope's family was called to this high office. In his reforms of 1692, Pope INNOCENT XII definitively abolished the office of cardinal nephew, and the powers of that office were assigned to the cardinal secretary of state. During the course of the eighteenth century, the influence and role of the Secretariat of State increased.

In 1814 Pope PIUS VII, building on the 1793 reforms of Pope PIUS VI, expanded the role of the cardinal secretary of state by establishing the Sacred Congregation for Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs. At this time, the HOLY SEE was served by one of its most able secretaries of state, Ercole Cardinal CONSALVI. Cardinal Consalvi, who remained a deacon, never having been ordained a priest, had as his greatest achievement the Concordat of 1801 with Napoleon Bonaparte and also assisted in leading the Church through the difficult postrevolutionary period. Noteworthy in that sense too was Giacomo Cardinal ANTONELLI, who served as secretary of state to Pope PIUS IX for three decades and was the effective head of the papal state until its end in 1870. Cardinal Antonelli assumed many of the burdens of state while Pius IX dealt with religious matters and the affairs of the universal Church.

In 1908 Pope PIUS X redefined the role of the various sections of the Sacred Congregation for Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs and specified their duties: The first section was concerned essentially with extraordinary affairs, the second with ordinary, and the third, which was until then an independent body, with the preparation of pontifical briefs that were fixed in the Codex Iuris Canonici (Code of Canon Law) of 1917. In his apostolic constitution, Regimini Ecclesiae Universae (1967), Pope PAUL VI, in the spirit of the Second Vatican Council, reformed the Roman Curia and with it the Vatican Secretariat of State. The Chancery of Apostolic Briefs was suppressed and the first section for extraordinary affairs was made into a body distinct from the Secretariat of State, to be known as the Council for Public Affairs of the Church.

In his apostolic constitution, Pastor Bonus (1988), Pope JOHN PAUL II, in a further reform of the Roman Curia, divided the Secretariat of State into two sections: the Section for General Affairs and the Section for Relations with States, which incorporated the Council for the Public Affairs of the Church. The Section for General Affairs, or First Section, deals with everyday matters of the Supreme Pontiff, in terms both of the universal Church and the dicasteries of the Roman Curia. It enacts the provisions for curial appointments and holds custody of the papal lead SEAL. The First Section also attends to relations with the embassies accredited to the Holy See. It supervises the Holy See's official communications agencies and is responsible for the publication of the Acta Spostolicae Sedis and the Annuario Pontificio.

Bertone, Tarcisio Cardinal (1934–) The Vatican Secretary of State blesses the coffins of the victims of the earthquake in Southern Italy during the funeral at the Guardia di Finanza Academy on April 10, 2009, in Coppito, a village near L'Aquila, Italy. MARCO DI LAURO/GETTY IMAGES

The Second Section, the Section for Relations with States, deals specifically with matters involving the civil governments of sovereign nations. It is responsible for the Holy See's diplomacy, including the establishment of concordats or agreements with civil governments. The Second Section is also responsible for the Holy See's presence in international conferences, and for providing, by the Supreme Pontiff's order and in consultation with the related discasteries of the Curia, for appointments to particular churches, as well as for their establishment or modification. This section actually had its beginnings as a congregation set up in 1793 by Pope Pius VI to deal with the problems posed for the Church by the FRENCH REVOLUTION.

As the pope's first collaborator in the governance of the universal Church, the cardinal secretary of state is chosen for his loyalty but also for his administrative and organizational skills. Being primarily responsible for the political and diplomatic activity of the Holy See, which has relations with more than 150 states and international organizations, and in some instances representing the Supreme Pontiff himself, the cardinal secretary of state is an individual who is both an outstanding ecclesiastic and expert administrator. If the office is vacant, a non-cardinal may serve as pro-secretary of state until a suitable replacement is found or the pro-secretary is made a cardinal.

SEE ALSO CURIA, ROMAN; VATICAN CITY, STATE OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Hyginus E. Cardinale, The Holy See and the International Order (Gerrard's Cross, U.K. 1976).

Robert A. Graham, Vatican Diplomacy: A Study of Church and State on the International Plane (Princeton, N.J. 1959).

Peter C. Kent and John F. Pollard, eds. Papal Diplomacy in the Modern Age (Westport, Conn. 1994).

William Roberts
Professor of History and Social Sciences
Fairleigh Dickinson University, Teaneck, New Jersey
(2010)

CARDINAL VIRTUES

The Christian moral life possesses a defined structure. The cardinal, or principal, moral virtues, PRUDENCE, JUSTICE, FORTITUDE, and TEMPERANCE, and the theological virtues, FAITH, HOPE, and CHARITY, supply the basic architecture for this makeup of Christian living.

Aquinas's Contribution. St. THOMAS AQUINAS remains an acknowledged authority for learning about the virtues of the Christian life. He devotes the largest section (the Secunda secundae) of his masterwork, the Summa theologiae, to a detailed analysis of both the theological and the moral virtues. In his view, the practice of Christian virtue encompasses more than observing the reasonableness espoused by Stoic moral philosophers. Aquinas says the virtues shape the operative powers of the human person in such a way that acting virtuously implies more than following imperatives elaborated within systems of ethical IDEALISM or respecting norms dictated by freestanding practical reasonableness. Catholic moral thought follows Aquinas and recognizes that the virtues form the concrete pattern of Christian existence.

Servais Pinckaers (b. 1925) is a leading contemporary exponent of the prominence the virtues hold in Catholic MORAL THEOLOGY. His work exhibits the continuity between the biblical and patristic teachings on the virtues of the Christian life and the systematic elaboration that Aquinas gives to the cardinal virtues. Aquinas develops a natural law theory that includes treatment of the cardinal virtues (explicitly in Summa theologiae 1a-2ae, q. 61); his broad context for the moral life also includes the new dispensation that the grace of the Holy Spirit establishes in those who belong to CHRIST. What remains unique to Aquinas, in contrast to other medieval theologians who discussed the cardinal virtues, is that in Summa theologiae he treats the cardinal moral virtues prior to his explicit consideration of the INCARNATION. The significance of this placement emerges from Aquinas's conviction that the moral life possesses its own native intelligibility and that the basic principles of the virtuous life, including the four cardinal virtues, stand open to philosophical reason. Josef Pieper's classic study The Four Cardinal Virtues (1966) respects Aquinas's methodological choice and provides a fine summary of his philosophical teaching on the moral virtues.

The Christian believer embraces the life of perfect virtue to the extent that he or she embraces Christ. Conformity with Christ, however, does not exempt the believer from dealing with the ordinary stuff of moral decision making. As the Letter of James reminds us, Christian faith and LOVE compel us to engage in the GOOD WORKS expected of the believer (James 2:14–26). The moral virtues specify these "works." Prudence, for example, remains an essential feature of Christian and human life. This virtue of the practical INTELLECT, recta ratio agibilium, shapes each moral choice so that the one who chooses embraces a good that perfects the human person. Pope JOHN PAUL II, in his ENCYCLICAL Veritatis splendor, observes that, "only the act in conformity with the good can be a path that leads to life" (II, no. 4, 72). Human maturity therefore can be identified with growth in the virtue of prudence.

Aquinas, in Summa theologiae, mentions more than fifty virtues that, drawing on classical sources, he considers necessary for anyone to achieve moral maturity. Following the paradigm set down by Aquinas, the Catechism of the Catholic Church (CCC) includes a section on the theological and the moral, or human, virtues (nos. 1803–1845). It is evident, then, that the cardinal moral virtues form an integral part of Catholic moral thought.

Catholic MORALITY is about personal transformation more than about striving to achieve ethical probity. The Church's commitment to a virtue-centered morality distinguishes Catholic moralists from those contemporary thinkers who prefer ethical systems based on the evaluation of the expected consequences of an action or on the creation of moral absolutes by freestanding practical reasoning. The virtues effect in the human person a real modification of the operative powers—intellect, WILL, and sense appetites—so that each of these powers acts promptly, easily, and joyfully toward the embrace of the authentic goods that perfect the human person. The technical name for this modification is habitus, an expression that implies both a flexibility and a spontaneity not ordinarily associated with the modern English word habit.

Aquinas identifies four powers that are proper to the human person: the intellect, the will, and the two sense appetites: the irascible, or contending, emotions and the concupiscible, or impulse, emotions. He assigns one of the four cardinal virtues to each of these powers. The rational part of man is the seat of prudence; the appetitive part is threefold, namely, "the will, which is the seat of justice, the concupiscible power, the seat of temperance, and the irascible power, the seat of courage" (Summa theologiae 1a-2ae, q. 61, a. 2). The use of the word seat is a way of expressing the human power or capacity that a virtue modifies and strengthens.

Aquinas also regards the cardinal virtues as overseeing human behavior. Prudence gives direction to human action. "Prudence is 'right reason in action'" (CCC 1806). Justice regards operations that involve another: "Justice is the moral virtue that consists in the constant and firm will to give their due to God and neighbor" (CCC 1807). Fortitude, which strengthens the contending emotions, concerns whatever in the person requires strengthening for endurance or enterprise: "Fortitude is the moral virtue that ensures firmness in difficulties in the pursuit of good" (CCC 1808). Temperance, on the other hand, concerns everything that involves restraint on the part of the human person. Temperance well tunes the impulse emotions. "Temperance is the moral virtue that moderates the attraction of pleasures and provides balance in the use of created goods" (CCC 1809). Aquinas holds for the connection of prudence and the moral virtues with respect to the human good "because no moral virtue can be had without prudence nor can prudence be had if one is lacking moral virtue" (1999, a. 2). Moralists discuss the implications of this principle under the rubric of perfect and imperfect virtue. Perfect acquired moral virtue is found only in the person of one who is rightly ordered to his ultimate end, and so indirectly depends on the gift of divine grace. At the same time, one who sins gravely may retain true but imperfect virtue inasmuch as this virtue is not capable of being ordered to its ultimate end. Veritatis splendor takes up this distinction: "The human act, good according to its object, is also capable of being ordered to its ultimate end. That same act then attains its ultimate end and decisive perfection when the will actually does order it to God through charity" (II, no. 4, 78).

The cardinal virtues may be considered hinges (cardo) on which the other virtues swing. The cardinal virtues "play a pivotal role" in the moral life (see CCC 1805). Put another way, the cardinal virtues are the parent virtues of the other moral virtues whose practice realizes the full truth about what it means to be human. Veritatis splendor emphasizes the importance of the virtues for the authentic well-being of humans: "He appropriates this truth of his being and makes it his own by his acts and the corresponding virtues" (II, no. 1, 52).

The tradition of enumerating four cardinal virtues reaches back to the period of the Old Testament. The Wisdom of Solomon 8:7 records: "And if anyone loves righteousness, her labors are virtue, for she teaches self-control and prudence, justice, and courage; nothing in life is more profitable for men than these." The sixteenth-century Thomist commentator Thomas de Vio, Cardinal CAJETAN, writes that the first Church Father to speak about the cardinal virtues is St. Ambrose of Milan (c. 339–397) in his Expositio super Evangelium secundum Lucam V, no. 49, 62. Citations of the cardinal virtues also occur in the De moribus ecclesiae catholicae (I, 15) of St. AUGUSTINE, the influential Moralia (II, 49; XXII, 1) of St. Gregory the Great, and in St. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX's, De consideratione (I, 8).

Christian Virtues. Catholic moral thought recognizes that a proportion exists between what perfects human nature in itself and the ability of our human powers or capacities to realize this telos, or end. Acquired or human virtues enable the person to achieve the optimum of human social existence. But there is something else to consider: "It is not easy for man, wounded by sin, to maintain moral balance" (CCC 1810). The infused Christian virtues bring to the cardinal moral virtues and the virtues grouped around them the full power of the Holy Spirit. The Christian virtues are designated as "infused" virtues to distinguish their mode of reception from the acquired moral virtues, which develop through repeated actions, whereas the infused moral virtues are received as a gift of divine grace. No proportion, of course, exists between human nature and the goal of beatific fellowship with God. The infused Christian moral virtues establish this proportion. Veritatis splendor speaks about this proportion as "connaturality." Specifically, the encyclical states: "Such a connaturality is rooted in and develops through the virtuous attitudes of the individual himself: prudence and the other cardinal virtues, and even before these the theological virtues of faith, hope and charity. This is the meaning of Jesus' saying: 'He who does what is true comes to the light' (Jn 3:21)" (II, no. 2, 64).

"Do not quench the Spirit," warns 1 Thessalonians 5:19. This text serves as one of many biblical warrants for Catholic teaching about the Christian virtues insofar as they infallibly produce what the spiritual tradition describes as "a spiritual liberty." The Catechism summarizes this tradition: "The virtuous man is he who freely practices the good" (1804). St. PAUL makes reference to this basic theological truth in Romans 8: 14–17 when he speaks about those who are led freely by the SPIRIT OF GOD as "heirs" to the Kingdom, although in the same place he also notes the possibility of their losing the divine inheritance by falling back into a spirit of slavery. The cardinal virtues describe authentic Christian liberation. At the same time, the Christian believer recognizes that "being a follower of Christ means becoming conformed to him who became a servant even to giving himself on the Cross (cf. Phil 2: 5–8)" (Veritatis splendor, I, 21). The end, or telos, of the Christian life here below remains entrance into a sacrificial union with God. The Christian moral virtues constitute so many ways of realizing the blessedness of God's life within our everyday human lives. From this overall perspective about the ultimate end of human life—what one may call perfect felicity or beatitude—charity, as Aquinas and the Fathers emphatically point out, remains the form and the mother of all the moral virtues.

The infused moral virtues are complemented by the gifts of the Holy Spirit, the gospel Beatitudes, and the fruits of the Holy Spirit mentioned variously by St Paul. The overall picture of the moral life characterized by the virtues, gifts, and Beatitudes represents an integral moral life. When one virtue predominates in a given individual, the other virtues are present supporting it. Because infused virtue comes from the work of the Holy Spirit, who recreates the whole person, the infused virtues are interconnected. If charity is had, says Aquinas, all of the virtues are had. No independent area can be carved out of the Christian life for the sake of recognizing human autonomy. On the contrary, Veritatis splendor insists that "man's genuine moral autonomy in no way means the rejection but the acceptance of the moral law, of God's command" (II, no. 1, 41). Nor can one choose to exclude from the transforming effects of God's grace some specific area of moral behavior under the pretext that certain human emotions or decisions merit an exception from the universal call to holiness. God's grace is always greater than our needs. Deus semper maior!

The Cardinal Virtues in Art. Illustration from a Medieval manuscript depicting the four Cardinal Virtues. © HISTORICAL PICTURE ARCHIVE/CORBIS

The Virtues Today. During the period of casuistry that developed after the sixteenth-century Council of TRENT, instruction on the cardinal virtues receded from everyday instruction about the moral life, although they retained a place in the specialized treatises on ascetical and mystical theology that were of interest mainly to professional religious people. Today the cardinal virtues have been restored to their proper place in Catholic moral instruction and life for all people. Witness how the 1998 encyclical of Pope John Paul II, Fides et ratio, describes the place the cardinal virtues should hold in contemporary moral theology:

> In order to fulfill its mission, moral theology must turn to a philosophical ethics which looks to the truth of the good, to an ethics which is neither subjectivist nor utilitarian. Such an ethics implies and presupposes a philosophical anthropology and a METAPHYSICS of the good. Drawing on this organic vision, linked necessarily to Christian holiness and to the practice of the human and SUPERNATURAL virtues, moral theology will be able to tackle the various problems in its competence, such as PEACE, SOCIAL JUSTICE, the family, the defense of life and the natural environment, in a more appropriate and effective way. (VII, 98)

SEE ALSO GREGORY (THE GREAT) I, ST. POPE; HUMAN ACT; LIBERALITY, VIRTUE OF; RELIGION, VIRTUE OF; SIMPLICITY, VIRTUE OF; VIRTUE; VIRTUE, HEROIC; VIRTUES AND VICES, ICONOGRAPHY OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Thomas de Vio Cajetan, "Commentary on the Summa theologiae," in Sancti Thomae de Aquino Opere Omnia, Leonine ed., vols. 4–12.

Catechism of the Catholic Church, 2nd ed. (Vatican City 1997), also available from http://www.vatican.va/archive/ENG0015/_INDEX.HTM (accessed March 6, 2008).

Romanus Cessario, The Moral Virtues and Theological Ethics (Notre Dame, Ind. 1991, rev., 2008).

Romanus Cessario, The Virtues, or, The Examined Life (New York 2002).

Romanus Cessario, "Hommage au Père Servais-Théodore Pinckaers, OP. The Significance of His Work," Nova et Vetera, English ed., 5, no. 1 (2007): 1–16.

John Paul II, Veritatis splendor (Encyclical, August 6, 1993), available from http://www.vatican.va/edocs/ENG0222/_INDEX.HTM (accessed March 3, 2008).

Thomas Aquinas, Disputed Questions on Virtue, translated by Ralph McInerny (South Bend, Ind. 1999).

Thomas Osborne, Jr., "Perfect and Imperfect Virtues in Aquinas," The Thomist 71, no. 1 (2007): 39–64.

Josef Pieper, The Four Cardinal Virtues (Notre Dame, Ind. 1966).

Rev. Romanus Cessario OP
Professor of Dogmatic and Moral Theology
Saint John's Seminary, Boston, Mass. (2010)

CARITAS IN VERITATE

Caritas in veritate (Charity in Truth) is Pope BENEDICT XVI's third encyclical and is his first official social encyclical. Dated June 29, 2009, and promulgated in early July, the release of the encyclical was reportedly delayed to take into account the worldwide economic collapse of 2008 to 2009. Written to commemorate the fortieth anniversary of Pope PAUL VI's 1967 encyclical on development, Populorum progressio, the thirty-thousand-plus-word document is composed of an introduction (nos. 1–9), five chapters (nos. 10–77), and a conclusion (nos. 78–79). Like his first two encyclicals, Deus caritas est and Spe salvi, Benedict centers this deeply theological encyclical on a theological virtue—charity—but in this case its moral implications for development.

Charity, Truth, and Church Social Doctrine. Benedict XVI begins by making clear that development is rooted in the charity in truth of Jesus' life. This love is "the principal driving force" behind all development. Its source is GOD himself (no. 1), as he noted also in Deus caritas est (no. 2). Hence the primacy of charity for the Church's social doctrine.

Benedict XVI argues, however, that charity needs to be bonded to the truth not only as veritas in caritate (truth in charity; Eph 4:15), but also in the complementary sequence of caritas in veritate (charity in truth; no. 2). The pope says charity needs truth to be authentically lived. When divorced from truth, it degenerates into "contingent subjective emotions and opinions" (no. 3). But when "filled with truth," charity can be shared in objective ways that overcome various limitations (e.g., relativism) [no. 4].

Again, Benedict reminds us of charity's source in "the Father's love for the Son, in the Holy Spirit." It is a love "revealed and made present by Christ (cf. Jn 13:1), and 'poured into our hearts through the Holy Spirit' (Rom 5:5)." Thus, the Church's social teaching is "caritas in veritate in re sociali": the proclamation of CHRIST's love in society (no. 5).

Caritas in veritate takes practical shape in the moral criteria that govern action. Benedict mentions two: justice and the common good. "Charity goes beyond justice...but it never lacks justice," which prompts one to respect another person's rights (no. 6). The common good is the good of everyone, "made up of individuals, families and intermediate groups." Working on behalf of it—and today the common good embraces the whole human family—"is a requirement of justice and charity" (no. 7).

Benedict intends to revisit Populorun progressio "teachings on integral human development ... so as to apply them to the present moment" (no. 8). Although controversial in some quarters when released (e.g., for its use of social science jargon), Benedict pronounces Paul's encyclical "the Rerum novarum" of our time. The pope concludes by recalling that the Church does not offer technical solutions to problems. Her mission, rather, is an evangelical one: "fidelity to truth, which alone is the guarantee of freedom (cf. Jn 8:32) and of the possibility of integral human development" (no. 9).

The Legacy of Populorum Progressio. In chapter one, "The Message of Populorum Progressio" (nos. 10–20), Benedict XVI articulates the enduring principles of the encyclical. The correct viewpoint is the "Tradition of the apostolic faith." (no. 10). He reminds Catholics, as did Pope John Paul II in Solicitudo rei socialis, of how greatly PAUL VI and the subsequent social magisterium are linked to VATICAN COUNCIL II. From its vision, Paul VI articulated the truths that in the Church's entire existence she is "engaged in promoting integral human development" and that "authentic human development concerns the whole of the person in every single dimension" (no. 11). Moreover, this development is a vocation and thus needs a transcendent anthropology. This anthropology should also be holistic (no. 76).

Benedict is also concerned that the pre- and post-conciliar social doctrine constitutes "a single teaching, consistent and at the same time ever new ... illuminat[ing] with an unchanging light ... new problems" (no. 12). The pope sees how tightly Populorum progressio is linked to Paul's overall magisterium. First, Benedict notes that with "development, understood in human and Christian terms, he identified the heart of the Christian social message," while proposing Christian charity "as [its] principal driving force" (no. 13).

Pope Benedict XVI also mentions Paul VI's Apostolic Letter Octogesima adveniens (no. 14). Here, Benedict addresses, as he will later, the role of technology in development, neither idealizing it nor condemning it. Perhaps the most original and lasting contribution of Caritas in veritate is how it definitively connects the social doctrine of the Church with her teachings on human life and sexuality, and evangelization. Paul's encyclical Humanae vitae indicated "the strong links between life ethics and social ethics"; his Apostolic Exhortation Evangelii nuntiandi indicated the strong links between evangelization and social ethics (e.g., human advancement) [no. 15].

Benedict devotes sections 16 to 20 to explicating Paul VI's notion of integral human development as a vocation: It requires God (no. 16), freedom (no. 17), and respect for truth (no. 18). It must also be "integral" (i.e., involving the whole man and every man) and include the GOSPEL (no. 18) and the centrality of charity (no. 19). Reform is "urgent," Benedict announces, and a "consequence of charity in truth" (no. 20).

In chapter two, "Human Development in Our Time" (nos. 21–33), Benedict reads the signs of the times and asks: Has Paul VI's vision of development been fulfilled? (no. 21). Although billions have been lifted out of extreme poverty, "economic growth has been and continues to be weighed down by malfunctions and dramatic problems." As Benedict formulates it in no. 22, world wealth is "growing in absolute terms, but inequalities are on the increase." Yet, progress must include more than material advancement; it must be integral (no. 23).

Section 24 evaluates the state's changing role in the context of international trade and finance (i.e., globalization). In number 25, the pope mentions the phenomenon of outsourcing and how it has led to a "downsizing of social security systems." He also notes the difficulties of labor unions (cf. no. 64), the positive and negative effects of labor mobility (cf. no. 40), and the problem of unemployment (cf. no. 63). Culture (no. 26; cf. no. 59), hunger (no. 27), respect for life (no. 28), and religious freedom (or its denial) [no. 29; cf. no. 56] are also treated in the context of development. Benedict affirms that only God guarantees "man's true development." (no. 29; cf. no. 52).

In numbers 30 and 31, Benedict calls for an interdisciplinary approach to development animated by charity. Section 32 warns against disparities in wealth, calls for "access to steady employment," and observes, "Human costs always include economic costs," and vice versa. After forty years, progress "remains an open question," made more critical in light of the economic meltdown (no. 33). Globalization, though, presents a "great opportunity," but also a great danger (no. 33; cf. no. 42). Therefore, society must broaden "the scope of reason" so it can direct "these powerful new forces" (no. 33; cf. no. 56).

Principles for Morally Sound and Humane Development. Chapter three, "Fraternity, Economic Development and Civil Society" (nos. 34–42), develops the idea of the "principle of gratuitousness" or gift (no. 34). This challenging but partially developed concept appears in number 35: "Without internal forms of solidarity and mutual trust, the market cannot completely fulfill its proper economic function" (cf. nos. 36–39). Although the market is not inherently bad (no. 36), all economic activity is subject to justice (no. 37; cf. no. 45). Benedict calls on businesses to take greater social responsibility, not only for their investors but for every stakeholder who makes a contribution (no. 40). Business, like political authority, involves "a wide range of values" (no. 41). The role of the state, according to the pope, seems to be growing in importance.

In Chapter four, "The Development of People; Rights and Duties; The Environment" (nos. 43–52), Benedict argues that rights—to avoid license—presuppose duties (no. 43). He addresses the question of population growth, condemns forced birth control programs, and warns of the dangers of a declining birthrate in many countries (no. 44). He also encourages forms of business that see profit as a means to a more humane economy (nos. 46–47).

Another profound and original aspect of the encyclical is its extended analysis of the environment and nature in the context of development and the energy problem. In short, Benedict calls the Church to stewardship and to view nature as a gift, with an intrinsic teleology (nos. 48–51).

Chapter five, "The Cooperation of the Human Family" (nos. 53–67), begins with a reflection on the "relational" character of the human person—"the human race is a single family" (no. 53; cf. no. 55)—one which is meant to be incorporated into the Trinitarian communion of Persons (no. 54). Benedict also discusses the time-honored Catholic social tradition of subsidiarity. He sees it as a curb on an "all-encompassing welfare state" as well as a way to manage globalization (no. 57). Solidarity is its sister principle (no. 58) [e.g., in international aid, no. 60].

Benedict continues by commenting on education and international tourism (no. 61), migration (no. 62), decent work (no. 63), labor unions (no. 64), finance (no. 65), the social responsibility of the consumer (no. 66), and the need for a "world political authority" governed by subsidiarity (no. 67). The latter proposal goes back to Blessed Pope JOHN XXIII's 1963 encyclical, Pacem in terris.

In Chapter six, "The Development of Peoples and Technology" (nos. 68–76), the pope returns to the topic of technology and warns of the Promethean spirit that often accompanies it (no. 68). While appreciating its benefits and the dominion it provides man (no. 69), the pope points out its drawbacks, especially when divorced from moral responsibility (no. 70), when abused in bioethics (nos. 74–75), or when understood materialistically to deny the soul and spiritual values (nos. 76–77).

Benedict closes by calling for a "Christian humanism" (no. 78) dependent on prayer and close attention to all aspects of the spiritual life (no. 79). Interestingly, in an authoritative encyclical on the global economy, Benedict does not use the word capitalism once, usually preferring the term market. His attitude seems to be one of cautious acceptance, with many qualifications. Thus, Caritas is definitely a more Populorum-progressio-inspired document than a Centesimus-annus-inspired one, with the latter more positive toward capitalism.

SEE ALSO CENTESIMUS ANNUS; DEUS CARITAS EST; JOHN PAUL II, POPE; PACEM IN TERRIS; POPULORUM PROGRESSIO; RERUM NOVARUM; SPE SALVI.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Benedict XVI, Caritas in Veritate, Charity in Truth (Encyclical, June 29, 2009), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/benedict_xvi/encyclicals/documents/hf_ben- xvi_enc_20090629_caritas-in-veritate_en.html (accessed October 10, 2009).

Caritas in Veritate: Why Truth Matters, Acton Institute, available from http://www.acton.org/issues/caritas_in_veritate.php (accessed October 10, 2009).

Allan Figueroa Deck, S.J., "Commentary on Populorum progressio (On the Development of Peoples)," in Modern Catholic Social Teaching: Commentaries & Interpretations, edited by Kenneth R. Himes, O.F.M. (Washington, D.C. 2005), 292–314.

John M. Finnis, "Catholic Social Teaching Since Populorum Progressio," in Liberation Theology in Latin America, edited by James V. Schall, S.J. (San Francisco 1982), 304–321.

Alfred T. Hennelly, S.J., "Populorum Progressio," in The New Dictionary of Catholic Social Thought, edited by Judith Dwyer (Collegeville, Minn. 1994), 762–770.

Michael Novak, James Schall, S.J., Joseph Wood, and Robert Royal, Caritas in Veritate: A Symposium, Catholic Education Resource Center, available from http://www.catholiceducation.org/articles/religion/re0954.htm (accessed October 10, 2009).

Paul VI, Populorum Progressio, On the Development of Peoples (Encyclical, March 26, 1967), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/paul_vi/encyclicals/documents/hf_p-vi_enc_26031967_populorum_en.html (accessed October 10, 2009).

Paul VI, Humanae vitae, On the Regulation of Birth (Encyclical, July 25, 1968), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/paul_vi/encyclicals/documents/hf_p-vi_enc_25071968_humanae-vitae_en.html (accessed October 10, 2009).

Paul VI, Octogesima adveniens, Eightieth Anniversary of Rerum Novarum (Apostolic Letter, May 14, 1971), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/paul_vi/apost_letters/documents/hf_p-vi_apl_19710514_octogesima-adveniens_en.html (accessed October 10, 2009).

Paul VI, Evangelii nuntiandi, To the Episcopate, Clergy, and Faithful of the World (Apostolic Exhortation, December 8, 1975), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/paul_vi/apost_exhortations/documents/hf_p-vi_exh_19751208_evangelii-nuntiandi_en.html (accessed October 10, 2009).

Robert Royal, "Reforming International Development: Populorum Progressio," in Building the Free Society: Democracy, Capitalism, and Catholic Social Teaching, edited by George Weigel and Robert Royal (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1993), 131–148.

Mark S. Latkovic
Professor of Moral Theology
Sacred Heart Major Seminary, Detroit, Mich. (2010)

CARLEN, CLAUDIA

American Librarian; b. Detroit, July 24, 1906; d. Detroit, April 19, 2004.

Sr. Claudia entered the Sisters of the IMMACULATE HEART OF MARY on June 30, 1926. Mother Domitilla sent her immediately to study at the prestigious University of Michigan. Instead of earning a degree in mathematics, her superior asked her to earn a Bachelor of Arts in Library Science. Afterwards Sr. Claudia was appointed to Marygrove College in Detroit, where she served as a librarian from 1929 to1944 and Library Director from 1944 to1969.

Sr. Claudia returned to the University of Michigan in 1936 to earn the Master of Arts in Library Science. Her master's thesis, under the direction of Dr. William Warner Bishop, began a path that would eventually lead to the Vatican Apostolic Library. Dr. Bishop received a grant to make the VATICAN LIBRARY more accessible to scholars. Sr. Claudia's thesis became published as a book, A Guide to the Encyclicals of the Roman Pontiffs from Leo XIII to the Present Day (1878–1937).

As Library Director, Sr. Claudia was remarkable at balancing administration with scholarship. While overseeing the building of the new Marygrove College library, Sr. Claudia worked on the writings of PIUS XII; she published a Guide to the Documents of Pius XII, 1939–1949 in 1951. Later while supervising the development of the college library, she published the Dictionary of Papal Pronouncements, Leo XIII to Pius XII, 1878–1957 in 1958. In 1963 she was recruited to be the index editor for the New Catholic Encyclopedia published in 1967. On this project Sr. Claudia made a significant contribution to library science in the twentieth century, one that would have made her mentor Dr. Bishop proud. After extensive research on indexing methods, Sr. Claudia discovered a way to computerize the indexing process. In the meantime, Sr. Claudia was very active in the CATHOLIC LIBRARY ASSOCIATION of America, serving as its president from 1965 to 1967.

Upon retirement Sr. Claudia was far from finished. Her "retirement" began in 1971 to 1972 when she became a consultant at the Vatican Apostolic Library and at the library for Casa Santa Maria, the graduate house of the NORTH AMERICAN COLLEGE in ROME.

When Sr. Claudia returned from Rome she was invited by the rector of St. John's Provincial Seminary, Msgr. (later Bishop) Robert Rose (1930–), to work in the library. In 1974 Sr. Claudia received the Distinguished Alumnus Award from the University of Michigan School of Library Science.

Sr. Claudia continued her scholarly work and published the monumental Papal Encyclicals 1740–1981. This was the first time that a comprehensive collection of the papal encyclicals had been published. It has been translated in many languages since its publication in 1981.

In the late 1970s she began planning the formation of the American Friends of the Vatican Library with Msgr. Francis X. Canfield. The American Friends was approved by Pope JOHN PAUL II in a letter by Cardinal CASAROLI on October 9, 1981. Years later she recounted the founding and development of the AFVL in The Catholic Library World (1996). She wrote: "It behooves every Catholic college and particularly every university library to assume some responsibility for aiding and promoting some awareness of the great treasures the Vatican Library is freely making available to scholars from around the world." This organization has raised significant amounts for the Vatican Apostolic Library since its founding.

After St. John Seminary closed in 1988, Sr. Claudia went to the Bentley Historical Library at the University of Michigan to work on another massive project under the direction of Dr. Francis Blouin. In 1998 the Vatican Archives: An Inventory and Guide to Historical Documents of the Holy See was published. Sr. Claudia was only 92 years old at the time.

The life of Sr. Claudia reflects the faith, dedication, energy, and love for learning that made this diminutive religious sister a giant among her peers, students, and friends. Near the end of her life she wrote:

> As I look back on my life I see, more clearly than ever before, that my first missioning determined practically everything that I have done throughout these past seventy-one years.... Everything I have achieved for these past years has flowed naturally and happily from this original appointment. In all of this I have truly felt that I was doing what the Lord was asking of me ... but also trusted Him to empower me far beyond my own strength and vision to do what needed to be done.

Sr. Claudia accomplished more in her "retirement" than most people accomplish in their professional careers.

SEE ALSO ENCYCLICAL; ENCYCLOPEDIAS AND DICTIONARIES, CATHOLIC; PRONOUNCEMENTS, PAPAL AND CURIAL.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Sr. Claudia Carlen, Guide to the Documents of Pius XII, 1939–1949 (Westminster, Md. 1951).

Sr. Claudia Carlen, Dictionary of Papal Pronouncements, Leo XIII to Pius XII, 1878–1957 (New York 1958).

Sr. Claudia Carlen, comp., Papal Encyclicals 1740–1981 (Wilmington, N.C. 1981).

Msgr. Charles Kosanke
SS. Cyril and Methodius Seminary
Orchard Lake, Michigan (2010)

CASEY, SOLANUS

Baptized Bernard Francis Casey; Capuchin priest; b. November 25, 1870, near Prescott, Wisconsin; d. July 31, 1957, in Detroit, Michigan, with a reputation for sanctity.

Casey's parents, Bernard James Casey and Ellen Elizabeth Murphy, emigrated from Ireland in the 1850s to the eastern United States. They were married in Salem, Massachusetts, in 1863, took up farming in Wisconsin in 1865, and raised a family of six girls and ten boys.

When he was about seventeen, Bernard left home to work in Stillwater, Minnesota, first on the river logjams, then as a part-time prison guard, and finally as a street car operator. In 1891 he entered the diocesan seminary in Milwaukee to study for the priesthood. After a five-year struggle with studies, his professors suggested that he join a religious order.

Acquainted with the Capuchins in Milwaukee, he entered their community in Detroit and received the name Francis Solanus. He made profession of vows on July 21, 1898, and was sent to the Capuchin Seminary of St. Francis in Milwaukee. Classes there were conducted in German and Latin, which became a constant struggle for the young friar. While his grades were barely passing, the superiors questioned his academic ability for the priesthood. But because of his genuine religious spirit, he was finally accepted for ordination on July 24, 1904. However, he was restricted without faculties for preaching or hearing confessions.

Assigned to Capuchin parishes in New York—Yonkers, Lower Manhattan, and Harlem—as SACRISTAN and PORTER, he dedicated himself to serving the sick and poor. In Harlem people began reporting remarkable favors following his blessings and prayers. When this came to the notice of the provincial, Fr. Benno Aichinger, he ordered Solanus to keep a record of these favors, which Solanus always attributed to the benefits of the holy Masses offered for those who enrolled in the Seraphic Mass Association. In 1924 he was transferred to St. Bonaventure Monastery in Detroit, Michigan. His reputation for HOLINESS soon became known and within a short time people began flocking to the monastery. For the next twenty-one years Fr. Solanus was at the service of people from all walks of life, especially the sick and the poor. Worn out by the daily crowds seeking his help, the superiors transferred him in 1946 to the rural Monastery of St. Felix in Huntington, Indiana. But again people from Michigan and the surrounding states continued to seek him out for prayers and blessings.

Finally, in April of 1956, worn out and suffering from a chronic skin disease, he returned to Detroit. Eighteen months later, after spending about a month in St. John Hospital, his long life was completed. His last conscious act was to raise himself up in bed and exclaim, "I give my soul to Jesus Christ."

Soon after his death a movement began to consider Solanus Casey a candidate for sainthood, and many people visited his burial place praying for his INTERCESSION. A thorough study of his life and virtues, from the testimony of many priests, religious, and lay people who had known him well, was completed in the Archdiocese of Detroit and sent to the Vatican in 1984. After this evidence was examined by the Congregation for Causes of Saints, Pope JOHN PAUL II issued the Decree of Heroic Virtue on July 11, 1995, and declared Solanus VENERABLE.

In the year 2000, the Solanus Casey Center and Museum of memorabilia was built adjacent to St. Bonaventure Church and the tomb of Solanus Casey. It is now an inspiring pilgrimage site where all who come seeking Solanus's intercession can learn from his holy life and example. Located near downtown Detroit, it is open to visitors. Many reports of healings from serious illnesses, attributed to the intercession of Solanus, have been submitted to the Vatican's Congregation for Causes of Saints. For BEATIFICATION there must be evidence of at least one cure that occurred without medical intervention.

SEE ALSO DETROIT, ARCHDIOCESE OF; FRIARS; RELIGIOUS (MEN AND WOMEN); VIRTUE, HEROIC.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Sr. Bernadine Casey, ed., Letters from Fr. Solanus Casey (Detroit 2000).

Michael H. Crosby, Thank God Ahead of Time (Chicago 1985).

Michael H. Crosby, Solanus Casey (New York 2000).

James Patrick Derum, The Porter of Saint Bonaventure (Detroit 1968).

Catherine M. Odell, Father Solanus: The Story of Fr. Solanus Casey, O.F.M. Cap. (Huntington, Ind. 1988).

Leo Wollenweber, Meet Solanus Casey (Cincinnati 2002).

Br. Leo E. Wollenweber OFMCap
Vice-Postulator
Father Solanus Center, Detroit, Mich. (2010)

CASSANT, JOSEPH-MARIE, BL.

Trappist Cistercian; b. Casseneuil-sur-Lot, France, March 6, 1878; d. Abbey of Sainte-Marie du Désert, France, June 17, 1903; beatified October 3, 2004, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

Joseph-Marie Cassant desired intensely to become a priest, but was handicapped by an almost total lack of the necessary intellectual endowments. At the age of sixteen, on December 5, 1894, he entered the Trappist Cistercian Abbey of Sainte-Marie du Désert where he received the habit of a choir religious, made his simple profession in 1897, and was solemnly professed on May 24, 1900.

Weak in body, prone to discouragement, and unresponsive by nature to many aspects of monastic culture, this seemingly ungifted monk nevertheless lived in constant and vivid awareness of the essential Christian and monastic realities. Less articulate than THÉRÈSE OF LISIEUX or Charles de FOUCAULD, Joseph nevertheless had the same thirst for the absolute, the same poverty of spirit, and the same intense charity. His unique gift was the humble acceptance of his frailty and complete abandonment to the love and mercy of God. Through both his intellectual and physical weaknesses and later in the midst of great suffering brought about by an incurable bout of tuberculosis that ended his life, he exhibited childlike dependence and trust in the Lord. Drawing his strength through constant meditation of Jesus Christ in his PASSION and upon the Cross, he remained ever faithful, continually proclaiming: "All for Jesus, all through Mary."

With the help of his spiritual father, André Malet (1862–1936, later abbot of the monastery), Joseph had the joy of being ordained on October 12, 1902, and of living the last eight months of his life as a priest. As his illness progressed, he stated, "When I can no longer say Mass, Jesus can take me from this world." On June 17, 1903, at the tender age of twenty-five, Fr. Joseph-Marie passed from this life into the next. On June 9, 1984, Pope John Paul II acknowledged his heroic virtues, and on October 3, 2004, presided at the Mass at his BEATIFICATION. There, the pope spoke of Fr. Joseph-Marie's intense "love for God," which strengthened him through his trials, enabling him to offer "his sufferings for the Lord and for the Church." The pope commended: "May our contemporaries, especially contemplatives and the sick, discover following his example the mystery of prayer, which raises the world to God and gives strength in trial!"

Feast: June 17.

SEE ALSO CISTERCIANS; FRANCE, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; RELIGIOUS (MEN AND WOMEN); TRAPPISTS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Marie-Étienne Chenevière, L'Âme cistercienne du Père Marie-Joseph Cassant (d'après ses notes inédites) (Abbey of Sainte-Marie du Désert, France 1938).

Marie-Étienne Chenevière, L'Attente dans le silence: Le Père Marie-Joseph Cassant (Bruges, Belgium 1961).

John Paul II, "Beatification of Five Servants of God" (Homily, October 3, 2004), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/homilies/2004/documents/hf_jp-ii_hom_20041003_beatifications_en.html (accessed October 22, 2009).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Joseph-Marie Cassant (1878–1903)," Vatican Web site, October 3, 2004, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_lit_doc_20041003_cassant_en.html (accessed October 22, 2009).

Rev. Chrysogonus Waddell
Organist, Choirmaster, Professor of Liturgy
Abbey of Gethsemani, Trappist, Kentucky

Kimberly Henkel
Ph.D. Candidate
School of Theology and Religious Studies
The Catholic University of America (2010)

CASTRO, FIDEL RUZ

Cuban President, b. August 13, 1926, Birón Cuba.

Fidel Castro remains one of the most controversial figures in contemporary history, particularly in relation to the Catholic Church. Educated by clergy and raised in a Catholic household and nation, Castro has maintained an interest in religion, particularly LIBERATION THEOLOGY, while repressing those religious aspects he deems counter to the revolution.

The Cuba of Castro's youth had a very small practicing Catholic population despite the fact that the majority of Cubans identified themselves as Catholic. Castro's father Angel, a Galician, was not a practicing Catholic; however, Castro described his mother, Lina, as a woman of faith who prayed the rosary and maintained a shrine in their home. Since the Castro family lived in the rural area of the Oriente, they, like many provincial families, did not regularly attend church because one was not located nearby.

As a child, Castro was educated first by the MARIST, then La Salle, brothers. He developed a respect for their selflessness and work with the poor; however, he resented the physical punishments and discipline that the brothers meted out to their charges. Although his education served him well, he had a greater thirst for knowledge than what he could receive there. During his final years of high school, he attended a Jesuit school. He admired the JESUITS for their intellectual rigor, their self-sacrifice, and their interest in their students. These Jesuit teachers taught him both ethics and sports. They also imbued him with a sense of nationalism and Hispanidad, a sense of pride in Spanish values, and caused him to question the materialism of the Anglo-Saxon world, all of which became prime components of the young man's character. Although the intellectual prowess of the Jesuits impressed him, he disliked their dogmatism.

Despite his Catholic education, Castro became a Marxist-Leninist in reaction to U.S. imperialism, dictatorship, and repression. These beliefs also led many other Cubans to the July 26 Movement. The movement, which gained its name from the revolutionaries' attack on the Santiago de Cuba army barracks on July 26, 1953, began in 1955 once the Castro brothers fled to Mexico after they had been released from prison. From their exile in Mexico, they coordinated with those revolutionaries who remained in Cuba. Many revolutionaries associated Catholicism with Spanish colonialism and foreign powers because many priests were from Spain. The Masons, who led the Cuban independence movement, called for a separation of CHURCH AND STATE. Some 5 to 6 percent of the population identified themselves as Protestant. In the July 26 Movement, these Protestants played a significant role, beginning with Frank País (1934–1957), son of a Baptist minister and a martyr of the revolution (Farber 2006, p. 53). Many leaders of the movement had attended or taught in Protestant schools, such as Mario Llerena (1913–2006), the spokesperson for the July 26 Movement, who had been a Presbyterian seminarian.

After the revolution, Castro's reputation as hostile to the Church began when he expelled foreign and native-born priests in 1961, many of them affiliated with OPUS DEI. The prevailing view of the Church as associated with the elites and ruling class led to further denunciations. Castro argued that the conservative clergy did not serve the poor, but rather the rich. Thus, he argued, they violated the true doctrine of Christ. Despite expelling priests, Castro has argued that he never closed churches.

Nonetheless, out of four million baptized Catholics, only 150,000 regularly attended mass in 1985 (Gott 2005, p. 307). Like much of Latin America, Cuba has grown more religiously diverse, with Protestantism, Santería, Palo Monte, and Abakuá. By the early 1990s, more than one million Protestants worshipped in 900 chapels (Gott 2005, p. 307). In an interview, Castro argued:

Papal Meeting. Cuban President Fidel Castro greets Pope John Paul II after the Mass celebrated at the Plaza of the Revolution in Havana on January 25, 1998. During the mass, the pope urged the Cuban government to lift restrictions on the Catholic Church. AFP/GETTY IMAGES

> From a political point of view, I think one can be a Marxist without ceasing to be a Christian and can work together with a Marxist Communist to transform the world. What is important in both cases is the question of sincere revolutionaries disposed to abolish the exploitation of man by man and to struggle for the just distribution of riches. (Betto 1985, p. 18)

Castro's remarks were not unique. Other Catholic Socialists and Marxists, whether lay or clergy, have made similar statements. What was unique was that he was the first head of state who formally acknowledged the role of religion in the struggles of Latin America.

In 1998, Pope JOHN PAUL II visited Cuba at the invitation of Castro. Castro met with John Paul in 1996, four years after the state declared itself secular rather than atheist. An ardent anti-Communist, John Paul II also deplored the Western excesses of capitalism, which made him more approachable for Castro. In his opening speech, Castro acknowledged the failures of the Church but also stated: "Your Holiness, I sincerely admire your courageous statements about what happened with Galileo, about the well-known errors of the Inquisition, about cruel episodes of the Crusades, about crimes committed during the conquest of America and about certain scientific discoveries once the object of so many prejudices and anathemas but no longer called in question." John Paul criticized Cuba for its excesses of divorce, abortion, alcoholism, and drug use. He also challenged the state monopoly over education. However, he publicly condemned the United States embargo describing it as "ethically unacceptable" and "oppressive" (National Catholic Reporter February 6, 1998). Despite John Paul's hostility to the theologians that Castro most admired, the state deemed the trip a success.

In 2006, when Castro grew ill, prayer vigils took place for the aging leader. Moreover, two prominent Catholic intellectuals attended him: Leonardo BOFF and Frei Betto (b. 1944). Betto, who had conducted extensive interviews with Castro in the 1980s, described him as undergoing a personal conversion. A prominent Liberation Theologian who was silenced by the Church and ultimately left in 1992, Boff wrote of Castro, "His Marxism is more ethical than political: how to do justice to the poor? He has read a mountain of books, all of them with notes ... I once told him, 'If Cardinal Ratzinger understood half of what you understand of the theology of Liberation, my personal destiny and the future of this theology would be very different'" (National Catholic Reporter August 18, 2006).

SEE ALSO BAPTISTS; COMMUNISM; CUBA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; MARXISM; PRESBYTERIANISM; RATZINGER, JOSEPH.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

John L. Allen Jr., "All Things Catholic," National Catholic Reporter, August 18, 2006, available from http://www.nationalcatholicreporter.org/word/pfw081806.htm (accessed September 26, 2009).

Frei Betto, Fidel and Religion: Castro Talks on Revolution and Religion with Frei Betto, translated by the Cuban Center for Translation and Interpretation, introduction by Harvey Cox (New York 1987).

Fidel Castro, Fidel: My Early Years, edited by Deborah Shnookal and Pedro Álvarez Tabío (Melbourne 1998).

Samuel Farber, The Origins of the Cuban Revolution Reconsidered (Chapel Hill, N.C. 2006).

Richard Gott, Cuba: A New History (New Haven, Conn. 2005).

Gary MacEoin, "For the Pope and Castro a Win-Win Visit," National Catholic Reporter, February 6, 1998, available from http://natcath.org/NCR_Online/archives2/1998a/020698/020698d.htm (accessed September 26, 2009).

Elaine Carey
Associate Professor, History
St. John's University (Queens), New York (2010)

CATANOSO, GAETANO (CAJETAN), ST.

Priest of Reggio Calabria, founder of the Congregation of the Sisters of St. Veronica of the Holy Face (Congregazione delle Suore Veroniche del Volto Santo); b. February 14, 1879, Chorio di San Lorenzo, Reggio Calabria, Italy; d. April 4, 1963, Reggio Calabria; beatified May 4, 1997, by Pope JOHN PAUL II; canonized October 23, 2005, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

Gaetano Catanoso's parents were landowners who encouraged his faith and vocation. He was ordained in 1902, and gained a reputation for holiness while serving as a parish priest at Pentidattilo. In 1920 he founded a parish confraternity and started a newsletter devoted to the Holy Father. He also used the newsletter to promote the Poor Clerics Association and to encourage vocations.

In 1921 Catanoso was appointed pastor of Santa Maria de la Candelaria, Reggio Calabria, where he founded the Missionaries of the Holy Face and built a shrine in honor of the Holy Face of Jesus. The first members of the congregation—dedicated to charity, prayer for reparation, and catechesis—were clothed in 1935, and their constitutions were approved by the diocese in 1958. To renew spirituality among his flock, Catanoso promoted Eucharistic and Marian devotions, catechesis, and parish missions. He organized teams of priests to conduct these missions in the region. In addition to his parish work (1921–1950), Catanoso served as chaplain to religious institutes, a prison, a hospital, and the archdiocesan seminary. He was declared venerable immediately after his death.

A healing at his INTERCESSION, approved as a miracle on June 25, 1996, led to his BEATIFICATION. During that ceremony, Pope John Paul II observed that Catanoso "worked tirelessly for the good of the flock entrusted to him by the Lord." In the face of each sufferer, Catanoso saw the reflection of "the bloodstained and disfigured face of Christ." Many Italians recognized the "good fragrance of Christ" in their "father," Catanoso, the pope said, and for that reason he was an "eloquent sign of the fatherhood of God."

In April 2004, Catanoso's cause was advanced by the Congregation for the Causes of Saints, and he was canonized by Pope Benedict XVI on October 23, 2005. During the canonization Mass, Pope Benedict identified the "soul" of Catanoso's priesthood: daily Mass and Eucharistic adoration. The pope emphasized the unity between Catanoso's devotion to the Holy Face and his devotion to the Eucharist: Catanoso joined these devotions with "joyful intuition.... He would say, 'If we wish to adore the real Face of Jesus ... we can find it in the divine Eucharist, where with the Body and Blood of Jesus Christ, the Face of Our Lord is hidden under the white veil of the Host.'" The pope also observed that Catanoso had transmitted his spirituality to the congregation he founded—"the spirit of charity, humility and sacrifice which enlivened his entire life."

Feast: April 4.

SEE ALSO RELIGIOUS (MEN AND WOMEN).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Benedict XVI, "Conclusion of the 11th Ordinary General Assembly of the Synod of Bishops and Year of the Eucharist, Canonization of the Blesseds: Jozef Bilczewski, Gaetano Catanoso, Zygmunt Gorazdowski, Alberto Hurtado Cruchaga, Felix of Nicosia" (Homily, October 23, 2005), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/benedict_xvi/homilies/2005/documents/hf_ben-xvi_hom_20051023_canonizations_en.html (accessed November 9, 2009).

Justin Catanoso, My Cousin the Saint: A Search for Faith, Family, and Miracles (New York 2008).

John Paul II, "Beatificazione dei Servi di Dio: Florentino Asensio Barroso, Ceferino Giménez Malla, Gaetano Catanoso, Enrico Rebuschini, e María Encarnación Rosal" (Homily, May 4, 1997), Vatican Web site, available (in Italian) from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/homilies/1997/documents/hf_jp-ii_hom_19970504_it.html (accessed November 9, 2009).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Gaetano Catanoso (1879–1963)," Vatican Web site, October 23, 2005, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_lit_doc_20051023_catanoso_en.html (accessed November 9, 2009).

Katherine I. Rabenstein
Senior Credentialing Specialist
American Nurses Association, Washington, D.C.

Kevin M. Clarke
Teacher of Religion
St. Joseph Academy, San Marcos, California (2010)

CATECHISMS

From the Greek κατηχεῖν (to speak so as to be heard, hence to instruct orally; cf. Lk 1:4; Act 18:25; Rom 2:18; Gal 6:6), a catechism according to an English-speaking and German usage is a manual of Christian DOCTRINE, often in question and answer form (German, Katechismus). In Romance languages the term also signifies the act of catechizing, the work of presenting Christian doctrine or an individual lesson, especially to the young (French, catéchisme; Italian, catechismo).

Patristic and Early Medieval Periods. CATECHISMS (catecheses) in the patristic era were traditionally prebaptismal and adult in orientation (e.g., CYRIL OF JERUSALEM, Κατηχήσεις μυσταγωγικαί (Mystagogical Catecheses); John CHRYSOSTOM, Ὁμιλίαι κατηχητικαί (Catechetical Homilies); AUGUSTINE, at the end of Catech. rud., Sermones 212–215; RUFINUS OF AQUILEIA, Commentarius in symbolum apostolorum). At times these lectures and homilies dealt with the immediate post-baptismal doctrinal needs of new Christians, in which case they were called mystagogic or simply paschal (e.g., Cyril of Jerusalem, Κατηχήσεις μυσταγωγικαί; Augustine, Selected Easter Sermons). Throughout the Carolingian and early and high medieval periods, numerous handbooks were produced that had the Christian formation of clergy and laity as their aim. Among these were the Disputatio puerorum per interrogationes et responsiones, attributed doubtfully to ALCUIN (d. 804; Patrologia latina 101, 1097–1144); the ninth-century Weissenburgensis Catechesis by Otfried, a MONK of that MONASTERY; the twelfth-century Elucidarium, attributed to HONORIUS OF AUTUN (Patrologia latina 172, 1109–1176; cf. Yves Lefèvre 1954); and the ingenious compendium of HUGH OF SAINT-VICTOR in that same century, De quinque septenis seu septenariis (Patrologia latina 175, 406–414). These treatises might be called the second layer of adult catechetical formation, suitable for those who could read Latin.

More basic were the catechisms proposed by bishops, emperors, and Church synods to be spoken orally to the unlettered FAITHFUL by those who had the cura animarum (care of souls). Among these, which invariably assumed phrase-by-phrase expositions by the clergy of the two baptismal prayers, APOSTLES' CREED and Our Father, and a list of vices to be avoided, would be the Capitularia of CHARLEMAGNE (AD 802; Patrologia latina [PL] 97, 247) and his letter (15) to Garibaldus (PL 98, 917–918); the synods of Leipzig (AD 743; PL 89, 822, c.25), Clovesho (AD 747; J.D. Mansi, 12:398, c.10), Frankfurt (AD 794; Mansi 13:908, c.33), AACHEN (AD 802; PL 97,247, c.14), ARLES (AD 813; Mansi 14:62, c.19), Mainz (AD 813; Mansi 14:74, c.45, 47), and TRIER (AD 1227; Mansi 23:31, c.8). The synod of Albi (AD 1254; Mansi 23:836, c.17, 18) required pastors to explain simply the articles of the CREED each Sunday and children to be brought to Mass from the age of seven onward and at the same time to have the Pater, Ave, and Credo explained to them. The Council of Lambeth demanded that this instruction be given by pastors four times a year on feast days, "without any fantastic weaving of subtle adornment" and that it include "the fourteen articles of faith [i.e., the Creed], the Ten Commandments of the Decalogue, the precepts of the gospel, namely the two concerned with charity, the seven works of mercy, the seven capital sins and their progeny, the seven principal virtues, and the seven Sacraments of grace" (AD 1281; Mansi 24:410). In 1357 the Convocation of York approved a series of ordinances very similar to the canons of the Council of Lambeth published in 1281 that outlined the contents and frequency of catechetical instruction. They were expanded and translated into English verse for the benefit of the clergy who could not understand Latin. Despite the fact that the work became known as The Lay Folks' Catechism, it was written primarily to help parish priests instruct the faithful, who in turn were to teach their children. About the same time a council in Lavaur, France, issued a similar catechism (AD 1368; Mansi 26:486). In the Lavaur catechism a summary of the necessity of FAITH comes first; next, a severe charge to the clergy on its obligations to catechize; third, the fourteen articles and seven Sacraments, "on which the whole Christian religion is based." Seven virtues and their opposing vices come after these "truths to be believed." These, together with the seven gifts of the SPIRIT and the BEATITUDES that correspond to them, are the "things that are to be loved," and the seven petitions of the Our Father describe the "things to be hoped for." In the fourteen articles of the Creed, seven pertain to the Deity proper, seven others to the humanity of CHRIST.

Influence of St. Augustine. The scheme of multiples of seven seems to have originated with AUGUSTINE's treatise on the Sermon on the Mount (PL 34, 1229–1308), in which he reduces the beatitudes to seven by identifying the last one in Matthew's GOSPEL with the first. Then he compares them with the seven gifts of the Spirit from the VULGATE version of Isaiah 11 in reverse order; these in turn correspond to the seven petitions in the LORD'S PRAYER. This mnemonic device emerged as supreme in medieval practice via popularizers, such as ISIDORE OF SEVILLE, RABANUS MAURUS, and especially Hugh of St. Victor in De quinque septenis seu septenariis. Hugh's "five sevens" are the seven DEADLY SINS, seven petitions of the Lord's Prayer, seven gifts of the Holy Spirit, seven virtues, and the seven Beatitudes.

A second insight of Augustine was his threefold division of all doctrine in his Faith, Hope, and Charity (c. AD 422; known as the Enchiridion). In it the "confession of faith is briefly summed up in the Creed.... But of all those matters which are to be believed in the true spirit of faith, only those pertain to hope which are contained in the Lord's Prayer" (114), while "all the divine commandments hark back to charity.... Of course the charity meant here is the love of our neighbor" (121). Augustine's extended treatment of the creedal articles (9–113) is in the speculative vein. The petitions of the Lord's Prayer (114–116) are seven in number, "three of which request eternal goods, the remaining four, temporal goods necessary for the attainment of the eternal." The HOLY SPIRIT, it is pointed out, "diffuses charity in our hearts" (121).

Although Augustine entirely subordinates the Decalogue to the twofold commandment of LOVE of GOD and love of neighbor in the Enchiridion (117–122), he is often said to have pioneered in presenting the Ten Commandments as a framework for Christian MORALITY (Catech. rud. 35.41). The convenient ten headings prevailed in a Mosaic spirit of observance, while Augustine's stress on the Holy Spirit as the finger of God who wrote on the stone tablets and again at PENTECOST was largely forgotten (cf. Rentschka 1905).

Paradoxically, Augustine's best insight survived least well, namely, the narratio (narration) of the story of SALVATION in six epochs (aetates), of which the seventh was eternity, the Day of the Lord. He develops this idea in two sample introductory catecheses at the end of De catechizandis rudibus. The landmark figures of the six ages are ADAM, NOAH, ABRAHAM, DAVID, the Babylonian captives, and Christ, "from [whose] coming the sixth age is dated" (39). Augustine was still in a millenarian phase at this writing (c. 405), but the important matter was his presentation of the Church's faith in a historical framework. He was the first to deal with the life of the Church (the sixth aetas) as sacred history in the same sense as the events described in Scripture.

Augustine's greatness as a CATECHIST resided in his musings on the relation between symbol and reality, word and truth, speech and thought. The psychological optimum for the reception of an idea figured largely in his catechetical theory. Lesser teachers, unable to handle his poetic diction or his PSYCHOLOGY, gravitated to his reasoned REFLECTIONS on the mysteries. The result was a rationalized Christianity cut off from its Biblical sources despite the massive use of the BIBLE made by Augustine (42,816 citations from both Testaments according to P. de Lagarde). The catechisms derived from his writings set the tone for Christianity in the West for 1,000 years. In departing from his Biblical and liturgical concerns and concentrating on his rationale of the mysteries, these catechisms created a vacuum of evangelical preaching and catechizing that the Reformers filled.

Middle Ages. Treatises on Christian life, such as Alcuin's De virtutibus et vitiis, on perfection for the soldier (PL 101, 613–638), continued into the MIDDLE AGES as a genre on the art of living and dying. Among these were L'Art de mourir attributed to MATTHEW OF CRACOW, bishop of Worms (1478), Tafel der Kerstlygken Levens (1475), and various shepherd's almanacs filled with secular and sacred information, such as the Compost et Kalendrier des Bergiers (Paris 1492). From the invention of printing onward, and even before, woodcut illustrations were used both in books and as wall charts (tabulae).

St. Thomas Aquinas. St. THOMAS AQUINAS in his various adult catechetical treatises was quite balanced in his concern with Christian behavior. These works were chiefly his Compendium theologiae, done on Augustine's pattern of FAITH, HOPE, and CHARITY (1272–1273, broken off when he was only ten chapters into hope and the petition "thy kingdom come") and the reportatum (bringing back, report or reproduction) in Latin of fifty-seven of his Italian sermons delivered at Naples during LENT 1273 on the Creed (15), the Lord's Prayer (10), and the law, that is, charity and the Decalogue (32), to which should be added his earlier conferences on the HAIL MARY and a treatise on the Church's Sacraments done for the archbishop of Palermo in 1261. In these lectures, fully scholastic in tone though they were, there was a healthy concern for the revealed mysteries.

Jean Gerson. The next major figure in the history of medieval catechesis is Jean GERSON (1363–1429). Forcibly retired as chancellor of Paris in his last years (1409–1412), Gerson taught catechism in Lyons and continued to write. He is best known for L'ABC des Simples Gens, a personal apologia for his engagement in the work of catechizing, titled Tractatus de parvulis trahendis ad Christum (Opera Omnia 1706, 3.278–291), and Opus tripertitum (Opera Omnia 1706, 1.426–450) on the Commandments, confession, and dying well. In the last work the attention given to moral precepts is so considerable that the writer's initial concern with the mysteries of faith has shrunk to almost a prologue.

Pre-Reformation. The lectures survived in medieval pulpit preaching until Trent, but the strain represented by Gerson's writing continued much more strongly. Thus, Dietrich Kolde's influential Christenspiegel of 1480 was extremely moralistic, as was Johannes Herolt's Liber discipuli de eruditione Christi fidelium in 1490. The latter devotes six pages to the Creed, three to the Our Father, and 101 to morality under the headings Commandments, deadly sins, and various moral precepts (cf. Bahlmann 1894, 12; also Göbl 1880).

From the close of the patristic period (i.e., from the ninth or tenth century) through the whole Tridentine era, little was done to relate beatitudes, works of mercy, evangelical counsels, fruits of the Holy Spirit, PRAYER, and almsgiving to the story of salvation as it culminated in the redemptive deed of Christ. Such moral and spiritual qualities are included with effectus divinitatis (the divine effect) or bona redemptionis (the goods of redemption), and related in a most general way to the works of the Spirit that conclude the Apostles' Creed. Although JUNGMANN's studies in Pastoral Liturgy (1962) show the conservative force of medieval culture on folk piety, Rudolf Padberg's Erasmus als Katechet (1956) is quite right in describing the entire medieval period as a catechetical vacuum.

Humanism. Late in the fifteenth century a number of humanists, including ERASMUS, tried a different approach. Among their attempts were the brief Cathecyzon (c. 1510) by John COLET, dean of St. Paul's and founder of its school, and Erasmus's adult catechism of 1533, Dilucida et pia explanatio symboli, quod apostolorum dictur, decalogi praeceptorum, et dominicae praecationis (Opera Omnia 1706, 5.1133–1196). By the onset of the REFORMATION the Catholic catechisms in commonest use included books of piety such as the Liber Jesu Christi pro simplicibus (1505) and the catechisms of J. Dietenberger (Cologne 1530) and Georg WITZEL or Wicelius (Leipzig 1535).

Luther. The catechism genre took definitive form in the sixteenth century and became a powerful instrument in the cause of reform. In 1529 Martin LUTHER published two catechisms, the Der kleine Katechismus, his Small Catechism, and his Deutsch Katechismus, which came to be known as Der grosser Katechismus, his Large Catechism. Luther's preface to the Small Catechism clearly stated that it was intended for the lower clergy as an instrument to instruct the uneducated laity. It was in the tradition of medieval catechesis, but Luther introduced three notable innovations: First he reordered the sequence, treating the Ten Commandments before explaining the Creed. Second, instead of dividing the Creed into twelve or fourteen articles, he focused on three: the salvific work of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. And third, influenced by the BOHEMIAN BRETHREN, he introduced the question-answer method that became a staple in Protestant and Catholic catechisms alike. Luther's Large Catechism is distinguished chiefly by its insight into the daily life of the peasant, its concern with the existential character of the GOSPEL, and its reliance on God's action rather than man's as ultimately effective in the work of salvation.

St. Peter Canisius. CANISIUS, the APOSTLE of Catholic Germany in the Reformation period, produced three handbooks of Catholic faith: Maior catechismus (1555), Minimus catechismus bound in with a Latin grammar, as Colet's had been (1556), and Parvus or Minor catechismus (1558). All three were done in Latin first, then in German (S. Petri Canisii Catechismi Latini et Germanici 1933–1936). The intermediate one, titled Capita doctrinae christianae compendio tradita, ut sit ueluti paruus catechismus catholicorum, became normative in many countries. It was composed of 124 questions and two appendices, one of Scripture texts against heretics and the other a quotation from Augustine on steadfastness in faith. There were five parts: three on the theological virtues and the matching prayers (or law), a fourth on the Sacraments, and a fifth on "duties of Christian holiness" (the smallest catechism featured sins and the opposing goods in this fifth place). The first four doctrinal sections taught sapientia (wisdom), the last, justitia (justice). Canisius claimed authorship of the books only in 1566, although publishers had attributed it to him as early as 1559. In 1569 a fellow Hollander named Peter de Buys, or BUSAEUS, produced with Canisius's help a work that supplied more than 4,000 references to Scripture and the Fathers for the Catechismus maior (4 vols., 1569–1570); this work is generally known as Opus catechisticum, a title given it in its revision by Johannes Hase (Hasius) in 1557.

St. Robert Bellarmine. BELLARMINE produced his Dottrina cristiana breve in 1597 [Opera omnia (Paris 1874), 12:261–282], a brief handbook derived from his instruction of Jesuit brother cooperators in ROME. It began with the sign of the cross, then went on to the Creed, Our Father, Hail Mary, Ten Commandments, precepts of the Church, counsels, Sacraments, virtues, gifts, works of mercy, gifts of the Spirit, four last things, and mysteries of the ROSARY.

A year later in 1598, motivated by the demands of office in his brief archbishopric of Capua, Bellarmine produced what might be called a teacher's manual of doctrine, Dichiarazione più; copiosa della dottrina cristiana breve (Opera omnia 1874, 12:283–332). The student is the questioner here, and the teacher, the respondent at length. Bellarmine follows Augustine's three virtues as the way to know what things are credenda (believing), speranda (hoping), and amanda (loving). The Sacraments that follow the threefold listings of obligations above are those means "by which the grace of God is acquired." All the matters that come after "the four principal parts of doctrine," from the theological and moral virtues onward, "help greatly in living in conformity with the will of God."

Other Efforts. The JESUITS Edmond AUGER, writing in France (1530–1591), and Jerónimo Martinez de RIPALDA, in Spain (1536–1618), produced handbooks similar to those above.

The Tridentine Catechism. The Council of TRENT adjourned in 1563, and the catechism its Fathers asked for was ready in Latin (having been composed in Italian) by 1566. A trio of DOMINICANS led by FOREIRO wrote it; a secular priest humanist named Poggianus polished its phrasing. The CATECHISM OF THE COUNCIL OF TRENT, a manual for parish priests, running to more than 400 pages, is popularly known as Catechismus romanus, though the full title in its first edition (Rome 1566) was Catechismus ex decreto concilii tridentini, ad parochos, pii v et clementis xiii. pontificis maximi iussu editus. Its fourfold divisions are (1) faith and the Creed, (2) the Sacraments, (3) the Decalogue and the laws of God, (4) prayer and its necessity, chiefly the Lord's Prayer. The restoration of the Sacraments to an integral place in the plan of REDEMPTION rather than as aids to observing the precepts is important; so is the book's heavy reliance on Scripture and the Fathers in place of the metaphysically tinged vocabulary of the scholastics. The general tenor of doctrinal exposition is Augustinian.

Attempts in a humanist vein, such as that of Trent, had been made by Cardinal Stanislaus HOSIUS, Confessio catholicae fidei christianae vel potius explicatio quaedam confessionis (Vienna 1561), and by Bp. Friedrich NAUSEA, In catechismus catholicus libris sex (Cologne 1543); but all three were fated to lose out in popular exposition to the medieval lists or "truths." Canisius genuinely admired Trent's catechism, but his neater summaries and classifications prevailed. Bellarmine said it was his model, but it is doubtful that he understood the attempt it represented. In fact, the little use (more accurately, the highly selective use) made of it by catechism authors since 1566 is perhaps its most notable feature. There is reason to think this handbook was quite influential in the pulpit over the years, but again, in proportion to the capacities of the priests who used it. It is quite unmarked by a polemical tone once it has mentioned "pernicious errors" in the introduction. The same introduction gives high promise of a thoroughgoing evangelical or KERYGMATIC THEOLOGY that is never realized. The times were simply incapable of it, as a genuine evangelical release overtook the Church in tandem with the zeal of the Protestants (linked in the Catholic mind with heretical positions).

After Trent. Post-Tridentine catechisms were in the mold of those by Bellarmine, Canisius, Auger, and Ripalda in the four chief language groups or in translations from one of the first two.

British, Irish, and American. Laurence Vaux (1519–1585) translated and adapted Canisius in 1567 as A Catechisme of Christian Doctrine Necessarie for Children and Ignorante People, deriving additional help from Pedro de SOTO's Methodus confessionis seu verius doctrinae pietatisque christianae praecipuorum capitum epitome (1576). What came to be known as the Doway, or DOUAI (DOUAY), Catechism was produced by Henry Turberville (1607–1678), a professor at the English College there, sometime before 1649, the date of a third edition of An Abridgment of the Christian Doctrine: With Proofs of Scripture for Points Controverted. The order is Bellarmine's, but the treatment is Turberville's own. Its tenor is Bible-quoting, polemical, allegorical, and adult. Other British efforts were those of Richard CHALLONER of London (The Catholic Christian Instructed in the Sacraments, Sacrifice, Ceremonies, and Observances of the Church by Way of Question and Answer, 1737) and George HAY of Edinburgh (The Sincere Christian Instructed in the Faith of Christ from the Written Word, 1781; The Devout Christian Instructed in the Faith of Christ, 1783). John LINGARD wrote Catechistical Instruction on the Doctrines and Worship of the Catholic Church in 1836. All the above-mentioned were published in the United States until well into the nineteenth century. Abp. John CARROLL abridged Hay's larger works (1772) in a form that contributed verbally to the BALTIMORE CATECHISM. Meanwhile, in Ireland Abp. James Butler (d. 1791) of Cashel produced a catechism (1775) that was revised by order of a Synod of Maynooth (1875) and in that form (1882) recommended itself to substantial borrowings in the United States. Archbishop John McHale (1791–1881) oversaw a bilingual Christian Doctrine (1865) for his Irish-speaking diocese of Tuam. Among those in the United States who produced catechisms in the nineteenth century, all of them European-derived, were John Henry MCCAFFREY (Baltimore before 1865) and John Pierre Augustin VEROT (Augusta 1864). The English-language efforts described above were all lineal descendants in the tradition of the "four principal parts of doctrine." When they halted to make a brief explanation, it was generally in the spirit of a work such as Rufinus of Aquileia's Commentarius in symbolum or a similar Augustine-derived source.

French. Attempts were made in France in the ENLIGHTENMENT period to follow through on Augustine's two Biblical catecheses in De catechizandis rudibus. They included Claude FLEURY's Catéchisme Historique (Paris 1683), which is prefaced by a claim of the superiority of the Bible's method of storytelling and a fairly mild disquisition, or treatise, against the usefulness of theology's method in catechetics. Methodologically Fleury presented material in expository lesson form with prayers from the LITURGY interspersed and questions added at the end.

François POUGET, an Oratorian, produced a similar Bible-oriented catechism, Instructions Générales en Forme de Catéchisme Où l'On Explique en Abrégé, par l'Écriture Sainte et par la Tradition, l'Histoire et les Dogmes de la Religion, la Morale Chrétienne, les Sacramens, les Prières, les Cérémonies et les Usages de l'Eglise in 1702. Fleury subsequently went on the Index as a Gallican; Pouget, too, because his patron Bp. Colbert of Montpellier was a Jansenist. Both catechisms were unexceptionable. Jacques-Bénigne BOSSUET, bishop of Meaux, produced the Biblical Le Second Catéchisme before his formal doctrinal one (Oeuvres Complètes 1687, 10).

Italian. Italy broke away from the Bellarmine mold with the Compendio della dottrina cristiana by Bp. Casati of Mondov'i (1765). It was in the spirit of the catechisms of Montpellier and Meaux and was probably the work of Canon G.M. Giaccone.

German. Similar forerunners of modern Biblical catechisms appeared in Germany in the nineteenth century, beginning with the Biblische Geschichte des Alten und Neuen Testaments by Bernard von OVERBERG (1799). Johann Ignaz von FELBIGER (1785), Christoph von SCHMID (1801), Ignatius Schuster (1845), Gustav MEY (1871), and Friedrich Justus Knecht (1880) all produced Bible histories in which virtuous conduct was excerpted from the Scriptures to illustrate and augment the catechism lesson. Overberg had the larger vision, seeing the Bible as the history of God's gracious concern for human salvation. He was the reformer of the schools of Westphalia and a friend of GOETHE, and he rightly deserves to be named with educators such as Johann H. PESTALOZZI and Johann Friedrich Herbart (1776–1841).

B. Galura, the Bishop of Brixen, studied at the University of Vienna for a year before his ordination—uncommon enough—and tried to come to terms with the spirit of the Aufklärung (Enlightenment) in his Grundsätze der Sokratischer Katechisiermethode (1793). In a six-volume reform of the plan of theology, Neueste Theologie de Christentums (1800–1804), he identified the KINGDOM OF GOD or the kingdom of heaven as the Grundidee (foundational idea) of the Bible. In his Biblische Geschichte der Welterlösung durch Jesum der Sohn Gottes (1806) Galura (1764–1856) tried to carry on the catechitical spirit of Overberg.

Other important figures were Augustin Gruber, archbishop of Salzburg (1823–1835), who gave lectures to his priests on the Augustinian technique of the sacred narratio (narration) and the necessity of inductive explanation before any memorization is required (Katechetische Vorlesungen, 1830–1834); Johann Baptist HIRSCHER, who tried to bridge the gap between sacred history and doctrinal formation in his theoretical essay Katechetik (Tübingen 1831) and in his larger and smaller Catholic catechisms (Freiburg 1842, 1845); and another professor of the new discipline of pastoral theology, Johann Michael SAILER, whose lectures on that subject (Munich 1788) demanded instruction based on the Bible for concreteness and immediacy, to "form man in the divine life rather than instruct him intellectually." In German-speaking lands the demands of child nature were being heard for perhaps the first time. France had known something similar through the efforts of the clergy at the parish of Saint-Sulpice, Paris, and of Bp. DUPANLOUP of Orléans (cf. Colomb 1958); but the pedagogic efforts of the Germans, Austrians, and Swiss were much more realistic in their developmentalist theories on the nature of the child.

A number of nineteenth-century catechisms departed from subject matter orientation and centered on the individual's natural concern for himself with questions such as "Why did God make you?" The only clear result was an anthropocentricism. Very shortly the authors returned to a summary of doctrine in theological form with a largely apologetic concern. The great figure in Germany who updated Canisius, but without his Biblical or patristic unction, was Josef DEHARBE, S.J., whose catechism, or Lehrbegriff (1847), based on the theological manual of Giovanni PERRONE, had a vigorous history (in German-speaking America, among other places). His work was subsequently revised by Josef Linden, S.J. (1900) and Theodor Mönnichs, S.J. (1925), the latter the so-called German Einheitskatechismus.

Toward a Universal Catechism. With every passing year the number of catechisms grew so that in 1742 Pope BENEDICT XIV recommended that Bellarmine's catechism become standard throughout the Catholic world. In 1761 Pope CLEMENT XIII protested against the RATIONALISM of the Enlightenment. He urged a uniform catechetical method that would employ the same words and expressions. In the 1770s Empress Maria Teresa (1717–1780) directed Johann Ignaz von Felbiger to edit a series of catechisms for use in the schools throughout Austria and Bohemia. Emperor NAPOLEON I commissioned and ordered an imperial catechism, to be used "in all the churches of the French empire." There was much support for a uniform catechism at the First Vatican Council. After much debate, and some compromise, the Council Fathers approved the Schema constitutionis de parvo catechismo (1870). It directed that a short catechism be drawn up, "modelled after the Small Catechism of the Ven. Cardinal Bellarmine." The stated intention was to "facilitate the disappearance in the future of the confusing variety of other short catechisms." Because of the hasty adjournment of the council, the decree was not promulgated and the project was never completed. There were brief, abortive efforts in the same direction by Pope PIUS X in favor of his own Compendio della dottrina cristiana (1905) and likewise by Cardinal GASPARRI with his three-level Catechismus catholicus, which Pope PIUS XI praised faintly.

National Catechisms. In the United States the bishops made repeated attempts to reach agreement on a uniform catechism for the whole country. In the wake of Vatican I, they achieved their goal. The Catechism of the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore (1885) was the fruit of the labors of Januarius de CONCILIO, priest of Newark, New Jersey, and John Lancaster SPALDING, bishop of Peoria, Illinois. It had 421 questions in thirty-seven chapters and more than seventy-two pages. There are no parts: The order is Creed, Sacraments (gifts, fruits, and beatitudes after CONFIRMATION), prayer, Commandments, and last things. A revision of 1941 by the bishops' committee of the CONFRATERNITY OF CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE (CCD), with which the name of Francis J. CONNELL, CSSR, is most closely associated, returned to the order Creed, Commandments, Sacraments, prayer. Both are theological summaries, the latter testifying to little of the theological progress of the intervening fifty-five years. Neither professes any pedagogical concern.

In a similar vein, France produced a national catechism in 1938 that was much criticized for its length and technical vocabulary. A national commission for its revision was set up in 1941, and in 1947 Canons Camille Quinet (1879–1961) and André Boyer authored a much-improved catechism in the form of a pupil text. It is composed of lessons and has a general Biblical-liturgical orientation, though "doctrines of faith" provide the leitmotif, or main theme. Belgium received a revised national catechism unmarked by distinctive features in 1947. The German national Katholischer Katechismus der Bistümer Deutschlands appeared in 1955 after having been begun in 1938 and interrupted by World War II. It is intended for children of the upper elementary years and is in four parts, following the schema of the Creed in twelve articles. Almost half the lessons fall under the heading "The Forgiveness of Sins," including TEMPTATION, SIN, the Sacraments, and GRACE. A multivolume teacher's manual, still incomplete, accompanies it. The initial claims in its favor that it fulfilled all the hopes of the kerygmatic renewal have been tempered somewhat by closer examination, but it is unquestionably a significant achievement. It was translated into twenty-two languages within five years of its appearance. Although the catechism is anonymous, the men most closely connected with its production included G. Fischer, H. Fischer, F. Schreibmayr, and K. Tilmann. Austria produced a national catechism conceived along similar lines in 1960, guided by Vienna's director of religious education, L. Lentner. In the late twentieth century, England's bishops began preparing one.

In 1963 and 1964 the Australian bishops published a Catholic Catechism for the upper four elementary grades in two volumes with matching teacher's manuals (Sydney). J. Kelly of the Archdiocese of Melbourne was its chief architect. The trend begun in the German catechism reached a relative perfection in the two pupil's books of the Australian product, so much so that national hierarchies faced the question of the MERIT of expressing the Church's faith in a single, fixed form for school children in these sensitive years. Modern universal literacy is a major consideration. The official catechism rose in a period of near illiteracy, and committing it to memory was largely predicated on that fact. Ecclesiologically, the position that the fixed formularies of the catechism were a faithful reflection of the fontes revelationis (sources of revelation), to be coupled, after the Scriptures, with liturgies, creeds, and councils, prevailed for fifteen centuries.

In Holland plans for a new catechism were laid in the 1950s, but under the influence of the Second Vatican Council, the focus changed. De Nieuwe Katechismus, published by the Dutch hierarchy late in 1966, was designed for adults. A maelstrom of controversy swirled about The Dutch Catechism because its critics, friendly and unfriendly, saw it as reshaping the catechism genre and redefining the task of catechesis. Aimed at adults, it sought to bring the Christian message into dialogue with issues of the contemporary world. When a second edition was published (1968), it had a supplement that addressed the points that Church authorities had found ambiguous in the original edition.

Despite the controversy that surrounded it, the Dutch Catechism became a model for other national catechisms directed toward adults. In 1985 the German Episcopal Conference published a Katholischer Erwachsenen-Katechismus (The Church's Confession of Faith: A Catholic Catechism for Adults). In 1986 the bishops of Spain published Esta Es Nuestra Fe. Esta Es la Fe de la Iglesia (This Is Our Faith. This Is the Faith of the Church), a work intended for both young people and adults, especially people responsible for catechesis. The following year the Belgian hierarchy issued Livre de la Foi (Belief and Belonging), a catechism for adults that the bishops intended as an instrument to aid in the re-evangelization of the country. In 1991 the bishops of France published Catéchisme pour Adultes, five years in the making. The Catholic Bishops Conference of the Philippines approved a Catechism for Filipino Catholics that is described as an "adult catechism" in so far as "it provides a sourcebook for those who address the typical Sunday Mass congregation of an ordinary Filipino parish" (par. 16).

In the years following the Second Vatican Council many Church leaders, citing the precedent of the Roman Catechism published after the Council of Trent, called for a new conciliar catechism. In response to a formal proposal made at the Extraordinary SYNOD OF BISHOPS assembled to commemorate the twentieth anniversary of Vatican II, Pope JOHN PAUL II appointed a commission of twelve cardinals to oversee the compilation of a new catechism. When John Paul introduced the new CATECHISM OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH with the APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTION Fidei depositum in 1992, he acknowledged that the arrangement of the Four Pillars (Creed, Sacred Liturgy, Christian Way of Life, and Prayer) followed the traditional order found in the Tridentine Catechism. The purpose of the new Catechism was manifold: John Paul wrote that it would "serve as a sure norm for teaching the faith" and provide "the Church's Pastors and the Christian faithful" with "a sure and authentic reference text for teaching Catholic doctrine and particularly for preparing local catechisms." It is a means whereby the faithful can deepen their knowledge of "the unfathomable riches of salvation," an instrument "to support ecumenical efforts" by presenting "the content and wondrous harmony of the Catholic faith," and a reference work for everyone "who wants to know what the Catholic church believes."

The publication of the Catechism of the Catholic Church shifted emphasis from uniformity to unity. It signaled the abandonment of the quest for a single catechetical text that would be standard throughout the Catholic world. Toward the conclusion of the apostolic constitution Fidei depositum, Pope John Paul reiterates that the Catechism "is meant to encourage and assist in the writing of new local catechisms, which take into account various situations and cultures, while carefully preserving the unity of faith and fidelity to Catholic doctrine." Thus, as the number of Catechisms continue to grow, each is marked by variety in style and presentation while at the same time witnesses to the unity of faith transmitted by the Scriptures and proclaimed in the Church's liturgy.

From Vatican II On. The Catechism of the Catholic Church was first promulgated in French in 1992, and numerous vernacular translations were made based on the original French text. An English translation of the French appeared in 1994. Meanwhile, work began on the preparation of the Latin edito typica (typical edition), approved by John Paul II in his apostolic letter, Laetamur magnopere, of August 15, 1997. This Latin edition, thus, became the definitive text of the Catechism of the Catholic Church, and all vernacular translations required some revisions based on this text.

The 1997 edition of the Catechism made a number of changes based on suggestions offered to the special Commission of Cardinals and Bishops chaired by Cardinal Joseph RATZINGER. Among the most noteworthy modifications were: stronger language with regard to the death penalty (Catechism of the Catholic Church, editio typica, no. 2267); the description of the homosexual inclination as "objectively disordered" (Catechism of the Catholic Church, editio typica, no. 2358); and a tighter definition of lying (Catechism of the Catholic Church, editio typica, nos. 2483 and 2508).

At the International Catechetical Congress held in October 2002, many participants expressed a wish for a Compendium of the Catechism of the Catholic Church, which would follow a question-and-answer approach. In response to this request, Pope John Paul II asked the Commission of Cardinals for the Catechism to draft such a compendium with the help of various experts in the field of catechesis. When the draft was completed, it was sent to all the cardinals and the presidents of the Conferences of Bishops for review. On June 28, 2005, Pope BENEDICT XVI issued a motu proprio approving the publication of the Compendium of the Catechism of the Catholic Church, which soon was published in numerous vernacular languages.

The Compendium was based on the content of the larger Catechism, but the question-and-answer approach made it more accessible to certain audiences. Moreover, the Compendium contained some beautiful artwork and appendices of common Catholic prayers and formulas of Catholic doctrine (e.g., the cardinal and theological virtues).

In his apostolic constitution, Fidei depositum, approving the Catechism of the Catholic Church in 1992, John Paul II made it clear that this catechism was "meant to encourage and assist in the writing of new local catechisms." In light of this, in 2006 the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops published the United States Catholic Catechism for Adults, which had received approval or recognition from the Congregation for the Clergy on November 22, 2005.

The United States Catholic Catechism for Adults follows the same four-part structure of the Catechism of the Catholic Church: The Creed, the Sacraments, Christian Morality, and Prayer. A glossary, a collection of traditional Catholic prayers, and suggestions for further reading appear as appendices. A question-and-answer approach is not followed. Rather, there are brief summaries in each section with shaded boxes containing key passages from the Catechism of the Catholic Church. There are also shaded boxes providing brief summaries or lists of specific points (e.g., the gifts and fruits of the Holy Spirit). In addition, there are short entries of doctrinal statements and questions for discussion. Various prayers are supplied throughout, and portraits of important figures from Catholic history (especially from the United States, e.g., Blessed Kateri TEKAWITHA, St. Katharine DREXEL, and St. John NEUMANN) are offered as examples of holiness and heroic VIRTUE.

SEE ALSO ABRAHAM, PATRIARCH; ALMS AND ALMSGIVING (IN THE CHURCH); AUSTRIA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; BAPTISM, SACRAMENT OF; BOHEMIA, CHURCH IN; CARDINAL VIRTUES; CAROLINGIANS; CATECHESI TRADENDAE; CATECHESIS, GENERAL DIRECTORY FOR; CATECHESIS, I (EARLY CHRISTIAN); CATECHESIS, II (MEDIEVAL); CATECHESIS, III (REFORMATION); CATECHETICAL DIRECTORIES, NATIONAL; CATECHISM, IMPERIAL; CATECHISMS IN COLONIAL SPANISH AMERICA; CATECHUMENATE; COMMANDMENTS, TEN; CONCILIARISM (THEOLOGICAL ASPECT); DOCTRINE OF THE FAITH, CONGREGATION FOR THE; DOCTRINE, DEVELOPMENT OF; EXISTENTIAL THEOLOGY; FIDEI DEPOSITUM; GALLICANISM; GREEK LANGUAGE, BIBLICAL; HERESY; HOLY SPIRIT, FRUITS OF; HOLY SPIRIT, GIFTS OF; HOMILY; HUMANISM; INDEX OF PROHIBITED BOOKS; ISAIAH, BOOK OF; JANSENISM; LAITY, FORMATION AND EDUCATION OF; LORD'S DAY, THE; MARIA THERESA OF AUSTRIA; MATTHEW, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO; MYSTAGOGY; MYSTERY (IN THEOLOGY); OBLIGATION, MORAL; ORATORIANS; REFORMATION, PROTESTANT (ON THE CONTINENT); SACRAMENTS, ARTICLES ON; SCHOLASTIC PHILOSOPHY; VATICAN COUNCIL I; VATICAN COUNCIL II; VICE; VIRTUE, HEROIC.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

CATECHISMS

St. Augustine, Enchiridion: Handbook on Faith, Hope, and Charity, translated by Albert C. Outler, available from http://www.ccel.org/ccel/augustine/enchiridion.html (accessed April 28, 2008).

St. Augustine, Selected Easter Sermons of St. Augustine, edited by Philip T. Weller (St. Louis, Mo. 1959).

Paul Bahlmann, Deutschlands Katholische Katechismen bis zum Ende des 16 Jahrhunderts (Münster, Germany 1894).

Bishops of Belgium, Belief and Belonging [Livre de la Foi] (Collegeville, Minn. 1991).

Jacques-Bénigne Bossuet, Oeuvres complètes (Bar-le-Duc, France 1687).

S. Petri Canisii, Catechismi Latini et Germanici, edited by Fridericus Streicher, Munich, Germany 1933–1936).

St. Peter Canisius, Maior Catechismus (Vienna, Austria 1555).

St. Peter Canisius, Minimus Catechismus (Ingolstadt, Germany 1556).

St. Peter Canisius, Minor Catechismus (Cologne 1558).

Catechism for Filipino Catholics (Manila, Philippines 1991).

Catechism of the Catholic Church, available from http://www.vatican.va/archive/ENG0015/_INDEX.HTM (accessed April 28, 2008).

Catechism of the Council of Trent, available from http://www.catholicapologetics.info/thechurch/catechism/trentc.htm (accessed April 28, 2008).

The Church's Confession of Faith: A Catholic Catechism for Adults, translated by Stephen Wentworth Arndt, edited by Mark Jordan (San Francisco 1987).

Pedro de Soto, Methodus confessionis seu verius doctrinae pietatisque christianae praecipuorum capitum epitome (Dillingen, Germany 1576).

De Nieuwe Katechismus [A New Catechism: Catholic Faith for Adults], translated by Kevin Smyth (New York 1967).

Claude Fleury, Catéchisme Historique (Paris 1683).

Bernhard Galura, Neueste Theologie de Christentums (Augsburg, Germany 1800–1804).

Bernhard Galura, Biblische Geschichte der Welterlösung durch Jesum der Sohn Gottes (Augsburg, Germany 1806).

German Episcopal Conference, The Church's Confession of Faith: A Catholic Catechism for Adults [Katholischer Erwachsenen-Katechismus] (San Francisco 1987).

Jean Gerson, Opera Omnia, edited by Louis Ellies Du Pin (Antwerp, Belgium 1706).

Peter Göbl, Geschichte der Katechese im Abendlande vom Verfalle des Katechumenates bis zum Ende des Mittelalters (Kempten, Germany 1880).

Augustin Gruber, Katechetische Vorlesungen (Salzburg, Austria 1830).

Johannes Herolt, Liber discipuli de eruditione Christi fidelium (Strasbourg, France 1490).

Johann Baptist von Hirscher, Katechetik: Oder, Der Beruf des Seelsorgers die ihm Anvertraute Jugend im Christenthum zu Unterrichten und zu Erziehen: Nach Seinem Ganzen Umfange Dargestellt (Tübingen, Germany 1831).

Stanislaus Hosius, Confessio catholicae fidei christianae vel potius explicatio quaedam confessionis (Vienna, Austria 1561).

Josef A. Jungmann, Pastoral Liturgy (New York 1962).

Katholischer Katechismus der Bistümer Deutschlands (Freiburg, Germany 1955).

Dietrich Kolde, Christenspiegel, edited by Clemens Drees (Werl, Germany 1954).

Yves Lefèvre, L'Elucidarium et les Lucidaires (Paris 1954).

Martin Luther, Der Kleine Katechismus (Wittenberg, Germany 1529), available in English from http://www.iclnet.org/pub/resources/text/wittenberg/wittenberg-luther.html#sw-lc (accessed April 28, 2008).

Martin Luther, Deudsch Catechismus (Wittenberg, Germany 1529).

Martin Luther, Small Catechism (Wittenberg, Germany 1529), available from http://www.iclnet.org/pub/resources/text/wittenberg/wittenberg-luther.html#sw-sc (accessed April 28, 2008).

Giovanni Domenico Mansi, Sacrorum conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 31 vols. (Florence and Venice 1758–1798).

J.P. Migne, Patrologia latina (Paris 1844–1865), available from http://pld.chadwyck.co.uk/ (accessed April 29, 2008).

Friedrich Nausea, In catechismus catholicus libris sex (Cologne, Italy 1543).

Otfried, Incerti monachi weissenburgensis catechesis theotisca seculo IX, edited by J.G. Eckhard (Hanover, Germany 1713).

Bernard von Overberg, Biblische Geschichte des Alten und Neuen Testaments (Münster, Germany 1804).

François Pouget, Instructions Générales en Forme de Catéchisme Où l'On Explique en Abrégé, par l'Écriture Sainte et par la Tradition, l'Histoire et les Dogmes de la Religion, la Morale Chrétienne, les Sacramens, les Prières, les Cérémonies et les Usages de l'Eglise (Paris 1702).

Paul Rentschka, Die Dekalogkatechese des hl. Augustinus: Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des Dekalogs (Kempten, Germany 1905).

Third Plenary Council of Baltimore, Baltimore Catechism #3 (Baltimore 1891), available from http://www.baltimore-catechism.com/ (accessed April 28, 2008).

Thomas Aquinas, The Compendium Theologiae, Part I, Tract 2, translated by R.J. Dunn. (Toronto, 1934).

Laurence Vaux, A Catechisme of Christian Doctrine Necessarie for Children and Ignorante People (Louvain, France 1567, Manchester, England 1883).

United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, United States Catholic Catechism for Adults (Washington, D.C. 2006).

United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, Compendium of the Catechism of the Catholic Church (Washington, D.C. 2006), available from http://www.vatican.va/archive/compendium_ccc/documents/archive_2005_compendium-ccc_en.html (accessed April 28, 2008).

Sources

Benedict XVI, Motu proprio, For the Approval and Publication of the Compendium of the Catechism of the Catholic Church (June 28, 2005), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/benedict_xvi/motu_proprio/documents/hf_ben-xvi_motu-proprio_20050628_compendio-catechismo_en.html (accessed April 28, 2008).

Pietro Braido, Lineamenti di Storia della Catechesi e dei Catechismi (Rome 1989).

Raymond Brodeur, ed., Les Catéchismes au Québec, 1702–1963, with the collaboration of Brigitte Caulier, B. Plongeron, J.P. Rouleau, and N. Voisine (Sainte-Foy/Paris 1990).

J. Colomb, "The Catechetical Method of St. Sulpice" in Shaping the Christian Message, edited by G. Sloyan (New York 1958).

L. Csonka, "Storia della Catechesi," Educare III (Zurich 1964): 61–190.

Jean-Claude D'hôtel, Les Origines du Catéchisme Moderne (Paris 1967).

Johannes Hofinger, "The Right Ordering of Catechetical Material," Lumen Vitae 2 (1947): 718–746.

John Paul II, Fidei depositum, On the Publication of the Catechism of the Catholic Church (Apostolic Constitution, October 11, 1992), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/apost_constitutions/documents/hf_jp-ii_apc_19921011_fidei-depositum_en.html (accessed April 29, 2008).

John Paul II, Laetamur magnopere, "In Which the Latin Typical Edition of the Catechism of the Catholic Church Is Approved and Promulgated" (Apostolic Letter, August 15, 1997), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/apost_letters/documents/hf_jp-ii_apl_15081997_laetamur_en.html (accessed April 29, 2008).

Josef A. Jungmann, Die Frohbotschaft und Unsere Glaubensverkündigung (Regensburg, Germany 1936).

Josef A. Jungmann, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, edited by Josef Höfer and Karl Rahner (Freiburg, Germany 1957–1965), 6:27–54.

Josef A. Jungmann, Glaubensverkündigung im Lichte der Frohbotschaft (Innsbruck, Austria 1962).

E. Mangenot, Dictionnaire de Théologie Catholique, edited by A. Vacant et al. (Paris 1899–1950; 2.2:1895–1968).

Bernard L. Marthaler, The Catechism Yesterday and Today: The Evolution of a Genre (Collegeville, Minn. 1995).

Rudolf Padberg, Erasmus als Katechet (Freiburg, Germany 1956).

Gerard Stephen Sloyan, ed., Shaping the Christian Message: Essays in Religious Education (New York 1958).

Gerard Stephen Sloyan
Professor of Religious Education and Head of the Department, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.
Founding member, Societas Liturgica

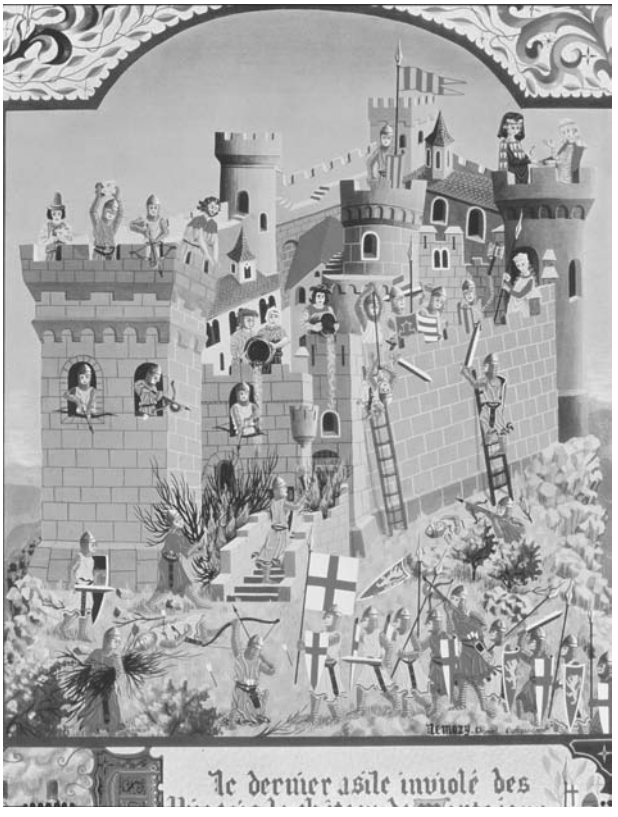
Robert L. Fastiggi
Professor of Systematic Theology
Sacred Heart Major Seminary, Detroit, Michigan (2010)

CATHARI

Cathari were members of a medieval sect adhering to a dualistic heresy of Oriental origin that became widespread in Western Christendom after 1150. The present study covers its origins, history, organizations, and disappearance.

Origins. Beginning with the eleventh century, religious life in western Europe had difficulty maintaining an equilibrium, despite the GREGORIAN REFORM movement and the new monastic trends. Some sought to satisfy their aspirations by a return to evangelical poverty and simplicity, from which it was easy to fall into heresy. This was the origin of many sporadic movements superficially labeled Manichaean by contemporaries, but of which little is actually known.



Bogomilism provided these indistinct currents with the doctrinal framework they lacked. Bogomilism itself traced its origin to those Paulician colonies settled in Thrace by the Emperor Nicephorus I (802–811), through which a dualistic and iconoclastic heresy, originally of Armenia, took root in the Balkans. It penetrated into Bulgaria and, during the reign of Czar Peter (927–969), inspired the preaching of the priest Bogomil, who taught contempt for the official Church, held the Sacraments to be useless, rejected the Old Testament, and retained but one prayer, the "Our Father." The world, which was the creation and domain of the devil, was evil. But the DUALISM of the BOGOMILS was not radical, inasmuch as the devil was a rebellious and fallen angel inferior to the principle of GOOD. This heresy is known principally through the Treatise of Cosmas the Priest, written in 972. In the early eleventh century, the Bogomils in CONSTANTINOPLE developed a more radical doctrine that admitted complete equality between the principle of Good, that is, the creator of the invisible world, and the principle of EVIL, the creator of the material world. This doctrine was characteristic of the Church of Dragovitsa.

History in Europe. This Eastern heresy was not found in the West until the middle of the twelfth century, when its adherents were called Cathari from καθαροί, a traditional name for Manichaeans. Transferred from the Balkan Peninsula principally by knights returning from the second Crusade, the heresy spread rapidly in northern France, through the Rhine countries where Cathari were mentioned in 1163, to southern France (the Boni homines of Lombers in 1165). They also spread into Italy around 1176, especially to Milan where many heretics resided. However, there could not have been a Catharist bishop in Italy before 1170.

At first all Cathari in Italy were subject to Bishop Mark, who professed the moderate dualism of the Catharist church of Bulgaria. The arrival of Nicetas, Catharist bishop of Constantinople and an absolute dualist, in Italy soon after 1174, led Mark to transfer to the order of Dragovitsa, which Nicetas represented. Under Mark's successor, John the Jew, the Cathari divided into separate groups. The first was composed of the partisans of absolute dualism, called Albanenses, who organized themselves in the church of Desenzano, south of Lake Garda. They were particularly numerous in Verona. Those who remained faithful to the moderate Bulgarian dualism, the Garatenses, constituted the church of Concorezzo, near Milan. Moderate dualists also came together around the church of Bagnolo, near Mantua, adhering to the order of Esclavonia. Like these, the Catharist churches of Vicenza, FLORENCE, and Spoleto rejected absolute dualism.

In northern France, Catharism was practically limited to Charité-sur-Loire, but heresy made extraordinary strides in the south. Through contact with the Albanenses, absolute dualism was quickly accepted. Soon all heretics in the Midi, both Cathari and WALDENSES, came to be known as ALBIGENSES. By the end of the twelfth century, there were four Albigensian bishops, with sees at Carcassonne, Toulouse, ALBI, and Agen. Around 1225 a church of Razès in the Limoux region was added. With the approval of Pope INNOCENT III, Simon of Montfort launched a crusade (1209–1229) against the Albigensians. The capture of Montségur in 1244, followed by the massacre of its defenders, precipitated the rapid decline of Catharism within France.

Organization. No real unity of doctrine existed among the Cathari, except their agreement on the principle that the visible world was evil. They rejected the Sacraments of the Church, particularly the BAPTISM of water and MATRIMONY. Although absolute dualists recognized a portion of the Old Testament, the great majority of Cathari accepted only the New Testament, which they read in its Catholic version.

Capture of Montségur Castle, France. Part of the Albigensian crusade of the thirteenth century, twohundred Cathars were burned alive at the site. THE ART ARCHIVE/BIBLIOTHÈQUE DE CARCASSONNE/DAGLI ORTI/THE PICTURE DESK, INC.

Absolute dualists held that Good and Evil constituted two distinct spheres: one the kingdom of the good god who was spiritual and suprasensible; the other, the kingdom of the evil god, creator of the material world. For the moderate dualists, or monarchists, the supreme god had created the invisible heaven, the heavenly spirits who inhabited it, and the four elements, whereas the devil was merely the organizer of the sensible world. The Cathari explained the creation of man by myths: the evil god, or SATAN, had imprisoned spirits in material bodies. The only salutary way to escape this evil world was by the reception of the consolamentum, the Cathari's unique sacrament administered by the imposition of hands. CHRIST had come to reveal to men the means of salvation, but not to assume full humanity or to atone for sin by his death on the cross. His earthly life had been merely an appearance.

The Cathar church considered as its members only the Perfect, who had received the consolamentum. They were subject to strict poverty and a rigorous ASCETICISM, their diet being completely vegetarian, except for fish. They observed three Lents each year. The Perfect, who for the most part were poor peasants or artisans, were accorded great veneration. In the hierarchy of the Perfect, deacons were above the ordinary Perfect, and at the head was the bishop who was assisted by a major son and a minor son. The major son succeeded the bishop.

The ordinary Cathari, the Believers, lived according to their beliefs, without fixed rules of morality. It was sufficient for them to believe that the consolamentum assured their salvation. During the ceremony of the melioramentum, the Believers worshipped the Perfect and listened to their preaching; their chief concern was the reception of the consolamentum when in danger of death. Catharism was well received by the lesser nobility, who were poor and in turbulence; by peasants and artisans; and above all by the burghers of the cities who profited from USURY that the Cathari had legalized.

Catharism has long been known only by the refutations found in the works of Catholic authors, for example, ALAN OF LILLE's Summa, prior to 1200; the compilations attributed to Bonacursus and Prepositinus of Cremona; and the Summa of Rainier of Sacconi in 1250. The Liber de duobus principiis, written by an Italian dualist around 1230 [ed. Antoine Dondaine, Un traité néomanichéen du XIIIe siècle (Rome 1939)], is now available as well as the anonymous Catharist treatise edited by Christine Thouzellier, Un traité cathère inédit... (Louvain 1961).

In refutation of some of the central tenets of Catharism, the profession of faith in the decrees of Lateran IV explicitly affirmed creation of both the invisible and the visible world by one GOD, subordination of the DEVIL to God, the humanity as well as the divinity of Christ, the unity of the Church, and the necessity of the material sacraments of the Catholic Church. Referring to "Moses and the holy prophets" as witnesses to the doctrine of the Trinity, the canon upheld against Catharistic rejection of the Old Testament the validity of Catholic use and interpretation of both the Old Testament and the New. By specifying that all believers receive communion annually, and that their requisite annual confession be made to their own parish priest, canon 21 directed itself against both the Cathari's rejection of the material sacraments and the claims of their clergy. Moreover, the sanctions invoked in canon 3 against heretics in general served to legitimate the harshness of the Albigensian crusade and other subsequent action against the heresy.

Disappearance of the Cathari. By 1250 the church of the Cathari in France was fragmented, and before 1260 the Cathar bishops of Toulouse sought refuge in Italy. There, the entire hierarchy disappeared before the end of the thirteenth century. In the Midi the last strongholds of the heresy, which were in the upper valley of Ariège and in the Carcassonne region, disappeared before 1330; in Italy Catharism died out quietly toward the end of the fourteenth century. In addition to the inherent weakness of the Catharist principle of passivity, the most vital factor in its disappearance was the example of the MENDICANT orders. The DOMINICANS and FRANCISCANS presented an effective alternative to Catharism, and this rather than the INQUISITION was probably most responsible for the disappearance of the sect.

SEE ALSO ARNOLD OF BRESCIA; CHARITÉ-SUR-LOIRE, ABBEY OF; CISTERCIANS; CLUNIAC REFORM; CRUSADES; HENRY OF LAUSANNE; HERESY, HISTORY OF; NICEPHORUS I, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE, ST.; PETER OF BRUYS; POVERTY MOVEMENT; TRINITY, HOLY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Malcolm Barber, *The Cathars: Dualist Heretics in the Languedoc in the High Middle Ages (*Harlow, U.K. 2000).

Arno Borst, Die Katharer (Stuttgart, Germany 1953).

Ilarino da Milano, "Il Liber supra stella' del piacentino Salvo Burci contro i Catari e altre correnti ereticali," Aevum, 16 (1942): 272–319; 17 (1943): 90–146; 19 (1945): 281–341.

Antoine Dondaine, "La hiérarchie cathare en Italie," Archivum Fratrum Praedicatorum, 19 (1949): 280–312; 20 (1950): 234–324.

Jean Duvernoy, Le Catharisme (Toulouse, France 1976).

Jean Duvernoy, II l'histoire des Cathares (Toulouse, France 1976).

Jean Duvernoy, La religion des Cathares (Toulouse, France 1976).

Joseph N. Garvin and James A. Corbet, eds., The Summa contra haereticos: Ascribed to Praepositinus of Cremona (Notre Dame, Ind. 1958).

Jean Guiraud, Histoire de l'inquisition au moyen âge, 2 vols. (Paris 1935–1938), 1.

Edmond G.A. Holmes, The Albigensian or Catharist Heresy: A Story and a Study (London 1925).

Thomas Kaeppeli, "Une somme contre les héretiques de S. Pierre Martyr (?)," Archivum Fratrum Praedicatorum 17 (1947): 295–335.

Emmanuel Le Roy Ladurie, Montaillou, village occitan de 1294 a' 1324 (Paris 1975).

Malcolm D. Lambert, The Cathars (Oxford, U.K. 1998).

Cosmas le Pretre, Le traité contre les Bogomiles, edited and translated by Henri-Charles Puech and André Vaillant (Paris 1945).

Dimitri Obolensky, The Bogomils: A Study in Balkan Neo-Manichaeism (Cambridge, U.K. 1948).

Steven Runciman, The Medieval Manichee, A Study of the Christian Dualist Heresy (Cambridge, U.K. 1947; repr. 1955).

Charles G.A. Schmidt, Histoire et doctrine de la secte des Cathares ou Albigeois, 2 vols. (Paris 1849).

Claire Taylor, Heresy in Medieval France: Dualism in Aquitaine and the Agenais, 1000–1249 (New York 2005).

Twelfth Ecumenical Council: Lateran IV 1215, "The Canons of the Fourth Lateran Council, 1215," Internet Medieval Sourcebook, edited by Paul Halsall, available from http://www.fordham.edu/halsall/basis/lateran4.html (accessed October 27, 2009).

Walter L. Wakefield and Austin P. Evans, eds. and trans., Heresies of the High Middle Ages (New York 1991).

Yves Dossat
Docteur ès letters
Chargé de Recherche au Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique, Paris, France

Wanda Zemler-Cizewski
Associate Professor, Theology Department
Marquette University, Milwaukee, Wis. (2010)

CATHOLIC ANSWERS

This prominent lay apostolate first arose in an effort to provide a Catholic response to those questioning or attacking Catholic beliefs and practices. The origins of this apostolate lie in the personal experience of a San Diego, California, attorney named Karl Keating, who was spurred to action by fundamentalist Protestant attacks on the Catholic Church. On its Web site, Catholic Answers (CA) provides an account of its transformation into a full-time lay ministry: "In 1988 growing demand and his own burgeoning desire to commit himself to serving the faith led Keating to close his law practice and turn Catholic Answers into a full-time apostolate, with its first office and staff members."

In addition to Karl Keating, many well-known Catholic speakers are also involved in the efforts of CA, including Jimmy Akin, Marcellino D'Ambrosio, Ray Guarendi, Rosalind Moss, Mark Shea, and Tim Staples, among others. CA is listed by the Catholic Diocese of San Diego as an approved Catholic group.

Nature of Its Activities. CA has a broad mission statement that goes beyond the stereotype of narrow apologetic exchanges with critics of the Church:

> Catholic Answers is an apostolate dedicated to serving Christ by bringing the fullness of Catholic truth to the world. We help good Catholics become better Catholics, bring former Catholics "home," and lead non-Catholics into the fullness of the faith. We explain Catholic truth, equip the faithful to live fully the sacramental life, and assist them in spreading the Good News.

This mission statement matches the call of Pope JOHN PAUL II for a New Evangelization that includes reevangelizing Catholics and evangelizing those outside the Church. CA does not limit its target audience in any way, unlike some who prefer, for example, not to approach others already active in non-Catholic religious communities.

Since its transformation in the 1980s into a full-time apostolate, CA has become a diversified ministry that uses many tools to reach people. These tools include:

1. This Rock magazine;
2. A Web site with discussion forums on many topics and a coveted Web address (Catholic.com);
3. An online bookstore selling many apologetic and evangelization resources in different media forms;
4. A radio broadcast seeking to respond to questions about the Catholic faith.

Its Ongoing Importance and Future. With the increasingly dramatic breakdown of any remaining Judeo-Christian consensus over values or lifestyles in the United States, assertive apostolates such as CA may very well be crucial in preventing the disappearance of a distinctive Catholic identity. The threats to this identity can be understood as a problem of cultural assimilation, as the descendants of previous waves of Catholic immigrants have prospered in the United States and have come to participate at every level in all of its cultural, educational, and economic institutions. While recent immigrants manage more easily to maintain a distinctive Catholic or Christian identity (though more than a few actually join other Christian communities), the affluent sons and daughters of earlier immigrants often find it difficult to resist the pressures of cultural assimilation into a secular society marked by moral RELATIVISM. This situation in some ways parallels the Jewish community's longstanding and historic concerns regarding assimilation.

Mere apologetic tit-for-tat will have little impact in such an aggressively secular society. The fundamentalists whose attacks first gave rise to CA are themselves suffering losses from the very same aggressive secularism and cynicism toward anything Christian or religious. Few "seculars" will care about or even understand intra-Christian issues or controversies that have often, unfortunately, pitted Catholics and Protestant evangelicals against one another for centuries. Thus, the broad mission statement of CA—which explicitly seeks to evangelize and empower Catholics to evangelize—is essential for the long-term relevance of its apostolate, beyond the controversies that gave rise to it in the 1970s. In the future, CA may find itself with an approach growing closer to that of C.S. LEWIS, arguably the most able Christian apologist of the twentieth century, who sought to defend the core of Christianity rather than focusing on intra-Christian controversies.

It is noteworthy that the list of speakers involved in CA seems to encompass a legitimate diversity of Catholics loyal to the Magisterium. Its mix of speakers includes at least one person sympathetic to the Catholic CHARISMATIC RENEWAL, while others have no apparent connection to the renewal. Former Protestants and a Catholic of Jewish background are also CA speakers. Such intra-Catholic diversity bodes well for the continued vigor of this important lay apostolate that does not shy away from defending official Catholic teachings.

SEE ALSO APOLOGETICS; APOSTOLATE AND SPIRITUAL LIFE; EVANGELIZATION, NEW; FUNDAMENTALISM; SECULARISM; TEACHING AUTHORITY OF THE CHURCH (MAGISTERIUM).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

"About Catholic Answers," Catholic Answers Web site, http://www.catholic.com/home/history.asp (accessed August 10, 2009).

"Catholic Organizations, Movements and Associations," Diocese of San Diego Web site, available from http://www.diocese-sdiego.org/set.asp?link=groups.htm&in=Institutions (accessed August 11, 2009).

Karl Keating, Catholicism and Fundamentalism: The Attack on "Romanism" by "Bible Christians" (San Francisco 1988).

Karl Keating, Controversies: High-Level Catholic Apologetics (San Francisco 2001).

Oswald Sobrino
Editor, Catholic Analysis
http://CatholicAnalysis.blogspot.com (2010)

CATHOLIC LEAGUE

The Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights is the largest Catholic organization of its kind in the United States. It was founded in 1973 by a Jesuit priest, Father Virgil Blum. At the time, Father Blum realized that, unlike racial and ethnic minorities in the United States, Catholics could still be treated as second-class citizens because of their religion, and he set out to do something about it. Discrimination against Catholics often took the form of exclusion from certain professions and academic institutions. But eventually this kind of discrimination was replaced by a form of prejudice that consists largely of ridiculing and mocking Catholic belief and practice. In the estimate of the Catholic League, this type of treatment has been especially visible in the arts and entertainment industries.

In 1993, William A. Donohue, Ph.D., became president of the Catholic League. On his watch, the Catholic League has become a media-driven organization, with Donohue making frequent appearances on television and radio to respond to attacks on the Church from various quarters. The league publishes a newsletter called Catalyst ten times a year. Its purpose is to chronicle ANTI-CATHOLIC prejudice in its multiple manifestations. The Catholic League also publishes a thick annual volume that reviews anti-Catholic expressions from the preceding year by category of defamation. Catalyst is sent to members of the Catholic League, and the Annual Report is mailed to members of the media and the political classes, and both publications are available on the league's Web site.

The Catholic League is funded by membership dues and individual donations. Its annual budget is approximately $3 million and there were about 350,000 members in 2006. In the early days of the league, it was headquartered in Milwaukee, where Father Blum lived at Marquette University as a member of the Wisconsin Province of the Society of Jesus. Since William Donohue assumed the presidency, it has been located in New York City.

The Catholic League has been effective in many of its efforts. Because of protest from the league, ABC's Nothing Sacred, a weekly television series about a Catholic priest that debuted in 1997, was cancelled after just a handful of episodes. The League objected to the portrayal of the priest and other dubious material in the ABC show. Likewise, when films such as The Last Temptation of Christ (1988), Priest (1994), and Dogma (1999) came to the big screen, the Catholic League vocally opposed them for their offensive depiction of Christ and the priesthood.

In 1999 the Brooklyn Museum of Art featured a collage by Chris Ofili, a black British Catholic artist of Nigerian descent, titled The Holy Virgin Mary. This work showed the Black Madonna surrounded by pictures of female genitalia and anuses, with elephant dung splattered all over the canvas. The Catholic League criticized the painting for trampling on good taste and Catholic sensibilities, and it organized a demonstration outside the museum and called for a withdrawal of public funding.

In January 2002, when the clerical sex abuse scandal erupted in Boston and spread to other American dioceses, the Catholic League weighed in by condemning the sordid conduct of a small minority of priests while also defending the Church both against media coverage which was unfair and biased and against district attorneys who overstepped their bounds.

The Catholic League was very active after the release of the film The Passion of the Christ in February 2004. In particular, the league argued against charges that the film was anti-Semitic. This was not new territory for the league, however, having defended Pope PIUS XII regularly over the years against the accusation that he failed to do anything to save Jews from the murderous designs of Adolph HITLER.

The league likewise exposed the false premises of the book The DaVinci Code (2003), which, among other things, posits that JESUS and MARY MAGDALENE were secretly wed to each other. In 2007, the league played a role in forcing the cancellation of a public display of a naked chocolate Jesus during Holy Week at a New York City hotel.

The Catholic League has been involved in what have come to be known as the "Christmas wars." This term refers to conflicts that have broken out over public acknowledgement of a Christian holiday in what many secularists see as a religion-free public square. The Catholic League has vigorously supported citizens who act in good faith when they file notices of discrimination concerning publicly expressing their religious belief in a pluralistic society.

The Catholic League's policy of tackling the key issues of religion and culture in a responsibly aggressive manner has made it a significant force not only against the marginalization of religion in society, but also in empowering the free exercise of religious rights. To this end, it has emboldened Catholics to have a greater concern for how religion is treated in the public square, helping them to carry out their vocation in the midst of a tumultuous and changing world.

Many U.S. bishops have praised the work of the Catholic League. For example, Cardinal Sean O'Malley, O.F.M. Cap. of Boston, has stated that:

> The Catholic League has done much to ensure that the Church's positions are presented clearly and fairly. Too often those who do not understand the Church or her teachings are the interpreters of the doctrines and events in the life of the Church. The work of the League is important in the mission of the Church which must teach the hard truths of the Gospel in season and out of season. (http://www.catholicleague.org/about.php)

Archbishop Charles Chaput of Denver endorsed the Catholic League in these words: "The Catholic League has the courage to speak up candidly and forcefully for the Church when circumstances call for fighting the good fight. The League should be on every Catholic's short list of essential organizations to support" (http://www.catholicleague.org/about.php).

SEE ALSO CHURCH AND STATE; FILM, THE CHURCH AND; JESUITS; MODERN MEDIA AND THE CHURCH; SEXUAL ABUSE CRISIS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Robert J. Batule, "Donohue, William A." in Encyclopedia of Catholic Social Thought, Social Science, and Social Policy, edited by Michael L. Coulter, Stephen M. Krason, Richard S. Myers, and Joseph A. Varacalli (Lanham, Md. 2007): 321–322.

Catholic League Web site, available from http://www.catholicleague.org (accessed March 3, 2008).

William A. Donohue, "Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights," in Encyclopedia of Catholic Social Thought, Social Science, and Social Policy, edited by Michael L. Coulter, Stephen M. Krason, Richard S. Myers, and Joseph A. Varacalli (Lanham, Md. 2007): 146–147.

Msgr. Robert J. Batule
Priest
Diocese of Rockville Centre, New York (2010)

CATHOLIC-MUSLIM DIALOGUE

In modern times, the involvement of the Catholic Church in dialogue with Muslims goes back to Nostra aetate, the Second Vatican Council document on the relationship of the Church to non-Christian religions. Although in the medieval period, individuals such as Pope GREGORY VII, in his famous letter to Al-Nasir (1285–1340), ruler of Bejaya (in modern Algeria), and St. FRANCIS OF ASSISI had made personal overtures to Muslims, the Church itself made no commitment to pursue dialogue with the followers of ISLAM. Similarly, in the decades before Vatican II, the writings of the French scholar Louis Massignon (1883–1962) and the efforts of the Badaliyya movement in Egypt and Lebanon sought to create a climate of spiritual sharing between Christians and Muslims, but these overtures remained quite limited in scope and had little influence on the Catholic Church as a whole. The growth of Catholic-Muslim dialogue since the time of the Second Vatican Council is discussed below.

Vatican II and Muslims. The immediate precedent to Nostra aetate was the 1964 Encyclical of Pope PAUL VI, Ecclesiam suam (ES). This letter paved the way for the council documents and introduced the concept of dialogue to a Church that previously had expressed no need for it. The approach of Paul VI to Jews and Muslims anticipates the teaching of Nostra aetate and other council documents, referring to "those who worship the one supreme God, whom we also worship. We mean the Jewish people, worthy of our affectionate respect ... and Muslims, who are worthy of admiration for all that is good and true in their worship of God" (ES 107).

Jesuits at the court of Akbar. © THE TRUSTEES OF THE CHESTER BEATTY LIBRARY, DUBLIN

The Nostra aetate (NA) (1965) passage on Muslims set the tone of the document in its opening statement: "The Church regards with esteem also the Muslims." With this expression, the Vatican Council determined the direction of subsequent Magisterial teaching, affirming that esteem for Muslims is a part of the official teaching of the Catholic Church's highest religious authority. Nostra aetate presented the reasons for this esteem—Muslims' worship of the One GOD, the Creator of all, who has revealed His WORD to humankind; the desire of Muslims to submit to God's will in the manner of ABRAHAM; their reverence for JESUS as prophet and for his Virgin Mother MARY; and their expectation of the Day of Judgment. The document then notes Muslims' dedication to moral uprightness and mentions four of the five pillars of Islam: worship of the One God, prayer, almsgiving, and fasting.

The final statement of this short, but dense, paragraph has had the greatest influence on the direction of Christian-Muslim dialogue. Acknowledging that in the course of history "not a few quarrels and hostilities have arisen between Muslims and Christians," the council urges all to move beyond the past to build mutual understanding between the two communities of faith. In a significant conclusion, Nostra aetate gives Muslims and Christians a common mission to work together in four key areas of modern life, that is, to promote and preserve "for the benefit of all humankind" peace, social justice, moral values, and true human freedom (NA 3).

The other reference to Muslims in Vatican II documents is found in Lumen gentium (LG), the dogmatic constitution on the Church. The document notes that Muslims, "who, professing to hold the faith of Abraham, along with us adore the one and merciful God, who on the Last Day will judge humankind" (LG 16). Thus, while not speaking of dialogue, the document provides a strong theological basis for dialogue by recognizing that Muslims worship "along with us" the One God in a monotheistic tradition that goes back to the faith of Abraham.

The council statements have been criticized for their lack of any explicit reference to the religion of Islam, the revelation of the QUR'ĀN, or the prophethood of MUḤAMMAD. Some Muslims have asked how a statement that remains silent on their religious status, their revealed Scripture, and their prophet Muḥammad could be considered an accurate or adequate expression of their faith. However, the prudent discretion expressed in the council documents can also be regarded in a positive light as an unwillingness to close theological research and discussion on such topics with a premature statement that might prove embarrassing and problematic to later generations. By remaining silent on these key points, the council left open the door for further investigation and clarification in subsequent theological studies and Magisterial teaching.

Secretariat for Non-Christians/Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue. During the council, the Catholic Church took the first tentative steps toward dialogue with Muslims and the followers of other religions by creating in 1964 in the VATICAN a Secretariat for Non-Christians, and within the secretariat a Commission for Relations with Muslims. In 1988 the name was changed to the PONTIFICAL COUNCIL FOR INTERRELIGIOUS DIALOGUE (PCID). In its early years, the secretariat devoted its energies mainly to producing books and journals to give Catholics more objective and sympathetic information about Islam and other religions but, with the exception of high-level delegations to the Vatican from Iran and Saudi Arabia, the secretariat had little direct contact with Muslims.

This situation changed with the appointment of Cardinal Sergio Pignedoli (1973–1980) and then Archbishop Jean JADOT (1980–1984) to head the Vatican Secretariat. Both took an activist approach by visiting Muslims in their home countries and transforming the secretariat into a Roman base for Muslim leaders and delegations on official visits to the HOLY SEE. During the reign of Pope JOHN PAUL II (1978–2005), the secretariat became the pope's personal instrument for pursuing dialogue with Muslims.

In addition to welcoming Muslim delegations to ROME and representing the pope at academic conferences and other dialogue activities organized by Muslims, the PCID initiated seminars with leading Muslim organizations to address theological and social issues. The council held symposia with international organizations such as the Muslim World League, the World Muslim Congress, and the World Islamic Call Society (WICS), and with national Islamic organizations from Turkey, Iran, Egypt, Tunisia, Indonesia, Pakistan, Russia, and Bangladesh. The topics studied included questions of nationalism, violence and religion, human rights and religious freedom, reproduction ethics, religious education, proselytism, the status of women in society, the task of the media in promoting mutual respect, pluralism and the rights of minorities, the challenge of modern secularism, and the role of religions in peacemaking.

Theological Bases for Interreligious Dialogue. Putting the practice of interreligious dialogue on a firm theological basis was one of the main projects of Pope John Paul II and his Vatican departments in the 1980s. Although a number of Catholic theologians had written treatises analyzing the processes and goals of dialogue, the Holy See still had to face the criticism of those who believed that dialogue with Muslims and the followers of other faiths was a compromise with error and incompatible with the obligation to proclaim the Gospel.

Within the space of ten years, the Holy See produced three documents that sought to explain the relationship between dialogue with other religions and the proclamation of Christian faith as well as the role of dialogue in the Church. The 1984 document of the Secretariat for Non-Christians, "The Attitude of the Church Towards the Followers of Other Religions: Reflections and Orientations on Dialogue and Mission (DM)," was followed by the 1991 document "Dialogue and Proclamation: Reflection and Orientations on Interreligious Dialogue and the Proclamation of the Gospel of Jesus Christ (DP)," jointly produced by the same secretariat and the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples and, finally, the papal Encyclical of the same year, Redemptoris missio (RM).

These documents took a holistic approach to the mission of the Church. The mission that JESUS CHRIST gave to his followers is a "single but complex and articulated reality" (DP 2). The principal elements of this mission are "presence and witness; commitment to social development and human liberation; liturgical life, prayer and contemplation; interreligious dialogue; and finally, proclamation and catechesis" (DM 13; DP 2). "Proclamation and dialogue are thus both viewed, each in its own place, as component elements and authentic forms of the one evangelizing mission of the Church." As two distinct elements in the Church's one mission, interreligious dialogue and proclamation of the Gospel cannot be considered contradictory. They are "related but not interchangeable" (DP 77). "They must maintain both their intimate connection and their distinctiveness; therefore they should not be confused, manipulated or regarded as identical" (RM 55).

This passage in John Paul II's encyclical Redemptoris missio on interreligious dialogue (RM 55–57) presents a clear summary of the Church's commitment to dialogue: "A vast field lies open to dialogue, which can assume many forms and expressions," stated the pope. "Each member of the faithful and all Christian communities are called to practice dialogue," he continued, "although not always to the same degree or in the same way" (RM 57).

These three documents break the practice of dialogue into four typical aspects: (1) the dialogue of life; (2) the dialogue of action and cooperation; (3) the dialogue of experts in studying theological questions and social issues; and (4) the sharing of personal religious experience. In delineating these four types of dialogue, Church teachings broaden the concept of dialogue beyond its roots in personalist philosophy. Dialogue does not indicate only theological discussions among experts but includes also the way that Christians and others live together and bear mutual witness to the values of their religious faiths, the way they work together for the common good, and their sharing of spiritual experience. The "dialogue of life" is a reminder that dialogue is not meant only for religious leaders and scholars but should involve the whole Christian community. On the doctrinal basis of these Magisterial documents, Muslim-Catholic dialogue could be built.

Achievement of Pope John Paul II. More than any other individual, John Paul II was responsible for the reception of the Second Vatican Council document Nostra aetate both by the bishops and the rank-and-file members of the Catholic Church. Elected pope thirteen years after the publication of Nostra aetate, at a time when the commitment to dialogue with people of other faiths was still misunderstood, ignored, or even opposed by many in the Church, John Paul communicated a consistent message of dialogue, mutual understanding, and peacemaking to Muslims and others, and taught Catholics that respect for the followers of other religions is an integral element of the Church's mission in modern times.

In his commitment to dialogue with Muslims, John Paul II followed steadily the direction set by Ecclesiam suam. In his first encyclical, Redemptor hominis, John Paul II acknowledged his theological and spiritual debt to Ecclesiam suam. Paul VI's later document, Evangelii nuntiandi, published in 1975, less than three years before the election of John Paul II, provided a second important springboard for John Paul II by broadening the concept of evangelization to embrace a respectful opening to the modern world that went beyond narrow attitudes of proselytism. Moreover, Evangelii nuntiandi's recognition of the role and activity of the Holy Spirit in all religious and interreligious discourse became a central pillar of John Paul's theology of religions.

Before the time of John Paul II, awareness of the commitment of the Catholic Church to dialogue tended to be restricted to the limited circle of those who studied papal documents. The achievement of John Paul II was to communicate this commitment to the Church at large. It became his practice on papal trips not to limit his encounters to members of his own Catholic flock or even to a broader gathering of Christians, but wherever possible to include visits and meetings with Muslims and, in many cases, with the followers of other religions. In Rome John Paul's audience chamber hosted visiting delegations of Jews, Muslims, Buddhists, Hindus, and others. John Paul had more than fifty private encounters with the followers of Islam, both in Rome and on his papal travels.

John Paul II's intuitive appreciation that the right gesture at the right time would be remembered long after texts and speeches were forgotten stamped images of a Church in dialogue on the minds of Christians, Muslims, and others. His visits to mosques in Senegal (1992) and Syria (2001) and his kissing a copy of the Qur'ān were dramatic gestures that showed respect for Muslims and for their faith. His invitation to religious leaders around the world to come to ASSISI to pray for peace (1986, 1993, 2002) gave concrete expression to his conviction that prayer in common was a method for believers to come spiritually closer under the guidance of the Holy Spirit.

Muslims as Children of Abraham. Beyond their obvious value as public relations events and their value as a witness to Catholics and the world, of the friendship and fellow feeling that should exist among Christians and Muslims, these encounters provided an opportunity for John Paul II to expound the Church's teaching on Islam and other religions. This theology grew out of, and sometimes went beyond, the literal text of Vatican II.

John Paul II situated Muslims within the history of salvation as one of the three families of faith who, together with Jews and Christians, look back to Abraham as their common spiritual ancestor. The pope based this on Nostra aetate, which praised Muslims for associating themselves with the prophet Abraham and Abraham's submission to God. The text in Nostra aetate is somewhat ambiguous: "They [Muslims] take pains to submit wholeheartedly to His inscrutable decrees, just as Abraham, with whom the faith of Islam takes pleasure in linking itself, submitted to God" (NA 3). Critics of the council took a restrictive interpretation of the phraseology of Nostra aetate to claim that the council text does not link Islam to Abraham, but only that Muslims presume incorrectly to make that claim. John Paul II repeatedly sought to clarify the council statement. In speaking to Christians in Ankara in 1979, he dispelled the ambiguity of the council text by saying: "They [Muslims] have like you the faith of Abraham in the one all-powerful and merciful God" (Homily, November 26, 1979). Not only do Muslims express Abraham's faith in the all-powerful and merciful God, but also they have that faith "like you," that is, in a manner analogous to Christians' own faith in God.

In 1980 in Otranto, John Paul noted that faith tradition of Muslims from Abraham forms a deep basis for a spiritual unity with Christians and a foundation for dialogue that should transcend historical and theological differences. He stated: "We present to the One God...the problem of coming closer and having true dialogue with those who are united to us—despite the differences—by faith in the one and only God, faith inherited from Abraham" (Homily, October 5, 1980). The challenge is not one of creating some vague theoretical unity with Muslims, but rather that of deepening a fellowship with those with whom Christians are already united by a common submission to the One God.

In a related effort at drawing out the implications found in the teaching of the Second Vatican Council, the pope noted that the common spiritual descent of Christians and Muslims from Abraham should form the basis for unity also with their "elder brothers," the Jews. To a mixed delegation from the three religions in Lisbon, Portugal, in 1982 the pope stated:

> We [Christians, Muslims, Jews] are united by faith and by a commitment, similar in many ways, to demonstrate by good works the consistency of our respective religious positions. We also desire that, honoring as Lord the Creator of all things, our example may serve to help others to seek God, to open themselves to transcendence, and to recognize the spiritual value of the human person. (Address to Jewish-Christian-Muslim Group, May 14, 1982)

The basis for dialogue with Muslims and Jews is thus defined as unity in faith and a common commitment to good works.

Work of the Episcopal Conferences. In the years after the council, the local Churches set up structures at the national and continental level to promote and pursue dialogue with Muslims. Each region established its priorities and created its own structures for dialogue. In Asia the FEDERATION OF ASIAN BISHOPS' CONFERENCES (FABC), representing seventeen Asian countries, conducted a series of bishops' seminars aimed at educating the bishops on practical issues and theological questions about dialogue with Muslims. The European Churches took an ecumenical approach to dialogue with Muslims; in 1986 the Council of Episcopal Conferences of Europe (CCEE) formed an Islam in Europe Committee, together with the largely Protestant and Orthodox group, Conference of European Churches (CEC), with representatives appointed by the EPISCOPAL CONFERENCES and the national councils of each European nation.

In Africa, dialogue with Muslims has mainly been pursued through Church structures at the regional level. The Regional Episcopal Conference of West Africa (CERAO) set up its Commission for Christian-Muslim Relations in the early 1970s, followed by that of the Association of Episcopal Conferences in Anglophone West Africa (AECAWA) in 1991, and more recently those of the Southern African Catholic Bishops' Conference (SACBC) and the Regional Conference of North Africa (CERNA). In the Middle East, where the Catholic Church is a member of the MIDDLE EAST COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (MECC), Catholics have participated ecumenically in annual dialogue seminars jointly organized with Muslims.

In all these regions—Asia, Africa, Europe, Middle East—the continental or regional episcopal structures for dialogue were mirrored by national committees and offices for dialogue and, in many cases, by diocesan dialogue structures. Where the number of Muslims warranted it, specific offices for Muslim-Christian relations were created.

In the United States, the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops (USCCB) began to make informal contacts with Muslim leaders as early as 1987, but not until 1996 did the USCCB Office of Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs organize the first regional dialogues with Muslims. The main purpose of these Midwest,

West, and East regional dialogues was to establish and deepen contacts with Muslim leadership so that they could face common problems together. In an effort to build friendship and trust among the religious leaders, the Catholic and Muslim participants met in a retreat environment and studied theological questions (e.g., the Word of God, revelation, prophecy, etc.). To obtain greater representativity on both sides, the seminars were co-hosted by the diocesan bishop and the local Islamic Council.

These early seminars paid rich rewards after the bombings of September 11, 2001, and the Iraq War in 2003 when, in the face of growing anti-Islamic sentiments in the American populace, Catholic bishops and Muslim leaders were able to make joint statements against violence and terrorism and urge their followers to avoid polarization and racial or religious generalizations and stereotyping.

At the diocesan and local level in the United States, members of the National Association of Diocesan Ecumenical Officers (NADEO) through its Committee on Faiths in the World carried out much of the dialogue with Muslims. NADEO dates from 1970 and works closely with the USCCB Bishops' Committee on Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs. In 2006 the name was changed to Catholic Association of Diocesan Ecumenical and Interreligious Officers (CADEIO).

Dominus Iesus. The dialogue between Catholics and Muslims that grew out of the Second Vatican Council had to confront both ancient conflicts and current issues. Christians wanted to raise questions concerning minority rights, freedom of religion, and the use of violence in the name of religion, whereas Muslims focused on the historical evils of the CRUSADES and the colonial period, and modern concerns such as the distorted image of Islam in Western media and the dangers to faith in secular societies. Although the participants did not always agree, the dialogue enabled them to understand better one another's concerns and to build relations of personal respect and trust.

The appearance in August 2000 of the document of the Vatican Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Dominus Iesus, on the unicity and salvific universality of Jesus Christ, raised serious problems for dialogue with Jews and for ecumenical relations with Christians of other churches. The document received relatively few reactions from Muslims, probably because they placed greater weight on the personal sincerity and esteem shown them by John Paul II than on a document issued by a Vatican department. Nevertheless, many Christians asked whether the document indicated a withdrawal from the Vatican council's openness to dialogue, prompting the papal response in November 2000 that the commitment of the Church to ecumenical and interreligious dialogue was "irreversible."

In retrospect, the furor over Dominus Iesus seems exaggerated. The document does not negate the Church's commitment to dialogue, and its assertions underline how far the Catholic Church had come since the time of Nostra aetate in its understanding of interreligious dialogue and theology of religions. Dominus Iesus notes that "mutual enrichment" is one of the benefits of interreligious dialogue (2). The scriptures of other faiths contain elements of grace by which God deepens their followers' relationship with Him (8). The Holy Spirit is at work in the history of peoples, religions, and cultures to bring about good (12). The kingdom of God is a reality that goes beyond the visible Church; Christians should work together with all people of good will for liberation from evil in all its forms (19). Those outside the Church have a "mysterious relationship" to the Church that theologians are still trying to understand. Other religions "contain and offer religious elements which come from God" and are "part of what the Holy Spirit accomplishes in human hearts, the history of peoples, cultures, and religions" (21).

Some have objected that such positive statements are not typical of the whole document and that they are often hemmed in by cautions and fears of being misunderstood. However, the fact that even a document concerned about excesses of enthusiasm for dialogue cannot deny Catholic teaching about the work of the Spirit in other religions, the distinction between the Church and the Reign of God, and the possibility of salvation for the followers of other religions shows the extent to which conciliar teaching has taken root in the Catholic tradition.

Pope Benedict XVI and "A Common Word." When Cardinal JOSEPH RATZINGER was elected as Pope BENEDICT XVI in 2005, some predicted that John Paul II's policy of openness toward Muslims would be discarded in favor of a more restrictive, hard-line approach. However, as a close advisor of John Paul II for many years in his role as president of the Congregation of the Faith, Cardinal Ratzinger was no stranger to the theological positions and practical policies of the previous pope; hence, it was not surprising that his orientation should follow the general lines of his predecessor.

In his first encounter with Muslims in Cologne, Germany, in 2005, Benedict XVI carried on, in content and tone, the approach of John Paul II. He recognized the efficacy of the prayer of Muslims and called upon Muslims and Christians to work together to "affirm the values of mutual respect, solidarity and peace, the sanctity of human life," defense of human dignity and rights, and cooperation in the service of fundamental moral values. He concluded by encouraging mutual understanding: "The lessons of the past must help us to avoid repeating the same mistakes. We must seek paths of reconciliation and learn to live with respect for each other's identity" (Benedict XVI, August 20, 2005).

Pope Benedict XVI and Islam. Pope Benedict XVI greets Muslim delegation head Mustafa Ceric (R), the Grand Mufti of Bosnia, at the Vatican November 6, 2008. Pope Benedict urged Muslim religious leaders and scholars to join Christians in defending their common moral values and respect for human rights despite theological differences between them. © OSSERVATORE ROMANO/REUTERS/ CORBIS

It came as a surprise to Muslims and non-Muslims alike, when at an academic conference in Regensburg, Germany, in 2006, Pope Benedict cited a passage very critical of the Islamic religion taken from a work by the fifteenth century Byzantine emperor, Manuel II Paleologos (1350–1425). In the ensuing controversy, Muslims around the world expressed their outrage, and several incidents of violence erupted. In an effort to clarify his position, the pope added a footnote to his text stating that he did not agree with the sentiments of the emperor. More effective as a gesture of respect was Benedict's bowing his head in silent prayer in the direction of MECCA in the Blue Mosque in Istanbul in December 2006.

Among the more reasoned responses of Muslims to the pope's Regensburg address was that of a group of 38 Muslim scholars who sent an open letter to the pope, correcting several references to Islamic teaching and history in the Regensburg text and inviting the pope to engage in dialogue on the questions raised. A year later, the same group of Muslims, whose number had by that time grown to 138 signatories, sent a new letter to Pope Benedict and to other Christian leaders. This initiative has come to be known as "A Common Word," after a phrase in the Qur'ān that commands Muslims to come to "a common word" between themselves and Christians.

The letter invites Christians and Muslims to agree on three fundamental elements of Christianity and Islam: love of God, love of neighbor, and the conviction that God wills that the two communities live in peace and work together to build peace in the world. Along with other Christian leaders, Pope Benedict welcomed the Common Word initiative. Following other Christian initiatives of seminars and study sessions on "A Common Word" in places like Yale and Georgetown Universities in the United States and at Cambridge University in England, Pope Benedict invited representatives of the Common Word signatories to Rome to discuss further steps toward reconciliation and cooperation.

A new committee, the Catholic-Muslim Forum, was formed to pursue dialogue between the two communities. The first meeting in Rome was held in November 2008, and Pope Benedict attended the final session. In welcoming the formation of the forum, the pope reiterated the Church's commitment to dialogue with Muslims in the following words:

> There is a great and vast field in which we can act together in defending and promoting the moral values which are part of our common heritage. Only by starting with the recognition of the centrality of the person and the dignity of each human being, respecting and defending life which is the gift of God, and is thus sacred for Christians and for Muslims alike—only on the basis of this recognition, can we find a common ground for building a more fraternal world, a world in which confrontations and differences are peacefully settled, and the devastating power of ideologies is neutralized. (Benedict XVI, November 11, 2008)

SEE ALSO CAMBRIDGE, UNIVERSITY OF; DOCTRINE OF THE FAITH, CONGREGATION FOR THE; DOMINUS IESUS; ECCLESIAM SUAM; EPISCOPAL CONFERENCES; EVANGELII NUNTIANDI; GEORGETOWN UNIVERSITY; GOD (HOLY SPIRIT); JOHN PAUL II AND INTERRELIGIOUS DIALOGUE; REDEMPTOR HOMINIS; REDEMPTORIS MISSIO; TEACHING AUTHORITY OF THE CHURCH (MAGISTERIUM); UNITED STATES CONFERENCE OF CATHOLIC BISHOPS (USCCB); VATICAN COUNCIL II.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

"A Common Word," Official Web site, 2009, available from http://www.acommonword.com/ (accessed November 1, 2009).

Michael L. Fitzgerald and John Borelli, Interfaith Dialogue: A Catholic View (Maryknoll, N.Y. 2006).

James Kritzeck, "Islamic/Roman Catholic Dialogue," in New Catholic Encyclopedia, vol. 17, second supplement volume, "Changes in the Church" (Washington, D.C. 1988), p. 301.

Muslim-Christian Research Group, The Challenge of the Scriptures: The Bible and the Qur'ān, translated by Stuart E. Brown (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1989).

Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue, Guidelines for Dialogue between Christians and Muslims, prepared by Maurice Borrmans, translated by R. Marston Speight (New York 1990).

Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue, Recognize the Spiritual Bonds Which Unite Us: 16 Years of Christian Muslim Dialogue, edited by Thomas Michel and Michael Fitzgerald (Vatican City 1994).

All Magisterial documents as well as homilies and Papal addresses mentioned in this entry can be found on the Vatican Web site, available at http://www.vatican.va/ (accessed November 9, 2009).

Rev. Thomas Michel SJ
Woodstock Theological Center
Georgetown University (2010)

CATHOLIC WORKER MOVEMENT

Founded in 1932 by Catholic convert Dorothy DAY (1897–1980) and French immigrant Peter MAURIN (1877–1949), the Catholic Worker Movement developed into one of the most influential Catholic social organizations in the United States. Known primarily for its work among the poor and dispossessed and for its overt PACIFISM, the movement grew rapidly in the 1930s and 1940s amidst the economic and social dislocation of the Great Depression. In many establishment quarters, including the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), the movement was considered radical and communist-leaning. J. Edgar Hoover, the longtime Director of the FBI, closely monitored the activities of the Catholic Worker Movement and on three occasions recommended to the U.S. Attorney General that the organization and its leaders be prosecuted for subversive activities.

The movement, however, always claimed its origins to be the teachings of JESUS CHRIST in the Gospels and the social encyclicals of the popes. In some respects, the Catholic Worker Movement, through the impact of Peter Maurin, was strongly influenced by European Catholic social thought, particularly the notion of Christian PERSONALISM and the writings of Jacques MARITAIN. Christian personalism, as articulated by the French philosopher, Emmanuel MOUNIER, subordinated the importance of large political or social movements in favor of the actions of individuals. Maritain, the great neo-scholastic philosopher, was an early proponent of universal human rights, and his close association with the movement inspired its members to emphasize the dignity of each human person. Drawing on these influences, the Catholic Worker Movement believed that no change could be effected in society if it did not have its origins in the conversion of the individual. Society transformed itself not from the top down, but from the bottom up, and from transformed individuals came the Christian remaking of the world.

Dorothy Day and the movement were never supporters of the welfare state, nor did they put great FAITH in organized charities. Day emphasized the need for each individual to assume personal responsibility for changing the ills of the world by sharing the burdens of other people in a direct, personal manner. Despite the charge that Day's organization was somehow communist-inspired, the movement's weekly newspaper, The Catholic Worker, consistently and energetically opposed Communism. Whether state-inspired solutions to social inequality and suffering emanated from the Left or the Right (National Socialism or FASCISM, for example), Day and her followers criticized any broad political movement that resulted in the subordination of the individual. When Catholic workers spoke of communal living, they were speaking of individuals living together cooperatively in a spirit of Christian sharing, a model akin to a religious community.

War Protest. Rose Cohn (R), journalist Dorothy Day (M), and Charlotte Margolies (L) wearing sashes stating "Keep Out of War" in protest to U.S. involvement in World War I. © BETTMANN/CORBIS

The similarity to a religious community, but of laypersons, is evident in several ways. Day emphasized the importance of living a life of POVERTY. She made a distinction between poverty forced upon a person by an unjust and unequal society and the voluntary poverty that she encouraged among her followers. It was voluntary poverty that freed the individual from the concerns and distractions of the world, that dissuaded a person from the pursuit of trivial material goods, and that ultimately enabled the individual to direct his energies toward caring for his brother and sister. In the end, voluntary poverty, for Day and Maurin, was a practical aid to the individual, as he went about the task of remaking the world according to the teachings of CHRIST.

One of the most controversial aspects of the Catholic Workers Movement was its uncompromising pacifism. In the United States this stance often brought its members into conflict with the federal government. Members of the organization were generally conscientious objectors during wartime. Many adherents of the group engaged in public displays of their opposition to war in any form by burning draft cards and protesting. Some members also refused to pay income tax on the grounds that any financial support of the U.S. government was tantamount to support of the government military policy. This emphasis on non-violence was remarkable in an age that saw the rise of radical political movements of the Left and Right that engaged willingly in mass murder. Later, during the Cold War, Day and her followers refused to accept that a "just war" could be legitimately waged, even against communist regimes that were, the Catholic Workers readily recognized, destroying individuals and trampling on human rights.

The philosophy of the Catholic Worker Movement spread during the 1930s to the early twentieth century in a variety of practical ways. The most effective means of transmitting the message and engendering the growth of the movement was Dorothy Day herself. Her prolific writing and her tireless work elevated her toward the end of her life into a well-known and widely respected figure in American Catholicism. The organization's weekly newspaper, The Catholic Worker, began publication in 1933. The newspaper aimed to bring Catholic social teaching to the masses in a time of tremendous economic failure and dislocation throughout the world. Over the years, it focused attention on issues of SOCIAL JUSTICE, non-violence, and poverty. Although its circulation never reached significant levels, The Catholic Worker's influence rippled through the American Catholic Church, especially among Catholic university students and lay intelligentsia.

The movement also established Houses of Hospitality in cities throughout the United States and abroad. Because of Day's and Maurin's aversion to organized efforts to confront social problems, they rarely kept records and had few rules. Scholars estimate that more than one hundred Houses of Hospitality, designed to take in the poor and homeless, have been founded, the first, St. Joseph's, in New York City in 1933. Maurin summed up the purpose of these refuges for society's unwanted and ignored: "We need Houses of Hospitality to give the rich the opportunity to serve the poor ... to bring the Bishops to the people and the people to the Bishops ... to show what idealism looks like when it is practiced ... to bring social justice through Catholic action.... (Aronica 1987, p. 59).

Communal farms were also a hallmark of the Catholic Worker Movement, with the first established in 1935 on Staten Island. These were seen, especially by Maurin, as a means for renewing society by returning MAN to the simplicity of nature where no unemployment could exist. The land would provide for the basic physical needs in life, and communal living would foster human virtues that would, in each affected individual, lead to the eventual transformation of society. The communal farms were fewer in number than the Houses of Hospitality and did not flourish as well over the years.

The Catholic Worker Movement continues into the twenty-first century to reflect the philosophy and undertake the work envisioned by its founders, Dorothy Day and Peter Maurin. Its purpose, as expressed by Maurin and put into practice by Day, remains unchanged: "to create a new society within the shell of the old with...a very old philosophy, a philosophy so old, that it looks like new" (Aronica 1987, p. 55).

SEE ALSO CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTION; CONVERTS AND CONVERSION; ENCYCLICAL; SOCIAL CONTRACT; SOCIAL GOSPEL.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Michele Teresa Aronica, Beyond Charismatic Leadership: The New York Catholic Worker Movement (New Brunswick, N.J. 1987).

Joseph D. Collins, Catholic Worker Movement in the Nineteen Thirties (M.A. thesis, Columbia University 1972).

Mel Piehl, Breaking Bread: The Catholic Worker and the Origin of Catholic Radicalism in America (Philadelphia, Pa. 1982).

Nancy L. Roberts, Dorothy Day and the Catholic Worker (Albany, N.Y. 1984).

Richard J.Wolff, Dorothy Day: Le Mouvement Catholique Ouvrier Aux Etats-Unis [The Catholic Worker Movement in the United States] (Paris 1994).

Mark and Louise Zwick, Catholic Worker Movement: Intellectual and Spiritual Origins (New York 2005).

Richard J. Wolff
Chief Executive Officer
The Global Consulting Group (2010)

CATHOLIC YOUTH ORGANIZATION

The history of the Catholic Youth Organization (known familiarly as CYO to legions of Catholics in the United States) began during the Great Depression "in 1930 as an athletic program for elementary and high school youth in the Archdiocese of Chicago" (National Federation for Catholic Youth Ministry [NFCYM] 2007, http://www.nfcym.org/about/history.htm). The founder was the dynamic, pro-labor Auxiliary Bishop Bernard J. SHEIL of Chicago, who would later encounter controversy as he boldly attacked Senator Joseph McCarthy at a time when McCarthy was popular among many Catholics. As one source described him:

> Bishop Bernard Sheil, given free rein by [Cardinal] Mundelein, best epitomizes that [socially progressive] spirit. He was the initiating force behind the Catholic Youth Organization (CYO), which successfully attracted thousands of Chicago teenagers to its sports programs, of which boxing was the most famous. In 1943, the Sheil School of Social Studies, which focused on adult education, opened at CYO headquarters. In 1954, Sheil vehemently attacked Joseph McCarthy at a time when most Catholics strongly supported the demagogic anti-Communist senator. (Gems 2004, http://www.encyclopedia.chicagohistory.org/pages/1090.html)

By 1937 a national organization existed in Washington, D.C. In the early twenty-first century, the successor of this first national Catholic youth organization in the United States is known as the National Federation for Catholic Youth Ministry, whose Web site details the involved and often stormy historical evolution of its organizational structure (NFCYM 2007, http://www.nfcym.org/about/history.htm). A broad overview of that detailed historical development follows. In the 1940s at the prompting of the VATICAN, the national organization became known as the National Council of Catholic Youth. In the 1960s it was renamed the National CYO Federation. In the 1980s major budget cutbacks at the UNITED STATES CONFERENCE OF CATHOLIC BISHOPS led to the complete organizational independence of youth ministry from the conference.

By 1982 the National Federation for Catholic Youth Ministry emerged. Growth in the 1980s was marked by several conferences and publications as well as new bylaws. In 1993 the organization hosted WORLD YOUTH DAY in Denver and in 1994 became involved with the True Love Waits CHASTITY program for teenagers. The 1990s also saw publication of a resource manual to address youth violence. The 1990s were marked by several youth conferences involving thousands of participants. The federation celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary in 2006 with a wide array of cooperating Catholic organizations and ministries. By 2007 the National Catholic Youth Conference had 20,000 participants.

A prominent, continuing example of what Chicago Bishop Sheil started is the CYO of the Archdiocese of Detroit, which began in 1933 shortly after the CYO was born in nearby Chicago (Archdiocese of Detroit 2008, http://www.cyodetroit.org/AboutCYO/OurHistory/tabid/56/Default.aspx). The history and continuing activities of the Detroit CYO have an athletic character true to the image of CYO formed by most Catholics in the United States. In Detroit, due to demographic changes also found in other large cities, an openness exists toward serving non-Catholics and to developing programs that address social ills such as racism and youth violence. A similarly comprehensive scope of services can be found in the vision of youth ministry set forth by the Catholic bishops of the United States (NFCYM 1997, http://www.nfcym.org/catholicym/index.htm). The offerings of the Detroit CYO give a concrete example of the broad range of CYO activities, such as the well-known athletic leagues, summer camps, youth conferences, and scouting. The scouting support embraces an explicitly Catholic, graduated program of Christian spiritual development (Archdiocese of Detroit 2008, http://www.cyodetroit.org/Programs/Scouting/tabid/224/Default.aspx).

Of special interest in this era of the New Evangelization emphasized by both Pope JOHN PAUL II and Pope BENEDICT XVI is the evangelization component of Catholic youth ministry that goes well beyond the merely athletic or social activities that are most familiar to many Catholics. As described by the National Federation for Catholic Youth Ministry, this evangelization component "involves the community's pronouncements and [the] living witnesses of adults and young people that the reign of God is realized in and through Jesus. The ministry of evangelization incorporates several essential elements: witness, outreach, proclamation, invitation, conversion, and discipleship" (NFCYM 1997, http://www.nfcym.org/catholicym/index.htm, quoting U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, Renewing the Vision: A Framework for Catholic Youth Ministry [1997]).

In addition to the well-developed diocesan youth programs in the United States, the twenty-first century has seen a dynamic outpouring of movements and ministries involving the very youthful populations of the Third World, where Christianity, including Catholicism, is growing rapidly. The largest Catholic youth organization in the world may possibly be CFC Youth for Christ, an adjunct of the pontifically recognized, private lay association of the FAITHFUL called Couples for Christ [CFC]. CFC originated in the Philippines in 1981 and has since spread to well over one hundred other nations (Couples for Christ 2008, http://couplesforchristglobal.org/newversion/). In contrast to the strong athletic image of CYO programs in the United States, the Youth for Christ movement is primarily evangelistic in its emphasis and is an offshoot or manifestation of the international Catholic Charismatic Renewal (CFC Youth for Christ 2008, http://cfcyouthforchrist.net/). Yet, the organization as a whole is also heavily involved in efforts to address the social and material needs of the poor, as was Bishop Sheil in Chicago.

The goals and mission of CFC Youth for Christ are quite specific and set forth an ambitious vision for Catholic youth ministry in the New Evangelization. Youth for Christ describes its vision for youth ministry in part, as affirming:

> That God is calling everyone to a personal relationship with Him through His Son, Jesus Christ....That the youth have a very special place in God's heart, and that they in return have a very deep sense of love for God, and that a personal relationship with Jesus Christ is something they desire....That the youth realize the need to make decisions in life; but [that] they should also know that as they do, God should always be an inseparable part of these decisions... (CFC Youth for Christ 2008, http://cfcyouthforchrist.net/default.asp?id=36&mnu=36).

Although expressed in language different from that of the National Federation of Catholic Youth Ministry quoted earlier, this vision for youth ministry from a vibrant, international Catholic movement originating in the Third World matches the evangelizing vision of youth ministry articulated by the Catholic bishops of the United States.

SEE ALSO Boy Scouts; Boys Town; Charismatic Renewal, Catholic; Chicago, Archdiocese of; Detroit, Archdiocese of; Evangelization, New.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Archdiocese of Detroit, CYO History (2008), available from http://www.cyodetroit.org/AboutCYO/OurHistory/tabid/56/Default.aspx (accessed May 31, 2008).

Catholic Youth Organization of the Archdiocese of Detroit, Spiritual Scouting (July 1, 2008), available from http://www.cyodetroit.org/Programs/Scouting/tabid/224/Default.aspx (accessed July 1, 2008).

CFC Youth for Christ (2008), available from http://cfcyouthforchrist.net/ (accessed May 31, 2008).

Couples for Christ, CFC Global News (May 2008), available from http://couplesforchristglobal.org/newversion/ (accessed May 31, 2008).

Gerald R. Gems, "Catholic Youth Organization," Encyclopedia of Chicago (Chicago 2004), available from http://www.encyclopedia.chicagohistory.org/pages/220.html (accessed May 31, 2008).

Philip Jenkins, The Next Christendom: The Coming of Global Christianity (Oxford 2002).

Jesus Youth: A Missionary Movement at the Service of the Church (2006), available from http://jesusyouth.org/main/component/option,com_frontpage/Itemid,1/ (accessed June 1, 2008). Founded in India.

National Federation for Catholic Youth Ministry (NFCYM), NFCYM History (2007), available from http://www.nfcym.org/about/history.htm (accessed May 31, 2008).

National Federation for Catholic Youth Ministry, Understanding Catholic Youth Ministry (1997), available from http://www.nfcym.org/catholicym/index.htm (accessed May 31, 2008). Commentary on the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops' Renewing the Vision: A Framework for Catholic Youth Ministry, p. 36.

Pontifical Council for the Laity. International Associations of the Faithful Directory (2006), available from http://www.va/roman_curia/pontifical_councils/laity/documents/rc_pc_laity_doc_20051114_associazioni_en.html (accessed June 1, 2008).

Steve Rosswurm, "Roman Catholics," Encyclopedia of Chicago (Chicago 2004), available from http://www.encyclopedia.chicagohistory.org/pages/1090.html (accessed May 31, 2008).

United States Conference of Catholic Bishops: Secretariat of Laity, Marriage, Family Life, & Youth, Renewing the Vision: A Framework for Catholic Youth Ministry (Washington, D.C. October 2000), available from http://www.usccb.org/laity/youth/rtvintro.shtml (accessed June 2, 2008).

Oswald Sobrino
Editor, Catholic Analysis
http://CatholicAnalysis.blogspot.com (2010)

CAVOUR, GUSTAVO BENSO DI

Marquis of Cavour; b. Turin, Italy, June 27, 1806; d. Turin, 1864.

As the older brother of Camillo Benso, Count of Cavour (founder of the modern Italian nation and first prime minister of the Kingdom of Italy), Gustavo Benso, Marquis of Cavour, occupies a distinct place among the neglected siblings of prominent historical figures. Yielding to his brother in public matters, Gustavo governed the affairs of the Benso family by virtue of seniority and the laws of primogeniture. Whereas the ebullient Camillo excelled in politics and business, the introspective Gustavo was drawn to religious and philosophical speculation. His upbringing exposed him to a variety of influences. His father supported the Napoleonic regime, but pledged loyalty to the conservative Savoy dynasty that the Congress of Vienna restored to the throne of the Kingdom of Sardinia. His mother, born into a family of Swiss Calvinists, converted to Catholicism in 1811. Jansenist teachers took charge of Gustavo's early education. His mentors and readings exposed him to the ideas of the ENLIGHTENMENT, British laissez-faire economists, Immanuel KANT, Victor COUSIN, and Joseph DE MAISTRE.

He received an eclectic education that pointed in no certain direction. His early views can be described as moderately liberal, but that ended in the early 1830s, when his political and economic liberalism may have influenced the ideas of his younger brother. Following the death of his wife, Adele Lascaris, in 1833, Gustavo experienced a personal crisis that turned him toward religion. Coincidentally, Adele's death caused a rupture with Camillo, who was deeply attached to his sister-in-law and blamed Gustavo for the unhappiness of the marriage and her early death. Gustavo found solace in the writings of the liberal Catholic theologian Antonio ROSMINI-SERBATI, whose ideas he set out to promote in Fragmens philosophiques (1841), which gathered in one volume many of his writings on philosophy, ethics, and religion. His championing of Rosminian ideas involved him in 1843 in a clamorous public controversy with Vincenzo GIOBERTI. Gustavo accused Gioberti of having misrepresented Rosmini's ideas in his writings to put him in a bad light with the pope and of being in league with JESUITS hostile to Rosmini's liberalism.

Gustavo shared Rosmini's convictions that faith and reason played a complementary role and that the teachings of religion could help solve the problems of the present. In 1848 Gustavo helped found the Catholic journal L'Armonia della Religione con la Civiltà (usually referred to simply as L'Armonia), whose full title reveals the intent of liberal Catholics to reconcile traditional religion with the currents of change. Gustavo resigned from its board in 1851 when conservatives objected to Gustavo's cautious endorsement of the principle of the separation of CHURCH AND STATE. In 1848 to 1849 he opposed the war against Austria, unlike Camillo, who welcomed it as a step toward Italian independence. Elected to parliament in December 1849, Gustavo joined the bloc headed by the ultra-conservative Count Clemente Solaro della Margarita (1792–1869). Gustavo continued to serve as an elected representative in the Sardinian and Italian parliaments until his death and often opposed policies championed by his brother. In 1852 he expressed initial support for the controversial proposal to recognize civil marriages, but then voted against it. In 1854 he spoke against his brother's proposal for Piedmontese participation in the Crimean War, which set in motion the events that led to Italian unification. In 1855 he condemned the expropriation of properties belonging to religious associations. He upheld the inviolability of private property, which he regarded as a bulwark against the extremisms of the left. The revolutions of 1848 confirmed Gustavo's fear that concessions to liberals and democrats would lead to socialism. The uneasy combination of conservative and reformist views made Gustavo Cavour a philosophical and political maverick, suspect in the eyes of both conservatives and liberals.

SEE ALSO CALVINISM; CAVOUR, CAMILLO BENSO DI; JANSENISM; NAPOLEON I; ROSMINIANS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ettore Passerin d'Entrèves, "Gustavo di Cavour e le idee separatiste nel dibattito politico-religioso del 1850–52 in Piemonte," in Istituto per la Storia del Risorgimento Italiano, In memoria di Walter Maturi (Rome 1962), 102–118.

Francesco Traniello, "Cavour, Gustavo Benso, marchese di," in Dizionario Biografico degli Italiani, XXIII (Rome 1979), 138–144.

Massimo Tringali, "Antonio Rosmini e il Marchese Gustavo Benso di Cavour," available from www.cattolici-liberali.com/tocquevilleacton/storia.htm#t2 (accessed November 24, 2009).

REFERENCES TO GUSTAVO CAVOUR APPEAR IN MOST BIOGRAPHIES OF CAMILLO CAVOUR, INCLUDING:

Rosario Romeo, Cavour e il suo tempo, l810–1842, 4 vols. (Bari, Italy 1969–1984).

Denis Mack Smith, Cavour (New York 1985).

Roland Sarti
Professor Emeritus
University of Massachusetts at Amherst (2010)

CELESTINA OF THE MOTHER OF GOD, BL.

Baptized Marianna Donati; foundress, Congregation of the Daughters of the Poor of St. Joseph Calasanz (Calasanctian Sisters) in Florence, Italy; b. October 26, 1848, Florence; d. March 18, 1925, Florence; beatified March 30, 2008, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

At thirteen, Marianna began to think about living a life dedicated to God. She tested her resolve by living for a time with the Vallombrosan Sisters. Unsure that she was suited to religious life, she went back to her family and received spiritual instruction and guidance from Fr. Celestino Zini, a Piarist priest who would become Archbishop of Sienna on March 25, 1889.

In time, Marianna accepted that she had a true vocation and, with the support of Fr. Zini, asked her family for permission to enter the convent. Not wanting his daughter to leave the family, Marianna's father refused permission with such vehemence that she bowed to his will. Years passed and the forty-year-old Marianna again pleaded for her father's approval to enter religious life. Now a widower and more dependent than ever on his daughter, the father consented only if he and Marianna's sister and aunt could continue to live with her.

In 1889 Marianna found a residence large enough to house her family and four young women who had expressed a desire to join her. At the age of forty-one, she embarked on her long-postponed dream to build a religious community based on the teachings of St. Joseph Calasanz, to address the needs of children who had been abused or abandoned or who lived in poverty. With the continued support of the congregation's cofounder, Archbishop Zini, Mother Celestina, as she had become known, opened her first school on December 28, 1889.

In 1892 Archbishop Zini died, leaving Mother Celestina to guide the new community. In 1899 she accepted another challenge. Taking responsibility for three girls whose father faced a long imprisonment, Mother Celestina signaled the beginning of a new mission for the congregation: to champion children who, while not actual orphans, had lost all adult guidance and aid, often ending up homeless, hungry, and exploited.

Mother Celestina never wavered in her determination to create a religious community as a way to serve God. As a result of her example and leadership, the Calasanctian Sisters embodied and spread an ethic of charity, particularly toward children victimized by poverty and abandonment. In celebrating her BEATIFICATION at the Cathedral in Florence, Cardinal José Saraiva Martins said that Mother Celestina understood "how to unite contemplation and action" through education, and that she stood as an example of the importance of the individual's contribution to a common goal for the good.

Feast: March 18.

SEE ALSO DIRECTION, SPIRITUAL; ITALY, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; RELIGIOUS (MEN AND WOMEN).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

"Cardinal Sees New Blessed as Light for an Anti-Faith World," Zenit (April 8, 2008), available from http://www.zenit.org/article-22238?l=english (accessed August 10, 2009).

Congregation for the Causes of Saints, "Homilía del Cardenal José Saraiva Martins, C.M.F., en la Misa de Beatificación de Celestina de La Madre De Dios," Vatican Web site, March 30, 2008, available (in Spanish) from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/congregations/csaints/documents/rc_con_csaints_doc_20080330_beatif-donati_sp.html (accessed August 10, 2009).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Bl. Celestina of the Mother of God (1848–1925): Religious, Foundress of the Daughters of the Poor of St Joseph Calasanz," Vatican Web site, March 30, 2008, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/2008/ns_lit_doc_20080330_celestina-donati_en.html (accessed August 10, 2009).

Elizabeth Inserra
Independent Scholar
New York, New York (2010)

CELIBACY, CLERICAL, HISTORY OF

The practice of celibacy (Latin caelebs, unmarried, single) in the Catholic Church, "based on the mystery of Christ," as decreed by VATICAN COUNCIL II in the Presbyterorum ordinis, is the voluntary renunciation of marriage undertaken implicitly or explicitly for the purpose of practicing lifelong perfect CHASTITY. This, as a personal response to a divine call addressed to a particular individual and grounded in the life-long discipleship of Jesus Christ (as a divine-human being) is a uniquely Christian institution, and its history reflects the high IDEALISM of Christian asceticism. As a law, celibacy has been contested from both outside of and within the Church.

Outside Christianity. Celibacy (temporary or lifelong) is known to all major cultures and major religions. It was incumbent upon priests and shamans of pre-Columbian America to practice it. Violating the elaborate Buddhist legislation in this regard results in automatic expulsion from a monastic community. DAOISM holds celibacy in high esteem, even though marriage is favored in relation to the worship of ancestors. In ISLAM the babas practice celibacy. The Hindu concept of YOGA means harnessing energies for a spiritual goal—therefore, Hindus are called upon to practice abstinence before marriage and after their children are raised.

Antiquity and the Old Testament. Among ancient people celibacy, especially celibacy or VIRGINITY practiced by women, was given a sacral value but was not considered to be a way of life. Temporary CONTINENCE was often imposed as a form of corporal purification (lustratio) but only in relation to WORSHIP. Virgins (at any one time there were the six Roman Vestals, each serving for thirty years) were consecrated to a female deity, but perpetual celibacy was not the usual practice. As keepers of the communal hearth, their VIRGINITY was considered essential for the common good of the Roman state. In Sparta those who refused to enter marriage lost civic rights (ἀτιμία) and were given menial tasks. After the time of Camillus (402 BC), Roman bachelors had to pay special taxes (aes uxorium), and during the imperial period, they were deprived of parental inheritance (caducariae leges).

In the Old Testament, sexual acts were considered defiling (Lv 15), even when not sinful. Virginity in a bride was the object of high praise (Dtn 22:14–29), and in practice, a girl who had been violated was unable to find a husband (2 Sm 13:20). But the state of virginity was not to be permanent—to be unmarried and childless was to be the object of SHAME (Gn 30:23; Is 4:1; 54.4; Jgs 11:37–40). Marriage was considered honorable and compulsory for all, and to have many children was viewed as a sign of divine favor (Gn 22:17). Thus, during the time of the Old Testament, virginity as a way of life consecrated to God seems to have been unknown except in the period of the ESSENES. Priests, LEVITES, and Kohens were expected to practice continence before and during their time of service in the temple (Ex 19:15; 1 Sm 21:4f). The emphasis was on "cultic purity" (what is considered clean and unclean as linked with the idea of sin) (Nm 6:2–21; 2 Chr 30:19; 1 Mc 14:36).

The New Testament. In the New Dispensation the New Testament emphasizes the value of lifelong celibacy, especially when considering the higher aspects of MORALITY as a means of worshiping God in "moral purity and blamelessness" (ἁγνεῖα: 1 Tm 4:12; 5:2). This is apparent in the examples of CHRIST (ἁαγνός: 1 Jn 3:3), Mary, and JOHN THE BAPTIST, as well as in the teaching of the Lord. Celibacy is presented as a state of eschatological beatitude, as preparing for and anticipating the consummation of the world in Jesus Christ at his Parousia (second coming of the Lord). Whoever leaves his wife for the sake of heaven is promised eternal life (Lk 18:29). In heaven men will not marry; in this respect they will be like the ANGELS (Lk 20:36; also Mt 22:30 and Mk 12:25, texts that are still more significant for the traditional comparison of angelic life with that of the unmarried life). Prior to beatitude, however, celibacy is a way of consecrating oneself to God if it is accepted freely for the sake of the kingdom of heaven (Mt 19:12, 19). Nevertheless it is a special grace and vocation: "Not all men can receive this PRECEPT, but only those to whom it is given" (Mt 19:11). Celibacy is a personal gift from God to an individual Christian.

PAUL did not underestimate marriage, but, along with the Gnostics, he considered it useless in view of the world's imminent destruction. He was generous in his advice to married Christians by helping them in their special vocation (Col 3:18; 4:1; Eph 5:22; 6:9; 1 Tm 4:3; 5:14). He stated that "it is better to marry than to burn" (1 Cor 7:2–6, 9, 27–28, 36). But he considered marriage, like all created things, as secondary if compared to the life in Christ (1 Cor 7:29–31). With this in mind Paul praised celibacy and virginity as a more perfect state because it is the condition for a more fervent—and indeed "undivided"—consecration to God. This more perfect state avoids earthly concerns, and it prepares Christians for the possession of eschatological goods (1 Cor 7:26–35). The unmarried are able to concentrate only on God while married people must think of each other. Paul's teaching, however, is not a universal sacred law for all Christians. He presented it as a counsel, as a grace or as an individual CHARISM, as a special vocation (1 Cor 7:6–7, 25). This charism, however, does not seem to have been granted to all the leaders of the Pauline churches. Moreover, it is difficult to find a peremptory argument in favor of a universal law in view of 1 Corinthians 9:5 and of the question about the matrimonial status of Peter, of the other apostles, and of the brethren of Christ there cited. The PASTORAL EPISTLES give clear evidence that the Pauline churches were ruled by married episkopoi, presbyteroi, and diakonoi. Ministers of the New Testament were not obliged to celibacy but only to what would traditionally be called boni mores. Duties in this regard were presented in stereotype form (1 Tm 3:2–13; Ti 1:6–9) with emphasis on three points: (1) the bishop should be married only once; (2) the bishop should rule well his own household; and (3) the bishop should keep his children under control and perfectly respectful; for, as Paul asked: If a man cannot rule his own household, how is he to take care of the Church of God?

At the end of the apostolic age (first and second centuries) The Book of Revelation in 14:4 stresses that celibacy is a sign of a higher way of life that points to the Parousia (the Second Coming) (Gal 5:16-24; Rom 7:14; 8:13). It is a particular sign of the divine dwelling in the human body (Rom 8:11; Cor 6:19). There is no gainsaying that Jesus's call to live the evangelical counsels of "OBEDIENCE, chastity, and POVERTY" (cf. Mt 5–7) applies especially to the apostles and their successors.

The Early Church. During the first three or four centuries no law was promulgated prohibiting clerical marriage. Though celibacy was valued it was a matter of choice for bishops, priests, and deacons. Under certain conditions, as shall be evident below, they were permitted to contract marriage and live as married men.

Clerical Marriage Permitted. CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA's (c. 150–c. 215) comment on the Pauline texts stated that marriage, if used properly (as donation of the self to God in Jesus Christ), was a path to SALVATION for all: priests, deacons, and laymen (Stromata 1.3.12; Sources Chrétiennes [SC], 38, 33). The Synod of NEOCAESAREA (c. 314) threatened to defrock priests who married (canon 10). The Synod of Gangra (c. 341) condemned manifestations of false ASCETICISM such as the refusal to attend divine worship celebrated by married priests (c. 4; J.D. Mansi, Sacrorum conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 2:1101). The Apostolic Constitutions (c. 350–380) excommunicated a priest or bishop who left his wife "under pretence of piety" (Sacrorum conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 1:51).

SOCRATES (Ecclesiastical History 1.1.11; Patrologia Graeca [PG] 67:101), SOZOMEN (Ecclesiastical History 1.1.23; PG 67:925), and Gelasius of Cyzicus (Hist. concilii Nicaeni 1.2.32; Sacrorum conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 2:906) all stated that new tendencies at the beginning of the fourth century had tried to prohibit clerical marriage, but until that time individual choice had been the rule. They suggest that when Bishop Hosius (Ossius) of Córdoba (c. 257–357) sought to have the First Council of NICAEA (325) pass a decree requiring celibacy, the Egyptian Bishop PAPHNUTIUS, himself unmarried, protested that such a rule would be difficult and imprudent. He further emphasized that celibacy should be a matter of vocation and personal choice. Research seems to indicate that the Paphnutius episode is legendary (Winkelmann 1968, pp. 145–153).

During this time the Council took measures to prohibit clandestine marriages with consecrated virgins (agapete; see John Chrysostom, Fem. reg., PG 47:513–532; Subintr., PG 47:495–514). Gregory the Elder of Nazianzus (c. 274–374) was bishop of that city when his son and successor, GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS the Younger, was born (c. 330). GREGORY OF NYSSA lived with his wife after his consecration (372)—though the couple decided in favor of abstinence once they had offspring for the sake of greater spiritual benefits, and the succession of GREGORY THE ILLUMINATOR (c. 240–332), the first Catholicos of Armenia, remained in his family for four generations, passing from father to son.

However, there is evidence to show that a great number of clerics in the early Church were unmarried or left the married state after ordination. The testimony of TERTULLIAN (De exhortatione castitatis ch. 13; Patrologia Latina [PL] 2:390) and ORIGEN (In Levit. hom. 6.6; SC 286. 290–297) may be suspect in that both authors were sympathetic to the sect of the Encratites (it may be noted that Origen castrated himself); but many other authors cited by EUSEBIUS (Demonstratio evangelica 1.9; PG 22:81) and Jerome (Adversus vigilantium ch. 2; PL 23:341) testify to clerical renunciation of marriage. During the fourth century most of the bishops in Thessaly, Greece, Macedonia, EGYPT, Italy, and Western Europe were unmarried or left their wives after consecration. But for priests and deacons clerical marriage continued to be accepted. A famous letter of SYNESIUS OF CYRENE (d. c. 414), elected bishop of Ptolemais, is evidence for both the respect of personal decisions in the matter and for the contemporary appreciation of celibacy. He noted that many Egyptian bishops were unmarried. Synesius declared that he would refuse consecration if it meant abandoning his wife and the prospect of rearing many children. He was permitted to retain his status (Epist. 105; PG 66:1485).

Conditions of Clerical Marriage. Legislation concerning the marriage of bishops, priests, and deacons is a valuable source of information for these practices in the early Church. First, it was declared that marriage could precede but not follow ordination. This general rule was applied according to the circumstances of age and person. If a married candidate for major orders had been baptized as an adult (as was the case with many bishops of the period) he may keep his wife; unmarried candidates were free to marry before consecration or to remain unmarried. Other candidates were baptized as children. Ordinarily they became clerics while quite young, and upon ordination as LECTOR or cantor they were permitted to choose between marriage and continence. Thus the Council of Hippo in 393 (Sacrorum conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 3:922) declared that lectors were allowed to function until the age of puberty; "thereafter, however, unless they had married while enjoying a good reputation, or unless they vowed continence, they are not permitted to read." The condition of "good reputation" (custodita pudicitia) was understood to mean that they were chaste. If the young man committed a sin against chastity he could not be accepted into the clerical state without renouncing his right to marry, for according to INNOCENT I (PL 20:477), "any baptized, but defiled [corruptus] person wishing to become a cleric, must promise that he will never marry." The canonical reason for this decision was that the marriage of a corruptus would not have been officially blessed by the Church and would therefore become the object of popular derision. However, monks who became clerics were not permitted to marry even if they were incorrupti (Siricius, Epist. 1; Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 185). Accordingly the practice may be summed up as follows: Generally speaking, marriage was permitted before the diaconate. One exception must be mentioned: In 314 the Council of ANCYRA (c. 10; Sacrorum conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 2:517) permitted deacons to marry after ordination if they had previously declared their intention to marry.

In addition the marriage must be monogamic, in accord with the words of Saint Paul that a bishop be unius uxoris vir (a man of one wife). Even though variously interpreted, these words were given at least one universal application: If a married cleric should lose his wife he was not permitted to marry again. The Apostolic Constitutions (Sacrorum conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 1:462), for example, declared that after ordination bishops, priests, and deacons were neither permitted to contract marriage if they had no previous wife nor to cohabit with anyone else if they already had a wife—they were to be satisfied with the wife they had at ordination. The attitude of the early Church, which looked with disfavor upon second marriages, was a sufficient reason for this law. If second marriages, in general, were considered inexcusable even for allaying the passions of youth, for a cleric they would have been scandalous. More lenient interpretations of this Pauline text, for example that of THEODORET OF CYRUS (PG 82:805), stated that because Saint Paul was aware of the polygamy practiced by both Jews and GENTILES, he was merely reminding clerics of the general law of monogamous Christian marriage. Consequently he forbade only simultaneous polygamy, meaning he did not forbid remarriage after the death of the first spouse. Ordinarily, however, this interpretation was not accepted and monogamy was understood to exclude successive polygamy (remarriage) as well. Second marriages were considered contemptible and without blessing, and a man who had twice been married could not be accepted into the clergy. Later CASUISTRY led many authors to distinguish between marriages contracted before and after baptism. Thus JEROME (Epist. 69, Ad oceanum; PL 22:654) stated that several bishops and priests had been ordained after a second marriage if the first marriage had been performed before baptism. This distinction was no longer admitted after INNOCENT I and LEO I when any man who had been married twice was refused ordination. By extension the same popes refused ordination to a man who had been married only once and whose wife had previously lived with another man either legitimately or illegitimately.

The Eastern Church. During the fourth century, because of the diversity of practice, the Church felt the need for legislation in this field of clerical activity. The growth of monastic influence, moreover, promoted the cause of virginity and celibacy as is evident in the letters and sermons of AMBROSE and Jerome. When the opposition of Jovinian and Vigilantius brought on a reaction to the monastic spirit, the Church was forced to take cognizance and to act decisively. Neoplatonic ideas also were at work. Laws passed in the East and in the West generally followed regional custom. Eastern practices and laws were usually more liberal than those of ROME, Gaul, or Africa, and were codified by THEODOSIUS II and JUSTINIAN I, both Christian emperors who enjoyed great authority in the Church. Urging national custom, both codes forbade bishops to marry; the Justinian code even denied episcopal consecration to the father of a family. However, if the married man was without children, it was possible for him to be consecrated provided he separated from his wife. In all cases unmarried men were preferred for episcopal consecration (Corpus iuris civilis, Codex Iustinianus, ed. P. Krueger 1.3.47 and Nov 6.1; 123.1).

Priests, deacons, and other clerics were permitted to live in marriage that was contracted before ordination but were forbidden to take another wife if the first wife died. If they did so they were to be degraded. The second marriage was judged invalid and the children were considered illegitimate and even incestuous (Corpus iuris civilis, Codex Iustinianus 1.3.44). The Trullan Synod in 692 (see QUINISEXT SYNOD)—never recognized by Rome—passed similar laws. Bishops were to observe absolute continence; if the bishop-elect was married, his wife had to live in a remote monastery (at her husband's expense), but she was allowed to become a DEACONESS.

For all other clerics the Synod permitted marriage before ordination and the use of marriage rights afterward. It further condemned all forms of bigamy. The Synod indirectly criticized Latin marriage legislation: If anyone should attempt to deprive a married priest, deacon, or SUBDEACON of his marriage rights, or if one of the aforesaid should renounce his wife "on the pretense of piety," he was to be condemned and deposed. Several concessions, however, were made to Latin usage: (1) sexual relations were prohibited prior to the celebration of the liturgies (in practice, on Saturday); and (2) a Greek priest was not to have relations with his wife while traveling in barbarian (Latin) countries (cc. 3, 13). No further legislation on celibacy and clerical marriage was issued by the EASTERN CHURCH throughout its history.

Diverse practices developed from these laws both before and after the EASTERN SCHISM, as well as after partial reunions with Rome. In the Byzantine Church and Russian Church, bishops often had been monks; if an unmarried priest was elected bishop, he ordinarily took vows similar to those of a monk before consecration. Many priests, moreover, who were immediate assistants of the bishop, were unmarried. By contrast a priest attached to a country parish was required to marry. If his wife died he was compelled to renounce his office and retire to a monastery. The Coptic Church followed canon ten of the Council of Ancyra in allowing all deacons to marry except those who explicitly promised to live as celibates. Among the Ethiopians and CHALDEANS, priests were permitted to marry after ordination.

The Eastern Catholic Churches, in theory, follow the legislation of the Trullan Synod in AD 692, which has been approved by several popes (CLEMENT III, INNOCENT III, and BENEDICT XIV; cf. Codex canonum ecclesiarum orientalium cc. 180 n. 3, 373, 758 § 3); in practice, however, Latin influence has altered the situation. Priests and deacons of the SYRO-MALABAR CHURCH must remain unmarried; the same is true for the ETHIOPIAN (GE'EZ) CATHOLIC CHURCH except that the bishop may dispense in the matter. The Syrians (1888) and the Copts (1899) demand celibacy except for a convert from ORTHODOXY. Melkite (1849), Maronite (1736), and Armenian priests and deacons (1911), however, may be married before ordination. Nobody preparing for the priesthood may be married in the United States (though some Eastern Rite Catholics wish to change this policy).

Legislation and Practice in the West. Celibacy became a canonical obligation for the clergy in the West through the combined efforts of popes and regional councils. It is the earliest example of general legislation based on the papal authority of DECRETALS and the collaboration between Rome and the bishops acting collectively. Between AD 300 and AD 304 a Spanish council at ELVIRA (near Granada) required absolute continence for all its clergy under pain of deposition (c. 33): "We decree that all bishops, priests, deacons, and all clerics engaged in the ministry are forbidden entirely to live with their wives and to beget children: whoever shall do so will be deposed from the clerical dignity" (Sacrorum conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 2:11; Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 118f, here 119). One of the Spanish bishops, Hosius of Córdoba, who had been present at Elvira, tried in vain for the same decision at the First Council of Nicaea. This legislation, however, did not enter the Western Church until the second half of the fourth century and was effected through the decretals of various popes: DAMASUS I (Ad gallos episcopos, 366–384); SIRICIUS (Ad Himerium Tarraconensem, 385; cf. Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 185; Ad episcopos Africae, 386); Innocent I (Ad vitricium Rothomagensem, 404; Ad exuperium Tolosanum, 405; Ad maximum et severum, 401–417); and Leo I (Ad anastasium thessalonicum, c. 446; Ad rusticum Narbonensem, 458). Councils issued the same decrees for Africa (CARTHAGE, 390, 401–419; cf. cc. 3–4 of 419), France (Orange, 441; Tours, 461), and Italy (Turin, 398). No longer could priests, deacons, and (after Leo I) subdeacons be married.

The first letter of Damasus I (wrongly ascribed to Siricius in PL 13:1181–1196; cf. Clavis patrum n. 1632) gave the classic arguments of the period urging celibacy. How can a cleric advise perfect continence to widows and virgins if he himself does not observe celibacy? Ministers of Christ must obey the Scriptures, which authoritatively require them to be celibate (cf. Rom 8:9; 1 Cor 7:29; Rom 13:14; 1 Cor 7:7).

Marital acts were repugnant to the sacred ministry, and PAGAN and Jewish priests were aware of the necessity of refraining from sexual relations. Saint Paul counseled abstinence for laymen, even though it was their duty to procreate (1 Cor 7:5). The statement of Damasus "that since intercourse is a defilement, surely the priest must undertake his duties with heavenly aid" may appear to favor Encratism (repudiation of marriage and sexuality), but it seems that the pope, alluding to Saint Paul and to the Old Testament, understood defilement (pollutio) to mean a legal impurity and not a sin.

Before ordination, the candidate was required to take a vow of chastity (professio conversionis). This conversio legally placed him in the state of public penitents and the rights of marriage were forbidden. Thus, married candidates were required to promise continence in the legislation of the Councils of ORANGE (441, c. 22), ARLES (c. 450, c. 2; 524, c. 2), and Orléans (537, c. 6). GREGORY I (PL 77:506) made this profession the general rule for the subdiaconate, and the Fourth Council of TOLEDO (663), presided over by ISIDORE OF SEVILLE, decreed this profession for priests and deacons assigned to parishes. In addition, the candidate had to declare under oath before receiving the order of the subdiaconate that he had not committed the four major sins of sodomy, bestiality, adultery, or the violation of consecrated virgins (Ordo Romanus 34; M. Andrieu, Les 'Ordines Romani' du haut moyen-âge, 3:549, 607).

Custom and legislation provided for the status of the wives of clerics. On the day of the husband's ordination, his wife received a special blessing. These wives, known as presbyterissae (presbyterae) and diaconissae (diaconae), wore a distinctive garb and were not permitted to remarry, even after the death of their husbands (Orléans, c. 573, c. 22; Les 'Ordines Romani' du haut moyen-âge 4:140–141). During the time of Leo I, clerics were not obliged to dismiss their wives but could live with them in chastity. In a letter to Bishop Rusticus of Narbonne (c. 427–461), Leo stated that married clerics should not give up their wives but should live together in wedded love without the acts of love so that a spiritual marriage may replace a carnal one (PL 54:1204). Later, after Pope Leo's pontificate, such cohabitation appeared to be difficult and suspicious, and canonical legislation proceeded more cautiously. On the one hand, a bishop was required to provide another household for his wife. Each day she could go to the bishop's house and carefully look after its needs, but she was not to bring her servants, and as a safeguard, the bishop was always to be attended by clerics. On the other hand, a priest was permitted to keep his wife in his home (probably for reasons of economy), but they were not to share a common room (Orléans, 541, c. 17). The ARCHPRIEST was always to be attended, especially at night. His clerics (canonici clerici) or a layman was to sleep in his room. Other priests and deacons slept alone but were expected to provide a female servant who was to sleep in the wife's room to warrant her virtue. Married clerics who disregarded these precautions were branded with the heresy of Nicolaitism (Tours 557, c. 20). Priests were forbidden to have other women in their household, and VIRGINES SUBINTRODUCTAE were especially suspect (Bordeaux, 663, c. 3). In the cities, common sleeping quarters were to be provided for priests and for lesser clerics (Tours, 567, c. 15).

The Gregorian Reform. The period of decline in the Carolingian Empire (814–1046) was also a time of crisis for clerical celibacy. The disorganization of society and the concomitant destruction of churches and monasteries by the NORTHMEN and other invaders of the Empire, and the progressive SECULARIZATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY led to the demoralization of the clergy. Councils in the tenth and eleventh centuries protested against the two chief vices of the clergy: SIMONY and clerical marriage (Nicolaitism). Thus, for example, the Council of Trosly (Soissons, 909) stated that in the monasteries, enclosure had been abandoned and many priests were married. The Synod of Augsburg (952) and the Councils of ANSE (994) and Poitiers (1000) all decreed the law of celibacy. BURCHARD OF WORMS in his Decretum (c. 1110) recalled the ancient law prohibiting the marriage of priests (PL 140:645–646). Around 1018 BENEDICT VIII protested against the current subversion of celibacy and strengthened the legislation of the Church, especially by imposing penalties for offenders. Priests, deacons, and subdeacons were forbidden to marry or to cohabit with a woman. Their children were declared to be serfs of the Church and could not be freed or granted rights of property and inheritance. The purpose of these canons (similar to that, perhaps, of the Justinian Corpus) was to prevent the secularization of ecclesiastical property by the families of priests.

Disorder existed not only in the practice of the period but even in the field of doctrine. Certain arguments that had circulated against celibacy were answered by PETER DAMIAN in his Liber Gomorrhianus and in De coelibatu sacerdotum ad Nicolaum II (PL 145:159–190, 379–388). He in turn was answered by Ulric, Bishop of Imola (c. 1060), in his Rescriptum seu epistola de continentia clericorum (Monumenta Germaniae historica: Libelli de lite [MGH] 1), a pamphlet once attributed to Saint ULRIC OF AUGSBURG and condemned by GREGORY VII (1079). Ulric appealed to the texts of Saint Paul and to the freer practices of the first several centuries, forgetting the power of the Church to initiate new laws. These errors were renewed in the Tractatus pro clericorum connubio, the expanded Norman edition of Ulric's work, and in the An liceat sacerdotibus inire matrimonium (MGH: Libelli de lite 3). These writings claimed that celibacy was a personal vocation, not a canonical state, and that marriage in itself was not evil. In the next century the Goliards appealed to the NATURAL LAW as an argument for greater freedom.

Many popes in the eleventh century proceeded with vigor against these conditions. LEO IX (1049) assigned the wives and concubines of priests to servitude as ancillae to the Lateran Palace. NICHOLAS II (1059) deprived married priests, even in the external forum, of the right to perform liturgical acts of worship, and they were forbidden to live in the presbyterium of the churches. They were also denied all further rights to ecclesiastical prebends. To further his efforts the pope tried to enlist the support of the laity by prohibiting them from attending Mass offered by a married priest or by one who lived in concubinage. Many laymen, indeed, were gravely scandalized by clerical immorality and supported the program of papal reform. And some of them, belonging to the sect of the PATARINES, fell under the influence of MANICHAEISM and became CATHARI.

GREGORY VII issued no new decretals on the subject but energetically applied existing law through the action of his legates and by extensive correspondence with bishops. In a letter to Otto of Constance, the pope summarized his actions and intentions:

> Those who are guilty of the crime of fornication are forbidden to celebrate Mass or to serve the altar if they are in minor orders. We prescribe, moreover, that if they persist in despising our laws, which are, in fact, the laws of the Holy Fathers, the people shall no longer be served by them. For if they will not correct their lives out of love for God and the dignity of their office, they must be brought to their senses by the world's contempt and the reproach of their people. (PL 148:646; "Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum," ed. S. Löwenfeld, 4932)

By his courage and zeal, Gregory must be credited with being the true restorer of sacerdotal celibacy in those disturbed times.

The last stage in the struggle against clerical marriage (considered illicit only in the Western Church) was to declare such marriages invalid. This action was taken at the First and Second LATERAN COUNCILS of 1123 and 1139. In the latter (cc. 6–7; Conciliorum oecumenicorum decreta 174) the impediment of orders was definitively declared to be a diriment impediment. In explaining this decision canonists commonly state that candidates for ordination to the subdiaconate tacitly take the vow of celibacy; thus BONIFACE VIII (Corpus iuris canonici, ed. E. Friedberg, VI; 3.15). This theory recalls similar vows taken in the Merovingian period and in the Russian Church. Other explanations are based on the power of the Church to annul marriages contracted contrary to its laws, or on arguments that clerical marriage is contrary to the divine law (e.g., Sanchez, De sancto matrimonii sacramento 7.27). This latter explanation came up for further discussion at the Council of TRENT.

The Age of the Reformation. By the end of the MIDDLE AGES the Church again experienced a period of decline in clerical morality, occasioned by the BLACK DEATH, the Hundred Years' War, the WESTERN SCHISM, and the pagan spirit of the RENAISSANCE. Most historians of this period point to clerical marriage as a common practice and to the sons of priests who were legitimated and, as in the case of ERASMUS, even ordained to the priesthood with a dispensation from the Roman CURIA (at the cost of 12 gros tournois). In his Commentary on the Galatians (4.30; 1535), LUTHER stated that his movement would have made little headway against the PAPACY if clerical celibacy had been observed then as it was in the time of Jerome, Ambrose, and Augustine; that "celibacy was something remarkable in the eyes of the world, a thing that makes a man angelic."

At the time of his break with the Church (1517) Luther did not promote sacerdotal marriage, and in a letter dated January 17, 1522, he refused to encourage it. But by the end of that year he condemned celibacy in his De votis monasticis, and in April 1523 he officiated and preached at the wedding of Wenzeslaus Link, the late vicar general of the AUGUSTINIANS. Finally, Luther himself was married on the evening of June 13, 1525, to the SCANDAL of many of his friends and the applause of many married priests of his day. Luther then attempted a doctrinal justification based on the authority of the Pauline texts, denial of the Church's authority to issue new laws (he burned the books of canon law in 1530 declaring them the work of the DEVIL), denial of the Sacrament of HOLY ORDERS, the futility of good works, and the necessity of marriage for fallen nature (cf. Luther, Werke 6:442, 550; 8:654; 10.2:276). CALVIN was perhaps less radical than Luther. While requiring marriage as the general rule, Calvin admitted (commenting on Mt 19.12 and 1 Cor 7) that celibacy may be an acceptable means of serving God. But he claimed that celibacy as a personal vocation cannot be judged as being greater in value than the common way of life. The Geneva reformer protested against the despising of marriage, found in the writing of Saint Jerome, and, in his opinion, in the average treatise on theology (cf. Calvin, Commentaires sur le Nouveau Testament 1561; Mt 19 and 1 Tm 4.3).

The Council of Trent. Opposition to the Protestant position voiced by popes, bishops, priests, and kings failed to agree on the methods to be used or on the nature of true reformation within the Church. Several of the princes, including Emperor Ferdinand I (c. 1503–1564), thought it opportune to grant Germany a married priesthood as well as COMMUNION UNDER BOTH SPECIES (bread and wine). Duke Albert V of Bavaria (c. 1528–1579) suggested that only married men be ordained and that the Church be indulgent to priests who sinned. According to L. von Pastor (1854–1928), PIUS IV did not altogether refuse to examine the matter, but distinguished the possibility of practical and individual grants of dispensation (such as were given later in the case of the UTRAQUISTS) from the general problem, which was submitted to the Council of Trent.

In its twenty-fourth session the Council studied these questions along with others related to marriage. On February 2, 1563, the cardinal of Mantua presented the theologians with a list of Protestant theses for their examination. Here were found the statements equating virginity and marriage (No. 5) (C.J. von Hefele, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, translated and continued by H. Leclercq, 10:507; Concilium tridentinum. Dariorum, actorum, epistularum, tractatuum nova collectio, ed. Görres-Gesellschaft, 9:376) as well as the legitimacy of marriage for priests in the Latin Church and for anyone who has not received the grace of perfect chastity; otherwise marriage would be degraded (No. 6). Discussion of No. 5 was neither difficult nor protracted. Theologians brought arguments to bear from Matthew 19 and 1 Corinthians 7 as well as from the FATHERS OF THE CHURCH and the example of the Blessed Virgin, leading to the definition of the superiority—objectively speaking—of virginity dedicated to God (sess. 24; c. 10; Conciliorum oecumeniocorum decreta 731; Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 1810). From a psychological point of view, for those who are not called to celibacy a vow is neither proposed nor advised as something better. Many opponents of the Council's definition, both then and now, forget this distinction. To understand the thinking and mindset of the fathers of the Council of Trent, also called Tridentine Council, in Latin "Concilium Tridentinum," reference must be made to 1 Corinthians 7: The Council did not go beyond the words of Saint Paul.

Discussions on sacerdotal celibacy were longer and of greater importance. In general, theologians and canonists expressed opinions that were more severe than canon 9, which was finally voted in by the Fathers of the Council. The Council cited texts from Scripture (1 Cor 7:5, 33), the Fathers of the Church (e.g., Jerome), and various papal decretals, concerning the suitability of celibacy to the sacerdotal vocation. First, it was argued that celibacy is the condition for God's service in the apostolate. A married minister of religion is too preoccupied with his wife and family to give such service. Secondly, the priesthood, even in the Old Testament, requires a form of sanctity that implies the curbing of carnal desires. In the Old Testament, priests were obliged only to a limited time of worship; but now they were totally consecrated to God. These arguments were presented by Jean Peletier, Jean de Lobera, Claude de Sainctes, and Miguel de Medina. Two opposing views were introduced regarding the nature of the obligation and the possibility of general or individual dispensation. The more rigid view, expressed by de Sainctes and de Lobera, claimed that marriage and the priesthood were incompatible. While good in itself marriage nevertheless rendered one unfit for the ministry. Consequently, celibacy for the priest was a duty based on divine law. Because the Sacrament of Holy Orders obliged the candidate to celibacy as baptism did to the Christian life, a vow was unnecessary.

Council of Trent. Considered one of the most important and influential of the Ecumenical Councils, Trent decided the question of clerical celibacy for the Catholic Church. © DAVID LEES/ CORBIS

Such views were difficult to reconcile with historical evidence, and de Sainctes was content to gloss over such evidence. For him, the early Church had always required celibacy—only the Trullan Synod had permitted marriage for incontinent Greek priests, and Rome had tolerated its decision in order to avoid greater evil. But this was not a true dispensation, for none could be given by the pope.

Fortunately, some theologians were both better informed in the past and better informed by history, and proposed more realistic views. The majority claimed that clerical celibacy was required by ecclesiastical law (Jean Peletier, Antonius Solisius, Richard du Pre, Lazaruss Broychot, Francisco Foriero Ferdinand Tritius, John de Ludegna, and Sanctes Cinthius). In their opinion a priest was unable to contract marriage either by the will of the Church or by reason of an implicit vow involved in ordination to the subdiaconate. Despite the suitability of celibacy to the sacerdotal state, the pope may fundamentally dispense from the law, or as some thought, at least dispense from the vow. At length the debate was resolved into the question of whether it was opportune to dispense priests at that time. The Portuguese Dominican, Francisco Foriero, argued in the affirmative by stating that the Church may allow clerical marriage for such grave reasons as combating SCHISM or heresy in a particular country. Three other Dominicans, John Valdina, Cinthius, and de Ludegna, and the Franciscan Lucius Angusiola, agreed with this opinion. Others, however, such as Broychot and Tritius, denied the utility and PRUDENCE of such a dispensation.

In voting to accept canon 9 (Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 1809), the Council rejected the opinion that celibacy was of divine law. The canon taught, first, that the Church had the right to prohibit and invalidate sacerdotal marriage by reason of vow or of ecclesiastical law. If the Church should change its legislation or not require the vow, priests would not be obliged to celibacy. Thus, the canon did not distinguish between the Eastern and the Western Church; the fundamental law was the same for both. Secondly, the Church taught that in holding sacerdotal celibacy in such high regard, it wished in no way to minimize its regard for marriage. Both vocations were distinct and each had its distinctive obligations. Thirdly, the Council rejected the claim of those priests who held that celibacy was impossible. Because priests had accepted celibacy by vow they should implore the grace of God, which would be sufficient to reinforce them in their resolve. Therefore, the Church implicitly refused to grant a dispensation for the clergy of Germany.

Celibacy's Prophetic Nature. Johann Adam MÖHLER's (1796–1838) systematic analysis of Church history ties Church life and libertas ecclesiae to the deliberate practice of celibacy. The celibate clergy preserves the faith's integrity in relation to political, social, cultural, and other instrumentalizations (Mk 12: 17). It is testimony to JESUS CHRIST's "spirit amongst his people...who had been poor, celibate and obedient." The magnanimity (see Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae 2a-2ae, q. 129, a. 3) to which Christ's example impels all Christians is lived for by the celibate clergy for the benefit of the people of God. Over and against NATURALISM and MATERIALISM, and hedonism, it symbolizes the world's ephemerality, and expresses the world's yearning for its completion in Christ's eternity. Thereby it overcomes a naïve sense of autonomy, constantly reminding everyone of the need for grace. Möhler significantly emphasizes the common root of both matrimony and celibacy in supernatural grace. Both are essential and necessary for the Catholic Church and reciprocally related to one another.

Special Consecration to Christ. The primary motive for priestly celibacy in the eyes of Vatican Council II is special consecration to Christ. The comments on priestly celibacy had been numerous and at times heated, although Pope VI had considered public discussion of this topic inopportune. A Brazilian intervention on behalf of viri probati was rejected, thereby affirming implicitly the constitutive import of the charism of celibacy for the Church as mystical body of Christ. While celibacy is not an essential mark of priesthood, it is the Father's personal "precious gift" (Presbyterorum Ordinis [PO] 16; Mt 19:12) and spiritually most fitting to a priest. The justification of celibacy is theological in nature. The total consecration to and imitation of Christ's priesthood has as consequence: (1) greater freedom (to live in God's presence); and therefore, (2) the ability of complete devotion to the people of God entrusted in their care. Consecration to Christ enables living the attendant mission, imparting supernatural life from Christ in the power of the Holy Spirit to the people of God entrusted in their care. Though acutely aware of numerous questions regarding celibacy, the assembly voted 2394 to 4 in favor of the decree.

Since Peter Brown's study in 1988, research reveals the high esteem held for priestly celibacy by the early Church ab initio. Nevertheless, in the early Church and in the East the marriage of bishops, priests, and deacons was permitted for good reason. Since the nineteenth century, popes have found similarly good reason to dispense from celibacy in the case of married Protestant and Anglican pastors who have converted and desire ordination. At the request of bishops from many countries Vatican Council II permitted a married diaconate, to which it admitted married men of mature years (Lumen gentium [LG] 29). Both the Council of Trent (Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 1810) and Vatican Council II (LG 44) affirm the close relationship between celibacy/virginity and marriage—chastity being the common foundation. The one thrives on the credible testimony of the other. All evangelical counsels are at the service of the total Church (PO 15-17). Hattrup points out celibacy's relevance in helping society combat the ecological crisis, consumerism, and hedonism (cf. Hattrup in Möhler 1828, pp. 145–163). Already the Council of CARTHAGE (390) held celibacy to be "taught by the Apostles" and "maintained by antiquity." To this day this is the understanding of all Christian denominations standing in apostolic succession. In contradistinction to JUDAISM and Greco-Roman culture, the rationale for Christian celibacy does not lie first and foremost in cultic purity. As Paul VI (1967) emphasized, celibacy has a Christological foundation and both ecclesiological and eschatological significance. It supports the priest "in his exclusive, definitive and total choice of the unique and supreme love of Christ and of the Church" (Sacerdotalis caelibatus, AAS 59 (1967) 657–697, n. 14). The general theological opinion gradually evolving since the 1980s among scholars may be summed up as follows: Far from a human achievement, as God's free gift (donum), clerical celibacy is considered most proper to the sacerdotal ministry; it is in no sense a depreciation of marriage but the condition for greater freedom of all Christians in the service of God (PO 16). JOHN PAUL II spoke of an "evangelical radicalism" that expresses itself in the evangelical counsels "which Jesus proposes in the Sermon on the Mount, and among them the intimately related counsels of obedience, chastity and poverty. The priest is called to live these counsels" (Pastores dabo vobis [PDV], AAS (1992) 657–804, n. 27). By becoming of like mind with Jesus, the priest can imitate his spiritual fecundity (LG 42) and become "a total gift of self for the flock" (PDV 15). The law of celibacy is of ecclesiastical origin and therefore disciplinary in nature (Codex iuris canonici, c. 277 § 1). The fact that it can, in theory only, be abrogated by the Church, calls for the constant re-affirmation and defense of its practice. The spiritual fecundity of celibacy is constitutive for the Church and Christianity in the sense that without it the two would evaporate into nothing. Therefore, it is the ennobling (i.e., Christifying) task of all—clergy and laity alike—to encourage, support and pray constantly for the charisma of celibacy as God's gift to some individual Christians.

SEE ALSO APOSTLE; BUDDHISM; BYZANTINE CHURCH, HISTORY OF; COUNCILS, GENERAL (ECUMENICAL), HISTORY OF; COUNCILS, GENERAL (ECUMENICAL), THEOLOGY OF; DECRETALISTS; DECRETALS; GREGORIAN REFORM; MEROVINGIANS; PAROUSIA; PRIESTHOOD IN CHRISTIAN TRADITION; TRIDENTINE MASS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Elizabeth Abbott, A History of Celibacy (New York 2000).

Andre Bieler, "L'homme et la femme dans la morale calviniste," translated and adapted by Louis F. Hartman (New York 1963) from A. van den Born's Bijbels woordenboek I 2548–2549.

Peter Brown, The Body and Society: Men, Women, and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity (New York 1988).

Roman Cholij, Clerical Celibacy in East and West (Herefordshire, U.K. 1989).

John Chrysostom, Les cohabitations suspectes: Comment observer la virginité, edited and translated by Jean Dumortier (Paris 1955).

Christian Cochini, The Apostolic Origins of Priestly Celibacy (San Francisco 1990).

Philippe Delhaye, "Le dossier anti-matrimonial de l'Adversus Jovinianum et son influence sur quelques écrits latins du XII^{e} siècle," Medieval Studies 13 (1951): 65–86.

Heinrich Denzinger and Peter Hünermann, Enchiridion symbolorum definitionum et declarationum de rebus fidei et morum 40th ed. (Freiburg, Germany 2005).

Augustin Fliche, La réforme grégorienne, 3 vols. (Louvain, Belgium 1924–1937).

Michael Frassetto, ed., Medieval Purity and Piety: Essays on Medieval Clerical Celibacy and Religious Reform (New York 1998).

Emil Friedberg, ed., Corpus iuris canonici, VI (Leipzig 1881), 3.15.

Stefan Heid, Celibacy in the Early Church: The Beginnings of a Discipline of Obligatory Continence for Clerics in East and West, translated by Michael J. Miller (San Francisco 2000).

Paul Henri Lafontaine, Les conditions positives de l'accession aux ordres dans la première législation ecclésiastique (Ottawa 1963), 300–492.

Henry Charles Lea, History of Sacerdotal Celibacy in the Christian Church, 2 vols. (3rd ed. London 1907).

Gabriel Le Bras, "Mariage, III., La Doctrine du Mariage chez les Canonistes depuis l'an mille" in Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, edited by A. Vacant et al. (Paris 1927), 9.2:2123–2317.

Henri Leclercq, "Célibat" in Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. Cabrol, H. Leclercq, and H.I. Marrou, 15 vols. (Paris 1907–1951), 2.2:2802–2832.

Giovan Domenico Mansi, ed. Sacrorum conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio (Paris 1901–1927), 2:1101.

J.P. Migne, "Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum," in Patrologia Graeca edited by S. Löwenfeld (Paris 1857–1866), 148:646, 4932.

Johann A. Möhler, The Spirit of Celibacy (originally 1828, English: Mundelein 2007, with extensive commentary by Dieter Hattrup, pp. 97–163).

Robert A. Pesarchick, The Trinitarian Foundation of Human Sexuality as Revealed by Christ According to H.U. von Balthasar (Rome 2000).

Igance de la Potterie, "'Mari d'une seule femme'. Le sens théologique d'une formule Paulinienne." in Paul de Tarse: Apôtre de notre temps, edited by L. De Lorenzi (Rome 1979), 619–638.

Pierre Renard, "Célibat," in Dictionnaire de la Bible edited by F. Vigouroux, 5 vols. (Paris 1895–1912), 2.1:394–396.

Francesco Spadafora, Temi di esegesi (1 Cor 7.32–38) e el cilibato ecclesiastico (Rovigo, Italy 1953).

Ceslas Spicq, Les épîtres pastorales de Saint Paul (Paris 1947).

Elphège Vacandard, "Célibat ecclesiastique," in Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, edited by A. Vacant et al., 15 vols. (Paris 1903–1950), 2.2:2068–2088.

Elphège Vacandard, "Les origines du célibat ecclésiastique," in Études de critique et d'histoire religieuse (Paris 1905).

Paul van Imschoot, Théologie de l'Ancien Testament, 2 vols. (Tournai, Belgium 1954–1956).

Vatican Council II, Lumen gentium, On the Church (Dogmatic Constitution, December 7, 2008), available from http://www.vatican.va/archive/hist_councils/ii_vatican_council/documents/vat-ii_const_19641121_lumen-gentium_en.html (accessed March 7, 2008).

Vatican Council II, Presbyterorum ordinis, On the Ministry and Life of Priests (Decree, December 7, 2008), available from http://www.vatican.va/archive/hist_councils/ii_vatican_ council/documents/vat-ii_decree_19651207_presbyterorum-ordinis_en.html (accessed March 7, 2008).

Charles Joseph von Hefele, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux in Concilium tridentinum. Diariorum, actorum, epistularum, tractatuum nova collectio, translated and continued by H. Leclercq, 10:507, edited by Görres-Gesellschaft (Paris 1907–1949), 9:376.

Martin Weitz, Der Zölibat des Weltpriesters zwischen Ideologie und Theologie (Hamburg, Germany 1998).

Friedhelm Winkelmann, "Paphnutios, der Bekenner und Bischof," in Probleme der koptischen Literatur, edited by P. Nagel (Halle, Germany 1968), 145–153.

D.F. Wright, "Sexuality, Sexual Ethics," in Dictionary of Paul and His Letters, edited by Gerald R. Hawthorne, Ralph R. Martin, and Daniel G. Reid (Downers Grove, Ill. 1993), 871–875.

Philippe Charles Delhaye
Professor of Moral Theology, Faculty of Theology of Lille, France
Visiting Professor, University of Montreal, Canada

Rev. Emery de Gaal
Associate Professor of Systematic Theology
University of St. Mary of the Lake (2010)

CENTURIONE BRACELLI, VIRGINIA, ST.

Foundress of the Brignoline Sisters; b. April 2, 1587, Genoa, Italy; d. December 15, 1651, Genoa; beatified September 22, 1985; canonized May 18, 2003, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

Virginia Centurione Bracelli was born into a noble family in Genoa. At age fifteen, despite her longing for the cloistered life, Virginia complied with the wish of her father, the doge of Genoa, and married Gasparo Grimaldi Bracelli. At twenty years old, she was left a widow with two daughters. She pronounced her vows of CHASTITY, devoting herself to prayer, and took to the education of her children while living with her mother-in-law. During a famine, she opened her palace, which she called Santa Maria del Refugio dei Tribolati, to abandoned children and those in distress. In 1619 the women who worked with her in the apostolate bound themselves by a solemn promise of perseverance to a common life under the Franciscan rule.

After the death of her mother-in-law in 1625, Virginia sought out the poor and troubled in the streets to help those in need. The Daughters of Our Lady of Mount Calvary, known as the Brignoline Sisters, opened their second house in 1641 through the munificence of the Marquess Emmanuele Brignole and soon spread throughout northern Italy. Virginia instituted the forty-hours devotion in 1642 in Genoa. In her later years, as her health declined, she received many mystical gifts, including inner locutions and visions. She died on December 15, 1651.

The sisters were invited to Rome in 1815 and moved the motherhouse to the Esquiline Hill near St. Norbert's Church in 1833. In addition to founding the Brignolines, Mother Virginia organized a group to maintain Genoa's Madonnette, about nine hundred sacred images of the Virgin Mary recessed into the outer walls of guild halls and houses throughout the city.

Virginia was beatified at Genoa by Pope John Paul II on September 22, 1985. During her canonization in Rome on May 18, 2003, the pope observed that, in her love, St. Virginia continues her influence into the present. The pope spoke of how Virginia encouraged others to make God their only goal, and in doing so, "all disagreements are smoothed out, all difficulties overcome," as she was known to say. Virginia loved in the way the Apostle John described in his first letter: "with deeds and in truth" (1 Jn 3:8). The pope further noted that she was truly "in love with Christ" and ready to make her life a gift to others for his sake: "Disregarding her noble origins, she devoted herself to assisting the lowliest with extraordinary apostolic zeal. The effectiveness of her apostolate stemmed from her unconditional adherence to God's will, which was nourished by ceaseless contemplation of, and obedient listening to, the word of the Lord."

Feast: December 15.

SEE ALSO RELIGIOUS (MEN AND WOMEN).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Acta Apostolicae Sedis 78 (1986): 968–971.

John Paul II, "Canonization of Four New Saints" (Homily, May 18, 2003), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/homilies/2003/documents/hf_jp-ii_hom_20030518_canoniz_en.html (accessed November 9, 2009).

Riccardo Magaglio, Una patrizia genovese antesignana della moderna assistenza sociale: Cenni biografici sulla serva di Dio Virginia Centurione Bracelli (1587–1651) nel centenario della sua traslazione dal Convento di Brignole alla Chiesa del conservatorio di Marassi (1872–1972) (Genoa, Italy 1972).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Widower Virginia Centurione Bracelli (1587–1651)," Vatican Web site, May 18, 2003, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_lit_doc_20030518_bracelli_en.html (accessed November 9, 2009).

L'Osservatore Romano, English edition 40 (1985): 5, 8.

Katherine I. Rabenstein
Senior Credentialing Specialist
American Nurses Association, Washington, D.C.

Kevin M. Clarke
Teacher of Religion
St. Joseph Academy, San Marcos, California (2010)

CERIOLI, PAOLA ELISABETTA (COSTANZA), ST.

Baptized Costanza Cerioli, known in religion as Paola Elisabetta; religious foundress; b. January 28, 1816, Soncino (Cremona), Italy; d. December 24, 1865, Comonte di Seriate (Bergamo); beatified by Pope Pius XII, March 19, 1950; canonized by Pope John Paul II, May 16, 2004.

Costanza Cerioli was the youngest of sixteen children born to the wealthy Count Francesco Cerioli. After attending the school run by the Visitandines in Bergamo (1826–1832), she assented to an arranged marriage with the sexagenarian Gaetano Buzecchi Tassis, a noble and wealthy widower on April 30, 1835. The disparity in age and spiritual outlook between wife and husband, the latter's ill health and uneven temperament, and the deaths of two of their children in infancy were trials that Costanza bore patiently. She finally endured the loss of her teenage son Carlo and her husband in the same year (1854).

Gaetano's widow dedicated her wealth and energies to works of charity. She began caring for rural orphan girls in her home. As the number of children grew, she kept increasing the number of persons who supervised their formation.

Costanza founded the Institute of the Sisters of the Holy Family of Bergamo (December 8, 1857) to promote the dignity of these agrarian children, and she took Paola Elisabetta as her name in religion. Her devotion to the Holy Family animated her efforts, and in her Direttorio she offered this model of "humility, simplicity, poverty, and love of work" to her community (Proemio). To care for orphaned boys, she founded, with the help of Giovanni Capponi, the Brothers of the Holy Family (November 4, 1863). In her final three years, she witnessed the establishment of Holy Family schools in Soncino and Leffe (Bergamo).

The cause for her beatification and canonization was opened in 1902, shortly after the VATICAN had approved the rules she had written for her congregations. Pope PIUS XII confirmed her heroic virtues (July 2, 1939) and later ratified two miracles attributed to her intercession (November 27, 1949), thus paving the way for her beatification on March 19, 1950. In 2000 the postulator of her cause alleged that Sister Michelina Rota had been cured through the Blessed's intervention from a malignant tumor that had spread to her liver and right kidney. The Congregation for the Causes of Saints affirmed that this healing was miraculous, and Pope JOHN PAUL II ratified this ruling (December 20, 2003). He canonized Paola Elisabetta at Vatican City on May 16, 2004. In his homily, the pope offered her to the Church as a teacher and example of contemplative faith and the practice of Christian values that strengthen family bonds and yield abundant spiritual fruit.

Feast: December 24.

SEE ALSO RELIGIOUS (MEN AND WOMEN).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

"Bd Paula Cerioli," in Alban Butler, Butler's Lives of the Saints, new full ed., edited by Paul Burns (Collegeville, Minn. 1999), 12:189–190.

Paola Elisabetta Cerioli, Direttorio dell'Istituto delle Suore della Sacra Famiglia di Bergamo (Rome 1906).

Emidio Federici, Beata Paola Elisabetta Cerioli, vedova Buzecchi-Tassis (Comonte di Seriate 1950).

Ferdinand Holböck, "Blessed Paula Cerioli and Gaetano Buzecchi-Tassis," in Married Saints and Blesseds: Through the Centuries, translated by Michael J. Miller (San Francisco 2002), 397–400.

John Paul II, "Cappella Papale per la Canonizzazione di 6 Beati," (Homily, May 16, 2004), Vatican Web site, available (in Italian) from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/homilies/2004/documents/hf_jp-ii_hom_20040516_canonizations_it.html (accessed October 16, 2009).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Paola Elisabetta Cerioli (1816–1865)," Vatican Web site, May 16, 2004, available (in Italian) from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_lit_doc_20040516_cerioli_it.html (accessed October 16, 2009).

Rev. Vincent Lapomarda SJ
Coordinator, Holocaust Collection, Department of History
College of the Holy Cross, Worcester, Mass.

Mark J. DeCelles
Doctoral candidate, School of Theology and Religious Studies
The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.
(2010)

CHAPPOTIN DE NEUVILLE, HÉLÈNE DE, BL.

Foundress of the Franciscan Missionaries of Mary; b. Nantes, France, May 21, 1839; d. San Remo, Italy, November 15, 1904; beatified October 20, 2002, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

Hélène de Chappotin de Neuville, the daughter of Sophie Caroline (du Fort) and Paul Charles Chappotin, displayed an interest in missions at a young age. In December 1860, she entered the POOR CLARES, and a month later felt God's call to offer herself up "to be crucified in place of the Holy Father." Soon after, she fell ill, requiring her to leave the convent. After her recovery in 1864, she entered the Society of Mary Reparatrix and took the name Mary of the Passion. From 1865 to 1876, she labored in the Madura missions of India, and was appointed provincial superior at the age of twenty-nine. In 1877 Pope PIUS IX authorized her to found the Institute of Missionaries of Mary. Inspired by a calling to the Franciscan way of life she had felt twenty-two years earlier, she was received into the third order of Franciscans in 1882, and her institute became the Franciscan Missionaries of Mary. On May 11, 1896, she received final approbation of the constitutions for her order from the HOLY SEE.

While serving as a superior and later as foundress of a new order, Mary of the Passion suffered through dissension and continual opposition, even to the point of being temporarily deposed from her position as superior of the institute. While enduring these and other trials, such as poverty and poor health, she encouraged her sisters to "stand up and walk! I beg you, walk in the footsteps of Jesus!" Her zeal for missionary work was fueled by a rich contemplative life, wherein she drew strength from "the great missionary," Jesus in the Eucharist. Seven members of the Franciscan Missionaries of Mary were martyred in 1900 in China, and were canonized on October 1, 2000, during the Great Jubilee year.

Mother Mary of the Passion's cause for beatification was introduced in 1923. On March 5, 2002, the Church attributed to her INTERCESSION the miracle of the healing of a religious who suffered from "pulmonary and vertebral TBC, Pott's Disease." At her BEATIFICATION on October 20, 2002, Pope John Paul II noted Mary of the Passion's deep commitment to social justice through "the promotion of women and everyone belonging to an inferior social class."

At the time of her death in 1904, the Franciscan Missionaries of Mary had almost three thousand religious and eighty-six houses on four continents. Today, the missions continue with more than seven thousand sisters located on six continents.

Feast: November 15.

SEE ALSO FRANCISCANS, THIRD ORDER REGULAR; MISSION AND MISSIONS; RELIGIOUS (MEN AND WOMEN).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

THOMAS F. CULLEN, Mother Mary of the Passion, ABRIDGED ED. (NORTH PROVIDENCE, R.I. 1942).

Dom Antoine Marie, "Life of Blessed Mary of the Passion (Helene de Chappotin)," March 21, 2007, Abbey Saint-Joseph de Clairval Web site, available from http://www.clairval.com/lettres/en/2007/03/21/2210307.htm (accessed October 23, 2009).

Franciscan Missionaries of Mary in the World, "Where Are We?" available from http://www.fmm.org/eng/cap06_where-are-we-eng.htm (accessed October 23, 2009).

George Goyau, Valiant Women: Mother Mary of the Passion and the Franciscan Missionaries of Mary, translated by George Telford (London 1936).

John Paul II, "Cappella Papale for the Beatification of 6 Servants of God," (Homily, October 20, 2002), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/homilies/2002/documents/hf_jp-ii_hom_20021020_beatification_en.html (accessed November 23, 2009).

John Paul II, "Litterae Apostolicae Unus [...] Deus," October 20, 2002, Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/apost_letters/2002/documents/hf_jp-ii_apl_20021020_unus-deus_lt.html (accessed October 22, 2009).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Mary of the Passion (1839–1904), Foundress of the Franciscan Missionaries of Mary," Vatican Web site, October 20, 2002, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_lit_doc_20021020_marie-passion_en.html (accessed October 23, 2009).

Kimberly Henkel
Ph.D. Candidate,
School of Theology and Religious Studies
The Catholic University of America (2010)

CHARISM

The word charism (from Gr. χάρισμα) denotes a gift freely and graciously given, a favor bestowed, a grace. In its technical meaning, a charism is a spiritual gift or talent granted to someone by God for "building up the body of Christ" (Eph 4:12, all references RSV unless otherwise noted). This article will examine first the biblical understanding of charism, and then the experience and theology of charisms in the history of the Church.

IN THE BIBLE

The Greek word charisma occurs seventeen times in the New Testament, principally in Romans and 1 Corinthians. Although it is sometimes employed in a general sense of a "free gift" from God in reference to justification (Rom 6:23), state of life (1 Cor 7:7), or other blessings, this article will focus on charism in the technical sense defined above, taking into account other biblical terms used to refer to the same reality (e.g., 1 Cor 12:4–7; Eph 4:7).

The longest and most important treatment of charisms occurs in 1 Corinthians 12–14 in the context of instructions about liturgical practice (1 Cor 8–14). Here Saint Paul makes clear that the goal and criterion for determining the proper use of spiritual gifts is that they "build up" the Church and its members and advance its mission (1 Cor 14:7–26). For this reason, Paul ranks the intelligible charisms of prophecy and teaching over speaking in tongues. According to Paul, the diversity of charisms found among the members of the Church must be understood in the context of the oneness of the body of Christ (1 Cor 12:12–26; Rom 12:4–8). Each member is equally necessary and important, although a hierarchy of charisms exists (1 Cor 12:28–30). The diversity of "gifts," "services," and "working" derives its unity from the same Spirit, same Lord, and same God (1 Cor 12:4–6).

The New Testament provides a few lists of charisms, each of which is somewhat different, suggesting the variety of ways that the Holy Spirit works through members of the body of Christ. The most extensive list is found in 1 Corinthians 12:8–10. There the "utterance of wisdom" and "utterance of knowledge" refer to graces given by the Spirit to preach or teach the faith with particular fruitfulness. "Faith" refers to a special inner assurance from the Spirit about God's will that enables someone to accomplish a marvelous work; it is the kind of faith that Jesus said can move a mountain (Mk 11:22–24; 1 Cor 13:2). Although all believers are empowered to pray for the sick (Mk 16:18), "gifts of healing" make some individuals particularly effective in this ministry. The "working of miracles" along with other extraordinary charisms lends credibility to the preaching of the Gospel (Acts 2:43, 5:12, 6:8; 1 Cor 14:24–25; 2 Cor 12:12; Heb 2:4). "Discernment of spirits" equips someone to recognize whether a particular spiritual phenomenon comes from God, from the evil one, or from a merely human source.

The remaining three charisms listed in 1 Corinthians 12:10—prophecy, speaking in tongues (glossolalia), and the interpretation of tongues—are explained more fully in 1 Corinthians 14. Prophecy and tongues also appear in Acts, where these forms of inspired speech indicate reception of the Spirit and are associated with Christian initiation (Acts 10:44–48; 19:5–6). Acts depicts these charismatic manifestations as fulfilling the promise of the Holy Spirit given by the prophets (Acts 2:4–18), John the Baptist (Lk 3:16), and Jesus himself (Lk 24:49; Acts 4:5). Paul regards speaking in "tongues"—human and angelic languages (1 Cor 13:1) that are not understood by the speaker or listeners (1 Cor 14:3, 14)—as a desirable grace for personal prayer, because "whoever speaks in tongues builds up himself" (14:4; see also Rom 8:26–27). He goes so far as to say, "I want you all to speak in tongues," and "I thank God that I speak in tongues more than you all" (14:18). Nevertheless, Paul regards speaking in tongues as inappropriate for addressing gatherings of the community unless someone with the charism of interpretation explains the message. Instead, Paul urges his readers to "earnestly desire ... that you may prophesy" (14:1; also v. 5), to exercise the charism of speaking under the immediate inspiration of the Spirit, sometimes directly in God's name (e.g., Acts 13:1–2). Although New Testament prophecy sometimes is predictive (Acts 11:27–29) or entails supernatural knowledge (1 Cor 14:24–25), it also takes the form of inspired praise (Lk 1:67) or exhortation (Acts 15:32). According to Paul, "those who prophesy speak to other people for their upbuilding and encouragement and consolation" (1 Cor 14:3, NRSV). Nevertheless, prophecy is imperfect (1 Cor 13:9–10), belongs to the present age, and must be subjected to discernment (1 Cor 14:29; 1 Thes 5:19–22).

At the center of Paul's discourse on charisms in 1 Corinthians 12–14 is his eloquent hymn about charity in chapter 13. Paul's point is that even the greatest charisms that come from the Holy Spirit are means of building up the Church and are of only passing value. In contrast, faith, hope, and love remain and are the ends that the charisms must serve. He concludes by recommending both love and charisms, but prioritizes love: "Make love your aim, and earnestly desire spiritual gifts" (1 Cor 14.1).

Paul's list of charisms in Romans 12:6–8 speaks less of obviously supernatural workings of the Spirit. Apart from prophecy, this list identifies charisms as ordinary human activities that take on a superior character when they are anointed by the Spirit: service, teaching, exhorting, contributing, leading, and performing acts of mercy. The charisms mentioned in 1 Peter 2:10–11 include only speaking "as one who utters oracles of God," and serving "by the strength which God supplies."

Although Ephesians 4:7–16 affirms that charisms are given to all (v. 7) and that it is vital that each person exercise his or her role in the body (v. 16), this passage emphasizes Christ's giving certain individuals to the Church for special leadership roles, "that some should be apostles, some prophets, some evangelists, some pastors and teachers" (v. 11). The task of these charismatically endowed individuals is "to equip the saints for the work of ministry" (v. 12)—in other words, to guide all the members of the Church into fruitful roles of service. The goal is that the Church be brought to unity, maturity, and stability in faith and love (v. 13–16). Finally, 1 Timothy 4:14 and 2 Timothy 1:6 use the word charism to refer to a spiritual endowment received through the laying on of hands—that is, through ordination.

Changing Understandings of Charisms. The Acts of the Apostles and the letters of the New Testament give abundant evidence of the universal understanding and exercise of even extraordinary charisms among the faithful in the apostolic Church. The Church continued to experience charisms in the subsequent centuries as many writers affirm, including Tertullian (c. 160–225), Saint Hilary of Poitiers (c. 315–367), Saint Cyril of Jerusalem (c. 315–387), Saint Basil of Caesarea (c. 330–379), and Saint Gregory Nazienzus [Nazianzus] (c. 329–389). Although not universally attested, charisms are mentioned in various geographical regions and in diverse linguistic and cultural traditions (Greek, Latin, Syriac). As in the New Testament, the reception of gifts of tongues and prophecy was especially associated with Christian initiation. On the other hand, Saint John Chrysostom (c. 347–407), writing in the early fifth century, bemoans a dramatic decrease in the presence of these spiritual gifts: "The charisms are long gone.... The present church is like a woman who has fallen from her former prosperous days. In many respects she retains only the tokens of that ancient prosperity" (McDonnell and Montague 1991, pp. 16–18). Although later Church Fathers mention prophecy, healing, and miracles in connection with initiation or monasticism, by the end of the eighth century the exercise of manifest charisms had diminished to the point of disappearance in the ordinary life of the Church. The cause of this decline is not entirely clear. Contributing elements may have included caution about prophecy in reaction to Montanism (a schismatic movement led by prophets), and a lowering of standards and a dilution of baptismal preparation to accommodate the influx of new converts after Christianity became the religion of the empire. Nevertheless, scattered accounts remain of healings, prophecy, exorcisms, and speaking in tongues among the monks of the desert, in the lives of the saints, and in renewal movements, such as those generated by the preaching of Saint Francis, Saint Dominic, Saint Vincent Ferrer, and others. By the time of the Reformation, many Catholic theologians, as well as Luther and Calvin, believed that "extraordinary" charisms of prophecy, speaking in tongues, healings, and miracles were given by God as an initial endowment to launch the Church. However, the gift of inspired Scripture—and for Catholics, Tradition and the Magisterium—made charisms seem superfluous except as testimonies to personal sanctity.

Classical Theology. Traditional theology defined charism as a gratuitous gift from God, a gift that is SUPERNATURAL, transitory, and given to the individual for the good of others and the benefit of the church. The early Fathers and ecclesiastical writers used the word loosely in the sense of GRACE or gift. Saint Thomas Aquinas stated that it is a grace given by God not for the personal justification or sanctification of the individual, but for the spiritual welfare of others. It differs essentially from the type of grace that renders the individual pleasing to God or holy in His sight (gratia gratum faciens). All grace, as the very name implies, is gratuitously given (gratis data) by God; yet, because a charism does not necessarily make a person holy, it retains for its name the merely generic term of gratuitously given grace (gratia gratis data; see Summa theologiae 1a-2ae, q. 111, a.1, ad 3). In this sense, charisms differ from sanctifying or actual grace, VIRTUES, the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit, and graces of state of life. All these graces are entitative or operative HABITS or dispositions that inhere in an individual and have as their primary purpose the person's perfection.

Charisms, on the other hand, are given to the individual in an instrumental manner to accomplish some salutary effect in others and may not benefit the individual who exercises them, if he or she does not seek and do God's will. Thus Jesus warns there will be many who will say to him, "Lord, Lord, did we not prophesy in your name, and cast out demons in your name, and do many mighty works in your name?" to whom he will say, "I never knew you" (Mt 7:22–23). The fact that a person exercises genuine charisms does not prove by itself that he or she is a holy person, although ordinarily God uses those who are close to Him as His instruments, and usually those who open themselves to charisms aspire to holiness.

The superiority and permanency of those graces that render the individual holy do not detract from the real value of charisms. Charisms are the product of a special intervention of God in man's faculties and operation. Metaphysically speaking, they may be regarded as in the category of accidents, and as transitory qualities or instrumental operative powers by which faculties are elevated beyond natural capacity. They consist in different types of intellectual illuminations, in facility of communication with others, and in the ability to perform miraculous deeds, and so on.

In theology the term charism is also used to refer to gifts such as Sacred Orders and infallibility, for these are also supernatural, freely given gifts intended for the benefit of the Church.

Since the Second Vatican Council. The question of the role of charisms arose during the Council's discussion of the document on the Church (Lumen gentium). Some Council fathers argued that charisms are extraordinary gifts and are no longer necessary as an ordinary part of the Church's life in view of God's provision of the sacraments, hierarchical ministry, and the Magisterium. However, the Council concluded in Lumen gentium 12, on the basis of Scripture, that charisms of both an ordinary and extraordinary kind remain essential:

> It is not only through the sacraments and the ministries of the Church that the Holy Spirit sanctifies and leads the People of God and enriches it with virtues, but "allotting his gifts to everyone according as he wills" (1 Cor 12:11), he distributes special graces among the faithful. By these gifts he makes them fit and ready to undertake the various tasks and offices which contribute toward the renewal and building up of the Church. These charisms, whether they be the more outstanding or the more simple and widely diffused, are to be received with thanksgiving and consolation, for they are perfectly suited to and useful for the needs of the Church. (Flannery 1983, p. 136)

The Council makes clear that the role of discerning and guiding the use of charisms belongs to those with pastoral authority in the Church (Lumen gentium 12).

Shortly after the conclusion of the Council in February 1967 a new impetus to the role of charisms in the Church occurred through the spontaneous birth of the CHARISMATIC RENEWAL among a group of students from Duquesne University in Pittsburgh. As in the Pentecostal movement that began at the dawn of the twentieth century, charisms of prophecy, tongues, and healing began to be widely experienced among Catholics, along with a new awareness of the multiplicity of ways that the Spirit equips Christians to serve. In a manner analogous to that of the liturgical and biblical movements that preceded Vatican II, the charismatic renewal seeks to bring a full appropriation of the graces of initiation and the exercise of charisms into the normal life of the Church.

Besides the charismatic renewal, many other new communities and ecclesial movements have flourished in the wake of the Council. The term charism has been extended to refer to the distinctive workings of grace that characterized the founders of these new communities and ecclesial movements as well as those of religious institutes. Charism is also used to refer to the distinctive grace embodied in the spirituality and way of life of such institutes, communities, and movements.

Pope John Paul II commented on the fruits of Vatican II's reevaluation of charisms in the life of the Church when he spoke on Pentecost 1998 to more than 500,000 representatives of renewal movements who gathered in Rome at Saint Peter's Square:

> With the Second Vatican Council, the Comforter recently gave the Church ... a renewed Pentecost, instilling a new and unforeseen dynamism.... During [the Council], under the guidance of the same Spirit, the Church rediscovered the charismatic dimension as one of her constitutive elements.... The institutional and charismatic aspects are co-essential as it were to the Church's constitution. They contribute, although differently, to the life, renewal, and sanctification of God's People. (L'Osservatore Romano, June 3, 1998, pp. 1–2)

Concluding his address, the Pope exhorted those gathered and all Christians: "Open yourselves docilely to the gifts of the Spirit! Accept gratefully and obediently the charisms which the Spirit never ceases to bestow on us!" (p. 2).

SEE ALSO CHARISMS IN RELIGIOUS LIFE; CHARISMATIC RENEWAL, CATHOLIC; HOLY SPIRIT, GIFTS OF; PROPHECY (THEOLOGY OF).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Raniero Cantalamessa, Sober Intoxication of the Spirit: Filled with the Fullness of God, translated by Marsha Daigle-Williamson (Cincinnati, Ohio 2005).

X. Ducros, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, edited by M. Viller et al. (Paris 1932–) 2.1:503–507.

Gordon D. Fee, The First Epistle to the Corinthians (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1987).

Gordon D. Fee, God's Empowering Presence: The Holy Spirit (Peabody, Mass. 1994).

Austin Flannery, ed., Vatican II: Conciliar and Post-Conciliar Documents (Boston 1983) 136.

J. Gewiess and K. Rahner, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, edited by J. Hofer and K. Rahner, 2nd rev. ed., 10 vols. (Freiburg, Germany 1957–1965), 2:1025–1030.

John Paul II, "This Is the Day the Lord Has Made!," L'Osservatore Romano, English edition (June 3, 1998): 1–2.

H. Leclercq, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, 15 vols., edited by F. Cabrol, H. Leclercq, and H.I. Marrou (Paris 1907–1953) 3:579–598.

Kilian McDonnell and George T. Montague, Fanning the Flame: What Does Baptism in the Holy Spirit Have to Do with Christian Initiation? (Collegeville, Minn. 1991).

Kilian McDonnell and George T. Montague, Christian Initiation and Baptism in the Holy Spirit: Evidence from the First Eight Centuries, 2nd ed. (Collegeville, Minn. 1994).

C. Pesch, De gratia, vol. 5 of Praelectiones dogmaticae, 9 vols. (Freiburg, Germany 1910–1922), app., "De gratiis gratis datis."

Francis A. Sullivan, Charisms and Charismatic Renewal (Ann Arbor, Mich. 1982).

Max Turner, The Holy Spirit and Spiritual Gifts (Peabody, Mass. 1998).

Albert Vanhoye, "Charisms," in Dictionary of Fundamental Theology, edited by René Latourelle and Rino Fisichella (New York 1995).

Rev. Warren Florian Dicharry CM
Dean, Registrar, and Professor of Scripture, Theology, and Greek
St. Mary's Seminary, Houston, Texas

Rt. Rev. Ralph John Tapia
Associate Professor of Theology, Fordham University
Associate Professor of Theology, Notre Dame College, Staten Island, New York

Peter S. Williamson
Associate Professor of Sacred Scripture
Sacred Heart Major Seminary, Detroit, Michigan (2010)

CHARISMATIC RENEWAL, CATHOLIC

The Charismatic Movement is a spiritual movement within the Catholic Church (as distinguished from the Protestant Pentecostal, or charismatic, movement) that seeks the renewal of the church through the charisms, or gifts of the HOLY SPIRIT, which are bestowed upon the faithful through "baptism in the Spirit." External manifestations of the gifts of the Spirit include GLOSSOLALIA (speaking in tongues), prophecy, and faith healing. However, the movement is also characterized by a deep personal commitment to holiness, as urged by the teachings of VATICAN II: "All the faithful of Christ of whatever rank or status are called to the fullness of the Christian life and the perfection of charity" (Lumen gentium 40).

In addition, charismatics are dedicated to the proclamation of the GOSPEL (EVANGELIZATION). In his book, Call to Holiness (1997), Archbishop Paul Josef Cordes, the episcopal adviser to the International Catholic Charismatic Renewal Office in Rome from 1981 to 1996, states unequivocally that the "mandate to evangelize ... is not an option but an imperative" (p. 9).

Although "enthusiastic" (from the Greek entheos, "God within") spiritual movements have emerged periodically throughout Christian history, the nineteenth-century United States saw an especially strong resurgence of the experience of "baptism in the Spirit." The resulting Holiness movement stressed the necessity of complete surrender of the individual to the Holy Spirit in pursuit of Christian perfection. Baptism in the Spirit was evidenced by an overwhelming emotional reaction that was often accompanied by tears, sometimes by falling prostrate (being "slain in the Spirit"), and most often by speaking in tongues. In 1906, William J. Seymour, a former student at Charles F. Parham's Bethel Bible School in Topeka, Kansas, and the pastor of the Los Angeles Azusa Street Mission, proclaimed that one was not baptized until one received the "gift" of glossolalia (although at the time he himself had not as yet received the gift). Through Seymour's insistence, speaking in tongues came to be viewed as the primary evidence of one's having been baptized in the Spirit. The Azusa Street Mission is considered to have been the birthplace of the Pentecostal movement in the United States.

Membership in Protestant Pentecostal churches increased from a modest few dozen in Los Angeles in 1906 to approximately 400 million worldwide by the end of the century. During the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the Pentecostal movement came to be associated with the poorer classes of American society, and Pentecostal communities often found themselves on the fringe of institutional Christianity. However, during the mid-twentieth century, a renewed interest in the gifts of the Spirit, particularly speaking in tongues, prophecy, and faith healing, began to emerge in the mainline Protestant churches.

The charismatic movement effectively reached the ROMAN CATHOLIC Church in the United States in 1967, when a group of about thirty Catholic students and faculty from Duquesne University "experienced the descent of the Spirit" during a weekend retreat in February of that year. The "Duquesne Weekend" is considered to be the beginning of the charismatic renewal in the Roman Catholic Church. News of the experiences of the Duquesne Weekend quickly spread among Catholic college campuses, and groups of students at other campuses soon began to organize charismatic prayer groups and retreats. In April 1967, just two months after the original Duquesne Weekend event, the National Catholic Reporter published an account of a charismatic weekend retreat on the campus of Notre Dame University that was attended by over one hundred students and faculty.

The two faculty members who participated in the Duquesne weekend were members of Cursillos in Christianity, or the CURSILLO MOVEMENT, a group that originated in Spain during the 1940s and that incorporated a three-day cursillo, or "short course," to train Catholic lay people as spiritual leaders. At the August 1966 National Cursillo Convention, the two professors came into contact with Notre Dame graduate students Ralph Martin and Steve Clark. Martin and Clark gave the professors copies of The Cross and the Switchblade (1963) by David Wilkerson and They Speak with Other Tongues (1964) by John Sherrill, books that have since become classics among both Pentecostals and Catholic charismatics. The two professors were deeply affected by the books and they began to pray for the touch of the Spirit, which they soon received.

Ralph Martin and Steve Clark became important leaders of Catholic Charismatic Renewal (CCR), and both served on the national secretariat of the Cursillo Movement during the 1960s. Ralph Martin was the founding editor of the charismatic New Covenant magazine and he served on the CCR's National Service Committee from 1970 to 1975. Martin also was the founding director of the International Catholic Charismatic Renewal Services (ICCRS), which was originally named the International Communications Office, or ICE, in the early 1970s. The organization was initially headquartered in Brussels but subsequently moved to Rome. During his association with the International Communications Office, Martin worked closely with Léon Joseph Cardinal SUENENS of Belgium, an influential figure at the Second Vatican Council who became a significant liaison between the CCR and the Church hierarchy.

Communal Celebration. A Charismatic Renewal group meeting in France, March 1979. © JACQUES PAVLOVSKY/SYGMA/CORBIS

After hosting a conference at Malines, Belgium, for the purpose of understanding and evaluating the CCR, Cardinal Suenens published his Theological and Pastoral Guidelines on the Catholic Charismatic Renewal (1974). Suenens also dedicated himself to ensuring that the movement remain within the institutional Church and consistent with Church tradition.

Catholic Charismatic Renewal shares with the Protestant charismatics and Pentecostals a strong emphasis on the "gifts of the Spirit." The movement therefore has had an ecumenical focus that tends to celebrate the commonalities, rather than the differences, among the movements. Catholic charismatics are sometimes referred to as "Catholic Pentecostals," but the two differ in some important respects. Protestant Pentecostals and charismatics, for example, have historically tended to pull away from the mainline churches, whereas the Catholic charismatics locate themselves fully within the Church and continue to express a profound love and commitment to the Catholic Church, the pope, and to church teachings and tradition. In turn, the movement has generally benefited from papal and episcopal acceptance and support. Three popes (PAUL VI, JOHN PAUL II, and BENEDICT XVI) have endorsed the Charismatic Renewal through official statements and other communications with CCR's leaders.

During the late 1980s and 1990s it appeared that the movement was beginning to decline, but the Charismatic Renewal remains one of the largest and most important spiritual movements within the Roman Catholic Church, increasing from approximately two million followers or adherents in 1970 to some 120 million in 2000, according to the The New International Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements (p. 465). Catholic Charismatic Renewal is particularly vibrant in the developing world. It is, for example, the largest and most dynamic lay movement within the Catholic Church in Latin America.

SEE ALSO CHARISMATIC PRAYER; HOLINESS CHURCHES; HOLY SPIRIT, GIFTS OF; PENTECOSTALISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Paul Josef Cordes, Call to Holiness: Reflections on the Catholic Charismatic Renewal (Collegeville, Minn. 1997).

Stanley M. Burgess and Eduard M. van der Maas, eds., The New International Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements (Grand Rapids, Mich. 2002).

Patti Gallagher Mansfield, As By a New Pentecost: The Dramatic Beginning the Catholic Charismatic Renewal (Steubenville, Ohio 1992).

Vinson Synan, The Century of the Holy Spirit: 100 Years of Pentecostal and Charismatic Renewal (Nashville, Tenn. 2001).

For the English text of Lumen Gentium, see The Documents of Vatican II (New York 1966), also available from http://www.vatican.va/archive/hist_councils/ii_vatican_council/ (accessed March 3, 2008).

Susan A. Maurer
Adjunct Instructor, Department of Theology and Religious Studies
St. John's University, New York (2010)

CHARLES OF AUSTRIA, BL.

Emperor of Austria, King of Hungary; b. August 17, 1887, Persenburg Castle, Lower Austria; d. April 1, 1922, Madeira, Portugal; beatified October 3, 2004, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

Son of Archduke Otto and Princess Maria Josephine of Saxony, Charles was raised in a family of great faith. When a stigmatic nun foretold that he would face great suffering in his lifetime, a group of people was assigned to pray for the boy. Charles nurtured a devotion to the Blessed Sacrament and Sacred Heart of Jesus. On October 21, 1911, he married Princess Zita of Bourbon and Parma; they had eight children.

Charles became heir to the throne of the Austro-Hungarian Empire when his uncle, Archduke Franz Ferdinand, was assassinated on June 28, 1914. Upon the death of his grandfather Emperor Franz Joseph I on November 16, 1916, Charles became Emperor of Austria, and he was crowned Apostolic King of Hungary on December 30, 1916. The assassination had heralded the start of WORLD WAR I, and Charles, with little political experience, assumed leadership amid military conflict, ethnic discord, and political chaos.

The new leader actively pursued a course to end the war, engaging in unsuccessful secret negotiations with the French. He was the only leader to support Pope BENEDICT XV's PEACE efforts. Internal conflicts resulted in the continued disintegration of the Empire, and on November 11, 1918, Charles issued a proclamation recognizing the right of the Austrian people to choose their form of government, although he did not abdicate his crown; a similar statement related to Hungary was issued on November 13, 1918. His actions allowed for a separation of states and averted a civil war. Encouraged by Pope Benedict XV and others who feared the rise of COMMUNISM, Charles twice tried and failed to regain the throne in 1921. He was exiled with his family to the island of Madeira in Portugal, where he ended his life in relative poverty. Zita, who died in 1989, asked that her heart be buried with his in an urn in Mori, Switzerland.

Some argue that Charles was guilty of personal indiscretions and responsible for terrible acts during the war, including the use of poison gas. These accusations appear to be untrue. Indeed, historians generally agree that while Charles may have been poorly equipped to govern, he was sincerely committed to achieving peace and SOCIAL JUSTICE. He acted consistently to limit conflict and relinquished his own power to govern in order to avoid further bloodshed among his countrymen. In beatifying him, Pope John Paul II said that Charles "conceived of his office as a holy service to his people," and that his goal was "to follow the Christian vocation to HOLINESS also in his political actions."

Feast: October 21.

SEE ALSO BEATIFICATION; SACRED HEART, DEVOTION TO; STIGMATIZATION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Gordon Brooke-Shepherd, The Last Hapsburg (London 1968).

"Charles of Austria Dies of Pneumonia in Exile on Madeira," The New York Times (April 2, 1922), available from http://query.nytimes.com/mem/archive-free/pdf?_r=1&res=9E0CE0DD1F30E433A25751C0A9629C946395D6CF (accessed August 10, 2009).

John Paul II, "Beatification of Five Servants of God, Homily of the Holy Father (Homily, October 3, 2004)," Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/homilies/2004/documents/hf_jp-ii_hom_20041003_beatifications_en.html (accessed August 10, 2009).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Charles of Austria (1887–1922)," Vatican Web site, October 3, 2004, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_ lit_doc_20041003_charles-austria_en.html (accessed August 10, 2009).

Elizabeth Inserra
Independent Scholar
New York, New York (2010)

CHAVARA, KURIAKOSE (CYRIAC) ELIAS, BL.

Priest, cofounder of the Syro-Malabar Carmelites of Mary Immaculate and the Congregation of the Mother of Carmel, and a pioneer figure in the Catholic Press in India; b. February 10, 1805, at Kainakary, Kerala (Malabar), India; d. January 3, 1871, in Changanacherry, Koonammavu, Kerala; beatified by John Paul II, February 8, 1986, in Kerala together with St. Alphonsa Muttathupandatu (canonized on June 1, 2007, by Pope Benedict XVI).

Ordained in 1829, Chavara founded an institute, which was canonically erected as a Carmelite congregation in 1855, when he was confirmed as its superior. He was appointed vicar-general of the Vicariate Apostolic of Verapoly in 1861. Two printing presses set up by early Portuguese missionaries to Kerala in South India had disappeared, and in 1844 Chavara was determined to reactivate this apostolate. Designing his own press and using type made by a local blacksmith, he was able in a few years to send to the Congregation of the Propagation of the Faith in Rome copies of 10 devotional and catechetical books that he had published. He also edited the liturgical books of the Syro-Malabar rite. In 1887, his press first issued Deepika, now the oldest daily paper in Malayalam, and in 1902 the Flower of Carmel, the most widely circulated Catholic magazine in Kerala. In 1963, the Church in Kerala maintained some 20 publishing establishments issuing four Catholic dailies, 12 weeklies or monthlies, and a great volume of other Catholic literature. The diocesan process for Chavara's beatification was inaugurated by the archbishop of Changanacherry on January 3, 1958. This man, praised during his beatification by Pope John Paul II for his heroic service, died after a long illness. In 1889, his body was transferred to Mannanam.

Feast: January 3 (Carmelites).

SEE ALSO CARMELITES OF MARY IMMACULATE; PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH, CONGREGATION FOR THE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Acta Apostolicae Sedis 78 (1986): 1076–1078.

Blessed Kuriakose Elias Chavara Official Web site, available from http://www.blessedchavara.org/ (accessed October 5, 2009)

Chavara carama'sathabdi, ed. H. Perumalil (Alleppey 1971).

Joseph Kanjiramattathil, The Pastoral Vision of Kuriakos Elias Chavara (Bangalore, India 1986).

Kurian Mathothu, Blessed Father Kuriakose Elias Chavara (Palai, India 1988).

Z.M. Moozhoor, Blessed Chavara: The Star of the East, Trans. Sr. Sheila Kannath (Mannanam, 1993)

L'Osservatore Romano, English edition, no. 7 (1986): 6–7.

Lucas Vithuvattical, Perspectives of a Heroic Christian Life: A Study on the Christian Virtues as Practiced By Blessed Kuriakose Elias Chavara (Mannanam, 1988).

Rev. Antony Chacko Kakkanatt CMI
Vice-Postulator
St. Joseph's Monastery, Mannanam (India)

Katherine I. Rabenstein
Senior Credentialing Specialist
American Nurses Association, Washington, D.C.

EDS (2010)

CHICHKOV, JOSAPHAT, BL.

Baptized Robert; priest and MARTYR; b. February 9, 1884, Plovdiv, Bulgaria; d. November 11, 1952, Sofia, Bulgaria; beatified May 26, 2002, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

Robert Mathieu Chichkov began studies at the minor seminary of the Congregation of the Assumption in Kara-Agatch at the age of nine. On April 29, 1900, he began his novitiate as an Assumptionist in Phanaraki, Turkey, taking the name Josaphat. In 1904 he was sent to Louvain, Belgium, to complete his studies in philosophy and theology. On July 11, 1909, Fr. Chichkov was ordained in the LATIN RITE.

Returning to Bulgaria, Fr. Chichkov taught first at St. Augustine's College in Plovdiv, and later in Varna at St. Michael's College. In 1929 he became the superior of the Sts. Cyril and Methodius Seminary, an institution teaching both Latin and Byzantine-Slavonic rites, in Yambol. During his tenure he increased the number of seminarians entering for both rites, and he conducted services in both languages. Fr. Chichkov was assigned to be a parish priest of the Latin Rite church in Yambol in 1933, and he was chaplain to the Oblate Sisters of the Assumption.

A musician, Fr. Chichkov directed the college band when he taught in Varna in the early 1900s. During his tenure at Sts. Cyril and Methodius Seminary, he owned one of only a few typewriters with Cyrillic characters, as well as a gramophone, which he used at youth gatherings, and a film projector. He was the founder of the St. Michael's French-Bulgarian Circle, a group in Varna composed mostly of business students. Fr. Chichkov's work was much admired by Msgr. Angelo Roncalli, the Papal Nuncio to Bulgaria, and the future Pope JOHN XXIII often visited the seminary. Named superior in Varna in 1937, Fr. Chichkov assumed the role of parish priest for its Latin Rite church in 1949. A compelling writer, his work was published in the Catholic periodical Poklonnik (The Pilgrim).

In December 1951 Fr. Chichkov was arrested in Varna; his whereabouts were unknown until September 16, 1952, when his name appeared on a list of forty people accused of espionage and conspiracy against the Bulgarian government. Later that month he was tried, along with his Assumptionist brother priests Kamen Vitchev and Pavel Djidjov (both beatified with Fr. Chichkov), and condemned to death. The men, with Bishop Eugene Bossilkov (beatified on March 15, 1998, by John Paul II), were executed by firing squad on November 11, 1952. In declaring him Blessed, Pope John II recalled the words by which Fr. Chichkov lived his life: "The most important thing is to draw near to God by living for him; everything else is secondary."

Feast: November 11.

SEE ALSO ASSUMPTIONISTS; BEATIFICATION; BULGARIA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; BYZANTINE CHURCH, HISTORY OF; NUNCIO, APOSTOLIC.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Pierre Gallay, The Martyrdom of the Three Bulgarian Assumptionists (Paris 2002).

John Paul II, "Apostolic Visit of His Holiness Pope John Paul II to Azerbaijan and Bulgaria: Eucharistic Celebration - Beatifications," (Homily, May 26, 2002) Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/homilies/2002/documents/hf_jp-ii_hom_20020526_beatification-plovdiv_en.html (accessed August 11, 2009).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Apostolic Visit of His Holiness John Paul II Paul to Azerbaijan and Bulgaria, Beatification of the Servants of God: Kamen Vitchev, Pavel Djidjov, Josaphat Chichkov," Vatican Web site, March 26, 2002, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_lit_doc_20020522_beatific-bulgaria_en.html #Bl Josaphat Chichov (accessed August 11, 2009).

"The Canonisation Process of the Bulgarian Martyrs," Augustinians of the Assumption Web site, available from http://www.assumption.us/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=59&Itemid=26 (accessed August 11, 2009).

Elizabeth Inserra
Independent Scholar
New York, New York (2010)

CHLUDZIŃSKA V. BORZĘCKA, CELINA, BL.

Wife and mother, widow, and founder of the Congregation of the Sisters of the Resurrection; b. Antowil, Orsza (formerly Poland, currently Belarus), October 29, 1833; d. Kraków, Poland, October 26, 1913; beatified October 27, 2007, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

One of three children of Ignatius and Clementine Chludziński, Celine Chludzińska was baptized on November 2, 1833, and received her FIRST COMMUNION in 1843. As well-educated and wealthy landowners, her parents instilled in her a deep religious faith and a noble patriotism, providing an environment in which she would manifest religious devotion at a young age. By age twenty, she had discerned a religious vocation, but ultimately obeyed her parents' wishes by marrying Joseph Borzęcki. At a family estate in Obrembszczyzna, they raised their daughters Celine and Hedwig, having two other children die in infancy. Such experiences of death became a constant source of suffering for Chludzińska, as she endured the loss of her father-in-law, her mother, her sister Filipina, her father, her brother Aloysius, and her sister-in-law over the course of the next twenty years. Her greatest suffering, however, came with the death of her husband in 1874; his health had constantly declined after a stroke left him a paraplegic four years earlier.

The next year became a turning point in Chludzińska's life when she met Fr. Peter Semenenko, the superior general of the Resurrectionist fathers. With hopes of starting a congregation of sisters, Fr. Semenenko began offering spiritual direction and formation for Chludzińska, and her daughter Hedwig would join her in seeking this foundation in 1881. The next ten years proved to be a time of great spiritual growth and trial, as both women progressed in the Resurrectionist spirituality yet faced an uncertain future—Fr. Semenenko considered having them join an already established community of women and contemplated choosing another candidate to serve as founder. After Fr. Semenenko died in 1886, several of his brother priests opposed the founding of the women's order.

Still, Chludzińska persevered. In 1891 she and Hedwig took permanent vows, three others professed temporary vows, and the Congregation of the Sisters of the Resurrection officially began. Chludzińska's determination and holiness began to win over supporters, including the father general of the RESURRECTIONISTS and the diocesan priest, Fr. Giacomo Della Chiesa, who would later become Pope BENEDICT XV. The Resurrectionist Sisters dedicated themselves to renewing society through education, opening their first school in Rome in 1887. They began a novitiate in Kęty and missions in Bulgaria, Częstochowa, Warsaw, and Chicago. Even after Hedwig's untimely death in 1906, Chludzińska remained steadfast in leading the congregation by word and example, being well regarded for giving individual attention to each sister, providing dedicated and organized leadership, and witnessing to a deep life of prayer and adoration of the Blessed Sacrament. She oversaw the congregation's first general chapter in 1911, and ultimately died in 1913.

Following the cure of the life-threatening head trauma of Andrew Mecherzynski-Wiktor, Chludzińska was beatified on October 27, 2007, in Rome. There, Cardinal José Saraiva Martins recalled her life as a "wife, mother, widow, and religious," a life marked by "fidelity in the fulfillment of the will of God in all humility and readiness, and in profound prayer, inspired by the paschal mystery."

Feast: October 26.

SEE ALSO POLAND; RELIGIOUS (MEN AND WOMEN).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Congregation for the Causes of Saints, "Rito di Beatificazione della Serva di Dio Celina Chludzińska Borzęcka: Omelia del Cardinale José Saraiva Martins," Vatican Web site, October 27, 2007, available (in Italian) from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/congregations/csaints/documents/rc_con_csaints_doc_20071027_beatif-chludzinska_it.html (accessed November 9, 2009).

Teresa Matea Florczak, C.R., The Double Knot, translated by Therese Marie Slonski, C.R. (New York 2002).

Brian Pedraza
Graduate Student, School of Theology and Religious Studies
The Catholic University of America (2010)

CHURCH, HISTORY OF

This entry contains the following:

I. EARLY
Rev. Francis X Murphy/Perry J. Cahall
II. MEDIEVAL
Constance B. Bouchard
III. EARLY MODERN: 1500–1789
William S. Barron/Frank J. Coppa
IV. LATE MODERN: 1789–2009
Rev John F. Broderick/Frank J. Coppa/William Roberts

I. EARLY

The Christian Church took its rise with CHRIST's commission to the Apostles: "Go out into the whole world and preach my gospel to every creature" (Mk 16:15). The historical fulfillment of that command began on the first PENTECOST when, as Christ had promised (Acts 1:5), the Holy Spirit descended on the Apostles and disciples, and Peter preached to the "devout Jews from every nation … Parthians, Medes, Elamites, inhabitants of Mesopotamia, Judea, Cappadocia, Pontus, Asia, Phrygia, Pamphilia, Egypt, and the parts of Libya about Cyrene, visitors from Rome, Jews also and proselytes, Cretans and Arabians" (Acts 2:5–11). Calling upon them to repent and be baptized in the name of JESUS CHRIST for the forgiveness of their sins (Acts 2:38), "he added that day about 3,000 souls" (Acts 2:41).

The idealization of the picture drawn by Luke is not overdone. The primitive Christian community, although considered at first but another sect within the Jewish milieu, proved unique in its theological teaching, and more particularly in the zeal of its members, who served as witnesses to Christ "in all Judea and Samaria and even to the ends of the earth" (Acts 1:8). While Christianity arose in the milieu of the religious life of late JUDAISM, and at first manifested an enthusiastic piety and messianic character similar to that of such sects as the Damascus and Qumran communities, the Christian KERYGMA did not stop at the border of JUDEA, but penetrated the surrounding world that was unified and dominated by the Greek language and the Hellenic civilization.

Early Expansion. In PALESTINE, Greek was understood and used in business; among the Jews living in the DIASPORA, it became their native tongue. With the Greek language, a world of concepts, categories of thought, metaphors, and subtle connotations entered late Jewish ideology. The first Christian preachers turned particularly to the Hellenized portion of the Jewish people. After the martyrdom of STEPHEN, his fellow deacons, including Philip, Nikanor, Prochoros, Timon, Parmenas, and Nicolaos, seem to have scattered through Palestine, Syria, and the East and begun the missionary activity of the next generation.

The new sect received the name of Christians (Christianoi) at ANTIOCH (Acts 11:26), a Greek city, and, after his conversion, Paul addressed himself in Greek to the Jews gathered in the synagogues in the principal cities of the Mediterranean world. Paul was a thoroughly educated Jew, a Pharisee of the PHARISEES in his own words, who in his travels addressed himself first to the Hellenized Jews, then to the GENTILES. Paul's powerful grasp of the central mystery of salvation in Christ, the SON OF GOD, prevented the new religion from being infected by the Hellenistic mystery cults or from being absorbed into one of the Jewish or Gnostic sects. His theological insight preserved the mystery of REDEMPTION in and through the Church as the body of Christ.

Little reliable evidence exists concerning the missionary travels of the Apostles, but by the year 65 the Christian message had penetrated into Syria, Asia Minor, Greece, and ROME. The movement was recognized, however imperfectly, by the Roman authorities, as is witnessed by TACITUS (Ann. 15:44) and SUETONIUS (Claud. 29:1), and Christians were apparently blamed by the Emperor Nero for the burning of Rome. In the persecution that followed, Peter and Paul suffered martyrdom.

Doctrinal Development. The theological evolution that accompanied the spread of the Christian kerygma was greatly influenced by developments in the late Jewish apocalypses, apocrypha, and eschatological literature and has been characterized as Judeo-Christian, its original impetus having been given by the community at JERUSALEM. It was also strongly marked by the liturgical writings of Qumran, the angelological and eschatological doctrines of several dynamic Jewish sects, and the dualism of the ESSENES. However, the collections of the Logia, or sayings, of Jesus and the Evangelia quickly found their way into Greek, and the Christian writers of the Apostolic age adopted the literary forms of the epistle and of the praxeis, or acts, in use among the secularist philosophers and their disciples. The next generation added other literary forms, adapting the diatribe, especially, to Christian use.

With the adaptation of literary forms came an assimilation of methods of propaganda and manner of expression current mainly among the CYNICS, Stoics, Pythagoreans, and Epicureans, who spread philosophical and religious tracts among the ordinary people. James, for example, in his epistle, used the Orphic concept of "the wheel of birth" (3:6), and the DIDACHE employed the Pythagorean device (also used by Hesiod) of the TWO WAYS in a moral context.

Conflict occurred between the Judaizers and Hellenists in explaining and developing the Christian message, as is evident from the Pauline warnings against aberrations from the traditional Faith that Christ gave to him and the other Apostles. This conflict is emphasized in the testimony of the Pseudo-Barnabas and the Clementine literature.

In Paul's first letter to TIMOTHY, he indicates that the Church of Asia was organized with a college of presbyters and a president bearing the title and office of episcopus (bishop), and deacons. Some of the earliest Christian communities were seemingly monarchically organized, such as that under James in Jerusalem, but it is obvious that the faithful had a voice in the community life of prayer and witness to Christ, and they held the charismatic gifts of preaching, comforting the afflicted, and healing in great respect.

Gnosticism. One of the earliest heresies the Church had to address, which aided the process of doctrinal development, was GNOSTICISM. Deriving its name from the Greek word for knowledge (gnosis), the core of the Gnostic system lies in the claim to a secret knowledge beyond that of the Faith of the Church, which had been secretly passed down from Jesus' disciples to gain access to salvation. The Gnostic system was complex, and the movement contained many sects (like those of BASILIDES of Egypt and VALENTINUS of Rome). The commonality among all Gnostics was an elitism that caused the Gnostic "elect" to look upon themselves as the few, enlightened, real Christians set above the common Christian believer. DUALISM—in which spiritual reality is viewed as good, whereas material reality is viewed as evil—was another universally held belief in the Gnostic movement. To support this dualistic vision of reality, Gnostics claimed to possess secret knowledge regarding the origin of the world. In these elaborate creation myths, the world resulted from some pre-cosmic accident or disaster, with lesser gods or demiurges (often malevolent) controlling the material world. In this dualistic vision, the human soul was seen as a divine spark that needed to be liberated from the flesh. This vision led to polarized moral codes. Whereas some Gnostics adopted rigorous ascetical practices (some going so far as to reject marriage as evil) to liberate their spirits from the influence of the flesh, other Gnostics encouraged morally licentious behavior because the body had no real value. Dualistic beliefs meant Gnostics denied the INCARNATION, claiming instead the docetic (from the Greek dokeo meaning to seem) belief that Jesus merely appeared to take on flesh but was more like a phantasm. Gnostic dualism also denied the RESURRECTION.

It is unclear whether Gnosticism predated Christianity as a syncretistic religious system, or whether Gnostic sects arose from within Christianity, amalgamating Christian belief with other religious and philosophical tenets of the Near East, such as those of Zoroastrianism and PLATONISM. From Judaism, Gnosticism borrowed and reinterpreted the CREATION narratives of Genesis, as well as Jewish apocalyptic views. From Christianity, the Gnostics focused on the theme of redemption but distorted it to mean redemption from the material world. Many think St. Paul encountered some form of Gnosticism in the communities of Corinth and Colossae. TERTULLIAN of Carthage, JUSTIN MARTYR, and IRENAEUS of Lyons are examples of Church Fathers from the first few centuries of Christianity who took up their pens to refute Gnosticism.

Clement I of Rome and Ignatius. By the turn of the second century, the Christian Church had emerged as a widespread entity united by a common faith and a communion of spiritual interests. The letter of the Church at Rome to the Church at Corinth, although predominantly a moral exhortation to unity and obedience, reveals a consciousness of the Church as a strong, clear, ecclesiastical organization whose line of authority descended from GOD through Christ and the Apostles to the elders of the frater united community (Epist. Clem. 42:1–5; 44:1–2). Utilizing the holiness code of the Old Testament synagogic teaching, it imposed a Christocentric theology of virtues on the Christian community, advocated imitating Christ's patience and long suffering (13:2–4) and guaranteeing man's full deliverance in the Resurrection (24–26). Though apparently written by CLEMENT I of Rome, the letter gives no direct evidence as to the structural organization of the Church in either Rome or Corinth.

In the letters of IGNATIUS OF ANTIOCH (d. c. 116) to the Churches of Asia Minor and to POLYCARP of Smyrna, a monarchical type of episcopal government prevails. Ignatius witnesses to a shift of spiritual interest from the Pauline preoccupation with Mosaic LAW and original justice, to the Greek concern about fate and the value of existence. While the Judaic influence seems to have persisted in the QUARTODECIMAN controversy centered in Asia Minor, in Rome and the Mediterranean cities there was a gradual development of theological consciousness that considered the Church a transcendent entity.

The Shepherd of HERMAS in the treatise on penance described the Roman Church as a fairly populous assembly (c. 140) containing a segment of the rich as well as numerous poor. Many in both classes had relapsed into pagan ways of blasphemy and idolatry; they are described as hypocrites in concert with ambitious clergymen and dishonest deacons. But the majority are referred to as hospitable bishops, zealous priests, martyrs, and the innocent. The Church itself is well organized, with a hierarchy of bishops, priests, and deacons. Considerable emphasis was placed on the achievement of gnosis (to be distinguished from gnosticism), or a superior knowledge of the triune mystery, particularly in relation to Baptism and the EUCHARIST. This was a direct offshoot of the rabbinic preoccupation with the "marvelous and true mysteries" that the one God "reveals to the hearts of his servants" as expressed in the Qumran theology (DSD 11.3; 15–16; DSH 7.1–7).

Formation of the Biblical Canon. The formation of the canon of Scripture was spurred in the middle of the second century in response to the teachings of MARCION. Marcion came from Asia Minor to Rome around AD 144. He was excommunicated for his teachings, many of which were contained in his book Antitheses. Marcion believed that the Old and New Testaments were irreconcilable. He associated the God of the Jews of the Old Testament with justice and wrath and the God of Jesus of the New Testament with love and mercy. He saw the law of the Old Testament in opposition to that of the gospel of the New Testament. Some have classified Marcion as a Gnostic because of his claim that the first generation of Jewish Christians had misunderstood Jesus' message and his claim to have the true insight into Jesus' teachings. Marcion also possessed some dualistic tendencies, denying that Jesus as the divine REDEEMER could have been born of a woman.

Rejecting any continuity between Old and New Testaments, Marcion claimed early Jewish Christians had corrupted the texts of the New Testament. He therefore sought to restore the text and compiled the first canon of Scripture in the history of the Church. This canon excluded all of the Old Testament texts and was comprised of only Luke's Gospel (minus the Infancy narrative) and some of Paul's epistles. Responding to Marcion's canon forced the leaders of the Church to discern what writings should be considered Scriptural.

Over the course of the next few centuries, the Church undertook the process of discerning the biblical canon. The first-century Church had accepted the more extensive SEPTUAGINT version of the Old Testament, which included seven books not originally written in Hebrew. However, deciding on the contents of the New Testament took longer. Questions surrounded texts like the Letter to the HEBREWS, the Letters of John, and the Book of REVELATION (due mainly to questions of authorship), as well as the Gospel of John when compared with the Synoptics. Other early writings, such as the Shepherd of Hermas and Clement's First Letter to the Corinthians, were considered to have canonical potential, but were eventually excluded because they did not have Apostolic provenance. Some factors the Church considered seem to be whether the text dated back to the time of the Apostles, whether or not the text was used in the liturgy, and whether or not the proposed text was consistent with the received RULE OF FAITH transmitted by the Apostles and preserved by the bishops. The importance of this rule of faith preserved by the bishops as successors to the Apostles is attested to by early Church Fathers such as Irenaeus of Lyons, who provides a canonical list of Biblical books in his Adversus haereses, where he addresses the errors of Marcion. Irenaeus' canon almost exactly corresponds to the modern day canon of Scripture.

One of the earliest lists of biblical books is the Muraturion canon, dated around AD 200. In North Africa, the Council of CARTHAGE in AD 397 published a list of canonical Scriptures, prohibiting that title for any other writings. The first papal statement on the canon comes from Pope DAMASUS in AD 382.

Persecution. Tacitus described the Neronian persecution of the primitive Christians as due "not so much to their having set fire to the city, as to their hatred of the human race" (Annal. 15.44). This odium humani generis was equivalent to the Greeks' misanthropia, a charge originally leveled against the Jews (Diodorus, Hist. 24), and subsequently used against the Christians because of their particular customs and refusal to participate in Roman civic and religious rites. Josephus listed these accusations as the adoring of a donkey's head, ritual murder, and incest (Contra Apion. 79).

While the recognition of Christianity as a separate religion took place only gradually, there seems to have been a persecution under DOMITIAN (81–96), apparently connected with messianic troubles and millenarianism, in which the senator Flavius Clemens was put to death for "atheism and Jewish practices" (Suetonius, Domit. 15) and Domitilla was exiled to Pandateria (Eusebius, Historia Ecclesiastica 3.18.4). The letter of Pope CLEMENT I (1:1) speaks of the misfortunes of the Roman Church at this time, and the Book of Revelation (1:9; 2:3–13) refers to the persecution of the Churches in Asia Minor.

Accusations. Whereas Paul had called for obedience to the imperial authorities, Revelation registers hostility to the empire. This attitude is reflected also in the SIBYLLINE ORACLES and the Ascension of Isaia. Under Nerva, peace returned. TRAJAN (98–117), in reply to the governor of Bithynia, PLINY THE YOUNGER, decided that Christians were not to be sought out, but when denounced as guilty of crimes (flagitia), they were to be condemned if they refused to abjure. He also cautioned, however, against false and anonymous denunciations, indicating that pressure for persecution came not so much from the government as from people who were intolerant of those bearing the name of Christians (Epist. 96.2–3). It is this decision, and not a governmental proscription, that Tertullian misinterpreted as indicating the existence of an institutum Neronianum (edict, or practice, adopted by Nero). The most famous martyr of this period was Ignatius of Antioch. Under HADRIAN (117–138) Christians enjoyed comparative peace; but during the reigns of Antoninus Pius and MARCUS AURELIUS, they were attacked by intellectuals such as Fronto (Min. Felix, Octav. 9.16; 31.1–2), Lucian (Life of Peregrinus), and Crescens the Cynic (fl. 152). Galen, who visited Rome in 162 and 166, accused the Christians of fanaticism and credulity, but the great indictment was launched by the philosopher CELSUS, who considered them charlatans and vagrants dangerous to the civic ideals of the Roman state. This was the basic accusation behind the persecutions.

The Apologists. By the mid-second century, the new religion had attracted a number of educated men, who used their literary competence in defending Christianity against the charges of atheism and idolatry, and began to assess the philosophical and moral thought of their contemporaries in the light of the Judeo-Christian teachings. They are known as the APOLOGISTS, but only a few of their writings have survived. They continued the catechetical approach of the older Apostles; this they combined with the propagandist methods of their contemporaries. Justin Martyr (c. 100–160) supplied both Jewish and pagan audiences with a rule of faith and a description of the rites of Baptism and the Eucharist while encouraging a conversion from pagan immorality to the Christian way of life. The Letter to Diognetus described the divine economy of salvation and claimed that Christians in the empire differed in no way from their contemporaries in marriage and family life, in civic custom, and the observance of the laws; but they avoided idolatry, strove to serve as models of moral excellence, and prayed for the preservation of the empire.

Reorganization and Expansion. In the last decades of the second century, there was evidence (c. 180) of a great reorganization of the Church and its missionary and catechetical endeavors. The Roman Church emphasized Christian unity in its controversy with the Church of Asia Minor over the date of Easter, a disagreement which persisted from the reign of ANICETUS (154–166) to that of VICTOR I (189–198). Irenaeus of Lyons stated that Polycarp of Smyrna had visited Rome, but had failed to reach agreement on the question (Eusebius, Historia Ecclesiastica 5.24.16). Although Polycrates of Ephesus acknowledged the Apostolic foundation of the Roman Church by Peter and Paul, he insisted that the customs of the Church in Asia had equal Apostolic backing.

Synods and Unity. The practice of holding synods to settle ecclesiastical problems seems to have begun in Asia Minor in the middle of the second century and was apparently based on a precedent of civil practice. Evidence supplied by DIONYSIUS OF CORINTH in his so-called CATHOLIC EPISTLES displays the interchange of doctrinal and disciplinary interests between the churches in Greece and Asia Minor. Testimony preserved by EUSEBIUS (Hist. eccl. 5.25) indicates that in synods the churches of Palestine, Pontus, OSRHOENE, and Gaul registered their agreement with the decision of a Roman synod under VICTOR that Easter should be celebrated only on a SUNDAY. Irenaeus gave a list of the popes from Peter to ELEUTHERIUS (174–189) and described the efforts made by the early heretics to obtain Roman sanction for their doctrines. Tertullian claimed that communion with the Roman See was regarded as communion with the whole Church (Adv. Prax. 1). He was the first churchman to utilize the Petrine text (Mt 16:18); yet the institution of the papacy had achieved a definitive form by the end of the second century: It was the center of unity. Rival claims to occupy the APOSTOLIC SEE by HIPPOLYTUS (217–235) and NOVATIAN (251) were disallowed by the other Churches, and these men were considered anti-popes.

In the dispute over the rebaptism of heretics that involved the churches of North Africa and Rome after the Decian (251) and Valerian (257) persecutions, CYPRIAN of Carthage acknowledged that the primacy had been given to Peter, and he saw in the cathedra of Peter a source of unity, while he still claimed the independence of individual bishops as successors to the Apostles. Despite difficulties with Novatian, Pope Stephen (254–257) asserted the validity of the Roman practice, and although a synod at Carthage (256) upheld Cyprian, no attempt was made to sever communion with Rome.

Local Churches. By the third century flourishing Christian communities existed in Gaul at Lyons, Vienne, Marseilles, Arles, Toulouse, Paris, and Bordeaux. Cyprian of Carthage wrote to the churches of León-Astorga and Mérida in Spain (Epist. 67) and mentioned the community at Saragossa. There were nineteen bishops at the Synod of Elvira (c. 306). In Germany churches at COLOGNE, TRIER, Metz, Mainz, and Strassburg have left testimony in archeological remains, and the spread of Christianity along the trade routes of the Danubian provinces of Rhaetia, Noricum, and Pannonia is attested by the martyrs of the Diocletian persecution. North Africa was clearly a well-established Christian center based on Carthage in the late second century, and the Church in Egypt had developed with its center at ALEXANDRIA in the same epoch. A tradition attested to by CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA at the end of the second century holds that the church in Alexandria was founded by St. MARK, disciple of St. Peter.

In Asia Minor synods in Phrygia between 172 and 180 dealt with the errors of MONTANISM (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 5.16). The satirist Lucian complained of Christians in Pontus (c. 170: Alexander 25). ARMENIA received Christian missionaries in the third century, with St. GREGORY THE ILLUMINATOR credited as bringing the faith there in mid-century. Antioch in western Syria had a Church of Apostolic origin from which missionaries Christianized the East. The house-church at DURA-EUROPOS testifies to the presence of Christianity (third century) in eastern Syria; and EDESSA, modern Urfa, and Osrhoene were likewise early recipients of the GOSPEL, though the stories of ADDAI AND MARI are legendary. TATIAN and BARDESANES preached there (c. 170), and the Christian message spread to Mesopotamia and Adiabene in ASSYRIA, to Parthia and to PERSIA, particularly under King Sapor I (241–272). A synod at Bostra testified to Christianity in ARABIA (c. 244), and there is evidence, however questionable, for its spread as far east as India.

Final Persecutions. The development of the Christian way of life and its expansion continued to meet grave difficulties from within because of doctrinal disputes, and from without, through sporadic outbursts of persecution. Under Marcus Aurelius (161–180), a Stoic philosopher, a series of physical calamities disturbed the empire in the form of famine, pestilence, and barbarian incursions. The people blamed them on the failure of the Christians to worship the pagan gods. A persecution broke out, the severity of which is indicated by the apologists ATHENAGORAS, MELITO, and Miltiades. Justin Martyr was put to death, apparently in Rome, with six companions; and a number of martyrs are recorded in Lyons (177), including BLANDINA, Photinus, and Ponticus (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 5.1–2). A letter from the Church at Lyons to that at Vienne described the persecution. After a period of peace, Septimius Severus (193–211) put down a series of Jewish insurrections and turned against the Christians, particularly in Egypt, where LEONIDES, the father of Origen, was martyred, and in Carthage, the place of the martyrdom of Felicitas and PERPETUA (March 7, 203).

Caracalla (211–217) allowed his mother, Julia Domna, to propagate the mystery cults of the East, particularly sun worship, and Mithraism became an official cult of the army. This caused great difficulty for Christian soldiers and officials. Severus Alexander (222–235) showed clemency, influenced by his mother, Julia Mammaea, who heard Origen lecture at Antioch. But Maximinus Thrax (237–238), Decius (249–251), and Valerian (253–260) carried out systematic and severe persecutions of the Christians. Under DIOCLETIAN (284–305) and GALERIUS, a final attempt was made to destroy Christianity at its roots. The effort was not supported by the elder Constantius I in Gaul and the West, so it failed.

Conversion of Constantine. While the nature and manner of CONSTANTINE's conversion is controverted, there is no question about the fact. With the Battle of the Milvian Bridge and the taking of Rome (313), Christianity was accepted as a legitimate religion and rapidly reached a favored status in the empire, although it was not the religion of the vast majority. Determined to use the religious factor as a unifying force within the state, Constantine evidently employed Bishop Hosius of Córdoba as a counselor and accepted appeals in regard to the Donatist problems in North Africa. He instructed the bishop of Rome, Miltiades (311–314), to hold a synod at the LATERAN, followed by others at Arles (314) and elsewhere, to resolve the situation, and resorted to force only later. With the rise of ARIANISM, he convoked the Council of NICAEA I (325), which defined the doctrine of the HOMOOUSIOS, or CONSUBSTANTIALITY, of the Father and the Son.

Battle of the Milvian Bridge (AD 313). This victory allowed Constantine to take the city of Rome and paved the way for the growth of Christianity in the Roman Empire. © PHILADELPHIA MUSEUM OF ART/CORBIS

Rise of the Pentarchy. Nicaea I determined also that, in the ecclesiastical organization, the sees of Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch held special status as patriarchal dioceses, exercising some juridical jurisdiction as metropolitan sees beyond the boundaries of their provinces. The canons of Nicea mentioned the church in Jerusalem as having special honor as the birthplace of the Church (although the bishop remained subject to the jurisdiction of the metropolis of CAESAREA IN PALESTINE). Other sees, such as Carthage, EPHESUS, Caesarea in Palestine, CAESAREA IN CAPPADOCIA, Heraclea in Thrace, and Arles in Gaul also assumed metropolitan status for surrounding sees; and the general organization of the Church was patterned on that of the civil dioceses. A fifth see soon gained prominence after Constantine constructed the city of CONSTANTINOPLE from 324 to 330 on the site of the city of Byzantium near the straits of the Bosphorus. Constantine made Constantinople, with its central location the capital of the empire, and styled it as the new Rome. By the fifth century, these fives sees—Rome, Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem, and Constantinople—became the major sees of Christianity. The prominence and status of each, however, would be the source of much tension.

Constantine came to consider himself the providentially appointed guardian of the Church; Eusebius referred to him as an Isapostolos (the same as an Apostle). He started a vast building program in Rome that included the VATICAN, Pauline, and LATERAN Basilicas. He also built in Jerusalem, evidently under the instigation of HELENA, and at Antioch and Treves. Eventually he transferred the seat of his government to Byzantium, which he rebuilt as the Christian city of Constantinople. His baptism on his deathbed by EUSEBIUS OF NICOMEDIA, however, gave encouragement to the semi-Arian bishops, and, under the sons of Constantine, turmoil marked theological disputes. A series of synods and counter synods involved such champions of orthodoxy as ATHANASIUS OF ALEXANDRIA, HILARY OF POITIERS, and Pope LIBERIUS in a sequence of painful exiles.

Basil of Caesarea died (379) just as the orthodox cause was about to succeed at the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE I (381) under THEODOSIUS I (379–395), who made Christianity the official religion of the empire. Pagan opposition had reached a final climax under JULIAN THE APOSTATE (361–363), but, with the removal of the statue of Victory from the Senate, despite the protest of the pagan prefect SYMMACHUS, and with GRATIAN's (375–383) renunciation of the title Pontifex Maximus, the power of the pagan priesthood was broken. Laws had to be passed to prevent the complete dismantling of the pagan temples.

Asceticism and Spirituality. The papacy of Damasus (366–384) and the close of the fourth century saw the rapid rise of a spiritual movement called MONASTICISM. Although one can find certain precedents for a monastic lifestyle among some of the Old Testament prophets and in Jewish sects such as the Essenes, most historians correlate the rise of monasticism with the advent of the Christian Empire. Once Constantine became sole emperor of the entire ROMAN EMPIRE and started supporting the Church, persecutions stopped and martyrdom as a witness to faith no longer existed. Once Christianity became the official religion of the empire in 381 under Emperor Theodosius, many people joined the Church for political expedience. As it became easier and more comfortable to be a Christian than a member of any other religion, many Christians grew lax in the practice of their Faith.

During the fourth century, new witnesses to the Christian faith emerged in the form of monks. These men and women, the first of whom are referred to as the DESERT FATHERS and Desert Mothers, embraced a radical witness to the gospel by going out into the wilderness to live lives of penance and prayer for themselves and for the morally lax society they saw around them. They embraced an ascetic spirituality and entered into spiritual battle with evil in the world.

The word monk comes from the Greek word monachos meaning alone or solitary, and two basic forms of monastic living emerged, both having their origins in Egypt. The first type of monastic spirituality was that of the solitary monk. This form of monasticism is referred to as anchoritic (from the Greek anachorein, meaning withdraw) monasticism. St. Antony (251–356), who fled to the Egyptian desert around AD 270, is considered the founder of this form of monastic living. He embraced an eremitic (hermit comes from the Greek eremos, or desert, denoting someone who lives in the desert away from society) lifestyle on the east side of the Nile River, and over time many others followed Antony's example, living in colonies of hermitages with Antony as their spiritual leader.

A second form of monasticism, also arising in Egypt, is the communal or cenobitic (from the Greek koinos bios, meaning common life) form. St. PACHOMIUS is considered the founder of this form of monasticism. He established a community of ascetics around AD 320 in the desert at TABENNISI along the Nile River. Before his death he founded nine monastic communities of men and two of women, serving as spiritual leader of all of them. Each monastic community was divided into houses of monks, composed of twenty to thirty members, who lived according to a rule, or way of life devised by Pachomius to govern the community in the spirit of poverty and obedience. These early monastic communities were self-sufficient, with the members sharing times of prayer, worship, and labor.

Monasticism developed and spread quickly in Egypt, Syria, and Asia Minor and was stimulated in Italy and Gaul, particularly by Athanasius through his Life of Anthony the Hermit. It attracted many who desired to follow Jesus Christ in a radical way and embrace a life of prayer and self-denial to witness to the world that seeking Christ is the most essential thing in life. Pilgrimages to the Holy Land and to Rome, with the development of the cult of the holy places and of the martyrs, took on enormous proportions and influenced the rise of a popular literature that paralleled the spiritual and theological writings of Ephraem of Edessa, John CASSIAN, DIDYMUS THE BLIND, and Epiphanius of Constantia (Salamis). The Lausiac History of Palladius, the Apophthegmata Patrum (Sayings of the Desert Fathers), the Historia monachorum, and the Peregrinatio ad Loca sancta of Aetheria encouraged ascetical and monastic interests. The monastic movement affected men such as Jerome, AUGUSTINE, GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS, GREGORY OF NYSSA, CHROMATIUS OF AQUILEIA, and John Chrysostom. Many monks were called upon to serve as bishops, and others became great figures in the Church. Basil of Caesarea (the Great, c. 330–379) wrote a rule for monks in the Eastern Church and is considered the father of Eastern monasticism. Basil's rule stressed obedience to the local bishop and emphasized the social aspect of monasticism, reminding monks that they could not focus exclusively on their own salvation. MARTIN OF TOURS (d. 397) founded a monastery in Gaul and is often called the founder of Western Monasticism. Monasticism in the West received a definite ascetic and mystical advancement with the writings of EVAGRIUS PONTICUS, who introduced order and method into the process of contemplation. John Cassian (360–435), a monk trained in Palestine and Egypt, produced writings that were incredibly influential in Western monasticism. Benedict of Nursa (480–543) is considered the traditional father of Western monasticism; he composed a rule that provided the dominant model for monastic spirituality in the West, centered around the simple principles of prayer and work.

Patristic Theology. The conversion of Augustine brought a new theological development in the West that, particularly through AMBROSE of Milan and RUFINUS OF AQUILEIA, had been closely dependent on the Eastern Fathers. Augustine dealt with manichaeism, PELAGIANISM, and DONATISM, as well as with the problems posed by the Trinity, truth, education, grace, marriage, virginity, and concupiscence. In the East, John Chrysostom proved an indefatigable homilist, commenting on St. Paul and the whole of Scripture in a popular and practical fashion. Jerome translated the Old Testament from Hebrew, provided a guide to the hebraica veritas, and utilized the works of Origen and Eusebius of Caesarea to put Scripture study, exegesis, and Christian literature on a firm basis. He encouraged an ascetical movement in Rome, and he became involved in the first phase of the Origenistic controversy precipitated by EPIPHANIUS OF SALAMIS. This occasioned difficulties between Jerome and Rufinus, as well as with Bishop JOHN OF JERUSALEM, and eventually enabled THEOPHILUS OF ALEXANDRIA to depose John Chrysostom from the See of Constantinople, at the Synod of the OAK.

Two Theologies in the East. By the start of the fifth century, two principal theologies had emerged: that of Alexandria with its insistence on the divinity of Christ and an allegorical interpretation of the Scriptures in the pursuit of man's divinization in Christ, and that of Antioch, devoted to a literal interpretation of Scripture and an insistence on man's perfection through the humanity of Christ in the Resurrection. The differences led to the Christological controversies of the fifth and sixth centuries and the Councils of EPHESUS (431), CHALCEDON (451), and CONSTANTINOPLE II (553), which made vigorous efforts to clarify the problems presented by the two natures and one person in Christ.

These councils also proved occasions for the expression of the latent rivalries among the sees of Alexandria, Antioch, and Constantinople. The preeminence of the latter had been asserted at Constantinople I (381) when, based on its civil status as the new Rome, it was given a position of prominence second only to that of old Rome. Pope Damasus (366–384) voiced concern over this new status given to Constantinople, and this status was further challenged at the Council of Ephesus when CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA ousted NESTORIUS of Constantinople as a heretic. At the Council of Chalcedon, Constantinople was given Patriarchal status and jurisdiction over all the sees of the East. Pope LEO I denied the validity of this decision, citing the lack of Apostolic foundation for the church in Constantinople and the primacy of the see of Rome through Peter over the entire Church. The canons of Chalcedon also freed Jerusalem from the jurisdiction of Caesarea and gave it the fifth place of honor among the great sees. Thus, by 451 the pentarchy of great sees in the Church was established with an order of precedence among them: Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem. The bishop in each of these cities was given the title patriarch. The canons of the Councils of Constantinople I and Chalcedon, which altered the traditional primacy of sees (from Rome, Alexandria, Antioch), were not accepted until CONSTANTINOPLE IV in 870 and Lateran IV in 1215 (when the affirmation of Constantinople IV was clearly confirmed in the West). The interference of the emperors, particularly in the affairs of the Eastern Church, brought conflict with the patriarchs and a general, if reluctant, acknowledgment of the primacy of the bishop of Rome, to whom appeals in both doctrinal and disciplinary matters were regularly made.

Leo the Great. Pope Leo I (440–461) followed a tradition handed down at least from Siricius (384–399), through INNOCENT I (401–417), CELESTINE (422–432), and SIXTUS III (432–440), in giving the Church organization a legal determination. He felt himself the vicar of Christ in the person of Peter and entertained a "care for all the churches"; he made liturgical, moral, and doctrinal decisions for the East as well as the West. His Tome to Flavian helped clarify the Christological issue at Chalcedon, and, in collaboration with MARCIAN and PULCHERIA, then with Emperor LEO I (457–474), he attempted to stem the rise of MONOPHYSITISM in Egypt and Syria. He defended Rome and Italy from the depredations of the HUNS under Attila (406–453), and the VANDALS under Gaiseric (c. 400–477). In dealing with the emperors, he was conscious that he was a citizen of the empire; hence he deferred to their authority, yet felt that that same authority was entrusted to the civil ruler for the enhancement of the Christian religion. This issue was further clarified by Pope GELASIUS I (492–496), who spoke of the "world as governed by two sovereignties, the papal authority and the imperial power that come from God, the supreme sovereign."

Monophysitism. With the rebellion of TIMOTHY AELURUS and Peter Mongus (d. 490) in Alexandria and Peter the Fuller (d. 488) in Antioch, Monophysitism gradually assumed a deep political as well as doctrinal and spiritual character. The great Monophysite teachers, such as SEVERUS OF ANTIOCH (512–518) and PHILOXENUS OF MABBUGH, were not actually heretics in doctrine because they followed Cyril of Alexandria literally. Their power came from their literary competence and the emphasis they placed on the spiritual doctrine of the divinization of man in Christ; they were aided by the persecution of the imperial government, which they used to influence the lower clergy, the monks, and the people.

The Emperor ZENO issued his Henoticon (484) to clarify the Christological issue but merely succeeded in occasioning the ACACIAN SCHISM between Rome and Constantinople. This was continued under Emperor ANASTASIUS I (491–518), despite the efforts of popes ANASTASIUS II (496–498) and Symmachus (498–514) to achieve a reconciliation. The Roman intervention was complicated by the rise of the Ostrogothic kingdom of Italy under THEODORIC THE GREAT and the rivalry of the Roman factions, one of whom elected Symmachus, whereas the anti-Byzantine party selected the deacon Laurentius and appealed to the Ostrogoths for support. Three synods in Rome (c. 502) settled the election in favor of Symmachus, and, despite a campaign of calumny on the part of the Laurentians, Theodoric accepted Symmachus as the true pope.

Age of Justinian. In 518 JUSTIN I became emperor. He was Latin and Catholic, and with his nephew Justinian (527–565) he made peace with Rome, condemned the Monophysite factions, and supported Pope HORMISDAS (514–523), whose decree condemning both EUTYCHES and Nestorius and asserting the validity of Leo's Tome and the Council of Chalcedon was made the touchstone of orthodoxy. Theodoric dispatched Pope JOHN I (523–526) to Constantinople as an emissary; but despite an honorable reception, the pope's mission failed, and the king maltreated him on his return. The philosopher BOETHIUS and his intimates were also put to death in an anti-Byzantine outbreak.

Emperor JUSTINIAN I, a theologian and also an administrator, a legislator, and an autocrat, attempted to wipe out paganism and closed the University of Athens (529). He passed disabling legislation against Jews and heretics and introduced some Christian concepts into the Justinian code. At the suggestion of the deacon, later Pope Pelagius, he condemned Origenism as a possible solution to doctrinal troubles among the Palestinian monks. His close adviser THEODORE ASCIDAS suggested the condemnation of the THREE-CHAPTERS as a countermeasure. Together with the Monophysite cause, Ascidas received the support of the Empress THEODORA (1), who appeared to counter her husband's religious policies, while living an edifying private life with him.

In 532 Justinian called a colloquy of Severian Monophysite and orthodox bishops. He pursued a vigorous policy of suppression of apparent Nestorianism, attempted to appease the Monophysite monks with the Theopaschite formula, and finally brought Pope VIGILIUS (532–555) to the capital and convoked the Council of Constantinople II, which redefined the Christological doctrine in what has been termed a Neochalcedonian fashion. The pope refused to attend the council after suffering ignominious treatment; he had issued his own Judicatum or Verdict on the Three Chapters in 548. During the council he put out his Constitutum, which condemned the writings of the three incriminated theologians prout sonant (as they read) but refrained from condemning them in person. The council (seventh session) condemned the pope and separated itself from the sedens but not the sedes (the occupant, but not the See of Rome); and in December 553 the emperor finally forced the aged pope to accede to the condemnation of the Three Chapters with his Constitutum II, in which he repudiated his former stand.

On the death of Vigilius, to counter the theological rebellion of the Western bishops, Justinian selected Pelagius I (556–561) as pope despite his previous opposition to the council. Pelagius found the West in turmoil, supported in part by the In Defense of the Three Chapters of FACUNDUS OF HERMIANE and the exiled African bishops. Schisms broke out in Milan and Aquileia. Justinian had given Vigilius a PRAGMATIC SANCTION for the adjustment of civil affairs in Italy; and the pope protected the population against tax gatherers, the depredations of the soldiery, and the Lombard invasions. In his last years, the emperor favored the aphthartodocetic heresy attributed to JULIAN OF HALICARNASSUS. But his suppressive measure against the Monophysites had had little effect. They were countered by the organizational efforts of James BARADAI, and gradually Egypt and Syria became disaffected against the empire on both religious and nationalist issues.

In Gaul the conversion of CLOVIS (481–511) under the influence of his wife, the Burgundian princess Clotilda, brought the whole nation into the Church (as AVITUS OF VIENNE remarked) and checked the spread of Arianism by the Ostrogoths. The tomb of St. Martin of Tours became a national pilgrimage center. Despite the interference of the kings in ecclesiastical affairs, more than thirty synods were held between 511 and 614. Among the more outstanding churchmen of this period were REMIGIUS OF REIMS (d. 535), the great preacher CAESARIUS OF ARLES (d. 542), GERMAIN of Paris (d. 576), and the historian GREGORY OF TOURS (d. 594), as well as the poet Venantius FORTUNATUS of Poitiers (d. 601). The Gothic peoples, whose conversion had been effected by Bishop ULFILAS and by his translation of the Bible into Gothic, were gradually brought over from forms of Arianism to Catholicism.

Britain had been evangelized early; but the invasions of the Angles, Saxons, and Celts brought back paganism except in small sections of Wales and Cornwall.

Although PALLADIUS had been sent to Ireland by Pope Celestine in 431, the conversion of the island was due to St. PATRICK, who had studied at Lérins and AUXERRE and returned to Ireland about 432. The Irish Church was organized on a monastic basis, and Irish monks set out from foundations such as that of St. COMGALL at Bangor to Scotland, England, Gaul, Germany, and Italy, where they became an important aid in the development of the Church in the sixth and succeeding centuries.

Pope JOHN III (561–574) made a strenuous effort to protect Rome and Naples from the Lombards, who had conquered RAVENNA; and BENEDICT I (575–579) had to wait a full year before receiving imperial confirmation of his election from Constantinople. His successor, PELAGIUS II (579–590), turned to the Franks for protection against the LOMBARDS and supported LEANDER OF SEVILLE when he converted King Reccared (ruled 586–601) and the Arian VISIGOTHS to Catholicism.

Gregory the Great. BENEDICT OF NURSIA had laid the foundations of Benedictine monasticism with his monastery at MONTE CASSINO (c. 529) and evidently was encouraged by Pope AGAPETUS (535–536) in the composing of his rule, which displays pedagogical wisdom and well-balanced asceticism in leading the monks to a perfect following of Christ. Benedictine monasticism received a great stimulus from GREGORY I the great (590–604), who had served both as prefect of the city of Rome and as papal APOCRISIARIUS in Constantinople before being elected pope. Despite war and pestilence brought to Italy through the depredations of the Lombards and the continued schism in Milan, he initiated a far-sighted program of reform. He reformed church music and the liturgy, and, as his tombstone proclaimed, as the Consul Dei, he made efforts to bring the Germanic peoples closer to the papacy and sent AUGUSTINE OF CANTERBURY and his companions as missionaries to the British Isles. He protested the use of the title Ecumenical Patriarch for the archbishop of Constantinople. His pastoral and exegetical writings helped to preserve a modicum of ecclesiastical culture for succeeding ages. His Liber regulae pastoralis was translated into Greek during his own lifetime and into Anglo-Saxon by ALFRED THE GREAT. His Moralia is a practical handbook of pastoral morality, in the form of a commentary on the Book of job. His exegesis of the Gospels and of EZEKIEL, as well as his Dialogues on the lives and miracles of the Italian saints, though replete with legends, filled a great ascetical and spiritual need; and his 848 letters contain a major portion of the history of his age. While CASSIODORUS (d. c. 580), at his retreat in Vivarium, Calabria, preserved theological and literary learning through his Institutiones divinarum et saecularium lectionum and his Historia tripartita ecclesiastica, Gregory, as the servus servorum Dei, created the moral, doctrinal, and pastoral atmosphere that prevailed in the early MIDDLE AGES.

The first period of Church history came to a natural close with Gregory. The reasons for the rise and spread of the Christian Church have challenged the ingenuity and competence of historians, particularly in modern times, but the problem is impossible to solve without an acknowledgment of the intervention of divine providence in the course of human events. It is equally insolvable without a realization that the Church, although divine in its origin and objective, is governed by human beings whose perceptions and ambitions frequently trail far behind the grace and inspiration needed to give finality to the achievement of the kingdom of God on earth.

SEE ALSO ANCHORITES; APOPHTHEGMATA PATRUM; APOSTOLIC FATHERS; ASIA MINOR, EARLY CHURCH IN; BENEDICTINES; CANON, BIBLICAL; CANONICAL COLLECTION BEFORE GRATIAN; CENOBITES; CHRISTOLOGY, CONTROVERSIES ON (PATRISTIC); CONSTANTINOPLE, ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE OF; DECIUS, ROMAN EMPEROR; DIOCLETIAN, PERSECUTION OF; DOCETISM; DOMITILLA, FLAVIA, SS.; EPICUREANISM; FATHERS OF THE CHURCH; GAUL, EARLY CHURCH IN; GENESIS, BOOK OF; HEBREWS, EPISTLE TO THE; HENOTICON; JAMES, EPISTLE OF; JOHN, EPISTLES OF; JOHN, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO; JOSEPHUS, FLAVIUS; JULIANISTS (APHTHARTODOCETISM); LATERAN COUNCILS; LAUSIAC HISTORY (PALLADIUS); LUKE, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO; MITHRAS AND MITHRAISM; NERO, ROMAN EMPEROR; ORIGEN AND ORIGENISM; ORPHISM; PAUL, APOSTLE, ST.; PETER, APOSTLE, ST.; PHILIP, APOSTLE, ST.; PSEUDO-CLEMENTINES; PYTHAGORAS AND THE PYTHAGOREANS; QUMRAN COMMUNITY; STOICISM; SYNOPTIC GOSPELS; TRAJAN, ROMAN EMPEROR.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Karl Baus, "Von der Urgemeinde zur frühchristlichen Großkirche," in Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte, edited by Hubert Jedin (Freiburg, Germany 1962).

Karl Bihlmeyer, Church History, vol.1, Christian Antiquity, revised by Hermann Tüchle, translated by Victor E. Mills (Westminster, Md. 1958).

Karl Bihlmeyer and Hermann Tüchle, Kirchengeschichte, 3 vols., 17th ed. (Paderborn, Germany 1962).

Philip Carrington, The Early Christian Church, 2 vols. (London 1957–1960).

Erich Caspar, Geschichte de Papsttums von den Anfängen bis zur Höhe der Weltherrschaft, vol.1 (Tübingen, Germany 1930–1933).

Henry Chadwick, The Early Church, rev. ed. (New York 1993).

Jean Daniélou and Henri I. Marrou, The First Six Hundred Years, vol. 1, The Christian Centuries: A New History of the Catholic Church (New York 1964).

Angelo Di Berardino, ed., Encyclopedia of the Early Church, 2 vols. (New York 1992).

Louis Duchesne, Early History of the Christian Church: From Its Foundation to the End of the Fifth Century, 3 vols. (London 1909–1924).

Louis Duchesne, L'Église au VI^e siècle (Paris 1925).

Eusebius, Historia ecclesiastica, translated Hugh J. Lawlor and John E.L. Oulton, Eng. ed., 2 vols. (London 1927–1928).

Augustin Fliche and Victor Martin, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'ā nos jours, vols. 1–5 (Paris 1935).

W.H.C. Frend, The Rise of Christianity (Philadelphia 1984).

Robert McQueen Grant, Augustus to Constantine: The Rise and Triumph of Christianity in the Roman World (New York 1990).

Alois Grillmeier, Christ in Christian Tradition, translated by John S. Bowden, vol. 1 (Atlanta, Ga. 1975).

Philip Hughes, A History of the Church, 3 vols., rev. ed. (New York 1947–1949).

Trevor Gervase Jalland, The Church and the Papacy (London 1944).

Sébastien Le Nain de Tillemont, Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclésiastique des six premiers siècles, 16 vols. (Paris 1693–1712).

Robert Louis Wilken, The Spirit of Early Christian Thought: Seeking the Face of God (New Haven, Conn. 2003).

Rev. Francis X. Murphy CSSR
Professor of Patristic Moral Theology
Accademia Alfonsiana, Rome, Italy

Perry J. Cahall
Associate Professor of Historical Theology
Pontifical College Josephinum, Columbus, Ohio (2010)

II. MEDIEVAL

The history of the church in the MIDDLE AGES can be divided into three major periods, dating roughly from 600 to 1050, 1050 to 1300, and 1300 to 1500. In the first period the Western church was ruled collectively by its bishops, in somewhat uneasy harmony with secular rulers. Wars and missionary activity converted the remaining pagans in the West to Christianity. Those who wished to adopt a holier way of life increasingly chose Benedictine monasticism. During this time the papacy was only intermittently a factor in church governance in the West outside of ROME. In the second major period, however, the popes rather abruptly began exercising regular control over bishops and monasteries, playing an unprecedented role in the church's day-to-day business. During this time, many new varieties of religious life proliferated, including friars, canons regular, and hermits. Heresies and disputes over Christian doctrine arose as they had not since late antiquity; the beginning of this period indeed saw the final split between Latin Catholicism and Greek ORTHODOXY. This was also the time of the CRUSADES. This second period also experienced an enormous intellectual and artistic flourishing, including the creation of European universities and the building of its great cathedrals. During the third major period, papal prestige lessened, and the popes encountered new resistance to their authority. Although novel forms of the religious life continued to proliferate, concern for doctrinal difference diminished during the disasters, war, plague, and economic collapse of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Concern over moral lapses within the church as a whole and calls for renewal were nonetheless a constant throughout this period.

Early Middle Ages (600–1050). Europe in the year 600 had developed many of the ecclesiastical institutions that marked the entire Middle Ages. Those parts of the continent formerly part of the ROMAN EMPIRE were divided into dioceses, headed by bishops expected to practice chastity. Western Christianity was completely LATIN, and both politically and religiously the West drew further and further from Byzantium. The patriarch of Rome, the pope, was recognized in a general way as the successor to Peter, with at least an abstract moral authority even if only limited practical authority. Many men and some women sought a spiritual life in monasteries dedicated to local saints. The cities that had once been Roman provincial capitals and had become European cathedral cities persisted in shrunken form, but the human landscape was overwhelmingly rural.

Merovingian Kings and Anglo-Saxon Conversion. The two regions of the year 600 with the greatest influence on later medieval history were the Merovingian kingdoms—roughly corresponding to modern France, the Benelux countries, and the western parts of Germany—and Anglo-Saxon England. The Merovingian kings of the FRANKS had been Christian since the time of CLOVIS (d. 511). Although many Germanic tribes had adopted the Arian version of Christianity, Clovis converted from paganism to Roman Catholicism, in part due to his Christian wife, Clotildis. He thus had the full support of his bishops, and the Germanic Franks and the local Christianized Gallo-Roman peoples quickly intermarried. Clovis and his successors declared it their religious duty as well as politically expedient to conquer anyone (such as the VISIGOTHS) considered heretical. By the late sixth century these kings and their wives routinely supported and helped found monasteries for both monks and nuns.

Anglo-Saxon England, in contrast, had during the late fifth and sixth centuries lost most of the Christian culture established under Roman rule. The Germanic invaders had pushed Christianity to Britain's margins, especially into Scotland and Ireland. But in the late sixth century, missionaries from these margins began the serious work of converting the ANGLO-SAXONS, beginning with their kings—a task made easier because many had Christian queens. At the same time, missionaries from Rome, headed by AUGUSTINE OF CANTERBURY, also came to Britain, leading to tensions when it was discovered that during the previous century, while Celtic Christianity was isolated from the continent, important differences had developed in such areas as the calculation of Easter. The synod of Whitby (664) resolved these differences in favor of the Roman model, and England became a staunch center of Latin Christianity.

The Roman missionaries to England had been sent by Pope GREGORY I (590–604), called the Great, the most influential of the early medieval popes. Not long before, the Liber pontificalis had first been composed in Rome, tracing the history of its bishops back to Peter, and thus bolstering papal authority. Gregory, in the absence of secular leadership, also organized the defense of the city of Rome against the LOMBARDS, wrote biblical commentary, and helped popularize the BENEDICTINE RULE.

The Rule that BENEDICT OF NURSIA originally composed around 530 for his monastery of Montecassino in Italy thus became well known in the West. Providing a model of a self-sufficient rural house where monks both practiced manual labor and copied Christian and classical texts, it was well suited for a society rapidly losing urban culture; its mixture of rigor and recognition of human weakness also made it attractive. Other forms of monasticism, however, also flourished, especially the version that the missionary Columbanus (d. 615) brought from Ireland and established first at Luxeuil. As monasteries multiplied in the seventh century, many obtained grants of immunity from kings or bishops, in which these authorities promised not to enter the cloister without permission or to appropriate monastic property.

Cult of the Saints. The monasteries of the seventh century were typically dedicated to saints, in most cases a local holy bishop or someone supposedly martyred in the region back in the second or third centuries. Such monasteries might be built on the site of an old cemetery at the edge of town. Cathedrals, in contrast, were most commonly dedicated to a universal saint, such as MARY or STEPHEN. In either case, by the seventh century it was considered normal to put saints' relics into an altar. Reverence for the saints was part of the general sense that the Christian dead were still part of the living community. Unlike the pagan Romans, who had not wanted the dead anywhere near, early Christians met in catacombs and cemeteries and, once they started to build churches, built them quite literally on the bones of their predecessors. Merovingian-era sarcophagi may still be found in many crypts.

Saints, as a living presence, acted as defenders of their monasteries. With few practical means of defense at their disposal, monks turned to saints for protection. Saints' lives and miracle stories are full of accounts in which wrathful saints blasted malefactors. Those without relics of appropriately powerful saints might steal them from another church, claiming a vision that the saint wished to be relocated. The body of Saint Benedict moved from Montecassino to France in this way. Alternately, churches could buy relics from JERUSALEM or Rome, the two principal sources.

Impact of Islam. The history of Latin Christendom was sharply influenced by the rise of ISLAM. This religion, third of the great Religions of the Book, was given form by Mohammed, who claimed to be the last in the line of prophets that included ABRAHAM, MOSES, and JESUS. From ARABIA in the early seventh century, Islam quickly spread throughout the Middle East and North Africa in the decades after Mohammed's death. The unity of the so-called Roman Lake, the Mediterranean, was broken. The Christian patriarchs of ANTIOCH, ALEXANDRIA, and Jerusalem lost most of their influence as Islam became the principal religion in their regions, leaving the patriarchs in Rome and CONSTANTINOPLE as the only two not under Muslim dominion. These latter two were increasingly separated from each other, as North Africa, the one-time home of AUGUSTINE OF HIPPO, became Muslim and Arabic speaking, and Saracen pirates disrupted long-time trade routes. The last of the great Christological debates of late antiquity disappeared along with the disputants. The European center of attention shifted northward, away from the Mediterranean.

From Africa, Muslim armies swept across Spain in the early eighth century. Some crossed the Pyrenees and reached western France before being stopped in 732 at the Battle of Tours, where they were defeated by the forces of CHARLES MARTEL, mayor of the palace (viceroy) for the Merovingian kings. The Pyrenees became the Christian-Muslim border; about a century later Christians in Spain (with Frankish support) began the long, slow process of the reconquista, which eventually drove the last Muslims from Spain in 1492. In the meantime, Islam became for western Christians the primary symbol of the evil Other, often equated mistakenly with paganism.

Carolingian Era. During the early eighth century, the Merovingian dynasty nearly died out in the male line, making it hard for Charles Martel (d. 741) to find a king to serve. Members of his family, now called the CAROLINGIANS, became de facto Frankish rulers. They sponsored the missionaries Willibrord and BONIFACE—the latter an Englishman—as they sought to spread Christianity in what is now Germany. But the Carolingians also seized church property as their own, as the MEROVINGIANS had not, and often appointed their favorites to bishoprics—including laymen.

In 751 Charles Martel's son, Pippin the Short, with the permission of the pope, deposed the last Merovingian king, ending a dynasty that had ruled the Franks for three centuries. A few years later, Pope STEPHEN II traveled to Francia to bless Pippin and his family. Perhaps in gratitude, Pippin issued the Donation of Pippin, giving the territory he had conquered around Rome to the papacy. This donation served as the model for the forged DONATION OF CONSTANTINE, which purported that, when CONSTANTINE left for Byzantium in the fourth century, he gave all he had in Italy to the pope—this forgery was assumed authentic until the RENAISSANCE.

Pippin's son, CHARLEMAGNE (king 768–814), took firm control of his kingdom's bishops and abbots, many of whom also served as administrators in his court. Western monasteries suffered in the eighth and early ninth centuries from secular appropriation of their property, often with royal connivance. But Charlemagne, although he founded no monasteries himself, did support some of those located in the recently Christianized lands to the east, and in his councils he sought to regularize monasticism under the Benedictine Rule. He sponsored scholars at his court, notably the Englishman ALCUIN, who worked to create a clean, correct copy of the BIBLE to serve as a model for all copies throughout the kingdom.

Charlemagne, like his father before him, went to Italy to help defend the pope from his enemies when the distant Byzantine emperor proved of no assistance. Popes had been writing the Carolingians intermittently for two generations on doctrinal issues; Charlemagne had all their letters copied into a book in 791, indicating his respect for the papacy. Roman and Greek Mother Church. Mater Ecclesia buttressing the shelter of a group of clergy and a group of laymen, miniature on a late-eleventh-century Exultet Roll written and illuminated at Monte Cassino.

Christianity continued to draw away from each other in the late eighth century, especially over the issues of papal authority, the Byzantine position on images (misunderstood in the West), and the Western addition (rejected in the East) of the phrase filioque, "and the son," to the statement that the Holy Spirit proceeded from the Father. In gratitude to Charlemagne and with the sense that the emperor in the distant East did not deserve the title, on Christmas Day 800 Pope LEO III crowned Charlemagne emperor.

Two sets of Roman emperors now existed: those in Byzantium, successors to the emperors of antiquity, who indeed continued until 1453, and those in the West, Charlemagne and his successors. From the twelfth century onward, the emperors in the West were titled Holy Roman Emperors, both to distinguish them from the Byzantines and to assert their spiritual authority. But the real issue raised by the events of 800 was the intimacy of the tie between pope and emperor: A king could not become emperor until a pope crowned him.

During the ninth century, churchmen began exercising more control over marriage, which went from being in general practice a secular arrangement to recognition as a Sacrament. Theologians, especially HINCMAR OF REIMS, insisted on monogamy as the only possible form of marriage, to be entered into by mutual consent. Highly contested divorce cases in the royal family reinforced the indissolubility of marriage. Also during this period, the FALSE DECRETALS were created to argue (not entirely successfully) that bishops were to be judged only by the distant pope—meaning in practice that they answered to no one.

Charlemagne and his son Louis the Pious (814–840) ruled a kingdom that included not just the old Merovingian territories but also much of modern Germany and Italy. But starting with Charlemagne's grandsons, this kingdom was divided and redivided among heirs. France and England were attacked by Vikings, Germany by Magyars, and the Mediterranean coast by Saracens; monasteries, with their wealth, were especially tempting prizes. Counts and dukes who mounted an effective defense against these invaders gained both prestige and followers, eventually replacing the last Carolingians as kings. In both France and England, the Vikings settled down during the tenth century—in Normandy in France, in Yorkshire in England—married local women, and adopted Christianity. Scandinavia itself, however, remained pagan until after the year 1000.

Monastic Reform and Renewal. In the tenth and early eleventh centuries, the West experienced a surge of monastic reform. Few monasteries had been founded west of the Rhine between the early eighth century and the mid ninth, and monasteries new and old had suffered from barbarian attacks and appropriation of their property by laymen. But during the late ninth and tenth centuries, new monastic communities began slowly to appear, most notably in rural areas. As in the Merovingian period, male monasteries far outnumbered nunneries. Most monks entered the religious life as children, as offerings (oblates) from their parents.

In the tenth century those who controlled ancient religious houses, either in ruins or populated by monks leading a less than regular life, sought to reform them. Powerful laymen and bishops gave such a monastery to the abbot of a flourishing house to renew or reform to the observance of the Benedictine Rule. The monastery of Cluny in Burgundy, founded in 909 or 910, was often asked to reform older houses in this way. Most commonly the abbot of the reforming house acted as abbot of the newly reformed house as well. When the abbot died, each monastery elected an independent abbot of its own. During the eleventh century, however, Cluny and some other highly respected monasteries, such as Gorze and St.-Bénigne of Dijon, began to acquire groups of dependent houses. Bishops and great laymen from as far away as Spain and Italy asked Cluny's abbot to reform monasteries in their regions. As laymen became increasingly concerned over the state of their souls, many made generous gifts to houses following a rigorous Rule. At the same time the PEACE OF GOD became established, a series of councils held by bishops in which knights were persuaded to swear not to attack the defenseless, both peasants and the clergy.

German Kings and the Papacy. By the tenth century the western empire was no longer all that Charlemagne had once ruled but specifically Germany and Italy. Under the Ottonian and Salian kings of Germany, the normal pattern was for a king to be elected by the German princes and then travel to Rome to be crowned emperor. Extensive fighting with the emerging Italian city-states and, in some cases, deposition of a pope whom the Germans did not find suitable usually accompanied these expeditions.

The German kings ruled through their bishops. Their great counts and dukes proved too independent minded, so the kings preferred to use bishops, who, not having sons, would not be tempted to appropriate land and authority to enrich their descendants. The royal court had a school to train future bishops. Cathedral priests were supposed to give their consent to episcopal appointments, but in practice the king decided. The German bishops still were, as a group, moral and conscientious rulers of their dioceses.

The emperors assumed that they had the same sort of authority over the Italian bishops—including the popes—as they had over the German bishops, but this was much harder to enforce, as they rarely visited Italy other than for their imperial coronations. In 1046 King Henry III went to Rome and was shocked to find three men claiming to be pope. He deposed all three and had one of the German bishops who accompanied him consecrated as pope. Although this pope quickly died, as did his successor, the next pope, LEO IX (1049–1054), originally from Alsace, asserted rather abruptly that the papacy was true head of the ecclesiastical hierarchy—a principle that would, a generation later, lead to a major conflict with the imperial dynasty that had reformed the papacy.

High Middle Ages (1050–1300). The emergence of a strong and consistent papal role in church governance was one of the most significant developments of the High Middle Ages. But the period from the middle of the eleventh century to the end of the thirteenth was also marked by a multiplication of forms of the religious life, including new varieties of Benedictine monasticism and the radically different way of life of the friars. This period of great intellectual ferment witnessed both the birth of the universities and development of Catholic theology. Also during this period the relationship between church and state was contested and redefined.

Popes and the Investiture Controversy. The new position of the papacy was made clear at the Council of REIMS (1049). Here Pope Leo IX ordered all attending bishops to attest, under oath, that they had been canonically elected "by clergy and people." In fact a number had been put into office by their secular relatives or had even bought the bishopric. Feeling the terrifying eye of Saint Remigius upon them, many confessed the irregularity of their accession and resigned. If the bishop had a vile reputation, Pope Leo accepted his resignation, but in other cases he reinstated the repentant bishop, establishing the principle that the pope was the ultimate authority as to who should or should not hold office.

This council also marked the beginning of what is often called the GREGORIAN REFORM, a conscious effort to improve the morals of the clergy, end simony, and to draw a sharper distinction between the clerical and secular realms. The newly active papacy—not entirely intentionally—also drew a sharper distinction between Eastern and Western Christianity; in 1054 a mission to Constantinople ended when both sides excommunicated each other in an essentially permanent breach. In Western Europe, priests' concubines, much less wives, were now strictly forbidden. Churches in secular hands were to be given to bishops or monasteries. The election of bishops and abbots came under close scrutiny; with the role of the laity reduced to acclamation. From the 1050s onward, the newly organized college of cardinals, made up of the heads of Rome's principal churches, had the exclusive right to choose new popes, thus excluding the Roman laity and the emperors.

The lay-clerical tension came to a head in the 1070s in what has become known as the Investiture Controversy, because the specific issue was whether kings could invest newly elected bishops with their rings and staffs. In practice, the real issue was who was the ultimate authority in a Christian empire, the pope or the emperor. Pope GREGORY VII (1073–1085) took a much sharper line than had any of his predecessors. The emperors, long used to controlling their bishops, were unwilling to back down. Gregory and Emperor Henry IV sought to rally both the German princes and the German bishops to their side, going so far as to support an anti-pope and an anti-emperor.

Henry and Gregory intermittently reconciled, but neither they nor their successors were able to reach a permanent solution until the Concordat of WORMS in 1122. This compromise, which pleased no one, made it clear that the emperor would not invest new bishops, but he was still allowed to observe episcopal elections. The conflict calmed down for a generation after Worms but then broke out again in the 1150s when Frederick Barbarossa was emperor and ALEXANDER III, pope. The fundamental relationship between the two greatest Western powers remained fraught. The French and English kings, meanwhile, had continued to exercise a good deal of control over the choice of bishops in their kingdoms, which was generally overlooked by the popes, who could fight only one battle at a time. Only when these kings did something as outrageous as HENRY II of England encouraging the murder of Archbishop Thomas BECKET in 1170 did the popes turn on them.

The Crusades. The period of the initial conflict between church and state was also the period in which the CRUSADES began, the effort by western Christendom to conquer the Holy Land. The Byzantine emperor asked Pope URBAN II for help against the Turks, and the pope was pleased to comply as a reestablishment of friendly relations between East and West. But when he called for volunteers in 1095 at the Council of Clermont, he inspired his audience in ways he had not anticipated. Urging knights to save their souls in fighting Muslims rather than lose their souls in fighting each other, he launched a movement in which the goal quickly changed from assisting the Byzantines to capturing Jerusalem.

With shouts of "God wills it," knights headed toward the Holy Land, spearheaded by a disorganized group that started their trip by massacring Jews in the Rhineland. The somewhat more organized wave, whose knights despised the Byzantines (a sentiment that was returned), actually managed, to everyone's surprise, to capture the city of Jerusalem and establish a Christian kingdom centered there in 1100. The First Crusade, as it is now known, was, however, the only successful one, although no one knew it at the time.

Church and State. A fourteenth-century manuscript illumination depicting a pope with clergy assembled on the left and monarchs on the right. © HISTORICAL PICTURE ARCHIVE/CORBIS

Knights continued to travel to the Holy Land to fight the Muslims in the following years. Because it was immediately evident that crusading was both extremely expensive and extremely dangerous—even if one were not killed by the infidel, drowning and disease were constant threats—those who went were primarily concerned for their souls. The Orders of the Knights Templar and the Knights Hospitaller, both founded within some two decades of the capture of Jerusalem, sought to combine the best of knighthood, the warrior skills and discipline, with the best of the monastic life, in protecting pilgrims and fighting Muslims.

When the county of EDESSA, on the outskirts of the Kingdom of Jerusalem, fell in 1144, it was considered a judgment on the crusaders, who, after all, believed that GOD had willed their capture of the Holy Land.

The Second Crusade, led by Kings LOUIS VII of France and Conrad III of Germany, failed to recapture Edessa in spite of its royal leadership—no kings had accompanied the First Crusade. When SALADIN, leader of the Turks, captured Jerusalem itself in 1187, Kings Richard I (Lionheart) of England, Frederick Barbarossa of Germany, and Philip II of France led an even more ambitious Third Crusade, which also failed.

The Fourth Crusade, launched in 1204, never even reached the Holy Land; instead it ended up sacking Constantinople and establishing a Latin empire there. The Byzantines eventually retook their capital, but in the meantime the eastern Roman Empire had been irrevocably weakened against the steady encroachment of the Turks, who finally captured Constantinople (modern Istanbul) in 1453. After 1204 the heart went out of the crusading movement, and although new Crusades were announced intermittently for centuries—most notably by LOUIS IX of France, who never got closer to the Holy Land than EGYPT—the movement was essentially over.

Monasticism in the High Middle Ages. The eleventh and twelfth centuries were marked by the rapid spread of monasticism as knights either made gifts to monasteries or converted to the monastic life themselves with the same religious enthusiasm that inspired many to go on Crusade. In the eleventh century many old monasteries, long abandoned or fallen into disrepute, were refounded with strict observance of the Benedictine Rule. Others, especially in urban settings, became houses of canons regular in the twelfth century, following the so-called Augustinian rule.

Beginning in the late eleventh century, many new monasteries were founded, adopting a determinedly ascetic lifestyle, preferentially far from the cities where most Merovingian-era monasteries had been located. Most significant was Cîteaux, founded in 1098, which quickly attracted enough converts that it established daughter houses and, within a generation or two, created an organized structure linking mother and daughter houses, the first true monastic order in the West.

The CISTERCIANS took only adult converts to the monastic life, not child oblates. They deliberately kept their churches unadorned, their diet extremely simple, and their clothing and bedding minimalist; they did not even dye the wool for their habits, and were thus called White Monks. Their adherence to collective as well as individual poverty was considered a mark of especial holiness, and (perhaps ironically) inspired a number of aristocrats to make them extensive gifts if not indeed to convert themselves. By the second half of the twelfth century, Cistercian houses had spread from their original center in Burgundy and were found in much of Europe.

The best-known member of the Cistercian order was Bernard, abbot of Clairvaux (d. 1153). As a knight himself before his conversion, he appreciated the sinfulness of a knightly lifestyle as well as its appeal and was instrumental in writing the Rule for the Knights Templar. He did not hesitate to criticize either popes or kings if he thought it appropriate: He railed against LOUIS VII's "incestuous" marriage and sent the king on the Second Crusade, and chided Pope EUGENIUS III (1145–1153), formerly his pupil, on letting the business of the papal curia detract from spiritual matters.

Although the Cistercians were the most famous of the twelfth-century forms of monasticism, they were by no means alone. Other Benedictine houses were founded and attracted converts, and the Cluniacs, who had seemed in the eleventh century to embody the best of monasticism, continued to flourish and became an organized order in the thirteenth century, in imitation of the Cistercians, establishing permanent lines of communication between houses and enforcing uniformity of practice. The CARTHUSIANS, who began about the same time as the Cistercian order, created a quite different version of the monastic life, in which the "monastery" was composed of a series of hermit cells. The PREMONSTRATENSIANS, founded by Norbert, adopted a version of the Augustinian rule but practiced austerity and sought wilderness locations.

Although male religious always outnumbered female religious, nunneries also multiplied during this period as houses provided an organized religious life both for widows and for consecrated virgins—as well as for women whose husbands became monks. The order of Fontevraud, founded at the beginning of the twelfth century, was the most successful of those devoted especially to women. Hildegard, abbess of Bingen, became well known in her own time for her mystical writings and musical compositions, and did not hesitate to instruct kings and popes.

Art and Architecture. Most art in the High Middle Ages was religious art, and churches were built in the latest styles, their building supervised by creative and highly skilled architects. Early medieval churches had been small and simple by both the standards of the Roman Empire and of the twelfth and later centuries, but their interiors were lavishly decorated. These churches were for the most part replaced during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, so that few Merovingian- or Carolingian-era churches now exist, except for their crypts.

The style in which churches were built in the eleventh and early twelfth centuries, now called Romanesque (or Norman in England), continued the general style of Roman architecture: columns, rounded arches, and solid stonework. Rounded stone vaults, however, were used instead of the flat ceilings of classical Roman basilicas. Romanesque churches were decorated with carvings, especially on the capitals at the tops of columns, often depicting biblical scenes or lives of the saints. A semicircular tympanum over the main doors typically showed Christ in majesty, surrounded either by the apostles or by the symbols of the four evangelists. These carvings, quite crude in the early eleventh century, became increasingly sophisticated as the technique of stone carving, nearly lost in the early Middle Ages, rapidly improved.

By the beginning of the twelfth century, Romanesque style was highly developed and widely adopted for monasteries. Its greatest achievement was the church known as Cluny III, the biggest church in the West—to hold the large numbers of monks and pilgrims—until SAINT PETER'S BASILICA half a millennium later. Cluny III was marked by decorative carvings and high, octagonal towers. It was deplorably dismantled by NAPOLEON, but Burgundy still has a number of Romanesque churches influenced by Cluny, including Vézelay and Paray-le-Monial. Cistercian churches were much simpler than other Romanesque churches, with no carvings; they did not even have towers. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX railed against decorations on churches as both distracting and needlessly expensive.

In the middle of the twelfth century, there emerged a New Style for churches, as it was then called—now called Gothic—characterized by pointed arches, ribbed vaults, and greater height. Although Romanesque churches were built to last, with heavy pillars and thick walls—some were bombed in World War II and came through surprisingly intact—Gothic churches were built with taller and thinner walls that allowed for more windows. The first Gothic church is now considered to be the abbey church of St.-Denis, built by Suger, and the first Gothic cathedral that of Sens.

This light and airy style quickly attracted attention, and cathedrals began to be rebuilt in the New Style. Notre-Dame of Paris, originally built without its now distinctive flying buttresses, found that its thinner walls were starting to bow outward within a generation of its construction, and the buttresses were retrofitted. In the thirteenth century such buttresses were built into Gothic churches from the beginning. The cathedral of Bourges was built with a higher vaulted nave than any stone structure before or since, some fifty meters high, but its collapse showed that height had reached its limits. The stone carvings on these buildings had a finesse and realism not seen since classical antiquity. Most European cathedrals had not been rebuilt since the Carolingian era, and, in the general rebuilding of the late twelfth and thirteenth centuries, these cathedrals outshone the Romanesque churches of the nearby monasteries.

The larger windows encouraged the development of stained glass. The Sainte-Chapelle in Paris, built to house the CROWN OF THORNS brought back from the Holy Land, is the epitome of thirteenth-century stained glass, its walls almost entirely windows. Such windows typically told stories from the lives of the saints in a series of small images. At the same time Bibles and prayer books were illustrated with exquisite, colorful images, called illuminations, often creating an entire scene within the loop of a capital letter.

Rise of the Universities. The religious enthusiasm of the High Middle Ages also led to a great expansion of interest in learning, especially theology but also the philosophy of classical antiquity, whose approaches were used to address questions on the nature of the Christian religion. In the late eleventh century wandering teachers, schoolmasters at cathedrals, and monastic schools predominated—the latter indeed had been the major contributors to education for half a millennium—but in the early twelfth century, certain schools began attracting both the best teachers and students who wanted an advanced education without necessarily becoming clerics. By the late twelfth century, some of these developed into the first European universities.

Two figures epitomize the early twelfth-century thirst for learning, Anselm and Abelard. Anselm (d. 1109), abbot of Bec in Normandy and then archbishop of Canterbury, was perhaps the first to attempt a logical proof for the existence of God that did not require revelation. Although his "ontological" proof was not found altogether convincing (THOMAS AQUINAS, for example, later dismissed it), it demonstrates a strong desire to integrate the tools of pagan philosophy into religious issues. Anselm thus marks the beginning of a period in which faith and reason, far from being opposed, worked together.

This certainly did not mean that any version of religious speculation was accepted. Peter ABELARD (d. 1142), who began his career dealing with the thorny issue of UNIVERSALS, derived ultimately from PLATO—he argued that universals were real, but only as a mental construct—was suspected of heresy when he attempted to apply these principles to the Trinity, itself a universal. Accused by Bernard of Clairvaux of writing "stupidology" rather than "theology," he was forced to recant.

Yet Abelard received no opposition to his most significant work, "Sic et Non," a series of questions on faith and doctrine which he answered both Yes and No, backing up all his answers on both sides with citations from the Bible, the Church Fathers, and pronouncements of popes and councils. The contradictions inherent in a thousand years of Christian doctrine were undeniable. Abelard did not resolve them, leaving that as an exercise for the reader, but it was clear that reasoning, not just appeal to authority, would be necessary to find ultimate answers. This approach, centered on the contradictions in received tradition, became known as the SCHOLASTIC METHOD, adopted as the normal form of teaching advanced topics. During the 1140s, PETER LOMBARD in Paris and Gratian (d. c. 1155) in Bologna adopted this approach in what became the standard textbooks in, respectively, theology and canon law.

Gratian taught at the University of BOLOGNA, the first European university, whose foundation is traditionally dated to 1100. Bologna had a copy of Justinian's lawcode from the sixth century, and it quickly became the university for the study of both laws, Roman and canon. From the middle of the twelfth century on, most members of the papal curia and indeed most popes were trained at Bologna. Paris meanwhile became the center for the study of theology, with a charter from King Philip II in 1200. Paris, like most universities, developed out of both the cathedral school and schools attached to nearby churches; its officers (chancellor, dean, provost) carried the same titles as officers in the cathedral chapter. Other universities were founded during the thirteenth century, including Oxford and Cambridge in England for students who did not want to cross the Channel, and Salerno and Montpellier, both of which concentrated on medicine.

Universities were places of fairly wide-open intellectual inquiry during the thirteenth century, where the pagan philosophers of classical antiquity, Hebrew and Arabic philosophers, and the Church Fathers were all studied. Both classical authors and commentary on them often reached Latin Europe via Toledo in Spain, where they were translated from Arabic. The writings of ARISTOTLE, who had been little known in the early Middle Ages, became widely available, and he came to be considered the philosopher, replacing Plato. In all of this it was taken for granted that one could not simply refer to earlier teachings for answers to complex questions; rather, the whole purpose of intellectual inquiry was to find out what those answers were.

The most important theologians at Paris in the thirteenth century were Thomas Aquinas and BONAVENTURE (both d. 1274), respectively holders of the Dominican and Franciscan chairs of theology. Aquinas incorporated Aristotelian thought and approaches extensively into his Summa theologica, which used the scholastic method to tie together pagan and Christian thought and the Old and New Testaments in what immediately became a standard work of Catholic theology. Bonaventure put greater stress on divine illumination than human reasoning, but he too was steeped in Greek philosophy.

Although Aristotle and Plato were completely accepted at Paris, others were treated with more suspicion, such as AVERROËS and what was labeled his double truth. Toward the end of the thirteenth century, some of the masters of the university worried that material actually antithetical to Christianity was being broadly disseminated. In 1277 a series of books were condemned, and the undergraduates were no longer supposed to read them, although they were still available to the faculty. The West during this period also began taking a harder line toward local Jews and Muslims.

Heresy in the High Middle Ages. The spiritual questing of the twelfth century, which marked both the monasteries and the nascent universities, also gave rise to serious heresies for the first time since late antiquity. Most heretics believed themselves devout Christians, although the bishops disagreed. The masters at the universities were rarely accused of heresy, and neither were ordinary peasants or townspeople.

Many of those accused of heresy had tried to preach repentance to the broader population, believing that they followed the example of the Apostles. Such preachers usually had not been properly trained, and thus could not be trusted to preach correct doctrine, especially if they suggested that the Sacraments were unnecessary. Generally bishops tried unsuccessfully to persuade such preachers to settle down in a monastery. ROBERT OF ARBRISSEL, founder of Fontevraud, for example, ignored repeated attempts to restrict him to the cloister, and the wandering preachers known as the Waldensians spent the final decades of the twelfth century skating along the edge of heresy.

Occasionally a charismatic preacher was also a social revolutionary, one who encouraged his followers to believe that the hierarchical structure of society, far from reflecting the hierarchy of heaven (the normal theological explanation), was inherently evil. For example, the movement of the Cappuciati, or white capes, in the 1180s began as an effort, supposedly inspired by the Virgin, to eliminate local brigands but quickly developed into an attack on all aristocrats. Such movements remained small and local and were routinely and swiftly put down.

The most serious heresy to threaten western Christianity in the High Middle Ages was that of the Cathars of southern France. This was more than a variant of Christianity (although again its adherents claimed to be good Christians); it was a different religion, based on dualism, the idea of an eternal struggle between good and evil. Although accused by their enemies of orgies and cannibalism, the Cathars seem to have sought to purify themselves of the taint of the physical. Their religion was widely adopted throughout the Mediterranean region both by ordinary people and by some of the most powerful.

Unsuccessful efforts were made to persuade the Cathars of their error; Cistercian preachers traveled regularly to southern France to try to convert the heretics. Finally in 1209, in response to the murder of a papal legate, the pope turned from persuasion to force, fearing that the heresy had become a "cancer" that would eat away the "body" of the church. The Fourth Lateran Council of 1215 formally denounced Cathar beliefs. The Albigensian Crusade was a long and bloody war that ended with the thorough defeat of the heretics—and, for that matter, the deaths of a number of perfectly orthodox Catholics. Because many heretics went underground, the West launched its first inquisition to search out those in hiding. Although, as in the twelfth century, efforts were made to reintegrate repentant heretics into the Christian community, the recalcitrant were burned, and many heretics, believing that they were right, refused to recant what they considered the true religion.

The Friars. The inquisition against the Cathars was spearheaded by the DOMINICANS, one of the two recently established orders of friars. In essence, the friars, both the Friars Minor and the Friars Preacher—or the FRANCISCANS and the Dominicans as they came to be known, in honor of their founders, FRANCIS OF ASSISI and DOMINIC—were an orthodox version of the wandering preaching that had seemed disturbingly heretical (at least potentially) in the twelfth century.

Both orders of friars were based on the same principles as inspired monasticism: personal poverty, a life of chastity and charity, obedience to superiors. But while monks had followed this life withdrawn from the world behind cloister walls, friars lived out in the world, preaching to the populace rather than praying for them from a distance. They also adopted a much more radical version of poverty than had the monks, especially the Franciscans, who initially refused to own property collectively, and whom Francis himself had urged not to save an apple or crust of bread from one day to the next or even to touch coins.

Unlike other wandering preachers, the friars sought approval from the papacy. The Fourth Lateran Council of 1215 officially recognized them, even while ordaining that no further religious orders should be established. Two chairs of theology were established at the University of Paris for the friars. The friars' stress on poverty reflected a society in which the overall economic flourishing made destitution less an inevitable disaster and more of a choice, and thus (at least potentially) more holy.

The emphasis of the Friars Minor on absolute poverty, however, soon caused a split within the order. Within a generation of Francis's death, his followers were dividing into the Spirituals, who claimed to be following his original teachings and imitating the life of Christ, and the Conventuals, who were more willing to relax some of the severest restrictions on property. It did not help that the Spirituals associated themselves with the "dusty footed preachers" who, it was prophesied, would come into their own in 1260—the year when the so-called Joachite heresy predicted the beginning of a Third Age, after a First Age that had supposedly begun with the world's creation in 1260 BC and a Second Age that had begun with the birth of Christ. The failure of the world to be transformed in 1260 did not lessen the Spirituals' growing alienation from the church hierarchy, culminating in 1323 when Pope JOHN XXII declared it heretical to assert that Christ had not owned property.

Highpoint and Decline of the Papacy. The friars gained approval under INNOCENT III (1198–1216), whose reign marked the highpoint of the power and prestige of the medieval papacy. He had only weak emperors to contend with, because Frederick Barbarossa's son Henry VI had died the year before Innocent took office, leaving a very young heir, FREDERICK II. Frederick promised to be an obedient son of the church, and Innocent died without learning how wrong he had been to believe him. Both King Philip II of France, who tried to put aside his wife, and King John of England, who refused to accept the new archbishop of Canterbury, were forced to yield by the pope.

Both the Fourth Crusade and the Albigensian Crusade were launched during Innocent's reign. Although neither did anything to restore Christian rule to the Holy Land, they did indicate that popes could expect to be heeded when they called for a holy war. Innocent was also very successful in organizing the affairs of the papal curia. By delegating most cases to local bishops or to legates, he was able to reserve his own decisions for the most important cases. Popes had long been overwhelmed by cases appealed from throughout Europe, but now he dealt with pressing cases in a short period of time—and, while at it, undercut the forgers who had provided genuine-looking papal bulls for those who did not care for lengthy waits. He also kept a record of all his rulings in a series of registers, soon imitated by the secular kings.

Innocent's greatest achievement was the Fourth Lateran Council of 1215, the largest ecumenical council since late antiquity. As well as condemning heresy, approving the establishment of the friars, and calling for a new crusade, the council made a number of significant doctrinal decisions. All Christians were commanded to confess and to receive Communion at least once a year. Priests were forbidden to participate in judicial ordeals. The council reaffirmed papal primacy and spelled out the nature of transubstantiation. It reduced the number of degrees of consanguinity from seven to four, thus making it more difficult for couples to "discover" that their marriages were incestuous, in essence getting divorce on demand.

This council marked the pinnacle of what has been called the papal monarchy. European kings were all what the curia considered properly deferential by 1216. Indeed, John of England declared England a fief of the papacy to escape the strictures of MAGNA CARTA, which, however, his infant son was forced to confirm on John's death. Yet in the decades after Innocent's death, his successors faced serious opposition from Emperor Frederick II.

Frederick, in spite of promising to give up Sicily—as king of both Germany and Sicily he effectively had the papacy surrounded—never seems to have intended to do so. He promised to go on Crusade, and, after long delaying, ended up negotiating with the Muslims rather than fighting them. Finally, fed up, Pope INNOCENT IV held the 1245 Council of Lyon to depose him. Having accused him of perjury and heresy and reiterating the Donation of Constantine's subjection of imperial to papal rule, the council deposed Frederick, but he refused to step down, and indeed called on other European kings to support him. The papacy now entered into open war against him. When Frederick died in 1250, papal agents hunted down and had killed all of Frederick's sons and grandsons, legitimate and illegitimate. Sicily and Germany would never again be ruled by the same king; the pope invited the French king's brother to take the crown of Sicily. But the pope's political victory severely undercut the spiritual authority of the office.

Late Middle Ages (1300–1500). Compared to the previous eight centuries, the late Middle Ages made a relatively small impact on the overall history of the church, and these years are too often seen merely as prelude to the reforms of the sixteenth century. The centralized governing authority of the papacy, built up over three centuries, was substantially weakened. Charges of corruption and laxness among the clergy were widespread. Although people of the era often expressed devout religiosity, more and more they did so with only minimal reference to the organized church.

Era of the Popes at Avignon. Having defeated the Holy Roman Emperor, the popes thought that they had become the true heads of western Christendom, both politically and spiritually. Their conflicts with the French monarchy, starting at the end of the thirteenth century, showed how wrong they were.

Pope BONIFACE VIII (1294–1303) and King Philip IV the Fair (1285–1314) initially quarreled over the king's efforts to tax the French clergy, then the royal deposition of a bishop. In response, in 1302 Boniface issued Unam sanctam, giving perhaps the most unequivocal statement ever of papal authority. But Philip defied him, and the newly established French Estates General backed him up. When Boniface threatened Philip with excommunication, the French king sent his agents to capture the pope and bring him to Paris to stand trial for heresy, the murder of his predecessor, and general unfitness for office. The French released the aged and infirm pope just in time so that he did not die on their hands.

After the succeeding pope quickly died, the cardinals thought it prudent to elect a Frenchman. On his way from Bordeaux, his original see, to Rome, CLEMENT V (1305–1314) stopped in AVIGNON and somehow never left. All subsequent popes for nearly seventy-five years lived there, building a large, comfortable palace. Avignon was a delicate choice, because although culturally French, it was officially in the empire. The popes could thus suggest that they were not really under the thumb of the French king, even though Clement acquiesced in Philip's suppression of the TEMPLARS.

The Avignon popes were, as a group, serious and competent if somewhat uninspiring. Yet they became decreasingly relevant to European religious life and were subject to harsh criticism, even from those who considered themselves excellent Christians. The emperors began assuming the imperial title without papal coronation, with the Golden Bull of 1356. Many, not only the Franciscans, believed true holiness resided in poverty and roundly criticized the wealth of the curia. MARSILIUS OF PADUA (d. 1342) saw the Christian community, not the pope, as divinely constituted; for him the pope was little more than an elected executive. WILLIAM OF OCKHAM (d. 1349) discussed how a heretical pope might be deposed, with special reference to John XXII. John WYCLIF in England (d. 1384) argued that the church should own no property; he also had the entire Bible translated into English for the first time, urging people to read it for themselves. By now popes routinely selected bishops and abbots for the next vacant position, with the expectation of an appropriate fee, and this practice of papal provisions was also severely criticized, especially when one man held several important offices simultaneously.

Gothic architecture in the fourteenth century continued to seek greater light and airiness, in a style now called Perpendicular. Painting as an art form developed rapidly; canvases, wall paintings, and devotional books such as the Très riches heures du Duc de Berry were executed with a wealth of detail and vivid colors, generally showing religious scenes. A new motif in the period was the DANCE OF DEATH, people of all ages and situations in life being led off to judgment by death personified.

The new religious orders that developed during this period tended to be fairly informal groups such as the Beguines, where (mostly) women lived together in urban houses to follow lives of simplicity while also working. The BRETHREN OF THE COMMON LIFE, founded by Gerard GROOTE (d. 1389), similarly followed a life of austerity while striving for inward piety. Persecutions for heresy became unusual; between the unprecedented famines of the early fourteenth century, the Hundred Years War that broke out between France and England in 1337, and the Black Death that first ravaged Europe in 1347, little energy remained to worry about someone's beliefs.

Great Schism. The popes always meant to return to Rome, and finally, in 1377, Pope GREGORY XI did so. The popes had been sorely missed; the humanist Petrarch referred to their sojourn in Avignon as a new Babylonian Captivity. When Gregory died shortly after arriving back in Rome, the mob raucously demanded an Italian pope. Intimidated, the cardinals complied. But when the new pope, URBAN VI, turned against the French cardinals, they slipped out of the city to return to Avignon. Saying that their election of Pope Urban had been coerced and thus invalid, they proceeded to elect CLEMENT VII instead. In Rome, Urban quickly appointed new cardinals of his own. Now there were two popes.

Certainly papal schisms had occurred before, but generally it had been clear that one of the two had the support of much of Europe, and at most the schism lasted until the schismatic pope died. But Europe was now fairly evenly divided, Italy (for the most part) and France, of course, supporting respectively the Roman and the Avignon pope, England supporting the Roman pope while at war with France, Scotland supporting the Avignon pope, Germany supporting the Roman pope, Spain the Avignon pope. As each pope died, his cardinals elected a new one. (Catholic tradition now takes the Roman line as the valid one.)

Both sides excommunicated the other, further reducing respect for the church hierarchy, because everyone had been excommunicated. Extended schism appeared horrible, for it tore apart the ecclesia, the body of Christ, but attempts at reconciliation proved fruitless. Suggestions that both popes step down were repulsed by both sides—unless of course the other pope would step down first. Eventually, the university masters and the chief bishops from throughout Europe, as well as many of the cardinals from both sides, agreed that the only possible solution was a council, which assembled at Pisa in 1409. Having deposed both popes in absentia, it then elected ALEXANDER V who would, it was hoped, reunify the church. Instead there were now three popes.

Initially it appeared that support might swing from the Avignon and Roman popes to the Pisan pope, but when Alexander was succeeded in 1410 by JOHN XXIII, a former mercenary captain who had been made a cardinal as reward for protecting the area around Rome, potential support fell away. Another council seemed the only alternative.

Council of Constance. After long negotiations, a council was assembled at CONSTANCE in 1414, the largest council in the West since the thirteenth century (and the largest until the Council of TRENT), its goals to settle the schism, deal with heresy, and promulgate reform. Heresy came first. After condemning John Wyclif, relatively straightforward as he was long dead, the council examined the beliefs of John HUS, who came to the council under an imperial safe-conduct. As well as criticizing the luxury of the church, he and his followers insisted, contrary to current practice, that Communion be given to everyone in "both kinds," both wine and wafer. Hus was declared a heretic and, when Emperor SIGISMUND withdrew his protection, burned at the stake. His followers, called UTRAQUISTS, rose up against the emperor and were eventually allowed to receive Communion in both kinds.

The Council of Constance next turned to the question of the schism. John XXIII, who had hoped to be reaffirmed as pope, was shocked to discover that instead the council was planning to investigate his fitness for office. He fled, hoping that his absence would bring the council to a halt. But declaring that a properly constituted council received its authority directly from Christ, the members of the council pushed on. They accused John of fornication, adultery, incest, sodomy, and murder and deposed him. The Roman pope offered to step down, perhaps hoping that his gracious concession would lead to his reinstallation, but instead his resignation was accepted. The Avignon pope, who refused to resign, was deposed in absentia. Since by this time even the French king no longer supported him, he was forced into exile. Finally, the council elected a new pope, Martin V. The cardinals of all three parties quickly accepted him. Exhausted, the council decided to postpone the troublesome issue of church reform.

Although Constance ended with assurances that councils would be called regularly, conciliarism soon lost momentum. Several councils were held, most notably that of Basel, which was moved to Ferrara and then to Florence, but plague or political upheavals or inertia kept them from promulgating wide-ranging reforms. Under Pope EUGENE IV, Florence condemned conciliarism, reasserted papal primacy, and achieved a short-lived reunion with some of the separated Eastern churches. Subsequent popes, however, showed little enthusiasm for calling councils, and the emperors, the only political force that could have made a difference, were not interested in supporting a group that would act independently. The French king was satisfied by gaining the authority to appoint bishops (GALLICANISM) and lost interest in conciliarism. Councils that would address many questions of church reform had to wait.

The popes, back in Rome, settled down to become, in effect, one more series of Renaissance princes. They and the cardinals lived in luxury and played a major role in Italian power struggles. Popes routinely practiced nepotism, promoting their relatives. The popes also founded libraries and became great art patrons, sponsoring Michelangelo's magnificent paintings in the SISTINE CHAPEL and constructing the present Saint Peter's Basilica. They stayed out of religious conflicts as much as possible, for example ruling on the heresy trial of JOAN OF ARC (1431) only a generation later. Even the discovery of the New World was no more than a distant rumor in 1500, as the organized church seemed oblivious to the sweeping changes about to come.

SEE ALSO ANSELM OF CANTERBURY, ST.; AVIGNON PAPACY; BASEL, COUNCIL OF; BEGUINES AND BEGHARDS; CAMBRIDGE, UNIVERSITY OF; CATHARI; CÎTEAUX, ABBEY OF; CLUNY, ABBEY OF; EASTER CONTROVERSY; FATHERS OF THE CHURCH; FILIOQUE; FLORENCE, COUNCIL OF; FRANCISCANS, CONVENTUAL; FRANCISCAN SPIRITUALS; FREDERICK I BARBAROSSA, ROMAN EMPEROR; GORZE, ABBEY OF; HENRY III, ROMAN EMPEROR; HENRY IV, ROMAN EMPEROR; HILDEGARD OF BINGEN, ST.; INVESTITURE STRUGGLE; JUSTINIAN I, BYZANTINE EMPEROR; LATERAN COUNCILS; LIBER PONTIFICALIS; LUXEUIL, ABBEY OF; LYONS, COUNCILS OF; MICHELANGELO BUONARROTI; MUḤAMMAD; OBLATE; OXFORD, UNIVERSITY OF; PETER, APOSTLE, ST.; PHILIP IV, KING OF FRANCE; PISA, COUNCIL OF; SUGER OF SAINT-DENIS; THE WEST IN THE MIDDLE AGES; UNAM SANCTAM; WALDENSES; WILLIBRORD OF UTRECHT, ST.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Malcolm Barber, The New Knighthood: A History of the Order of the Temple (Cambridge, U.K. 1995).

Robert L. Benson and Giles Constable, eds., Renaissance and Renewal in the Twelfth Century (Cambridge, Mass. 1982).

Uta-Renate Blumenthal, The Investiture Controversy: Church and Monarchy from the Ninth to the Twelfth Century (Philadelphia 1988).

Constance Brittain Bouchard, Spirituality and Administration: The Role of the Bishop in Twelfth-Century Auxerre (Cambridge, Mass. 1979).

Constance Brittain Bouchard, Sword, Miter, and Cloister: Nobility and the Church in Burgundy, 980–1198 (Ithaca, N.Y. 1987).

Constance Brittain Bouchard, Holy Entrepreneurs: Cistercians, Knights, and Economic Exchange in Twelfth-Century Burgundy (Ithaca, N.Y. 1991).

Peter Brown, The Cult of the Saints: Its Rise and Function in Latin Christianity (Chicago 1981).

Donald A. Bullough, Alcuin: Achievement and Reputation (Leiden, The Netherlands 2004).

Stanley Chodorow, Christian Political Theory and Church Politics in the Mid-Twelfth Century (Berkeley, Calif., and Los Angeles 1972).

Marcia L. Colish, Medieval Foundations of the Western Intellectual Tradition, 400–1400 (New Haven, Conn. 1997).

Kenneth John Conant, Cluny: Les églises et la maison du chef d'ordre (Mâcon, France 1968).

Giles Constable, The Reformation of the Twelfth Century (Cambridge, U.K. 1996).

Patrick J. Geary, Furta Sacra: Thefts of Relics in the Central Middle Ages (Princeton, N.J. 1978).

Patrick J. Geary, Living with the Dead in the Middle Ages (Ithaca, N.Y. 1994).

Thomas Head and Richard Landes, eds., The Peace of God: Social Violence and Religious Response around the Year 1000 (Ithaca, N.Y. 1992).

Malcolm Lambert, Medieval Heresy: Popular Movements from the Gregorian Reform to the Reformation, 2nd ed. (Oxford, U.K. 1992).

C.H. Lawrence, The Friars: The Impact of the Early Mendicant Movement on Western Society (New York 1994).

C.H. Lawrence, Medieval Monasticism: Forms of Religious Life in Western Europe in the Middle Ages, 3rd ed. (New York 2000).

Jean Leclercq, The Love of Learning and the Desire for God: A Study of Monastic Culture, translated by Catharine Misrahi (New York 1961).

Karl J. Leyser, Rule and Conflict in an Early Medieval Society: Ottonian Saxony (London 1989).

Lester K. Little, Religious Poverty and the Profit Economy in Medieval Europe (Ithaca, N.Y. 1978).

Joseph H. Lynch, The Medieval Church: A Brief History (New York 1992).

John Marenbon, The Philosophy of Peter Abelard (Cambridge, U.K. 1997).

Rosamond McKitterick, Charlemagne: The Formation of a European Identity (Cambridge, U.K. 2008).

Guillaume Mollat, The Popes at Avignon, 1305–1378, translated by Janet Love (New York 1963).

Barbara Newman, Sister of Wisdom: St. Hildegard's Theology of the Feminine (Berkeley, Calif., and Los Angeles 1987).

Thomas F.X. Noble, The Republic of St. Peter: The Birth of the Papal State, 680–825 (Philadelphia 1984).

Thomas F.X. Noble, Images, Iconoclasm, and the Carolingians (Philadelphia 2009).

Francis Oakley, The Western Church in the Later Middle Ages (Ithaca, N.Y. 1985).

Mark Gregory Pegg, A Most Holy War: The Albigensian Crusade and the Battle for Christendom (Oxford, U.K. 2007).

Anne Prache, Cathedrals of Europe, translated by Ian West and Alayne Pullen (Ithaca, N.Y. 2000).

Donald E. Queller and Thomas F. Madden, The Fourth Crusade: The Conquest of Constantinople, 1201–1204, 2nd ed. (Philadelphia 1996).

Pierre Riché, ed., La christianisation des pays entre Loire et Rhin (IVe–VIIe siècle) (Paris 1993).

I.S. Robinson, The Papacy, 1073–1198: Continuity and Innovation (Cambridge, U.K. 1990).

Barbara H. Rosenwein, Rhinoceros Bound: Cluny in the Tenth Century (Philadelphia 1982).

Barbara H. Rosenwein, To Be the Neighbor of Saint Peter: The Social Meaning of Cluny's Property, 909–1049 (Ithaca, N.Y. 1988).

Barbara H. Rosenwein, Negotiating Space: Power, Restraint, and Privileges of Immunity in Early Medieval Europe (Ithaca, N.Y. 1999).

Jane Sayers, Innocent III: Leader of Europe, 1198–1216 (New York 1994).

Walter Simons, Cities of Ladies: Beguine Communities in the Medieval Low Countries, 1200–1565 (Philadelphia 2001).

R.W. Southern, Western Society and the Church in the Middle Ages (Harmondsworth, U.K. 1970).

R.W. Southern, Saint Anselm: A Portrait in a Landscape (Cambridge, U.K. 1990).

Gerd Tellenbach, The Church in Western Europe from the Tenth to the Early Twelfth Century, translated by Timothy Reuter (Cambridge, U.K. 1993).

J.M.M.H. Thijssen, Censure and Heresy at the University of Paris, 1200–1400 (Philadelphia 1998).

Brian Tierney, The Crisis of Church and State, 1050–1300 (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1964).

Christopher Tyerman, God's War: A New History of the Crusades (Cambridge, Mass. 2006).

John Van Engen, "The 'Crisis of Cenobitism' Reconsidered: Benedictine Monasticism in the Years 1050–1150," Speculum 61 (1986), 269–304.

Bruce L. Venarde, Women's Monasticism and Medieval Society: Nunneries in France and England, 890–1215 (Ithaca, N.Y. 1997).

Suzanne Fonay Wemple, Women in Frankish Society: Marriage and the Cloister, 500 to 900 (Philadelphia 1981).

Susan Wood, The Proprietary Church in the Medieval West (Oxford, U.K. 2006).

Constance B. Bouchard
Distinguished Professor of Medieval History
University of Akron (2010)

III. EARLY MODERN: 1500–1789

In the early modern age, the Church faced the gravest crisis it had yet experienced in the West, the Protestant REFORMATION. After suffering the loss of a considerable part of Europe, Catholicism managed by self-reform to emerge strengthened and purified of many of the abuses that had in part caused and furthered PROTESTANTISM. The new energies were used in answering the missionary challenges posed by Africa, Asia, and the Americas, in consolidating the position of the Church in those parts of Europe that had remained within the old unity, in quelling grave theological quarrels within its own fold, and in maintaining the Church's autonomy within absolutistic European states. Before the end of this period, the Church was faced with yet a new challenge, the rise of disbelief and SECULARISM. The following survey will be divided into two periods: The first (1500–1648) will treat of the Protestant Reformation, the COUNTER REFORMATION, Catholicism within the various European nations, and the missionary expansion of the Church; the second period (1648–1789) will treat of the internal theological problems and Church–State quarrels, and the situation of the Church throughout the world at the end of the ancien régime.

THE CHURCH, 1500 TO 1648

The end of the THIRTY YEARS' WAR does mark in many respects a turning point in the history of the Church, for by 1648 both the Reformation and the Counter Reformation ceased to win any large number of new adherents.

Eve of the Reformation. The general situation of the Church on the eve of the Reformation was one of seeming great prestige and power but of internal apathy and hollowness. The cry for reform in head and members had not been satisfactorily heeded. The papacy had suffered a grievous loss of prestige in the period at Avignon and in the Great Schism. By 1500 the popes seemed to be more Renaissance princelings than spiritual fathers of Christendom. While as rulers of an Italian state they were concerned with the independence and government of their territories, the temptation to use the papacy to advance their families was too often overwhelming. In ALEXANDER VI (1462–1503), JULIUS II (1503–1513), and LEO X (1513–1521), the Church had successively at its head a man of immoral private life, a warrior, and a pleasure-seeker. The tone of the papal court may be judged by the attempt on the life of Leo X in 1517, in which some of his own cardinals were involved. The reputation of the Roman CURIA for rapaciousness at the expense of the Christian flock was of long standing. Absenteeism, pluralism, and lack of pastoral interest characterized the episcopacy in varying degrees; the same was true of other members of the upper clergy (e.g., the canons and the pastors of wealthy parishes). The lower clergy suffered above all from inadequate spiritual, intellectual, and moral formation, which often resulted in ignorance of even basic Christian doctrine and in the growth of concubinage. In the religious orders, despite the existence of some exemplary reformed cloisters, apathy and spiritual torpor appeared to be dominant. Although the devout Christian laity still followed their appointed leaders, the abuses and excessive privileges of the clergy were fostering an ANTICLERICALISM, which, while not new, was growing. A desiccated theology remote from pastoral concerns, an externalism in sacramental practice, and a proliferation of devotional practices often peripheral to the central message of Christianity were parts of the spiritual malaise that gripped the Church. A spiritual hunger was felt—unconsciously by some, consciously by the more educated clerics and laymen—for the spiritual treasures of the Sacred Scriptures and for a theology and practice of the sacraments centered upon their nature as signs of faith and sources of grace for the Christian community. The Reformers seemed to many to provide the answer to their longing for a deeply thought and lived Christianity. But when the new formulations denied or excluded part of divinely entrusted teaching, the Church could only reject those theses of Protestantism that it felt were a narrowing down or impoverishment of the riches of the Christian message. If the Reformers rediscovered basic Christian principles hidden in what was without doubt a dry, decadent, and tired SCHOLASTICISM, their formulations of these were outside the central stream of Christian tradition and were linked with denials of other doctrines and practices that formed an inseparable part of the inheritance of both the Eastern and the Western Churches.

The Reformation. The Reformation took four main forms: LUTHERANISM, CALVINSIM, Radicalism, and ANGLICANISM.

Lutheranism. The Lutheran Reformation, which spread from Saxony throughout much of Germany and into the Scandinavian and Baltic lands, was the result of an Augustinian monk's struggle to find peace of soul for a conscience tortured by doubts about salvation. Martin LUTHER, in his reading of St. Paul, felt that he had discovered the absolutely central truth of Christianity, namely, that God forgives man his sins or justifies him by faith alone without any other activity on man's part. In other words, only God is active in the process of SALVATION; man's only reply, which has bearing upon his salvation, is his faith in his Redeemer, Jesus Christ. GOOD WORKS are the fruit of JUSTIFICATION, but they are of no avail to salvation. The exclusiveness of this formulation, which had necessarily to rule out FREE WILL, forced the Church to reject it. While the Lutheran churches in varying degrees conserved more of ancient practices than the Calvinist and Radical, other denials also made the Lutheran answer impossible for the Church to accept. The hierarchical constitution of the Church was rejected. All Christians were to be considered priests without distinction. Scripture alone was to be the rule of faith without an authoritative interpreter. The sacraments were reduced to two, Baptism and the Eucharist, while both the sacrificial character of the Mass was denied and an already rejected theory of the Eucharistic presence was introduced, that of consubstantiation.

Calvinism. The Calvinist Reformation, which spread from Switzerland to France, the Low Countries, and parts of Germany, England, and Scotland, derived from the Lutheran and a somewhat more radical type of reform that had been taking place in certain southern German and especially Swiss cities. In Switzerland the chief early leader of this radical reform was ZWINGLI in Zurich. John CALVIN, a Frenchman, who became the reformer of Geneva, accepted the cardinal doctrines of Luther: justification by faith alone and the all-sufficiency of Sacred Scripture, but he presented them in a more highly organized and systematic form and shifted the emphasis from the forgiveness of the sinning creature to the transcendency of the forgiving God. Calvinism required a far more austere way of life and worship than Lutheranism. The rejections of traditional Catholic doctrine were the same as those of Luther, while the rejection of traditional Catholic practices were more radical than those of Luther, who was willing to retain those that did not violate the doctrine of justification by faith alone. In one doctrinal respect, the manner of the Eucharistic presence, Calvinism differed irreconcilably from Lutheranism. While Luther steadfastly maintained the reality of Christ's presence in the Eucharist through consubstantiation, Calvin admitted only a presence of Christ in the believing communicant.

The Radical Reformation. The Radical Reformation is a term used to designate various sectarian movements that arose after the beginning of the Lutheran Reformation. No single doctrine characterized the adherents of the many, sometimes tiny, groups who are called radical, but rather they manifest a tendency to go further than Lutheranism or Calvinism. The Low Countries, Germany, Bohemia, and Poland, were the main centers. Three subjects especially interested the radical: the Eucharistic presence, which some interpreted as purely symbolic (SACRAMENTARIANS); infant baptism, which some rejected (ANABAPTISTS or BAPTISTS); and the INCARNATION, which some denied (SOCINIANS, UNITARIANS). These movements, always small, were mostly suppressed by both Catholics and Protestants, but some few of them survived the Reformation era or were later revived.

Anglicanism. The Anglican Reformation, confined to the British Isles, differs in many respects from the Continental Reformation. In England, it was the monarch and parliament who defined the shape and form of the new ecclesiastical structure. Under HENRY VIII the English Church was separated from Rome, but Catholic practice and doctrine were retained almost without alteration. During the short reign of his son, Edward VI, liturgy and doctrine were, however, altered in a Protestant sense. Following the also brief reign of MARY TUDOR, during which the ties with Rome were restored, the definitive establishment of a church comprising both Catholic and Protestant elements was accomplished by and under ELIZABETH I. The uniqueness of Anglicanism lay in this attempt to synthesize Protestantism and much of the old Catholic tradition. Only the Anglican Church has, besides the confession of faith of the THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES, a liturgical book, the Book of COMMON PRAYER, as the basis for its beliefs. The Prayer Book is essentially a combined BREVIARY, missal, and ritual, retaining many Catholic practices but with Protestant elements, especially in connection with the Eucharist and the Eucharistic service. The Thirty-Nine Articles are an attempt to fuse Catholic and Protestant doctrines in formulations broad enough to be acceptable to both. The Eucharistic service of the Prayer Book eliminated reference to its sacrificial character. Those who wished a more profound Protestantization in the Calvinist sense eventually became known as PURITANS and managed briefly in the seventeenth century to gain political and ecclesiastical power. Those who wished to remain fully Catholic were reduced to a tiny persecuted minority compromised in their political allegiance by the futile attempt of PIUS V to depose Queen Elizabeth. By severing its link with Rome, the English Church broke communion with the Catholic Church.

Thus, despite the rich scriptural piety of the Lutherans and their warm devotion to their Savior, the profound awe before the transcendent God and the austere sobriety of life of the Calvinists, the traditionalism and sober piety of the Anglicans, and the commitment to a totally Christian life of some of the radical Protestants, the Church had necessarily to oppose Protestantism and to attempt to answer Protestant negations.

The Catholic Reaction. In the beginning the reply to Protestantism was a defensive reaction. Basic tenets of Lutheran doctrine were solemnly condemned by the papal bull Exsurge, Domine (1520). In the previous year the Universities of Cologne and Louvain had issued condemnations, as did the Sorbonne in 1521. In reply to the flood of Lutheran publications, scores of Catholic theologians entered the fray to publish refutations. The quality of these works was quite uneven. Luther and his followers had the advantage of promoting a new movement that promised a long-awaited reform. The Catholic theologians, none of whom had the theological and literary genius of Luther, seemed to be defending the status quo. Moreover, until the Council of TRENT, there was, on certain points, some confusion as to what was the traditional Catholic position. Nevertheless a great deal of preparatory work, which was later to prove valuable at Trent, was done by these theologians, throughout Europe. In Germany there were such men as Johann ECK, one of Luther's first and most passionate opponents; Johannes COCHLAEUS, responsible for a Catholic view of Luther enduring for centuries; the erudite Johannes Fabri of Vienna; the humanistic catechist Frederich NAUSEA, and many others, especially among members of the religious orders. At Louvain, Luther, by his own admission, found his most powerful opponent in Jacobus LATOMUS. Elsewhere in Europe much was written against the new doctrines. In England, for example, ironically Henry VIII, as well as John FISHER and Thomas MORE, wrote against Luther. Out of hundreds only a few additional names can be mentioned, such as Alfonso de Castro (Spain), Josse Clichtove (France), and Ambrose Catharinus (Italy). If the work of these men, often quite unappreciated in its time, in defending Catholic doctrine was flawed by anything, it was that they were speaking as individuals without the authority of the entire Church. Only an ecumenical council would be heeded as speaking with the necessary authority, but such a council required convocation by the pope. For too long, the papacy hesitated to call a council mainly because it feared a resurgence of CONCILIARISM.

The Convoking of a Council. After the brief pontificate of the last non-Italian pope (before JOHN PAUL II), ADRIAN VI (1522–1523), one of the rare high prelates to admit the responsibility of the Church for the rupture of religious unity, CLEMENT VII (1523–1534) ascended the papal throne. An indecisive pope, his fear of conciliarism, of the Emperor CHARLES V, and of a possible deposition because of his illegitimate birth caused him to refuse to summon the council that Christendom was clamoring for. His successor PAUL III (1534–1549), while guilty of lavish NEPOTISM and not himself a reformer, nevertheless by his encouragement of reforms of the religious orders, by his nomination of reform-minded cardinals, and above all by successfully bringing the Council of Trent into being, effectively if belatedly placed the papacy behind the movement of Catholic reform.

It was not easy to convoke a council in a period of warfare between France and the Empire and of threatening war within the Empire itself. Attempts to convoke a council at Mantua and Vicenza failed. Moreover, in the 1540s the Emperor decided to attempt to seek his own religious agreement in Germany by means of theological conversations. These failed because the theological rift proved to be too deep. Moreover, political considerations were involved, and neither side seems really to have believed in the sincerity of the other. To Catholics, Protestants were obstinate, formal heretics and the despoilers of the goods of the Church; to Protestants, Catholics were the defenders of corrupt doctrine and of entrenched abuses and interests. The meager, unwilling, brief, and fruitless appearance of Protestants at Trent in 1552 manifested their view that the demands for a free council on German soil had not been met. By a "free" council the Protestants meant one free of papal control. This demand could not be granted. Trent, however, the city where most of the council was held, was in fact part of the Empire. While the popes never appeared personally at the council, they presided through legates over its sessions, during which, it should be noted, debate was free.

The Council of Trent. The Council of Trent met in three periods separated by suspensions under three different popes. The first period (1545–1548), under Paul III, produced the Catholic reply to the most profound doctrinal problem that the Reformers had raised, the manner of man's justification, along with decrees on the canonical Scriptures, the VULGATE, and ORIGINAL SIN. It had been decided to treat reform and doctrine pari passu as a compromise to satisfy the curialist party, who wished to treat only of doctrine, and the imperialist party (that is, those bishops subject to the emperor, whether German, Spanish, or Italian), who wished to treat only of reform. The latter feared to further alienate the Protestants. If the reform decrees at times were timid, it should be remembered that the papacy felt that the reform of the Curia was its prerogative. Moreover, what seemed to be abuses to some were viewed as legitimate exceptions to law by others. After treating the sacraments in general, the council was transferred to Bologna by the legates in 1547, partly because of an outbreak of a contagious fever at Trent and partly because of the desire of the papacy to have the council more under its control. Some of the bishops protested and refused to follow. Though the council discussed future decrees on the sacraments at Bologna, no promulgations were made before it was suspended in 1549.

JULIUS III (1550–1555) reconvoked the Council of Trent for its second period (1551–1552), during which decrees on the sacraments were promulgated, including the Catholic doctrine on the manner of the Eucharistic presence. The outbreak of war in the Empire caused the suspension of the Council in 1552. After the three-week reign of Pope MARCELLUS II (1555), the fiery, reform-minded PAUL IV (1555–1559) succeeded to the papal throne. Wanting in moderation, jealous of papal power, and too ready to brand innocent men as heretics, he refused to summon the council back into session. After his brief reign, a pope favorable to reform through the council, PIUS IV (1559–1564), was elected. Pius IV brought the last period of the council (1562–1563) to a successful conclusion and confirmed its decrees. Through his able legate, Giovanni MORONE, the council surmounted its final and most dangerous crisis, which had been brought about by the tensions between the curialist and imperialist parties, to whom were added also in this last session the French. Doctrinally, the most important decisions of these sessions concerned the sacrificial character of the Mass. From the standpoint of discipline the greatest achievement was the creation of a system of schools (seminaries) for the moral, intellectual, and spiritual formation of diocesan priests.

The Council of Trent furnished in the doctrinal order a much needed clarification of the divine economy of salvation in its decrees on original sin, justification, the sacraments, and the Mass. A positive body of doctrine was thus created that would not only answer Protestant denials but also set the tone for Catholic theology, spirituality, and even culture for the succeeding centuries. If certain lines were drawn concerning Catholic belief, nevertheless the possibility of future discussions of doctrine even on the above-mentioned topics was not ruled out. The failure of the council to mention any of the Protestant Reformers by name has been taken to indicate that it did not wish to rule out the possibility of future conversations. The disciplinary reforms were somewhat disjointed in form and incomplete, but still a model of the ideal pastor, both bishop and priest, was provided, which would be imitated gradually but with increasing effectiveness. The institution of seminaries was of the highest importance in the achievement of this end.

Catholic Reform. Not all reform in the Church, however, was due to Trent. A movement of self-reform reaching back into the Middle Ages had been growing steadily even before the Reformation and without reference to it. It was especially concentrated in Spain and Italy. In Spain its early leaders were the Archbishop of Granada, Fernando de Talavera y Mendoza (1428–1507), and the Cardinal-Archbishop of Toledo, Francisco XIMÉNEZ DE CISNEROS (1436–1517). In Italy, before and independently of the Reformation, groups of priests interested in self-reform and more zealous pastoral care had been arising here and there. Of this type was the Roman confraternity, the Oratory of DIVINE LOVE, which was founded some years before the outbreak of the Reformation and which became a seed-bed of future Catholic reformers. Some of these groups developed into new societies of clerics regular, such as the THEATINES (1524), founded by St. Cajetan of Tiene and others, including the future Paul IV; the BARNABITES, founded by St. Antonio Maria ZACCARIA (1530); and finally the SOMASCAN FATHERS, founded by St. Jerome EMILIANI (1540). The important educational order of nuns, the URSULINES, was founded by St. Angela MERICI and approved by Paul III (1544). There were also a number of reforming bishops in Italy, of whom the most outstanding was Gian Matteo GIBERTI of Verona (1495–1543). The number of reforming bishops grew after Trent.

The Council of Trent (1545–1564). Pope Paul III called this Council of the Catholic Church in an effort to find an effective reaction to the Protestant Reformation. HULTON ARCHIVE/GETTY IMAGES

The Jesuits. While the JESUITS are often identified with the Counter Reformation, that is, the militant Catholicism of the post-Tridentine Church, their roots are fully in the earlier Catholic movement of self-reform. In fact, the spirituality and structure of the society were developed in complete independence of the struggle against Protestantism. Beginning as a group of pilgrims to the Holy Land gathered around IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA as their leader, the first Jesuits had put themselves at the disposition of the pope. After the pilgrimage had proved impossible and they had come into contact with the new clerics regular in northern Italy, a religious society called the Company of Jesus was developed by Ignatius and approved by Paul III in 1540. The originality of the new group did not consist only in its distinctive IGNATIAN SPIRITUALITY, with its emphasis on a considered commitment to Christ, or in the mobility of the society, with its revolutionary dispensation from Divine Office in choir. It was both the paramilitary character with which its soldier-founder endowed the society and, above all, the very close link between the order and the papacy that were new. The Jesuits were to be the spiritual soldiers of the papacy, tied by bonds of unquestioning obedience to the pope. Since the members were bound to observe poverty and not to seek ecclesiastical preferment, the papacy had at its disposal an increasingly vast international body of selfless supporters. When they defended the papacy they could not be accused of furthering their own personal interests—an accusation that had been raised, not always unjustly, against the curialists and others. Thus, in an age when the papacy was both denied and discredited, the Jesuits were an example of unselfish devotion to the primacy of Peter.

While the Jesuits, whose growth was extraordinary, began as part of the movement of Catholic internal reform, and while their widespread missionary activities were of great importance, they came soon to be associated with the Counter Reformation. In Germany St. Peter CANISIUS (1521–1597), through his diplomatic activity, his example and preaching, his catechisms, and above all through the foundation of colleges, aided immeasurably the revival of Catholicism there. In the face of the widespread decay of the universities, which until the second half of the seventeenth century did not flourish in Catholic countries as they had in medieval times (except briefly in Spain), the Jesuit school system was of great importance in maintaining to some degree the prestige of Catholic intellectual activity. But while the Jesuit colleges developed an estimable form of Christian humanism, though not without borrowing something from the similar tendencies of renaissance humanism and MELANCHTHON, their openness to new subjects of study was timid. The higher education given by the Jesuits was exclusively for those entering the priesthood. The Catholic universities, perhaps recoiling from the fact that the Reformation had been in some measure the creation of academicians, remained closed to subjects of secular interests and either died of atrophy or became ultimately the secular universities of the modern world. Within this period then, until the advent of the teaching brothers, a high quality of teaching was not to be found in the universities but rather in the colleges of the Jesuits, in the houses of study of religious orders, and especially in the seminaries in France, which were highly successful in elevating the standards of the clergy.

Reforms in Religious Orders. In addition to completely new religious orders, the Catholic reform brought about a number of revivals in the older orders, which occasionally led to the foundation of new branches of congregations. A strict new congregation of the CAMALDOLESE Benedictines was founded by Paolo Giustiani (1476–1528). The generals of the AUGUSTINIANS, GILES OF VITERBO and especially Girolamo SERIPANDO, were both reformers of their order. The FRANCISCANS, the target of much pre-Reformation and Reformation satire, were hampered in their attempts to reform by fears of yet another split in the order, which was already divided into two branches—the Conventuals and the Observants. In a fresh attempt to return to the spirit of St. Francis, a third branch, the Capuchins, came into existence and thrived, despite the handicaps of a founder, Matteo da BASCIO (c. 1495–1552), who left his new foundation, and of a fourth vicar-general, Bernadino OCHINO (1497–1564), who became a Protestant. The Capuchins were officially separated from the Conventuals in 1619. Under the aegis of TERESA OF AVILA (1515–1582) a new reformed branch of the CARMELITES, the Discalced, was formed both for women and for men. Gradually reforms were brought about in the other orders.

Reforming Popes. The papacy of the period immediately after Trent produced three strong figures, PIUS V, GREGORY XIII, and SIXTUS V, who all aided in accelerating the rate of the centralization of Church government. This trend was not new, but it received additional force from the critical situation in which the Church found itself. Pius V (1566–1572), the first saintly pope of the modern era, reformed the college of cardinals, the Curia, and the religious orders, and was also the first pope belonging completely to the age of the Counter Reformation. Such anachronistic gestures as the attempted deposition of Elizabeth I of England, however, were ultimately harmful. The milder Gregory XIII (1572–1585) furthered the Jesuits, the missions, education (especially priestly), and both the Catholic internal reform and the Counter Reformation. To him the GREGORIAN CALENDAR is due, and also an increase in the number of permanent papal diplomatic missions. The most important reorganization of the Curia, however, took place under Sixtus V (1585–1590). In 1588 the cardinals were organized into fifteen congregations, some concerned with the government of the papal states, others with the government of the entire Church. The Congregation of the Roman and Universal Inquisition (renamed Congregation for the DOCTRINE OF THE FAITH in 1965), which had originated in 1542 under Paul III as a commission of cardinals, achieved its final form at this time. New regulations for the ad limina visits and reports of bishops, another step in the increasing centralization of the Church, were issued in this pontificate. Sixtus also effected a number of reforms in the papal states and may be called the father of Rome as a baroque city.

Papal Decline. The lesser figures who occupied the papal throne until the middle of the seventeenth century were characterized by their interest in the beautification of Rome and in the government of the papal states. Nepotism on the part of the popes themselves was not absent, nor were curial abuses. The longer reigns were those of CLEMENT VIII (1592–1605), PAUL V (1605–1621), URBAN VIII (1623–1644), and INNOCENT X (1644–1655). Just as the last major papal attempt to declare a monarch deposed had been unsuccessfully made under Pius V, so also under Paul V a last and equally ineffective attempt was made to place an entire state, Venice, under interdict. Further grave Church–State conflicts were soon to come, but even before them the political weakness of the papacy became more evident. Thus, Innocent X's protest against the religious provisions of the Peace of WESTPHALIA went unheard.

Outside the papal states in this period, the rest of Italy was also generally in political and economic decline, with part of the country under Spanish rule (Naples, Sicily, Milan, and Sardinia). Ecclesiastically, however, the decrees of Trent were accepted in the various states, and reforms were carried out both within the religious orders and by reforming bishops. One of the most striking of these last was Charles BORROMEO (1538–1584), the reformer of the See of Milan. A nephew of Pius IV, he was one of the rare examples of a happy outcome of nepotism.

The Wars of Religion. If Italy remained in relative peace during the last half of the sixteenth and the first half of the seventeenth centuries, much of the rest of Europe was involved in the wars often called (somewhat incorrectly) the Wars of Religion, including those in France, the revolt of the Spanish Netherlands, and the Thirty Years' War.

France. In France the wars of religion (1562–1598) were really a series of eight small wars divided by truces and periods of peace. The principal and original cause was the struggle for and against Calvinism, but such motives as the dynastic question, the struggle between feudal conceptions of the monarchy and an absolutist, centralizing view, and foreign intervention come to play important roles also. With the acceptance of Catholicism by HENRY IV, the issuance of the Edict of NANTES specifying the conditions for the coexistence in France of Protestant communities and Catholicism, and the peace with Spain (Vervins 1598), order was reestablished in France. The effect of the wars, however, was to put off the necessary internal Catholic reform. While the French government refused to accept officially the decrees of Trent, the doctrinal decrees were accepted by all without question. Despite the high degree of control over the Church that the Concordat of 1516 gave the French monarchy, many reforms were effected, especially through the influence of such saintly men as FRANCIS DE SALES (1567–1622), Pierre de BÉRULLE (1575–1629), Charles de CONDREN (1588–1641), Jean Jacques OLIER (1608–1657), John EUDES (1601–1680), and VINCENT DE PAUL (1581–1660). All of these fostered the moral, spiritual, and intellectual training of priests, especially through the new system of seminaries.

Revolt of the Spanish Netherlands. The revolt of the Spanish Netherlands is sometimes classed as a religious war between the Dutch, who were principally Calvinists, and Catholic Spain. The desire of the Dutch, however, to shake off the political and economic domination of a foreign power was equally important. In Spain itself the excessive control of the Church by the state in a period when the monarchy was entering a time of continual degeneration could scarcely encourage the religious revival that had begun with Ximenes. Spanish missionary activity, on the other hand, continued to flourish.

The Thirty Years' War. The third great religious war, the Thirty Years' War (1618–1648), was fought principally on the territory of the Empire. While religious causes, especially the law that forbade the secularizing of ecclesiastical property, were not absent, political causes were or became the major factors. At the end of the war Catholic France was fighting with Lutheran Sweden against the Catholic Emperor. The Peace of Westphalia, so unsatisfactory to the papacy, marked the end of the Counter Reformation considered as an attempt to regain territories lost to Protestantism. It also marked the end of any large shifts of allegiance from one religious body to the other. When, somewhat later, the Electors of Saxony wished to be elected also kings of Poland, they became Catholic, but their Saxon subjects remained Lutheran, and their Polish subjects remained Catholic.

Catholicism in the British Isles. In the British Isles the dwindling persecuted Catholic minority suffered not only because they refused to accept Anglicanism but also because they were accused of political disloyalty. Their lot was aggravated by the fact that England's chief foreign enemy was Catholic Spain. After the death of Elizabeth, under Mary Stuart's son JAMES I (1603–1625), who had been raised a Protestant, the situation of Catholics did not improve, but their treatment under CHARLES I (1625–1649) was slightly milder. The Civil War, however, brought in the Protector, Oliver CROMWELL, a much more determined opponent of Catholicism than the Tudor or Stuart monarchs. Catholics in Scotland, which was united to England in personal union from 1603, fared no better, but a small number survived as in England. In Ireland, completely under English rule from 1602, despite persecution under extremely severe penal laws, and apart from the plantations, almost the entire population remained faithful to Catholicism.

Catholicism in Eastern Europe. In Eastern Europe the Catholic reform was introduced gradually. The religious situation of Poland mirrored the confused political order, but under the aegis of Cardinal Stanislas HOSIUS (1504–1579) and the Jesuits, a strong Catholic revival took place toward the end of the sixteenth and the beginning of the seventeenth century. An important reunion of Eastern Christians, the Ruthenians, was effected by the Union of BREST (1595–1596) and also by the Union of Užhorod (1646). In Hungary the Catholic reform and Counter Reformation were fostered especially by Cardinal Peter PÁZMÁNY (1570–1637).

Missionary Activity. The enthusiastic missionary activity of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries was paralleled only by the preaching of the gospel in the first centuries. The impetus to this revived activity came from the explorations and discoveries that had begun in the fifteenth century. Of the newly discovered lands, or the hitherto scarcely known lands, including North and South America, the East and Far East, only Africa remained largely untouched by the missionaries, whose activities Rome began to coordinate (from 1622) under the Congregation for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH. An essential difference between the evangelization of the Western and the Eastern worlds was the fact that in North and South America, the missionaries, mostly members of the new and old religious orders, accompanied Spanish and Portuguese conquerors and colonists, whereas in the East the missionaries, also chiefly from the religious orders, sought to evangelize old established civilizations. This occasioned two quite different methods. In the New World, the old existing civilizations were destroyed, and in most of South and Central America an Iberian cultural and ecclesiastical order was established. Thus the first see, Santo Domingo, was established in 1511, and by 1582 there were fifteen more. The missionaries fought with varying degrees of success to prevent the exploitation of the natives by their own countrymen. In Paraguay, the Jesuits organized model communities (REDUCTIONS) of native Christians. Eventually governmental opposition and an excessive paternalism caused these experiments to fail. The greatest single weakness of the Spanish and Portuguese missionary effort in Central and South America was the failure to foresee the need for a native clergy. Consequently, in the eighteenth century there was a dearth of clergy and a decline of missionary zeal, although evangelization did not cease completely (e.g., California).

In the East and the Far East, the missionaries faced different problems. There, after the early heroic exploits of St. Francis XAVIER in India, China, and Japan, a number of missionaries, especially Matteo RICCI, J. Adam SCHALL VON BELL, and Roberto de NOBILI, began to propose the adaptation of Christianity to certain of the cultural and intellectual features of the centuries-old civilizations of China and India. Other missionaries violently opposed such accommodations, and the problem was referred to Rome. For nearly a century it was debated until the last disapproval of adaptation was given by Rome in 1742. Interorder rivalries and national interests had envenomed the quarrels. Along with the already-noted decline of missionary fervor in the eighteenth century, the outcome of the rites controversy marked the virtual end of missionary activity in the East until the nineteenth century. The Philippines, a Spanish possession, however, presented an exception. The attempt to Christianize Japan had failed even before the rites controversy. There violent persecutions (1614–1646) almost completely destroyed the missionaries' efforts, although small secret groups of Christians (Old Christians) continued on without priests. A final and lamentable result of the rites controversy was that it, along with the other grave theological dissensions, helped to discredit Christianity among the intellectual classes during the late seventeenth and the eighteenth centuries.

THE EUROPEAN CHURCH, 1648–1789

The history of the Church in the century and a half before the French Revolution is dominated by a series of dissensions on doctrinal matters within the Church, above all the quarrels over JANSENISM, QUIETISM, and FEBRONIANISM, and of distensions between the papacy and the Catholic states, principally over GALLICANISM, JOSEPHINISM, and the suppression of the Jesuits. These quarrels contributed to the profoundly weakened state and seeming apathy of the Church at the end of the ancien régime, with whose fate its own seemed inexorably bound. It was not until the nineteenth and twentieth centuries that the Church recovered its vigor both in thought and action.

Theology and Theological Quarrels. The trends and schools of theology from the sixteenth century on become exceedingly diverse. Whereas the medieval theologians had in the main been universal theologians, treating in their works of the whole of theology, later theologians became specialists in such recognized branches of theology as dogmatic or speculative, moral, ascetic, or positive. Although the traditional purely speculative method still was carried on by schoolmen such as BÁÑEZ, JOHN OF ST. THOMAS, and SUÁREZ, their efforts represented the work of theologians living to some degree in the past. The important new dimension in theology was the historical or positive theology, which derived from the methods of the humanists, such as ERASMUS. While an effort was made to integrate positive and speculative theology (e.g., Melchior CANO), theology became quite fragmentized, and no theologian of the status of the great patristic and medieval theologians emerged to produce a new synthesis. The interest in historical theology had results important for the growth of the historical sciences both ecclesiastical and secular. In this regard, the work of the BOLLANDISTS in HAGIOGRAPHY and of the Benedictines of the Congregation of St. Maur are especially notable. In biblical criticism, however, the work of Richard Simon, who was well ahead of his time, was condemned. Similarly, the condemnation of Galileo GALILEI implied a conflict between Christianity and science and had unfortunate consequences. The quarrel with Protestantism often brought forth only a defensive and negative theology; worse yet, internal theological quarrels exhausted the energies of the best theologians. These same quarrels were in no little part also responsible for the growth of disbelief and indifference to religion, which, in turn, presented new problems to the Church.

Jansenism. The gravest of these quarrels centered around the Augustinian doctrine of nature and grace and its practical applications. A theologian of Louvain, Cornelius JANSEN (1585–1638), and a French ecclesiastic, Jean DUVERGIER DE HAURANNE (1581–1643), dreamed of a revival of patristic theology and practice beginning with the doctrine of grace. For them scholasticism and the humanistic theology of some Jesuit theologians were abhorrent, and Calvin had, in their view, grasped Augustine's teaching even if he expressed himself badly. Thus, Jansenism was in a sense a crypto-Calvinism. The Jansenists, however, never wished to leave the Church, but rather hoped to have their doctrine accepted by the Church or at least tolerated by it. This explains, in part, the persistence of Jansenism even into the nineteenth century. Jansen produced his great theoretical work of doctrine in the Augustinus (1640), published two years after his death.

Meanwhile, Duvergier de Hauranne, now abbot of Saint-Cyran, had spread enthusiasm for their views in France, especially into the large ARNAULD family, many of whom were or became religious and whose activities were centered around the Cistercian convents of Port-Royal-des-Champs near Paris and PORT-ROYAL in Paris. Schools established by the Jansenists (petites écoles) fostered Jansenist doctrine, as well as new methods of pedagogy. Jansenism was almost immediately condemned by Rome, but the Jansenists, led by Antoine Arnauld (1612–1694), refused to accept the condemnation as valid for what Jansen had actually taught and for what they actually held. An endless quarrel ensued about the right of the Church to judge and condemn error in a concrete case. The Jansenists admitted only a de iure right and denied that the condemned doctrine was de facto in Jansen's writings. A new leader, Pasquier QUESNEL (1634–1719), emerged toward the end of the seventeenth century. Repeated condemnations and harassments failed to drive Jansenism from the French Church, where it continued clandestinely until the nineteenth century. French Jansenism had always been more interested in the moral rigorism that seemed to follow from Jansen's thought rather than his doctrinal elaboration, and toward the end of its history Jansenism was more a symbol of protest against ecclesiastical and political authority than a theological doctrine. A still-existing schismatic church was founded as the result of the Jansenist quarrel at Utrecht in 1723.

Quietism. The quarrel over Quietism was smaller and less grave than the Jansenist quarrel. The father of Quietism was a Spaniard resident in Italy, Miguel de MOLINOS (1628–1717), although his thought was not entirely original. Molinos's Spiritual Guide (1675), translated into five languages, proposed a doctrine of total passivity in the face of divine action in the soul. Molinos was condemned and imprisoned, but similar ideas on the spiritual life were put forth by an unstable French woman, Mme. J.M. GUYON. It was FÉNELON (later archbishop of Cambrai), however, who, having become Mme. Guyon's confessor, became the chief spokesman for Quietism in France. The touchstone of Quietism was the belief that the soul might reach such a state of pure love that not only would it be indifferent to its own perfections and the practices of virtue, but it might even cease to will its own salvation. This doctrine of the exclusive action of God on the soul has affinities with Luther's teaching, but Luther never drew the Quietist conclusions. Fénelon's doctrine, attacked by BOSSUET, was condemned by Rome in 1699. Although Fénelon submitted, he denied that he had preached the condemned teaching. Unlike Jansenism, Quietism died out immediately and completely. Both Jansenism and Quietism, however, indirectly encouraged the growth of disbelief by the public spectacles that had been made of doctrinal differences within the Church. As a result, even within the Church a certain mistrust of mystical tendencies became evident.

Febronianism. The dissatisfaction of some German ecclesiastics with papal centralization manifested itself in several ways in the eighteenth century. The most important of these was the work of an auxiliary bishop of Trier, Johann Nikolaus von HONTHEIM (1701–1790). His work, published beginning in 1763 under the pseudonym of Febronius and often called simply the Febronius, foresaw a revival of conciliarism in an extreme form in which the papacy would be stripped of the powers that Hontheim claimed it had usurped. The Febronius was soon translated from Latin into other languages and achieved considerable popularity. It was condemned, and Hontheim retracted, but in a quite ambiguous manner. The work gave expression to the desire on the part of certain churchmen to be free from papal and curial control. In this it was not far removed from Gallicanism, which was, however, a political attempt to be free of these same controls.

Church–State Quarrels. This period witnessed a number of disagreements between the papacy and various Catholic states.

Gallicanism. The term Gallicanism is used to cover a number of theories of ecclesiatical government, all generally in various degrees hostile to or suspicious of Rome. All of these were present in France in the seventeenth century—from the purely ecclesiastical theories of authority vested in all the faithful or the clergy as a whole or the entire episcopate to political Gallicanism. The latter doctrine in its extreme form made the monarch in effect head of the Church in his country. In France it was the attempt by LOUIS XIV to extend his powers over the Church, which led in the 1680s almost to schism. Louis, since about 1670, had been attempting to increase his already extensive regalian rights, both temporal and spiritual. Meeting some opposition, he inspired the calling of an extraordinary meeting of the general assembly of the clergy. While Bossuet's opening address on the unity of the Church was credited with avoiding a break with Rome, it was he who drew up the summary of Gallican doctrine called the Four Articles of 1682. Royal edict forced the acceptance of these on the French Church. For about fifteen years the papacy refused to institute Louis's appointments to the French dioceses until a large number became vacant. Finally, concessions were made on both sides, but the monarchy gave up the prescribed acceptance of the Gallican Articles. Gallicanism, while partially defeated, did not, however, die out. The state church of the Revolution was the last attempt in France to give it concrete form.

Josephinism. Not unlike the policies of Louis XIV were those of the Hapsburg Emperor JOSEPH II (1765–1790) in his Austrian domains. Even his pious mother, MARIA THERESA, had, in fact, involved herself in strictly ecclesiastical matters. Moreover, due reforms were not effected by the ecclesiastical authorities themselves. In a certain sense, however, Joseph went further than Louis by attempting to make the Church a department of the state and above all by interfering in what were beyond question strictly ecclesiastical affairs, such as the curricula of seminaries, and even the liturgy. His attitude toward the Church was more than a little influenced by the ENLIGHTENMENT and enlightened despotism. An attempt by PIUS VI in 1782 by a personal visit to Vienna to change the Emperor's views did not succeed. Joseph's brother Leopold, his successor briefly as emperor, attempted similar reforms in the Grand Duchy of Tuscany. The Jansenist Bishop S. RICCI of Pistoia and Prato aided him, and a synod at Pistoia in 1786 drew up a list of reforms partly Jansenist, partly enlightened. The other Tuscan bishops refused, however, to follow Ricci.

While the failure to effect reforms was in part responsible for the lethargic situation of the Church in the Catholic countries in the eighteenth century, the method of reform proposed by the enlightened despots would have disastrously compromised the independence of the Church. The Constitutional Church of the French Revolution disintegrated when power was assumed by nonbelievers.

Suppression of the Jesuits. The most unhappy Church-State quarrel of the eighteenth century was the suppression of the Jesuits. Opposition to the Jesuits had arisen from many quarters—from the Jansenists, the Gallicans, and the thinkers and rulers of the Enlightenment. The Jesuits were accused, in most cases unjustly, of having acquired excessive power and wealth. They were, moreover, the religious society with the greatest loyalty to the papacy. They were suppressed by Portugal in 1759, France in 1764, and Spain in 1767, but the Catholic powers were not content until they obtained a complete suppression from Rome. This they succeeded in getting from CLEMENT XIV in 1773. Only in Russia did the society survive until its restoration in 1814.

The Papacy, 1648–1789. The political prestige of the papacy continued to decline in the period from 1648 to 1789. No longer were the popes arbiters in international disputes. Generally, in fact, they were excluded from the major international conferences. They failed also to supply the necessary leadership or to effect reforms in their own states. In the religious domain, on the other hand, they successfully resisted Jansenism and Quietism and restrained Gallicanism and Febronianism. In dealing with the enlightened despots and their followers, especially in the matter of the Jesuits, however, they failed. The most notable papal figures during this period were INNOCENT XI (1676–1689), BENEDICT XIV (1740–1758), and Pius VI (1775–1799), who died a prisoner of the French.

Catholicism in Non-Catholic Lands. Generally speaking, the position of Catholics in Protestant lands improved somewhat during the eighteenth century. This was in part due to the Enlightenment with its ideal of tolerance. In the United Provinces, the existence of Catholics was tolerable although complicated by the Jansenist Church of Utrecht. In Scandinavia there were scarcely any Catholics except for a few, mostly foreigners, in Sweden. In Great Britain there was gradual progress toward greater toleration, but Catholics remained very few in number and still were not emancipated. Ireland also was beginning to progress toward emancipation (Relief Bill of 1778).

The Church Under the Old Regime. A brief survey of the situation of the Church in France on the eve of the Revolution offers a view of the virtues and failings of the Church in the Catholic lands. The struggle between Church and state had sunk from the level of the monarchy to quarrels between the Jansenist lawyers of the Parlements and the Church. The episcopacy, while not composed of unworthy men, was often nonresident and almost entirely drawn from the nobility. Most of the bishops were to leave France en masse when the Revolution threatened. The lower clergy, well-educated and often devoted, nevertheless resented their inability to rise in the ecclesiastical hierarchy. The monasteries had vast possessions but had experienced a sharp drop in vocations, and some were almost empty. The abuses of COMMENDATION had continued. Among the laity, the educated classes were imbued with the spirit of the Enlightenment, and some had ceased to believe; the working classes, mostly still agrarian, remained for the most part attached to Catholicism.

SEE ALSO AD LIMINA VISIT; AVIGNON PAPACY; CAJETAN (GAETANO DA THIENE), ST.; CHINESE RITES CONTROVERSY; CLERICALISM; EASTERN SCHISM; GRACE, SACRAMENTAL; HUMANISM, CHRISTIAN; MAURISTS; PRIMACY OF THE POPE; TRANSUBSTANTIATION; UTRECHT, SCHISM OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Paul Avis, Beyond the Reformation? Authority, Primacy and Unity in the Conciliar Tradition (New York 2006).

Manfred Barthel, The Jesuits: History and Legend of the Society of Jesus, translated by Mark Howson (New York 1984).

Joseph Bergin, The Making of the French Episcopate (New Haven 1996).

Robert Birley, The Refashioning of Catholicism: A Reassessment of the Catholic Reformation (Washington, D.C. 1999).

Richard J. Blackwell, Behind the Scenes at Galileo's Trial (Notre Dame, Ind. 2006).

Miriam Bodian, "In the Cross-Currents of the Reformation: Crypto-Jewish Martyrs of the Inquisition, 1570–1670." Past and Present, n. 176 (August 2002): 66–104.

John Bossy, Peace in the Post-Reformation (Cambridge, U.K. 1998).

Owen Chadwick, The Reformation (Baltimore 1964).

Gerald R. Cragg, The Church and the Age of Reason: 1648–1789 (New York 1961).

John Patrick Donnely, S.J., ed., Jesuit Writings of the Early Modern Period, 1540-1640 (Indianapolis 2006).

John Patrick Donnely, S.J., and Michael W. Maher, S.J., eds., Confraternities & Catholic Reform in Italy, France, & Spain (Kirksville, Mo. 1999).

Louis Dupre, The Enlightenment and the Intellectual Foundation of Modern Culture (New Haven 2004).

Maurice A. Finocchiaro, "The Church and Gaileo," The Catholic Historical Review, 94, no. 2 (April 2008): 260–282.

Augustin Fliche and Victor Martin, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours, vols. 16–19 (Paris 1935).

Malcolm Freiberg, "Going Gregorian, 1582–1752: A Summary View," The Catholic Historical Review, 86, no. 1 (January 2000): 1–19.

Kenneth Gouwens and Sheryl E. Reiss, eds., The Pontificate of Clement VII (Burlington, Vt. 2005).

Paul F. Grendler, Renaissance Education between Religion and Politics (Burlington, Vt. 2006).

Stephen Haliczer, Inquisition and Society in Early Modern Europe (London 1986).

Gregory Hanlon, Confession and Community in Seventeenth-century France: Catholic and Protestant Coexistence in Aquitaine (Philadelphia 1993).

Philip Hughes, The Reformation in England, 5th ed. (New York 1963).

Wim Janse and Barbara Pitkin, eds., The Formation of Clerical and Confessional Identities in Early Modern Europe (Leiden 2006).

Hubert Jedin, History of the Council of Trent, translated by Ernest Graf (St. Louis 1957–1960).

Hubert Jedin and John Dolan, eds., Handbook of Church History, vol. 4 (New York 1965).

Pamela M. Jones, Federico Borromeo and the Ambrosiana (New York 1993).

Henry Kamen, The Phoenix and the Flame: Catalonia and the Counter Reformation (New Haven 1993).

Benjamin J. Kaplan, Divided by Faith: Religious Conflict and the Practice of Toleration in Early Modern Europe (Cambridge, Mass. 2007).

Kenneth S. Latourette, A History of the Expansion of Christianity, vol. 3 (New York 1937–1945).

Lance Gabriel Lazar, Working in the Vineyard of the Lord: Jesuit Confraternities in Early Modern Italy (Toronto 2005).

Albert J. Loomie, Spain and the Early Stuarts, 1585–1655 (Brookfield, Vt. 1996).

Joseph Lortz, Die Reformation in Deutschland, 2 vols., 4th ed. (Freiburg 1962).

Peter Marshall and Alexandra Walsham, eds., Angels in the Early Modern World (New York 2006).

Aimé Georges Martimort, Le Gallicanisme de Bossuet (Paris 1953).

John T. McNeill, The History and Character of Calvinism (New York 1954).

Stephen Neill, History of Christian Missions (New York 1964).

Jean Orcibal, Les Origines du jansénisme, 5 vols. (Louvain 1947–1962).

Ludwig von Pastor, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages (London 1938–1961).

José Pereira and Robert Fastiggi, The Mystical Theology of the Catholic Reformation: An Overview of Baroque Spirituality (Lanham, Md. 2007).

Joseph Perez, The Spanish Inquisition: A History (New Haven, Conn. 2005).

Maurizio Sangalli, "Colleges, Schools, Teachers: Between Church and State in Northern Italy (XVI-XVII Centuries)," Catholic Historical Review, 93, no. 4 (October 2007): 815–844.

Jane Shaw, Miracles in Enlightenment England (New Haven, Conn. 2006).

William S. Barron
Assistant Professor of History
Regis College, Weston, Mass.

Frank J. Coppa
Professor of History
St. John's University, New York (2010)

IV. LATE MODERN: 1789–2009

The centuries from the Age of Revolutions (the French and Industrial Revolutions at the end of the eighteenth century) to the opening of the third millennium ushered in profound economic, social, and political changes. Although the effect of these developments has been uneven, with the passage of time almost every corner of the world has felt their impact. The widespread technological innovations flowing from the Scientific Revolution, giving rise to urbanization and secularization, influenced religion in general and the Roman Catholic Church in particular.

The Church has found some external changes beneficial, others harmful. Western civilization, increasingly secularized in its ideals and practices, has continued to drift away from the Church that was largely instrumental in creating it and to which it had been intimately united for centuries. The problem of adjusting to the radically new conditions of civilization remains critical. Throughout this entire period, persecutions have persisted, never more violent and destructive than in the twentieth century. Despite this, indeed partly because of it, the Church has become a more spiritual and more closely knit organization, under the primacy of the popes.

In civil society, nationalism swelled to ominous proportions; it has been extolled as a kind of religion, but its fruits have often been hatred and bloodshed. Ecclesiastical particularism, on the other hand, shrank to minimal proportions with the disappearance of GALLICANISM, FEBRONIANISM, and JOSEPHINISM, which in the eighteenth century had been the bane of the universal Church. Inner threats to unity in the form of heresies and schisms were few and gained few adherents. Religious indifferentism within the fold and leakage of individuals from it have, however, been sources of great concern. Counterbalancing these losses there have been great numerical gains as the Church spread worldwide as the result of large-scale emigration from Catholic Europe and of unparalleled missionary activity.

The more important developments and the most characteristic trends are outlined here. (For the ecclesiastical history of individual nations, see the entries on each country of the world.)

From 1789 to 1815. France has for centuries played a significant role in the Church's life, but never before or since has it monopolized the stage to the extent that it did between the outbreak of the FRENCH REVOLUTION and the downfall of NAPOLEON I. As a political and social upheaval, the Revolution was of major importance in world history. From the religious viewpoint, it was scarcely of less moment for the Church, both in France and elsewhere. Fittingly, therefore, this event is selected as inaugurating a turning point in the Church's history. After abolishing clerical privileges, nationalizing Church properties, and suppressing religious orders, the Constitutional Assembly enacted the CIVIL CONSTITUTION OF THE CLERGY, which created a SCHISM and split France religiously into two hostile camps. As time went on, leadership in the Revolution fell into the hands of men bitterly hostile to the Church, more intent on destroying than reforming it. An attempt was made to dechristianize the country by violent persecution, wholesale iconoclasm, reorganization of the calendar, imprisonment and deportation of the clergy, separation of Church and state, and propagation of a series of naturalistic, patriotic cults as substitutes for Christianity. As their crowning attack on religion, the revolutionists stripped Pope Pius VI of his temporal power, seized him, and marched him captive to southern France, where he died a prisoner.

Victorious revolutionary armies swept into the Low Countries, Germany, Switzerland, and Italy, where they imposed the French innovations. Throughout the nineteenth century, the aspirations of the Revolution kept spreading through Europe and the New World. The French Revolution afforded, then, a preview of what was in store for the Church. Reconciliation with the principles of 1789 posed for the Church a major problem that was not solved completely a century later. Even this span of years did not suffice to close the rift in French society opened during the revolutionary decade. The heirs of the great Revolution were the republicans, liberals, and anticlericals of the nineteenth century. Loyal Catholics tended to link democracy with godlessness; in good part their politics were conservative and monarchist. They resisted the RALLIEMENT and formed the backbone of ACTION FRANÇAISE.

When Napoleon Bonaparte gained control of revolutionary France, he turned it into a military dictatorship and an instrument of his boundless ambitions. After his military genius had subjected most of western Europe, he introduced into the conquered territories the ideology of the Revolution, whose devotee he claimed to be. Napoleon, a man of little or no Christian faith, utilized religion to promote his state policies. Since political considerations counseled the restoration of religious peace in France, he concluded with the HOLY SEE the CONCORDAT OF 1801, which regulated Church-state relations for a century, and which served as a model for numerous other concordats during the nineteenth century. Many of the benefits accorded to the Church by the Concordat of 1801 were withdrawn as soon as they were given, by Bonaparte's unilateral action in publishing the Organic Articles.

In Italy, Napoleon arranged a concordat on similar terms. He was mainly responsible for the vast secularization of ecclesiastical territories in Germany. Had Napoleon attained his goals, Paris would have replaced Rome as the center of the Church and the pope would have become his chaplain. When the first consul decided to become emperor, he humiliated Pius VII by inviting him to Paris to attend the coronation ceremony in Notre Dame as simply a spectator who had to watch the emperor crown himself. In retaliation for the Holy See's refusal to ally with France and join the Continental Blockade, the emperor seized the STATES OF THE CHURCH and held Pius VII captive (1809–1814) until military reversals sent Bonaparte to exile in Elba.

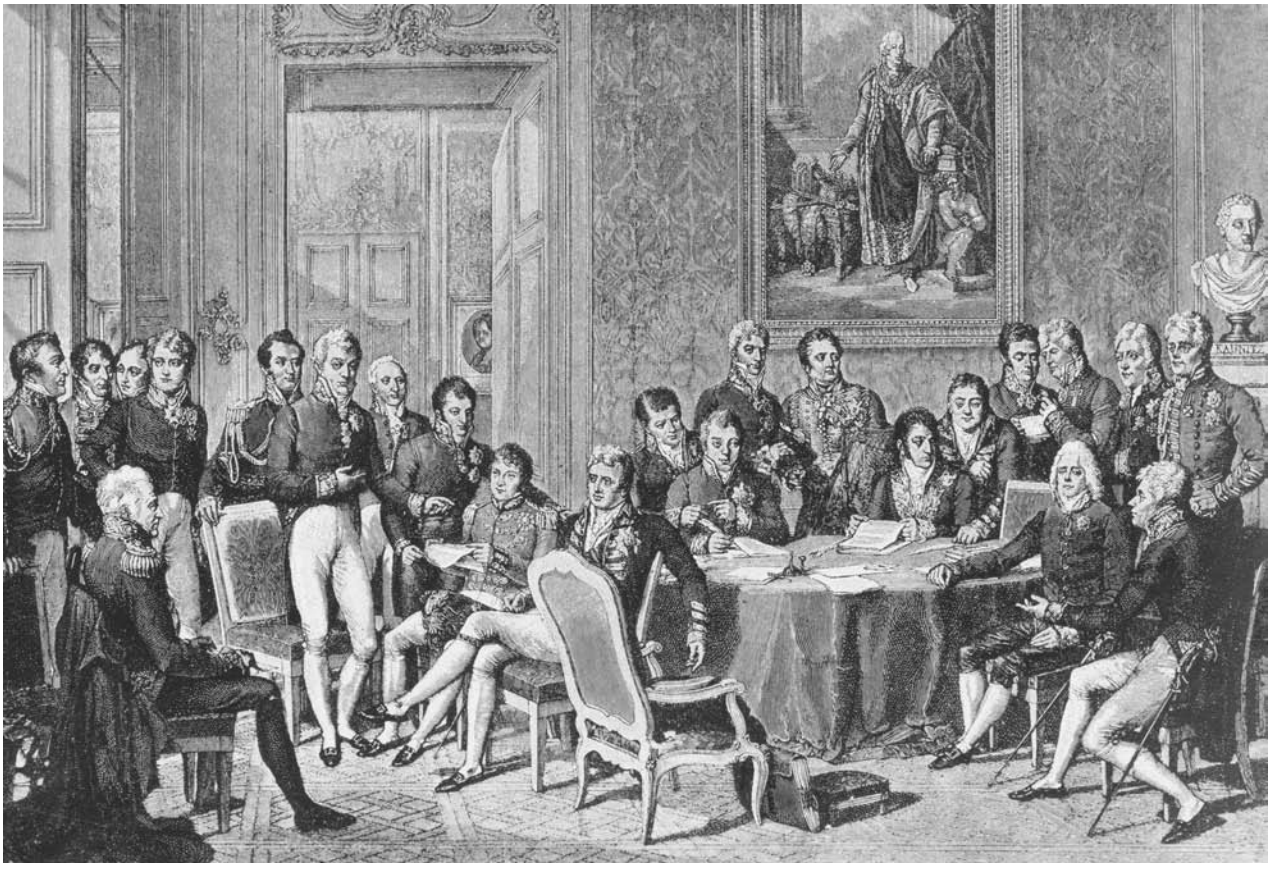
Ecclesiastical Restoration. Following the Battle of Waterloo (1815) came a period of restoration for the Church, as well as for European governments. At the Congress of Vienna, attended by Cardinal Ercole CONSALVI, the papal secretary of state, the victorious powers undertook to revive, as far as possible, the ancien régime. In their endeavor to stabilize conservative monarchical governments in power, they disposed of thrones and territories on the principle of legitimacy. Political considerations predominated; but the Church, particularly the papacy, became a major beneficiary. The statesmen at Vienna were well aware that the absolutist rulers who had weakened the Church in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries had unwittingly undermined their own thrones in the process, as events after 1789 demonstrated.

The conclusion was that throne and altar are best united. A much more benign attitude toward religion came into vogue. As a result, the allied powers that had watched unmoved when Pius VII was deprived of his temporal power and detained as a prisoner decreed the return of most of the States of the Church. Not all the decisions at Vienna were of this tenor, to be sure. Catholic Belgium was united with Holland and subjected to the Protestant House of Orange. Most of Poland passed to Russia. German lay rulers, generally Protestants, were allowed to retain their recently acquired ecclesiastical principalities.



In this changed atmosphere, Pius VII restored the JESUITS throughout the world in 1814, soon after his release from Fontainebleau; he was able to take this step without objection from the royal courts that had exerted strong pressure on Pope CLEMENT XIV to suppress the Jesuits in 1773. The situation allowed the badly disrupted Church to reorganize itself in Europe and in the mission fields. It was very significant that the papacy, the authority of which had been much weakened since the mid-seventeenth century, took the lead in this process. From this point, there was an upswing in papal spiritual power, a pronounced trend toward centralization of ecclesiastical administrative power in Rome, and an unquestioned exercise of papal primacy of jurisdiction throughout the Church. These were among the most significant developments of the century. The concordats and other agreements that were concluded by the Holy See were an important part of this reorganization.

Not surprisingly, the Church regarded the Restoration regime with favor, just as it had looked askance at the French Revolution and what it represented. The alliance of throne and altar had serious disadvantages that became more apparent in succeeding decades. After 1815, the Church was identified in many minds with the reactionary Restoration; the reorganization of the States of the Church along the lines of the ancien régime did nothing to dispel this notion. Klemens Wenzel von Metternich (1773–1859), the leading exponent of the political Restoration, hoped that this edifice would be an enduring one; yet revolutionary outbreaks in Latin America in the 1820s and in Europe in 1830 soon weakened its foundation. It could not withstand the explosions of nationalistic and constitutional furies of 1848, promoted by the liberals, to whom belonged the future.

Church and Liberalism. LIBERALISM and its manifold relations with the Church provided the main themes for nineteenth-century ecclesiastical history. Liberalism is a broad but vague term that defies precise definition; its connotations varied in different countries and in different decades. In general, the liberal outlook favored a minimum of restrictions on individual liberty in private and public life, and defended a maximum of freedom for the individual in his social, economic, and religious existence and in his relations to the state. This viewpoint was rooted in RATIONALISM; it was based, therefore, on an ideology sharply at variance with the Catholic one. The liberals upheld the ideals of the French Revolution and abhorred those of the Restoration.

The trend in the nineteenth century was toward constitutional regimes, popular sovereignty, broadening of the suffrage, complete religious liberty, equality for all citizens, abolition of established churches and of clerical privileges, separation of Church and state, and assumption by the government of functions formerly exercised by the Church. Thus, the civil power came to claim control over marriage, charitable endeavors, public welfare, and education. The tendency was to view the Church as a society within the state, part of it and subject to it like other societies, inferior to the state even in the religious sphere. This trend found its strongest supporters among the liberals, who looked upon the Church's conservatism as a major obstacle to their victory. Religious and philosophical propositions fundamental to doctrinaire liberalism attracted the ire of the Church in the Mirari vos (On Liberalism and Religious Indifferentism, 1832), the SYLLABUS OF ERRORS (1864), Quanta cura (Condemning Current Errors, 1864), and other notable papal pronouncements.

A group of Catholic liberals (or democratic Catholics), particularly in France, quickly foresaw the perils to the Church in aligning itself with forces destined for proximate oblivion. Hugues Félicité Robert de LAMEN-

Congress of Vienna. This painting by Johann Baptist Isabey shows the delegates of the Vienna Congress, held after the Napoleonic Wars in 1814 to decide the reconstruction of Europe, seated around a table. © BETTMANN/CORBIS

NAIS was the pioneer in seeking an accommodation with the new order developing out of the French Revolution. His program advocated freedom of education, of association, and of the press. Still more revolutionary to the Church of his day was his advocacy of complete religious liberty and complete separation of Church and state. Among his principal disciples, Lamennais counted Olympe-Philippe GERBET, Thomas-Marie-Joseph Gousset (1792–1866), Prosper GUÉRANGER, Jean-Baptiste Henri LACORDAIRE, Charles-Forbes-René de MONTALEMBERT, and René François ROHRBACHER. In some respects, Lamennais was a man of prophetic vision. Unfortunately, he advanced his proposals in exaggerated fashion and mixed them with a good deal of unsound theology. The conservative Pope Gregory XVI solemnly condemned them in Mirari vos (1832) and Singulari nos (On the Errors of Lamennais, 1834).

In France, the hierarchy and the majority of the laity sided with the pope, and the cause of liberal Catholicism accordingly suffered a serious but not universal setback. In Belgium, Catholics joined forces with liberals to win independence in 1830 and to draft a liberal constitution. Daniel O'CONNELL, who led the successful struggle in Great Britain for Catholic Emancipation (1829), and who then started an unsuccessful drive to repeal Ireland's legislative union with England, represented a decidedly liberal outlook.

Liberals, drawing their strength mainly from the middle class, came to control several countries, particularly from the mid-nineteenth century to World War I (1914–1918). In Spain, Portugal, Italy, France, and Latin America, their rule was hostile to the Church and characterized by ANTICLERICALISM, sometimes of the most extreme type. In Germany, Austria, and Switzerland, they supported the KULTURKAMPF.

Political Organization of Catholics. A striking modern innovation has been the organization of Catholics for political purposes. The Catholic Association, started in 1823 in Ireland by Daniel O'Connell to win emancipation, was a pioneer. With the growth of representative government and of political parties, along with the need for Catholics to band together to further their rights, Catholic political parties were formed in several western European countries, notably in Belgium, the Netherlands, France, Germany, Austria, Switzerland, and Italy. These groups were not always professedly confessional; this was true of the best known of them, the Center Party in Germany, which was succeeded after World War II (1939–1945) by the Christian Democratic Party. Christian Democracy became more prominent after 1918. In France after 1945, the Mouvement Républicain Populaire became important.

Political Developments after 1918. Following World War I, a series of national and international political upheavals confronted the Church, with new and delicate problems of the first magnitude replacing those associated with liberalism. Exaggerated nationalism was a major factor in the outbreak of two world conflicts a quarter of a century apart, separated by a great economic crisis, and followed by the division of the globe into two violently hostile ideological groups with an "iron curtain" between them and by the increasing importance and independence of non-Western peoples in Africa and Asia. Western Europe became less prominent in the Church, although the gradient of this descent by no means paralleled the steepness of the political, economic, and intellectual declines.

Particularly significant was the rise of FASCISM in Italy under Benito MUSSOLINI. This dictatorial regime laid to rest the ROMAN QUESTION, yet it kept relations with the Holy See in a state of uneasy tension for two decades. National Socialism, under Adolf HITLER, was much more hostile to religion ideologically and subjected the Church in Germany to severe persecution. More important for the Church in the long run was the rise of Socialism and COMMUNISM.

Socialism and Communism. The spread of the Industrial Revolution, along with the shortcomings of prevailing liberalism, impelled the formulation of plans to reorganize society that were far more radical and sweeping than those propounded by the French Revolution. Progress in preventing and controlling diseases resulted in rapid population increases. Technological innovations sped the multiplication of factories, one of the effects of which was urbanization. To the industrial centers came masses of poorly educated persons who settled in squalid slums. There, the labor of men, women, and children was ruthlessly exploited by members of a greedy middle class, indifferent to the welfare of their employees and intent on accumulating for themselves maximum profits under a capitalistic system that favored fierce, open competition, minimal state control of individualism, and slight governmental efforts at social legislation. The disparity in wealth and political power between the minority who owned the means of production and the proletarian majority of wage earners was glaring and became ever more irritating.

Socialism arose as a solution to the evils connected with private property. In general, the Socialists aimed to improve society on the basis of public ownership of the means of production, but they differed widely among themselves in principles and, still more, in the application of them. In addition to contriving theories, Socialists became active in politics and in the labor movement. Socialist political parties rose to prominence in several European countries in the second half of the nineteenth century and continued to be important thereafter.

Some Socialists were Christians, but very many of them ignored Christianity or attacked it. Neither Claude Henri de SAINT-SIMON, the father of French Socialism, nor his leading disciples considered themselves Christians. Pierre Proudhon (1809–1865) assailed all religions, and Mikhail Bakunin (1814–1876) preached atheism. Communism evolved out of the theories of Karl MARX and Friedrich ENGELS, as a completely materialistic and militantly atheistic system. Pius IX, Leo XIII, and succeeding popes condemned the basic errors in Socialism and Communism. In return, both of these groups regarded the Church as their most stalwart foe and entered into bitter struggle against it. For huge numbers in the working class, Socialism served as a substitute for Christianity or as a religion in itself; it caused large-scale defections from Catholicism and, even more, from Protestantism. After World War I, Communists established themselves in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. Subsequent to World War II, they came to rule several countries in Eastern Europe as well as China. Persecution of all religion, particularly of the Catholic religion, was the usual aftermath of these victories.

Social Catholicism. Catholics recognized the implications of the French Revolution much more quickly than they did those of the Industrial Revolution. They became actively concerned about the political and religious aspects of liberalism long before they became fully aware of the novelty, magnitude, and complexity of the problems treated by economic liberalism. Socialism thereby gained a considerable head start on Catholicism in attempting to solve the social question.

After its beginnings in predominantly Protestant Great Britain late in the eighteenth century, the Industrial Revolution spread to the Continent, reaching different countries in different decades. The material distress and moral abandonment of the industrial proletariat became known quickly and roused sympathy and the desire to alleviate them. Poverty was a problem older than Christianity. It was widely believed that the traditional method of private charity, applied on an enlarged scale, was the proper and sufficient solution.

Only gradually did it become clear that SOCIAL JUSTICE as well as charity was involved and that structural changes in the social order were required.

Eventually a program in conformity with Catholic teachings was framed and put into practice. By that time, unfortunately, the industrialized proletariat of western Europe had become in great part alienated from the Church. The dechristianization of this group was branded by Pius IX as "the great scandal of the nineteenth century." The result was that an entire generation or more passed its life out of contact with the Church. Valiant efforts were made later to regain them, but even the heroic sacrifices of the WORKER PRIESTS met with partial success at best.

Catholics did not meet the problem simultaneously everywhere, nor were their responses the same in all lands. German Catholics were among the first to resolve the question, although the Industrial Revolution penetrated Germany after reaching France and Belgium. Adolf KOLPING and Bishop Wilhelm von KETTELER acted as pioneers around midcentury, and the Center Party was an early advocate of enlightened social legislation. As a result, German Catholics did not desert the Church en masse as did Protestant industrial workers, who flocked to the Social Democratic Party and adopted its Socialist, irreligious ideas. French Catholics, on the other hand, remained wedded to social conservatism, and French bishops and priests were slow in displaying interest in or comprehension of the problem; for some time, they disapproved of labor unions. Belgium also was tardy in meeting the new situation. The Church in Great Britain and the United States escaped the calamitous results visited upon France and Belgium, even though men of farsighted social vision, such as Cardinal Henry Edward MANNING of Westminster and Cardinal James GIBBONS of Baltimore, were not common.

Pius IX was preoccupied with liberalism's political and doctrinal aspects rather than with its social and economic consequences. In Quanta cura, however, he outlined the program that Leo XIII developed much more fully in Rerum novarum (On Capital and Labor, 1891), the first thorough papal pronouncement on the subject. With this famous encyclical, the papacy assumed the leadership in supplying the Catholic solution. Succeeding popes have on many occasions amplified Leo XIII's teachings and applied Catholic principles to new situations, most notably in the encyclicals Quadragesimo anno (On Reconstruction of the Social Order, 1931), Mater et magistra (On Christianity and Social Progress, 1961), Laborem exercens (On Human Work, 1981), and Centesimus annus (On the Hundredth Anniversary of Rerum novarum, 1991).

The Popes. The recent life of the Church has centered in Rome to such an extent that an understanding of the development of the papal office and of the course of papal history is essential for a comprehension of Church history. One of the most remarkable phenomena in the entire history of the Church is the rapid change in papal fortunes subsequent to 1815. After a period of declining prestige and effectiveness that extended from the mid-seventeenth century and reached its nadir in the misfortunes of Pius VI and Pius VII, the papacy took advantage of the changed external situation and asserted effectively its spiritual authority over the universal Church to a degree never before equaled.

Once the stormy revolutionary era closed with Napoleon's downfall, authority tended to be centralized increasingly in Rome. This trend, which became more pronounced after midcentury, reached its culmination in 1870 at VATICAN COUNCIL I, when the papal prerogatives of primacy of jurisdiction and INFALLIBILITY were solemnly defined. Especially from the time of Pius IX, the popes have been active to an unprecedented extent in the exercise of their teaching authority. Papal temporal power, on the other hand, kept declining, until in 1870 it disappeared with the loss of the States of the Church. The LATERAN PACTS (1929) resurrected this power on a very limited scale when they solved the Roman Question by creating the State of VATICAN CITY.

After Pius VI (r. 1775–1799) and Pius VII (r. 1800–1823) came Leo XII (r. 1823–1829), Pius VIII (r. 1829–1830), Gregory XVI (r. 1831–1846), Pius IX (r. 1846–1878), Leo XIII (r. 1878–1903), Pius X (r. 1903–1914), Benedict XV (r. 1914–1922), Pius XI (r. 1922–1939), Pius XII (r. 1939–1958), John XXIII (r. 1958–1963), Paul VI (r. 1963–1978), John Paul I (r. 1978), John Paul II (r. 1978–2005), and Benedict XVI (r. 2005–). As a group, the popes from the nineteenth to the twenty-first centuries have been dedicated, industrious leaders, whose intellectual and spiritual qualifications were outstanding. (For the history of these pontificates, see the entries on each pope.)

Clergy. Wide variations, quantitatively and qualitatively, can be observed in the inner, more important, phase of the Church's life in various parts of the world. On the whole, there has been a decided improvement in the caliber of the clergy. The loss of ecclesiastical wealth, clerical privileges, and lofty social status, along with the democratic spirit of the recent period, have changed for the better the character of the hierarchy; it has become more plebeian but more knowledgeable and more intent on fulfilling its duties as the shepherd of souls. The day has passed when the upper strata of society monopolized bishoprics, canonries, and other higher posts, which were too often esteemed as sinecures. Much more attention has focused on ameliorating and standardizing the intellectual and spiritual training of priests in seminaries. The Holy See has made the seminary system the object of continual solicitude and of watchful supervision. Priests of the twentieth century were better prepared than their predecessors in the nineteenth century to meet the problems created by vast economic, social, and intellectual upheavals. Pastoral vision in the nineteenth century was too often narrow, and pastoral methods adjusted themselves slowly to a rapidly changing society.

Religious Institutes. One of the most conspicuous indications of the restored vitality of the nineteenth-century Church was the extraordinary progress made by religious orders and congregations. Only the thirteenth century can be compared with the nineteenth in this respect. Yet the century opened very inauspiciously for religious institutes. The age of the ENLIGHTENMENT had been one of decline for the orders, whose most conspicuous loss came in 1773 with the suppression of the Jesuits. So much religious property was seized and so many orders were dissolved in whole or in part after 1789 that most institutes had to make a fresh start after 1815.

Subsequently, the growth of existing orders and of new foundations has been steady, despite several attempts by anticlericals to stunt it in Germany and in Latin countries, notably in France. Some older orders never regained their former importance or numbers; others succeeded in doing so, only to later suffer decline. Monastic orders, which were hardest hit by secularization, were the slowest to recover. Thus the Benedictines verged on extinction for a while, but after the mid-nineteenth century they began to prosper once more. The Dominicans and Capuchins diminished greatly in numbers until a reversal set in late in the nineteenth century. The Vincentians declined to a few hundred, increased in the 1960s, and subsequently declined again. There were only a few dozen Christian Brothers left at the opening of the nineteenth century, but membership swelled in the mid-1960s. However, they proved no more able to sustain this growth than the Jesuits, who witnessed a similar resurgence and decline. Older orders of women, such as the Ursulines, Visitation Nuns, and the Daughters of Charity of St. Paul, went through similar experiences.

Numerous new congregations appeared, more so in the nineteenth than in the twentieth century. Most frequently they originated in France, Italy, or Spain, but much of the growth of the larger ones occurred outside these borders, even outside Europe. In the vast majority of cases these new institutes engaged in the active apostolate, predominantly in education, hospital work, and missionary endeavors. Several groups were founded explicitly for work in the missions. To an unprecedented extent, religious women traveled to foreign missions. The trend favored centralized, mobile, international organizations.

Among the new congregations for men, those that became best known include the Assumptionists, Blessed Sacrament Fathers, Claretians, Consolata Missionary Fathers, Divine Word Society, Holy Cross Congregation, Holy Ghost Fathers, Immaculate Heart of Mary Congregation (Scheut Fathers), La Salette Missionaries, Mariannhill Missionaries, Marianists, Marist Fathers, Montfort Fathers, Oblates of Mary Immaculate, Oblates of St. Francis de Sales, Sacred Hearts Missionaries (of Issoudun), Sacred Heart of Jesus Priests (of Saint-Quentin), Sacred Hearts Fathers, Salvatorians, Stigmatine Fathers, Verona Fathers, Viatorians, and Xaverian Missionary Fathers. Members of John BOSCO's Silesians and Silesian Sisters have spread throughout the globe.

Societies of men who live a common life without vows included the African Missions Society, Pallottines, Pontifical Institute for Foreign Missions, Precious Blood Society, and White Fathers. The Columban Fathers and St. Patrick's Missionary Society were founded in Ireland; the Mill Hill Missionaries, in England; and the Josephite Fathers, Maryknoll Missionaries, and Paulists, in the United States. The Missionary Society of St. James the Apostle was the creation of Cardinal Richard CUSHING of Boston.

Several congregations of brothers were founded. Among the more prominent ones were the Brothers of Christian Instruction of Ploërmel (La Mennais Brothers), Brothers of Christian Instruction of St. Gabriel, Charity Brothers, Immaculate Conception Brothers, Lourdes Brothers, Mercy Brothers, Our Lady Mother of Mercy Brothers, Sacred Heart Brothers, and Xaverian Brothers. The Marist Brothers grew to a membership exceeding ten thousand. Ireland was the place of foundation of the Irish Christian Brothers, Patrician Brothers, and Presentation Brothers.

Congregations of women far exceeded those of men in the number of new foundations and in total membership. Women came to constitute a higher percentage of all religious than in earlier centuries. The number of groups of Benedictine sisters alone is large; so are the numerous groups of Charity, Dominican, Franciscan, Good Shepherd, Notre Dame, Precious Blood, Providence, and Sacred Heart sisters. The Society of the Sacred Heart, founded by St. Madeleine Sophie BARAT, became famous for its educational work. The School Sisters of Notre Dame blossomed into a much larger organization. The Little Sisters of the Poor greatly endeared themselves by their care of the aged and impoverished. The Mercy Sisters, founded in Ireland by Mother Catherine MCAULEY, became the largest ever established in the English-speaking world. (See the entries on each of the above congregations).

Secular institutes represent a new direction in the religious life that has become more prominent since the mid-twentieth century.

Laity. Leakage and dechristianization processes have drained large numbers of the faithful. The careful surveys of religious practice that were made in the mid-twentieth century usually confirmed widely held opinions about the sizable, sometimes alarmingly high, percentage of nominal Catholics. Yet the laity have become more prominent in the life of the Church. After World War I, this became one of the most significant phenomena in the Church. Much attention has been devoted to the lay state as a special vocation and to a type of spirituality best suited to this state.

Catholic Organizations. The multiplication of flourishing Catholic organizations was another striking feature of this period. Some arose to foster particular devotions, others to promote the Church's rights, to aid the poor and the sick, to cultivate social life, or to unite Catholic workers, tradespeople, professional persons, war veterans, students, teachers, colleges, hospitals, and other groups. Prominent among these associations were the Holy Name Society, the LEGION OF MARY, and the National Federation of Sodalities of Our Lady.

The vast expansion of missionary activity, now dependent on private charity for material subsistence, has given great importance to mission aid societies, such as the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, the Pontifical Association of the Holy Childhood, and the Missionary Union of the Clergy. Antoine Frédéric OZANAM initiated the work of the Society of St. VINCENT DE PAUL, the charitable undertakings of which branched into numerous countries. Pax Romana and the NEWMAN APOSTOLATE were intended for students and intellectuals. The GÖRRES-GESELLSCHAFT fostered Catholic scholarship. Catholic political parties have been noted above. Catholics formed their own labor unions in addition to numerous other organizations devoted to the causes of education, access among rural Catholics, and betterment of the lives of Catholics in general. Leading fraternal organizations in the United States included the KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS, CATHOLIC DAUGHTERS OF AMERICA, and DAUGHTERS OF ISABELLA. Other countries have Catholic organizations suited to their own needs and desires. The National Catholic Welfare Conference was formed to coordinate the efforts of American Catholics to carry out the Church's social program.

Devotions. Traditional forms of piety did not vanish, but new trends and emphases emerged. JANSENIST PIETY, with its moral rigorism, gave way gradually to a more sentimental type of devotion, associated with Italian Catholicity, that stressed external practices and frequentation of the Sacraments. This interior transformation of Catholic inner life north of the Alps has been termed the "real triumph of ultramontanism," more so than the definition of papal infallibility.

Late in the nineteenth century, another trend developed and gained momentum in the following decades: Catholic spirituality became predominantly Christocentric in its orientation. Evidence of this trend appeared in the widespread devotion of the Sacred Heart. The nineteenth century has been called the "century of the Sacred Heart," but this devotion retained its popularity in the twentieth century. Pius XI extended the feast of the Sacred Heart to the universal Church. Equally Christocentric are the devotion to the PRECIOUS BLOOD and still more to the Eucharist, manifest in the common practice of perpetual adoration, frequent Communion, and the development of EUCHARISTIC CONGRESSES. Relaxation of the requirements for the EUCHARISTIC FAST served to increase this practice, but this modification was in line with the general trend observable in the laws concerning FAST AND ABSTINENCE, censures, and other disciplinary regulations.

Devotion to the Blessed Virgin Mary on a worldwide scale was also characteristic of the period. It was promoted by the solemn definitions of the doctrines of the IMMACULATE CONCEPTION (1854) and the ASSUMPTION OF MARY (1950), and by progress in the study of MARIOLOGY. As a result of the visions of St. Catherine LABOURÉ, devotion to the MIRACULOUS MEDAL gained many adherents. The apparitions to St. Bernadette SOUBIROUS have made LOURDES, France, one of the most frequented SHRINES in the world. FÁTIMA, Portugal, and, to a lesser extent, LA SALETTE, France, also have become goals of international PILGRIMAGES.

A third characteristic trend in twentieth-century lay piety was its biblical orientation. Relatively few Catholics in the nineteenth century read the BIBLE with any regularity, and the modernist crisis early in the twentieth century deterred ecclesiastical authorities from seeking to alter this situation. BIBLICAL THEOLOGY received more attention in later decades. Catholic scholars worked with greater freedom after the appearance of Pius XII's encyclical Divino afflante spiritu (On Promoting Biblical Studies, 1943), and they produced numerous scholarly works. The availability of good vernacular translations of the Sacred Scriptures and of worthwhile popular literature on the subject, as well as the urging of the hierarchy, gave great impetus to this movement.

The LITURGICAL MOVEMENT progressed during the nineteenth century after the pioneering efforts of Dom GUÉRANGER. In the following century, it became one of the most impressive developments in the Church, one that promoted notably the role of the laity in liturgical services and that increased interest in the LITURGY.

Intellectual Life. The Church confronted an enormous task of ever-increasing magnitude in solving the religious problems posed by discoveries in the natural sciences and in many other fields of learning and by new directions in thought and letters. An explosion of discoveries in physics, chemistry, geology, astronomy, and biology vastly expanded knowledge about the natural world. These findings raised numerous questions about traditional religious beliefs, and the reconciliation of science with faith. So successful was the method of the natural sciences that many became convinced that that was the sole adequate method. The writings of Charles DARWIN on EVOLUTION, popularized by Thomas Huxley (1825–1895), were enormously influential; they were accepted enthusiastically by scientists and thinkers and came to be applied to widely diverse fields. Their impact on religion was great and for some time destructive. Scientific investigations into the workings of the mind by psychiatrists and psychologists resulted in great advances in the understanding of the human mind, but they also led to mechanistic, deterministic views and supplied many with substitutes for Christianity.

Modern philosophers have been much interested in religion, and their writings have had a profound influence on theology, more on Protestant than on Catholic theology. Many leading thinkers ceased to believe in Christianity, and some were openly anti-Christian. Their philosophical systems differed widely, but they tended directly or indirectly to portray Christianity as irrelevant or harmful.

The Bible was subjected to an enormous amount of critical attention, especially in Germany. Basic to the outlook of many of the more prominent critics was a denial of all supernatural faith and a habitual contesting of the truth of Sacred Scripture. The problem of the historical Jesus gave rise to dozens of theories. David STRAUSS and Joseph Ernest RENAN, who published two of the best-known nineteenth-century lives of Christ, were skeptics and passed on to their readers their own disbelief in the Gospel narratives. Historical study of the origins and early development of the Church was another favorite field for scrutiny and resulted in a number of theories derogatory to Catholic claims. The comparative study of religion was a well-tilled field, but its products proved injurious, in many cases, to belief in Christianity as the sole road ordained by God for SALVATION. Literature served often to disseminate in wide circles these new ideologies in the form of novels, plays, and poems impregnated with naturalistic outlooks and disdainful of Christian standards.

Catholic scholarship was for several decades ill-prepared to surmount these challenges. The closing of numerous Catholic universities, theological faculties, and monastic schools during the revolutionary and Napoleonic periods and the disastrous infiltration of the Enlightenment and Kantian ideas into Catholic thought, even in seminaries, left Catholicism at a low intellectual ebb. Recovery was slow until the mid-nineteenth century; after that, progress was rapid and continuous.

Signs of renewal became apparent first in France early in the nineteenth century, with the influential, if not profound, writings of François de CHATEAUBRIAND, whose Genius of Christianity (1802) was a sensational success, and those of Joseph de Maistre and Louis de BONALD. APOLOGETICS was cultivated extensively, most notably toward midcentury by John Henry NEWMAN, Victor DECHAMPS, and Jaime BALMES. Church history, patrology, and the history of dogma also received much study at this time, especially in Germany, where Johann MÖHLER, Johannes Ignaz von DÖLLINGER, and Carl von HEFELE were outstanding. German emphasis on historical theology caused tensions, however, with the theologians in Rome, who were traditionally attached to SCHOLASTICISM.

The key problem of conciliating faith and reason produced several solutions, not all of them acceptable. Thus HERMESIANISM, as evolved by Georg HERMES, TRADITIONALISM, ONTOLOGISM, and the systems advocated by Franz von BAADER, Anton GÜNTHER, and Jakob FROHSCHAMMER met official Roman disapproval (see Denzinger and Hünermann 2005, pp. 2738–2740, 2751–2756, 2765–2769, 2833, 2841–2847, 2850–2861). Vatican Council I supplied an impetus to ecclesiastical scholarship. The renewal of scholasticism and THOMISM gained strong encouragement from Leo XIII in 1879 in his encyclical Aeterni patris (On the Restoration of Christian Philosophy). When AMERICANISM, Reformkatholizismus, and, more importantly, MODERNISM arose around the turn of the twentieth century, the exercise of the papal magisterial power sufficed to quell them speedily. The same fate befell new theological trends in France after World War II subsequent to the publication of Pius XII's Humani generis (Concerning Some False Opinions Threatening to Undermine the Foundations of Catholic Doctrine, 1950).

Heterodox movements after 1789 that resulted in lasting group separations from the Church were rare. Deutschkatholizismus, initiated by Johann RONGE and Johann CZERSKI, the OLD CATHOLICS, the LOS-VON-ROM MOVEMENT, and the POLISH NATIONAL CATHOLIC CHURCH were the most sizable schisms, but their followings were relatively limited even at the height of their popularity. After 1918, Catholic ecclesiastical scholarship, centering in western Europe, became very active and prominent and moved out of the position of secondary rank it occupied earlier. The Catholic press spread its influence throughout the world.

Expansion. Emigration and missionary evangelization after 1789 established the Church in almost every corner of the globe and greatly increased its numbers. Millions of emigrants from Catholic countries in Europe were the main factors in building the Church in the United States, Canada, Australia, and New Zealand; they also augmented the Catholic populations converted earlier in Latin America.

By 1789 the missions were in a sad state after a century of stagnation and decline, hastened by the heavy loss of personnel when the Jesuits were suppressed in 1773. During the next four decades and longer, this situation deteriorated further as the religious orders suffered dissolutions, confiscations, and diminution of numbers. It has been estimated that in 1800 the vast territories in both hemispheres entrusted to the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith had only about five hundred priests (about half of them natives), a few dozen sisters, and somewhere between 1,400,000 and 5,000,000 faithful. Not until the pontificate of Gregory XVI was it possible to begin improving matters.

After 1878, progress was remarkable. So extraordinary were the subsequent activity and accomplishments that these decades constitute one of the most flourishing periods in all mission history. No similar length of time recorded anywhere near as many converts. The revival of the religious orders was mainly responsible for this growth. Gregory XVI, the leading mission pope of his century, and all his successors helped enormously by taking keen interest in the missions and by assuming a far more active leadership than their predecessors did or could. The huge expenditures involved in evangelization have been met by the charitable contributions of the laity, who have carried the material burdens once assumed by the Catholic governments of Spain, Portugal, and France. External factors helped. Travel became easier and safer. China, Japan, and Siam (Thailand) reopened their doors to foreigners. Regions such as inner Africa ceased to be inaccessible.

Almost all missionaries until the twentieth century came from Europe; they suffered, not always without justification, from having their work regarded as merely one phase of European colonialism. Their reluctance in some areas to prepare native clergies gave added substance to the charge, but their outlook was severely disapproved by Rome and has disappeared. With the multiplication of precise papal directives, with attention focused on mission science, and with improvements in training for missionaries, the proper function and activity of the missions came to be more perfectly understood and practiced. Disadvantageous also to the missions was the tarnished image of Christianity furnished by the arrogance, greed, immorality, and religious indifference of many transplanted colonial officials, merchants, and adventurers. By the mid-twentieth century, European prestige had dimmed, and a blaze of anti-Europeanism had erupted, fed by rising nationalisms and demands for independence. Missionaries also faced serious competition. Protestants began to spread the Gospel with great zeal and success in the nineteenth century. Islam became a serious rival in Africa and elsewhere, and in lands where anti-Catholic or atheist ideologies gained political mastery, Christian missionaries were persecuted and expelled.

Despite all this, statistics leave no doubt about the tremendous progress of the missions. By 1957 there were some 30,000 priests, 8,000 brothers, and 60,000 sisters—about half of them native—in the territories allotted to Propaganda alone, not counting the areas dependent on the Congregation for the Oriental Church, the Consistorial Congregation (in North Africa), or the Congregation for Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs (Portuguese possessions). There were also 4,000 native seminarians and 150,000 catechists and teachers. One in six of the 683 territories under Propaganda was confided to native bishops, a development that progressed rapidly under Pius XI and his successors. About fifty million Catholics inhabited mission lands. Nearly half of them were in Africa, the scene of the most spectacular gains, since the total in 1800 approximated 50,000, and in 1900, 500,000.

Reunion. UNITY OF FAITH and UNITY OF THE CHURCH are ideals that the Catholic Church has always sought. For centuries, the Catholic Church worked to mend the break with the Orthodox churches, and on a few occasions the attempts seemed to verge on success. Practical as well as theological considerations heightened the urgency in the twentieth century to promote these aims, resulting in a far greater readiness to engage in interfaith dialogue.

Interfaith movements became extremely prominent and well-received. Catholics and Anglicans conducted the MALINES CONVERSATIONS (1921–1926) to try to resolve their differences. Important attempts to restore Christian unity were undertaken by the Protestant WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and VATICAN COUNCIL II. Through the decrees and efforts of the council, as well as the Unitas Association, the UNA SANCTA movement, and many other ventures, Catholics demonstrated a growing spirit of cooperativeness. The sincerity with which the task was faced improved the relations between religious bodies that had been intolerant of one another in the not too distant past.

The Contemporary Church. The Catholic Church entered the contemporary age with the election of Giovanni Roncalli as Pope John XXIII on October 28, 1958. John XXIII recognized the need for updating, or aggiornamento, of the Church, as well as aperturismo, or opening up to the outside world. Perceiving synods and councils as the constitutional means to institute change, he called the Twenty-first Church Council to effect the necessary aggiornamento.

The Pontificate of John XXIII. John's vision was global and catholic as he selected Cardinal Augustin BEA to head a new Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity. It prepared the way for the participation of observers from other Christian communities in the council and for the promotion of ecumenism within the Roman Catholic Church. The secretariat also proposed a statement denouncing the age-old discrimination against Jews. Pope John XXIII set the example by meeting with the non-Catholic observers and receiving the archbishop of Canterbury.

Pope John XXIII also sought an accommodation with the Eastern bloc, drawing a distinction between Communism as an atheistic creed with which the Church could not compromise and Communism as a social, political, and economic reality, which had to be confronted. Rather than continuing the Church's anti-Communist crusade, he was prepared to adopt a pragmatic approach to the Communist regimes, letting Moscow know that the Vatican sought improved relations. Later, he reached agreements with a series of Communist governments, enabling the Church to secure the liberation of a number of ecclesiastics from Eastern Europe while filling some vacant bishoprics there. In turn, the Yugoslav government permitted the public funeral of Cardinal Alojzije STEPINAC in 1960. Other dividends ensued as the Soviet Union permitted the participation of the bishops from Eastern Europe in the Church Council.

During this pontificate, the Church did not neglect social questions. On May 15, 1961, the encyclical Mater et magistra, on the Church as mother and teacher of all nations, was issued, emphasizing the Church's role in social progress. In John's view, Rerum novarum represented a compendium of Catholic social and economic teaching, insisting that work was not another commodity, but a specifically human activity, and while private property was a right, it entailed social obligations. Although the Church could not accept Communism or Socialism, the objectives of which did not transcend material well-being and preached atheism, it recognized the lawfulness of state and public ownership of productive goods, especially those that exercise great power. Indeed, Mater et magistra assigned an extraordinary responsibility to the state for providing social security, accepting the welfare state as an expression of the common good, while welcoming the increase in social relationships among nations, peoples, and classes.

Two years later, on April 11, 1963, Pope John XXIII issued the wide-ranging encyclical Pacem in terris (On Establishing Universal Peace in Truth, Justice, Charity and Liberty), which was widely heralded in the secular press. Addressed not only to Catholics, the pope called for all people of good will to work together for universal peace. To achieve that goal, government and social structures must be grounded on principles of truth, justice, charity, freedom, and the dignity of the human person. Pacem in terris discussed four major themes: the relation between authority and conscience, human rights, disarmament, and the quest for the common good. It identified three "signs of the times," characteristic of modern society: the progressive improvement in the economic and social conditions of working people; the emerging prominence of women in public life; and the collapse of colonialism and rise of independent nations.

During this pontificate, the Church called for Catholics to cooperate with Christians who were separated from the Holy See, and even with non-Christians. John's global vision, reflected in his calling of the council, his social encyclicals, and his support of international organizations, also provided broad support for the work of the missions. In November 1959, on the fortieth anniversary of Benedict XV's Maximum illud on the missions, Pope John XXIII issued Princeps pastorum (On the Missions, Native Clergy, and Lay Participation) on the same subject. It announced that by 1959 there were sixty-eight Asian and twenty-five African bishops, noting that while the Church had historically been associated with Western civilization, it belonged to no one culture and had to welcome and assimilate anything that redounds to the honor of the human mind. There was also a missionary component in Mater et magistra, which depicted the Church as the mother and teacher of all nations.

When the first session of the Second Vatican Council closed on December 8, 1962, the expectations aroused had not been fulfilled, for no decrees had been approved. John proved unable to see the council to its conclusion; he died on June 3, 1963. He had been awarded the International Peace Prize of the Eugenio Balzan Foundation in March 1963, and had been selected Time magazine's "Man of the Year" for 1962. Yet not all concurred with his decisions. Likewise, his reconciliation with Jews, Protestants, Muslims, and even nonbelievers and his advancement of the social question spawned critics as well as acclaim. Some decried his opening the floodgates of change. Consciously or unconsciously, this pontificate set in motion changes that led to profound reform in the Church.

The Pontificate of Pope Paul VI. On June 21, 1963, the conclave elected the cardinal archbishop of Milan, Giovanni Battista Enrico Antonio Maria Montini, as the new pope; he assumed the name Paul VI. Following his election, he announced that the council would be continued, calling for its resumption on September 29, 1963. The aggiornamento or updating of the Church remained his objective. He cited the need to revise the canon law and reform the Curia, while revealing his commitment to the social justice enunciated in his predecessors' encyclicals. Thus Pope Paul VI made it clear that the main program for the Church would be the completion, followed by implementation, of the council's decisions.

Prior to convoking the second session, Pope Paul VI outlined new directives for the council, including the admissions of lay Catholics and an extended invitation to non-Catholic observers. At its opening, he recalled the council's goals, including Church renewal, Christian unity, and dialogue in the modern world. During this second session (from September 29 to December 4, 1963), Paul struggled to get the Roman Curia and the council to work together. He wanted the bishops to exercise their rights to govern the Church with him, while fostering conditions for ecumenical encounters with non-Catholics. Among its achievements were: the proclamation of the constitution on the liturgy, Sacrosanctum concilium, and the decree on the means of social communication, Inter mirifica. In reforming the liturgy, the Church fathers sought to adapt institutions that were subject to change to the needs of the age and to foster unity among those who believe in Christ.

In December there emerged a tentative agenda for the third session, scheduled to convene in mid-September 1964, with provisions to have women attend as auditors. By November 21, when the third session closed, three important decrees had been approved, including Lumen gentium, exploring the relationship of the pope, the bishops, the priests, and the laity within the Church; Orientalium ecclesiarum, on the Catholic EASTERN CHURCHES; and Unitatis redintegratio, on ecumenism. There were, in addition, other issues confronting the Church, including the reform of canon law, mixed marriages, birth control, and cultural diversity.

Soon after the opening of the fourth session on September 14, 1965, Pope Paul VI established a SYNOD OF BISHOPS to collaborate with him in the governance of the Church. On October 28, 1965, he promulgated five important council documents: one on the role of bishops in the Church, another on the renewal of religious life, a third on the training of priests, a fourth on Christian education, and Nostra aetate, on the Church's attitude toward non-Christian religions. Within the last document, it was stipulated that the Church reproves every form of persecution and "deplores all hatreds, persecutions, displays of anti-Semitism leveled at any time or from any source against the Jews." On December 8, 1965, the council closed.

Within the next decade, the difficulties of the post-conciliar age proved almost as troubling as those confronted in the council. Pope Paul VI recognized that the documents promulgated could not affect change in the Church unless they were implemented, and he therefore established postconciliar commissions to continue the council's work, as well as yearly meetings in Rome to continue the dialogue. The papal directive to the Postconciliar Central Commission provided suggestions for coordinating postconciliar activities and interpreting the council's decrees.

In January 1967, there was established a Council on the Laity, which sought to integrate the laity into the Church's official organizations and activities. Subsequently, canonical form was provided to the diaconate, implementing this ministry as called for by the council. Meanwhile, Pope Paul VI issued the encyclical Populorum progressio (On the Development of Peoples) on March 26, 1967. Deemed by some to be the Church's MAGNA CARTA for justice and peace, it revealed concern for those attempting to escape the ravages of hunger and poverty, pleading for social justice for the impoverished masses of the third world. A subsequent encyclical, Sacerdotalis caelibatus (On the Celibacy of the Priest), issued on June 24, 1967, upheld the Church's traditional position of priestly celibacy. Sharing the council's conviction that the Church had to draw closer to the world, Paul indicated there was a wrong and right way to do so. In his words, the Church was in the world, not of the world, but for the world.

The limits to conciliation with the modern world were evident in the pronouncement on birth control provided in Humanae vitae (On the Regulation of Birth, 1968), which condemned as unlawful the use of means that directly prevent conception. This position unleashed criticism within and outside the Church, particularly in North America and Europe.

Pope Paul VI convened an Extraordinary Synod at the end of 1969, encouraging it to explore the relationship between papal primacy and episcopal collegiality. In 1970 he ruled that bishops should submit their resignations when they reached the age of seventy-five, and that cardinals after their eightieth year could no longer take part in a conclave. Paul VI died at Castel Gandolo on August 6, 1978, having brought the council to a successful conclusion and having continued the Church's reconciliation with the modern world.

The Pontificates of Popes John Paul I and II. On August 26, 1978, Cardinal Albino Luciani, the patriarch of Venice, was elected pope and was the first to assume a double name, John Paul, indicating his determination to continue the work of the two previous Church leaders. He did not have time to do so. The challenge of the papacy proved burdensome, taxing his stamina and undermining his health. He died after a pontificate of only thirty-three days. In the second conclave of 1978, divisions prevented the election of a pope until October 16, when Cardinal Karol Wojtyła, archbishop of Kraków, was elected the first Slavic pope and first non-Italian since Hadrian VI of Utrecht in 1522. He took the name John Paul II.

Pope John Paul II continued the work of the council. He reiterated that, in the Christian view, human relations should not be governed by the individualistic logic of profit, and the Earth is to be utilized for the well-being of humanity. He also continued the social program of the Church; in September 1981 he released an encyclical, Laborem exercens (On Human Work), defending the right of workers to organize and calling for a new economic order that avoided the excesses of unrestrained capitalism and ideological Marxism.

At the beginning of June 1979, Pope John Paul II returned to his homeland—the first of three visits (1979, 1983, and 1987)—before the opening of Eastern Europe. The pope's visit, from June 2 to June 11, was religious but had political overtones. This tour altered the mentality of fear that prevailed in Poland and much of the Eastern bloc, forecasting a united Christian Europe. John Paul expressed his views on the role of the Church in the world in his first encyclical, Redemptor hominis (The Redeemer of Man), released in March 1979, and repeated them in his second encyclical, Dives in misericordia (Rich in Mercy), of December 1980.

In 1984 the Church agreed to a revision of the Lateran Pacts and the Italian Concordat that had been concluded between Pope Pius XI and the Mussolini government in 1929. By the terms of the new agreement, the Vatican recognized the separation of Church and state in Italy. Meanwhile, diplomatic relations with the United States were established. Early in 1984, President Ronald Reagan (1911–2004) announced that William A. Wilson (1914–2009) of California would be appointed the first U.S. ambassador to the Holy See.

Foreseeing the inevitable collapse of Communism and a greater role for the Church in Eastern Europe, the pope in a 1985 encyclical, Slavorum apostoli (Apostles of the Slavs), called for European unity with Christianity as its spiritual center. In 1987 the Warsaw government pledged to reopen a dialogue with the Catholic Church. It did so in July 1989, becoming the first of the Communist-bloc nations to establish diplomatic relations with the Holy See and facilitating the dramatic changes that occurred from 1989 to 1992. By 1991 the Communist system in the Soviet Union had crumbled. Near the end of 1991, a synod of European bishops, from both the East and the West, met to assess the opportunities presented by the political changes on the Continent and to promote a new evangelization of Europe.

During the last years of the twentieth century, Pope John Paul II took the lead in focusing on the Church's global mission, traveling more than all the previous popes combined, and targeting the developing world, where more than half the world's Catholics lived. In 1992 he visited Santo Domingo in the Dominican Republic for the opening of the Fourth Latin American Bishops Conference. Reiterating the Church's "preferential option for the poor," as called for by the Latin American bishops at their meeting in Medellín, Colombia, and Puebla, Mexico, the pope cautioned the Latin American clergy not to forget their spiritual mission while battling economic, social, and political injustices. He underlined that the Church's mission was religious rather than political. In September 1993, the pope challenged moral relativism, which he perceived as a great threat to Western civilization, in the encyclical Veritatis splendor (The Splendor of Truth).

During the course of 1993, Pope John Paul II apologized for the Roman Catholic Church's collaboration in the enslavement of African men, women, and children. Subsequently, at the opening of the new millennium, the Vatican issued a document titled Memory and Reconciliation: The Church and the Mistakes of the Past, which catalogued the Church's historical failures, including the excesses of the Crusades, the Inquisition, and anti-Judaism. Regret for anti-Judaism in the Church was repeated by the pope during his March 2000 visit to the Yad Vashem Holocaust museum in Jerusalem.

At the same time, the Church sought to expand its global perspective. Pope John Paul II explained that Catholicism had to become more universalized, with a different approach to the ancient cultures of non-European peoples. The pope pursued this policy through the creation of new cardinals throughout his pontificate. By the end of 1994, the Italians, once the dominant element in the college, were whittled down to twenty out of 120 cardinal electors.

After 1993, following Veritatis splendor, the reign of Pope John Paul II was highlighted by four more significant encyclicals. In March 1995, in Evangelium vitae (The Gospel of Life), his eleventh encyclical, he spoke out against abortion and euthanasia, declaring both to be "grave violations of the law of God," and stating that Catholics have a moral duty to oppose any legislation advocating or promoting either of these immoral practices. The encyclical makes clear the supremacy of divine law over human law.

In May of that same year, in Ut unum sint (On Commitment to Ecumenism), Pope John Paul II reviewed the Church's role in the ecumenical movement and ecumenism, stating it to be "an organic part of her life and work." The document also examines the papacy's role as the "visible sign and guarantor" of unity, while acknowledging that the post of bishop of Rome constituted a difficulty for most other Christians. The encyclical also reviews the history of ecumenism, including dialog, shared sacramental practices, and joint prayers and services, as well as ecumenical translations of the Bible.

In Fides et ratio (Faith and Reason), which was issued in September 1998, the pontiff focused on the "relationship between faith and philosophy," stating that it is his task to put forth the principles needed to restore "a harmonious and creative relationship" between theology and philosophy. He states that the Church has no actual philosophy of its own, nor does it elevate one particular philosophy above the others. Revelation does not debase reason and its discoveries. The encyclical goes on to examine truth and freedom, human experience and philosophy, metaphysics and theology, philosophy's value in a scientific world, and the relationship of philosophy to God's word.

In April 2003, Pope John Paul II issued Ecclesia de eucharistia (On the Eucharist in Its Relationship to the Church). In this encyclical, the pope puts forth that the Eucharist is the center of Church life. He also presents the Blessed Mother as the "woman of the Eucharist."

In the later years of his reign, in his capacity as Supreme Pontiff of the Universal Church, Pope John Paul II continued his extensive worldwide pastoral visits, visiting a great number of sites, inside and outside Italy. In 1993 alone he visited Africa, Albania, Spain, the Caribbean states, Latvia, Lithuania, Estonia, and the United States (Denver, Colorado, on WORLD YOUTH DAY). In 1994 he visited Croatia, and in that same year he established formal diplomatic relations between the Holy See and the state of Israel. The following year, Pope John Paul II went to Asia and Oceania, being greeted with great enthusiasm in the Philippines, Sri Lanka, Australia, and Papua New Guinea. He also in that year visited the Czech Republic, Poland, Belgium, and Slovakia, as well as the Cameroons, South Africa, and Kenya. And again visiting the United States, he addressed the United Nations in New York City. In 1996 the pontiff made pastoral visits to Central America, Venezuela, Tunisia, Slovenia, Germany, Hungary, and France, and, in 1997 Bosnia (Sarajevo), the Czech Republic, Lebanon, Poland, France (Paris on World Youth Day), and Brazil. That same year, he presided over the Twenty-third Italian National Eucharistic Congress in Bologna, Italy. Pope John Paul II made a historic visit to Cuba in 1998, and to Nigeria, Austria, and Croatia. In 1999 he traveled again to the United States (St. Louis, Missouri) and to Mexico, as well as to Romania, Poland, Slovenia, and Georgia. He also visited India.

The year 2000 was significant in that it marked the pope's historic visit to Egypt and the Middle East, where he traveled to both Israel and Palestine. When in the Middle East, Pope John Paul II made JUBILEE YEAR pilgrimages to Mount Sinai and the Holy Land. That same year, he made another Jubilee Year pilgrimage to the Shrine of Our Lady in Fátima, Portugal. In 2001 Pope John Paul II made a "pilgrimage in the footsteps of St. Paul the Apostle" to Greece (where he prayed with the Orthodox patriarch), Malta, and Syria (where he became the first pope to enter a mosque). That same year, he also visited Armenia, Ukraine, and Kazakhstan. He made apostolic visits in 2002 to Azerbaijan, Bulgaria, Canada, Central America, and Poland, and, in 2003, to Spain, Croatia, Bosnia-Herzegovina, and Slovakia. Then, in 2004, the Holy Father visited Switzerland and the shrines of Loreto in Italy and Lourdes in France, significantly marking the closing period of this most exceptional pontificate of the modern era.

The universal approach of Pope John Paul II, whose twenty-six-and-a-half-year reign was one of the longest in papal history, was demonstrated not only by his nearly 250 pastoral visits, but by his creation of World Youth Day and of 1,338 blesseds and 482 saints from around the world (he also made St. Thérèse of the Child Jesus a DOCTOR OF THE CHURCH).

The Pontificate of Pope Benedict XVI. On April 19, 2005, Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, the dean of the College of Cardinals, and a leading scholar, theologian, and intellectual, was elected bishop of Rome and Supreme Pontiff, taking the name Benedict XVI, chosen in honor of both St. BENEDICT and Pope Benedict XV. At his inaugural Mass, Pope Benedict XVI demonstrated his desire to be close to his flock by changing the previous custom of the submission of each cardinal. Instead, twelve people, including cardinals, clergy, religious, and laity, greeted him (the cardinals had previously sworn their obedience upon his election). He also chose to use an open-topped papal automobile so as to be closer to the people.

Pope Benedict XVI began the BEATIFICATION process of his predecessor, Pope John Paul II, waiving the usual five-year waiting period for such a process to commence, announcing this on May 13, 2005, the feast of Our Lady of Fátima. Pope Benedict XVI also celebrated his first canonizations in October of that year, marking the conclusion of the Year of the Eucharist. His curial reforms include the merging of various existing PONTIFICAL COUNCILS.

A theme of Pope Benedict XVI's pontificate has been, as he terms it, a "crisis of culture" in the West. In that regard, he has often spoken and written on the role of reason in Christianity and its place in any dialogue between secularists and Catholics. His views are reiter-

Habemus Papam (We Have a Pope). The newly elected Pope Benedict XVI, known as German Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, blesses thousands of pilgrims from the balcony of the St. Peter's Basilica at the Vatican, April 19, 2005. © KAI PFAFFENBACH/REUTERS/CORBIS ated in his encyclicals. In his first encyclical, Deus caritas est (God is Love), signed on Christmas Day 2005, he puts forth that the life of love is the life of the saints and is the proper direction for Christians. In his second encyclical, titled Spe salvi (Saved by Hope), promulgated on November 30, 2007, he outlines the relationship between hope and redemption, and, citing both philosophers and theologians, speaks of the "new hope" of Christ as a nonpolitical hope, closing with a chapter on "Mary, Star of Hope."

In his third encyclical, Caritas in veritate (Charity in Truth), signed on June 29, 2009, the Holy Father is concerned with the issues of global development and globalization and the primacy of both love and truth in any response toward the seeking of a common good for all humanity. This encyclical, recalling Pope Paul VI's Populorum progressio, which Pope Benedict XVI called the Rerum novarum of its day, deals with rights, duties, and the environment, and is critical of materialism, consumerism, and capitalism. This encyclical was written in the hope of influencing the July 2009 G8 Summit in Italy in the direction of social justice.

Pope Benedict XVI continued the ecumenical efforts of his predecessors, encouraging dialogue with other Christians, as well as with Judaism and Islam. These efforts, however, have not been without controversy, in part because of his emphasis on the primacy of the See of Peter and what has been viewed at times as a traditionalist stance (he has allowed greater access to the TRIDENTINE MASS, now called the "extraordinary form of the ROMAN RITE"), and especially because of his insistence that Catholic doctrine not be compromised as the Church reaches out to its Christian and non-Christian brethren.

Pope Benedict XVI, in fulfilling his role as Universal Pastor, has made pastoral visits outside of Italy, beginning with his visit to his native Germany (once on World Youth Day 2005 in Cologne, and later to the places of his youth). He was enthusiastically received in Poland and Spain, and in Turkey he met with the ecumenical patriarch, with whom he made a joint declaration in an effort to heal the ancient rift between the churches. The pope also visited Istanbul's famed Blue Mosque.

In 2007 Pope Benedict XVI, during an apostolic visit to Brazil, canonized an eighteenth-century Franciscan priest. In that same year, the Holy Father made a personal pilgrimage to the shrine of St. Francis in Assisi, Italy, and visited the shrine of Mariazell in Austria. In April 2008, the Holy Father visited the United States for the first time since becoming pope and celebrated Mass in Washington, D.C., and New York City, where he also addressed the United Nations General Assembly. In July 2008 Benedict XVI traveled to Australia to attend the World Youth Day in Sydney. In September 2008 he visited France, where he again condemned modern materialism.

Pope Benedict XVI proclaimed a Jubilee Year in honor of St. Paul, to be celebrated from June 28, 2008, to June 29, 2009, the Feast of Saints Peter and Paul. This bimillennial celebration commemorated the role of the Apostle Paul to the GENTILES. On June 19, 2009, the Solemnity of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, Pope Benedict XVI announced a Year for Priests (June 2009–June 2010), commemorating the 150th anniversary of the death of the Curé of Ars, St. Jean-Baptiste-Marie VIANNEY. In 2009 the Holy Father visited Africa (Cameroons, Angola) and, in the same year, the Middle East (Jordan, Israel, Palestine). He also visited and comforted the victims of the 2009 earthquake in Aquila, Italy.

Numerically, the Church has progressed both absolutely and relatively. The 130 million or so Catholics in 1789 had increased to about 545 million by 1961 and jumped to more than one billion at the opening of the new millennium, constituting some 18 percent of the global population. In 1999 the Church growth rate was 1.6 percent, slightly higher than the general population growth of 1.4 percent. However, this Church expansion was uneven, increasing mostly in Africa, Asia, and the Americas, while suffering a decline in Europe. Thus, while Europe accounted for 37 percent of the world's Catholics at the death of Pope Paul VI in 1978, at the opening of the third millennium its share had declined to 27 percent. Meanwhile, the Catholic population of the Americas had come to constitute some one-half of the world's total. During that same period, the percentage of African Catholics doubled from 6 percent to 12 percent, and Asian Catholics increased from 7.6 percent to 10.4 percent of the global Catholic population. According to Our Sunday Visitor's 2010 Catholic Almanac, the Catholic world population was 1.14 billion, with the largest Catholic populations found in Brazil (189 million), Mexico (97.2 million), the Philippines (71.9 million), the United States (68.1 million), and Italy (56.9 million). The same source records 12 patriarchates; 600 archdioceses; 2,077 dioceses; 8 patriarchs; 186 cardinals; 982 archbishops; 3,757 bishops; 408,024 priests (272,431 diocesan and 135,593 religious); 35,942 permanent deacons; 54,956 religious brothers; and 746,814 female religious.

Periodic renewal is necessary if the Church, as the Bride of Christ, is to remain ever young and fair despite nineteen centuries of age. During the twentieth century, aggiornamento was the great opportunity and challenge; the chief instrument for carrying it to successful completion was Vatican Council II.

SEE ALSO Aeterni Patris; Caritas in Veritate; Centesimus Annus; Church and State; Deus Caritas Est; Dives in Misericordia; Ecclesia de Eucharistia; Evangelium Vitae; Humani Generis; Laborem Exercens; Laity, Formation and Education of; Lay Spirituality; Mary, Blessed Virgin, Devotion to; Mater et Magistra; Missiology; Mission Theology; Pacem in Terris; Papacy; Populorum Progressio; Primacy of the Pope; Quanta Cura; Redemptor Hominis; Reformkatholizismus; Rerum Novarum; Slavorum Apostoli; Social Thought, Papal; Spe Salvi; Ut Unum Sint; Veritatis Splendor.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The Catholic Periodical Index (New York 1930–).

The Guide to Catholic Literature, edited by Walter Romig et al. (Haverford, Pa. 1888–).

Index to Religious Periodical Literature (Princeton, N.J. 1953–).

Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique (Louvain 1900–). Includes the fullest bibliographies.

The Universal Church from the Age of Revolutions through Pius XII

Roger Aubert, Le Pontificat de Pie IX, 2nd ed. (Paris 1964).

Roger Aubert, The Church in a Secularised Society, translated by Janet Sondheimer (New York 1978).

Roger Aubert, The Church in the Industrial Age, translated by Margit Resch (New York 1981).

Karl Bihlmeyer and Hermann von Tüchle, Kirchengeschichte, 17th ed. (Paderborn, Germany 1962). Vol. 3 includes an excellent bibliography.

Auguste Boulenger, Histoire générale de l'Église, Vols. 8–9 (Paris 1943–1950).

Matthew Bunson, ed., Our Sunday Visitor's 2010 Catholic Almanac (Huntington, Ind. 2009).

Owen Chadwick, The Popes and European Revolution (Oxford, U.K. 1981).

Louis Châtellier, The Religion of the Poor: Rural Missions in Europe and the Formation of Modern Catholicism, translated by Brian Pearce (New York 1997).

Carlen Claudia, ed., The Papal Encyclicals, vol. 5: 1958–1981 (Wilmington, N.C. 1981).

Frank J. Coppa, The Papacy, the Jews and the Holocaust (Washington, D.C. 2006).

Frank J. Coppa, Politics and the Papacy in the Modern World (London 2008).

Henri Daniel-Rops, The Church in an Age of Revolution, 1789–1870, translated by John Warrington (Garden City, N.Y. 1967).

Heinrich Denzinger and Peter Hünermann, Enchiridion symbolorum definitionem et declarationem de rebus fidei et morum, 40th ed. (Freiburg im Breisgau, Germany 2005).

Newman C. Eberhardt, A Summary of Catholic History, 2 vols. (St. Louis 1961).

Waldemar Gurian and M. A. Fitzsimons, eds., The Catholic Church in World Affairs (Notre Dame, Ind. 1954).

E.E.Y. Hales, The Catholic Church in the Modern World: A Survey from the French Revolution to the Present (Garden City, N.Y. 1958).

Gustav Krüger, ed., Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte, 4 vols. (Tübingen, Germany 1909–1912); vol. 4: Die Neuzeit, by Stephan Horst and Hans Leube, 2nd ed. (Tübingen, Germany 1931).

Lester Kurtz, The Politics of Heresy: The Modernist Crisis in Roman Catholicism (Berkeley, Calif. 1986).

Kenneth Scott Latourette, Christianity in a Revolutionary Age: A History of Christianity in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries, 5 vols. (New York 1958–1962).

Jean Leflon, La Crise révolutionnaire, 1789–1846 (Paris 1949).

Joseph Lortz, History of the Church, edited and translated by Edwin G. Kaiser (Milwaukee, Wisc. 1938).

Joseph Lortz, Geschichte der Kirche in ideengeschichtlicher Betrachtung, 2 vols., 21st ed. (Münster, Germany 1962–1964).

Timothy McCarthy, The Catholic Tradition: Before and After Vatican II, 1878–1993 (Chicago 1994).

Timothy McCarthy, The Catholic Tradition: The Church in the Twentieth Century, 2nd ed. (Chicago 1998).

Francisco. J. Montalban et al., Historia de la Iglesia Católica, vol. 4: 1648–1951 (Madrid 1951).

Joseph N. Moody, ed., Church and Society: Catholic Social and Political Thought and Movements, 1789–1950 (New York 1953).

Fernand Mourret, A History of the Catholic Church, translated by Newton Thompson, 8 vols. (St. Louis, Mo. 1931–1957).

Charles Poulet, A History of the Catholic Church for the Use of Colleges, Seminaries, and Universities, translated by Sidney A. Raemers, 4th ed., 2 vols. (St. Louis, Mo. 1934–1935).

Ludwig A. Veit, Die Kirche im Zeitalter des Individualismus 1648–1932, 2 vols. (Freiburg, Germany 1931–1933).

The Universal Church from Vatican II to the Present

Thomas Bokenkotter, Church and Revolution: Catholics in the Struggle of Democracy and Social Justice (New York 1998).

John Deedy, ed., The Catholic Church in the Twentieth Century: Renewing and Reimaging the City of God (Collegeville, Minn. 2000).

Avery Dulles, The Reshaping of Catholicism: Current Challenges in the Theology of Church (San Francisco, Calif. 1988).

Joseph Egan, Restoration and Renewal: The Church in the Third Millennium (Kansas City, Mo. 1995).

Timothy Fitzgerald and Martin Connell, eds., The Changing Face of the Church (Chicago 1998).

Austin Flannery, ed., Vatican Council II: The Conciliar and Post-Conciliar Documents (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1992).

Gustavo Gutierrez, A Theology of Liberation: History, Politics, and Salvation (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1973).

Eric O. Hanson, The Catholic Church in World Politics (Princeton, N.J. 1987).

James Hitchcock, Catholicism and Modernity: Confrontation or Capitulation (New York 1979).

Darrell Jodock, ed., Catholicism Contending with Modernity: Roman Catholic Modernism and Anti-modernism in Historical Context (New York 2000).

Mary Jo Leddy, Remi De Roo, and Douglas Roche, In the Eye of the Catholic Storm: The Church Since Vatican II, edited by Michael Creal (Toronto, Ont. 1992).

Richard McBrien, Report on the Church: Catholicism after Vatican II (San Francisco, Calif. 1992).

Gerald Miller and Wilburn Stancil, Catholicism at the Millennium: The Church of Tradition in Transition (Kansas City, Mo. 2001).

Thomas Rausch, Catholicism at the Dawn of the Third Millennium, 2nd ed. (Collegeville, Minn. 2003).

Thomas J. Reese, Inside the Vatican: The Politics and Organization of the Catholic Church (Cambridge, Mass. 1996).

Janet E. Smith, Humanae Vitae: A Generation Later (Washington, D.C. 1991).

Theo Westow, Introducing Contemporary Catholicism (Philadelphia, Pa. 1967).

Popes and the Papacy

Richard Camp, *The Papal Ideology of Social Reform: A Study in Historical Development, 1878–1967 (*Leiden, Netherlands 1969).

Owen Chadwick, A History of the Popes, 1830–1914 (Oxford, U.K. 1998).

Patrick Granfield, The Papacy in Transition (Garden City, N.Y. 1980).

Meg Greene, Pope John Paul II: A Biography (Westport, Conn. 2003).

Peter Hebblewaite, The Year of Three Popes (London 1978).

John Paul II, Crossing the Threshold of Hope, edited by Vittorio Messori, translated by Jenny McPhee and Martha McPhee (New York 1994).

Stephen Mansfield, Pope Benedict XVI: His Life and Mission (New York 2005).

Malachi Martin, The Keys of this Blood: The Struggle for World Dominion between Pope John Paul II, Mikhail Gorbachev, and the Capitalist West (New York 1990).

J. Michael Miller, The Divine Right of the Papacy in Recent Ecumenical Theology (Rome 1980).

Deborah Parks, John Paul II: The Pope from Poland (Brookfield, Conn. 2002).

Pio Paschini and Vincenzo Monachino, eds., I papi nella storia, 2 vols. (Rome 1961).

Susan Provost Beller, Pope John Paul II and Pope Benedict XVI: Keepers of the Faith (New York 2007).

Barbara Sheen, Pope Benedict XVI (Detroit, Mich. 2009).

Vincent Twomey, Pope Benedict XVI, The Conscience of Our Age: A Theological Portrait (San Francisco, Calif. 2007)

George Wiegel, Witness to Hope: The Biography of Pope John Paul II (New York 1999).

Missions

Congregatio de Propaganda Fide, Atlas missionum a Sacra Congregatione de Propaganda Fide dependentium (Vatican City 1958).

Simon Delacroix, ed. Histoire universelle des missions catholiques (Paris 1956–1959).

Anton Freitag, The Universe Atlas of the Christian World: The Expansion of Christianity through the Centuries, translated by Heinrich Emmerich (London 1963).

Kenneth S. Latourette, A History of the Expansion of Christianity, vols. 3 and 4 (New York 1937–1945).

Alphonsus Mulders, Missionsgeschichte: Die Ausbreitung des katholischen Glaubens (Regensburg, Germany 1960).

The Church in Various Countries

Michael Burdick, For God and the Fatherland: Religion and Politics in Argentina (Albany, N.Y. 1995).

Wilfried Daim, The Vatican and Eastern Europe, translated by Alexander Gode (New York 1970).

Maria Elisabetta de Franciscis, Italy and the Vatican: The 1984 Concordant between Church and State (New York 1989).

Richard J. Gelb, Politics and Religious Authority: American Catholics Since the Second Vatican Council (Westport, Conn. 1994).

Anthony Gill, Rendering unto Caesar: The Catholic Church and the State in Latin America (Chicago 1998).

Michael Glazier and Thomas J. Shelley, eds., The Encyclopedia of American Catholic History (Collegeville, Minn. 1997).

Anne Greene, The Catholic Church in Haiti: Political and Social Change (East Lansing, Mich. 1993).

Arturo C. Jemolo, Church and State in Italy, 1850–1950, translated by David Moore (Oxford, U.K. 1960).

Ronald C. Monticone, The Catholic Church in Communist Poland, 1945–1985: Forty Years of Church-State Relations (New York 1986).

Milagros Peña, Theologies and Liberation in Peru: The Role of Ideas in Social Movements (Philadelphia, Pa. 1995).

Michael Tangeman, Mexico at the Crossroads: Politics, the Church, and the Poor (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1995).

Rev. John Francis Broderick SJ
Professor of Ecclesiastical History
Weston College, Weston, Massachusetts

Frank J. Coppa
Professor of History
St. John's University, Jamaica, New York

William Roberts
Professor of History and Social Sciences
Fairleigh Dickinson University, Teaneck, New Jersey
(2010)

CHURCH AND STATE IN THE UNITED STATES (LEGAL HISTORY)

This entry contains the following:

I. COLONIAL PERIOD (1607–1776)
Rev. Thomas Hanley/Howard Bromberg
II. THE DISESTABLISHMENT PERIOD (1776–1834)
Matthew J. Mullaney Jr./Howard Bromberg
III. PERIOD OF CONFLICT (1834–1900)
Joseph C. Polking/Howard Bromberg
IV. SEARCH FOR SOLUTION (1900–2001)
Michael S. Ariens/Howard Bromberg
V. NEW CONTROVERSIES (2001–2009)
Howard Bromberg

I. COLONIAL PERIOD (1607–1776)

The U.S. law of FREEDOM OF RELIGION has evolved from many historical circumstances and often conflicting ideologies. The church-state arrangements of the colonial period were to require a new pattern when full union was finally attained. By a process of legislation and judicial decisions, continual adjustments were made to accommodate the needs and to meet the demands of a nation becoming ever more pluralistic in religion. The study of church and state in American law indicates that there is wide latitude for the solution of conflicts and problems still to come.

Church-state understandings in the United States had their origins in the colonial period between 1607 and 1776. The law of this period reflected a growing spirit of freedom and grew out of the colonists' adjustment to New World opportunities. The colonists had always to reckon with the Church of England and the religious policy of the mother country. Great diversity came out of the experience in the three major regions, the Southern, Middle, and New England Colonies, which were to some extent distinct cultural groups. Certain legal landmarks in each of the colonies of these regions will be pointed out and an account taken of the forces behind them. Restrictions on dissenters from the varying versions of establishment had great implications even for Catholics, and these will be noted.

Virginia. The Church of England was officially maintained in Virginia from the very beginning. The 1606 Virginia Company Charter urged the colony to foster Christianity "according to the rites and doctrine of the Church of England." The Royal Charter of 1624, in the era of Archbishop William LAUD, carried forward the design of ANGLICANISM without regard for dissenters. Novelties of doctrine were opposed, and the assembly passed laws applying Canon Law. The colonial government regulated the building of chapels, appointment of ministers, and ritual. It was in this environment that the first Lord Baltimore unsuccessfully attempted a settlement and saw the need of locating elsewhere. Catholics were soon disfranchised. Comprehensive legislation on these matters was passed in 1642.

The seventeenth century was marked by a successful move toward local vestry control of parishes. This involved conflict with the governor. Following the lead of a predecessor, William Berkeley (1605–1677) insisted on examining the credentials of ministers to make certain that they had the approval of the bishop of London. However, he won the power of presentation of ministers only in Jamestown; elsewhere, parish vestries, in the hands of the planter gentry, controlled appointments.

PURITANS were unable seriously to modify this order of things, even during the commonwealth period. When Berkeley returned as governor in 1661, he made further provisions for the enforcement of Anglican liturgy; legal illegitimacy was imputed to children born of parents outside this rite of matrimony. Fines were levied on those failing to meet church obligations, and assessments were collected for support of the church. Quakers, Puritans, and Catholics were unwelcome during this era. Giles Brent (1600–1672), a wealthy Catholic planter, as an exception held a seat in the assembly.

The DECLARATION OF RIGHTS OF 1689 compelled Virginia to give legal status to congregations that were not strictly in the Anglican tradition. HUGUENOTS and German Lutherans organized churches between 1700 and 1730 with legal incorporation. The Hanover Presbytery legally placed itself under the Philadelphia Synod. Dissenters in time established their churches in this manner, but their practice of having itinerant preachers created legal difficulties that had to be remedied by other legislation. Francis MAKEMIE first won a certificate to preach as a Presbyterian. In time, itinerant preachers came to enjoy the same legal rights, and Samuel Davies (1723–1761) among BAPTISTS played a leading role in widening practices of toleration when his appeal to the royal government was upheld.

Methodists and Baptists, however, experienced de facto intolerance at the hands of local officials. Instances of imprisonment for alleged disturbance of peace and verbal attacks on the Church of England shortly before the Revolution created a rallying point for opposition to establishment. General taxes on nonconformists for the support of the Church of England now became a major issue. The laity from within the Church of England indirectly supported this trend when they opposed what was called the "Parson's Cause." They resented the clergy's claim to greater income in the face of losses from fluctuation in tobacco prices. They now became militant in the traditional cause against a resident bishop who would claim more taxes and the very ecclesiastical power that the lay vestries had long retained. It was only with the Revolution, however, that the new form of the Protestant Episcopal Church brought what the laity wanted. Other denominations likewise had their remaining disabilities removed by this turn of events.

Carolinas. The Church of England was established in the Carolinas, even though dissenters soon constituted a majority of the inhabitants. The ecclesiastical law of England was applied by the Charter of 1663, and the lord proprietors soon made declarations in which religious freedom was promised. King CHARLES II, however, gave them discretionary power in limiting it in the interest of the establishment and civil order.

The Fundamental Constitution of 1670, attributed to John LOCKE, showed greater toleration while retaining establishment. All, save atheists, were allowed, although tax benefits went only to the Church of England. The freedom granted to non-Christians was intended to aid the conversion of the native peoples. A law of 1696 specifically excluded Catholics from full citizenship and religious freedom. This occurred during a period of Quaker influence; a governor of that faith took office in 1694. As in Virginia, Protestant dissenters struggled for full freedom in the eighteenth century in the face of a more firmly established Church of England. The assembly began to supervise them strictly, and they were for a time disfranchised by a law of 1704. Assemblymen had to conform to the Anglican communion ritual. Dissenting ministers were not recognized and were excluded from congregations petitioning them. Joseph Boone, however, appealed successfully to the Crown and the Fundamental Constitution. Particularly in North Carolina, which became a separate colony in 1691, Quakers fought against the established church and the Vestry Act of 1704. It was some time before they were relieved of disabilities implied in oath requirements. Marriages before non-Anglican clergymen were not legal in North Carolina until 1766.

Georgia. The Charter of George II in 1732 assured all inhabitants except Catholics "a free exercise of Religion," and Quakers were allowed to substitute an affirmation for the usual oaths. The trustees in their "Design" encouraged European Protestant settlers and later offered material support to clergy who would minister to new communities. When the colony was put under direct royal control in 1752, formal establishment of the Church of England came about. Its parishes received support and stipends for their clergy.

Massachusetts. The founders of Massachusetts Bay brought with them the belief that the true church was the individual congregation. A group of such churches could, however, be viewed collectively as within the Church of England. The New Englanders, following the teaching of William Ames (1576–1633) and in opposition to Thomas CARTWRIGHT, rejected the idea that the congregation existed by authority of the Church of England.

A second principle produced what has been called a "Bible State," or THEOCRACY, in Massachusetts. The Hebraic concept of covenant as a relationship between the soul and God found legal application. Persons who enjoyed such a relationship were the only full citizens, or saints. Their status was verified by the elders of the local congregation. Such covenanted souls and congregations collectively formed a covenanted state. The civil magistrates and judges ruled as the counterpart of the congregation elders. While clergymen were not civil officials, they were their authentic guides in fashioning laws, which all assumed would conform to the BIBLE. Such godly magistrates were guardians both of public morals and church discipline. Because both religious and civil authority derived immediately from the rule of divine revelation in the Bible, the commonwealth was properly called a theocracy.

Using to advantage the vague language of the Massachusetts Bay Company Charter, the founders, through the general court, limited control and full benefits to settlers "such as are members of some of the Churches." Four years later, in 1635, such churches had to be approved by the general court. Within three years, assessments were levied for the support of these congregations. Fines were soon imposed for nonattendance, and in 1646 the Act Against Heresy listed punishments that would be meted out for denial of justification, immortality of the soul, and other orthodox beliefs.

Adjustment of authority was made within this framework of law. The clergy, as learned divines, were earnestly consulted by all magistrates to see that the actions of the latter conformed to the directives of Holy Scripture. Nathaniel Ward (1578–1652) wrote a code of laws for this purpose in 1641. Controversy over the manner of forming and approving true CONGREGATIONAL CHURCHES led to the CAMBRIDGE PLATFORM, and a general court act of 1651 put down the WESTMINSTER CONFESSION of Faith as a criterion of orthodoxy. Thus an aristocracy of magistrates and church elders was preserved by the balance of authority that these prescriptions established.

Judicial decisions fell harshly upon dissenters from these laws. The magistrates expelled Anne Hutchinson (1591–1643) for the heresy of antinomianism and Roger WILLIAMS for his notion of separation of church and state. Quakers were executed when they defied decrees of expulsion, and the Salem WITCHCRAFT trials at the end of the seventeenth century were the result of this legal system. Catholics were singled out by specific laws as being even more unwelcome than Quakers. The Christmas festival was forbidden as a manifestation of popery.

Reaction against such harshness, the pressures of a growing SECULARIZATION and religious diversity, forced concessions. The HALF-WAY COVENANT as a law relaxed requirements for church membership and full citizenship. The strict rule of baptism for children born only of parents in full communion no longer held. Forms of "communion in spirit" were applied as norms. Anglicans were increasingly receiving the LORD'S SUPPER, and in time their churches were legally recognized.

Yet Congregationalism combined with other denominations in stopping the spread and influence of these churchmen, lest an Anglican establishment be imposed on New England. The Declaration of Rights of 1689 urged Massachusetts to extend freedom to all Christians except Catholics. Financial support of Congregationalism became the bone of contention. The Five Mile Act of 1727 allowed Anglicans to apply their assessment to one of their churches or ministers provided they were within that distance. The eighteenth century saw the gradual extension of this practice, even to the benefit of ANABAPTISTS. Through the Revolution, incidental inequities were a continual object of attack by Baptists, Presbyterians, and others.

The Plymouth settlement, founded before Massachusetts and joined to it in 1691, did not strive so strenuously for theocracy. The MAYFLOWER COMPACT made no specific provision for theocracy, although Puritans predominated in drafting it and applying it to civil life. Laws gave civil officials power to keep peace in the churches and promote attendance at worship without specifying any denomination. Financial support of some clergy was enforced. In 1671 freemen came to be limited to those of orthodox belief. Quakers were unwelcome, as were Catholics, and oaths created a problem for both groups.

Connecticut. New Haven, which was joined to Connecticut in 1662, was a pure theocracy. Under the leadership of John Davenport (1597–c. 1669) and the Fundamental Agreement of 1639, unorthodox views were suppressed. Those who were not Congregational Church members had to apply for a certificate if they wished to remain in the colony, and even then they were without full citizenship. All settlers were put under the government of magistrates, who were pillars of the church. These men chose a governor who had a similar standing.

Connecticut was not so strict a theocracy. Thomas HOOKER, who formed its principles, disagreed with John Winthrop's (c. 1588–1649) aristocratic theory of magistracy. Church membership was not a requirement for citizenship. The assembly was therefore more open. The governor, possessed of less authority than in Massachusetts, was required to have church standing. The substance of theocracy was found in the authority of the assembly over church discipline. It chartered Congregational and all other churches, and in disputes it might sit as a quasi-ecclesiastical court. After 1656 Connecticut was guided by Massachusetts's Half-Way Covenant and its own Saybrook Platform of 1708 in relaxing requirements for congregations and membership. Assessments of all for the support of the official Congregational Church prevailed throughout the period.

The religious homogeneity of Connecticut in the seventeenth century had minimized the difficulty of dissent, but this condition of homogeneity soon changed. However, Quakers, once viewed as unwelcome, now found some protection. A law of 1708 made further concessions to liberty when Anglican churches were authorized. In the Act of 1727 to protect dissenters, one provision allowed Anglicans to apply their religious assessment to their own ministers and churches. After 1750, Presbyterians and others were given a similar benefit.

New Hampshire. When John Wheelwright (c. 1592–1679) was banished from Massachusetts, he successfully established the foundations of what would become in 1679 the independent colony of New Hampshire. The Agreement of 1639 put down no religious requirement for citizenship, officeholding, and voting. Massachusetts agreed to this and admitted New Hampshire delegates to its general court. At the same time, New Hampshire early on passed laws of assessment for the support of the clergy without specifying to what denomination they must belong.

Beginning in 1680, steps were taken to make a royal colony of New Hampshire. Past practices continued. Except for a few intervals before 1700, the mother country effectively formed a policy that protected, and at times favored, the Church of England. Freedom of Protestants was decreed, and dissenter churches were not opposed.

Rhode Island. The only truly radical departure from the prevailing conviction that church and state should be united was made by Rhode Island. Roger Williams, its founder and guiding genius, argued against Massachusetts laws within the framework of Calvinistic theology. Rhode Island's first charter contained only customary statements on religious freedom. A fundamental code was soon drawn up that denied civil magistrates authority over spiritual matters. Persons of all religious persuasions were granted citizenship, and no levy of taxes for the support of any church was permitted. In his oversimplified analysis, the church must stand before the law as any other corporation, free of any complicated characteristics that might put it beyond the nation or with a purely spiritual existence. Williams's own adjustments of theory to practice were confined to the task of dealing with Quakers and others where freedom of conscience might disrupt public order. In 1662 Charles II approved the original charter. The eighteenth century saw departures from the full measure of toleration. In 1729 Roman Catholics were disfranchised. Jews were disbarred on religious grounds from public office.

New York. The 1638 Articles of Colonization made it clear that Dutch companies were responsible for promoting the Dutch Reformed religion. This arrangement, however, never resulted in a very strict establishment, and dissenters were generally respected.

These conditions continued to a great extent when the Catholic Duke of York, later King JAMES II, took over control with his laws of 1665. Liberty of conscience was specifically granted, and the Catholic governor, Thomas Dongan (1634–1715), reasserted more forcefully in 1683 the provision for religious freedom for Christians. An attempt was made in 1693 to compel appointment of Anglican ministers only, but these efforts failed. Dissenting congregations and their clergy were recognized. The Presbyterian Francis Makemie and others were allowed to preach throughout the province.

Concessions were made to Quakers regarding oath taking in 1734, but no concessions ever clearly freed Moravians. Catholics were specifically denied benefits of toleration, and instructions from the Crown and the governors reinforced this measure.

New Jersey. Both East and West Jersey came under the force of New York law between 1702 and 1738. Before this time, official "Concessions" of the lord proprietors gave toleration to Scotch Presbyterians, Quakers, and Dutch Reformed, and in 1693 to other Christians, except Catholics. No full establishment was found after 1738, when New Jersey became a royal colony.

Pennsylvania. The proprietary form of colonial charter provided the foundation upon which Pennsylvania developed, free of an established religion. As an exercise of personal power, Charles II repaid an old debt of money, services, and friendship to Admiral William Penn (1621–1670) through the admiral's son of the same name. Young William PENN's deep involvement with the Quakers, who were laboring under legal disabilities, made it natural to seek in the charter issued to him in 1681 a remedy for his religious troubles. Its only reference to the Church of England was an assurance to its adherents that they might freely petition and receive preachers.

The year following the issue of the charter brought a fuller public statement of the colony's legal structure. In keeping with the "Holy Experiment" characterization he had given the colony, Penn's Frame of Government clearly acknowledged God as the author and end of society. Liberty was assured to any believer in God. The SABBATH and Scriptures were to be honored. When Penn's first colonial assembly met, representatives saw fit to require that voters and officeholders profess Christianity. No reservations were made in reference to Roman Catholics.

In 1693 King William III (1650–1702) and Queen Mary II (1662–1694) annulled all the Pennsylvania laws, but the colonial assembly immediately passed them anew. Apparently, their legality needed to be established, since the legality of Stuart provisions may have been questioned. Certainly the broad provision for freedom in Pennsylvania would have been narrowed if the Declaration of Rights of 1689 had been applied to it. As it was, public worship, even by Roman Catholics, continued all through the colonial period. Unlike practices in England, one need not take the oath of supremacy nor perform prescribed acts of worship in the Church of England.

The oath, however, was required in connection with voting and officeholding in Pennsylvania. William Penn failed in his own efforts to relieve Americans of this burden, particularly to the consciences of Quakers and Catholics. Under pressure, the first assembly passed in 1696 "A New Act of Settlement," which practically had the effect of excluding many Quakers and all Catholics from voting and holding public office. It was not until 1725 that Quakers obtained relief, when the Crown finally ceased to disallow action in their favor by the assembly. Benefits of this law were extended to other societies in 1743 and in 1772 to any person who objected to the practice of oaths. Oaths and declarations against Catholic doctrines were demanded of immigrants and do not seem to have been removed during the colonial period, although they may not have been applied consistently.

Delaware. A Swedish Lutheran Church was established in the period before the Dutch attached the colony of Delaware to New Netherlands in 1663. Initially part of Pennsylvania when English rule began, it continued after 1701 as a separate colony with toleration similar to that in Pennsylvania. Oaths in particular were mitigated to the advantage of immigrants and others during the next twenty years. Church property rights were recognized. Neither benefit, however, came to Catholics.

Maryland. The Maryland Charter of 1634 freed George Calvert, First Lord Baltimore (c. 1579–1632), and his colonists from the requirements of the Church of England, though George Calvert died shortly before the Charter was sealed. The grant was given to his son, Cecil Calvert, Second Lord Baltimore (1605–1675). The general references to religion in the charter and his own instructions secured freedom of conscience for all—probably including non-Christians. The Maryland Toleration Act in the ordinance of 1639 made this freedom even more certain. The act of 1649 gave special force to the Christian's claim to toleration. This legislation was repealed in 1654 when the Puritans came to power, but was restored again when Cecil Calvert recovered full control as proprietor in 1660.

Cecil Calvert had two legal controversies with the Jesuits during this early period of the colony. He refused to exempt laymen on church property from civil law and its courts. A Jesuit title to land received from the native peoples was successfully challenged, and legislation against mortmain followed.

An Act for the Establishment of the Protestant Religion was passed by the assembly following the overthrow of the Stuarts by William and Mary. Catholic proprietary government was thereafter illegal. In 1700 taxes for support of the Church of England were voted. Benedict Leonard Calvert (1679–1715) won back proprietary rights after he had conformed to the Church of England in 1714.

The governor's powers of presentation and induction of clergy were a source of continual controversy. Attempts at obtaining a resident bishop, or a permanent commissary to supervise the clergy, failed. As late as 1769, the governor prevented the clergy of the Church of England from holding a convention to deal with their affairs.

While concessions to Quakers and other Protestants came in the eighteenth century, penalties continued to be imposed on Catholics. There was an Act to Prevent the Growth of Popery that ruled out public officeholding and public worship. Catholic immigrants found obstacles in coming to Maryland, and possession by a Catholic widow of children by a Protestant husband was declared unlawful.

SEE ALSO Toleration Acts of 1639 and 1649, Maryland.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Thomas Curry, The First Freedoms: Church and State in America to the Passage of the First Amendment (New York 1986).

Timothy Hall, Separating Church and State: Roger Williams and Religious Liberty (Champaign, Ill. 1997).

James Hutson, Church and State in America: The First Two Centuries (New York 2008).

Monica Najar, Evangelizing the South: A Social History of Church and State in Early America (New York 2008).

John Moretta, William Penn and the Quaker Legacy (Boston 2006).

Hilrie Shelton Smith et al., American Christianity: An Historical Interpretation with Representative Documents, vol. 1: 1607–1820 (New York 1960).

Rev. Thomas Hanley
Assistant Professor of History
Marquette University, Milwaukee, Wisconsin

Howard Bromberg
Professor, Law School
University of Michigan, Ann Arbor (2010)

II. THE DISESTABLISHMENT PERIOD (1776–1834)

By the time the American Revolution began in 1775, physical persecution of religious dissenters had ended, and a measure of toleration existed. Yet ten of the original thirteen colonies—the exceptions were Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, and Delaware—continued to prefer and support one religion over all others. The church that by law enjoyed that status was called the established church, or establishment, of that state. The erosion of the preferential position of the established church is traced from the Revolution to the mid-nineteenth century when, for the first time in world history, church and state were completely divorced.

No Federal Establishment. There has never been a federally established church in America. In the Articles of Confederation (ratified in 1781), there is only one reference to religion. Each state is guaranteed the assistance of its sister states if attacked "on account of religion." The articles only maintained the status quo.

When the Constitutional Convention met in Philadelphia in 1787, the practical needs of the situation as much as the political and philosophical theories of the day demanded that only timid reference, if any, be made to religion. By 1789, the states were on their way to religious freedom. To interfere with this current by establishing a federal church would have jeopardized the new Union. The New England colonies generally supported a Congregational Church, while the Middle Atlantic and southern colonies maintained Episcopal establishments. Even if the founding fathers had not believed in separation of church and state, which church was to be established? The only way Episcopal and CONGREGATIONAL CHURCHES could federate with Presbyterians, BAPTISTS, and smaller groups was on a basis of church-state separation. Article 6 of the U.S. Constitution (ratified in 1788), proscribing a religious test of office, was the offspring of this innocuous neutralism. European political states traditionally required their officers to follow the state religion. The American colonies were no exceptions. Almost all of them enacted some religious prerequisite to holding public office. Even though the new states had not yet effected disestablishment at home, they included Article 6 in the proposed Constitution. It read: "No religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States."

In the state conventions called to ratify the Constitution, a desire for even stronger guarantees of religious liberty was voiced by the delegates. Whether a state still retained its own establishment or not, its delegates announced the tenor of the times: the federal government, if only to preclude encroachment on the privileges of the state establishment, should not establish a federal religion. The federal government was not to be antagonistic to religion, but was rather to remain impartial in that matter and to attend to its civil business.

Responding to this public sentiment, the First Congress drafted a Bill of Rights, ratified by the states in 1791, which in part declared negatively that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." Both Article 6 and the religious guarantees of the First Amendment applied only to the federal government (Barron v. Mayor of Baltimore, 7 Peters 243 [1833]). It was easier to breach centuries of history and bar a federal religion where none yet existed than to dislodge existing establishments in the states. Thus the states of the Union that had not already done so were to spend the next half-century attaining this federal standard of church-state relationship.

Reasons for Disestablishment. The states granted religious freedom of their own volition, since the federal government was without jurisdiction over a state's internal affairs (Permoli v. New Orleans, 3 How. 589 [1845]). The disestablishment of state churches was the result of several factors: (1) The argument voiced by establishment proponents that religion and ultimately the state would die out without the continued support of the government was rebutted dramatically by the growth of religion in the free soil of Rhode Island and Pennsylvania; (2) with the ease resulting from their wealth and legally secured position, the established churches had become stagnant and stilted, had obtained few converts, and lacked a fervent congregation that would energetically oppose disestablishment; (3) as immigration to the New World increased and the dissenting churches gained more converts, the established groups became the political minority; and (4) the Bill of Rights, even though legally inapplicable to the states, added impetus to the disestablishment process by emphasizing individual liberties. Catholic agitation during this period, while unequivocal, should not be overemphasized. At the time of the Constitutional Convention, less than 2 percent of the churches in the United States were Catholic.

New England States. With the exception of Rhode Island, the New England states supported the Congregational Church and were more reluctant to disestablish than the states to the south.

Connecticut. Connecticut operated for more than forty years after the Revolution under the royal charter of 1662, which designated the state church as the Congregational Church. Disestablishment was not achieved until 1818, after a long and bitter politico-religious struggle. Here, as in Massachusetts, the established Congregational ministry had retained tremendous political, social, and economic influence long after the federal Constitution was ratified. With the Toleration Act of 1784, the first glimpse of disestablishment was visible. The act removed many disabilities, and established a "certificate" scheme whereby a dissenter was excused from contributing to the established church if he executed a paper declaring that he regularly attended a dissenting church. The dissenter might then pay his tax to his own church, but he was still required to support a religion.

The political agitation was intense. Congregational members had always aligned themselves with the Federalist Party. The dissenters joined the liberal Jeffersonian Republican Party. As in all the New England states, the Baptists, both for reasons of religious belief and practical advantage, pressed the cause of separation. In 1816 compulsory church attendance was repealed. In 1817 Oliver Wolcott Jr. (1760–1833), a liberal coalition candidate, won the gubernatorial election, ending a Congregational monopoly of that post. A constitutional convention was called for the following year. After recognizing the individual's freedom to enjoy religious profession and worship, the new constitution declared that "no person shall be compelled to join or support, nor by law be classed with or associated to any congregation, church or religious association." The Methodists secured a charter for Wesleyan University in 1831, and the disestablishment was completed.

Massachusetts. Though not as slow as Connecticut in adopting a state constitution, Massachusetts was slower in bringing about a financial disestablishment of the Congregational Church. The state constitution of 1780 contained an important and inclusive Declaration of Rights (Moehlman 1938, p. 40). But an abrupt and absolute break with the past was not conceivable, so the constitution went on to provide for the support of the Protestant ministry and for compulsory religious instruction. The proposed constitutional amendment of 1820 to overturn these vestiges of the establishment was defeated by nearly two to one. The end of the establishment did not come until 1833, when a comprehensive amendment to the constitution was ratified by an overwhelming vote (Moehlman 1938, p. 67).

New Hampshire. New Hampshire's colonial attitude was akin to that of Massachusetts, since New Hampshire was a part of Massachusetts until 1679. The Bill of Rights of 1784 acknowledged the right of conscience, but permitted the towns of the state "to make adequate provision at their own expense, for the support and maintenance of public Protestant teachers of piety, religion, and morality." Protection of the law was extended only to Christians (Moehlman 1938, p. 50). Legal status was granted to Baptists in 1804, to UNIVERSALISTS the following year, and to Methodists in 1807. The Toleration Act of 1819 retained the requisite that public teachers and public officials be Protestant, but it did abolish mandatory support for the establishment, thereby mollifying the dissenters. An amendment of 1877 decreed that "no person is disqualified to hold office by reason of his religious opinion."

Rhode Island. From the beginning, Rhode Island guaranteed religious freedom to all its citizens. The success of Roger WILLIAMS's "Lively Experiment" was a constant rebuke to proponents of a union of church and state who argued that one would collapse without the other. For a time, a slight "blemish" appeared on Rhode Island's record of religious freedom. In some printed editions of its charter, Roman Catholics were excluded from the "liberty to choose and be chosen officers in the Colony." This restriction was foreign to the spirit of the colony, and both Joseph Thorning (1931) and Anson Stokes (1950) argue that it was inserted without legislative authorization, possibly as a result of a clerical error. It remained in the laws of Rhode Island until 1783. The constitution of 1842 guaranteed religious and civil liberties to all citizens (Moehlman 1938, p. 72).

Middle Atlantic States. Unlike New England, there was never a firmly entrenched establishment in any of the Middle Atlantic states, though New York and New Jersey did favor the Church of England.

New York. In the years preceding the Revolution, the general policy of the New York government was to favor the established Church of England as much as possible without severely alienating dissenters. By the first state constitution, enacted in 1777, the Act of Establishment of 1683 was repealed (Moehlman 1938, p. 48). "Religious profession and worship, without discrimination," were assured to all citizens. No religious test was prescribed for any state officer, with the exception that ministers of the Gospel were denied the right to hold public office. Quakers were allowed to affirm an oath rather than swear to it, and they were permitted to substitute a money payment for military service. The first constitutional revision in 1821 did little to change the clauses regarding religion. The disability of public office was removed from the ministry in the amendment of 1846. In New York, the disestablished church was guaranteed at all times continuous possession of lands granted during the establishment period, a reversal of the Virginia precedent.

New Jersey. Close political ties with liberal New York, plus the mild and tolerant spirit of the Quakers in the state legislature, leavened the whole course of New Jersey's attainment of religious freedom. The state's first constitution, adopted two days before the Declaration of Independence was announced in 1776, exempted all persons from mandatory attendance at religious services and the obligation of maintaining a church or ministry. Only Protestants, however, "were capable of being elected into any office of profit or trust, or being a member of either branch of the Legislature" (Moehlman 1938, p. 48). This situation continued until 1844, when a new constitution was enacted, granting civil liberties equally to all the citizenry (Moehlman 1938, p. 72).

Pennsylvania. Under the enlightened William PENN, Pennsylvania grew without an establishment. His Charter of Liberties and Privileges, granted in 1701, guaranteed freedom of worship to all theists and the right to hold office to all Christians. This liberal bent was continued in the Pennsylvania constitution of 1776, but the religious test of office found in the charter was retained. Before being seated, each member of the house of representatives was required to attest, "I do believe in one God, the creator and governor of the universe, the rewarder of the good and punisher of the wicked. And I do acknowledge the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be by Divine inspiration." This admitted Roman Catholics to full rights and was in this respect more liberal than contemporaneous constitutions of Pennsylvania's sister states. The reference to the New Testament was, of course, distasteful to the Jewish community in Philadelphia, and in 1783 they petitioned that it be dropped. This was done in 1790, but the test of belief in God was retained.

Delaware. Delaware gained independence from Pennsylvania in 1701, and taking its lead from its parent state, it never had an established church. Religious freedom, therefore, was always the rule; complete civil freedom was not so immediate. In its constitution of 1776, Delaware, like Pennsylvania, required an oath of all elected officials to provide that the state should be governed by orthodox Christians (Moehlman 1938, p. 52). Unlike Pennsylvania, however, Delaware abolished any religious test of office in 1792, completely separating the state from religion.

The South. All the southern states established the Church of England. The contrast between the conduct of Virginia and that of South Carolina during the Revolution is notable.

Maryland. The position of Roman Catholics in Maryland at the time of the Revolution was more secure than in the other colonies because of the strong Catholic influence in the early years of the colony and the weak position of the Maryland establishment, the Anglican Church.

The declaration of rights adopted as part of its new constitution of 1776 recognized that "all persons, professing the Christian religion are equally entitled to protection of their religious liberty." The Quakers, Dunkers, and Mennonites, opposed to taking judicial oaths, were allowed "to affirm" and were "admitted as witnesses in all criminal cases not capital." This was extended to capital cases in 1798. Charles Carroll (1737–1832) of Carrollton, the Catholic patriot, was one of those voting in favor of the article authorizing the state legislature to "lay a general and equal tax, for the support of the Christian religion." Finally, a "declaration of a belief in the Christian religion" was required by the constitution for admission to any office of trust or profit (Moehlman 1938, p. 41). The Jew and the freethinker were still under disabilities. There were only a few Jews in the state, and the legislature did not act to remove the restriction until 1826. The religious test of office, which has since been struck down by the U.S. Supreme Court in Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488 (1961), was then unacceptable only to a small number of agnostics and atheists, since a declaration of belief in the existence of God was still necessary.

Virginia. Thomas Jefferson (1743–1826), James Madison (1751–1836), George Mason (1725–1792), the Baptists, and the Presbyterians united to disestablish the conservative Episcopalian Church of Virginia and to light the path to religious freedom in the United States. Virginia's Declaration of Rights, passed three weeks before the Declaration of Independence, and the Bill for Establishing Religious Freedom combined to assure members of all faiths complete religious and civil liberties by 1785. This influenced immeasurably the course of the federal and sister states' governments.

North Carolina. The Carolina Charter of 1663 specially recognized the Church of England, but it provided for a measure of toleration so long as nonconformity did not interfere with the civil authority. North Carolina was second only to Virginia in adopting a constitution guaranteeing complete religious freedom (Moehlman 1938, p. 44). The constitution restricted public office to those acknowledging "the being of God [and] the truth of the Protestant religion [and] the divine authority of the Old and New Testament," thereby excluding Roman Catholics and Jews. Clergymen were not permitted to hold office.

In 1835 at Raleigh, the word Protestant was changed to Christian in deference to Roman Catholics. In fact, however, the Protestant requirement had not been enforced, for Thomas Burke (c. 1747–1783), who became governor in 1781, and William Gaston (1778–1844), who was appointed to the North Carolina Supreme Court in 1833, were both Catholics. The Jewish disability was enforced, for there was little pressure to remove the bar since most of the Jewish population in the United States was found in the large cities to the north. The constitution of 1868 removed this last restriction to total religious freedom (Moehlman 1938, p. 108).

South Carolina. South Carolina had established the Anglican Church. By the constitution of 1778, all theists were "freely tolerated," but that document further declared that "the Christian Protestant religion shall be deemed, and is hereby constituted … the established religion of this State." Despite the existence of a preferred religion, the dissenters' onerous task of supporting an establishment was removed. Only Protestants could hold public office, but any religious society holding property was permitted to retain it. This law was very beneficial to the Anglican Church, the prior establishment, since it had been the recipient of much official largesse.

The state exercised a Connecticut-like control over religious activities. The election of a pastor or clergyman was prescribed by the constitution to be by majority vote of the congregation. The elected minister was further required to subscribe to a declaration anticipating his official and unofficial conduct during his tenure.

By the constitution of 1790, dissenters, previously only "tolerated," were guaranteed the "free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference." Roman Catholics and other non-Protestant groups were enfranchised. The document was a drastic departure from the narrowly Protestant constitution of twelve years earlier (Moehlman 1938, p. 45). By 1868, only those who denied the existence of a supreme being were ineligible to hold public office.

Georgia. The Georgia Charter of 1732, secured by James Oglethorpe (1696–1785), stipulated that all officeholders be Protestant, and "that all ... persons, except papists, shall have a free exercise of religion." The derogatory term papist was deleted in the constitution of 1777, and freedom of worship was extended to all citizens. As was frequently the case, the clergy were unable to hold office. There was no religious test for voting, but the Protestant prerequisite for membership in the state legislature was retained. The 1789 constitution removed all religious restrictions upon service in public office. Thus Georgia from early times was provided with religious freedom.

In conclusion, though the federal government was forbidden to establish a preferred religion, remnants of the state establishments existed well into the nineteenth century. Thereafter, for the first time in history, state and church were independent of each other. The pace of disestablishment is notable, but more notable is the historic result.

SEE ALSO AMERICAN REVOLUTION, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH AND; ANGLICANISM; ANTI-CATHOLICISM (UNITED STATES); EPISCOPAL CHURCH, U.S.; FREEDOM OF RELIGION (IN U.S. CONSTITUTION); METHODIST CHURCHES; PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES IN THE UNITED STATES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Chris Beneke, Beyond Toleration: The Religious Origins of American Pluralism (New York 2006).

Daniel Dreisbach, Thomas Jefferson and the Wall of Separation Between Church and State (New York 2003).

Daniel Dreisbach, Mark Hall, and Jeffrey Morrison, The Forgotten Founders on Religion and Public Life (South Bend, Ind. 2009).

Frank Lambert, The Founding Fathers and the Place of Religion in America (Princeton, N.J. 2003).

Leonard Levy, The Establishment Clause: Religion and the First Amendment, 2nd ed. (Chapel Hill, N.C. 1994).

Conrad H. Moehlman, The American Constitutions and Religion: Religious References in the Charters of the Thirteen Colonies and the Constitutions of the Forty-eight States (Berne, Ind. 1938; reprint: Clark, N.J. 2007).

Anson Stokes, Church and State in the United States (New York 1950).

Joseph F. Thorning, Religious Liberty in Transition: A Study of the Removal of Constitutional Limitations on Religious Liberty as Part of the Social Progress in the Transition Period (Washington, D.C. 1931).

Steven Waldman, Founding Faith: How Our Founding Fathers Forged a Radical New Approach to Religious Liberty (New York 2009).

Matthew Mullaney
Assistant Corporation Counsel for the District of Columbia
Washington, D.C.

Howard Bromberg
Professor, Law School
University of Michigan, Ann Arbor (2010)

III. PERIOD OF CONFLICT (1834–1900)

The nineteenth century was an era of conflict on the religious front in the United States. Resentment against immigrants brought forth American NATIVISM in the form of such movements as the KU KLUX KLAN and KNOW-NOTHINGISM. The amazing growth of the Catholic parochial system was a response to the problems of the era.

At the start of this period, only a few effects of state establishment of religion still remained. The most obnoxious was the religious test for public office. In spite of federal and state guarantees of religious freedom, American churches in the nineteenth century encountered several new types of difficulty with the government. A proposed constitutional amendment (the BLAINE AMENDMENT) that sought to deprive religious-affiliated schools of state financial aid had a lasting effect in many states. The Mormon Church and its practice of polygamy came under direct attack. A series of disputes reached the courts as a result of schisms that split the churches into warring factions. Religious practices in public schools were both approved and forbidden by various state courts. And problems arose concerning the holding of church property and the incorporation of churches. Amid all this conflict, there was, strangely enough, a twenty-year period in which the United States and the VATICAN maintained diplomatic relations.

Religious Tests for Public Office. The Founding Fathers of the United States thought that a necessary prerequisite for securing the freedom of religion was the inclusion in the U.S. Constitution of a clause prohibiting any religious test as a requirement for holding public office. The original proposal was made in 1787 at the Constitutional Convention by Charles Pinckney (1746–1825) of South Carolina. There was considerable debate on the subject at the convention, but the proposal was finally drafted into Article 6 of the U.S. Constitution and passed easily, North Carolina being the only state that voted against it. Article 6 states that elected officials shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support the Constitution, and then continues, "but no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States."

Although this provision in the U.S. Constitution was almost unanimously approved by the original thirteen states, they were very slow to incorporate similar provisions in their own state constitutions. Most of the states were still feeling the effects of religious establishment, and they consequently limited public office to those who professed the "Protestant religion," those who were "Christians," those who believed in the "Old and New Testament," and other such conditions. Five of the original states had provisions in their constitutions limiting holders of public office to those who professed a belief in the Protestant religion (Georgia, New Hampshire, New Jersey, North Carolina, and South Carolina). Georgia was the first of the five to remove this requirement, in 1789, when its constitution was changed to read that no religious test for public office would be required. New Jersey and New Hampshire did not follow suit until 1844 and 1877 respectively. North Carolina changed "Protestant" to "Christian" in 1835, and in 1868 revised it to "belief in God." South Carolina replaced the qualification "Protestant" with belief in a supreme being in 1868. Maryland and Delaware originally required officeholders to be Christians. Delaware removed this restriction in 1792. Maryland changed the requirement to belief in God in 1826, and the requirement held until 1961, when the U.S. Supreme Court declared it unconstitutional (Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488). Pennsylvania early required a belief in both the Old and New Testaments, but the requirement was changed in 1790 to "belief in God." The slow pace at which the original states proceeded to remove religious tests can be attributed to the fact that they were free to retain or modify their laws of religious liberty as they chose.

However, the new states to gain admission to the Union had to have their constitutions approved by Congress, and Congress after the beginning of the nineteenth century required that states have adequate guarantees of religious freedom. Consequently, only four states admitted to the Union after the original states had any kind of religious restriction for public officeholders (Arkansas, Mississippi, Tennessee, Texas). These four required officeholders to hold a belief in God or in a supreme being. Most of the states admitted to the Union during the nineteenth and the early twentieth centuries have some specific constitutional provision forbidding any religious test for public office. Some, though not specifically referring to public office, forbid a religious test in guaranteeing civil or political rights to all. A few states made no mention of a religious test in their constitutions.

By 1912, with the admission of the forty-eighth state to the Union (Arizona), the states specifically prohibiting any religious test included: Alabama, Arizona, Delaware, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Louisiana, Maine, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, Ohio, Oregon, Rhode Island, Utah, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, Wisconsin, and Wyoming. States forbidding a religious test to guarantee civil and/or political rights included Michigan, Montana, Oklahoma, and South Dakota. States whose constitutions made no mention of any form of religious test were California, Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Kentucky, Nevada, and North Dakota. Those requiring a belief in God or a supreme being included Arkansas, Maryland, Mississippi, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Texas. One state, Massachusetts, obliged the people in choosing their officials to pay attention to principles of piety.

The Blaine Amendment. On December 14, 1875, James Gillespie Blaine (1830–1893), a congressman from Maine, presented to the House of Representatives a proposed amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The proposed amendment sought primarily to prevent the states from directly or indirectly devoting any public money or land to schools having any religious affiliation. As proposed, the amendment read:

> No state shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; and no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under any State. No public property, and no public revenue of nor any loan of credit by or under the authority of the United States, or any State, Territory, District or municipal corporation, shall be appropriated to, or made or used for, the support of any school, educational or other institution, under the control of any religious or antireligious sect, organization, or denomination, or wherein the particular creed or tenets shall be read or taught in any school or institution supported in whole or in part by such revenue or loan of credit; and no such appropriation or loan of credit shall be made to any religious or anti-religious sect, organization or denomination, or to > promote its interests or tenets. This article shall not be construed to prohibit the reading of the Bible in any school or institution, and it shall not have the effect to impair rights of property already vested. Congress shall have power, by appropriate legislation, to provide for the prevention and punishment of violation of this article.

The issue was debated in Congress, and discussion centered on the questions of the states' right to determine their educational policies, and the privilege of a religious people to secure their teachings in schools attended by their children. The proposal failed to win the necessary two-thirds majority in the Senate and was never put to the states for ratification.

Since the amendment's original failure, it has been reintroduced some twenty times, but only once was it reported on by the committee to which it was referred. Even this report recommended that the resolution should not be passed. But the amendment's effect has been felt in subsequent amendments or revisions of many state constitutions. Between 1877 and 1913, more than thirty state constitutions forbade financial aid to parochial schools. The provisions adopted vary greatly in detail. Some use the same language as the Blaine amendment; others say the same thing in different words. However, they all have the same purpose, of preventing the use of public school funds by private sectarian schools.

Only eight states had any constitutional provision on this matter before the Blaine amendment was introduced. These provisions were very limited in scope, usually prohibiting aid to theological and religious seminaries. The states were Wisconsin (1848), Michigan (1850), Indiana (1851), Oregon (1857), Minnesota (1857), Kansas (1858), Nebraska (1866), and Illinois (1870).

States that responded early to the Blaine amendment and incorporated a similar provision in their own constitution before 1880 included Pennsylvania (1873); Missouri, Alabama, and Nebraska (1875); Texas and Colorado (1876); Georgia, Minnesota, and New Hampshire (1877); California and Louisiana (1879); and Nevada (1880). Other states were to follow in the next twenty years: Florida (1885); Idaho, Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Wyoming (1889); Mississippi and Kentucky (1890); New York (1894); South Carolina and Utah (1895); and Delaware (1897). Three states admitted to the Union after 1900 joined in adopting similar provisions in their constitutions: Oklahoma (1907), New Mexico (1911), and Arizona (1912). Several states that have adopted new constitutions since 1900 retained provisions on this matter that appeared in their earlier constitutions: New Hampshire, Louisiana, Massachusetts, and Alabama.

The Mormon Church. In 1852 the Mormon Church decreed that the practice of polygamy was in accord with its doctrine. Polygamy was permitted only to people of good moral character who could afford a large family. The practice was never widespread, even among Mormons. But opposition to it was strong. Many non-Mormons clamored for some type of legislation to suppress and prohibit the practice.

Congress responded in 1862 with the passage of the Anti-Polygamy Act (12 Stat. 501), making polygamy in any U.S. territory a crime, and prescribing a penalty of up to five years imprisonment for violations of the act. The law was difficult to enforce because it was hard to obtain evidence of plural marriages; the Mormon Temple officials secretly retained the records of such services. It was also hard to get convictions because the juries hearing the cases were often composed primarily of Mormons. One case of violation of the Anti-Polygamy Act did reach the U.S. Supreme Court (Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145 [1878]). The Court upheld the conviction of Reynolds, reasoning that freedom of religion does not extend so far as to condone overt acts that may be disruptive of the social order.

In 1882 Congress passed the Edmunds Act (22 Stat. 30), making it a crime for a man to cohabit with two or more women at once. To secure enforcement, it was further provided that in a prosecution under this act no one could serve as a juror unless he swore that he never practiced polygamy or that he disapproved of the practice. The act also excluded polygamists from voting or holding public office in any territory. Prosecution under this law was much more successful than under the previous law.

Congress followed in 1887 with the Edmunds-Tucker Act (24 Stat. 635), which further restricted the privileges of people practicing polygamy. It permitted the vote only to those who would swear an oath against polygamy, and required all marriage ceremonies to be registered. The act also annulled laws that indirectly supported the practice, such as those affording inheritance rights to illegitimate children, laws limiting prosecution for adultery to cases in which there was a complaint by the wife, and laws that provided for elective judgeships in order to afford judicial support to the practice. This act also dissolved the corporation of the Mormon Church and seized all its property except that used for worship. Shortly after passage of this act, the Mormon Church officially disavowed polygamy and advised its members to abide by the laws of the United States in regard to it.

Shortly thereafter, in 1896, Utah was admitted to the Union with a constitutional provision forbidding the practice of polygamy. Four other western states subsequently admitted to the Union also forbade the practice in their constitutions (Oklahoma, Idaho, Arizona, and New Mexico).

Religious Practices in Public Schools. The nineteenth century saw the advent of the public school system in the United States under the leadership of Horace Mann (1796–1859). Gradually, the parochial schools of most denominations were absorbed into the public school system; the major exception was the Catholic school system. When parochial schools were merged with the public schools, there was not an immediate desecularization; religious practices and instruction were common in the early public schools. Since the Protestant religion was predominant at this time, most public schools incorporated Protestant teachings into their curriculum. Catholics objected to this practice and accordingly thought it expedient to continue their own schools with their own religious instruction.

Gradually, antireligious and nonreligious elements of the population began to work for the discontinuance of religious instruction in the public schools, and they soon succeeded. Toward the end of the nineteenth century, the public school system was conducted by the state, divorced from all church control, and given over exclusively to the dissemination of secular information. Though public schools were no longer to be controlled by religious factions, vestiges of sectarian influence remained in many states. Many schools retained the practices of saying prayers, singing hymns, and reading the Bible.

Court decisions in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries concerning the propriety of Bible reading in public schools had conflicting results; a minority of the decisions prohibited such practices. Wisconsin (State v. School District of Edgeton, 44 N.W. 967 [1890]), Nebraska (State v. Scheve, 91 N.W. 846 [1902]), Illinois (People v. Board of Education, 92 N.E. 251 [1910]), and Louisiana (Herold v. Board of School Division [1915]) were the four states to disallow Bible reading in public schools. Illinois excluded the Bible entirely; Nebraska and Wisconsin barred it only so far as it was sectarian and not when it was used to teach moral ethics. Louisiana barred it as giving preference to Christians over Jews. Twelve other states in which the question reached the courts decided in favor of allowing the reading of the Bible; they were Colorado, Georgia, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Texas.

Similar inconsistent results occurred when the courts were asked to decide whether the holding of religious services and Sunday schools in the public school buildings was proper. Some courts prohibited such use, stating that school buildings can be used only for educational purposes, thereby excluding religious services. Other courts upheld the decisions of school officials in these matters, whether the school officials allowed or disallowed the use.

The propriety of the practice of employing Roman Catholic nuns as teachers in the public schools also came to the courts for determination. Objectors pointed out that the wearing of religious garb with crucifixes and rosaries had a sectarian influence on education in such schools. Statutes forbidding the wearing of religious garb were upheld in both Pennsylvania (Commonwealth v. Herr, 78 Atl. 68 [1910]) and New York (O'Connor v. Hendrick, 77 N.E. 612 [1906]).

In the late nineteenth century, antireligious feelings concerning public schools brought pressure to bear on legislation. As a result, from 1876 to 1912, nine of the ten states admitted to the Union were required as a condition of admission to agree that provision be made for the establishment of public schools free from sectarian control.

Tenure of Church Property. Early in the nineteenth century, most of the property of the Catholic Church was held or administered by lay trustees. This was the result of an interplay of several factors, including Old World customs, Protestant influence, and practical necessity.

Since priests were scarce in the early colonies, small communities desiring to establish a church had to rely on traveling missionaries. The only practical method of caring for church property in the absence of priests was to entrust its care to lay members of the church. Also, many early Catholics in the United States had come from continental Europe, where a similar lay trustee system worked well in a civil-law framework. Finally, since the Protestant denominations were in the majority in the United States, and since they were organized on a basis of lay control, Catholics were inclined to trust in lay organization.

Nevertheless, the lay trusteeship form of control of church property in the United States was the cause of great dissension and conflict within the Church for fifty years. Trustees attempted to secure a voice in spiritual affairs of the Church. Cases occurred in which they refused to accept the services of lawfully appointed priests and attempted to name priests of their choice. Often these differences resulted in civil court cases and occasionally went to Rome for settlement.

In 1829 the First Provincial Council of Baltimore attempted to put an end to such internal disorders and dissension by decreeing that in the future no church could be built unless it were assigned to the bishop of the diocese in which the church was to be located. The decree cited the ills of the trustee system and obviously meant to abolish this system in the future. It was immediately carried out.

Bishop as Absolute Owner. Under this system, the bishop holds absolute title to the property and administers it in his individual name. This was a useful system for some time in that it proved better than the lay trustee system. However, certain difficulties arose in regard to the transfer of property at the death of the bishop, as well as in regard to improper use or disposition of the property by the bishop during his life. Attempts were made by the provincial councils of 1837, 1840, and 1843 to guarantee continuance of property in the church's hands by requiring the bishops holding title to make valid wills in favor of fellow bishops. Many courts aided the church in this matter by declaring that the bishop mentioned in a conveyance held the property only as trustee for the members of the church, even though no trust is expressed in the instrument. By virtue of this interpretation, the property would not descend to the heirs of a bishop not having a will, nor could he dispose of it by will since the beneficiary of the trust would be the equitable owner. By the same token, under this interpretation, the property cannot be reached for satisfaction of a bishop's personal debts, as it could were he the absolute titleholder. An important case in which this result was reached was Mannix v. Purcell, 46 Ohio St. 102 (1888).

As a result of the troubles involved in this system, the Third Plenary Council (1884) decreed that the method of making the bishop the absolute owner of church property was to be used only as a last resort. On July 29, 1911, the Congregation of the Council forbade the method entirely.

Bishop as Trustee. Under this system of property ownership, the legal title is vested in the trustee (bishop) and the equitable title is vested in the cestui que trust (members of the congregation). The bishop holds title for the benefit of the congregation. As legal owner of the property, the bishop is free to administer it according to the canons of the Church. He can delegate control of the property to administrators while retaining the right of supervision over the administration. Other advantages of the system include the protection of the property of the church. The property of the church cannot be reached by creditors of the bishop, and neither is there a problem of testate or intestate succession since the members of the church are the equitable owners.

Most courts have minimized the importance of the bishop as trustee and classify him as a passive, silent trustee with little power, thereby giving the members of the congregation considerable voice in deciding what use or disposition is to be made of the property (see Arts v. Guthrie, 37 N.W. 395 [1871]). This is the only objection to this form of church property ownership, and such interference by a congregation has become rare.

Bishop as a Corporation Sole. Some states in the United States provide for a system of church property ownership called the corporation sole. By this system, the bishop and his successors are incorporated by law and are afforded perpetuity. The corporation consists of one person, the bishop. At his death, the corporation does not cease but is merely in abeyance until a successor is appointed, the successor then becoming the new corporation sole. The corporation sole holds absolute title to its property. The bishop, though he is the corporation, does not hold title. This means that the property does not descend to the bishop's heirs, nor can it be reached by the bishop's creditors. The property is transferred to the succeeding bishop.

This type of ownership existed in the colonial days wherever established religions existed (e.g., in Maine, Massachusetts, and Virginia). With the disappearance of the establishments, the corporation sole disappeared until the late nineteenth century, when a few states provided for it by statute. Other states have created quasi corporations sole through court decisions without legislation authority.

Corporation Aggregate. Two types of corporation aggregate appeared: the trustee corporation and the congregational corporation. The trustee corporation is an outgrowth of the lay trustee system. To remedy the faults inherent in the lay trustee system, churches sought special charters incorporating the trustees. Later, most states provided for such incorporation in their general statutes. In this form of property ownership, the legal title is vested in the incorporated trustees, and the equitable title is in the unincorporated society. Death of a trustee has no effect on the life of the corporation, and title to property after such a death is never in abeyance.

The congregational corporation is composed of all the members of the parish. Together they form a single legal entity. The title of property is vested in the body corporate. Officers (often called trustees) are elected, but they do not hold title to the property. They merely are entrusted with the management of the business affairs of the corporation and as such are agents of the corporation. Their discretion is similar to that vested in the board of directors of an ordinary business corporation.

These types of aggregate corporations began to appear with regularity in the second half of the nineteenth century as various states passed laws permitting their establishment. Prior to this time, religious societies were not allowed to be incorporated except by special charter. This system was criticized because favoritism to certain churches was becoming manifest.

Schisms and the Courts. A SCHISM has been defined as a division or separation in a church or denomination of Christians occasioned by diversity of opinion (Nelson v. Benson, 69 Ill. 29 [1873]). Such schisms have occurred with considerable frequency in the history of the churches of the United States, with comparatively few of them involving the Roman Catholic Church. Usually, when a schism occurs, a dispute arises concerning the property of the church. Both factions seek to retain title to and use of the property. The resolution of such disputes has often been placed in the hands of the civil courts of the United States. The courts have struggled with the difficult problems involved, the primary difficulty arising from the fact that the solution depends on the type of church involved. The large number and variety of denominations with varying forms of government make it impossible to find a solution that is applicable to all such disputes.

A study of the case law in this area shows that state courts have given uniform treatment to these problems according to the type of church involved. In the only U.S. Supreme Court decision on this matter, the Court summarizes the various types of cases that have occurred and classifies them according to three categories (Watson v. Jones, 80 U.S. 679 [1871]).

Specific Trust. A type of controversy arises when a schism occurs in a church that holds property deeded to it with an express stipulation that it be used to spread some specific form of doctrine or belief. In such a case, it is the duty of the court to see that the property is not diverted to any other than the specified use. The court has to decide which faction of the church still adheres to the tenets or beliefs specified in the deed. This solution will often depend on the type of church involved. Is the church totally independent of any higher form of government or is it part of a national church by which it is governed? If the church is totally independent, the court must decide for itself which faction is adhering to the specified beliefs. There is no higher church government to rely on. If the church is part of a larger organization, the court enforces the decision of the highest tribunal of the church. Accepting this decision, the civil court has merely to decree that one faction is entitled to the use of the property according to the terms of the deed. This result will follow even if the recognized faction is a minority of the original local congregation (Wilson v. Pres. Church of John's Island, 2 Rich. Eq 192 [1846] S.C.).

Independent Congregation. Another type of controversy arises when a schism occurs in a religious congregation that owes no fealty to a higher authority or any other ecclesiastical association. The property that is the subject of the controversy has not been specifically entrusted. Such an organization is entirely independent and governs itself either by the will of a majority of its members or by such other local organism as the majority may have instituted for the purpose of ecclesiastical government. The rules to be followed in these cases are the ordinary principles governing voluntary associations. Whatever form of government is set up by the congregation must be followed. If the majority is to rule, the courts will abide by this, even if the majority has made a complete reversal from the doctrines to which it originally adhered. If certain officers are vested with control of the church, then whatever faction is headed by these officers will be entitled to the property. No inquiry may be made into the doctrine or beliefs of the various factions of the church.

In Shannon v. Frost, 3 B. Monro 253 (1842), a Kentucky court showed its reluctance to interfere with the decision of the majority of an independent Baptist church by stating: "The judicial eye cannot penetrate the will of the church for the forbidden purpose of vindicating the alleged wrongs of excised members." The court refused to allow the minority to use the house of worship, basing the decision on the decision of the majority. A Vermont court, in Smith v. Nelson, 18 Vt. 511 (1846), stated that in a review of church proceedings, a church cannot be treated differently from any other voluntary association. In a 1903 Texas case involving a church of this type, the court correctly stated that the question of a higher church government cannot be a test, since the society is independent of all such higher ecclesiastical control, and can, by majority vote, conduct its government as it pleases (Gibson v. Morris, 73 S.W. 85).

Associated Church. Another type of case, and the type under which most of the court cases seem to fit, is that of property normally acquired and intended for the general use of a religious congregation that is itself part of a large and general organization of some religious denomination, with which it is more or less intimately connected by religious views and ecclesiastical government. Most early cases were in agreement as to how disputes over property should be handled in such a case. Often a majority of a local congregation would attempt to break away from the general association and attempt to retain rights to its property. The courts recognized that although the dissenting group might be a majority of the local congregation, consideration must be given to the church government of the association of which the local congregation is a part.

A church originally formed as a branch of an associated church, subordinated to the government of that church, cannot break away from that form of government and discipline without losing the character or identity that confers rights to property (Miller v. Gable, 2 Denio [New York] 492 [1845]). The portion of a church that separates itself from the old organization to form a new one cannot validly claim property belonging to the old organization if the old organization retains its original framework, tenets, and beliefs (Gibson v. Armstrong, 46 Ken. 481 [1847]). Any majority of a local congregation that organizes resistance to the legitimate authority of its ecclesiastical superiors is not a true congregation and is not entitled to use of the church property (Winebrenner v. Colder, 43 Pa. 244 [1862]).

In a case in which a majority of a congregation withdrew from a presbytery of a Protestant church and denounced its teachings, the court held that the title to church property should remain with that portion of the congregation adhering to the tenets and discipline of the larger organization to whose use the property was originally dedicated. This is true even though the remaining faithful are a minority (Ferraria v. Vascanelles, 23 Ill. Repts. 403 [1860]).

These cases indicate that a minority of a local Methodist Episcopal congregation that adheres to its conference or of a local Presbyterian church that adheres to its presbytery is entitled to the property in such a dispute. It has likewise been decided that a Roman Catholic congregation that has placed itself under the authority of its archbishop cannot divorce itself from such authority and still keep title to property acquired by it (Dochkus v. Lithuanian Benefit Society of St. Anthony, 206 Pa. 25 [1903]).

The U.S. Supreme Court case of Watson v. Jones, 80 U.S. 679 (1871), involved a division in a local Kentucky congregation that was part of the Presbyterian Church. In deciding in favor of the group still recognized by the Protestant presbytery, the Court stated:

> In this class of cases we think the rule of action which should govern the civil courts, founded in a broad and sound view of the relations of church and state under our system of laws, and supported by a preponderating weight of judicial authority is, that, whenever the questions of discipline, or of faith, or ecclesiastical rule, custom, or law have been decided by the highest of these church judicatories to which the matter has been carried, the legal tribunals must accept such decisions as final, and as binding on them, in their application to the case before them.

The Court based its decision on two principles. First, it feared that freedom of religion would be subverted if an aggrieved party could appeal to the secular courts after the church judicatory had decided against him. Second, the Court reasoned that ecclesiastical courts and scholars were better equipped with the knowledge proper for deciding questions of this nature.

Generally speaking, U.S. civil courts have refused to hear cases concerning purely ecclesiastical matters; rather, they accept the holding of the ecclesiastical judicatories. Also, if a civil court should choose to hear such a case, it will only do so after the aggrieved person has exhausted all possible appeals in the particular church judicatory structure (German Reformed Church v. Seibert, 3 Barr 282 Pa. [1846]).

Diplomatic Representation at the Vatican. Prior to 1846, there were a few isolated instances in which the idea was proposed that the United States send a diplomatic representative to the Vatican. However, in 1846, with the election of PIUS IX to succeed GREGORY XVI as pope, the idea gained new impetus since this election was greatly favored in the United States; Pius IX was considered a liberal who would strive for reforms and greater freedoms.

In June 1847, the American consul at Rome, in a dispatch to the secretary of state, proposed that formal diplomatic relations be established between the United States and the government of the Vatican. This proposal was made after high officials of the Vatican government and the pope himself expressed the desire that such diplomatic relations be started.

In December 1847, President James K. Polk (1795–1849) in his message to Congress proposed the opening of such diplomatic relations, giving as reasons the political events occurring in the Papal States and protection of U.S. commercial interests there. In Congress, the proposal met with some opposition, but easily passed (137 to 15 in the House and 36 to 7 in the Senate). The opposition argued that under the U.S. Constitution the government could play no part in ecclesiastical matters and that the United States had no actual commercial interests to protect in the Vatican. Some feared that the president was making the proposal merely as a political move, to secure the vote of the Roman Catholic population. With the passage of this proposal, Jacob Martin, a convert to Roman Catholicism, was named the first chargé d'affaires to the Vatican in 1848. Martin's instructions from the secretary of state read:

> There is one consideration which you ought always to keep in view in your intercourse with the Papal authorities. Most, if not all Governments which have Diplomatic Representatives at Rome are connected with the Pope as the head of the Catholic Church. In this respect the Government of the United States occupies an entirely different position. It possesses no power whatever over the question of religion. All denominations of Christians stand on the same footing in this country,—and every man enjoys the inestimable right of worshiping his > God according to the dictates of his own conscience—Your efforts, therefore, will be devoted exclusively to the cultivation of the most friendly civil relations with the Papal Government, and to the extension of the commerce between the two countries. You will carefully avoid even the appearance of interfering in ecclesiastical questions, whether these relate to the United States or any other portion of the world. It might be proper, should you deem it advisable, to make these views known, on some suitable occasion, to the Papal Government; so that there may be no mistake or misunderstanding on this subject.

The diplomatic relationship thus created lasted for twenty years, until 1867. During these years, six different chargés d'affaires represented the United States in the Papal States. There was no interruption of the friendly feelings that existed between the two governments. Most of the matters arising were unrelated episodes that called for no sustained policy on the part of either country. Some of the more important incidents that arose included the alleged recognition of the southern Confederacy by the Vatican; the question of the status of Monsignor Gaetano BEDINI, who came to the United States as apostolic delegate; the protection of Vatican property by the U.S. legation during Giuseppe GARIBALDI's entrance into Rome; and the rejection of the Washington Monument Association in 1852 of a block of marble for the monument sent by the pope.

The matter that caused the most concern and eventually the cessation of U.S. diplomatic representation at the Vatican revolved around the institution of Protestant services conducted for American citizens within the Vatican. Such worship apparently seemed to the papacy inconsistent with the idea of Rome as the center of the one, true, universal Church. To enable the American chapel, set up outside the legation, to continue their Protestant services, the American minister in 1866 placed the arms of the American legation over the building used as a chapel. The American minister insisted that this arrangement was satisfactory to the papal authorities. Nevertheless, as a result of this difficulty, which had been greatly exaggerated, Congress refused to appropriate money for continuance of the U.S. representative at the Vatican. Thus the mission ceased to exist without ever having been formally discontinued. No formal message of explanation was ever sent to the Vatican.

SEE ALSO AMERICAN CIVIL WAR, PAPAL STANCE TOWARDS; ANTI-CATHOLICISM (UNITED STATES); BALTIMORE, COUNCILS OF; EDUCATION, CATHOLIC (K THROUGH 12) IN THE UNITED STATES; FREEDOM OF RELIGION (IN U.S. CONSTITUTION); LATTER-DAY SAINTS, CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF; TRUSTEEISM; UNITED STATES RELATIONS WITH THE PAPACY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ray Allen Billington, The Protestant Crusade, 1800–1860: A Study of the Origins of American Nativism (Chicago 1964 [1938]).

Sarah Barringer Gordon, The Mormon Question: Polygamy and Constitutional Conflict in Nineteenth Century America (Chapel Hill, N.C. 2002).

Philip Hamburger, Separation of Church and State (Cambridge, Mass. 2002). A modern classic reviewing the entire history of American church-state relations; particularly strong on the nineteenth century.

John J. McGrath, "Canon Law and American Church Law: A Comparative Study," Jurist 18 (1958): 260–278.

Anson P. Stokes, Church and State in the United States, 3 vols. (New York 1950).

Joseph Polking
Assistant to Staff Editor for Canon and Civil Law, New Catholic Encyclopedia
The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.

Howard Bromberg
Professor, Law School
University of Michigan, Ann Arbor (2010)

IV. SEARCH FOR SOLUTION (1900–2001)

The First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution provides, in part, that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." These sixteen words were rarely commented upon from 1791 through the end of World War II (1939–1945). Since the late 1940s, and especially since 1970, the Supreme Court of the United States has expended an extraordinary amount of time attempting to ascertain the meaning of these words. The more the Court has attempted to explicate the Constitution's meaning, the more elusive the guarantee of religious liberty has become.

As interpreted by the U.S. Supreme Court before the Civil War (1861–1865), the First Amendment's guarantee of religious liberty applied to action by the federal government, but not to action by state governments (Barron v. Baltimore, 7 Peters 243 [1833]).

The Fourteenth Amendment. The Fourteenth Amendment was one of three constitutional amendments adopted in the wake of the Civil War. The Fourteenth Amendment states, in part, that "no state shall ... deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." Although the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified in 1868, its relation to the protection of religious liberty was rarely explored during the remainder of the nineteenth century.

In 1875 President Ulysses S. Grant (1822–1885) delivered a speech to the Army of Tennessee in which he objected to any governmental support of sectarian schools and urged his listeners to "keep the church and state forever separate."

Later that year, Grant urged the passage of a constitutional amendment requiring states to establish free public schools and forbidding states to use any school funds for the direct or indirect benefit of any religiously affiliated school. Grant's proposal was modified shortly thereafter and came to be called the BLAINE AMENDMENT, after James G. Blaine (1830–1893), a Republican congressman hoping to win the 1876 presidential nomination. Although the Blaine amendment was overwhelmingly adopted by the House of Representatives in 1876, a similar proposal failed to pass the Senate by the required two-thirds vote. From 1875 to 1907, the proposed amendment was introduced before Congress more than twenty times, but it never received more support than it did in 1876. However, Congress required all states entering the Union after 1876 to include a provision in the state's constitution mandating the creation of a nonsectarian public school system.

At the beginning of the twentieth century, the First Amendment guarantee of religious liberty was rarely invoked against actions of the federal government, and the guarantees of the Fourteenth Amendment, which protected individuals from some actions of the state governments, had not been used in a religious liberty case. In 1917, when the United States entered World War I (1914–1918), Congress enacted a selective-service law that included some exemptions for conscientious objectors. The exemption was attacked as an unconstitutional establishment of religion, but was upheld by the Supreme Court (Arver v. United States, 245 U.S. 366 [1918]).

More than a decade later, the Supreme Court interpreted the naturalization law to require the denial of naturalization to any applicant who refused to swear an oath pledging his or her support of the U.S. government in future wars (United States v. Macintosh, 283 U.S. 605 [1931]). That the applicant refused to so swear for religious reasons did not persuade a majority of the Court. The Court later determined that Congress did not require the swearing of such an oath, and abandoned its holding in Macintosh (Girouard v. United States, 328 U.S. 61 [1946]).

In 1925 the Supreme Court decided two cases involving claims of religious liberty. In Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925), the Court held that an Oregon law that made it unlawful for parents to send their children to a private or parochial school was a violation of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Although the implications of the Pierce decision have been interpreted in a variety of ways, all commentators have agreed that the decision gives to parents the right to send their children to religious schools. The Court also upheld New York's "kosher" law against a challenge that the law violated the Fourteenth Amendment. The complainants argued that the words "kosher" and "orthodox Hebrew religious requirements" were too vague and indefinite (Hygrade Provision Company v. Sherman, 266 U.S. 497 [1925]). Five years later, the Supreme Court held constitutional a Louisiana law requiring school boards to purchase all books for schoolchildren, even those attending religiously affiliated schools (Cochran v. Louisiana State Board of Education, 281 U.S. 370 [1930]).

In 1940 the Supreme Court concluded that the free exercise guarantee of the First Amendment applied to state action through the due process guarantee of the Fourteenth Amendment (Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296 [1940]). Seven years later, the Court incorporated into the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment the First Amendment clause barring laws respecting an establishment of religion (Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1 [1947]).

Defining Religion. The Supreme Court has decided more than seventy cases on the proper relation between religion and government since the mid-twentieth century, but it has not established a constitutional definition of religion. During the nineteenth century, the Court offered a definition premised on a belief in a deity and on the distinction between a religion and a cult (Davis v. Beason, 133 U.S. 333 [1890]). As the United States became more religiously diverse in the twentieth century, this relatively narrow definition was rejected.

When Congress adopted the Selective Service and Training Act (1940), courts were required to interpret the provision granting conscientious-objector status to those opposed to war in any form by reason of religious training and belief. Divergent interpretations of that language led Congress to amend the act in 1948 by stating: "Religious training and belief in this connection means an individual's belief in a relation to a Supreme Being involving duties superior to those arising from any human relation, but does not include essentially political, sociological, or philosophical views or a merely personal moral code."

During the Vietnam War (1957–1975), the Court twice interpreted that provision. It first held that the provision should be broadly interpreted to include those whose belief system was sincere and was parallel to the belief system of those who clearly fit the exemption (United States v. Seeger, 380 U.S. 163 [1965]). Five years later, the Court held that the statutory language fit a person who denied that his or her beliefs were religious, for religion was to be given an extremely broad definition (Welsh v. United States, 398 U.S. 333 [1970]). Three members of the Court dissented from the holding, claiming that the statutory provision was interpreted well beyond any sound interpretation of religion.

In constitutional interpretation, the Court has rarely alluded to the issue of the definition of religion. In the Amish schooling case, discussed below, the Court noted the distinction between religious reasons and "philosophical and personal" reasons, and that only the former was protected by the First Amendment. In an unemployment-compensation case, the Court merely noted that the free exercise clause granted special protection to beliefs rooted in religion.

Freedom of Religious Exercise. In the 1930s and 1940s, the Supreme Court weighed the individual's claim to religious liberty against the interest of the state in a variety of contexts, many of which involved members of the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES.

Proselytizing. In the 1930s and 1940s, members of the Jehovah's Witnesses pressed a number of claims alleging violations of their constitutional rights. In several cases, the Supreme Court used various provisions of the First Amendment to strike down state statutes that limited the proselytizing efforts of the Jehovah's Witnesses. In Cantwell v. Connecticut, the Court held unconstitutional, as a violation of the free exercise clause, a criminal conviction for soliciting money for a religious cause without a permit. The majority opinion, by Justice Owen Roberts (1875–1955), followed an injunction first stated in Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145 (1879), the Mormon polygamy case: "[Free exercise] embraces two concepts—freedom to believe and freedom to act. The first is absolute, but in the nature of things, the second cannot be." The Court then cautioned that the government cannot unduly infringe the right to free exercise, even when attaining a permissible end.

In Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105 (1943), and Follett v. McCormick, 321 U.S. 573 (1944), the Supreme Court held violative of the First Amendment's free exercise clause the imposition of a license and bookseller's taxes on Jehovah's Witnesses who offered religious books and pamphlets for sale. In 1989 a badly divided Supreme Court held that a Texas law exempting from its sales tax periodicals published or distributed by a religious faith that consisted solely of religious content violated the establishment clause (Texas Monthly v. Bullock, 489 U.S. 1 [1989]). The plurality opinion of the Court limited the Murdock and Follett cases to their facts, which means those cases cannot be understood to prohibit the government from taxing the sale of religious publications. The Court also held unconstitutional a local ordinance prohibiting the door-to-door distribution of handbills (Martin v. City of Struthers, 319 U.S. 141 [1943]).

The Court did hold constitutional the conviction of Sarah Prince for violating the child-labor laws of Massachusetts, which Prince claimed violated her free exercise rights. Prince permitted her niece, for whom she was the custodian, to join her in selling Watchtower, the magazine of the Jehovah's Witnesses. The Court held that Prince's free exercise right to proselytize and sell Watchtower did not include the right to bring her niece with her while she proselytized (Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158 [1944]).

Flag Salute. A few weeks after the Cantwell decision, the Court decided the first flag-salute case (Minersville School District v. Gobitis, 310 U.S. 586 [1940]). Justice Felix Frankfurter (1882–1965), speaking for eight of the nine members of the Court, upheld the constitutionality of a Pennsylvania law that required all public school pupils to salute the flag. As Jehovah's Witnesses, the Gobitis children refused to salute the flag on religious grounds, as instructed by their parents. The challenge to the law on free exercise grounds was rejected by the Court, which concluded that the state's interest in the promotion of national unity was sufficient to justify the law. The lone dissenter was Chief Justice Harlan Fiske Stone (1872–1946), who concluded that the state's justification for the law was insufficient when balanced against the individual interest in the free exercise of religion. The Gobitis opinion was released on June 3, 1940, at a time when World War II was raging in Europe, but before the United States had entered the war. Shortly after the decision in Gobitis was released for publication, and apparently in part because of the decision, anti–Jehovah's Witness hysteria gripped the country. Elite reaction to the Gobitis opinion was largely negative.

Three years later, the Court reversed itself (West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 [1943]). The Court's opinion was written by Justice Robert H. Jackson (1892–1954), who had been appointed to the Court in 1941, after the Court issued its decision in Gobitis. Five other members of the Court joined Jackson's opinion, including several justices who had joined the majority opinion in Gobitis. Jackson's opinion is a ringing, eloquent endorsement of the centrality of individual liberty in American constitutional law: "If there is any fixed star in our constitutional constellation, it is that no official, high or petty, can prescribe what shall be orthodox in matters of politics, nationalism, religion, or other matters of opinion or force citizens to confess by word or act their faith therein." For the majority, freedom of speech could be restricted only if there was a grave and immediate danger to paramount community interests. The refusal by schoolchildren to salute the American flag did not create such a danger to the state or community.

Church-Property Disputes. In the early 1950s, the New York legislature attempted to transfer control of Saint Nicholas Cathedral in New York City from members of the Russian Orthodox Church who deferred to the authority of the patriarch in Moscow to those who saw the patriarch as a puppet of the Soviet government. The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice Stanley Reed (1884–1980), held that this legislative effort violated the church's right to self-governance (Kedroff v. St. Nicholas Cathedral, 344 U.S. 94 [1952]).

From the late 1960s until the end of the 1970s, the Supreme Court decided several other cases involving church-property disputes. Doctrinal changes by several Protestant churches in the late 1960s led to religious disputes between local and national church bodies, and within local churches themselves. Those ecclesiological disputes resulted in litigation concerning the rightful owner of the local church. After several attempts to craft a constitutional rule concerning the resolution of church-property disputes, the Supreme Court in 1979 declared constitutionally permissible the resolution of disputes based on "neutral principles of law" (Jones v. Wolf, 443 U.S. 595 [1979]). The problem with the "neutral principles" approach, as noted by Justice Lewis Powell (1907–1998), dissenting in Jones, is that this rule of law fails to account for the fact that religious organizations are organized as much by religious as legal precepts. Because the neutral principles rule bars courts from acknowledging the existence of those religious precepts, courts will award title to church property contrary to the precepts that undergird the religious organization, particularly hierarchical religious organizations.

Sunday Legislation. In the early 1960s, those who observed the SABBATH on Saturday claimed that Sunday closing laws violated their religious liberty. A Sabbatarian who closed his business on Saturday for religious reasons and on Sunday because state law demanded he do so suffered adverse economic consequences compared with someone whose business remained open on Saturdays. In 1961 the Court upheld the constitutionality of Sunday closing laws against challenges on both free exercise and establishment clause grounds (Braunfeld v. Brown, 366 U.S. 599 [1961]). The opinion of Chief Justice Earl Warren (1891–1974) conceded that the Sunday closing law indirectly operated to make the practice of religion by Sabbatarians more expensive than those whose day of rest was Sunday, but the Court concluded that the Sunday closing laws were designed primarily to achieve legitimate secular goals. An exemption for Sabbatarians might adversely affect those secular goals by granting an economic advantage to Sabbatarians over their competitors. Such an exemption could also complicate enforcement of the Sunday closing law, inject religion into decisions concerning employment, and undermine a common day of rest. The dissenters concluded that the free exercise of religion could be infringed only to prevent a grave and imminent danger of substantive evil, and the justification of a common day of rest was a mere convenience that could not outweigh the religious liberty interest of Sabbatarians. The inequities permitted by the Court in Braunfeld eased as the states began repealing their Sunday closing laws. The number of Sunday closing laws retained are few, and they are rarely enforced.

The abolition of Sunday closing laws led to a different problem. Connecticut abolished its Sunday closing law in 1977. In response, Caldor, Inc., opened its stores for business on Sunday. After abolishing its Sunday closing law, Connecticut adopted a provision barring a private employer from requiring any employee to work on the employee's Sabbath as a condition of employment. Donald Thornton was a manager with Caldor, and a Presbyterian who refused to work on Sunday, his Sabbath. He was demoted to a clerical position by Caldor, resigned, and claimed he was fired in violation of Connecticut law. The Supreme Court held that the Connecticut law violated the establishment clause, because it had the primary effect of impermissibly advancing a particular religious practice (Estate of Thornton v. Caldor, Inc., 472 U.S. 703 [1985]).

Unemployment Compensation. In 1963 the Court held that South Carolina could not exclude from its unemployment-compensation program a claimant who, for religious reasons, refused to take a job that required her to work on Saturdays, her Sabbath (Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 [1963]). The Court characterized the law as requiring the claimant to "choose between following the precepts of her religion and forfeiting benefits, on the one hand, and abandoning one of the precepts of her religion in order to accept work, on the other hand." This was impermissible, because the law effectively penalized the exercise of her religious beliefs. The Court held that the state could infringe the religious liberty of the claimant, Adell Sherbert, only if it had a compelling interest. The state's interest in administrative convenience and preventing fraudulent claims did not rise to the level of a compelling interest. The Court's opinion, by Justice William Brennan (1906–1997), also concluded that this case was distinguishable from Braunfeld.

A concurring opinion by Justice Potter Stewart (1915–1985) argued that the Court had painted itself into a corner, for its interpretation of the free exercise clause in Sherbert was directly in conflict with its interpretation of the establishment clause. Justice Stewart claimed that the Court's interpretation of the establishment clause required South Carolina to deny Adell Sherbert unemployment benefits, and the Court's interpretation of the free exercise clause required South Carolina to grant Sherbert unemployment benefits. Justice Stewart concluded that the Court's mechanistic interpretation of the establishment clause was unsound as a matter of history and wrong as a matter of constitutional interpretation.

In three subsequent unemployment-compensation cases decided in the 1980s, the Supreme Court extended the holding of Sherbert v. Verner. The Court first held that the state could not deny unemployment-compensation benefits to a Jehovah's Witness who left his job at a munitions factory based on his religious objections to war. That the claimant had not been fired but had left his job voluntarily made no constitutional difference to the Court (Thomas v. Review Board, 450 U.S. 707 [1981]). The Court then held impermissible the decision to refuse unemployment compensation to a claimant who was fired because, after working for his employer for two years, he became a Seventh-Day Adventist and then refused to work on Friday night or on Saturday, his Sabbath (Hobbie v. Unemployment Appeals Comm'n of Florida, 480 U.S. 136 [1987]).

Finally, the Court held that unemployment benefits were improperly denied to a claimant who refused to work on Sundays because he was a Christian. The Court concluded that it did not matter that the claimant was not a member of any particular Christian church or organization. The issue was whether the claimant's refusal to work was based on a sincerely held religious belief (Frazee v. Illinois Department of Employment Sec., 489 U.S. 829 [1989]).

The extent to which the unemployment compensation cases stated a general rule of constitutional law was placed in great doubt after the Court's decision in Employment Division v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990), discussed below.

The Amish and Compulsory Schooling. The State of Wisconsin made it a criminal offense for parents to violate the state's compulsory school-attendance law mandating that children attend school until age sixteen. Amish parents, pursuant to their religious beliefs, removed their children from school after they completed the eighth grade. The Supreme Court, with only Justice William O. Douglas (1898–1980) dissenting in part, held that the Wisconsin law violated the free exercise rights of Amish parents (Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205 [1972]). The Court, following the doctrine stated in Sherbert v. Verner, held that the right to free exercise could be infringed only upon a showing by the state that the justification for its action was compelling. The Court noted that the Amish were "productive and very law-abiding members of society," and that the Amish alternative to formal schooling, vocational training, had enabled them to survive as a highly self-sufficient community in the United States for more than two hundred years.

The Court decided that the state's interest in educating Amish schoolchildren was not compelling, but merely "highly speculative." That the state's compulsory school-attendance law was neutral on its face, for it was not directed at the Amish or any other religious group, did not make the law constitutional, because the law clearly created an undue burden on the religious practices of the Amish. Justice Douglas dissented on the ground that the Court failed to account for the interests of the children themselves, who might disagree with their parents and opt to attend high school.

Native Americans and Free Exercise. Unlike the Jehovah's Witnesses in the 1940s, Native American religious practices have not fared well before the Supreme Court. In 1986 the Court held that the assignment of a Social Security Number to a Native American child by the Social Security Administration did not violate the free exercise rights of the child or her parents (Bowen v. Roy, 476 U.S. 693 [1986]).

Two years later, the Supreme Court held that the free exercise clause did not bar the government from permitting the harvesting of timber or the construction of a road on federal land, even though part of that land had traditionally been used by three Native American tribes for religious worship. The majority concluded that, because the federal government's decision did not burden the religious exercise by the complaining tribes, it did not have to address whether the government's interest in harvesting the timber and building the road constituted a compelling governmental interest (Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Association, 485 U.S. 439 [1988]). Shortly thereafter, the Supreme Court drastically altered its free exercise jurisprudence in another case concerning Native American religious exercise, Employment Division v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990).

Retrenchment. The continuing validity of the standards set forth in Sherbert and Yoder was called into doubt by the Supreme Court's decision in Employment Division v. Smith. Before Smith, the standard for determining a violation of the free exercise clause was to determine (1) whether the governmental action burdened the exercise of religion, and if so, (2) whether the government's reason for burdening the exercise of religion was justified by a compelling governmental interest. In Smith, the Court rejected that test, concluding that if the law was a neutral and generally applicable law, it did not offend the free exercise clause of the First Amendment, even if application of that law might burden an individual's exercise of religion.

In Smith, the issue was the constitutionality of Oregon's criminal law prohibiting the possession or use of peyote when applied to a Native American who used peyote, a hallucinogenic drug, in religious worship. Because the criminal law was a valid and neutral law generally applicable to anyone who possessed or used peyote, the incidental effect of the law's application to someone using peyote for religious reasons did not mandate a constitutional exemption from the law. The majority, in an opinion by Justice Antonin Scalia, distinguished Sherbert and Yoder. Sherbert was limited to a peculiar constitutional rule concerning unemployment compensation, and Yoder was reinterpreted to mean that a neutral and valid generally applicable law was unconstitutional only if it violated both the free exercise clause and some other constitutional right. The Court called Yoder-type cases "hybrid" cases, and concluded that the issue in Smith was not such a case.

The academic reaction to Smith was widespread and largely negative. In 1993, three years after the decision was issued, Congress adopted the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA), which attempted by statute to restore the test enunciated in Sherbert and Yoder. In 1997 the Supreme Court held RFRA unconstitutional, as a violation of section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment (City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507 [1997]). In reaction, Congress enacted the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act in 2000. This act provides numerous protections to religious owners of property in such areas as zoning and land use, although Congress tried to do so to comport with the establishment clause. Several states have adopted "mini-RFRAs," which protect religious liberty as a matter of state law. The constitutionality of those "mini-RFRAs" has not been tested in most states.

The Relation of Free Exercise and Free Speech. The exercise of religion often involves speech. The Supreme Court wrestled with the relation of the free exercise, free speech, and establishment clauses in several cases during the 1980s and 1990s.

The University of Missouri at Kansas City allowed registered student groups to use generally available facilities for meetings. In the late 1970s, the university refused to allow a registered religious group named Cornerstone to use its facilities after the Board of Curators prohibited the use of university property for religious worship or religious teaching. The Court held that barring a registered student group from using a generally available facility because the group was religious constituted impermissible discrimination on the basis of the content of the group's speech (i.e., that its speech was religious in nature). Further, the university's "equal access" policy, granting to registered groups the right to use open rooms, did not raise establishment clause concerns, because the university did not place its imprimatur of approval on the religious activities of Cornerstone, nor did it attempt to advance religion by creating an open forum (Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 263 (1981]).

Shortly after Widmar, Congress adopted the Equal Access Act (1984), which prohibited high schools from refusing access to religious and philosophical groups if the school granted access to other noncurricular groups. The Court held the Equal Access Act constitutional in Board of Education v. Mergens, 496 U.S. 296 (1990). In 1993 the Supreme Court held that a school district violated the free speech clause of the First Amendment by denying a church access to school premises to show a film after school hours solely because the film dealt with a subject from a religious standpoint. The Court held that allowing the church access to school premises would not have amounted to an establishment of religion (Lamb's Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School District, 508 U.S. 384 [1993]).

In Good News Club v. Milford Central School, 533 U.S. 98 (2001), a closely divided Supreme Court held that the refusal of a public school district to permit a religious organization to use its facilities after school hours because the organization was teaching moral lessons from a Christian perspective through live storytelling and prayer constituted viewpoint discrimination in violation of the free speech clause. The Court considered apposite the decision in Lamb's Chapel, because the only difference between the two cases was the inconsequential distinction that in the former case, religious and moral lessons were taught through films; in the latter case, those lessons were taught through storytelling and prayers.

The Court returned to the issue of the relation of religion and speech in two cases in 1995. In Capitol Square Review & Advisory Board v. Pinette, 515 U.S. 753 (1995), the issue concerned the constitutionality of the government's refusal to allow the unattended display of a cross in a public forum. A closely divided Court held that private religious speech was fully protected by the free speech clause of the First Amendment. The board's refusal to allow the display of the cross was unconstitutional. The dissenters argued that the establishment clause should be interpreted to create a strong presumption against the installation of unattended religious symbols on public property.

In the second case, Rosenberger v. Rectors and Visitors of the University of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819 (1995), the University of Virginia refused to pay for the printing costs of a newspaper printed by a recognized student organization because the paper "primarily promotes or manifests a particular belie[f] in or about a deity or an ultimate reality." This, the university claimed, violated the establishment clause. The divided Court held that, because the university's decision discriminated against the student organization on the basis of the organization's viewpoint (e.g., that there is a God), the university violated the free speech clause. Paying for the printing costs of the paper did not violate the establishment clause because the university's reimbursement scheme was neutral toward religion, neither advancing nor inhibiting religion by its action in paying for the printing costs of a paper distributed by a student organization recognized by the university. The dissenters claimed that the establishment clause required some justification beyond "evenhandedness." Direct funding of sectarian activities was inconsistent with the establishment clause, even if the funding was undertaken as a matter of evenhandedness.

The Supreme Court remains closely divided on the interpretation of the free exercise clause, and on the application of the free speech clause to religious speech. It appears unlikely that this division will heal any time soon.

Religious Establishment. Since the Supreme Court first applied the establishment clause in 1947 to state as well as federal action, it has regularly attempted to mark the proper boundary between religion and government interaction. As discussed more fully below, the Court has rarely reached consensus about the proper interpretation of the establishment clause. This has meant a bewildering array of cases and "tests" about the establishment clause. Those who read the Court's establishment clause decisions often leave befuddled and frustrated, for the members of the Court begin with widely differing premises, which often lead the justices to diametrically opposed positions.

The more the Supreme Court has decided establishment clause cases, the wider the circle of types of cases it has decided. Since the mid-twentieth century, however, the Court has focused on the interaction between government and religion in the field of education, both public education and religious education. Those parents who send their children to public schools are often of many different faiths, or of no religious faith. From 1947 to the present, the Supreme Court has issued a number of rulings attempting to demarcate the constitutional boundaries imposed on public school officials when claims of religious establishment are raised. For those parents who send their children to religious schools, the recurring question is the extent to which the state may pay, either directly or indirectly, for any costs attributable to that religious education. The result, after more than sixty years of effort, is a muddle. The Supreme Court, as discussed below, has offered a number of different "tests" concerning the meaning of religious establishments, and the current state of the law is largely a mess.

Public Transportation. The first modern case decided by the Supreme Court was Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1 (1947). A New Jersey township school board, acting pursuant to state law, reimbursed parents for the cost of sending their children to local parochial schools on municipal buses. A severely divided Court held that, though the actions of the school board were subject to the constraints of the establishment clause, the reimbursement scheme did not violate that clause.

Both the majority in Everson, in an opinion by Justice Hugo Black (1886–1971), and the dissent, in an opinion by Justice Wiley Rutledge (1894–1949), agreed that the clause against an establishment of religion was intended to erect "a wall of separation between Church and State." The unanimous adoption of Thomas Jefferson's "separationist" standard (which he crafted while president in a January 1, 1802, letter to the Danbury Baptist Association) masked the marked disagreement about the application of the "wall of separation" to the township's reimbursement scheme. The five-man majority concluded that spending tax monies to pay for the transportation of schoolchildren to parochial schools was part of a general program helping all children make their way to school. For the majority, these services were "indisputably marked off from the religious function" of the schools. Consequently, the government was not supporting the religious schools, but merely helping parents get their children, regardless of their religion, to school. The four dissenters concluded that paying the transportation costs to and from parochial school aided those parents and children "in a substantial way" in obtaining religious training, which they concluded was barred by the establishment clause.

The central difficulty with Everson was the implicit conflict between the claim that "absolute" separation was required between church and state, and the conclusion that the public transportation of schoolchildren was a permissible welfare measure. The effort by the majority to avoid this conflict by focusing on the fact that the benefit was not to the parochial school, but to the child attending the parochial school (the "child benefit" theory), merely removed the conflict one step. Arguably, the parochial school was the ultimate beneficiary, even though the money was given to the parents of the schoolchildren rather than to the school itself. Justice Rutledge made this very argument in dissent in Everson, claiming that "it cannot be said that the cost of transportation is no part of the cost of education or of the religious instruction given." Consequently, concluded the dissent, the reimbursement scheme violated the required separation of church and state. The five-to-four division in Everson was a harbinger of what was to come.

Released Time. One year after Everson, the Court held unconstitutional a released-time program in the Champaign, Illinois, school district (Illinois ex rel. McCollum v. Board of Education, 333 U.S. 203 [1948]). Students in this public school district were given religious instruction for thirty to forty-five minutes per week in their schools if their parents requested such instruction. Those who were not given religious instruction left their classrooms for secular instruction elsewhere. Again speaking for the Court, Justice Black held the program unconstitutional. Justice Black concluded that the public school system could not be used to aid religion. The only dissenter, Justice Stanley Reed, concluded that, based on custom and particular historical practices (e.g., military chaplains, prayer in public schools), this aid to religion was consistent with the principle of religious liberty. Justice Reed also criticized the Court's reliance on the "wall of separation of church and state" metaphor, claiming that, "a rule of law should not be drawn from a figure of speech."

Four years later, the Court softened its position on released time, holding constitutional a New York City program in which public school children were released from their schools to attend religious instruction off school property during the school day (Zorach v. Clauson, 343 U.S. 306 [1952]). Justice Douglas's majority opinion included the statement, "We are a religious people whose institutions presuppose a Supreme Being," and held that the principle of separation was modified by the principle of neutrality toward religion. Otherwise, the principle of separation led to hostility between religion and the state. Justice Black dissented, finding no difference between the Illinois and New York programs.

The Court, with the exception of the two church-property cases discussed above, then remained silent concerning religion for nearly a decade. After holding Sunday closing laws constitutional against both free exercise and establishment clause challenges, the Court held impermissible a Maryland constitutional requirement that public officials declare a belief in God, on the ground that the provision was a religious test for office (Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488 [1961]). Within two years, the Court created a firestorm with its decisions in two public school-prayer cases.

State Prescribed Prayer. New York regents recommended that public schoolchildren recite the following prayer at the beginning of the school day: "Almighty God, we acknowledge our dependence upon Thee, and we beg thy blessings upon us, our parents, our teachers, and our country." For the Court, Justice Black held that the recommended prayer violated the establishment clause because it was composed by state officials and was designed to advance religious beliefs (Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421 [1962]). The next year, the Court held unconstitutional an officially sponsored reading of the Bible and the recitation of the LORD'S PRAYER at the beginning of the public school day (Abington School District v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203 [1963]). Although both decisions relied heavily on Jefferson's "wall of separation" metaphor as the touchstone for understanding the meaning of the establishment clause, the Court suggested a more particularized approach to determining the constitutionality of government actions that were challenged pursuant to that clause. In his opinion for the Court in Schempp, Justice Tom Clark (1899–1977) held that the government's action must have (1) a secular purpose and (2) a primary effect that neither advanced nor inhibited religion.

The Court's decisions were largely unpopular with the public and with Congress. A number of unsuccessful efforts to overturn the school-prayer decisions by constitutional amendment have been initiated by members of Congress since 1963. The public clamor for reversal of school-prayer decisions subsided over time, which may be attributed in part to grudging acceptance of the decision and to the fact that public school officials in some areas of the United States refused to acknowledge the decisions, and continued to condone the saying of prayers in school.

The Supreme Court did not return to the issue of prayers in public schools for nearly two decades. In 1980 the Court held that the posting of the Ten Commandments in public school classrooms violated the establishment clause because there existed no secular purpose in doing so (Stone v. Graham, 449 U.S. 39 [1980]). Five years later, the Supreme Court held unconstitutional an Alabama law authorizing a moment of silence "for meditation and voluntary prayer" at the beginning of the public school day. The Court noted that the sole purpose for the law was the nonsecular purpose of returning voluntary prayer to the public school (Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 [1985]). Five members of the Court concluded that some moment-of-silence laws were constitutional, although they disagreed about the constitutionality of Alabama's law.

A number of states have since adopted moment-of-silence statutes that meet the secular-purpose standard. In 1992 the Court barred invocation and benediction prayers at public school graduation ceremonies if they were part of the official school graduation ceremony (Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577 [1992]). The majority opinion in Lee was written by Justice Anthony Kennedy. Justice Kennedy's opinion suggested that because the graduation prayers bore the imprint of the government, and because students in effect were obliged to attend graduation, the saying of those prayers required students to participate in a religious exercise, which the establishment clause forbids.

The emphasis by the Court on the official nature of the prayers led some student groups to attempt to eliminate any official sanction for an invocation and a benediction by placing the authority to include prayers at graduation with the graduating class rather than school officials. The Court appeared to respond in part to this effort in Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe, 530 U.S. 290 (2000), in which it held unconstitutional a public school district policy concerning student-led prayers given before high school football games. The Court's opinion, written by Justice Kennedy, concluded that though nothing in the Constitution forbade a public school student from praying voluntarily before, during, or after school, if the government affirmatively sponsors the practice of prayer, it violates the establishment clause.

Evolution and Public Schools. In 1925 John Scopes (1900–1970) was convicted for teaching the theory of evolution in a Tennessee public school, contrary to state law, although it was almost certain that Scopes did not teach evolution. The trial was a circus, taking place over eight days, but culminating in a mere one hour of testimony. The conviction was reversed based on a legal fiction, but the "lesson" of the trial, according to the press, was that the forces of progress (secular modernism) had routed the forces of superstition (religious fundamentalism). Although the trial ended most efforts in the states to adopt antievolution laws, textbook publishers began reducing or even eliminating references to evolution in biology textbooks to avoid controversy.

The issue would not arise again until the 1960s. In Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968), the Supreme Court held unconstitutional Arkansas' antievolution statute, calling it a "quixotic prohibition." Those opposed to the teaching of evolution responded to Epperson by lobbying local and state boards of education to require biology textbooks to label evolution a theory and to require the teaching of creationism if evolution was taught in the public school. The State of Louisiana later passed a law barring the teaching of evolution unless the school also taught creation science. In Edwards v. Aguillard, 482 U.S. 578 (1987), the Supreme Court held that this law lacked a secular purpose, and thus violated the establishment clause.

Governmental Aid and Private and Parochial Schools. The importance of education in the modern world has been clear to governmental bodies for some time. Since World War II, both the federal and state governments have passed laws attempting to enhance learning in both public and private schools, from elementary school through graduate studies. Laws that provide money either to students who attend (or hope to attend) a religiously affiliated school, or to the school itself, have been regularly challenged since the late 1960s. The Court has been a model of inconsistency, first creating nearly insuperable barriers to governmental aid that affects religious educational institutions, and then relaxing those barriers. It has largely done so through a multipronged establishment clause test, the so-called Lemon test.

In 1971, in Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602, the Supreme Court held that state laws providing salary supplements to teachers in religious schools and reimbursing religious schools for some costs attributable to the teaching of secular subjects violated the establishment clause. The Court, in an opinion by Chief Justice Warren Burger (1907–1995), retreated from the separationist standard first enunciated in Everson, noting that the language of the religion clauses "is at best opaque," and that "the line of separation, far from being a 'wall,' is a blurred, indistinct, and variable barrier depending on all the circumstances of a particular relationship." In place of the wall of separation, the Court offered a three-pronged test of constitutionality: (1) the law must have a secular purpose; (2) the principal or primary effect of the law must neither advance nor inhibit religion; and (3) the statute must not foster an excessive entanglement by government with religion.

The first two prongs of this test were taken from Schempp, the second school-prayer case; the last prong was taken from Walz v. Tax Commission, 397 U.S. 664 (1970), which held constitutional a property-tax exemption available to religious organizations for property used for worship. Because the proper governmental oversight of the programs created an excessive entanglement between government and religion, the state laws were unconstitutional. Although the Court retreated from the separationist standard, and attempted to replace it with a standard of religious "neutrality" or religious "accommodation," the Lemon test was a severe challenge to those who believed the relation between government and religious educational institutions was too strained and hostile.

Including its decision in Everson, the Supreme Court has decided at least twenty cases concerning the constitutionality of aid that may, directly or indirectly, assist religious schools. The result is a foray into a byzantine world. The Court initially made a distinction between aid that flowed to religious institutions involved in higher education and aid to religious elementary and high schools. Because the former were not considered "pervasively sectarian," aid to religiously affiliated colleges and universities was permissible because there was little fear of excessive entanglement between religion and government (Tilton v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 672 [1971]; Hunt v. McNair, 413 U.S. 734 [1973]; Roemer v. Board of Public Works, 426 U.S. 736 [1976]). Students in religious elementary and high schools could be lent textbooks by the state (Board of Education v. Allen, 392 U.S. 236 [1968]), but not globes, maps, or audiovisual equipment (Meek v. Pittenger, 421 U.S. 349 [1975]; Wolman v. Walter, 433 U.S. 229 [1977]).

In 2000 a divided Court overruled Meek and Wolman, permitting governmental agencies to lend educational materials and equipment to private and religious schools (Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793 [2000]). Although there is some evidence that the Court has retreated on the higher education/compulsory education dichotomy, some justices continue to argue for its strict enforcement. Parents may take a tax deduction for educational expenses incurred in sending their children to school (Mueller v. Allen, 463 U.S. 388 [1983]), and a handicapped student may use state tuition funds to attend a higher religious institution (Witters v. Washington Department of Services for the Blind, 474 U.S. 481 [1986]), but parents cannot receive tuition tax credits for sending their children to religious schools (Committee for Public Education v. Nyquist, 413 U.S. 756 [1973]). The government may not pay for teachers to provide remedial education for poor children if it takes place at a religious school (Aguilar v. Felton, 473 U.S. 402 [1986]), but the government may pay for an on-premises sign-language interpreter who aids a deaf child attending a religious school (Zobrest v. Catalina Hills School District, 509 U.S. 1 [1993]).

An issue the Supreme Court had studiously avoided for a number of years is the constitutionality of a voucher system, in which the state issues an educational voucher that may be redeemed by students at either a public or private school. State and lower federal courts addressing this issue had reached contrary results. In Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639 (2002), however, the Supreme Court, in a five-to-four decision, upheld the constitutionality of educational voucher systems that can pass a five-part test demonstrating their secular purpose and nature.

Additional Approaches to Interpreting the Establishment Clause. In 1789 each house of Congress hired a chaplain to pray at the opening of the legislative day. In 1983 the Supreme Court decided a case concerning the constitutionality of the State of Nebraska's practice of opening each legislative day with a prayer by a chaplain paid by the state. The Court held that the "unique history" of the practice of hiring government-paid chaplains led it to conclude that the practice did not violate the law because the founders did not believe that the practice violated the First Amendment. The Court ignored the Lemon test in favor of this "historical practices" test, which the dissenters claimed was because application of Lemon would have resulted in a contrary result (Marsh v. Chambers, 463 U.S. 783 [1983]).

The next year, in a concurring opinion, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor suggested a revised test for the establishment clause, the "endorsement" test. This test focuses attention on whether the government's action had made adherence to religion relevant to the person's standing in the community (Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 [1984]).

In 1989 the Court's jurisprudence disintegrated. The issues before the Court were whether (1) the placement of a crèche on the grand staircase of the Allegheny County Courthouse in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and (2) the placement of a menorah next to a Christmas tree and a sign saluting liberty on public property next to Pittsburgh's City-County Building were impermissible establishments of religion. No opinion garnered a majority of the Court. Varying coalitions held that the former was unconstitutional but the latter was constitutional. The constitutional difference between the two displays was either that the crèche solely promoted a religious message while the menorah, tree, and sign promoted a secular message (the opinion of Justice Harry Blackmun [1908–1999]) or that the crèche solely promoted a religious message while the menorah, tree, and sign promoted a message of pluralism and freedom of belief during the holiday season and did not endorse Judaism or religion in general (the opinion of Justice O'Connor). Justice Brennan concluded that both displays favored religion, and the establishment clause forbade any governmental action that favored religion over nonreligion. Justice Kennedy concluded that both displays were constitutional, because the government did not coerce anyone to support or participate in any religion or its exercise (County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union, 492 U.S. 573 [1989]).

The Supreme Court has never overturned the Lemon test, although it has been the subject of repeated criticism by justices and legal commentators. The endorsement test suggested by Justice O'Connor has been incorporated by some justices into the "primary effect" prong of Lemon, and used independently of Lemon by Justice O'Connor and other justices. To determine whether some action of government is an endorsement of religion, the proper perspective is that of the reasonable observer, who is understood to be well-informed. A minority of justices consider coercion the proper test of an establishment clause violation. For those justices, the establishment clause is violated only when the government attempts to coerce an individual's religious liberty. A different minority of justices urge a return to the wall of separation, particularly in cases in which aid flows to one or more religious organizations. The former group is more "accommodationist" in its treatment of the relation of government and religion, and the latter is more "separationist" in its understanding of that relationship.

The establishment clause has become one of those fissures in American society that gave rise to the phrase "culture wars." Like much of society, the Court is badly divided about the fundamental principles that guide interpretation of the establishment clause. This division among the Court, which will probably continue for some time, makes clarity in this area of law extremely unlikely.

SEE ALSO EDUCATION, CATHOLIC (HIGHER) IN THE UNITED STATES; EDUCATION, CATHOLIC (K THROUGH 12) IN THE UNITED STATES; FREEDOM OF RELIGION (IN U.S. CONSTITUTION).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Sydney E. Ahlstrom, A Religious History of the American People (New Haven, Conn. 1972).

Michael S. Ariens and Robert A. Destro, Religious Liberty in a Pluralistic Society, 2nd ed. (Durham, N.C. 2002). A general overview of issues of church-state relations.

Gerard V. Bradley, Church-State Relationships in America (New York 1987).

Daniel Dreisbach, Real Threat and Mere Shadow: Religious Liberty and the First Amendment (Westchester, Ill. 1987).

Martin E. Marty, Pilgrims in Their Own Land: 500 Years of Religion in America (Boston 1984).

John T. Noonan Jr., The Believer and the Powers that Are: Cases, History, and Other Data Bearing on the Relation of Religion and Government (New York 1987).

Steven D. Smith, Foreordained Failure: The Quest for a Constitutional Principle of Religious Freedom (New York 1995). A critical study of the Supreme Court's efforts in this doctrinal area.

Anson P. Stokes, Church and State in the United States, 3 vols. (New York 1950). The classic history of the relation between religion and government.

Michael Ariens
Professor of Law
St. Mary's University of San Antonio, San Antonio, Texas

Howard Bromberg
Professor, Law School
University of Michigan, Ann Arbor (2010)

V. NEW CONTROVERSIES (2001–2009)

The first decade of the twenty-first century did not achieve clarity in the thorny questions of church-state relations in the U.S. legal system. Supreme Court cases in this decade reflected both an ideological split in the Court and a tenuous attempt to harmonize the often conflicting free exercise and establishment clauses cases of the late twentieth century. As new social questions inflamed American society, legislatures and courts expressed reluctance to allow moral considerations rooted in religious tradition to play a role, fearing the imposition of denominational views onto a secularized polity. Nevertheless, the Catholic Church, enlivened by the pastoral leadership of Pope JOHN PAUL II, proposed firm answers to questions of church-state relations and public MORALITY.

Supreme Court Church-State Cases. Several Supreme Court cases, in decisions that were often decided by the slimmest majority of five justices to four, seemed to question the possibility both of the constitutionality of morals legislation and the presence of the church in public life. For example, in the case of Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003), the U.S. Supreme Court invalidated a Texas law that proscribed sodomy. The Court rejected the notion that the state could regulate private sexual conduct, an essentially libertarian view that threatened the existence of hundreds of years of morals legislation. Other decisions seemed to reflect a hostility to religion in public life. In Elk Grove Unified School District v. Newdow, 542 U.S. 1 (2004), the Court failed to take advantage of an opportunity to examine the substance of a decision of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals finding recitation of the Pledge of Allegiance in schools unconstitutional for its mention of "God."

The seemingly contradictory elements of the Court's jurisprudence were demonstrated in two religious display cases, Van Orden v. Perry, 545 U.S. 677 (2005), and McCreary County v. ACLU of Kentucky, 545 U.S. 844 (2005), in which the Court reached seemingly opposite conclusions regarding the permissibility of displaying the Ten Commandments on government property. In Locke v. Davey, 540 U.S. 712 (2004), the Court permitted the exclusion of college theology majors from receiving state scholarships open to all other students. In Cutter v. Wilkinson, 544 U.S. 709 (2005), the Court upheld certain portions of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000.

New Social Questions. Both technology and changing norms raised new social questions in twenty-first-century America. From the perspective of the legal system, there seemed little confidence in the ability to discover a fundamental moral basis that could shed light on these questions. With the rapid growth of new technologies for in vitro fertilization, surrogate motherhood, embryo stem-cell research, and human reproduction, the reaction of the U.S. Congress and state legislatures was often seemingly no reaction at all. Adopting the position that these were purely private matters, the legal system left this new world of reproductive technology virtually unregulated, even though these technologies raised fundamental questions of human life. Many Americans took the position that for the law to take a position on these issues was to impose a religious set of values on others and break down the wall between church and state.

In the name of promoting the autonomy of the individual, state courts in California, Connecticut, Iowa, Massachusetts, and New Jersey struck down laws defining marriage as a union of a man and a woman, commanding their states to legalize same-sex marriage. These high state courts found offensive the traditional role of religion and public morality in defining marriage. The courts determined that marriage was a purely secular institution; the state created and had exclusive control over marriage. This modern jurisprudence rejected the traditional notion that the marriage of a man and a woman was an independent reality, which both the state and church had a role in regulating, but which neither state nor church could dominate. For example, the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court in the case of Goodridge v. Dept. of Public Health, 798 N.E. 2d 941 (Mass. 2003), refused for "historical, cultural, religious, or other reasons [to] permit the state to impose limits on personal beliefs concerning whom a person should marry."

The Catholic Response. The Catholic Church responded to what it deemed to be confusion over the proper role of religion and morality in the legal system in various ways. Two important documents can be noted here. On November 24, 2002, the Vatican Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith promulgated a Doctrinal Note on Some Questions Regarding the Participation of Catholics in Political Life. Perhaps motivated by the stream of controversies concerning American politicians who spoke of a divide between their private religious beliefs and their public obligations, the Doctrinal Note is a clarion call for reconnecting politics and morality. Significantly, the note begins with the faithful example of St. Thomas MORE, lord chancellor and MARTYR of Tudor England, who had recently been proclaimed patron of statesmen and politicians by Pope John Paul II. The note decries a RELATIVISM that refuses a role for the principles of the natural moral law in modern democracies. While celebrating the legitimate freedom of Catholic citizens in political questions, the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith identifies several contemporary social questions that demand the adherence of Christians to fundamental ethical demands. These questions include ABORTION, EUTHANASIA, and embryonic research, where the law must protect the basic right of life from birth to natural death; the right of religious freedom; the desire to make peace over war; the scourge of drug abuse and PROSTITUTION, which can be a form of enslaving the young; and the necessity for legal protection for the family based in marriage, as defined as a monogamous, lifelong bond between a man and a woman.

On the last point, the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith promulgated a related note on June 3, 2003, on Considerations Regarding Proposals to Give Legal Recognition to Unions between Homosexual Persons. In this document, the Congregation insisted on the obligation of the state to defend marriage as an institution essential for the common good and to reject the legalization of unions between persons of the same sex as contrary to biological and anthropological norms as determined by right reason. The Congregation therefore insisted that Catholic politicians are obligated to vote against laws recognizing same-sex unions on the same level as marriage.

Although the force of these documents was blunted by the sad controversies surrounding clerical sexual abuse of minors, the Church had spoken to present controversies with a confidence that seemed lacking in many other established institutions. In the end, the Catholic Church once more insisted that there could be no separation of church and state that relieved the individual and society of acting according to moral strictures written on the human heart.

SEE ALSO FREEDOM OF RELIGION (IN U.S. CONSTITUTION).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Doctrinal Note on Some Questions Regarding the Participation of Catholics in Political Life (November 24, 2002), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/congregations/cfaith/documents/rc_con_cfaith_doc_20021124_politica_en.html (accessed December 16, 2009).

Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Considerations Regarding Proposals to Give Legal Recognition to Unions between Homosexual Persons (June 3, 2003), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/congregations/cfaith/documents/rc_con_cfaith_doc_20030731_homosexual-unions_en.html (accessed December 16, 2009).

Noah Feldman, Divided by God: America's Church-State Problem—and What We Should Do about It (New York 2005).

Robert George and Jean Elshtain, eds., The Meaning of Marriage: Family, State, Market, and Morals (Dallas, Tex. 2006). Offers a range of essays on modern social norms and the state from a religious perspective.

Kent Greenawalt, Religion and the Constitution, vol. 1: Free Exercise and Fairness (Princeton, N.J. 2006).

James Hitchcock, The Supreme Court and Religion in American Life, vol. 2: From "Higher Law" to "Sectarian Scruples" (Princeton, N.J. 2004).

Frank Ravitch, Masters of Illusion: The Supreme Court and the Religion Clauses (New York 2007).

U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, Faithful Citizenship: A Catholic Call to Political Responsibility (Washington, D.C. 2003), available from http://www.usccb.org/faithfulcitizenship/bishopStatement.html (accessed December 16, 2009).

Howard Bromberg
Professor, Law School
University of Michigan, Ann Arbor (2010)

CISZEK, WALTER J.

Priest and missionary, Society of Jesus (JESUITS); b. November 4, 1904, Shenandoah, Pa.; d. December 8, 1984, New York City.

Walter Ciszek was a Jesuit priest of Polish-American descent who responded to the appeal of Pope PIUS XI for missionaries to go to Communist Russia. After studies at the newly founded Russicum in Rome, he was ordained in 1937 in the Byzantine Rite and sent the following year to the Jesuit mission in Albertyn in eastern Poland. With the outbreak of war in 1939 and the occupation of eastern Poland by the Soviet Union, he saw an opportunity to enter Russia and begin the work for which he had been trained. He received permission from Metropolitan Andrei Sheptytsky of Lvov to join the many refugees heading east in search of work and to cross the border under an assumed name (Wladimir Lypinski). For a year he worked secretly as a priest while serving as an unskilled laborer in the logging town of Chusovoy in the Ural Mountains. In 1941, however, he was arrested on the charge of espionage on behalf of the Vatican and confined for five years in Lubyanka Prison in Moscow, mostly in solitary confinement. On the basis of a confession that he signed under severe torture in 1942, he was convicted of espionage and sentence to fifteen years of hard labor. In 1946 he was transferred to Norilsk in Siberia, some ten degrees north of the Arctic Circle, where he worked shoveling coal into freighters and later in the coal mines and ore processing plants.

During his imprisonment and then after his release in 1955 (with three years off for having successfully met his work quotas), he persevered in his priestly work of offering Mass when he could, hearing confessions, and even conducting retreats. Although restricted to the general area of Norilsk, he developed a number of underground parishes and met with tremendous response there from people long deprived of any possibility of practicing their religion. His family and the Society of Jesus presumed him dead until he was allowed to write to his sisters in the United States for the first time in 1955. When the KGB forced him to relocate a hundred miles to the south in Krasnoyarsk, he established several secret mission parishes there. When they were discovered, the KGB moved him to Abakan, where he worked for four years as an automobile mechanic, and clandestinely as a priest. In October 1963 the Soviet government exchanged him and an American student for two captured Soviet agents.

Upon his return to the United States, he worked until his death in 1984 as a spiritual director and counselor in the Bronx at the John XXIII Center sponsored by Fordham University for Eastern Christian studies. During that time he authored two books: a memoir entitled With God in Russia, which recounts many of the details of his experience and the situation in the Soviet Union at the time; and a spiritual autobiography called He Leadeth Me, which reflects on his inner struggles—both the failures and the successes—and interprets his experience in light of the Gospels and such foundational Jesuit documents as the Spiritual Exercises. He is buried in the Jesuit Cemetery in Wernersville, Pennsylvania. Mother Marija Shields, O.C.D., the superior of a Ruthenian Rite Carmelite convent that Ciszek helped to found, began to petition for his canonization in 1985, and in 1990 Bishop Michael J. Dudick of the Eparchy of Passaic, New Jersey, began the formal diocesan process seeking official recognition for his sanctity. His cause is now under the patronage of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Allentown, Pennsylvania, and he is considered a Servant of God.

According to his spiritual autobiography, the day he capitulated and signed the admission of being a spy was one of the darkest moments of his existence. But from that darkness he felt drawn to a profound conversion and committed himself thereafter "always to do the will of God" (He Leadeth Me, p. 73). His extant letters, tape-recordings of some of his lectures, and other materials are available through the Father Walter Ciszek Prayer League, located at 231 North Jardin Street in Shenandoah, Pennsylvania.

SEE ALSO COMMUNISM; DIRECTION, SPIRITUAL; RUSSIA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; SPIRITUAL EXERCISES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

John T. Catoir, Encounters with Holiness (Boston 2007).

Walter J. Ciszek, S.J., With God in Russia, with Daniel L. Flaherty, S.J. (New York 1964; reprint, San Francisco 1997).

Walter J. Ciszek, S.J., He Leadeth Me, with Daniel L. Flaherty, S.J. (New York 1973; reprint, San Francisco 1995).

Rev. Joseph W. Koterski SJ
Professor, Dept. of Philosophy
Fordham University (2010)

CLARKE, W. NORRIS

Jesuit priest, professor, writer, editor; b. June 1, 1915, New York City, N.Y.; d. June 10, 2008, Bronx, N.Y.

William Norris Clarke, S.J., entered the Society of Jesus at the novitiate of St. Andrew-on-Hudson in Poughkeepsie, New York, on August 14, 1933, after two years of study at GEORGETOWN UNIVERSITY in Washington, D.C. From 1936 to 1939 he studied PHI-LOSOPHY at the Collège St. Louis on the Isle of Jersey in the English Channel and then earned an M.A. in Philosophy at Fordham University in Bronx, New York, in 1940 under Professor Anton PEGIS. He taught for two years as a Jesuit regent at Loyola College in Baltimore, Maryland, before studying THEOLOGY at Woodstock College in Maryland and being ordained a Jesuit priest in 1945. In 1950 he completed his Ph.D. at the Université Catholique de Louvain, where he studied under the neo-Thomists Fernand VAN STEENBERGHEN and Louis DE RAEYMAEKER and wrote a dissertation on "The Principle Actus non limitatur nisi per potentiam [Act is only limited by potency]: Its Sources and Meaning in St. Thomas." After teaching at Woodstock College and at Bellarmine College in Plattsburg, New York, he joined the faculty of the philosophy department at Fordham University, where he taught from 1955 until his retirement in 1985 and occasionally thereafter as a professor emeritus when he was not serving as a visiting professor at such institutions as Santa Clara University, VILLANOVA UNIVERSITY, Xavier University, the University of San Francisco, the Immaculate Conception Seminary at Seton Hall University, the Franciscan University of Steubenville, Canisius College, John Carroll University, Wheeling Jesuit University (West Virginia), the University College Dublin, and the Ateneo de Manila in the Philippines.

With a number of his fellow JESUITS, Father Clarke founded the International Philosophical Quarterly and served as its first editor-in-chief from 1961 to 1985. Active in many scholarly associations, he was president of the Jesuit Philosophical Association of North America from 1960 to 1961, president of the Metaphysical Society of America in 1968, president of the American Catholic Philosophical Association in 1969, and president of the International St. Thomas Society from 1996 to 2008. He received the Aquinas Medal from the American Catholic Philosophical Association in 1980, the same year that he received Fordham's Outstanding Teaching Award. In 1982 he was presented with an honorary Doctor of Laws degree by Villanova University, and in 1993 Wheeling Jesuit bestowed on him an honorary Doctor of Humanities degree.

The author of over seventy articles, Father Clarke also published six books during his life: Authority and Private Judgment; The Philosophical Approach to God: A Contemporary Neo-Thomist Perspective; with Gerald A. McCool, S.J., The Universe as Journey: Conversations with W. Norris Clarke, S.J.; Person and Being; Explorations in Metaphysics: Being–God–Person; and The One and the Many: A Contemporary Thomistic Metaphysics. A posthumous collection of his essays titled The Creative Retrieval of Saint Thomas Aquinas: Essays in Thomistic Philosophy, New and Old was published by Fordham University Press in 2009.

From his earliest philosophical training under the metaphysician André Marc, S.J., on the Isle of Jersey; Father Clarke regarded himself as a Thomist. From his reading of Joseph MARÉCHAL's Le Point de départ de la métaphysique (The starting point of metaphysics), he acquired an appreciation for the innate DYNAMISM of the human INTELLECT toward the Infinite, and from Maurice BLONDEL's L'Action (Action), a sense of the complementary dynamism of the human WILL toward the GOOD. After his experience with Anton Pegis at Fordham, Clarke began to call himself an "existential Thomist" in the tradition of Etienne GILSON's Le thomisme and its emphasis on the centrality of esse as the act of existence for understanding God and all of CREATION. His own doctoral dissertation stressed the diversification of esse (being) by various modes of limiting ESSENCE. From van Steenberghen and de Raeymaeker at Louvain and from his reading in the works of such Thomists as Cornelius Fabro (1911–1995), Louis Geiger (1906–1983), and Joseph de Finance, he came to understand Thomistic METAPHYSICS as an original synthesis of ARISTOTLE and NEOPLATONISM. His seminal articles on this topic include "The Limitation of Act by Potency: Aristotelianism or Neoplatonism?" (1952) and "The Meaning of Participation in Aquinas" (1952).

Intrigued by the PERSONALISM of such thinkers as Emmanuel MOUNIER, Gabriel MARCEL, Martin BUBER, Maurice Nédoncelle (1905–1976), and John MacMurray (1891–1976), Clarke embarked on his own creative synthesis between traditional Thomism and other schools of philosophy, including interpersonal PHENOMENOLOGY and process metaphysics. His central concept for contributing to the work of what he liked to call "Thomistic personalism" has been the notion of the human person as substance-in-relation, an idea by which he offered an ontological ground for the dynamism of personal substance considered as a unifying center for its many relationships through time as well as for its self-identity. In articles such as "Interpersonal Dialogue as Key to Realism" (1975) and "The 'We Are' of Interpersonal Dialogue as the Starting Point of Metaphysics" (1992), one finds his development of the idea of interpersonal dialogue as an argument against SKEPTICISM and as a novel approach to the traditional problems of metaphysics.

Father Clarke's native openness to the novel did not preclude a critical dimension to his work. Among his more trenchant philosophical articles one finds his sober critiques of Buddhist denials of the SELF, post-modern repudiations of natural theology such as found in the work of John Caputo (1940–), and attacks on the use of metaphysics in classical statements of CHRISTIAN theology by proponents of historical consciousness such as the theologian Roger Haight.

An avuncular storyteller, Father Clarke's lectures invariably wove together lofty themes of metaphysics with intellectual autobiography under the image of "life's journey." Ever interested in new ideas and ways of seeing things differently than his own, Father Clarke contributed not only the insights achieved through efforts at the "creative retrieval" of AQUINAS by placing him in conversation with some other schools of philosophy but also the education of many minds and the spiritual care of many souls as a Jesuit priest.

SEE ALSO LOUVAIN, CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF; NEOSCHOLASTICISM AND NEOTHOMISM; PERSON (IN PHILOSOPHY); THEOLOGY, NATURAL; THOMISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

W. Norris Clarke, S.J. "The Limitation of Act by Potency: Aristotelianism or Neoplatonism?" New Scholasticism 26 (1952): 167–194.

W. Norris Clarke, S.J., "The Meaning of Participation in St. Thomas," Proceedings of The American Catholic Philosophical Association 26 (1952): 147–157.

W. Norris Clarke, S.J., Authority and Private Judgment (New York 1962).

W. Norris Clarke, S.J., "The Self as Source of Meaning in Metaphysics," Review of Metaphysics 21 (1967): 587–614.

W. Norris Clarke, S.J., The Philosophical Approach to God: A Contemporary Neo-Thomist Perspective (Winston Salem, N.C. 1979; 2nd rev. ed., Bronx, N.Y. 2007).

W. Norris Clarke, S.J., Person and Being (Milwaukee, Wisc. 1993); as Person, Being, and Ecology, with additional commentary by Rainier R.A. Ibana (1996), in Italian translation as Persona ed essere by Siobhan Nash-Marshall (1999); Czech translation as Osoba a bytí by Tomás Machula (2007).

W. Norris Clarke, S.J., Explorations in Metaphysics: Being–God–Person (Notre Dame, Ind. 1994).

W. Norris Clarke, S.J. "Conscience and the Person," Buddha (Manila) 1 (1997): 155–170.

W. Norris Clarke, S.J., "God and the Community of Existents: Whitehead and St. Thomas," International Philosophical Quarterly 40 (2000): 265–287.

W. Norris Clarke, S.J., The One and the Many: A Contemporary Thomistic Metaphysics (Notre Dame, Ind. 2001).

W. Norris Clarke, S.J., "Reflections on Caputo's Heidegger and Aquinas," in A Passion for the Impossible: John D. Caputo in Focus, edited by Mark Dooley (Albany, N.Y. 2003), 51–68.

W. Norris Clarke, S.J., The Creative Retrieval of Saint Thomas Aquinas: Essays in Thomistic Philosophy, New and Old (Bronx, N.Y. 2009).

W. Norris Clarke, S.J., and Gerald A. McCool, S.J., The Universe as Journey: Conversations with W. Norris Clarke, S.J. (Bronx, N.Y. 1988).

Gerald McCool, S.J., "An Alert and Independent Thomist: William Norris Clarke, S.J.," International Philosophical Quarterly 26 (1986): 3–21.

Rev. Joseph W. Koterski SJ
Professor, Department of Philosophy
Fordham University, New York, NY (2010)

COLD WAR AND THE PAPACY

The papacy played a key role in the opening and closing of the Cold War, as well as the collapse of the communist regimes in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. Papal opposition to communism was long-standing. During the course of the nineteenth century, a series of popes—from GREGORY XVI (1831–1846) to LEO XIII (1878–1903)—denounced this ideology as contrary to Catholic beliefs and branded it a threat to the Christian community. Following the outbreak of World War I in 1914 and the Bolshevik Revolution of 1917, Pope BENEDICT XV (1914–1922) opposed the Soviet state, which preached atheism and waged war upon organized religion in general, and the Catholic Church in particular. Catholic concerns were also revealed in 1917 in the apparitions of Fátima, Portugal, where Mary was said to have appeared and invoked prayers for the conversion of Russia. But neither prayers nor the limited intervention of the European powers, Japan, and the United States could overturn the Soviet regime, which threatened a broader revolutionary upheaval.

Eugenio Pacelli, the papal nuncio in Munich and the future Pope PIUS XII (1939–1958), had to confront communist insurgents personally during the Spartacist revolt in Bavaria in 1919. Ambrogio Achille Ratti, the future Pope PIUS XI (1922–1939), who was nuncio in Warsaw, faced the prospect of a Soviet attack upon the Polish capital in 1920. When he became pope, Pius XI lamented the anticlerical measures adopted by Moscow and tried unsuccessfully to negotiate with its revolutionary regime. At the end of 1924, the frustrated pontiff renewed his protests against the Soviet attacks upon religion, stressing the grave danger presented by communism. Pius XI hoped that divine providence would intervene and provoke the collapse of what he perceived to be a pseudo-religious faith. When this did not occur, he invoked prayers of atonement for the outrages against religion perpetrated in the Soviet Union. His opposition to these abuses was cataloged in his 1937 encyclical Divini Redemptoris (On Atheistic Communism), which condemned this movement as subversive of Christian culture. Pacelli, who served as papal secretary of state from 1930 to 1939, shared the papal concern and approved this condemnation of communism.

The Aftermath of World War II. Pope Pius XII appears behind microphones during a radio broadcast from the Vatican in November 1947. The Pope commended the American people for their efforts to save food for war-torn Europe. AP IMAGES

Pius XII's Reaction to Communism, 1939–1945. Pacelli assumed the tiara in 1939, when Europe was on the brink of another world war. Despite concordats or agreements with Mussolini's Italy in 1929 and Hitler's Germany in 1933, the harassment of the Church continued in these countries as well as in the Soviet Union. In October 1939, Pius XII issued his first encyclical letter Summi pontificatus (On the Unity of Human Society), which condemned the claims of absolute state authority and indirectly denounced the totalitarianism of the Soviet Union and Nazi Germany. While critical of both regimes, Pius apparently deemed the frontal assault by communist states upon organized religion more serious than the indirect Nazi attacks. Another important difference, from the papal perspective, was that the Nazi persecution, unlike the Bolshevik one, had not completely outlawed religion and suppressed the churches.

Pius XII, seeking to preserve a cautious neutrality, appreciated Franklin Delano Roosevelt's appointment of Myron Taylor as his personal representative to the VATICAN in December 1939. During the war, Pius was troubled by the Anglo-American alliance with Stalin to combat Nazi Germany, Fascist Italy, and later Imperial Japan. While the Allies applauded the Soviet incursion against Nazi-occupied Europe, and while Roosevelt urged the Vatican to moderate its anticommunist stance, the pope worried about the Soviet drive into Europe at war's end. He questioned the American conclusions that the Soviets were on the brink of introducing religious toleration in their territories and that the Russian dictatorship was less dangerous than the Nazi one. The Vatican complained about Stalin's continued harassment of the Catholic Church, which saw its property nationalized and its hierarchy shattered by deportations, arrests, and executions. Pius dreaded the prospect of an extension of Stalin's system, and he hoped that a stalemate between the Nazis and the Soviets would undermine both. He perceived the "unconditional surrender" policy that Churchill and Roosevelt had sanctioned during the Casablanca Conference in January 1943 as dangerous, suspecting it would prolong the conflict and ultimately benefit the Soviet Union and its communist ideology.

The Curia shared his concerns. Before his death, Cardinal Luigi Maglione, the papal secretary of state, cataloged the dangers of Russian hegemony in Europe. His apprehension was shared by Monsignor Domenico TARDINI, the undersecretary of state, who predicted the war would end with a predominant Russian victory in Europe and the spread of communism, which would be to the detriment of European civilization and Christian culture. Even if the Allied armies remained in Europe, Tardini foresaw the onset of the Cold War, and he predicted that the ensuing peace would only rest on mutual fear. Pius worried not only about the future of Germany and Italy, he also feared the consequences a Soviet victory would have for Poland, the Baltic states, the whole of Eastern Europe, and the entire war-torn continent.

Pius XII Foresees the Cold War. Both the pope and the Curia were convinced that the Soviets would exploit the devastation of World War II to impose their imperium and ideology on the territory they occupied. The Vatican's anxieties were not initially shared by the Americans, however, who believed the key Soviet effort in defeating Nazi Germany justified their prominent role in the peacemaking process and the postwar reconstruction. At this juncture the United States saw communism as an essentially internal problem rather than an international one. Immediately following the death of President Roosevelt in April 1945, the new American president, Harry S. Truman, followed Roosevelt's policy of cooperation with the Soviet Union in Europe, remaining aloof from the strident anticommunism of the Vatican. At first, therefore, Washington provided the Holy See with little moral support against communism, and the papacy was left to its own devices. This did not deter Pius from initiating a global campaign against Bolshevism and the Soviet Union, thus contributing to the opening of the Cold War.

On the other hand, Pius XII welcomed American economic aid to war-torn Western Europe, as well as their sponsorship of a new international organization to preserve the peace. Although the Vatican approved the general aims of the United Nations, as constituted at San Francisco in June 1945, the pope harbored reservations about its structure. He was especially concerned about the veto power of the Soviet Union in the Security Council. Stalin dismissed papal opposition: "The Pope! The Pope! How many divisions has he got?" the Soviet dictator repeated at the Yalta Conference of 1945, as he sought to discount the Vatican's input (Stehle 1981, p. 225). He realized that Pius nourished serious reservations about the proposed postwar settlement, and early on exposed the pretense that the Russian occupation was benign. Pius said as much in his Christmas message of 1946, wherein he lamented the compromises made at war's end by the Western Allies. The papal prediction that the Russians would impose communist regimes in Eastern Europe soon materialized.

Rome and Washington: Cold War Allies. The heavy-handed methods of the Soviets in Eastern Europe and their occupation zone in Germany had an impact on Washington, which belatedly accepted the papacy's view of the Cold War. By 1947 Truman had adopted the anticommunist stance of Pius XII, Winston Churchill, and the American diplomat George Kennan, as the United States saw the need to stop Soviet subversion in Europe and abroad. Adhering to the containment course of the United States, the pope welcomed the 1947 European Recovery Program that George C. Marshall announced at Harvard University in June 1947. The Marshall Plan was designed to reconstruct the faltering European economies and provide Soviet propaganda with less fertile ground. Pius was relieved that Washington had finally recognized the communist danger. Meanwhile, the pope also approved the early steps toward European economic and political integration, which he deemed another means of blocking the unfortunate consequences of Soviet expansion. In 1949 and 1950, Pius veered even further away from neutrality by approving the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), which was designed to thwart Moscow's diplomatic coercion and military threats. Papal support enabled Alcide de Gasperi and his Christian Democrats to overcome left-wing opposition and secure Italian ratification of the NATO treaty in April 1949, and this support also helped the Christian Democrats, under Konrad ADENAUER, to secure West Germany's adherence to NATO in 1955.

Although suspicious of partisan politics, Pius relied on the Christian Democratic parties of Belgium, France, the Netherlands, and Italy to combat communism. After members of the Italian Communist Party entered the provisional government following the liberation of Rome, he became increasingly alarmed and embroiled himself in the peninsula's affairs. He did this through Catholic Action, a consortium of organized Catholic groups under the leadership of Professor Luigi Gedda and supervised by the bishops. In March 1946 the pope alerted the Italian clergy that it was their duty to instruct the faithful to combat anti-Christian forces in politics and society, and to support the Christian Democrats in keeping the communists out of power. The Vatican policy played a major role in assuring that the Christian Democrats in Italy won 48.5 percent of the vote and over half the seats in the Chamber of Deputies.

Washington increasingly appreciated the importance of collaborating with the Vatican once it acknowledged the reality of the Cold War. As early as 1946, Myron Taylor suggested to President Truman that communism could be defeated in Italy and Western Europe with papal help. He noted that the pope had openly challenged communism from the beginning, concluding that papal leadership was central to any future campaign against communism. Churchill shared Taylor's conviction, declaring his support for the pope, who proclaimed he could not, and would not, remain silent while communist states menaced the Church and undermined the peace. The papal stance encouraged clergy around the world to second the papal condemnation. Across the Atlantic, Bishop Fulton Sheen used his television show to brand communism as the antichrist, and many American Catholics pressed Washington to join the war against communism. Their voice was heard, and an exchange of letters between the Vatican and Washington in 1947 saw the two concur in branding communism a threat to religion and Western civilization. Although Truman's attempt to reopen full diplomatic relations with the Vatican at the end of 1951 failed, the anticommunist cooperation between the two continued.

The Soviet Reaction to Catholic Opposition. Stalin resented the "alliance" between Washington and the Vatican, and he sought to discredit Pius XII as "Hitler's Pope" and an anti-Semite. He also encouraged his "allies" in Eastern Europe to commence a brutal repression against the Church and clergy. Following the communist putsch in Czechoslovakia in 1948, the communists introduced obligatory civil marriage and legislation against reading Episcopal and papal messages from Church pulpits. In response, Pius urged the Czech bishops to stand firm against the violations of Church rights. Attempts to negotiate a solution in 1949 failed, provoking retaliation under the auspices of the Cominform (Communist Information Bureau), which sought to create a Catholic Church free of papal control. Subsequently, under the prodding of Foreign Minister Andrei Vishinsky, the Soviet government proclaimed a "Karlsbad Protocol," which provided for the eventual liquidation of the traditional Catholic Church in Czechoslovakia. In turn, the Vatican excommunicated the communists and their allies.

The Vatican's relations with Tito's Yugoslavia were not much better. During the war, Archbishop Alojzije (Aloysius) STEPINAC of Zagreb had been arrested by communist partisans, who regarded him as a symbol of Croat oppression of the Serbs. Although he was released, Stepinac remained persona non grata to the communist regime. Tito requested his recall, but Pius proved unwilling to do so. In retaliation, the archbishop was put on trial in October 1946, and he was found guilty of unlawful collaboration with the "fascist" Ustasha regime and admitting forcibly converted Orthodox Serbs into the Catholic Church. The Vatican, in turn, excommunicated all who had participated in the trial, leading Tito's government to encourage the formation of professional organizations of priests that would be free from Vatican control. These organizations were condemned by the Yugoslav bishops and the pope, but the papal message was accidentally leaked, leading the Tito government to complain about the Vatican's "unwarrantable interference" in Yugoslavia's internal affairs.

To make matters worse, Pius honored Archbishop Stepinac by naming him a cardinal, and he did so on November 29, Yugoslavia's national holiday, prompting Tito's government to sever diplomatic relations with the Vatican in mid-December 1952. Similar problems developed elsewhere in communist-controlled Eastern Europe, where churches and other ecclesiastical properties were nationalized, schools were taken over by the state, religion was eliminated from the curriculum, monasteries and seminaries were slammed shut, and Catholic clergy were either arrested or deported. In Hungary, the persecution led to the condemnation of its primate, Cardinal József MINDSZENTY, in 1949. In Bulgaria, Bishop Evgenij (Eugene) BOSSILKOV, who refused to join the Orthodox Church or form a national Catholic Church without ties to the Vatican, was executed by a firing squad in 1952.

The Papal Response to Communist Persecution. In response, Pius launched a counterattack on those who sought to subvert the Faith, and he minced no words in his condemnation of communism. In 1951, the year after the Cold War contributed to the conflict in Korea, Pius deplored Peking's disruption of relations between Rome and the Chinese hierarchy, as well as its attempt to create an alternative to the traditional faith—the Chinese Catholic Patriotic Association. In 1952, he again rebuked the unjust Chinese attack upon the Church, and his apostolic letter of January 18, 1952, Cupimus imprimis, expressed papal support for the clergy and faithful of China, urging them to trust in Christ.

Earlier, in mid-July 1949, the Holy See had published a decree issued by the Congregation of the Holy Office (initially formed as the Sacred Congregation of the Universal Inquisition, and today known as the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith). It asked the following questions:

1. Was it legitimate to become a member of the Communist Party or support it?
2. Was it permissible for Catholics to publish, disseminate, or read periodicals or other literature that upheld Communist doctrine?
3. Could the faithful who professed the anti-Christian doctrine of Communism, and especially those who engaged in the activities listed above, be admitted to the Sacraments?

4. Did those faithful who professed the anti-Christian doctrine of Communism automatically fall under excommunication?

The Holy Office responded "no" to the first query, reporting it was not permissible for the faithful to join or support the Communist Party. Secondly, Catholics could not publish, disseminate, or even read books, periodicals, or other literature that upheld such a doctrine. In addition, those who violated these first two prohibitions should not be admitted to the Sacraments. Finally, the decree proclaimed that those who affirmed such doctrines and practices automatically fell under excommunication as apostates of the faith. On July 1, 1949, the decree Responsa ad dubia de communismo was promulgated in the Acta Apostolicae Sedis, providing for the excommunication of those who supported communism.

Pius XII: From Confrontation to Conciliation. In combating communism, Pius increasingly looked to the states of the West, and particularly to the United States, which he eventually found to be a willing collaborator. On January 7, 1953, in his State of the Union message, President Truman reported that the United States had developed a hydrogen bomb, which proved to be a double-edged sword for the Vatican. On the one hand, this might restrain the Russians; on the other hand, the potential for global destruction and human annihilation was exponentially increased. Pius XII, who was in the forefront of preaching against the development and use of weapons of mass destruction, worried about the devastating consequences of a third world war, and like his predecessors he preferred negotiation to confrontation. While the pope preached against the march of communism, in his Christmas message of December 24, 1954, he was not an unrepentant "cold warrior." Instead, he recognized the danger of the "coexistence of fear" that prevailed at the time. He was not only in the forefront of focusing upon the communist threat, he was also among the first to warn of the dangers posed by the prospect of nuclear war. Internationally, Pius foresaw there would be no victory from a future world conflict, but only the inconsolable weeping of the humanity that survived.

Indeed, the pope who had foreseen the opening of the Cold War also looked forward to its conclusion following the death of Stalin. To be sure, the dictator's death, in March 1953, did not immediately end the East-West tension, but it did initiate the movement from the Cold War to a "cold peace." Pius, for his part, contributed to this development by offering hints that an accord with the Soviet Union might be possible. In his Christmas message of December 1954, he called for a "coexistence in truth'" to replace the current climate of fear. In 1955, the year that Konrad Adenauer visited Moscow, Pius became more distressed by the proliferation of the nuclear arsenal in a bipolar world, and he further elaborated his call for coexistence between East and West.

At the end of 1955, the pope warned the West of the inherent danger of an indiscriminate opposition to any sort of coexistence and the prospect of nuclear holocaust. Pius thus offered the communist regimes of Eastern Europe a cease-fire in the Cold War. The signals from the Vatican were received by Moscow, which recognized that despite ideological differences there might be "useful" and perhaps even "official" relations between the Soviet Communist Party and the papacy. In December 1956, in his Christmas message, Pius revealed that though he abhorred communism, he refused to launch a Christian crusade against the Soviet regime. He also invoked European union and an acceptance of the authority of the United Nations as means of preserving the peace. At the same time, a new understanding was elaborated between the communist regime in Poland and the Catholic Church. The following year, Auxiliary Bishop Josip Lach of Zagreb was allowed to venture to Rome, and he facilitated an agreement between the Vatican and Yugoslavia that allowed their bishops to travel to Rome for the obligatory ad limina visits to the Holy See every five years. At the beginning of 1958, the Soviet foreign minister Andrei Gromyko, acknowledging the deep ideological divide between Moscow and Rome, stated that agreement was possible with the Vatican on "various questions of peace."

In March 1957, Pius XII commended and encouraged the American government for seeking peace, citing the need for collective agreements. That same year he condemned the destructive use of nuclear energy and continued to support the pacific efforts of the United Nations. Later, in May 1958, the ailing pontiff again emphasized the opposition of the Church to all wars, except those of a defensive nature. Towards the end of Pius XII's pontificate, the Vatican was slowly moving to reach some accommodation with the Soviet system, and it sought to shift from a de facto alliance with the West to a policy of nonalignment. Paradoxically, the pope who had assumed a leading role in the opening of the Cold War now joined forces with those who called for its conclusion. This process would reach fruition with his successors, beginning with John XXIII's aggiornamento, or updating of the Church, and Paul VI's Ostpolitik (Eastern Politics). The Cold War finally ended during the pontificate of the Polish pope, John Paul II.

From Cold War to Conciliation. Pope JOHN XXIII (1958–1963) was concerned with the needs of the persecuted Church in Eastern Europe, and he encouraged an opening to the Eastern bloc, particularly to Moscow. Adversaries had to talk to one another, he explained, initiating a policy of accommodation. In doing so, John distinguished between communism as an atheistic creed, with which the Church could not compromise, and communism as a social, political, and economic theory, which he deemed a reality that could not be ignored. Further abandoning the papacy's earlier anticommunist course, he revealed that the Vatican sought better relations with Moscow. Early in November 1958 he invoked a just and fraternal peace among all nations, and shortly thereafter he confided to Cardinal Stefan WYSZYNSKI and a group of Poles that he prayed for the peace and prosperity of all peoples. John sought to strengthen the local churches across Eastern Europe while avoiding philosophical debate with the communists and focusing upon pragmatic issues and specific measures, such as the appointment of bishops. He thus changed the atmosphere of Vatican-Soviet relations by moving from Pius XII's earlier containment to his own limited engagement.

Later, Pope John utilized Monsignor Agostino CASAROLI, who succeeded as secretary of state, to reach informal accords with a series of communist governments. He thus secured the liberation of incarcerated ecclesiastics in Eastern Europe and filled a number of vacant bishoprics. In 1963 he dispatched his secretary of state to Budapest and Prague to initiate conversations with their communist regimes. Cassaroli stressed the practical nature of this policy, assuring nervous conservatives that these talks did not dilute the Church's ideological opposition to communism, while also pointing to the specific successes attained. In this atmosphere, the Yugoslav government allowed the public funeral of Cardinal Stepinac. Meanwhile, the pope seemed to support the "opening to the left" in Italy, and cooperation with communist regimes, when he wrote that one had to distinguish between error and one who falls into error. He asserted that a man who has fallen into error does not cease to be a man. Likewise, John differentiated between the mistaken Marxist philosophy of the purpose of men and the world and the political and socioeconomic changes that drew inspiration from such a philosophy.

In September 1961, the Soviet premier Nikita Khrushchev paid tribute to Pope John's reasonableness, convinced that this pope was sincere and trustworthy. Relations were further improved in November 1961 following Khrushchev's telegram congratulating John on his eightieth birthday and expressing support for his efforts to solve international problems by negotiation. The pope responded warmly, thanking the Soviet leader for his greetings and promising to pray for the people of his vast state. Dividends were soon forthcoming, as the Vatican utilized the Soviet ambassador to Turkey to facilitate the participation of the bishops from Eastern Europe to the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965). Assured that the council would not condemn communism, Khrushchev allowed Russian Orthodox observers to attend. Both the failure of the council to explicitly condemn communism and the participation of bishops from Eastern Europe represented crucial developments in the Church's détente with communist states, facilitating the Vatican's Ostpolitik.

Despite John's efforts for reconciliation, the Cold War continued during the first years of his pontificate, as the superpowers remained locked over the issue of Berlin and confronted one another over Cuba. Nonetheless, relations between the Vatican and Moscow improved on the eve of the Cuban missile crisis of October 1962, which threatened to unleash a nuclear confrontation. Urged to intervene by the Americans, the pope appealed to the superpowers to answer humanity's cry for peace. His message was given front-page coverage in Pravda, representing the first signal that the Soviets were prepared to negotiate a peaceful resolution of the conflict. Following the resolution of the crisis, Moscow encouraged regular, if private, contacts with the Vatican, and Cardinal Josyf SLIPYJ, the primate of Ukranian Catholics, was released from a Soviet prison. In December 1962, John received a Christmas message from Khrushchev, thanking him for his efforts on behalf of the whole of humanity. The following year the pope received Alexis Adzhubei, the editor of Izvestia, and his wife, Rada, Khrushchev's daughter. In March 1963, John was awarded the Balzan Prize for fostering brotherhood and peace.

Pope John's conciliatory course was continued and extended by Pope Paul VI (1963–1978), who concluded a written agreement with communist Hungary in September 1964. In April 1966 he was visited by the Soviet foreign minister, Andrei Gromyko, and the following year he met with the president of the Soviet Union, Nikolai Podgorny. Meanwhile, in June 1966, an agreement was signed between the Vatican and Yugoslavia.

John Paul II, the Collapse of Communism, and the End of the Cold War. In October 1978, the fifty-eight-year-old Cardinal Karol Wojtyła, archbishop of Kraków, was elected as the first Polish pope. Wojtyla had shown political agility in negotiating with Poland's communist regime. Following the announcement of his election, church bells were rung across Poland in celebration. In the Soviet Union, however, alarm bells sounded because the new pope invoked the opening of frontiers. JOHN PAUL II named Agostino Casaroli, the architect of Paul's Ostpolitik, as secretary of state, enabling John Paul to return to his homeland in June 1979 (the first of eight trips to his native Poland). It was the first visit of a pope to Poland, the first papal trip to a communist country, and the first time a pope said Mass in a communist country. Although the visit was religious in nature, it had profound political implications, altering the mentality of fear that prevailed in Poland and much of the Soviet-controlled Eastern bloc. The pope visited Auschwitz, where his direct condemnation of Nazi abuses represented an indirect condemnation of communist crimes, thus challenging the regime on the issue of human rights.

The Vatican and the Kremlin. Pope John Paul II welcomes Soviet president Mikhail Gorbachev to the first meeting ever between a Kremlin chief and a pope at the Vatican, December 1, 1989. AP IMAGES

The papal visit apparently inspired the strike in the Gdansk shipyards in August 1980, as well as the formation of the Solidarity labor organization, which was inspired by Catholic teaching. In the summer of 1980, when the pope heard that the Russians advised the Polish state to purge Solidarity or face invasion, he cautioned President Leonid Brezhnev against the projected aggression. The papal intervention apparently contributed to the compromise between Solidarity and the Polish regime, to the annoyance of the Soviets. Some observers are also convinced that it inspired the assassination attempt on his life in May 1981, which the pope survived.

In June 1982 the pope met with President Ronald Reagan, who had also survived an assassination attempt, and discussed the Soviet domination of Eastern Europe. Richard Allen, Reagan's national security advisor, claimed the two plotted to "hasten the dissolution of the communist empire." It is now known that the CIA director, William Casey, who had been an architect of the American-Vatican cooperation on SOLIDARITY and Poland, met with various Vatican officials, including Archbishop Achille Silvestrini, the Vatican's deputy secretary of state, and Archbishop Pio LAGHI, the Vatican's apostolic delegate in Washington, who relayed the effectiveness of their operations to the Americans. John Paul returned to Poland in June 1983, and four years later, in June 1987, he helped to bring change to Poland. This was facilitated by Mikhail Gorbachev's election as general secretary of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union in 1985. Gorbachev favored glasnost or "openness" and perestroika, the restructuring of Soviet society, and he supported Warsaw's negotiations with the Catholic Church.

In the summer of 1988, Gorbachev ventured to Warsaw. He was aware that the Polish government could not rule without the cooperation of Solidarity and some level of understanding with the Catholic Church. For his part, the pope gave his approval to have Polish bishops participate in a joint committee with communist delegates to outline a new church-state relationship. In April the government promised to legalize Solidarity, called for open parliamentary elections in June 1989, and agreed to establish diplomatic relations with the Vatican. These pledges assured the victory of Solidarity in the 1989 elections, which soon led to the collapse of the communist governments in Poland, Eastern Europe, and, by 1991, in the Soviet Union. Gorbachev, the ousted Soviet leader, concluded that Pope John Paul II had played "a major political role" in crippling communism in Eastern Europe.

Clearly, Vatican support proved crucial in the early fall of 1991, when the Soviet Union recognized the independence of the Baltic republics of Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia, whose incorporation into the Soviet Union the Holy See had never recognized. Without any military divisions, John Paul II's Vatican had emerged as an important, if not crucial, factor in the collapse of communism and the end of the Cold War. Thus, the papacy not only played an important role in the opening of the Cold War during the pontificate of Pius XII, it played an equally important role in its demise during the pontificate of John Paul II.

SEE ALSO EUROPEAN UNION AND THE PAPACY; RUSSIA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; UNITED NATIONS AND THE PAPACY; UNITED STATES, RELATIONS WITH THE PAPACY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

For contemporary assessments of the Cold War, see the journal Cold War History (United Kingdom), and for the papal response to the Cold War, see Papal Pronouncements: A Guide, listed below.

Claudia Carlen, Papal Pronouncements: A Guide, 1740–1978 (Ann Arbor, Mich. 1990).

Owen Chadwick, The Christian Church in the Cold War (London 1993).

Frank J. Coppa, "Pope Pius XII and the Cold War: The Postwar Confrontation between Catholicism and Communism," in Religion and the Cold War, edited by Dianne Kirby (London 2003), 50–66.

Dennis J. Dunn, The Catholic Church and the Soviet Government, 1939–1949 (New York 1977).

John Lewis Gaddis, We Now Know: Rethinking Cold War History (Oxford, U.K. 1997).

Robert A. Graham, The Vatican and Communism in World War II: What Really Happened? (San Francisco 1996).

Peter Hebblethwaite, Pope John XXIII: Shepard of the Modern World (Garden City, N.Y. 1985).

Peter Hebblethwaite, Paul VI: The First Modern Pope (New York 1993).

Peter Kent, The Lonely Cold War of Pope Pius XII: The Roman Catholic Church and the Division of Europe, 1943–1950 (Montreal 2002).

Malachi Martin, The Keys of this Blood: The Struggle for World Dominion between Pope John Paul II, Mikhail Gorbachev, and the Capitalist West (New York 1990).

Joseph S. Nye Jr., "The Cold War," in Understanding International Conflicts: An Introduction to Theory and History, 4th ed. (New York 2003), 112–149.

Pedro Ramet, ed., Catholicism and Politics in Communist Societies (Durham, N.C. 1990).

Hansjakob Stehle, Eastern Politics of the Vatican, 1917–1979, translated by Sandra Smith (Athens, Ohio 1981).

Carolyn M. Warner, "Strategies of an Interest Group: The Catholic Church and Christian Democracy in Postwar Europe, 1944–1958," in European Christian Democracy: Historical Legacies and Comparative Perspectives, edited by Thomas Kselman and Joseph Buttigieg (Notre Dame, Ind. 2003), 138–163.

William C. Wohlforth, ed., Witnesses to the End of the Cold War (Baltimore, Md. 1996).

Frank J. Coppa
Professor of History
St. John's University, New York (2010)

COLL Y GUITART, FRANCISCO, ST.

Dominican priest, founder of the DOMINICAN SISTERS of the ANNUNCIATION; b. Gombreny (Gombrén) near Gerona (Catalonian Pyrenees), Spain, May 18, 1812; d. Barcelona, Spain, April 2, 1875; beatified April 29, 1979, by Pope JOHN PAUL II; canonized October 11, 2009, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

Francisco Coll y Guitart was the youngest of ten children of a wool carder who died when the boy was four. Even while studying at the seminary of Vic (1823–1830), Coll devoted himself to the catechesis of children. He also taught grammar to pay for his education. In 1830 Coll joined the DOMINICANS at Gerona, where he was professed and ordained to the diaconate. When the FRIARS were exclaustrated by the government in 1835, Coll continued to live as a Dominican and was secretly ordained a priest on March 28, 1836, with the consent of his superiors.

After serving as a parish priest (1836–1839), Coll preached throughout Catalonia for several decades, giving popular missions and offering spiritual direction, like his friend St. Anthony Mary CLARET, whom he aided in forming the Apostolic Fraternity of priests. Coll was renowned in Catalonia for his preaching abilities and spiritual exercises, leading popular missions during LENT and in May and October to honor the Blessed Virgin. Named director of the secular order of Dominicans in 1850, Coll reopened the former Dominican friary, cared for cholera victims during the 1854 outbreak, and founded the Dominican Sisters of the Annunciation in 1856 to provide for the religious formation of youth in poor and neglected regions.

From 1869 until his death, Coll suffered from increasing physical problems caused by a stroke, including blindness and the loss of mental acuity. Nevertheless, the Dominicans, upon returning to Spain in 1872, found that Coll had carefully maintained the order's spirit and work throughout its suppression. Coll's two main writings are La hermosa rosa (The Beautiful Rose, 1852) and La escala del cielo (The Ladder of Heaven, 1862). He died in Barcelona on April 2, 1875. Coll's mortal remains are venerated in the motherhouse of La Annunciata (Vic), which had grown to three hundred members in fifty houses by the time of his death.

At Coll's BEATIFICATION in 1979, Pope John Paul II reflected on the glory of his heritage, saying that it "takes on concrete form in a magnificent and tireless work of evangelical preaching, which culminates in the foundation of the Institute known today as that of the Dominican Sisters of La Anunciata." The pope noted that Coll strongly advocated the praying of the ROSARY—a practice that John Paul II himself followed "assiduously." The beatification ceremony was the first of John Paul's historic pontificate, in which he elevated more blesseds and saints than his modern predecessors combined. But the connections between this pontiff and Coll do not end there—both John Paul and Coll were born on May 18 and died on April 2.

In December 2008, a miracle granted through Coll's INTERCESSION was approved, clearing the way to his canonization. Coll and Rafael ARNÁIZ BARÓN were the first Spanish saints to be canonized by Pope Benedict XVI.

In his HOMILY at the canonization Mass, the pope observed that St. Francisco "eagerly dedicated himself" to the preaching of the Word of God. As a Dominican and itinerant preacher of the Word, "faithfully accomplishing his vocation" to the order, he educated and catechized the people of Catalonia through "popular missions." Coll's "evangelizing activity included great devotion to the sacrament of Reconciliation, an outstanding emphasis on the Eucharist and a constant insistence on prayer. Francisco Coll reached the hearts of others because he transmitted what he himself lived with passion, that which burned in his heart: the love of Christ, his devotion to Him."

Feast: April 2.

SEE ALSO RELIGIOUS (MEN AND WOMEN); SPAIN, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Acta Apostolicae Sedis 71 (1979) 1505–1508.

Benedict XVI, "Eucharistic Celebration for the Canonization of Five New Saints," (Homily, October 11, 2009), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/benedict_xvi/homilies/2009/documents/hf_ben-xvi_hom_20091011_canonizzazioni_en.html (accessed November 22, 2009).

Lorenzo Galmés Más, Francisco Coll y Guitart, O.P. (1812–1875) vida y obra (Barcelona 1976).

John Paul II, "Beatification of Fr. Jacques Laval, C.S.S.P. and Fr. Francis Coll, O.P.," (Homily, April 29, 1979), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/homilies/1979/documents/hf_jp-ii_hom_19790429_beat-laval-coll_en.html (accessed November 22, 2009).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "St Francisco Coll y Guitart (1812–1875)," Vatican Web site, October 11, 2009, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/2009/ns_lit_doc_20091011_coll_en.html (accessed November 22, 2009).

L'Osservatore Romano, English edition 19 (1979): 6–7.

Katherine I. Rabenstein
Senior Credentialing Specialist
American Nurses Association, Washington, D.C.

Kevin M. Clarke
Teacher of Religion
St. Joseph Academy, San Marcos, California (2010)

COMBONI, DANIELE, ST.

Missionary bishop in Africa, founder of Comboni Missionaries of the Sacred Heart and the Missionary Sisters Pie Madri della Nigrizia; b. Limone del Garda (near Lake Garda), northern Italy, March 15, 1831; d. Khartoum, Sudan, October 10, 1881; beatified March 17, 1996; canonized October 5, 2003, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

Daniele Comboni was the only one of the eight children of his farmer parents to live to adulthood. With a view to dedicating his life to evangelizing Africa, he studied languages and medicine, as well as theology, at the diocesan seminary and Verona Institute for missionary preparation before his ordination to the priesthood in 1854.

In 1857 Comboni traveled to Khartoum, Sudan, with four other priests via the Holy Land. The five labored along the White Nile, suffering deplorable shortages of food and water in an unfamiliar climate and a hostile environment that left three of the priests dead within a short time. The failed mission was aborted by the Propaganda Fide, and Comboni and his companion returned to Italy in 1859 to train more missionaries.

In 1864 Comboni conceived of a plan for the evangelization of Africa that involved "saving Africa with Africans." Europeans would establish missions along the coast and make expeditions inland to educate Africans to evangelize others. The plan included the use of female missionaries. Comboni entreated the wealthy throughout Europe in his quest to actualize his plan. In the process, he published Italy's first missionary magazine. In 1867, with papal approval, he founded the Verona Fathers because the new bishop of Verona no longer allowed the institute for missionary preparation to have its own seminarians or priests. The first group left before the end of the year to establish a mission post at Cairo.

Returning to Europe to seek funding, Comboni established the Missionary Sisters of Verona, or Pie Madri della Nigrizia, in 1872. He prepared a document describing his plan for VATICAN COUNCIL I (1869–1870), and Comboni received approval on July 18, 1870, from Pope PIUS IX. Comboni was appointed provicar apostolic in 1872. Alessandro Cardinal Franchi (1819–1878) consecrated Comboni bishop in 1877, a month after Comboni was made vicar apostolic of the Vicariate Apostolic of Central Africa, embracing Sudan, Nubia, and territories south of the great lakes. The following year, he was involved in famine relief in Khartoum. Besides traveling widely in his vicariate and establishing missions at Khartoum, El Obeid, Berber, Delen, and Malbes, Comboni sought to end the widespread slave trade and its abuses. This led to his abduction by a freemason in Paris during one of his fund-raising trips.

Comboni was also a linguist, geographer, and ethnologist, and contributed extensively to scientific journals. He compiled a dictionary of the Nubian language, and published studies on the Dinka and Bari tongues. His reports, such as Un passo al giorno sulla via della missione (1997) and Gli scritti (1991), and correspondence provide much information on the history of African civilization. Comboni succumbed to malaria during his journey from El Obeid to Khartoum in July of 1881. Nevertheless, he continued to work for several months before he died.

In April 1995, the inexplicable cure of Maria José de Oliveira Paixão of Brazil opened the way for Comboni's BEATIFICATION, and Pope John Paul II beatified him in Rome on March 17, 1996. The miraculous cure of Lubna Abdel Aziz, a Sudanese Muslim woman, through Comboni's INTERCESSION paved the way for his canonization. He was canonized at St. Peter's Basilica by Pope John Paul on October 5, 2003.

During the HOMILY, Pope John Paul emphasized the Church's mission ad gentes, or "to the nations." He praised Comboni, an "outstanding evangelizer and protector" of Africa, for his missionary work in a land "rich in human and spiritual resources" despite its tumultuous history. Invoking the saint's intercession for the continent, the pope stated that the Church today needs "evangelizers with the enthusiasm and apostolic outreach of Bishop Comboni, an apostle of Christ among the Africans. He relied on the resources of his rich personality and solid spirituality to make Christ known and loved in Africa, a continent he loved deeply."

Feast: October 10.

SEE ALSO AFRICA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; COMBONI MISSIONARIES OF THE HEART OF JESUS; MISSIONARIES OF AFRICA; NUBIA; RELIGIOUS (MEN AND WOMEN); SUDAN, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Domenico Agasso, Un profeta per l'Africa (Bologna, Italy 1981).

Arnaldo Baritussio, Cuore e missione: La spiritualità del cuore di Cristo nella vita e negli scritti di Daniele Comboni (Bologna, Italy 2000).

Oliver Branchesi, Safari for Souls: Bishop Daniel Comboni, Founder of the Sons of the Sacred Heart (Verona Fathers) and of the Missionary Sisters of Verona (Cincinnati, Ohio 1951).

Augustino Capovilla, Daniele Comboni, 6th ed. (Verona, Italy 1923).

L. Franceschini, "Il Comboni e lo schiavismo," Archivo Comboniano (1961): 27–65.

Clemente Fusero, Daniele Comboni, 3rd ed. (Bologna, Italy 1961).

Michelangelo Grancelli, Daniele Comboni e la missione dell'Africa Centrale (Verona, Italy 1923).

John Paul II, "Canonization of Three Blesseds" (Homily, October 5, 2003), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/homilies/2003/documents/hf_jp-ii_hom_20031005_canonizations_en.html (accessed November 10, 2009).

Silvia Luciani and Irma Taddia, eds., Fonti Comboniane per la storia dell'Africa Nord-orientale, 2 vols. (Bologna, Italy 1986; Cagliari, Italy 1988).

Venanzio Milani, ed., Mozambico: Un imperativo di coscienza (Bologna, Italy 1976).

Angelo Montonati, Il Nilo scorre ancora: L'avventura missionaria di Daniele Comboni (Bologna, Italy 1995).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Daniel Comboni

(1831–1881)," Vatican Web site, October 5, 2003, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_lit_doc_20031005_comboni_en.html (accessed November 13, 2009).

Rev. Januarius M. Carillo FSCJ
Professor and Missionary
Yorkville, Illinois

Katherine I. Rabenstein
Senior Credentialing Specialist
American Nurses Association, Washington, D.C.

Kevin M. Clarke
Teacher of Religion
St. Joseph Academy, San Marcos, California (2010)

COMBONI MISSIONARIES OF THE HEART OF JESUS

(MCCJ, Official Catholic Directory #0380) Popularly known as the Verona Fathers. The Comboni Missionaries of the Heart of Jesus (Missionarii Comboniani Cordis Jesu), a pontifical congregation of priests and brothers devoted exclusively to missionary work, was founded by St. Daniele COMBONI (canonized on October 5, 2003 by Pope John Paul II) in Verona, Italy, in 1867. Originally founded as a secular institute for African missions, the institute was changed in 1885 into a religious congregation under the guidance of the JESUITS. Final approval of the Holy See was given in 1910.

From its inception, the congregation gave priority to missionary work in Africa, establishing its mission in Sudan, but a revolution there in 1881 disrupted the work. In 1899, the congregation returned to Sudan to rebuild the missions and establish schools. In 1910 they expanded their work to Uganda, and later to Ethiopia and Mozambique. In Latin America the society has missions in Mexico, Brazil, and Ecuador. As of 2009, there were 2,031 missionaries (1,309 priests) located in forty-one countries in Africa, Europe, the Americas, and Asia (Catholic Almanac 2010, p. 467). Members of the society have written works on the ethnology and languages of the African tribes whom they have evangelized.

When they came to the United States in 1940, the congregation established themselves in Cincinnati, Ohio, where the provincial house is located. In 2009 they were represented in the Archdioceses of Chicago, Cincinnati, Los Angeles, and Newark. The generalate is in Rome.

SEE ALSO AFRICA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; MISSION AND EVANGELIZATION, PAPAL WRITINGS ON; MISSION AND MISSIONS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Oliver Branchesi, Safari for Souls (Cincinnati 1951).

Comboni Missionaries of the Heart of Jesus Official Web site, available from http://www.worldmission.ph/Comboni%20Family.htm

Patricia Durchholz, Defining Mission: Comboni Missionaries in North America (Lanham, Maryland 1999)

Bernard Ward, MCCJ, A Heart for Africa: The Life and Legacy of Blessed Daniel Comboni (Cincinnati, 1996).

Rev. Januarius M. Carillo FSCJ
Professor and Missionary
Yorkville, Ill.

EDS (2010)

COMENSOLI, GERTRUDE CATERINA, ST.

Baptized Caterina; known in religion as Gertrude of the Blessed Sacrament; foundress of the SACRAMENTINE SISTERS OF BERGAMO; b. Biennio, Brescia, Lombardy, Italy, January 18, 1847; d. Bergamo, Lombardy, Italy, February 18, 1903; beatified October 1, 1989, by Pope JOHN PAUL II; canonized April 26, 2009, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

Caterina Comensoli, the fifth of ten children in a poor family, learned to love and revere the Blessed Sacrament from her parents' example. When she was seven, increasingly drawn to the Eucharist, she slipped away alone to the neighboring church and secretly made her First Communion.

In 1862 Caterina joined the Sisters of Charity until she was dismissed from the convent due to a serious illness. Upon her recovery, she taught in association with the Company of Angela MERICI, while serving as a lady's companion to Countess Fé-Vitali. In 1878, on the Feast of Corpus Christi, Caterina made a perpetual vow of CHASTITY. The next year she met Francesco SPINELLI, founder of the Sisters of Perpetual Adoration of the Blessed Sacrament, who would be instrumental in her future work. Travelling to Rome with Countess Fé-Vitali, Caterina spoke with Pope LEO XIII about her desire to found a religious congregation dedicated to Eucharistic adoration. One of Caterina's concerns was the lack of time for prayer brought about by the long workdays in the newly industrialized society. The Holy Father suggested she incorporate the Christian formation of young, female workers into her congregation's mission.

In 1882, with the permission of the bishop of Bergamo, and with Fr. Spinelli as her guide, she founded the Sacramentine Sisters of Bergamo, dedicated to Christian education and adoration. The first sisters received the religious habit in 1884, and Caterina took the name Sr. Gertrude of the Blessed Sacrament. From Bergamo, where they had started, the sisters moved to Lodi, where they received episcopal approval in 1891. They returned to Bergamo the following year, expanded the congregation's ministries, and received papal approval in 1908. When financial difficulties beset the Sacramentine Sisters, Spinelli was removed from their direction by the bishop. The BEATIFICATION process for Gertrude Comensoli was opened in 1928.

Pope John Paul II remarked at her beatification that it was the "example of the poor and humble Christ, contemplated especially in the Eucharistic mystery, which guided the commitment of Gertrude Comensoli on the difficult spiritual journey and the distressing events of the foundation of the Blessed Sacrament Sisters." In his HOMILY at her canonization, Pope Benedict XVI also commented on her devotion to Eucharistic adoration: "She reminds us that 'adoration must prevail over all the other charitable works,' for it is from love for Christ who died and rose and who is really present in the Eucharistic Sacrament, that Gospel charity flows which impels us to see all human beings as our brothers and sisters."

Feast: February 18.

SEE ALSO PERPETUAL ADORATION OF THE BLESSED SACRAMENT, NUNS OF THE; RELIGIOUS (MEN AND WOMEN).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Acta Apostolicae Sedis 81 (1989): 1030.

Benedict XVI, "Holy Mass for the Canonization of Five New Saints: Arcangelo Tadini, Bernardo Tolomei, Nuno de Santa Maria Alvares Pereira, Gertrude Comensoli, and Caterina Volpicelli" (Homily, April 26, 2009), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/benedict_xvi/homilies/2009/documents/hf_ben-xvi_hom_20090426_canonizzazioni_en.html (accessed November 10, 2009).

Carlo Comensoli, Un'anima eucaristica: Madre Gertrude Comensoli (Monza 1936).

La Suora Sacramentina alla scuola della Serva di Dio Madre Gertrude Comensoli (Bergamo, Italy 1960).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Geltrude Comensoli (1847–1903)," Vatican Web site, October 15, 2009, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/2009/ns_lit_doc_20090426_comensoli_en.html (accessed November 10, 2009).

Katherine I. Rabenstein
Senior Credentialing Specialist
American Nurses Association, Washington, D.C.

Laurie Malashanko
Independent Scholar
Ann Arbor, Michigan (2010)

COMMUNION OF SAINTS

The article of the APOSTLES' CREED that in Latin reads, "Credo in ... sanctorum communionem," is translated as, "I believe in ... the communion of saints." The Christian reality underlying this article is so central and so pervasive in the life of the Church that it was lived and borne along in the movement of the Church's life long before it became the object of theological reflection. Once such reflection did begin, the very amplitude of the doctrine favored a variety of emphases, kindred enough, in evolving its many aspects; and the same cause often resulted in a treatment more piecemeal than synthetic.

The present treatment sets forth only the general outlines of the doctrine, with special aspects left to other headings. The order is the following: (1) communio as mutual interchange, (2) New Testament foundation, (3) patristic and creedal origins, and (4) later historical developments.

Communio as Mutual Interchange. Beginning in the nineteenth century, the main emphasis has been on the mutual interchange and interplay of supernatural energies and goods among all the members of the tripartite Church, triumphant in heaven, expectant in PURGATORY, and militant on earth. The stress is on what some theologians came to refer to as "horizontal" sharing by all the members in the varied common life of the Church under the headship of Christ. It is succinctly explained in Pope LEO XIII's encyclical on the Eucharist, Mirae caritatis:

> As everyone knows, the communion of saints is nothing else but a mutual sharing in help, satisfaction, prayer and other good works, a mutual communication among all the faithful, whether those who have reached heaven, or who are in the cleansing fire, or who are still pilgrims on the way in this world. For all these are come together to form one living city whose Head is Christ, and whose law is love.

Explanations in the writings of Leo's successors in the twentieth century develop along similar lines. Vatican II's Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (Lumen gentium), while looking to the Lord's coming in glory, states, "at the present time some of his disciples are pilgrims on earth," some "have died and are being purified," and still others "are in glory" contemplating God as He is. All, "in varying degrees and different ways," share in the same charity toward God and neighbor. "The union of the wayfarers with the brethren who sleep in the peace of Christ is in no way interrupted, but on the contrary, according to the constant faith of the Church, this union is reinforced by an exchange of spiritual goods." Those who have been "received into their heavenly home" and are "present to the Lord" (cf. 2 Cor 5:8) do not cease to intercede for us with the Father, sharing the merits they acquired on earth through Christ Jesus (Lumen gentium, n. 49). In this connection, PAUL VI affirmed the Church's doctrine of INDULGENCES, which is rooted in the Church's ancient belief that pastors of the Church can set individuals free from the vestiges of sin "by applying the merits of Christ and the saints" (Indulgentiarum Doctrina: Apostolic Constitution, n. 7). JOHN PAUL II followed Paul VI in stressing that the Church itself is a sanctorum communionem, which implies first of all incorporation into the Body of Christ and the sharing of his gift of charity in the entire body of the faithful (Christifidelis Laici: Post-Synodal Exhortation, n. 19). BENEDICT XVI has further reaffirmed the connection of the communion of the saints with the doctrine of indulgences, a sharing of merits whose ultimate basis is incorporation into the Eucharistic Body of Christ (Sacramentum caritatis: Post-Synodal Apostolic Exhortation, n. 21).

In explaining the creed, the Catechism of the Catholic Church follows Paul VI and John Paul II in linking the communio sanctorum to the Church, to the point of stating explicitly, "The communion of saints is the Church" (n. 946), whose "most important member is Christ, since he is the head" (n. 947). It presents the twofold meaning of communio sanctorum—sharing in holy things (sancta) and among holy persons (sancti) as complementary.

"Sancta sanctis!" ("God's holy gifts for God's holy people!") is proclaimed by the celebrant in most Eastern liturgies during the elevation of the holy gifts before the distribution of Communion. The faithful (sancti) are fed by Christ's holy body and blood (sancta) to grow in the communion of the Holy Spirit (koinonia) and to the world (n. 948).

The Catechism describes in some detail the "goods" that are shared under the headings: communion in the faith, communion of the sacraments (especially the Eucharist), communion of charisms, communion in CHARITY, and, alluding to the primitive Christian community in Jerusalem, holding all things in common (nn. 949–953).

New Testament Context. Though the emphasis is on the members' solidarity and vital interdependence, it is clearly taught that this horizontal sharing of goods and life is real only as suspended from a "vertical" communion, that is, from a sharing in Jesus Christ and in His Spirit, realized in and through FAITH and the sacraments, especially the Eucharist. If in Christ's social Body, under the quickening Spirit of love, there is a radial diffusion of love and of its goods, it is fundamentally because there is in Christ a descent of divine love poured forth into men's hearts by the Spirit of Christ, a rebirth from above communicated in water and the Spirit, a force from on high that makes Christ's glory in His various members turn to the service and benefit of all (Rom 5:5; Jn 3:5; Ti 3:5–6).

The ground is found in the divine life that the Father has communicated to the fallen world, drawing people afresh into a real, though distant, sharing in the one life that the Father and His Son in their one Spirit live together as their own (Jn 17:20–26). It is only in His Son made Man that the Father has brought men into the sphere of divine life (Jn 14:6–24; 1 Jn 2:23; 5:11–13), made them "partakers of the divine nature" (2 Pt 1:4), and given them communion with Himself and with His Son (1 Jn 1:1–3; 1 Cor 1:9). The Christian shares, through faith and the sacraments, in all the stages of Christ's life from His lowliness in suffering and death (Phil 3:10; 1 Pt 4:13) to His risen glory (1 Pt 5:1; Rom 8:17). The Christian shares initially in all the blessings of the New Covenant, brought by Jesus and already realized in Him, the dead and risen Lord (1 Cor 9:23). It is a communion with Christ most intensely realized by partaking sacramentally of the Lord's body and blood (1 Cor 10:16–17); it is a communion sealed in the gift that is the Spirit of Christ (2 Cor 13:13; Phil 2:1; Gal 4:6; Rom 8:14–17).

The common life that Christians share with Christ and with His Father in their one Spirit (Eph 2:18) leads of itself to a sharing of life among all those quickened by the same Spirit of Christ (1 Jn 1:3, 7). Among Christ's members there exists a most varied inward–outward interplay of new life; an interchange of supernatural energies and gifts, of helps and services of all forms (Phlm 17; Rom 12:13, 15:26–27; 2 Cor 8:4, 9:13; Phil 4:14–20; Gal 6:6; Heb 13:16; Acts 2:42). Sharing in the "trials" of Jesus brings into play a communion in suffering with the social Body of Christ that turns to the good of the whole (Col 1:24; 2 Cor 4:12, 15; 1:5, 7). The interchange of new life to the "building up the body of Christ" (Eph 4:12) is shown and realized in mutual prayer and almsgiving (Eph 6:18–19; Rom 15:30; 2 Cor 8:13–15). "The Church is in its truest being both a shared destiny and a shared existence with Christ, and with one another in Christ."

Patristic Period. The Apostles' Creed in its present form, conventionally labeled T (Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer [32d ed. Freiburg 1963], 30), is an expanded version of the old Roman baptismal creed, labeled R (see Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 12 for a fourth-century Latin text of R). R's development into T took place, seemingly, in southwestern Gaul during the fifth to the eighth centuries. Among the additions that T makes to R is the article sanctorum communionem.

This addition presents a difficult problem of the history and interpretation of T. First, the provenance of the clause is debated, some holding for an Eastern and Greek origin, others for a Western and Latin.

Second, the original meaning of the clause is disputed. There are two main opinions held. The first view puts a personal construction on the clause and translates it "fellowship or common life with the saints." In this personal interpretation the "saints" are either the martyrs and confessors proper, both living and departed, or all the baptized faithful without exception. The second view, sometimes called the "real" interpretation, and commonly proposed by those holding a Greek origin of the clause, translates it "a sharing in, or partaking of, holy things." The holy things or realities (hence the "real") are either the faith and sacraments in general, or, in particular, the consecrated elements of the Eucharist.

This real interpretation is not apersonal. In the thought and sensibility of the early Church, sharing in holy things, and above all in the Eucharist, meant a deeply personal meeting with the glorious Christ sanctifying His members through His mysteries present in His Church. "You have shown yourself to me face to face, O Christ," wrote St. Ambrose, "I find you in your Sacraments" (Apologia prophetae David 12.58; Patrologia Latina 14:875). Sharing in the Eucharist was also a profession and a realization of a profound personal union with all Christ's members and with the whole present company of the saints in the Church. Finally, sharing in the Eucharist had a deeply personal eschatological direction, grounding the faithful's hope in the full communion of the coming kingdom with the Father and the Lord in their one Spirit, and with all the blessed.

An exclusively linguistic approach to the problem of original meaning is inconclusive. If the original meaning is sought in the extant creedal commentaries and homilies, chiefly of a south Gallic provenance, dating from the fifth to the eighth centuries, the personal interpretation predominates, but even in the West the words were often taken as referring to the sacrament.

But one must also consider the living background of early Christian belief and practice, which came to a focus in this creedal article. Before the clause was introduced into the creed, what it stood for was long since part of the living faith of the Church.

In the thought and devotion of the early Church, the mystery of the holy Church is the sacrament of the glorious Savior, giving His light and life to the world ("What was visible in the work of our Redeemer, passed over into the Sacraments," wrote St. Leo the Great [Serm. 74.2; Patrologia Latina 54:398]). It is only through the faith and sacraments of the holy Church that one is made a sharer in Him who is "the holy one of God" (Jn 6:69); it is only under His headship that His members, once consecrated through His Spirit in the sacraments, are enabled to adore and to serve the movement of His life in and through His whole Body, with an outreach of love compassing their fellow members who have gone ahead, and looking forward in hope to the full communion of the coming great kingdom. Above all it is in the Eucharist that the glorious Lord is supremely present and active in communicating His holiness to men; it is here that the Christian shares in Christ's lordship over the newness of life, and is qualified to serve the range of that new life over the whole Body, both in those that live here below and in those that live beyond.

This awareness of sacramental communion with Christ carried with it a vivid sense of the diffusive sanctity of the whole Body of Christ sharing in the mystery of Christ. In a study of the Church's saving mediation, as the early Fathers portrayed it under the image of the Church as Mother, Karl Delahaye writes:

> The early Church considers all the saints as both subject and object of her own saving action.... The Church as mother, comprising all united to Christ in faith and Baptism, is the communion of saints. If her motherhood is grounded on her inward mysterious union with Christ, then all who have entered into this communion with Christ share in the Church's motherhood.... The communion of the saints is always at the same time a communion which saves and sanctifies. (Delahaye 1958, pp. 142–143)

If the whole Church is, to adapt a word of IGNATIUS OF ANTIOCH, a fruitful "bearer of holy things" (ἁγιοφόρα: To the Smyrnaeans, introduction), the reason is that the whole Church shares in the Spirit of Christ. As Pope MARTIN I (649–655) wrote to the Church of Carthage: "Whatever is ours, is yours, according to our undivided sharing in the Spirit" (Eph 4; Patrologia Latina 87:147).

Subsequent Developments. In the MIDDLE AGES, the two orientations lived on. In ALEXANDER OF HALES's Summa theologica, the two are merely juxtaposed (lib. 3, p. 3, inq. 2, tr. 2, q. 2, t. 1–2; tom. 4 [Quaracchi 1948] 1131, 1136). Both St. ALBERT THE GREAT and St. THOMAS AQUINAS give a more synthetic view, indicating that the real-sacramental communion is the ground of the varied horizontal sharing (for St. Albert, see In Ioannem 6.64; In 4 sent. 45.1; De sacramento Eucharistiae 1.5; 4.1–7). St. Thomas writes: "The good of Christ is communicated to all Christians ... and this communication is realized through the Sacraments of the Church, in which the power of Christ's Passion is at work" (Exp.

symb. apost., 10). But the good that Christ communicates is chiefly "the Holy Spirit, who through the unity of love communicates the blessings of Christ's members one with another" (Summa theologiae 3a, q. 82, a. 6, ad 3).

From the Reformation onward, the emphasis is strongly on the validity and the modes of the interplay of life among the members of the tripartite Church. Theologians were aware that the article "is variously explained by the doctors" (Juan de LUGO, De virtute fidei divinae 13.4.112), but generally their preference is for the personal interpretation (see Francisco SUÁREZ, De virtutibus infusis 13.4.10; Rodrigo de ARRIAGA, De fide divina 13.3.16). The catechisms, from BELLARMINE on, reflect this trend (see Ramsauer 1951). In the early nineteenth century, the two orientations begin to come together. In J.A. Möhler's phrase, "a communion in the holy and of the saints," they are seen as complementary, one to the other (Möhler 1957, p. 315).

SEE ALSO ALMS AND ALMSGIVING (IN THE CHURCH); CATECHISM OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH; CHARISM; CHRISTIFIDELES LAICI; CONFESSOR; ESCHATOLOGY (IN THEOLOGY); HEAVEN (THEOLOGY OF); MARTYR; REFORMATION, PROTESTANT (IN THE BRITISH ISLES); REFORMATION, PROTESTANT (ON THE CONTINENT); SACRAMENTAL THEOLOGY; VATICAN COUNCIL II.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Benedict XVI, Deus caritas est, On Christian Love (Encyclical, December 25, 2005), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/benedict_xvi/encyclicals/documents/hf_ben-xvi_enc_20051225_deus-caritas-est_en.html (accessed October 4, 2009).

Communio (English) 15 (Summer 1998), issue devoted to the Communion of Saints.

Karl Delahaye, Erneuerung der Seelsorgsformen aus der Sicht der frühen Patristik (Freiburg 1958).

Henri de Lubac, Christ and the Common Destiny of Man (San Francisco 1988).

Avery Dulles, The Catholicity of the Church (Oxford 1987).

A.R. George, Communion with God in the New Testament (London 1953).

L. Hertling, Communio: Chiesa e papato nell' antichità cristiana (Rome 1961).

J.N.D. Kelly, Early Christian Creeds, 3rd ed. (London 1972).

Johann P. Kirsch, The Doctrine of the Communion of Saints in the Ancient Church (St. Louis 1910).

Leo XIII, Mirae Caritatis, On the Holy Eucharist (Encyclical, May 28, 1902), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/leo_xiii/encyclicals/documents/hf_l-xiii_enc_28051902_mirae-caritatis_en.html (accessed October 5, 2009).

Albert Michel, "La Communion des Saints," Doctor Communis 9 (1956): 1–125.

Johann A. Möhler, Die Einheit in der Kirche, edited by J.R. Geiselmann (Cologne 1957).

Salvador Muñoz Iglesias, "Concepto biblico de κοινωνία," in XIII Semana Biblica Española, 1952 (Madrid 1953), 195–224.

Antonio Piolanti, Il mistero della comunione dei santi (Rome 1957).

Martin Ramsauer, "Die Kirche in den Katechismen," Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 73 (1951): 129–169, 313–346.

Joseph Ratzinger, Called to Communion: Understanding the Church Today (San Francisco 1996).

Heinrich Seesemann, Der Begriff κοινωνία im Neuen Testament (Giessen 1933).

Lionel S. Thornton, The Common Life in the Body of Christ, 3rd ed. (London 1950).

Max Thurian, The Eucharistic Memorial, 2 vols., translated by J.G. Davies (Richmond, Va. 1961).

Rev. Francis X. Lawlor SJ
Professor of Dogmatic Theology
Weston College

Dr. Keith Lemna
Researcher, Center for World Catholicism
DePaul University (2010)

COMMUNISM

The term communism designates both a socioeconomic system whose central feature is public ownership of the means of production, and a utopian political ideology centered on the promotion of a classless, stateless society. The rise of communism in the first half of the twentieth century and its decline by that century's end have arguably been among the most important political phenomena in recent world history.

Theoretical Underpinnings. The theoretical underpinnings of communism are found primarily in works of Karl MARX (1818–1883) and Friedrich ENGELS (1820–1895). The Marxist version of socialism provided a sustaining vision for many regimes that have called themselves communist, however far their actual practice departed from the original theory. Marx himself expected that revolutions of the proletariat (the working class) would be most likely to occur first in Western industrialized societies, where he saw various social and economic problems emerging as the manifestations of certain inner contradictions within capitalism. He predicted that out of bitterness at having to produce surplus value for the capitalist owners of the means of production, the proletariat would eventually arise as a class, newly conscious of its own power to effect massive social change. He held that the working class was the primary producer of wealth and that it needed to replace its exploiters, the bourgeoisie or capitalist class, in ruling the state so as to create a free society that would be without class or racial divisions.

In fact, it was in the heavily peasant societies of Russia and China that communism first flourished. From there it spread to dozens of other countries in Europe, Latin America, Asia, and Africa. Even in strongly democratic countries like the United States and Britain, there were many individuals among the elite classes who were attracted to communism, and in such countries as France and Italy there were for a time strong political parties and intellectual movements of a communist character.

In the course of raising a sustained critique of nineteenth-century capitalism, Marx articulated a vision of communism as the ultimate and inevitable future state of society. This stage of human development would bring about a universal liberation of humanity from the futility so often encountered in the struggle for basic survival. He assumed that this liberation would occur with the implementation of changes in the ownership of the means of production that would lead to greater productivity and to a superabundance of goods and services. Further, he envisioned that a change in human nature was likely to flow from living under the new system of governance and economic organization. Once the aggressive forms of greed, violence, and domination that typified virtually all previous forms of social organization were banished, he expected that people would be able to live more freely than ever before and that every member of society would be able to participate in decision-making by democratic means. Yet he devised no safeguards for individual liberty in his theory of communism, and apparently he expected the problem to take care of itself (Walicki 1995, p. 71). The most prominent of the political leaders who claimed the mantle of Marx in the course of the twentieth century—for example, Vladimir Ilyich Lenin (1870–1924) and Josef STALIN (1878–1953) in Russia, and Mao Zedong (1893–1976) in China—used Marx's ideas not for the liberation of their people but for the construction of ruthless dictatorships.

As the first leader of Russia's new Bolshevik government after the October Revolution of 1917 and during the six-year civil war (1917–1923), Lenin crafted the political principles necessary for successful agitation and the accumulation of power that became standard for all subsequent communist regimes. Inspired by the Russian revolutionary Georgi Plekhanov (1857–1918), Lenin culled from the writings of Marx and Engels certain ideas about society, labor, value, and freedom that he welded together into a revolutionary ideology. His synthesis is sufficiently different from the thought of his forbears as to be rightly called the Marxist-Leninist form of communism.

During the First World War (1914–1918) and the immediate postwar period, Lenin's main rival was Karl Kautsky (1854–1938), who persistently questioned the totalitarian inclinations of Lenin's version of communist rule and urged a socialist form of DEMOCRACY as a guarantee for basic human freedoms. On the opposite flank, Lenin had to struggle with radically leftist communists, such as Leon Trotsky (1879–1940), who championed the principle of permanent revolution through the cultivation of a chain of revolutions across the globe. Trotsky opposed what he considered to be Lenin's eclectic use of Marxist ideas and criticized his various compromises with capitalism. By contrast, Lenin urged the strategic necessity of the temporary coexistence of communism with bourgeois capitalism. Recognizing certain weaknesses within the proletarian class for successfully employing the power that he thought to be rightfully theirs, Lenin saw a need to retain various bourgeois institutions and practices during the period of transition to the pure communism that he envisioned as the ultimate goal of socialism.

Religion in Communist States. The subsequent history of communism was dominated by a struggle between those ready to countenance violence in the pursuit of their revolutionary goals (including severe coercion of internal critics of the new system) and those who preferred an evolutionary path that would more gradually realize socialist goals through a mixed economy in which private and public ownership could coexist. Both groups appropriated from MARXISM and Leninism the conviction that the chief determining factor in human society is material, not spiritual. Among those more inclined to an organic transformation of the social order, there have not only been individuals committed to ATHEISM and MATERIALISM but even a number of Christian intellectuals who have adapted some of the terminology of religion for communist purposes in such movements as LIBERATION THEOLOGY. More frequently, however, in professedly communist regimes there has been a steady repression of religion and persecution of the Church. Using the Marxist explanation that religion is the opium of the people, such regimes have cultivated dogmatic forms of state-sponsored atheism and have regularly imprisoned and killed countless thousands of believers from various religions.

Communism in Europe. One of the most important events in the history of communism was the establishment of the Third International (the Comintern) in Moscow in March 1919. Lenin saw it as a vehicle for broadly disseminating his ideas and for gaining international assistance for the Russian Revolution. The twenty-one points through which he expressed his concept of communism and his strategy for world revolution became dogmatic for membership in communist parties everywhere. After Lenin's death in 1924, Trotsky urged a change in the strategy, so as the better to foment proletarian uprisings throughout the world. By 1927, however, Stalin triumphed in the councils of the communist movement with a strategy that focused on consolidating power in those countries where the revolution had succeeded. His strategy called for giving the Communist Party a monopoly on power and for establishing a secret police with its own military system and its own concentration-camp-style prisons. His program for the collectivization of farms involved the merging of peasant families into vast agricultural enterprises under the direction of the agents of his government. Many peasants were forcibly relocated to urban centers to labor in the factories needed by the regime. Resistance to the collectivization program, however, occasioned repeated crises in agriculture and factory production that in turn brought about yet more violent measures of repression and a readiness to send dissidents into internal exile in the gulags of Siberia.

Internationally, Stalin's post–World War II regime stood for the reconstruction of Russia and for the broadening of Russia's sphere of economic influence. His infamous five-year programs called for steady work on economic development with the aim of gradually supplanting capitalism by the comparative advantages that would accrue from socialist economics. Over the years of his leadership, it became increasingly clear that the program for communist world revolution had in fact become a vehicle for Russian foreign policy aims. The Comintern was officially dissolved in 1943. Its successor, the Cominform (Communist Information Bureau), created in 1947, consisted only of the communist parties from nine European nations. This organization was in turn abandoned after Stalin's death in 1953. Despite regular appeals to global unity that were often enunciated thereafter, the communist parties of various countries were at greater liberty to follow their own roads to the socialist ideal, and the tensions between the conflicting aspirations of China and Russia occasionally led to military operations against one another. Even in countries nearer to the Russian sphere of influence within Eastern Europe, Marshal Josip Tito (1892–1980) of Yugoslavia took a relatively independent line from Moscow while using his own form of communist ideology to repress the long-standing ethnic conflicts endemic to that region that reemerged in the 1990s with a vengeance after the fall of communism.

The resistance to communism by some intellectual and religious leaders took both active and passive forms over the decades of the Cold War. In 1956, for instance, there were significant protests by cultural leaders in Poland and in Hungary. But while much of the land that had been collectivized in Poland was returned to private ownership after 1956, Hungary was subjected to a violent Soviet occupation. In 1968 the Slovakian leader Alexander Dubcek (1921–1992) briefly became the First Secretary of the Communist Party and the President of Czechoslovakia. He attempted a reform of communism by a de-Stalinization of its program of centralized control. The armed forces of the Warsaw Pact, however, entered Czechoslovakia on the night of August 19 to 20, 1968. Over the ensuing months, Dubcek's reforms were undone, and by 1970 he had been expelled from the party. A series of hard-line communists maintained the basic commitments of the communist system in the Soviet Union for decades, including Nikita Khrushchev (1894–1971), Leonid Brezhnev (1906–1982), and Alexei Kosygin (1904–1980).

Communism in Asia. The Communist Party of China, founded in Shanghai in 1921, took control of all China except Taiwan after defeating the Guomindang (Kuomintang) in 1949. The People's Republic of China, established and ruled by Mao Zedong until his death in 1976, was nominally based on Marxist-Leninism, but it broke away from Russian dominance and the standard ideology during the quarrels between Mao and Khrushchev. Mao's vision concentrated on a revolution of the peasantry and culminated in the atrocities of the Cultural Revolution (1966–1976). His enforcement of a strict communist ideology against those reformist elements that he saw as working to reintroduce bourgeois capitalism led to severe repression and economic chaos across the country.

After Mao's death, leaders of the Chinese Communist Party who were opposed to the Cultural Revolution gained power under the leadership of Deng Xiaoping (1904–1997). Deng and his successors led China back toward a market economy without ever abandoning their commitments to socialism. When many socialist governments collapsed from the protests that began in 1989, the Chinese government took a stiff line against the protesters in Tiananmen Square and dealt severely with those who tried to undermine the regime and its ideology.

Within the general Chinese sphere of influence there have been communist regimes in Korea and Vietnam that have led to protracted wars with Western democratic states in the power vacuum left by the withdrawal of Japanese forces at the end of the Second World War. Under the leadership of Kim Il-Sung (1912–1994), the communists concentrated forces in northern Korea. They were assisted by Communist China in battling against the democratically inclined forces of southern Korea and their American allies until a United Nations–brokered armistice partitioned the country in 1953. Under the regime of Kim Il-Sung's son, Kim Jong-Il, North Korea remains deeply committed to its own form of Marxist-

The Berlin Wall. A demonstrator pounds away at the Berlin Wall as East German border guards look on from above at the Brandenburg Gate, November 11, 1989. © REUTERS/CORBIS

Leninism but largely cut off from the rest of the world. Its people have suffered terribly in both economic and spiritual terms from their isolation.

Ho Chi Minh (1890–1969) led the Viet Minh independence movement from 1941 and eventually ousted the French from Indochina in 1954. The Geneva Accords of that year allowed pro-communist forces to relocate to the northern part of Vietnam around Hanoi, and anti-communist forces to do the same in the southern part, centering around Saigon (now Ho Chi Minh City). Following the doctrines of Stalin and Mao, Ho Chi Minh formed a communist workers party. In the ensuing war, the United States supported South Vietnam, but in America popular support for the war eventually flagged. The successors of Ho Chi Minh in North Vietnam united the entire country under a regime that retains a Marxist-Leninist form of communism to this day.

The Demise of Communism. While Marx and Lenin had prophesied the eventual demise of capitalism as the result of the resentments aroused by the inequalities they thought unavoidable in a capitalist free-market system, it was the inner contradictions of communist systems of governance and economics that contributed significantly to the collapse of regime after regime. After Mikhail Gorbachev became the leader of the Soviet Union in 1985, he undertook initiatives to reform communism. Among other things, he relaxed central control of the economy through his policies of glasnost (openness) and perestroika (restructuring). Unlike his predecessors, he did not intervene in Poland when the Solidarity movement inspired by Pope JOHN PAUL II and led by Lech Walesa challenged the communist government of General Wojciech Jaruzelski.

The containment policies enforced against the spread of communism by the likes of President Ronald Reagan (1911–2004) of the United States and Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher of Britain put unbearable pressure on the Soviet economy to attempt to match spending on various military and international aid initiatives. This pressure eventually burst the fragile socialist economies that Soviet leaders had desperately tried for decades to keep in place. By 1990, East Germany, Czechoslovakia, Romania, Bulgaria, and Hungary had all abandoned communism, and in 1991 the Soviet Union itself dissolved.

The Catholic Position on Communism. The history of the Catholic Church's opposition can be traced back at least as far as Pope PIUS IX's ENCYCLICAL Nostis et nobiscum (On the Church in the Pontifical States, 1849), which refers to the "perverted theories of socialism and communism" (no. 25). Likewise, his encyclical, Quanta cura (Condemning Current Errors, 1864), calls communism and socialism a "fatal error." Communism and socialism are both condemned in Pope LEO XIII's rerum novarum (On Capital and Labor, 1891) as fundamentally at odds with basic Christian beliefs. Pope PIUS XI's Quadragesimo anno (On Reconstruction of the Social Order, 1931) distinguishes between communism and socialism in important ways but singles out communism for attack because it explicitly advocates class warfare and the complete abolition of private ownership, even by violent means if necessary. The Catechism of the Catholic Church sums up the balanced judgment that the Catholic position aims for when evaluating communism and socialism by stating the following: "The Church has rejected the totalitarian and atheistic ideologies associated in modern times with 'communism' or 'socialism'.... Regulating the economy solely by centralized planning perverts the basis of social bonds ... [Still,] reasonable regulation of the marketplace and economic initiatives, in keeping with a just hierarchy of values and a view to the common good, is to be commended" (§2425).

SEE ALSO BOLSHEVISM; CATECHISM OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH; CHINA, CHRISTIANITY IN; THE CHURCH, THE COLLAPSE OF COMMUNISM, AND THE CHALLENGE OF NEW DEMOCRACIES; CZECH REPUBLIC, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN THE; POLAND, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; QUADRAGESIMO ANNO; QUANTA CURA; RERUM NOVARUM; RUSSIA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; VIETNAM, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Archie Brown, The Rise and Fall of Communism (New York 2009).

Catechism of the Catholic Church (Vatican City 1994), available from http://www.vatican.va/archive/ENG0015/_INDEX.HTM#fonte (accessed December 3, 2009).

Leszek Kołakowski, Main Currents of Marxism: Its Rise, Growth, and Dissolution, translated by P.S. Falla (Oxford, U.K. 1978).

Gabriel Kolko, Vietnam: Anatomy of a Peace (New York 1997).

Pierre F. Landry, Decentralized Authoritarianism in China: The Communist Party's Control of Local Elites in the Post-Mao Era (New York 2008).

Andrei Nikolaevich Lankov, From Stalin to Kim Il-Sung: The Formation of North Korea, 1945–1960 (New Brunswick, N.J. 2002).

Vladimir Ilyich Lenin, Revolution, Democracy, Socialism: Selected Writings, edited by Paul Le Blanc (London 2008).

James Pettifer and Miranda Vickers, The Albanian Question: Reshaping the Balkans (London 2007).

Stanley Pierson, Leaving Marxism: Studies in the Dissolution of an Ideology (Stanford, Calif. 2001).

David Shambaugh, China's Communist Party: Atrophy and Adaptation (Berkeley, Calif. 2008).

Svetozar Stojanović, The Fall of Yugoslavia: Why Communism Failed (Amherst, N.Y. 1997).

Andrzej Walicki, Marxism and the Leap to the Kingdom of Freedom: The Rise and Fall of the Communist Utopia (Stanford, Calif. 1995).

Rev. Joseph W. Koterski SJ
Professor, Department of Philosophy
Fordham University, New York (2010)

CONCORDAT WITH GERMANY (1933)

Of the thirty-eight concordats concluded by the PAPACY between 1919 and 1938, none was more controversial or had a greater impact on the reputation and the moral integrity of the Church than the Reich Concordat made with Nazi Germany in 1933. Although Pope PIUS XI had condemned the principles of the totalitarian state, he relied on concordats with various states to protect the interests of the Church. The interest of the HOLY SEE in negotiating a concordat with the Weimar Republic reflected its concern with the unequal status of confessional schools in Germany. Efforts to obtain legal equality and negotiate a concordat with the republican government were never successful, however. One of the many obstacles that contributed to a stalemate in the negotiations was the German government's request for a military chaplaincy, which the VATICAN resisted because the government would not make concessions to the Church in the areas of marriages, denominational schools, and state financial contributions.

When Adolf HITLER came to power on January 30, 1933, he was concerned about the political activities of the German Center Party and the Church's opposition to the Nazi Party, which were both fundamental obstacles to the establishment of a dictatorship. Episcopal authorities had criticized National Socialism's PAGAN and anti-Christian ideas, describing the party as racist and totalitarian. Earlier, in February 1931, the Bavarian bishops had forbidden Catholics to support the party. On the occasion of his first radio address, on February 1, 1933, Hitler attempted to allay Catholic suspicions by promising to make Christian MORALITY and family the basis of German society. In his Reichstag speech of March 23, 1933, he declared that both Christian confessions of faith were essential foundations of the German nation, and that he would respect the state concordats, secure the rights of the Church in education, and pursue amicable relations with the papacy. These conciliatory statements masked his true intentions of eliminating the political opposition of the Catholic Church.

Hitler believed that a concordat would provide an endorsement by the pope of the legitimacy of his government and counter the reluctance of many Catholics to support his regime. On March 28, facing a dilemma as to whether to support the government or oppose it, the German bishops announced a dramatic reversal rescinding the prohibitions against the Nazi Party, and they admonished Catholics to be obedient to lawful authority. That same month the Center Party voted for the Enabling Act, which gave Hitler dictatorial powers.

There has been some controversy over who first proposed the negotiation of a concordat, the Vatican or Hitler's government. It is generally accepted by historians, however, that the Catholic nobleman Franz von Papen (1879–1969), who at the time was the deputy chancellor in Hitler's cabinet, and the German government first made the proposal in early April, and that the Vatican cautiously responded to this initiative. On his trip to Rome to negotiate the concordat, Papen was joined by Monsignor Ludwig KAAS (1881–1952), the leader of the Center Party, who assisted him in the preparation of a draft treaty. Negotiations were conducted with Eugenio Pacelli, the papal secretary of state (and later Pope PIUS XII). The draft of the concordat was completed in only four sessions, and to the surprise of the Vatican, the German state conceded practically all that Pacelli required.

Yet while the negotiations continued, the German persecution of the Church accelerated. It was hoped by Pacelli and Pius XI that a concordat would erect a legal wall of defense to protect the Church and its denominational schools, as well as obtain the state's recognition of canon law. Pacelli, of course, was suspicious of Hitler's motives and expected a concordat to be violated. The German government had accepted the major demands of the Holy See, however, and Pacelli assumed that the Church's rejection of such a favorable treaty would lead to a religious war and endanger the Catholic Church in Germany.

The Reich Concordat was signed on July 20, 1933, and it was ratified in a ceremonial exchange of documents in the Apostolic Palace of the Vatican on September 10, 1933. Of the 33 articles, 21 pertained to the rights of the Church. The concordat, for instance, guaranteed the Church the right to teach, publicly defend Catholic principles, and operate Catholic schools. Church organizations, especially Catholic Youth associations, could not be politically oriented. Article 31, which dealt with religious, cultural, and educational associations, was left purposely vague and subject to future negotiations, which resulted in many disagreements. Communications with ROME, canonical regulations governing religious orders, and ecclesiastical property were safeguarded, and bishops were given the right to approve instructors of religion in state schools, but consultation with the state was required in ecclesiastical appointments. Members of the clergy had to be German citizens and have a German education, while seminarians had to perform military service during a general mobilization. The loyalty of bishops was secured by Article 16, which required them to take an oath of loyalty to the German government, and religious education was to inspire patriotism and loyalty in students. Finally, Article 32 fulfilled Hitler's dream of barring the clergy from politics, membership in political parties, or even promoting political parties.

Although Pacelli refused to accept Hitler's interpretation of the concordat as an approval of the National Socialist state, he did believe that it provided Rome the right to intervene in Germany's domestic affairs and enabled it to challenge Nazi policies. The need for such an intervention was obvious, as violations of the concordat were rampant between 1933 and 1936. Catholic offices were closed, meetings were banned, property confiscated, the Catholic press suppressed, civil servants dismissed or arrested, clergy imprisoned, pastoral letters confiscated, Catholic schools and cloisters closed, and episcopal offices ransacked. During the ensuing years, thousands of clergy were defamed, arrested, tried, and imprisoned. As early as October 1933, Pacelli was complaining to the German Foreign Ministry about serious violations of the treaty.

The bishops followed a policy called "petition politics," in which they publicly complained of concordat violations and then privately appealed to the government to desist from such abuses. The bishops could do little more than that, however, because Article 16 of the treaty bound them by an oath of loyalty to the state. In August 1936 the bishops requested that Pius XI publicly condemn the ongoing persecution of the Church in an apostolic letter. This culminated in the famous papal encyclical Mit brennender Sorge (With Deep Anxiety), which was secretly distributed throughout Germany. Some have claimed, however, that the pope's public condemnation only resulted in greater repression.

Following the outbreak of WORLD WAR II, the new pope, Pius XII, followed the example of Pope BENEDICT XV during World War I by adhering to a policy of strict neutrality. Unlike his predecessor, who had recourse to strong words and public protests, Pius XII adhered to the concordat and relied on diplomacy, private protests, and oblique condemnations when confronted with the persecution of the Church and the genocide of the HOLOCAUST (SHOAH). This led to the charge that he was "silent" and sparked a historiographical debate on the role of this pope and the papacy during the war and its aftermath.

SEE ALSO GERMANY, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Dieter Albrecht, ed., Der Notenwechsel zwischen dem Heiligen Stuhl und der Deutschen Reichsregierung, 3 vols. (Mainz, Germany 1965–1980).

Frank J. Coppa, ed., Controversial Concordats: The Vatican's Relations with Napoleon, Mussolini, and Hitler (Washington, D.C. 1999).

Klaus Gotto and Konrad Repgen, eds., Die Katholiken und das Dritte Reich (Mainz, Germany 1990).

Peter C. Kent and John F. Pollard, eds., Papal Diplomacy in the Modern Age (Westport, Conn. 1994).

Konrad Repgen, ed., "Über die Entstehung der Reichskonkordats: Offerte im Früjahr 1933 und die Bedeutung des Reichskonkordats," in Vierteljahrshefte für Zeitgeschichte 25 (1978).

Stewart A. Stehlin, Weimar and the Vatican, 1919–1933: German-Vatican Relations in the Interwar Years (Princeton, N.J. 1983).

Ludwig Volk, Das Reichskondordat vom 20 Juli 1933 (Mainz, Germany 1972).

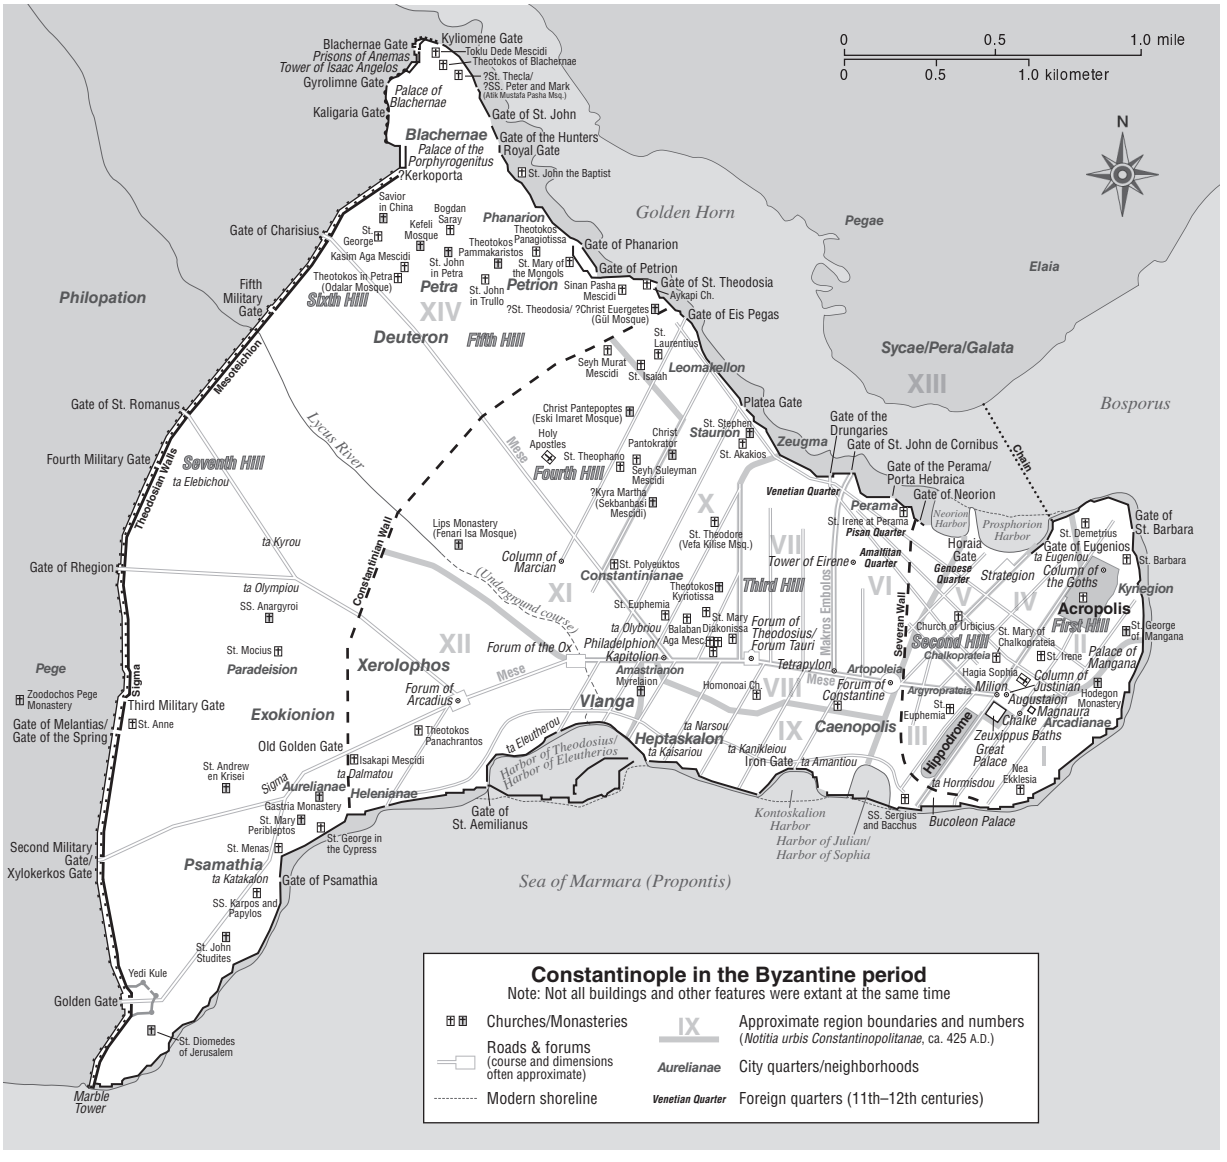
John Zeender, "The Genesis of the German Concordat of 1933," in Studies in Catholic History in Honor of John Tracy Ellis, edited by Nelson H. Minnich, Robert B. Eno, S.S., and Robert F. Trisco (Wilmington, Del. 1985).

Joseph A. Biesinger
Professor Emeritus, Department of History
Eastern Kentucky University (2010)

CONSTANTINOPLE (BYZANTIUM, ISTANBUL)



Constantinople (modern Istanbul), "Constantine's City" (Latin: Constantinopolis), sometimes Byzantium or simply "the City." This article deals with Constantinople: (1) as a center of Church history; (2) in its relations with Rome; (3) in its break with Rome; (4) as a center of monasticism; and (5) as a center of art and archeology.

EARLY HISTORY

The importance of the site of Constantinople as a center of communications and the advantages of its excellent harbor, the Golden Horn, were recognized as early as the seventh century BC, when Greek merchants founded the colony of Byzantion. As a small commercial city it survived into Roman times.

The Founding of Constantinople. On becoming the sole emperor, CONSTANTINE I, THE GREAT (306–337), transferred the imperial capital from Italy to the eastern part of the empire for greater administrative and military efficiency. As a result of his conversion to Christianity, he preferred to build a new capital that would be Christian from the beginning, rather than occupy a city with old pagan associations. After considering several sites, he chose Byzantium, since it was not a major city and so could be "refounded" and given a new name, "the city of Constantine." The account of the founding written by Bishop EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA, Constantine's adviser and biographer, describes the construction of a number of churches, which were supplied with costly copies of the Scriptures specially prepared in Eusebius's SCRIPTORIUM in Caesarea. Other sources indicate that Constantine had to take into account that many of his subjects were still pagans and the dedication ceremonies (330) included traditional pagan rites as well as Christian services.

The history of the Church at Constantinople was inevitably colored by the city's being the imperial residence and by the consequent propinquity of the bishop and the emperor. The see inescapably became involved in disputes with other major churches over questions of precedence and authority. A late legend, dating apparently from the early seventh century, attributed the founding of the Church at Byzantium to the Apostle ANDREW. This claim cannot be verified, and its late origin suggests that it arose at the time of the controversy between Rome and Constantinople over the title of "ecumenical patriarch" as used by the patriarch of Constantinople. It is thought that someone at Constantinople, wishing to place the see of the capital among the apostolic foundations and thus raise it to the same level as Rome in this respect, fabricated the legend. The actual situation at the time of the founding of the city is shown by canon six of the Council of NICAEA I (325), which confirmed the traditional authority of the metropolitan of Heraclea over the see of Byzantium.

Jewel of the Eastern Roman Empire. This vast city grew in size and importance as Rome shrank in the West. The physical expansion of Constantinople can be traced by examining the numbered regions on the map. Each region is numbered in the order that it was incorporated into the city, beginning with its initial foundation site (Region I) to the furthest expanse of the city limits (Region XIV). REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION OF GALE, A PART OF CENGAGE LEARNING

The Strengthening of the Church in Constantinople. The controversy over ARIANISM involved Constantinople in tension with the other major churches and had special significance at the capital because of the Emperor CONSTANTINE II's Arian leanings. Toward the end of the Arian troubles, GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS was installed (381) as bishop in order to direct the restoration of orthodoxy, and the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE I in 381 (later acknowledged as the second ecumenical council) was convoked by THEODOSIUS THE GREAT in order to complete the restoration of religious unity. The Nicene doctrine of the nature of Christ was confirmed, and APOLLINARIANISM was condemned. The CREED called Niceno-Constantinopolitan, once thought to have been promulgated at this council, probably originated earlier. The status of Constantinople was elevated by canon three, which decreed that the bishop of Constantinople should have "precedence of honor" after the bishop of Rome "because Constantinople is the new Rome." This canon, though, was not accepted by Rome, as Jedin reports.

As patriarch of Constantinople, JOHN CHRYSOSTOM (398–407) encountered political and ecclesiastical difficulties, which led to his condemnation at the Synod of the OAK, followed by his exile and death. Canon 28 of the Council of CHALCEDON (451) granted "equal prerogatives" to the see of Constantinople, the "New Rome," as those enjoyed by the see of the "Old Rome," after which it ranked second. As Jedin reports, the papal legates present at Chalcedon, however, protested this canon, and Pope LEO I refused to endorse it. Nevertheless, the canon indicates that between 381 and 451 Constantinople had extended its jurisdiction over the dioceses of Thrace, Asia, and Pontus, and that the see of the imperial capital was engaged in a series of hostilities with ANTIOCH and ALEXANDRIA, its natural ecclesiastical rivals in the East. Antioch, by the support it gave to NESTORIANISM and MONOPHYSITISM, provided opportunities for attacks on its own power, while Alexandria brought more strength to its resistance to the capital. The frequent and extended visits of ecclesiastical prelates to the capital led to the formation of a permanent "resident synod" (synodos endemousa), which became characteristic of this patriarchate and served both the patriarch and the emperor in the preparation of policy and the issuing of decrees concerning ecclesiastical problems.

RELATIONS WITH ROME

Relations between Constantinople and Rome were conditioned at an early date by the extension of power of the Constantinopolitan see and by the influence of its patriarch with the emperor. The activities of the patriarch of Constantinople must be viewed in the light of the theory of the nature of the office of the Christian Roman emperor, formulated in the time of Constantine the Great. According to this theory, which was designed to replace the political theory of the pagan Roman Empire, the Christian emperor was conceived to be the vicegerent of God on earth, divinely chosen for office and ruling by divine inspiration and by virtue of his position responsible for the spiritual as well as the material welfare of his subjects. The competence and right of the sovereign to control or intervene in ecclesiastical affairs was in due course challenged by the Church, but the patriarch of the imperial residence, whether he was considered a partner of the emperor or only an adviser, could on occasion claim authority and jurisdiction, political or spiritual, which the other ancient sees, especially Rome, were unable to accept. Thus the ACACIAN SCHISM, separating East and West from 484 to 519, arose when Pope FELIX III felt it necessary to excommunicate the Patriarch ACACIUS for the HENOTICON or formula of union issued by the Emperor ZENO.

Reign of Justinian (527–565). This was one of the most brilliant periods in the history of Constantinople and established a new era in Byzantine civilization. JUSTINIAN I sought to complete the process inaugurated by Constantine and Theodosius and to perfect the life of a Christian Roman Empire in which religion, intellectual culture, art, social life, and government were integrated into one harmonious whole under a benevolent emperor who was the all-powerful father of his people and the responsible head of both Church and State. Constantinople was the center in which this achievement was to be realized. In the religious sphere, Justinian's constant preoccupation was the restoration of orthodoxy and the suppression of heresy and paganism. The emperor pursued his goal with autocratic vigor, and in an effort to solve the Monophysite problem, which constituted a breach in both the spiritual and the political unity of the empire, applied himself to theology and ended by issuing unilateral legislation on points of doctrine without consulting the Church, an action that exceeded the most liberal interpretation of his powers. Justinian endeavored to impose his will on Popes AGAPETUS, SILVERIUS, and VIGILIUS. Silverius was deposed, while Vigilius was brought to Constantinople and treated with physical violence. The Council of CONSTANTINOPLE II (fifth ecumenical council, 553) was convoked by Justinian to settle the question arising out of the Monophysite problem, as to whether the THREE CHAPTERS, condemned by Justinian in a personal edict in 543, should be condemned, along with their authors, Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodoret of Cyr, and Ibas of Edessa, for their Nestorian sympathies. At the emperor's behest, the council condemned the chapters and anathematized their writers.

A new source of difficulty between Constantinople and Rome arose over the use of the title "ecumenical patriarch" by the patriarchs of Constantinople. In existing Greek usage, the term "ecumenical" had a restricted sense, but Pope GREGORY I protested against the patriarchs' use of the title because in the West it would be taken as a claim to universal jurisdiction. This controversy continued for some years, but the patriarchs did not discontinue the use of the title. MONOTHELITISM, growing out of Monophysitism, caused further estrangement between the East and the West, in the course of which Pope MARTIN I and MAXIMUS THE CONFESSOR were arrested by order of the Emperor CONSTANS II, taken to Constantinople, and tried for treason. The pope was banished and died from cold and hunger (655).

In 680 the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE III (sixth ecumenical council) was convoked by the Emperor CONSTANTINE IV to settle the Monothelite heresy. The Dogmatic Decree issued by the council reaffirmed the definition of Chalcedon with an additional statement certifying the reality of the two wills and the two operations in Christ. This was followed by the Trullan Synod (692), so called from its meeting in the trullus or domed chamber of the imperial palace. It is also referred to as the Quinisext, for its task was to draw up disciplinary decrees on clerical marriage, clerical dress, age of ordination, and the like, in order to supply the canonical measures not handled at the fifth and sixth ecumenical councils (553 and 680). The legislation of this council served to emphasize the difference between Eastern and Western practice, and the refusal of Pope SERGIUS I (r. 687–701) to endorse the Trullan Synod led to further tensions, as Kelly reports.

Iconoclast Controversy (725–843). This controversy produced tension between the popes, who supported further the traditional use of images as orthodox, and the iconoclast emperors and patriarchs, who sought to abolish sacred images as promoting idolatry. Further cause for discord was the rivalry between Rome and Constantinople for the ecclesiastical control of Illyricum, southern Italy, and Sicily, over which, from the fifth to the ninth century, the See of Constantinople gradually extended its jurisdiction.

Photius and the Greek Schism. The Photian schism was once thought to be the beginning of the definitive schism between the East and the West, but recent research has tended to show that the breach between the East and the West under the Patriarch PHOTIUS (858–869, 877–886) was not permanent, that a recognized schism came about only gradually, and that the date when the schism became complete is not easy to establish. Relations between the East and the West at this time reflect the effect of the accumulation of the successive points of difference between Rome and Constantinople, combined with the increasing difficulty of effective communication, as fewer people in the East had a competent knowledge of Latin, while at the same time fewer people in Rome possessed an accurate knowledge of Greek. Thus official correspondence was sometimes not interpreted correctly.

The personal history of the future patriarch Photius was typical of the Constantinople of his day, and his appointment illustrates the way in which the affairs of the patriarchate were conducted at that time. A member of a wealthy and distinguished family (his uncle TARASIUS had been patriarch from 784 to 806), Photius was one of the most learned and cultivated men of his time, a leader in the intellectual and literary revival then taking place in Constantinople. His contributions to scholarship were important. Photius had also shown unusual talents as a diplomat and civil servant. Others of similar background had been called to the patriarchal throne because of their personal prestige and their experience of practical affairs. In the East this was not considered an undesirable practice; but the appointment of such men to the highest ecclesiastical posts seemed strange to the West. Thus, when Emperor MICHAEL III deposed the patriarch IGNATIUS in the course of a quarrel between conservative and moderate elements in the Church, the emperor chose Photius to succeed him, as a man capable of reconciling the discordant groups. Photius was a layman and had to proceed through the necessary series of ordinations in six successive days. When the deposition of Ignatius seemed irregular, Pope NICHOLAS I had additional reason not to recognize Photius as patriarch. Ignatius's friends carried their complaints to Rome. The question of the FILIOQUE was raised; and the case became further complicated by an important administrative question, namely, whether the newly established Church of BULGARIA should come under the jurisdiction of Rome or Constantinople. The controversy, protracted and complex, illustrates the way in which the pope was obliged to deal with two powers, the patriarch and the emperor, whereas the patriarch and the emperor had to deal with only a single agent, the pope. Several councils were held in Rome (863, 864, 869, 879) and in Constantinople (859, 861, 869–870, 879–880). The Council of CONSTANTINOPLE IV (869–870), the eighth ecumenical council, confirmed the sentence of the Council at Rome in 869 that anathematized Photius. Ignatius was reestablished as patriarch, but he died in 877; and Photius once again was appointed patriarch and was recognized by Pope JOHN VIII. At a Photian Council at Constantinople in 879–880, the papal legates apparently accepted Photius and annulled the action of the council of 869–870. If the Photian schism did not create a lasting breach between the East and the West, the part played by Photius certainly hastened the final schism—he was the first Eastern theologian to bring an accusation that the filioque was an innovation—and it is appropriate that his name is attached to the episode.

Patriarchal Status. The careers of Ignatius and Photius illustrate the relations between patriarch and emperor. The patriarch had great power; in the middle of the seventh century he controlled 419 bishoprics, in the early ninth century, more than 500. At the same time, the patriarch often had to defer to the emperor. While a patriarch who had public opinion behind him could, when necessary, oppose an emperor very effectively, the imperial office could employ constraints that the Church could not always withstand. Under the best conditions, the collaboration of emperor and patriarch could be a harmonious partnership; but emperors might be tyrannical and patriarchs might be servile or contentious. It was possible for heretics such as NESTORIUS, men with heretical tendencies such as Acacius, and iconoclasts to be patriarchs.

BREAK WITH ROME

After the time of Photius, relations between the East and the West further deteriorated. The patriarchate of MICHAEL CERULARIUS (1043–1059) has traditionally been seen as the time of the final breach (1054), but recent research has shown that this year did not witness a permanent break and that the final schism developed gradually. Cerularius, a civil servant ordained late in life, brought to the duties of patriarch the strict mentality of the bureaucrat and a strong will that did not defer to the emperor's views. Violently anti-Latin, the new patriarch inaugurated a systematic attack on Latin usages, such as use of unleavened bread in the Eucharist, fasting on Saturdays, and the like. When the Latin churches in Constantinople refused to adopt Greek usages, Cerularius closed them, caused a violent letter to be sent to Rome, and instituted further anti-Western propaganda which included some exaggerated and abusive charges.

Continued Hostilities. Pope LEO IX sent three legates to complain to the emperor and reprove the patriarch, their leader being Cardinal Humbert, who disliked the Greeks as strongly as Cerularius disliked the Latins. The Emperor CONSTANTINE IX attempted to act as conciliator but failed. The legates took the unusual step of entering HAGIA SOPHIA just before the singing of the liturgy and laying on the altar a bull excommunicating the patriarch and his followers (but not the emperor). When the contents of the bull became known in the city, there were riots, which the imperial troops put down only with difficulty. After the legates left for Rome, a synod met at Constantinople and anathematized them. Though the synod was careful not to involve the pope, it was later believed in the East that Cerularius had answered the attack on himself by excommunicating the pope. The crisis was taken more seriously in the West than in the East. But political negotiations between the emperor and the Roman See continued, and the evidence indicates that neither the East nor the West looked upon the episode as the beginning of a permanent schism.

Crusades. The CRUSADES aggravated the hostility of the patriarch and the Greek people toward Rome. The motives of the crusaders were suspected and their behavior seemed offensive. The emperors made efforts toward conciliation, but the patriarchs did not support these. Feeling became so strong that there was a massacre of Latins in Constantinople in 1182. There was even more extensive violence when some members of the Fourth Crusade, after having captured Constantinople in 1204, pillaged the city for three days when they felt betrayed by the Byzantine Emperor, Alexius IV, whom they had helped regain the imperial crown. It was the memory of this, more than anything else, that confirmed the breach between Constantinople and Rome. The Byzantine government in exile, with the Greek patriarchs, resided at Nicaea, and the Latins, under a Latin patriarch, occupied the principal churches and monasteries of Constantinople. From the beginning of the Latin occupation, Pope INNOCENT III attempted to conciliate the Greeks and procure their obedience with as little disturbance of the hierarchy as possible, but the Greeks had no desire for compromise. The patriarchate returned to Constantinople when the city was recaptured by the Byzantines in 1261.

During the remaining years of Byzantine rule in Constantinople, the patriarchs joined with the emperors, who in order to secure political and military support against the Turkish threat were seeking union with Rome. At the councils of LYONS (1276) and FLORENCE (1439), the Church of Constantinople recognized the supremacy of the Roman See, but these actions were only accepted by a very small portion of the Byzantine clergy and people. A council, which met in Hagia Sophia in 1450, condemned the union with Rome and deposed the prounion patriarch. Emperor Constantine XII caused the union to be proclaimed again in Hagia Sophia in December of 1452, and it was not formally repealed until 1484, as Nichols reports. In reality, though, the union ended when Constantinople was captured by the Turks on May 29, 1453.

MONASTIC ESTABLISHMENTS

A major influence in the political and religious life of Constantinople was the large number of monastic establishments, each with its particular rule. The extant documents preserve the names of 325 monasteries of men and women in the capital between the years 330 and 1453, though some of these may represent the refounding of an existing establishment under a new name. In 1453, when the capital had shrunk to a shadow of its former size, eighteen monastic establishments were still active.

Influence. The monks had a powerful influence on the religious life of the people, for example, in the iconoclast controversy, in which they strongly defended the use of icons. As a rule, the monks had a lively sense of independence and could become fanatical when they considered that they must resist unjust actions of ecclesiastical authority. Some of the monasteries, such as the STUDION, were important centers of scholarship and the preservation of manuscripts.

Patriarchal School. Along with the university founded by Constantine the Great, there was a patriarchal school, first attested in the seventh century, which offered instruction not only in theology but in secular learning as well. When reorganized by Photius, this school was divided into various branches, which met at different churches in the city.

ART AND ARCHEOLOGY

Recent archeological activity in Istanbul has stimulated popular interest in the art of imperial Constantinople, and the corpus of known monuments has largely increased. Exploration of the area of the imperial palace has brought to light important mosaics, as well as valuable topographical information. The work of the Byzantine Institute of America in uncovering and restoring mosaics and frescoes in Hagia Sophia (Holy Wisdom) and elsewhere has added new chapters to the history of Byzantine art. A definitive study of the structure and architectural history of Hagia Sophia, carried out by R.L. Van Nice, was published in 1986. Research on many aspects of the history and antiquities of Constantinople is in progress at the Center for Byzantine Studies of Harvard University at Dumbarton Oaks, in Washington, D.C., and at the Institut Français d'Études Byzantines in Paris.

Churches. Numerous churches, as well as other buildings, including a palace, were constructed after the refoundation of the city by Constantine. Extant sources for eleven centuries of the history of Constantinople record the names of 485 churches. The oldest surviving is the Basilica of St. John Baptist Studium, built circa 463. The most important, still standing, is Justinian's great Church of Hagia Sophia. Constructed on a new plan and at a scale never before attempted, it was the greatest church then existing in the world. Contemporary literary accounts of the original construction and decoration by Procopius of Caesarea and Paulus Silentiarius have been preserved. Procopius, who watched the building being constructed and may have been present when it was dedicated, described its effect on the worshipper:

> Whenever anyone enters this church to pray, he understands at once that it is not by human power or skill, but by the power of God, that this work has been so beautifully executed. And his mind is lifted up toward God, feeling that He cannot be far away, but must especially love to dwell in this place which he has chosen.

Procopius's description is part of his panegyrical account of Justinian's buildings both at Constantinople and throughout the empire, in which one can perceive that the construction of churches and public buildings was one of the main functions of the emperor, illustrating the sovereign's benevolent role as father of his people. Other churches of Justinian still standing are the church of Sts. Sergius and Bacchus and the church of St. Irene. Another great undertaking of Justinian, the church of the Holy Apostles, was destroyed after 1453, but its plan and decoration are known from literary descriptions by Constantine of Rhodes and Nikolaos Mesarites. Some idea of the richness of this church can be gained from St. Mark's at Venice, which was modeled on it in plan and decoration.

Secular Architecture. The imperial palace facing the Augustaeum, the public square on which Hagia Sophia stood, was begun by Constantine the Great following the quadrangular plan of the Roman fortified camp, exemplified by the palaces at Spalato and Antioch. As at Antioch and Thessalonica, the juxtaposition at Constantinople of the palace, the hippodrome, and the "great church" brought together the three places in which the emperor performed his ceremonial functions, both political and religious. In time the palace was enlarged by the addition of public halls, banquet rooms, private chambers, chapels, churches, gardens, and a polo field, until it became one of the largest and most magnificent structures in the world of that time. The fortification walls of Constantinople, in large part preserved, give an excellent idea of Byzantine skill in masonry construction and military engineering.

The Arts. Constantinople was famous not only for its buildings and their decorations, but for the luxury articles of all kinds which were manufactured in the city and exported throughout the world, the city being one of the most important trading centers of its time. As the largest and most luxurious city in the world, Constantinople possessed both a taste for the work of skilled artists and craftsmen and the wealth to attract them to the city. The spirit of the capital was expressed in a fondness for magnificence and display, and a love of color. Gold mosaic and gold cloth were much in use. Constantinople and Antioch were the two centers for the manufacture of gold and silver Eucharistic vessels and altar furnishings. The workshops of the city—often established in the palace under direct imperial patronage and supervision—produced the finest jewelry and other objects, such as book covers inlaid in gold and silver or enamel and ivory, as well as richly illustrated books and figured silks. Icons of all sizes—metal, painted, or mosaic—were produced. The coins struck at the imperial mint in Constantinople are important both as examples of contemporary art and iconography and as portraits of imperial personages; notable collections are in the British Museum and at Dumbarton Oaks. The illustrations and ornamentation of the secular and religious manuscripts produced at Constantinople are one of our richest sources for the purpose and methods of Byzantine art.

Justinian's Great Church. Exterior view of Hagia Sophia in Istanbul, Turkey. © FRANCESCO VENTURI/CORBIS

Byzantine art as it developed in Constantinople illustrates the way in which the capital brought together the artistic traditions of the other great cities of the empire, notably Antioch and Alexandria, and transformed them into a new and distinctive manner, which often went back to the works of classical Greece and Rome for its inspiration. Byzantine Christian art is full of classical motifs and genre scenes in the antique fashion. It was a unified art that was at the same time secular and religious, decorative and didactic. As an official art, centered on the glorification of God and the emperor, Byzantine art found its finest expression in Constantinople.

The iconoclast controversy had two effects on the artistic activity of the capital: a revival of the classical style and the development of a popular style, centered in the monasteries, which flourished alongside the official, imperial art. Thus the end of the iconoclast ban on religious art was followed by a new golden age in the art of Constantinople, from the ninth through the twelfth centuries.

The artistic influence of the capital radiated throughout the world; it is now especially familiar in the early art and architecture of the Slavic lands, whose whole culture was so dependent upon Byzantium, and in the work of the Italian painters, such as CIMABUE, Duccio, Cavallini, GIOTTO, and MANTEGNA, who were familiar with Byzantine work and developed a close affinity with its spirit and style.

SEE ALSO BYZANTINE ART; BYZANTINE CIVILIZATION; BYZANTINE EMPIRE, THE; BYZANTINE LITERATURE; BYZANTINE THEOLOGY; ICONOCLASM; OTTOMAN TURKS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Michael Angold, Church and Society in Byzantium under the Comneni, 1081–1261 (Cambridge, U.K. 1995).

Michael Angold, The Byzantine Empire 1025-1204: A Political History (London 1997).

Michael Angold, Byzantium: The Bridge from Antiquity to the Middle Ages (London 2001).

Giovanni Becatti et al., Enciclopedia dell'arte antica, classica e orientale (Rome 1958–), 2:880–919, with useful bibliography.

John Beckwith, The Art of Constantinople (London 1961).

Roger Crowley, Constantinople: The Last Great Siege (London 2005).

Glanville Downey, Constantinople in the Age of Justinian (Norman, Okla. 1960).

Francis Dvornik, The Photian Schism (Cambridge, U.K. 1948).

Francis Dvornik, The Idea of Apostolicity in Byzantium and the Legend of the Apostle Andrew (Cambridge, Mass. 1958).

Jean Ebersolt, Constantinople byzantine et les voyageurs du Levant (Paris 1918).

Jean Ebersolt, Constantinople: Recueil d'études (Paris 1951).

H.C. Evans and W.D. Wixom, eds., The Glory of Byzantium: Art and Culture in the Middle Byzantine Era, AD 843–1261 (New York 1997).

George Every, The Byzantine Patriarchate, 451–1204, 2nd edition (London 1962).

John Freely, Istanbul: The Imperial City (New York 1998).

John Freely and Ahmet S. Cakmak, The Byzantine Monuments of Istanbul (Cambridge, U.K. 2004).

André Grabar, L'Empereur dans l'art byzantin (Paris 1936).

André Grabar, Byzantine Painting, translated by Stuart Gilbert (New York 1953).

J.A. Hamilton, Byzantine Architecture and Decoration, 2nd edition (London 1956).

Jonathan Harris, Constantinople: Capital of Byzantium (London 2007).

Jonathan Harris, Byzantium and the Crusades (London 2003).

Judith Herrin, Byzantium: The Surprising Life of a Medieval Empire (Princeton, N.J. 2008).

Judith Herrin, Women in Purple: Rulers of Medieval Byzantium (Princeton, N.J. 2001).

Joan M. Hussey, The Orthodox Church in the Byzantine Empire (London 1990).

Raymond Janin, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, edited by Alfred Baudrillart et al. (Paris 1912–), 13:626–768.

Raymond Janin, Constantinople byzantine: Développement urbain et répertoire topographique (Paris 1950)

Raymond Janin, Les Églises et les monastères, vol. 3 of La Géographie ecclésiastique de l'empire byzantin, part 1 (Paris 1953).

Hubert Jedin, Ecumenical Councils of the Catholic Church: An Historical Outline (New York 1960).

J.N.D. Kelly, The Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986).

Henry Maguire, ed., Byzantine Court Culture from 829 to 1204 (Washington, D.C. 1997).

Cyril A. Mango, "The Byzantine Inscriptions of Constantinople: A Bibliographical Survey," American Journal of Archaeology 55 (1951): 52–66.

Cyril A. Mango, Materials for the Study of the Mosaics of St. Sophia at Istanbul (Washington, D.C. 1962).

Cyril A. Mango, Studies on Constantinople (Aldershot, U.K. 1993).

Cyril A. Mango, The Oxford History of Byzantium (New York 2002).

Philip Mansel, Constantinople: City of the World's Desire, 1453–1924 (New York 1998).

Thomas F. Mathews, Byzantium: From Antiquity to the Renaissance (New York 1998).

Aidan Nicholas, O.P., Rome and the Eastern Churches (Collegeville, Minn. 1992).

Donald Nicol, The Last Centuries of Byzantium, 1261–1453 (Cambridge, U.K. 1993).

S. Runciman, The Eastern Schism (Oxford, U.K. 1955).

Linda Safran, Heaven on Earth: Art and the Church in Byzantium (University Park, Pa. 1998).

R.A. Tomlinson, From Mycenae to Constantinople: The Evolution of the Ancient City (London 1992).

Warren Treadgold, A History of the Byzantine State and Society (Stanford, Calif. 1997).

Robert L. Van Nice, Saint Sophia in Istanbul: An Architectural Survey, 2 vols. (Washington, D.C. 1986).

Glanville Downey
Professor of History
Indiana University, Bloomington, Ind.

Michael Wolfe
Professor of History
St. John's University, Queens, N.Y. (2010)

COPE, MARIANNE, BL.

Missionary to HAWAII; b. Heppenhein, a village in the German Grand Duchy of Hesse-Darmstadt, January 23, 1838; d. Moloka'i, Hawaii, August 9, 1918, at the age of eighty; beatified May 14, 2005, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

Two years after Barbara Koob was born in Germany, her family immigrated to Utica, New York. On arrival, they changed their name to Cope. Barbara joined the Sisters of St. Francis (O.S.F.) in Syracuse, New York, in 1862 and took the name Marianne. After she taught and administered schools in New York, she became administrator of Syracuse's first hospital. Her leadership brought the Geneva Medical College to Syracuse for a successful development of medical practices between the hospital and the college.

Cope became the major superior of the sisters in Syracuse in 1877. In 1883, after a letter and visit from Fr. Leonor Fouesnel, emissary from the Kingdom of Hawaii, Mother Marianne and six sisters from her community traveled to Hawaii to work with lepers. Initially she was uncertain how long she would remain there because of her responsibilities as the major superior. Her eventual decision was to remain permanently. On arrival, they worked at the Kakaako Branch Hospital in Oahu, where Hansen's disease patients were received and processed for shipment to Molokai. Two years later, Mother Marianne and her sisters established the Kapiolani Home for the daughters of Hansen's disease patients who were quarantined on the island of Molokai.

In 1888 Mother Marianne and two sisters, Leopoldina Burns and Vincentia McCormick, accepted Father Damian's invitation to work with Hansen's disease patients at Molokai, a ministry they continued after his death. Arriving on November 14, 1888, they took charge of the Bishop Home for Girls in Kalaupapa. From 1888 to 1895 they also managed the Home for Boys at Kalawao that Father Damian had earlier founded. Mother Marianne's indefatigable spirit, unflagging optimism, and self-sacrificing devotion inspired her sisters to cope with the extremely heavy and punishing workload of caring for women and children with Hansen's disease. Remarkably, she never contracted the disease. In 1918, at the age of eighty, she passed away. Her remains are buried on the grounds of her beloved Bishop Home for Girls, now a national park monument.

In establishing homes for women and children with Hansen's disease, Mother Marianne led one of the earliest American Catholic women's congregations to establish missions outside the United States. In doing so, she became the first American Catholic woman missionary to minister to patients with this disease, and today she is especially honored as an intercessor for victims of leprosy. Throughout her life she practiced an ecumenism of good works, reminding her community that "the charity of the good knows no creed, and is confined to no one place."

In recognizing a life replete with HOLINESS, Mother Marianne of Molokai was declared venerable by Pope JOHN PAUL II on April 19, 2004. The following year, on May 14, 2005, she was one of the first two persons beatified by Pope Benedict XVI. Prior to her BEATIFICATION, the Vatican affirmed a miraculous cure in 1992 attributed to Mother Marianne's intervention, involving a teenage girl suffering from multiple organ failure who regained full health after invoking her INTERCESSION. In his homily for Mother Marianne's Mass of beatification on the eve of PENTECOST in the Vatican Basilica, Cardinal José Saraiva Martins, Prefect of the Congregation for the Causes of Saints, reflected upon her virtues and works of CHARITY during her many years as a Third Order Franciscan, referring to her life as "a wonderful work of divine grace." Recognizing and fulfilling her unique call to a life of charity during her thirty-five years of devoted service to outcast women and children, Mother Marianne saw the suffering face of Jesus in those whom she cared for in body, mind, and spirit. The cause for Blessed Marianne's eventual sainthood continues, anticipating the final step in her canonization process, which will recognize her as the first female saint from Hawaii.

Feast: January 23.

SEE ALSO CANONIZATION OF SAINTS (HISTORY AND PROCEDURE); FRANCISCANS, THIRD ORDER REGULAR; VEUSTER, JOSEPH DE (FR. DAMIEN), BL.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Mary Adamski, "'Blessed' Mother Cope: The Kalaupapa Nun Reaches the Second Step to Sainthood," Honolulu Star Bulletin (May 15, 2005), available from http://archives.starbulletin.com/2005/05/15/news/story3.html (accessed September 9, 2009).

Congregation for the Causes of Saints, "Mass of Beatification for the Servants of God Ascención Nicol Goñi and Marianne Cope: Homily of Card. José Saraiva Martins," Vatican Web site, May 14, 2005, available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/congregations/csaints/documents/rc_con_csaints_doc_20050514_beatifications_en.html (accessed September 9, 2009).

Mary Laurence Hanley and O.A. Bushnell, A Song of Pilgrimage and Exile (Chicago 1980).

Mary Laurence Hanley and O.A. Bushnell, Pilgrimage and Exile: Mother Marianne of Molokai (Honolulu 1991).

Edward Anthony Lenk, Mother Marianne Cope (1838–1918): The Syracuse Franciscan Community and Molokai Lepers (Ph.D. diss., Syracuse University, 1986).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Bl. Marianne Cope (1838–1918)," Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_lit_doc_20050514_molokai_en.html (accessed September 9, 2009).

Rev. Angelyn Dries OSF
Associate Professor and Chair, Religious Studies Dept.
Cardinal Stritch University, Milwaukee Wis.

Kent Wallace
Independent Researcher
Providence, R.I. (2010)

COR UNUM

The Pontifical Council for Human and Christian Development, Cor Unum (One Heart), was founded on July 15, 1971, by Pope PAUL VI as the HOLY SEE's umbrella organization for the international promotion and distribution of CHARITY and human development. The VATICAN charity office was established in Paul VI's letter of institution, Amoris officio, of the same date, addressed to Jean Cardinal VILLOT, the Holy See's secretary of state, whom the POPE selected as Cor Unum's first president. According to Cor Unum's APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTION, the council's mission is to express "the solicitude of the Catholic Church for the needy, to foster human fraternity and make manifest Christ's charity" (Pastor bonus, V, 145).

Cor Unum is a dicastery, or permanent office, of the Holy See, with officials selected by the pope for five-year terms. Based in the Palazzo San Calisto, just outside of Vatican City, Cor Unum is directed by a president, a secretary, and an undersecretary. Cor Unum is assisted by a council of thirty-eight members who are clerical and lay leaders of charities from around the world, six consultors who are experts in the areas of charity and development, and a permanent staff of nine.

Cor Unum cooperates with the charitable endeavors of bishops' conferences, Caritas Internationalis (the Vatican-based international confederation of Catholic social service and development agencies), Catholic Relief Services, Coopération Internationale pour le Développement et la Solidarité (CIDSE), Cross International Catholic Outreach, the International Association of the Ladies of Charity, the INTERNATIONAL CATHOLIC MIGRATION COMMISSION, and the Society of St. VINCENT DE PAUL, among others. It also assists the charitable efforts of individual bishops and nationally based Catholic aid and development organizations such as CATHOLIC CHARITIES USA.

Cor Unum has also worked closely with non-Catholic charities, the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, and UNITED NATIONS agencies promoting aid and development. In addition, the papal organization has been the pope's arm of assistance to apply timely material and spiritual salve to the many peoples who have suffered from natural disasters.

Origins. Cor Unum is based on the principle espoused by St. Luke in the ACTS OF THE APOSTLES (4:32) that the entire church of baptized FAITHFUL is to be made of one heart and one SOUL. The organization is predicated on the belief that we are our brother's keeper, a belief that Giovanni Battista Montini, the future Pope Paul VI, witnessed his father, Giorgio Montini, put into action during political involvement in the future pope's boyhood home of Brescia, Italy. This example may have encouraged Paul VI to seek to apply his Catholicism to social action throughout his life.

Cor Unum was part of Paul VI's effort to continue on the path of his predecessor, Pope JOHN XXIII, regarding the Church's AGGIORNAMENTO, or dialogue and engagement with the world. In his speech of September 6, 1963, Paul VI had expressed a wish to fulfill the promise of Vatican II by offering a "preferential place to the practice of charity to our neighbor," a place rooted in "the inner contemplative life" (Levillain 2002, p. 1138). The pope had spoken of his great concern for human development also in his March 26, 1967, social encyclical, Populorum progressio (On the Development of Peoples), in which he beseeched the developed world to assist the developing world's peoples in their battles with famine, chronic disease, POVERTY, and illiteracy.

History and Charitable Impact. Cor Unum distributes millions of dollars in assistance annually to help alleviate the suffering of the world's many victims of war, famine, and natural disaster. In the year of its founding, 1971, Cor Unum helped to coordinate the raising of more than $10 million by Roman Catholic charities for the relief of victims of the Indian-Pakistani war. Cor Unum has promoted peace and human development worldwide and is responsible for distributing the pope's annual Lenten message about charity.

Cor Unum oversees two charitable foundations established by Pope JOHN PAUL II: the Foundation for the Sahel, founded in 1984 to provide funds to fight drought and desertification in Africa, and the Populorum Progressio Foundation, established in 1992 to aid indigenous and racially mixed people and poor farmers in Latin America. In addition, Cor Unum has published numerous documents, some favoring the provision of nutrition and hydration to patients in a persistent vegetative state, a view confirmed by Pope John Paul II and the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith.

In 1995, John Paul II appointed German archbishop Paul Cordes (1935–) as president of Cor Unum, replacing Roger Cardinal ETCHEGARAY, a French cardinal who also headed the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace. As president of Cor Unum, Archbishop Cordes, who was elevated to the cardinalate on October 17, 2007, personally traveled to disaster areas regularly to extend both a papal blessing and a financial donation.

Through the auspices of Cor Unum, the Holy See's donations to charities internationally topped $1 million annually starting in 1997 and reached almost $4 million in 2003. In 1998, Cor Unum announced the Panis Caritatis (Bread of Charity) project, in which an Italian flour-milling company pledged to sell discounted flour mix to bakers through the year 2000 to encourage them to donate their savings to Cor Unum. The initiative also asked families to eat a special loaf of bread whose shape commemorated Jesus and his twelve apostles as a symbol of Christian fellowship. The resulting 700 million lire in donations were used to fund Cor Unum projects to rebuild homes in Rwanda, to bring famine relief to the Sudan, and to build bread ovens in the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

In 1999, Cor Unum sponsored at the Vatican a four-day conference on charity attended by 200 people, including religious leaders and members of charities, from seventy nations. Cor Unum published The Acts of the World Congress on Charity as well as an updated Catholic Aid Directory, a listing of about 1,100 charitable agencies, later that year. During the year, Archbishop Cordes visited Albania, Macedonia, and Kosovo to encourage peaceful coexistence and rebuilding. With Cor Unum's support, Catholic relief agencies pledged about $30 million for reconstruction programs in Kosovo and for assistance in the repatriation of Kosovar refugees.

Contemporary Contribution. In 2000, the president of Cor Unum met with survivors of earthquakes in Taiwan and Colombia. He also visited with survivors of flooding and with church leaders in Mozambique and in Aosta, in northern Italy, bringing papal donations, recovery coordination, and international attention to both locales. In that same year, the Vatican announced that the John Paul II Foundation for the Sahel had provided $13 million in project funding since its foundation in 1984. Half of the foundation's 200 projects had trained people to combat drought and desertification in nine African countries; the other half of the projects had financed developments in agriculture and health. It was also announced that the Populorum Progressio Foundation had donated $9 million toward 200 projects that supported the agricultural development and health of indigenous and other poor farmers in Latin America since the organization's establishment in 1992.

In the year 2000 alone, in the name of the pope, Cor Unum distributed $1,211,600 in emergency assistance to victims of flood, drought, war, volcanic eruption, earthquake, hurricane, typhoon, famine, displacement, and/or disability in twenty-eight nations. Cor Unum also donated $555,100 toward education, social assistance, water purification, orphan relief, debt relief, AIDS care, counseling, and/or health initiatives in twenty-three nations. The pontifical council also encouraged dioceses in wealthy nations to support the development endeavors of the dioceses in poor nations in an ongoing project titled "The 100 Projects of the Holy Father." Cor Unum also made plans to expand the Panis Caritatis program to other parts of Europe and to parts of South America.

In 2001, Archbishop Cordes traveled to El Salvador to meet with the nation's president as well as with the leaders of Catholic aid agencies and various nongovernmental organizations to assist earthquake victims in that nation. The Cor Unum president also gave $100,000 on behalf of the pope to assist in the recovery effort.

In 2004, the Vatican donated more than $9 million in emergency aid and development assistance through Cor Unum. A total of $310,000 in Vatican funds was earmarked as part of a Catholic relief effort of several million dollars for regions of Southeast Asia and East Africa devastated by a December 2004 tsunami. Other Vatican monies assisted flood victims in the Dominican Republic and Haiti as well as disaster victims elsewhere. Over $2.8 million was spent on development projects that supported health care, education, and agriculture. The Vatican sent almost $130,000 as part of a Catholic commitment of more than $1 million by Catholic relief agencies to assist the war weary in Darfur, Sudan. Archbishop Cordes met with both political and Catholic leaders in Khartoum, Sudan's capital, and visited refugee camps in the Sudan with the assistance of United Nations officials. Cor Unum also assisted Cross International Catholic Outreach in aiding earthquake victims in Iran.

In that same year, at the prompting of Cor Unum, the Vatican released a postage stamp commemorating children with AIDS, with revenue from the sale of the stamp underwriting the Children of God Relief Institute in Kenya, which provides for the medical treatment, schooling, and maintenance of orphans with AIDS in Kenya.

In 2005, Cor Unum sponsored the International Conference on Charity, attended by about 200 heads of Catholic charitable agencies from around the world, an event that received added attention because of the planned release of Pope BENEDICT XVI's first encyclical, Deus caritas est (God Is Love), during the same week. Archbishop Cordes was a major contributor to the encyclical, which explored the interconnection between true LOVE and charity, and was present at its release at a January 25, 2005, Vatican press conference. The encyclical held that the Church's charity was "not just an organization like other philanthropic organizations" but was rooted in the Christian faithful's mirroring of God's love (Thavis 2006). Archbishop Cordes said of the encyclical, "Those we help need not be Catholic, but it must be clear that we love and care for them because we are Catholic" (Wooden 2007). While in favor of technical expertise in responding to disaster, Archbishop Cordes maintains that the toughest task for Catholic charities is not obtaining funds but "the temptation to limit charity to a technical procedure" (Wooden 2007).

During that year, Archbishop Cordes visited New Orleans and other disaster sites after Hurricane Katrina to demonstrate the pope's compassion and met with former U.S. president Bill Clinton to discuss Catholic relief efforts. Monsignor Giovanni Dal Toso, undersecretary of Cor Unum, traveled to the tsunami-stricken, mostly Muslim, Aceh Province of Indonesia to extend aid on behalf of Archbishop Cordes, who was visiting other parts of Indonesia. Archbishop Cordes also attended a Sarajevo conference of Balkan Catholic bishops attended by European officials to encourage peace in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

In 2006, Cor Unum hosted at the Vatican the World Conference on Charity, which evaluated the activities of Catholic charities within the perspective of Pope Benedict's 2005 encyclical, Deus caritas est. Archbishop Cordes subsequently spoke at three U.S. cities to call attention to the pope's encyclical. During the year, Cor Unum dispersed more than $8 million to disaster victims around the world. In 2007, Archbishop Cordes met with Russian Orthodox Patriarch Alexy II (1929–) of Moscow to enhance the coordination of cooperative efforts by Catholic and Orthodox charities.

SEE ALSO Charity, Works of; Deus Caritas Est; Doctrine of the Faith, Congregation for the; Mercy, Works of; Pontifical Councils; Populorum Progressio; Vatican Council II.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Benedict XVI, Deus caritas est, God Is Love (Encyclical, 2005), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/benedict_xvi/encyclicals/documents/ (accessed March 27, 2008).

"Catholic Agencies Provide $500 Million in Aid," America, Feb. 7, 2005 (192, 4), p. 5. (anonymous author)

Catholic News Service, available from http://www.catholicnews.com (accessed April 13, 2008).

"Cor Unum: Charity Makes God's Presence Known," America, May 29, 1999 (180, 19), p. 5. (anonymous author)

"Cross International Launches Multi-Million Dollar Tsunami Relief Program Within Days of Disaster," National Catholic Reporter, March 11, 2005 (41, 19), p. 8A. (anonymous author)

Jerry Filteau, "Bishop Skylstad Calls New Encyclical 'Profound'," Catholic News Service, Jan. 25, 2006, available from http://www.catholicnews.com/data/stories/cns/0600500.htm (accessed April 13, 2008).

Carol Glatz, "In Lenten Message, Pope Calls for Greater Concern for Children," Catholic News Service, Jan. 29, 2004, available from http://www.catholicnews.com/data/stories/cns/20040129.htm (accessed April 13, 2008).

Carol Glatz, "Pope Appeals for Aid for Millions Affected by Indian Ocean Disasters," Catholic News Service, Dec. 28, 2004, available from http://www.catholicnews.com/data/stories/cns/0407056.htm (accessed April 13, 2008).

Carol Glatz, "Pope Donates $100,000 Toward Relief Efforts in Flood-stricken Haiti," Catholic News Service, Sept. 27, 2004, available from http://www.catholicnews.com/data/stories/cns/0405279.htm (accessed April 13, 2008).

Carol Glatz, "Pope Sends Envoy to Sudan, Calls for Greater Protection for People," Catholic News Service, July 22, 2004, available from http://www.catholicnews.com/data/stories/cns/0404036.htm (accessed April 13, 2008).

John Hooper, "Give Until It Doesn't Hurt, says Vatican John Hooper in Rome on a Miracle of Loaves Where the More you Eat the Less Others Starve," The Guardian, Manchester, U.K., Oct. 1, 1998, p. 15.

John Paul II, Pastor bonus (Apostolic Constitution, 1988), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/apost_constitutions/documents/ (accessed March 27, 2008).

"JPII Donated More than $9 Million to Charity in 2004, Vatican Says," Catholic News Service, April 19, 2005, available from http://www.catholicnews.com/data/briefs/cns/20050419.htm (accessed April 13, 2008).

Philippe Levillain, "Paul VI," The Papacy—An Encyclopedia, vol. 2 (New York 2002), pp. 1131–1145.

New York Times, available from http://www.nytimes.com (accessed April 30, 2008).

"Papal Envoy Says U.S. Must Not Be Abandoned During Katrina Recovery," Catholic News Service, Sept. 19, 2005, available from http://www.catholicnews.com/data/briefs/cns/20050919.htm (accessed April 13, 2008).

Paul VI, Amoris officio, Establishing the Pontifical Council "Cor Unum" for Promoting Human and Christian Development (Pontifical Letter, 1971), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/paul_vi/apost_letters/documents/ (accessed March 27, 2008).

Paul VI, Populorum progressio, On the Development of Peoples (Encyclical, 1967), available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/paul_vi/encyclicals/documents/ (accessed March 27, 2008).

Pontifical Council "Cor Unum," available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/pontifical_councils/corunum/corunum_en/ (accessed March 27, 2008).

Stephen Steele, "Vatican Official Says Aid Agencies Show Compassion, Don't Proselytize", Catholic News Service, Feb. 1, 2005, available from http://www.catholicnews.com/data/stories/cns/0500587.htm (accessed April 13, 2008).

John Thavis, "Pope Says First Encyclical Explores Dimensions of Love, Charity," Catholic News Service, Jan. 18, 2006, available from http://www.catholicnews.com/data/stories/cns/0600292.htm (accessed April 13, 2008).

"Vatican Delegation Tours Devastated Regions of Gulf Coast," Catholic News Service, Sept. 13, 2005, available from http://www.catholicnews.com/data/briefs/cns/20050913.htm (accessed April 13, 2008).

"Vatican Official: Pope's Lenten Message Focuses on Relations with God," Catholic News Service, Feb. 13, 2007, available from http://www.catholicnews.com/data/briefs/cns/20070213.htm (accessed April 13, 2008).

"Vatican War Aid $10-Million," New York Times, Dec. 25, 1971, p. 30.

Paul Wilkes, "The Popemakers," New York Times, Dec. 11, 1994, pp. 62–101.

Cindy Wooden, "When Love Seeks Good of Others, It Can Change World, Pope Says," Catholic News Service, Jan. 23, 2006, available from http://www.catholicnews.com/data/stories/cns/0600386.htm (accessed April 13, 2008).

Cindy Wooden, "When Promoting Church Charities, Vatican Official Leads by Example," Catholic News Service, March 26, 2007, available from http://www.catholicnews.com/data/stories/cns/0701688.htm (accessed April 13, 2008).

Michael Andrews
Adjunct Professor, Department of History
St. John's University, New York
Associate Adjunct Professor, History and Political Science, Molloy College, Rockville Centre, New York (2010)

CORAZÓN TÉLLEZ ROBLES, MATILDE DEL SAGRADO, BL.

Foundress of the Daughters of Mary, Mother of the Church; b. Robledillo de la Vera, Spain, May 30, 1841; d. Don Benito, Spain, December 17, 1902; beatified March 21, 2004, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

Matilde Téllez Robles, the second of four children of Félix Téllez Gómez and Basilea Robles Ruiz, displayed great religious devotion as a youth. Her father, a notary, moved the family to Béjar in the province of Salamanca in 1851. There, Matilde joined the Association of the Daughters of Mary, now known as the Vicentian Marian Youth, and was elected president. Though Téllez wanted to dedicate herself completely to God through the religious life, her father wanted her to marry. Still, her constant longing for prayer before the Blessed Sacrament and service to the poor eventually led him to acquiesce, and she, along with eight friends from the Daughters of Mary, began to make plans for the founding of a religious institute.

Acquiring a house in Béjar, they decided to officially begin the institute on March 19, 1875, the feast of St. JOSEPH; however, the only two women who came were Téllez and María Briz. Undismayed, the women began their prayer and service under the original name of Lovers of Jesus and Daughters of Mary Immaculate. They dedicated themselves to both contemplation and action: Eucharistic adoration became the source for their service to orphans, the poor, the sick, and the homebound. In time, Téllez opened a novitiate in Don Benito, the province of Badajoz, and began a school for children.

On March 19, 1884, the institute was raised to the level of a congregation by Bishop Pedro Casas y Souto, and the group took the name Daughters of Mary, Mother of the Church. Three months later, on June 29, Téllez and her sisters made their religious profession.

In 1885 the plague struck Badajoz, and the Daughters began to care for the sick. Téllez's original companion, Briz, died from the disease in Don Benito. Nevertheless, the new congregation grew with another foundation in Cáceres in 1889. As mother, Téllez guided the growth of the community, nurturing the devotion to the Eucharist and care for the poor in every sister.

At the age of sixty-one, Téllez suffered a stroke and died two days later on December 17, 1902. She was beatified by Pope John Paul II on March 21, 2004, in Rome, where the pontiff remarked that "her luminous witness is a call to live in adoration to God and in service to our brethren."

Feast: December 17.

SEE ALSO RELIGIOUS (MEN AND WOMEN); SPAIN, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

John Paul II, "Beatification of Four Servants of God" (Homily, March 21, 2004), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/homilies/2004/documents/hf_jp-ii_hom_20040321_beatifications_en.html (accessed November 23, 2009).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Matilde del Sagrado Corazón Téllez Robles (1841–1902)," Vatican Web site, March 21, 2004, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_lit_doc_20040321_robles_en.html (accessed November 23, 2009).

Brian Pedraza
Graduate Student
School of Theology and Religious Studies
The Catholic University of America (2010)

CROSS, THEOLOGY OF THE

"Theology of the cross" is an expression used by Martin LUTHER from 1518 to 1520 in opposing an alleged scholastic "theology of glory" that permits unbroken, direct access to God, be it by metaphysical speculation or by meritorious works.

Luther's Theology. The cross reveals God's love for sinners: Jesus bears their sin to justify them. Because God reveals Himself in Jesus crucified, He contradicts sinful human expectations and desires. Instead of a strong, glorious God we find a weak, suffering man. Since sin distorted visible creation's testimony to God, the revealed God supplies man's only sure knowledge. This insight Luther gathered from FAITH as the "conviction of things not seen" (Heb 11:1) and Paul's preaching of Jesus crucified, foolishness to the worldly wise, but God's wisdom (1 Cor 1:18–26). All self-justification collapses before this mystery; the sinner must confess the justness of God's condemnation of sin, and the truth of this confession of God's "alien work" justifies him. Yet Luther's stress on omnipotent providence postulates a hidden God beyond the revealed God, a God utterly free, not even bound by his word, a God who brings about sin and the sinner's death despite his revealed word, "I do not wish the sinner's death" (Ez 18:23). Only to faith is the apparent contradiction between the hidden and revealed God overcome as faith recognizes the risk of belief but adheres to God and his goodness even if He should destroy all men.

Christ of St. John of the Cross, 1951. © 2010 SALVADOR DALI, GALA-SALVADOR DALI FOUNDATION/ARTISTS RIGHTS SOCIETY (ARS), NEW YORK. © DACS/© CULTURE AND SPORT GLASGOW (MUSEUMS)/THE BRIDGEMAN ART LIBRARY

For Luther there is no revelation without concealment, and if self-revelation belongs to God's essence, so does self-concealment. God conceals Himself in his works; in bestowing suffering on believers He can appear as the DEVIL. For the devil is under his control and does his will. Though faith can be opposed to understanding, it also precedes understanding, and the greatest trial of faith in the experience of apparent abandonment generates the insight of how God works sub contrario ("under contrary appearances") in suffering. Though faith is contrary to experience, it produces experience. Believers experience the greatest peace in the midst of tribulation when they realize that it comes from God. True faith is always hidden like God, subject to trials, and never without suffering. For trials reveal how the justified sinner must in his nothingness stand before God, praying with empty hands. Thus the struggle between the old man and the new man continues. Through all trials the believer adheres to God's Word, Christ, and recognizes that his sufferings are one with Christ's. These sufferings are neither a human work nor a means to glory, but God's work in man. This insight supplies the basis of true HUMILITY, the recognition of one's own nothingness. It is not a human virtue, for true nothingness cannot merit.

Reinterpretation. In the wake of Friedrich SCHLEIERMACHER, who sought to awaken the God within through exterior preaching, nineteenth-century liberal theology considered Luther's theology of the cross a transient stage in the development of his theology of the word. When dialectical theology arose after World War I, Luther's theology of the cross was reinterpreted. Walther von Loewenich (1903–1992) argued that it remained central throughout Luther's theology. Though modern Protestant theology employs the cross to reject mysticism and natural theology, Rudolf BULTMANN's existentialism ignores Luther's historical reference to Jesus' cross and, consequently, justification through his alien work. Even Karl BARTH's CHRISTOCENTRISM lacks Luther's theology of creation. Where Barth points to Jesus crucified and finds a God utterly transcending man, Eberhard Jüngel (1933–) identifies in Jesus a God so immanent as to suffer in history. Jürgen Moltmann (1926–) lets God suffer in sympathy because of his solidarity with the man Jesus: the cross is not God's death but a death in God.

Though Catholic theology affirms Christ's cross as the sole redeeming cause of justification and the ultimate historical revelation of God's love, it does not reject natural theology lest thought should be deprived of a sure foundation and irrationality result. That would not only undercut the intelligibility needed for freedom's cooperation with grace but also undermine theology and eviscerate the meaning of DOGMA and Scripture. Human cooperation allows believers to grow in love of God by bearing suffering as they "fill up what is lacking to Christ's sufferings for the sake of his Body, the Church" (Col 1:24). Nonetheless, the conundrum presented to human thought by physical and moral evil manifests philosophy's insufficiencies and opens man to revelation. (Fides et ratio 23, 26, 33–34).

True mystics, such as JOHN OF THE CROSS, recognize how suffering joins them to Christ as they grow in love's response to Love. Though Catholic theologians and mystics may borrow the language of Neoplatonic participation, they are aware of its limitations. Christian mysticism does not obliterate finite personality because love preserves the greatest distinction in the greatest unity. Though maintaining man's ability to know God, Catholic theology also recognizes philosophy's limitations. Traditional Thomists recognize the transcendence of revealed mysteries, and transcendental Thomists place the paradoxical natural desire for the beatific vision at the center of theology.

Compassion in God. A late-twentieth-century shift in Catholic theology toward personalism and freedom allows such thinkers as Hans Urs von BALTHASAR and Joseph RATZINGER as well as the International Theological Commission (1981) to acknowledge a certain suffering or compassion in God; God transcends the opposition of mutable and immutable; sin offends Him, and the cross matters to Him. Dominum et vivificantem 39, 41, 45, interprets the cross as the historical manifestation of the offense to God's heart that man's sin caused; God feels the "pain" of sin and knows "compassion." No deficiency in God is implied, for his love, the basis of his compassion, is infinite. The shift to freedom as a basic category may allow ecumenical dialogue to overcome the opposition between Catholic acceptance and Protestant rejection of natural theology. God's infinite love cannot be captured in finite categories, yet love does not destroy the human words that indicate the central mystery of existence: the incarnate Son, the union of finite and Infinite, who reveals love in the midst of sin. Thus, Deus caritas est (3–12) insists on the profound unity of eros, the natural, ascending desire for fulfilling possession, and Christian agape, descending self-giving, but their unity is attained only by the purifying crucifixion of eros; for Christ's death culminates "that turning of God against Himself in which He gives Himself in order to raise man up and save him."

SEE ALSO DOMINUM ET VIVIFICANTEM; REDEMPTION (THEOLOGY OF); SIN (THEOLOGY OF); THOMISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Hans Urs von Balthasar, Mysterium Paschale: The Mystery of Easter, translated by Aidan Nichols (Edinburgh 1990).

Hans Urs von Balthasar, Theo-drama: Theological Dramatic Theory, translated by Graham Harrison, vols. 2 and 4 (San Francisco 1990, 1994).

Karl Barth, The Epistle to the Romans, translated by Edwyn C. Hoskyns (London 1933).

Hans Werner Bartsch, Kerygma and Myth: A Theological Debate, translated by Reginald H. Fuller (New York 1961).

Rudolf Bultmann, Existence and Faith: Shorter Writings of Rudolf Bultmann, translated by Schubert M. Ogden (New York 1960).

Maurizio Flick and Zoltán Alszeghy, Il mistero della croce: Saggio di teologia sistematica (Brescia, Italy 1978).

International Theological Commission, Theology, Christology, Anthropology, translated by Michaël Ledwith (Washington, D.C. 1983).

John Paul II, Salvifici doloris (Vatican City 1984).

Eberhard Jüngel, God as the Mystery of the World: On the Foundation of the Theology of the Crucified One in the Dispute between Theism and Atheism, translated by Darrell L. Guder (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1983).

Walther von Loewenich, Luther's Theology of the Cross, translated by Herbert J.A. Bouman (Minneapolis, Minn. 1976).

Jürgen Moltmann, The Crucified God: The Cross of Christ as the Foundation and Criticism of Christian Theology, translated by R.A. Wilson and John Bowden (New York 1974).

Regin Prenter, Luther's Theology of the Cross (Philadelphia 1970).

Joseph Ratzinger, Behold the Pierced One, translated by Graham Harrison (San Francisco 1986).

Rev. John M. McDermott SJ
Professor of Theology
Sacred Heart Major Seminary (2010)

CUAUHTLATOATZIN, JUAN DIEGO, ST.

Layman who according to tradition had visions of the Virgin Mary; b. c. 1474, Cuautitlán, Mexico; d. May 30, 1548, Tepeyac, Mexico; beatified by Pope John Paul II, May 6, 1990; canonized by Pope John Paul II, July 31, 2002.

According to tradition, Juan Diego is the name of the Native Mexican to whom the Virgin Mary appeared at Tepeyac, a hill outside of Mexico City, on December 9, 1531. According to this same tradition, Juan Diego's given name was Cuauhtlatoatzin, and he was born around 1474 in Cuautitlán, about twenty kilometers north of Tenochtitlán (Mexico City). He was married but had no children. When he and his wife were baptized in 1524, he took the name Juan Diego, and his wife the name María Lucía. The earliest written account (1649) of the apparitions, the Nican Mopohua, calls him a macehualli (poor Indian). In 1666, when a formal ecclesiastical inquiry was made into the apparitions, Juan Diego was described as being devout and religious even before his conversion. After this, he was said to have walked weekly to Tenochtitlán to attend Mass and receive catechetical instruction. When his wife died in 1529, he went to live with his uncle, Juan Bernardino. Juan Diego was fifty-seven at the time of the apparitions, and from then on he lived in a small room attached to the chapel that housed the image of Our Lady of GUADALUPE, as its custodian. In his latter years, many seeking aid from Our Lady asked him to intercede before the Blessed Virgin on their behalf. He is also said to have received special permission from the bishop to receive Communion three times a week. He died on May 30, 1548, at seventy-four years of age.

Although individuals and groups had begun calling for Juan Diego's canonization as early as 1888, the cause for his canonization and beatification was not officially opened until July 8, 1982. On May 6, 1990, at the Basilica of Our Lady of Guadalupe and in the presence of Pope JOHN PAUL II, he was recognized as blessed by means of an equivalent beatification with the reading of a decree (promulgated April 9) from the Sacred Congregation for the Causes of Saints. It recognized that public devotion to Juan Diego was a long tradition and approved an obligatory memorial for the archdiocese of Mexico City and an optional memorial for other dioceses. The decree set December 9, the date of the first apparition, as the day for the memorial.

Although written accounts exist from the sixteenth century that mention both the shrine and devotion to the Virgin of Guadalupe, the first written mention of Juan Diego is in the above cited Nican Mopohua. This so-called silencio guadalupano (Guadalupan silence) of more than a century has led some to question his historical existence. Such opinions, and the controversy that has followed them, can be traced at least as far back as 1794, to an essay written by Father Juan Bautista Muñoz (1745–1799). In 1996 media reports revealing similar skepticism on the part of the abbot of the Basilica of

Our Lady of Guadalupe. A mural of Juan Diego's encounter with the Blessed Virgin Mary. © DANITA DELIMONT/ALAMY

Guadalupe, Monsignor Guillermo Schulenburg Prado (1916–2009), reignited this controversy in Mexico and led to the abbot's resignation.

Because of the issues raised by Schulenburg Prado, Vincentian historian Stafford Poole, and others, the Congregation for the Causes of Saints required, in addition to a miracle through his intercession, an investigation into Juan Diego's historical existence. In 1998 the Congregation approved the report of a commission of historians, including Fidel González Fernández (1943–), Eduardo Chávez Sánchez (1956–), and José Luis Guerrero Rosado (1935–), that affirmed the historicity of Bl. Juan Diego. These three co-authored a volume the following year that presented the details of their case. In 2000 Asunción Garcia Samper of the Center of Guadalupe Studies also published a book to demonstrate that Juan Diego existed and was a nobleman. Despite these results, some still maintain that the existence of Juan Diego cannot be established on historical grounds.

Shortly after the beatification, the Archdiocese of Mexico began an inquiry into an alleged miraculous healing. On May 6, 1990, Juan José Barragán Silva (1970–) suffered massive head trauma after throwing himself off a balcony. He recovered rapidly after his mother prayed repeatedly for the Blessed's intercession. Following diocesan investigation, the Congregation for the Causes of Saints judged this to be a miraculous healing, and Pope John Paul II ratified their ruling on December 20, 2001. This fulfilled the final prerequisite for Juan Diego's canonization.

Presiding over the Mass of canonization at the Basilica of Guadalupe, Pope John Paul II enrolled Bl. Juan Diego in the catalogue of saints on July 31, 2002. In his homily, the Pope offered as an inspiration for promoting "greater justice and solidarity" among Mexico's diverse ethnic groups the newly canonized, who, "[i]n accepting the Christian message without forgoing his indigenous identity ... facilitated the fruitful meeting of two worlds and became the catalyst for the new Mexican identity, closely united to Our Lady of Guadalupe, whose mestizo face expresses her spiritual motherhood which embraces all Mexicans."

Feast: December 9.

SEE ALSO MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, DEVOTION TO; VISIONS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Center of Guadalupe Studies, El Mensajero de la Virgen (Mexico City 2000).

Fidel González Fernández, Eduardo Chávez Sánchez, and José Luis Guerrero Rosado, El Encuentro de la Virgen de Guadalupe y Juan Diego, 2nd ed. (Mexico City 1999).

John Paul II, "Canonization of Juan Diego Cuauhtlatoatzin," (Homily, July 31, 2002), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/homilies/2002/documents/hf_jp-ii_hom_20020731_canonization-mexico_en.html (accessed October 16, 2009).

Richard Nebel, Santa María Tonantzin, Virgen de Guadalupe: Continuidad y transformación religiosa en México, translated by Carlos Warnholtz Bustillos (Mexico City l995).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Juan Diego Cuauhtlatoatzin (1474–1548)," Vatican Web site, July 31, 2002, available (in Italian) from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_lit_doc_20020731_juan-diego_en.html (accessed October 16, 2009).

Stafford Poole, Our Lady of Guadalupe: The Origins and Sources of a Mexican National Symbol, l53l–l797 (Tucson, Ariz. l995).

Stafford Poole, The Guadalupan Controversies in Mexico (Stanford, Calif. 2006).

Luis Laso de la Vega, The Story of Guadalupe: Luis Laso de la Vega's Huei tlamahuiçoltica of l649, edited and translated by Lisa Sousa, Stafford Poole, and James Lockhart (Stanford, Calif. l998).

Rev. Jose Antonio Rubio
Director of Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs
Diocese of San Jose, Santa Clara, California

Mark J. DeCelles
Doctoral candidate
School of Theology and Religious Studies
The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.
(2010)

CUOMO, MARIO M.

Governor of New York; b. June 15, 1932, New York, N.Y.

As a leading figure in the Democratic Party, Mario Cuomo was one of the most prominent Catholics in American public life during the 1980s and 1990s. His 1984 speech at the University of Notre Dame remains a touchstone in the debate over the political responsibilities of American Catholics with respect to ABORTION and, more broadly, over the relation of religion to American politics.

Cuomo was born in the borough of Queens to Italian immigrant parents. After attending public school for his primary education, he attended St. John's Preparatory School, College, and Law School, and he obtained a law degree in 1956. This Vincentian education introduced him to the thought and example of two figures to whom he would later point as major influences, sixteenth-century English chancellor and MARTYR, Thomas MORE, and twentieth-century French Jesuit philosopher Pierre TEILHARD DE CHARDIN.

Following an unsuccessful bid for lieutenant governor in 1974, Cuomo was appointed New York secretary of state in 1975. In 1978 he won election as lieutenant governor under Governor Hugh Carey. He was elected governor of New York in 1982 and served three consecutive terms, ending in 1996.

Cuomo articulated his views on religion and public life in a 1983 speech at the Episcopal Cathedral of St. John the Divine in New York City. He explained that his Catholicism encouraged him to be involved in government but did not compel him "to impose a universal oath of religious allegiance, or a form of ritual, or even a life style." Instead, it urged him to use government "to move us toward the shared commitments that are basic to all forms of compassionate belief" (Tobin 1999, p. 34).

Cuomo delivered a well-received keynote address to the 1984 Democratic National Convention, which marked him as a prospective presidential candidate during several ensuing election cycles. He never formally entered the Democratic presidential primary, but he remained a nationally recognized figure in American politics throughout his gubernatorial tenure.

In the same year, John O'CONNOR was named archbishop of New York; he quickly became known for his vocal support of the pro-life movement as well as his more specific criticism of Governor Cuomo for signing a law permitting state funding of abortions through Medicaid. The current presidential campaign, meanwhile, pitted incumbent President Ronald Reagan against Democratic challenger Walter Mondale, whose vice-presidential running mate was a New York Catholic, Geraldine Ferraro. In the course of an election cycle featuring a pro-life, non-Catholic Republican and a pro-choice, Catholic Democrat, every statement by a Catholic bishop or politician was closely examined. It was in this context that Notre Dame theology department chair, Fr. Richard McBrien, invited Cuomo to address the university community on September 13, 1984.

Cuomo observed that the Church dictated "no inflexible moral principle which determines what our political conduct should be" (Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life). He pointed to the Church's toleration of existing civil law on DIVORCE and birth control as an indication that, "we are not required to insist that all our religious values be the law of the land" (Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life). Cuomo declared his private belief in the immorality of abortion but insisted that in a society where there was no consensus on the issue, the Catholic politician was not obligated to seek legislation enforcing that belief: "I believe that legal interdicting of abortion by either the federal government or the individual states is not a plausible possibility and even if it could be obtained, it wouldn't work" (Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life).

Cuomo qualified abortion's preeminence as a political issue by insisting that "Christian responsibility doesn't end with any one law or amendment" (Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life). Invoking the terminology of Cardinal Joseph BERNARDIN of Chicago, Cuomo asserted that the "seamless garment" approach, which emphasized issues such as nuclear weapons, hunger, and homelessness, in addition to abortion, "is a challenge to all Catholics in public office, conservatives as well as liberals" (Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life).

Some Catholic Democrats and others who perceived no conflict between pro-choice politics and Catholic faith heralded the speech as a masterful exposition of the role of Catholic politicians within a pluralist society. Critics viewed it as a faulty attempt to excuse Catholics in government (primarily though not exclusively those affiliated with the Democratic Party) for taking a pro-choice position despite the contradiction between that stance and the Church's official teaching.

In 2004, when Catholic John Kerry was running for president on the Democratic ticket, Kenneth Woodward criticized Cuomo's argument in the pages of Commonweal by positing that it continued to distort Catholic politicians' view of the relationship between morality and government. In contrast, E.J. Dionne praised the speech's prescience in a 2008 piece in Notre Dame's alumni magazine, in which he argued that by emphasizing social programs over legal penalties, Cuomo offered a way to "ease the culture wars."

The ongoing controversy over Cuomo's speech and public life testifies to his significance as an exemplar of one approach to the relationship between Catholic faith and politics in a pluralist nation. With respect to legal protection for the unborn, Cuomo's position is at odds with Church teaching as expressed in documents such as Pope JOHN PAUL II's Evangelium vitae (1995).

SEE ALSO EVANGELIUM VITAE; JESUITS; POLITICS, CHURCH AND; VINCENTIANS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

SPEECHES BY CUOMO

Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life, "Religious Belief and Public Morality: A Catholic Governor's Perspective," available from http://pewforum.org/docs/index.php?DocID=14 (accessed October 22, 2009).

"The Campaign for Governor," in Saints and Sinners: The American Catholic Experience through Stories, Memoirs, Essays, and Commentary, edited by Greg Tobin (New York 1999), 30–35.

BOOKS AND ARTICLES ABOUT CUOMO

E.J. Dionne, "Religion's Reach and the Tides of Change: One Catholic Citizen's Survey of the Shifting Political Landscape," Notre Dame Magazine 37, no. 2 (Summer 2008): 44–48.

Robert P. George and William L. Saunders, "The Failure of Catholic Political Leadership," Crisis 18 (April 2000): 17–22.

Robert S. McElvaine, Mario Cuomo: A Biography (New York 1988).

John T. McGreevy, Catholicism and American Freedom: A History (New York 2003).

Peter Steinfels, A People Adrift: The Crisis of the Roman Catholic Church in America (New York 2003).

Kenneth L. Woodward, "Catholics, Politics, and Abortion: My Argument with Mario Cuomo," Commonweal (September 24, 2004): 11–13.

Kevin E. Schmiesing
Research Fellow, Acton Institute
Executive Director, CatholicHistory.net
Sidney, Ohio (2010)

CURCI, CARLO MARIA

Priest of the Society of Jesus; b. Naples, Italy, September 4, 1809; d. Careggi (outside Florence), June 8, 1891.

Carlo Curci was the chief founder and first director of the Jesuit journal Civiltà Cattolica, which first appeared in Naples in April 1850 at the suggestion of Pope PIUS IX (1846–1878; called Pio Nono in Italian). He entered the Society of Jesus in 1826 and was ordained a priest a decade later. Initially, Curci was positively inclined toward the RISORGIMENTO, the movement for Italian unification, and he especially appreciated the work of the priest, philosopher, political figure, and Italian patriot Vincenzo GIOBERTI (1801–1852). Curci was particularly impressed and persuaded by Gioberti's Del primato morale e civile degli Italiani (On the Moral and Civil Primacy of the Italians, 1843), for which he wrote the preface for one edition. He seconded Gioberti's call for the Piedmontese and the papacy to jointly create and then preside over an Italian federation. Thus, Curci firmly believed in the neo-Guelph movement, which sought to reconcile the preservation of the temporal power (the Papal State) with some form of Italian independence and unification.

The Founding of La Civiltà Cattolica. The revolutionary events of 1848, which provoked revolutions in much of Europe, inspired revolution in Rome in mid-November 1848. This led Pius IX to flee from his state and subjects the evening of November 24, 1848. The formation of the Roman Republic and the threat posed to the papacy as well as the criticism of the JESUITS by Gioberti in Il Gesuita Moderno (The Modern Jesuit, 1847) led Curci to abandon his liberal and national sentiments and adopt an increasingly cautious and conservative course. This was reflected in his response to Gioberti, Fatti ed argomenti in risposta alle molte parole di Vincenzo Gioberti (Facts and Arguments in Response to the Many Words of Vincenzo Gioberti), in which he defended his order, which had been forced to leave ROME, and rejected the notion that churchmen should make themselves the apostles of national regeneration and political revolution. Back in Naples, with the encouragement of Pius IX and the collaboration of fellow Jesuits Matteo LIBERATORE (1810–1892) and Luigi TAPARELLI D'AZEGLIO (1793–1862), he founded La Civiltà Cattolica, which defended the temporal power of the PAPACY and denounced the liberalism and nationalism that threatened it. In a series of lengthy articles, the writers of this journal emphasized the crucial role of religion in the perfection of life.

Following the defeat of Giuseppe GARIBALDI, the collapse of Giuseppe Mazzini's Roman Republic, and the restoration of Pius IX through the intervention of the French, Spanish, Neapolitan and Austrian forces, the fortnightly review, which reflected papal positions, moved to Rome in 1850. In its pages, and in a series of separate publications, Curci proved an ardent defender of the temporal power. In 1849 alone he published Sette libere parole di un italiano sull'Italia (Seven Free Words of an Italian on Italy), La demagogia italiana ed il Papa Re (Italian Demagogy and the Pope King), and La questione romana nell'Assemblea francese (The Roman Question in the French Assembly). In the two decades that followed, Curci continued his conservative course and campaigned against the ideologies that had emerged from the FRENCH REVOLUTION, adopted by the Risorgimento, and threatened Catholic culture and the Papal State. However, he did not adopt the intransigent stance and violent tone of subsequent editors and writers of the journal he had founded. He also opposed their occasional tendency to resort to ANTI-JUDAISM to combat the enemies of the journal, the Jesuits, and the papacy.

In 1870, while VATICAN COUNCIL I (1869–1870) was in session, the Franco-Prussian War erupted, much to the consternation of Pius IX. French defeats at the hands of the Prussians necessitated the recall of the French forces remaining in the remnant of the Papal State (mainly Rome and its immediate environs) that had not been incorporated into the Kingdom of Italy, which was proclaimed in 1861. The Italians took advantage of this situation to march into Rome and make it their capital, to the consternation of Pio Nono, who protested by locking himself in the VATICAN, where he died in 1878. At the same time, the Civiltà Cattolica moved from Rome to FLORENCE, where it was published from 1870 to 1887, when it returned to Rome.

Conflict with the Curia. In May 1871 the Italian government passed the Law of Papal Guarantees, which sought to regulate relations between the Kingdom of Italy and the HOLY SEE. At this point, Curci began to question the intransigent stance of Pius IX and the Curia, who hoped that some power would intervene to restore Rome to the papacy. In fact, the papacy found itself in conflict not only with the Italian State but also with the newly created German Empire, where it had to confront the KULTURKAMPF (culture struggle). The papacy's close identification with the monarchist cause in France alienated Republicans, and they would soon initiate a series of anticlerical measures. A sense of realism, a resurgent Italian patriotism, and a conviction that the papal opposition to the Italian State created an internal crisis for conscientious Catholics who were also patriotic Italians led Curci to advocate reconciliation with Italy. His call did not strike a responsive chord in the Curia, however.

The Vatican adhered to the non expedit issued earlier (and confirmed and renewed in 1874), which proclaimed that it was "not expedient" for Catholics to participate in the political life of the Italian Kingdom, which had deprived the Church of the temporal power essential for its independence. Curci and others questioned its validity and binding nature, and in 1877 the non expedit was converted into the non licet, an absolute prohibition of Catholic participation in Italian political life. This policy distressed Curci, who commenced a public campaign to alter the Vatican's political policy toward Italy. In 1878 he published Il Moderno Dissidio tra la Chiesa e l'Italia (The Modern Disagreement between the Church and Italy), in which he once again supported reconciliation between the Church and the state. When this work failed to elicit a positive response, he published La nuova Italia ed I vecchi Zelanti (The New Italy and the Old Zealots) in 1881, followed by Il Vaticano Regio (The Vatican Kingdom) in 1883.

Curci's criticism of papal policies enraged the Vatican and embarrassed his order, from which he was suspended in 1877. The Holy Office responded by placing his critical volumes on the Index Librorum Prohibitorum (ILP, or INDEX OF PROHIBITED BOOKS), which Catholics were forbidden to read or even own. Subsequently, Curci, who had been suspended from the right to officiate as a priest, reluctantly accepted the critique of the Holy Office and disavowed some of the positions he had assumed in his writings and publications. Readmitted into the Jesuits just before his death, he was no longer the optimist of his youth. This is reflected in his memoirs, which were published posthumously in 1891 and subtitled Memorie utili di una vita disutile (Useful Memories of a Useless Life).

SEE ALSO ITALY, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; ROMAN QUESTION; VATICAN CITY, STATE OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Frank J. Coppa, "Italy: The Church and the Risorgimento," in The Cambridge History of Christianity, vol. 8, World Christianities c.1815-c.1914, edited by Sheridan Gilley and Brian Stanley (New York 2006), 233–249.

Carlo M. Curci, Memorie del Padre Curci: Memorie utili di una vita disutile (Florence, Italy 1891).

Antonio Ferrua, "Il 'primo progetto' della Civiltà Cattolica," La Civiltà Cattolica 3 (1971): 258–267.

Giandomenico Mucci, Il primo direttore della "Civiltà Cattolica" (Rome 1986).

Giandomenico Mucci and Carlo Maria Curci, Il fondatore della "Civiltà Cattolica" (Rome 1998).

Frank J. Coppa
Professor of History
St. John's University, New York (2010)

CURCIO, MARIA CROCIFISSA, BL.

Foundress of the Carmelite Missionary Sisters of St. Thérèse of the Child Jesus; b. January 30, 1877, Ispica, Italy; d. July 4, 1957, Saint Santa Marinella, Italy; beatified November 13, 2005, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

Born the seventh of ten children of Salvatore Curcio and Concetta Franzò, Maria Crocifissa Curcio grew up in a highly cultured home filled with books, but her father, a strict and moral man, did not believe in allowing his daughters to obtain higher education. So, although she loved learning, Maria had to leave school after sixth grade. Her determination and intelligence, however, led her to read widely from the family library.

There she discovered The Life of St. Teresa of Jesus and other religious books. Maria's spiritual study inspired her at age thirteen to enter the Carmelite Third Order in her town, in spite of her family's objections. To combine the contemplative and mystic nature of Mary with the hard work of Martha through apostolic service, she became a Missionary Carmel. St. Teresa's example inspired her throughout her life to do even the smallest deeds with love and dedication and to be humble and joyful in all circumstances. Maria first stayed in a community with several others in a small apartment that had once belonged to her siblings. Later she went to Modica to oversee Carmela Polara, a school for needy or orphaned girls, but she spent several years struggling to gain support for the school.

When she visited Rome on May 17, 1925, for the canonization of St. Thérèse of the Child Jesus, she loved the beauty of a small nearby town, Santa Marinella, and, seeing the poverty there, wanted to remain to help. A few months later, on July 3, Cardinal Antonio Vico of the Diocese of Porto Santa Rufina gave her permission to start a community. On July 16, 1926, she obtained the decree of affiliation with the Carmelite Order. It took until 1930, though, before the Church recognized her small group, the Carmelite Missionary Sisters of St. Thérèse of the Child Jesus.

She instilled her mission into her religious daughters—to give of themselves in service of abandoned youths and to restore their dignity as children of God. The sisters worked throughout Italy, and in 1947 she also sent missionaries to Brazil and Malta. After her death, other communities were established in Canada, Tanzania, the Philippines, and Romania.

In spite of her own suffering from diabetes and poor health, she continued to set an example to her sisters both through her prayer life, her acceptance of God's will, and her giving spirit. When she died on July 4, 1957, at the age of eighty, she left behind a legacy of love and HOLINESS. Her BEATIFICATION, which was to take place in April 2005, had to be postponed due to the death of Pope JOHN PAUL II. Pope Benedict XVI declared her "Blessed" on November 13, 2005, and established her memorial as July 4.

Feast: July 4.

SEE ALSO CARMELITE SISTERS; ITALY, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; THÉRÈSE DE LISIEUX, ST.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Benedict XVI, "Apostolic Letter by which the Supreme Pontiff Benedict XVI Has Raised to the Glory of the Altars the Servants of God: Charles de Foucauld, Maria Pia Mastena, Maria Crocifissa Curcio," (Apostolic Letter, November 13, 2005), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/benedict_xvi/apost_letters/documents/hf_ben-xvi_apl_20051113_beatification_en.html (accessed October 23, 2009).

CITOC: Office of Communications of the Carmelite Order, "New Date for the Beatification of Mother M. Crocifissa Curcio, Curia Generalis Carmelitarum, September 2005," available from http://carmelites.info/citoc/citoc/julyseptember2005/citoc_magazine_julyseptember2005_news_2.htm#New%20Date%20for%20the%20Beatification%20of%20Mother%20M.%20Crocifissa%20Curcio (accessed July 28, 2009).

General Curia of Carmelites, "Maria Crocifissa Curcio," available from http://www.ocarm.org/pls/ocarm/v3_s2ew_consultazione.mostra_paginat0?id_pagina=671 (accessed October 23, 2009).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Maria Crocifissa Curcio (1877–1957)," Vatican Web site, November 13, 2005, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_lit_doc_20050424_curcio_en.html (accessed October 23, 2009).

Laurie J. Edwards
Independent Scholar
Reidsville, N.C. (2010)

CURRAN, CHARLES

Priest, moral theologian; b. Rochester, N.Y., 1934.

Charles E. Curran, S.T.L., S.T.D., is a Catholic moral theologian embroiled in a complex controversy concerning Catholic moral teaching. He attended the NORTH AMERICAN COLLEGE (seminary) in ROME and was ordained a priest for the diocese of Rochester in 1958. In 1961 he received two doctorates, one from the Pontifical GREGORIAN UNIVERSITY and the other from the Accademia Alfonsiana in Rome, and in 1965 he accepted a teaching position in the School of Theology at The CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA. Some of the positions he espoused and taught created considerable controversy.

Curran's open opposition to the Church's position on artificial CONTRACEPTION resulted in a decision in April 1967 by Catholic University's board of trustees not to renew his teaching contract. Curran's dismissal triggered a university-wide protest by both faculty and students that attracted national publicity and brought about his reinstatement (with tenure and a promotion to associate professor). This event placed Curran at the forefront of Catholic DISSENT on the subject of birth control. During the summer of 1968, Curran, with other Catholic University colleagues and several other American theologians, crafted a response to Pope PAUL VI's recently issued ENCYCLICAL Humanae vitae that opposed the encyclical's condemnation of artificial contraception and asserted that "good Catholics could in theory and in practice reject its conclusion" (Curran 2006, p. 50). Six hundred theologians, including one of the leading contemporary Catholic moral theologians, Bernard HÄRING, ultimately signed the document.

Curran's argument centered on the issues of the possibility of dissent from non-infallible Church teaching and the NATURAL LAW defense of the encyclical's position. According to Curran, the encyclical was not an ex cathedra statement; therefore, it should not be considered infallible, and it should be subject to evaluation by Catholic theologians. Curran took the position that Catholics could disagree in theory and in practice with non-infallible church teachings when there were sufficient reasons to do so, while still remaining loyal and dedicated members of the Church. Curran concluded that Catholics "could responsibly decide to use birth control if it were necessary to preserve and foster the values and sacredness of their marriage" (Curran 2006, p. 52).

During the 1970s, Curran continued to lecture and to publish his views on birth control and other controversial topics, such as ABORTION, DIVORCE, and HOMOSEXUALITY. In August 1979, Curran was informed that he had been under investigation by the Congregation for the DOCTRINE OF THE FAITH for several years. Curran responded to the congregation's observations on his teachings twice, in 1981 and in 1982. In June 1983, Curran was again invited to respond to the congregation's concerns about his public dissent, which he did in 1984.

However, Curran's public positions on the issues of birth control, sterilization, abortion, homosexuality, MASTURBATION, premarital intercourse, and divorce remained of concern to the Church. In September 1985, Cardinal Joseph RATZINGER, prefect of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, issued a letter to Curran asking that he retract his positions on these issues to continue teaching Catholic theology in the name of the Church. Curran, in negotiations with Archbishop James HICKEY, the chancellor of Catholic University, and Cardinal Joseph BERNARDIN, the chair of the university's board of trustees, agreed to accept a Church document pointing out his theological errors if the Church would permit him to continue to teach as a Catholic theologian; but he would not retract his positions.

In March 1986, Curran met with Cardinal Ratzinger in Rome. Some months later, in July, Curran received a letter from Ratzinger, which stated that, with the approval of the POPE, the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith had decided that Curran could "no longer be considered suitable nor eligible to exercise the function of a Professor of Catholic Theology" (Goldman 1986). On the basis of this decision of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, the Board of Trustees of The Catholic University of America decided that Curran could no longer teach theology at the university (although he would be able to teach in another area). Curran responded by initiating a lawsuit against the university for breech of contract and failure to acknowledge his ACADEMIC FREEDOM. In February 1989, the court ruled against Curran.

Curran has emerged as a leading spokesperson for the right to dissent from non-infallible Catholic teachings. He has also challenged traditional perceptions of academic freedom and the role of the Catholic theologian, while addressing such issues as MORALITY, ETHICS, and Catholic MORAL THEOLOGY. Since 1991, he has been the Elizabeth Scurlock University Professor of Human Values at Southern Methodist University. He has served as president of the CATHOLIC THEOLOGICAL SOCIETY OF AMERICA, the Society of Christian Ethics, and the American Theological Society. He was the first recipient of the John Courtney MURRAY Award for Theology, in 1972. In 2003 Curran received the Presidential Award of the COLLEGE THEOLOGY SOCIETY, recognizing a lifetime of scholarly achievements in moral theology, and in 2005, Call to Action—a reform movement of 25,000 Catholics—presented him with its leadership award. Regarding his priesthood, he has written that although his primary role has been that of theologian and teacher, he still considers himself, and is looked upon by others, as a Catholic priest (Curran 2006, pp. 253–254).

SEE ALSO CALL TO ACTION CONFERENCE; EX CATHEDRA; EX CORDE ECCLESIAE; FAITH AND MORALS; INFALLIBILITY; MORAL EDUCATION; MORAL THEOLOGY, HISTORY OF (TRENDS SINCE VATICAN II); RELIGION AND MORALITY; SEX; WOMEN AND PAPAL TEACHING; HUMANAE VITAE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Paul Collins, "Loyal Dissent and Freedom: Charles Curran," in The Modern Inquisition: Seven Prominent Catholics and Their Struggles with the Vatican (Woodstock, N.Y. 2002), 3:46–79.

Charles E. Curran, Loyal Dissent: Memoir of a Catholic Theologian (Washington, D.C. 2006).

Ari L. Goldman, "Vatican Curbs U.S. Theologian over Liberal Views on Sex Issues," New York Times, August 19, 1986, available from http://query.nytimes.com/gst/fullpage.html?res=9A0DEED61138F93AA2575BC0A960948260&sec=health&spon=&pagewanted=print (accessed March 29, 2008).

Robert Wister, "The Curran Controversy," in The Encyclopedia of American Catholic History, edited by Michael Glazier and Thomas J. Shelley (Collegeville, Minn. 1997).

Susan A. Maurer
Adjunct Instructor
St. John's University, Jamaica, N.Y. (2010)

CZARTORYSKI, AUGUSTO, BL.

Also known as Augustus; priest of the Salesians of Don Bosco; b. August 2, 1858, Paris, France; d. April 8, 1893, Alassio, Italy; beatified April 25, 2004, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

Augusto Czartoryski, the firstborn son of Prince Ladislaus of Poland and Princess Maria Amparo of Spain, was destined to be a prince. Following the Russian occupation of Poland, his family spent thirty years in exile in France, where he was born. Though in exile, the family remained influential with the Polish people and worked for the unity of Poland.

Augusto's mother died of tuberculosis when he was six years old, and he contracted the disease from her. His father then married Margaret d'Orléans, daughter of the count of Paris. During Augusto's teen years, he went to school in both Poland and France, but his health often interrupted his studies. Though he and his father traveled to many countries seeking a cure, Augusto remained in ill health for the rest of his brief life. Young Augusto had little interest in worldly pleasures but cared about spiritual things, so his tutor Joseph KALINOWSKI (later venerated as a saint) suggested a priest should educate him. His father agreed and asked Fr. Stanislaus Kubowicz to teach his son.

When Augusto was twenty-five, he met Don Bosco, founder of the SALESIANS, and felt sure of God's call to become a Salesian. His father, who had already planned his marriage, opposed the decision. Don Bosco did not want to accept Augusto, but Pope LEO XIII insisted. In July 1887, at age twenty-nine, Augusto began his novitiate, which was a difficult adjustment for one used to luxury, but he became known for his HUMILITY.

Augusto's father pressured him to accept his nobility and continue the family line. Prince Ladislaus appealed to Augusto to consider his health and even approached the cardinal to have his son released from his vows, but Augusto refused to deny God's calling. On April 2, 1892, the bishop of Ventimiglia ordained Augusto, but his father did not attend the service. Later, Prince Ladislaus came to accept his son's decision.

Fr. Augusto did not live long after his ordination. Little more than a year later, on April 8, 1893, he died at the age of thirty-four. On April 25, 2004, Pope John Paul II beatified him along with four women religious and one laywoman, calling them "eloquent examples of how the Lord transforms the existence of believers when they trust in him." In his homily, John Paul II stressed Fr. Augusto's faithfulness to God's calling and his willingness to take up the life of poverty. John Paul also held up Fr. Augusto as an example for young people to follow when they ask for the Holy Spirit's guidance.

Feast: April 8.

SEE ALSO Beatification; Religious (Men and Women); Poverty, Religious.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Catholic Online, "Bl. Augusto Czartoryski (1858–1893)," Saints and Angels, available from http://www.catholic.org/saints/saint.php?saint_id=5749 (accessed October 24, 2009).

Direzione Generale Opere Don Bosco, "Blessed Augustus Czartoryski (1858–1893)," available from http://www.sdb.org/ENG/Pagine/_2_12_18_15_.htm (accessed October 24, 2009).

John Paul II, "Beatification of Six Servants of God," (Homily, April 25, 2004), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/homilies/2004/documents/hf_jp-ii_hom_20040425_beatifications_en.html (accessed October 24, 2009).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Augusto Czartoryski (1858–1893): Priest of the Salesians of Don Bosco," Vatican Web site, April 25, 2004, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_lit_doc_20040425_czartoryski_en.html (accessed October 24, 2009).

Laurie J. Edwards
Independent Scholar
Reidsville, N.C. (2010)

D

D'ANNUNZIO, GABRIELE

Italian literary, political, and military figure; b. March 12, 1863, Pescara, Abruzzo, Italy; d. March 1, 1938, Gardone Riviera, Lombardy, Italy.

Gabriele d'Annunzio was a literary phenomenon well known to the rest of society thanks to his accomplishments as a writer and genius for self-promotion. In the provincial society of Pescara, where he was born, the young d'Annunzio stood out as a precocious and brilliant student. His father was a successful merchant who regarded his son as a prodigy, made sure that he received an excellent education, and encouraged him to pursue fame and fortune. After being taught privately by priests, Gabriele attended the exclusive live-in Collegio Cicognini of Prato (1873–1880). It was run by JESUITS, but the faculty included lay teachers, and the curriculum was slanted toward the classics, with a strong emphasis on the study of Latin and Greek. An unruly but likable student, he gained the admiration of his teachers with his quick intelligence and enthusiasm for learning. Prato's proximity to FLORENCE proved to be an additional bonus that enabled him to enjoy the city's cultural and worldly attractions.

Shortly after leaving the Cicognini, d'Annunzio moved to ROME, where he made a name for himself as a gossip columnist, poet, and novelist. As much as he cherished literary fame, he equally craved social acceptance. His adoption of the lower-case d in his surname was intended to convey aristocratic provenance. He courted and married a young woman from a family of the so-called black aristocracy, meaning a family that refused ostentatiously to acknowledge the parvenu Kingdom of Italy that had forcibly seized Rome from the pope in 1870. The wedding to the lovely Maria Gallese was a low-key affair because the bride's family disapproved, but the marriage lasted long enough to produce three sons.

By the time the couple separated around 1890, d'Annunzio was heralded by some critics as a new voice in literature and as the harbinger of a new culture and way of life. Even Pope LEO XIII, who did not share d'Annunzio's vision of the good life, expressed admiration for him as a writer. D'Annunzio showed a flair for publicity. Since GABRIEL was the name of the announcing archangel, and d'Annunzio meant "the announcer," he posed as Gabriel the Announcer of a new culture. Never one to spell things out too clearly, the nature of the culture had to be inferred from his writings. The novel Il piacere (Pleasure, 1889) is probably the most revealing. Its hero, Andrea Sperelli, is a godlike Übermensch in the Nietzschean fashion, who claims exemption from the rules of conventional morality because of superior intellect and aesthetic sensitivity. However, unlike his hero NIETZSCHE, who proclaimed the death of God and vilified Christianity, d'Annunzio never attacked religion or the clergy. Inexplicably, he regarded St. FRANCIS OF ASSISI as a kindred spirit and was known to parade in his garb. He was drawn to the Roman Catholic Church not by its doctrines, to which he was supremely indifferent, but by its majestic rituals, the liturgy and the processions, the colorful garments, the smell of INCENSE, and so forth.

D'Annunzio felt the temptation of politics. A brief stint in parliament (1897–1900) cured him of any desire to abide by the rules of liberal politics. More promising was his championing of Italy's naval buildup and glorification of heroic deeds. Life should be lived dangerously, he claimed, and la bella morte ("a beautiful death") on the battlefield was something to be desired. In 1911 he sang the praises of Italy's colonial war in Libya. He called for Italian intervention in WORLD WAR I, against the appeals of Pope BENEDICT XV, who wanted to keep Italy out of the conflict. When Italy went to war against Austria in May 1915, d'Annunzio volunteered for service and conducted some highly publicized exploits, including a flight to drop propaganda leaflets over Vienna. At war's end he proclaimed dissatisfaction with Italy's rewards and coined the phrase "the mutilated victory," which was taken up by the Fascists. In November 1919 he led a paramilitary force that took over the contested city of Fiume on the border with Yugoslavia. When the Italian government refused to accept the city as a gift, he proclaimed himself comandante of the independent Reggenza del Carnaro, a tiny unrecognized state that he ruled until January 1921, when Italian troops forcibly evicted him and his legionnaires. In the intervening months he developed much of the ceremonial style that became part of the Fascist regime.

After the Fiume episode, d'Annunzio retired to private life in a manner befitting his self-image. Ensconced in a splendid estate overlooking Lake Garda, which he called Il Vittoriale and is now a state museum, he lived out the rest of his days burnishing his image, simultaneously admired and resented by Benito MUSSOLINI, who saw in him a precursor, a competitor, and a leech that extorted extravagant sums from the government, mixing abject flattery with threats of an open break.

SEE ALSO FASCISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Tom Antongini, D'Annunzio (Boston 1938).

Philippe Julian, D'Annunzio (New York 1973).

Michael A. Ledeen, The First Duce: D'Annunzio at Fiume (Baltimore, Md. 1977).

Paolo Valesio, Gabriele D'Annunzio: The Dark Flame (New Haven, Conn. 1992).

Roland Sarti
Professor Emeritus
University of Massachusetts at Amherst (2010)

DA COSTA, ALEXANDRINA MARIA, BL.

Laywoman; b. March 30, 1904, Balasar, Portugal; d. October 13, 1955, Balasar, Portugal; beatified April 25, 2004, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

Alexandrina Maria da Costa was born to a Portuguese farming family who taught her about God. When she was seven, Alexandrina boarded with a carpenter's family in Póvoa do Varzim, so she could attend the primary school there. After she returned, she worked hard in the fields and had a lively, cheerful nature. She was strong and hardy, but her good health lasted only until age twelve, when she almost died from an infection. Though she recovered, the infection affected her for the rest of her life. That would not be her only SUFFERING.

As a young teen, she, her sister Deolinda, and another young girl were sewing on Holy Saturday in 1918, when three men burst into the house and tried to rape them. Alexandrina jumped from the window to escape, but the thirteen-foot fall crippled her. For the next five years, until she was nineteen, she dragged herself to church. She eventually became totally paralyzed and bedridden. On April 14, 1925, she prayed for healing, but she came to see that God had called her to a mission of suffering. For the next thirty years, she exhorted others to stay away from sin, and she called them to conversion.

From October 3, 1938, to March 24, 1942, God's grace gave her a mystical gift that allowed her to relive Christ's final hours every Friday as she completed the STATIONS OF THE CROSS in agonizing pain. Beginning on March 27, 1942, and continuing until her death in 1955, Alexandrina took no food other than the Holy Eucharist. Her weight fell to about seventy-three pounds.

In spite of all she endured, thousands who came to her bedside for comfort remarked that she was always smiling and peaceful. Her sister recorded her words and mystical experiences at the urging of a Salesian priest, Fr. Umberto Pasquale, who assisted Alexandrina from 1944 on. That year Alexandrina asked to become a Salesian cooperator, and she offered up her suffering for the salvation of souls and for the sanctification of youth. Before she died on October 13, 1955, she expressed great joy that she would be going to heaven.

On April 25, 2004, Pope John Paul II beatified her along with five others. In his homily, the pope said that Blessed Alexandrina demonstrated the trilogy of acts, to "suffer, love, make reparation," by making her pain noble "through the greatest evidence of love: sacrificing one's life for the beloved." The key to her HOLINESS and her ability to withstand the debilitating pain was her love for Christ.

Feast: October 13.

SEE ALSO BEATIFICATION; PORTUGAL, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN; SALESIANS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Catholic Online, "Bl. Alexandrina Maria da Costa (1904–1955)," Saints and Angels, available from http://www.catholic.org/saints/saint.php?saint_id=5911 (accessed October 24, 2009).

John Paul II, "Beatification of Six Servants of God," (Homily, April 25, 2004), Vatican Web site, available from http://www.vatican.va/holy_father/john_paul_ii/homilies/2004/documents/hf_jp-ii_hom_20040425_beatifications_en.html (accessed October 24, 2009).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Alexandrina Maria da Costa (1904–1955)," Vatican Web site, April 25, 2004, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_lit_doc_20040425_da-costa_en.html (accessed October 24, 2009).

Salesians of Don Bosco, "Blessed Alessandrina Maria da Costa (1904–1955)," available from http://www.sdb.org/ENG/Pagine/_2_12_18_17_.htm?Sez=12&Sotsez=18&DetSotSez=17 (accessed October 24, 2009).

Laurie J. Edwards
Independent Scholar
Reidsville, N.C. (2010)

DARONCH, ADÍLIO, BL.

Priest, missionary, and MARTYR; b. October 25, 1908, Dona Francisca in the Cachoeira do Sul municipality of Rio Grande do Sul, Brazil; d. May 21, 1924, near Feijão Miúdo, Três Passos, Rio Grande do Sul, Brazil; proclaimed a martyr on December 16, 2006; beatified October 21, 2007, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

Adílio Daronch was the third son of eight children born to Italian immigrants Pedro Daronch and Judite Segabinazzi, who arrived in Brazil in 1875. Adílio moved in early childhood, first to Passo Fundo in 1912, and then to Nonoai in 1913. As a boy he attended a school founded by Bl. Emmanuel Gómez GONZÁLEZ, a missionary from Spain, and he became a faithful ACOLYTE.

In his early teens, as the protégé of Fr. Emmanuel, he went on long journeys with the priest, who ministered to the Kaingang Indios in the neighboring parish of Palmeiras das Missões. After Holy Week in 1924, sixteen-year-old Adílio accompanied Fr. Emmanuel on a visit to the Três Passos forest, near Uruguay. The trip was a dangerous one because the region was a hotbed of revolutionary activities.

Along the way, Fr. Emmanuel stopped to preach to the revolutionaries, reminding them of their shared faith and urging them to pursue PEACE. He administered the sacraments and also gave Christian burials to victims of the revolutionaries. His message and kindness to the families of their enemies made the insurgents wary.

Fr. Emmanuel and Adílio continued their journey in spite of the warnings they received about the perils of entering the forest. Bishop Àtico Eusébio da Rocha of Santa Maria had asked Fr. Emmanuel to visit a colony of Teutonic Brazilian planters there, and the priest was determined to complete this mission. On May 20, 1924, they celebrated Holy Mass in Braga at the military colony and then traveled to a trading center, where they asked for directions to their destination.

Soldiers offered to escort them to Três Passos; instead of ensuring their safe passage, however, they took Fr. Emmanuel and Adílio to a remote part of the forest, where they ambushed them, bound each to a tree, and shot them on May 21, 1924. The locals who found them four days later were amazed that wild animals had not touched their bodies. Fr. Emmanuel and Adílio were buried nearby, but in 1964 their remains were transferred to the parish church of Nonoai. A monument now marks the spot where their martyrdom occurred.

On December 16, 2006, Pope Benedict XVI proclaimed the decree of martyrdom for both Adílio and Father Emmanuel Gómez González. The Mass of BEATIFICATION was held on October 21, 2007, at the Municipal Exhibition Park in Frederico Westphalen, Brazil. Cardinal José Saraiva Martins gave the homily. Using the example of young Timothy who accompanied St. PAUL on his missionary journey, the cardinal praised the bravery and determination of Adílio Daronch, who traveled with Fr. Emmanuel in a similar manner and gave up everything, even his life, for the GOSPEL.

Feast: May 21.

SEE ALSO BRAZIL, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Congregation for the Causes of Saints, "Mass of Beatification of the Servants of God, Emmanuel Gómez González and Adilio Daronch: Homily of Cardinal José Saraiva Martins," Vatican Web site, October 21, 2007, available from http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/congregations/csaints/documents/rc_con_csaints_doc_20071021_martiri-brasile_en.html (accessed October 24, 2009).

Municipal Commission of Três Passos, "Beatos do Rio Grande do Sul: Coroinha Adílio Daronch," available (in Portuguese) from http://www.beatosdors.com.br/index.php?pg=historico2 (accessed July 28, 2009).

Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations, "Bl. Adílio Daronch (1908–1924)," Vatican Web site, December 16, 2006, available from http://www.vatican.va/news_services/liturgy/saints/ns_lit_doc_20071021_daronch_en.html (accessed October 24, 2009).

Terry H. Jones, "Blessed Adílio Daronch," Patron Saints Index, available from http://saints.sqpn.com/saintaiu.htm (accessed October 24, 2009).

Laurie J. Edwards
Independent Scholar
Reidsville, N.C. (2010)

DE GAULLE, CHARLES

French general, leader of Free France, architect of the Fifth Republic and its first president; b. Lille, France, November 22, 1890; d. Colombey-les-Deux-Églises, France, November 9, 1970.

Early Life and Education. Charles de Gaulle was born in Lille in 1890 to an upper middle-class, liberal, and cultivated Catholic family—although his father supported Captain Alfred Dreyfus (1859–1935) during the controversial DREYFUS AFFAIR. Educated first at Jesuit schools, Charles de Gaulle, who was influenced early by the writings of Maurice Barrès (1862–1923), Henri BERGSON (1859–1941), Émile BOUTROUX (1845–1921), and Charles PÉGUY (1873–1914), was inclined toward a military career and entered Saint-Cyr in 1909. Upon graduation, he was posted to an infantry regiment commanded by Colonel Philippe Pétain (1856–1951).

During World War I (1914–1918), de Gaulle served with distinction at Verdun (1916). He was taken prisoner and, after several attempted escapes, was interned at the fortress of Ingolstadt. There he worked on the draft of his first book, La Discorde chez l'ennemi (Discord Among the Enemy), published in 1924. Upon his release, he fought in Poland against the Russian Soviet forces (1920). Returning to France, he taught military history at Saint-Cyr and soon became aide-de-camp to Pétain and a member of his staff on the High Military Council. Given command of a battalion, de Gaulle became known during this period for his writings on military and political history (Histoire des troupes du Levant [History of the Troops of Levant, 1931]; Le Fil de l'épée [The Edge of the Sword, 1932]), and in particular for his study on military strategy, Vers l'armée de métier (Toward a Professional Army, 1934), in which he advocated a highly mechanized and mobilized army, something already strongly counseled by General Jean-Baptiste Estienne (1860–1936) in France and General Heinz Guderian (1888–1954) in Germany, but considered incomprehensible by most other military leaders of the era. During the 1930s, de Gaulle also was associated with various antifascist Catholic groups and opposed the Munich Pact of 1938.

