Military Leadership. A brigadier general at the beginning of World War II (1939–1945), Charles de Gaulle, who fought in a number of counteroffensives against the invading Nazi forces, was appointed undersecretary of national defense in June 1940 by President Paul Reynaud (1878–1966). Opposed to the armistice, de Gaulle escaped to London, where he issued his "June 18 Appeal" for the continuation of the struggle against the Axis Powers. He also announced the formation of a French National Committee in Exile, which in 1942 was recognized by both the French Resistance leaders and the Allied governments. In September 1940, de Gaulle's Free French forces, including French colonials and a part of the French fleet, launched an unsuccessful attack on Dakar, Senegal, but did succeed in rallying support for Free France in Chad, French Equatorial Africa, Madagascar, and Réunion. At the same time, de Gaulle sought to lead and coordinate actions with the Resistance movement back in France. His efforts contributed to the formation of the National Council for the Resistance in 1943.

Supported by Joseph STALIN (1878–1953) since 1942, de Gaulle was not liked by Franklin Roosevelt (1882–1945), and de Gaulle's forces were excluded from the Allied invasion of North Africa, during which the British and Americans recognized the authority of General Henri Giraud (1879–1949). Finally, after the Casablanca Conference, de Gaulle and Giraud agreed to the creation of the Committee of National Liberation (June 1943). At this time, de Gaulle outlined a new direction for French colonial policy, conceiving a plan for the autonomy and integration of the populations of the French overseas territories into the French Union (Brazzaville Conference, 1944).

Political Leadership. Arriving at Bayeux after the Normandy invasion, then in liberated Paris in August 1944, de Gaulle became the main political leader and reestablished central authority, dissolving the patriotic militias, or milices, and reestablishing the French Army to fight alongside the British and American forces. Chosen by the first National Constituent Assembly as president of the Provisional Government of the French Republic in November 1945, de Gaulle, who feared a return to the institutions and policies of the Third Republic (party divisions, parliamentary domination), put forth a plan for a constitution that would emphasize executive power. This was opposed by the supporters of legislative power, particularly the socialists and communists. As a result, de Gaulle resigned in January 1946 and then made several visits throughout the French Union with the aim of opposing the Fourth Republic and forming his own party, the Rassemblement du peuple français (Rally of the French People), founded in April 1947.

From 1954 to 1958, de Gaulle edited his Mémoires de guerre (Memories of War). As the conflict in Algeria escalated, a movement developed for de Gaulle's return to power. Shortly after the May 13, 1958, uprising in Algiers, de Gaulle was invested as the head of the French government (June 1, 1958). His first effort was the reform of the political institutions. Approved by referendum on September 28, 1958, the new constitution established a presidential regime marked by a reinforcement of the powers of the head of state and by frequent recourse to referenda. De Gaulle's opponents claimed this would limit the powers of parliamentary democratic processes.

In December 1958, after the victory of the Union pour la Nouvelle République (Union for the New Republic) in the legislative elections of November, de Gaulle was elected president of the Fifth Republic and assumed his powers in January 1959, selecting Michel Debré (1912–1996) as prime minister (1959–1962). De Gaulle broadly outlined his domestic policies (economic reforms, a new franc) and colonial policies (a new type of relationship with the overseas territories within the French community, the restoration of peace in Algeria), and his plans for the restoration of France's prestige and primary place in world affairs.

The Algerian question dominated the initial period of de Gaulle's presidency. After having initially supported the French Algerians, de Gaulle soon took a new direction in his Algerian policy, upholding the Evian Accords (March 1962) and the independence of Algeria. At this time, de Gaulle, with his prime minister, Georges Pompidou (1911–1974), also brought France into the European Economic Community (he supported an economically united Europe, but opposed the entrance of Great Britain into the Common Market); pursued reconciliation with Germany through the Franco-German cooperation treaty (1963); sponsored a unilateral nuclear-armaments program for France and renewed ties with the Soviet Union and mainland China in an effort toward East-West rapprochement; and withdrew French forces (but not France itself) from NATO in 1966. As French influence increased worldwide, de Gaulle took positions on the great issues of international politics of the time (Vietnam, China, Biafra, the Middle East—he condemned Israel during the Six-Day War of 1967), advocated the autonomy of French Canada ("Vive le Québec libre," he proclaimed on a visit there in 1967), and supported the return to an international gold standard.

This policy of French prestige was not without social, economic, and financial difficulties, with the inflation of 1962 ending the relative stability enjoyed since 1958. De Gaulle's government had to face a political and labor opposition that manifested itself for the first time in the presidential elections of 1965, in which there was a runoff against the leftist candidate, François Mitterrand (1916–1996). In the parliamentary elections of 1967, the Gaullist majority lost a number of seats.

The economic, social, and cultural malaise in France exploded in May 1968, when striking students and workers brought the nation almost to a complete halt. Charles de Gaulle again won in the June 1968 presidential elections, but in April 1969 he resigned following the defeat of his policies in a national referendum. He retired to his home in Colombey-les-Deux-Églises to continue work on his memoires, thus ending the political career of a man who during almost thirty years had dominated French political life. Along with his Mémoires de guerre trilogy (L'Appel [1954], L'Unité [1956], and Le Salut [1959]), de Gaulle's other writings include the two-volume Mémoires d'espoir (Memories of Hope: Le Renouveau [1970] and L'Effort [1971]).

Charles de Gaulle, who in the 1930s was associated with Catholic anti-fascist groups, and his wife were devout Catholics, as is evidenced in his writings (in which he sought to reconcile liberal democracy and Catholicism) and in their private and public lives. Devoted to their daughter Anne who had Down syndrome, they lovingly and attentively cared for her for 20 years; Charles de Gaulle for instance would engage her in playing cards, himself patiently playing both hands.

Publicly, the de Gaulles manifested their Catholicism on such occasions as in 1966, when on a state visit to the Soviet Union, they attended Mass in Leningrad's only Catholic church, Notre Dame de Lourdes.

DEACONESS

The word deaconess is a title given to a woman who exercises a special ministry or service in the Church. Considerable debate has occurred as to whether the deaconesses mentioned in the New Testament and in the early Church were the equivalent of male deacons or whether they exercised a ministry of service that was sacramental.

In Romans 16:1–2, Paul refers to "our sister Phoebe, a deaconess (he diakonos) of the Church at Cenchreae" (Catholic Revised Standard Version). In the New American Bible, he diakonos is translated as a minister rather than deaconess. According to the International Theological Commission [ITC], one cannot conclude from the use of diakonos in Romans 16:1 that the specific function of a DEACON is designated, first "because in this context diakonos still signifies servant in a very general sense, and second because the word 'servant' is not given a feminine suffix but preceded by a feminine article" (ITC 2004, English ed., pp. 19–20). The ITC further notes that the same Greek word, diakonos, is used by Paul to refer to the authorities of this world (Rom 13:4) and to the servants of the DEVIL (2 Cor 11:14–15).

In 1 Timothy 3:11, women are mentioned in a passage following a reference to deacons. Exegetes, though, are divided as to whether these women are the wives of the deacons just mentioned or women deacons. In 1 Timothy 5: 3–16, Paul mentions women being inscribed into an order of widows, a group that might also have exercised a type of non-sacramental diakonia, or service, in the early Church (Müller 2002, p. 56).

In the early second century, PLINY THE YOUNGER, governor of Bithynia, refers to two women who are called ministrae (ministers) by Christians. Ministrae here is probably the Latin equivalent of diakonoi, but only in the third century did the term deaconess (diaconissa in Greek and diacona in Latin) begin to emerge (ITC 2004, p. 20). Deaconesses are mentioned in the Greco-Syriac canonico-liturgical compilation known as the Didascalia Apostolorum [DA] that appears around 240 AD. In this document, deaconesses seem to have taken the place of the order of widows. They anointed women in the rite of BAPTISM, but they could not confer baptism by themselves and had no part in the EUCHARIST offering (DA 3, 12, 1–4; cf. ITC 2004, p. 21).

Deaconesses are also mentioned in the Apostolic Constitutions (Constitutiones Apostolorum) [CA], a document that appeared in Syria around 380 AD, bringing together various prior documents, such as the Didache, the Didaskalia, and the Traditio Apostolica. The compiler of the CA distinguished between the roles of deaconesses and deacons, for the deaconess "does not bless, and she does not fulfill any of the things that priests and deacons do, but she looks after the doors and attends the priests during the Baptism of women, for the sake of decency" (CA VIII 28, 6; cf. ITC 2004, pp. 22–23). In the CA, though, deaconesses, unlike widows, were included among the clergy, because they had a liturgical function. It should be noted, though, that the CA understood the concept of clergy (klèros) in a very broad manner to include all those "who benefited from the privileges in civil law allowed by the Empire to the clergy" (ITC 2004, p. 22).

There has been considerable debate as to what type of ordination deaconesses received. Canon 19 of the Council of Nicea (325) refers to the former members of the Paulinists who were seeking refuge in the Catholic Church. Their deaconesses were to be numbered among the laity because they did not receive any IMPOSITION OF HANDS (cheirothesían/manus impositionem) (Tanner 1990, p. 15). According to some scholars, the deaconesses who did receive a true imposition of hands were ordained to HOLY ORDERS and, therefore, not counted among the laity. The Greek verb cheirotenein could refer to an election, but it could also mean an appointment, installation, or liturgical ordination (cf. ITC 2004, pp. 25–26).

The compiler of the CA "reserves the term cheirotonia to the ordination of bishops, priests, deacons and sub-deacons (VIII 4–5; 16–17; 21). He employs the expression epithenai tèn (tas) cheira (s) for deaconesses and lectors (VIII 16, 2: 17, 2)," but "[h]e does not seem to wish to give these expressions a different meaning, since all the impositions are accompanied by an epiclesis of the Holy Spirit" (ITC 2004, no. 63, p. 30). Canon 15 of the Council of CHALCEDON does refer to deaconesses being ordained, and it uses a verbal form of cheirotonia (cheirotoneīsthai/ ordinandam: cf. Tanner 1990, p. 94). Because, however, canon 15 requires deaconesses to be at least forty years old and forbids them from marrying after being ordained, some believe that "the way of life of deaconesses was very similar to that of nuns," and St. GREGORY OF NYSSA and others use the term deaconess to refer to women in charge of monasteries (cf. ITC 2004, p. 23).

In the early Church, deaconesses were mostly present in the Christian East. In the West "there is no trace of any deaconesses for the first five centuries" (ITC 2004, p. 24). Perhaps because of the presence of deaconesses in certain heretical sects, various local Western synods of the fourth through sixth century forbad the ordination of deaconesses, though abbesses and wives of deacons were called deaconesses (diaconissae) by way of analogy (ITC 2004, p. 24).

Deaconesses were present in the East from the third through the tenth centuries, and in certain places of the West from the sixth through thirteenth, but, in the opinion of the INTERNATIONAL THEOLOGICAL COMMISSION, "It seems clear that this ministry was not perceived as the simple feminine equivalent of the masculine diaconate" ("Il semble clair que ce ministère n'était pas perçu comme le simple équivalent féminine du diaconat masculine") (ITC, Le Diaconat: Evolution et Perspectives 2002, ch. II, no. IV). Many scholars also believe that "the consecration of deaconesses was not the ordination of women to the diaconal ministry; on the contrary, it was a question of a different ecclesiastical office" (Müller 2002, p. 48).

In recent years some Catholic scholars have made the case for the ordination of women to the diaconate (Zagano 2000), and they have been encouraged by the 2004 decision of the HOLY SYNOD of the ORTHODOX CHURCH IN GREECE to restore the female diaconate (Zagano 2005). Recent documents of the Catholic Church, however, have not given any encouragement to these initiatives. The 2002 study of the International Theological Commission on the diaconate (published in French as Le Diaconat: Evolution et Perspectives) included a historical study of the ministry of the deaconess. Some Catholic scholars used this document as possible support for ordaining women to the diaconate, because the ITC referred the matter to the Magisterium "to pronounce authoritatively on this question" (ITC 2004, p. 109). Thus, the issue seemed to be open for discussion.

In response to this interpretation of the 2002 document, Father Georges Cottier, O.P., the general secretary of the commission, noted that the ITC, even though it lacks the authority of the Magisterium, nevertheless, provides some strong indications against the possibility of ordaining women to the diaconate. The first indication is that the deaconesses in the early Church cannot be understood simply as the equivalent of ordained deacons, and the second is "the unity of the sacrament of Holy Orders," which includes the ministry of bishops, priests, and deacons (Cottier 2002, p. 12).

Early twenty-first-century interventions of the Roman CURIA likewise manifest a decided resistance to the possibility of ordaining women to the diaconate. On July 20, 2000, Cardinal Jorge Medina Estévez, the Prefect of the Congregation for DIVINE WORSHIP AND THE DISCIPLINE OF THE SACRAMENTS, wrote a letter condemning the "abuse" (abuso) committed by Bishop Samuel Ruiz García and his Coadjutor, Bishop Raúl Vera López, at an ordination LITURGY of permanent deacons that took place January 18, 2000, in the Mexican diocese of San Crisóbal de Las Casas. In this ordination liturgy, the two bishops laid their hands upon the wives of men being ordained deacons, thus creating, "ambiguity and confusion as if they were also being 'ordained'" (Enchiridion Vaticanum [EV]19, 2000, no. 1057, p. 601). Cardinal Medina required the bishops to make a public declaration that these wives of the permanent deacons "did not receive any sacramental ordination and, therefore, are not 'deaconesses'" [EV 19, 2000, no. 1054, p. 598).

Another intervention by the Magisterium on the question of deaconesses was a Notification of September 17, 2001, issued jointly by the cardinal prefects of three curial Congregations: namely, the Doctrine for the Faith (Cardinal Ratzinger), Divine Worship and Discipline of the Sacraments (Cardinal Medina Estévez), and the Clergy (Cardinal Castrillón Hoyos). This Notification was issued in response to reports of some dioceses conducting programs of study directly or indirectly aimed at the diaconal ordination of women. The Notification states that such programs are devoid of solid doctrinal foundation and can, therefore, generate pastoral disorientation (carenti di salda fondatezza dottrinale e che possono generare pertanto disorientamento pastorale: Enchiridion Vaticanum [EV] 20, 2001, no. 1800, p. 1200). Moreover, such programs are illegitimate because the discipline of the Church does not foresee the possibility of such ordination [i.e., of women to the diaconate] (Poiché l'ordinamento ecclesiale non prevede la possibilità di una tale ordinazione: Enchiridion Vaticanum [EV] 20, 2001, no. 1800, p. 1200).

DEMOCRACY, CHRISTIAN

Christian democratic movements had their origins in continental Europe and took root in Italy, Germany, Austria, Belgium, and the Netherlands. In Latin America, Christian DEMOCRACY emerged largely in the second half of the twentieth century, eventually becoming active in eighteen nations.

During the second half of the nineteenth century, new threats to Catholicism arose in Europe. Industrialization brought social urbanization and mobility that weakened the Church's traditional pastoral institutions. Increasing democratization meant that the Church's enemies could use elections to curtail or even eliminate the ability of the Church to function in society. Historians have sometimes explained the rise of Christian democracy as the Catholic Church's response to the twin threats of ANTICLERICALISM and mass politics. This interpretation presupposes that the Church, led by the VATICAN, encouraged and nurtured Christian democracy to defend the Church against the growing SECULARIZATION of European society. This view also portrays the confessional parties as nothing more than stalking horses for Europe's conservative elements, which used the Catholic parties to fight socialism and ensure their control over the masses.

Birth of Christian Democracy. At its most fundamental, the development of political Catholicism was, in part, the result of the conflict between the Church and the forces of LIBERALISM. However, the confessional parties were not initially supported by the hierarchy and the Vatican. The Vatican worried that Catholic political parties would take positions of expediency, make unfortunate political alliances, and undercut the importance of religion to win elections. The Church was also concerned that the heads of Catholic political parties would confuse the FAITHFUL and rival the Magisterium if they were perceived as Catholic leaders and spokespersons. Thus, the Church initially embarked on a different strategy to combat the liberal anticlericalism of the late nineteenth century.

In the wake of a series of anticlerical laws across Europe, petition drives in the Netherlands (1878), Belgium (1879), Prussia (1868–1869), and Austria (1867) showed the force of Catholic opinion. Behind the petition gatherings were lay Catholic organizations that had been given greater structure and coordination and brought under closer episcopal supervision as a result of Pope PIUS IX's ENCYCLICAL Quanta cura and the attached Syllabus errorum. The Vatican of Pius IX saw these traditional Catholic associations as the cornerstone of a Catholic action focusing initially on piety and religious practice that would oppose the errors of the modern world, not on the political stage, but among the people. These associations soon became more than just movements against liberalism and anticlericalism and instead began to organize cooperatives, banks, clubs, and self-contained economic units that would isolate Catholic masses from the so-called corrosive influence of liberalism.

At the same time, the hierarchies in individual countries sought to maintain control over these organizations, even as they grew in size and scope. Aware that a younger generation of lay Catholic leaders saw the advantages of mobilizing the Catholic masses for political ends, the bishops asserted clerical rights and privileges with the associations. The statutes of the Italian Opera dei Congressi, the national umbrella group of Catholic movements founded in 1874, clearly stated that all the Opera activities were to be "in accordance with the wishes of the highest pontiff and under the guidance of the bishops and the clergy." Virtually all Catholic associations in Europe included similar clauses in their bylaws or constitutions. In Belgium, the bishop of Liege summed up this view of the associations as reflecting, "the priest in his parish ... the bishop in his diocese, surrounded by devoted laymen."

In Italy, Pius IX's non expedit forbidding Catholics to participate in the electoral process drew a sharp line across which activists in the Opera dared not cross. In other European countries, however, the issue of Catholic participation in electoral politics was not as clear. For example, Joseph Othmar von RAUSCHER, the archbishop of Vienna, had to repeatedly rule out the idea of transforming Catholic associations into political movements. In Germany, the associations often had clauses in their charters that specifically forbade political discussions, even including provisions for the expulsion of members who engaged in political activity.

Under Pope LEO XIII, Catholic organizations expanded their scope beyond generating piety and faithfulness among the laity. Leo recognized the need for social and economic activities and encouraged the engendering of a Catholic identity among the masses. Yet the pope drew the line at the transformation of Catholic associations into Catholic political parties. The associations' growing strength in Europe in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries resulted in attacks by the Liberal Party and the nascent Socialist Party, stoking the flames of anticlericalism.

The Catholic response was to forge informal alliances with friendly political parties, providing the latter with mass movements they often lacked. In 1895, Italian Catholics allied with a conservative list of candidates, La lista contrattuale; in 1913 this tactic took the more developed form of the Gentiloni Pact. Similar arrangements were made in Belgium (1879), Austria (1887), Germany (1870), and France (1890, 1894, 1901). These alliances, universally approved and guided by national hierarchies, were the first steps toward establishing Catholic political movements, giving Catholics a sense of political identity and organization without violating the Vatican's ban on overtly confessional parties. In fact, the Vatican viewed these alliances as merely temporary and specific responses to specific problems. When and if the problems went away, the Vatican reasoned, so would Catholic involvement in electoral politics. Further, lay Catholic leaders of the associations did not stand for election under these arrangements; Catholic organizations were to deliver the vote, not put their own men in office.

Establishment of Catholic Political Parties. The actual institution of Catholic political parties occurred earlier in Germany, Austria, Belgium, and the Netherlands (mid- to late nineteenth century) than in Italy (1919), largely because of the Italian state's peculiar relationship with the HOLY SEE. "Imprisoned" in the Vatican since the pontificate of Pius IX, the popes did not accept the legitimacy of the Italian state until 1929. Nonetheless, the European Catholic political movements had many developmental factors in common. Despite the hierarchy's efforts to control the associations, their activities grew so markedly in the latter half of the nineteenth century that lower clergy and laymen discovered increasing latitude. Catholic trade unions were founded in many countries by priests without the approval of their bishops. Credit unions and cooperatives were formed in Italy by the Opera, despite the misgivings of many local bishops who saw them as bordering on socialism.

Scholars have pointed out that in many cases the strongest and most vocal supporters of the establishment of Catholic political parties were priests, many of whom found themselves in difficulties with their superiors as a result. Indeed, two of the most successful Catholic political parties, Austria's Christian Socialism Party and Italy's Partito Popolare, were founded by priests, Ignaz SEIPEL and Luigi STURZO, respectively. These young priests, joined and then surpassed by young activist laymen such as Guido Miglioli (1879–1954) and Giuseppe Sacchetti (1845–1906) in Italy, Georg Hertling (1843–1919) in Germany, and Jacques Piou (1838–1932) in France, did not agree with the bishops' cautious political strategy, and they were not afraid to move their organizations toward direct political involvement. For example, in Belgium in 1875, the bishops appealed to the pope to discipline activist Catholic laymen who "gave themselves the mission to teach the bishops" about sensitive political issues. Across Europe, a new generation of Catholic activists, while faithful to the Church, was anxious to defend Catholicism and their fellow Catholics by direct participation in electoral politics.

As the Catholic movements developed into bona fide political parties, the lower clergy's dominance gave way to lay control. Mass party-related organizations weakened the hold of the clergy, and the confessional parties began to see themselves as allied, but distinct from the Church itself. By the beginning of the twentieth century, a process of declericalization had occurred to some extent in all European Catholic political parties. This allowed the Catholic parties greater freedom to compete for votes in the increasingly secular European societies. By the time of the establishment of the Partito Popolare Italiano (PPI) in Italy in 1919, Catholic political parties in Europe had been largely transformed into Christian people's parties that, rather than simply defending the narrow institutional interests of the Church, looked to Catholicism to provide the spiritual and moral basis for newly emerging democratic societies.

Between the World Wars. The interwar period (1919–1939), however, saw the development of the Christian Democratic parties slow to a halt. In Italy, the PPI competed in elections for the first time in 1919, winning a remarkable 100 seats and emerging as a genuine force in post–World War I politics, a fact that neither the establishment liberals nor the radical socialists welcomed. The PPI found itself in the center of a democracy in crisis. The old ruling parties were discredited and unable to govern alone. The socialists and communists fomented social unrest and rebellion in the factories and among the peasants, often violently clashing with Catholic unions and cooperatives. Conservative Catholic organizations, the hierarchy, and the Vatican criticized Sturzo's PPI for refusing to form alliances with the conservatives to block the socialists. The Fascist March on Rome in 1922 ended the postwar political and social chaos but was also the beginning of the end of the PPI. By 1926, Benito MUSSOLINI felt strong enough to eliminate all rival parties. The Vatican, under Pope PIUS XI, did not protest the dissolution of the Popolari. Instead, it recognized that regimes of the radical right, like fascism, would not tolerate electoral politics, and Pius XI began to formulate a policy of concordats, or treaties, with governments to ensure the rights of the Church and the faithful.

As radical right movements took power in Europe, the Catholic political parties lost ground. In Germany, the CENTER PARTY competed against the new Nazi Party and, in Catholic areas of Germany, generally retained control and popularity. In the last free German elections in 1933, the Center Party and its ally, the Bavarian People's Party, did well and held onto to their seats in the Reichstag. However, the Vatican felt that with Adolf HITLER now in power, only a concordat would truly protect Catholicism in Germany. As part of the negotiations, the Vatican banned priests from politics, and this included Ludwig Kass, the leader of the Center Party. In July 1933, the Center Party was dissolved.

In Austria, the Christian Socialists won an absolute majority in the 1920 elections, held after the fall of the Hapsburg monarchy, and the party was the dominant political force until the Anschluss incorporated Austria into Nazi Germany in 1938. The assassination of the Christian Socialist chancellor Engelbert Dollfuss (1892–1934) by the Nazis in 1934 ushered in a period of undemocratic consolidation in a futile effort to fend off the Anschluss. By 1938, the Christian Social Party and other political parties were suppressed by the Nazis.

Essentially, all European Christian Democratic political parties shared the same ultimate fate as fascist and radical right movements spread across Europe. The outbreak of the Second World War and the Nazi occupation saw the end of political activity, and the Christian Democrats in many countries disbanded and bided their time. In Italy, for example, the Catholic university movement, La Federazione Universitaria Cattolica (FUCI), kept alive the principles of the Popolari through intellectual discourse and social activities. Protected by the Vatican as a section of CATHOLIC ACTION, the FUCI leadership of the interwar period became the leadership of the reprised Christian Democratic Party after the war.

Post–World War II Movements. Christian democratic movements were active in France, Italy, Germany, and Belgium in the immediate aftermath of the Second World War. In almost all instances, the parties attempted to rally Catholic organizations and political movements, liberal and conservative alike, under the banner of Christian democracy. Major Catholic political figures emerged, such as Alcide de GASPERI in Italy and Konrad ADENAUER in Germany, who were held in high regard by the victorious Allied powers and viewed as principal pillars on which to reconstruct a democratic Europe. The Christian Democrats were a viable alternative to communism in Europe and strong supporters of the new North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) alliance and early supporters of greater pan-European cooperation.

De Gasperi and Adenauer built formidable political and social movements that formed numerous governments in the postwar period. In Italy, the Christian Democratic Party became the party of government, providing the lion's share of prime ministers, but the party ultimately suffered from an internal decline that was the product of continual power and power sharing. The German Christian Democrats and their Bavarian sister party, the Christian Socialists, spent more time in opposition than did their Italian counterparts. The German party was willing to remain in opposition, out of power, for lengthy periods of time and avoided the inevitable corruption that comes from continual political power. In Belgium and the Netherlands, Christian Democratic parties also formed governments, participating routinely in cabinets and coalitions. Only in France did the Christian Democratic Party fail to survive the twentieth century, dissolving in 1967. However, its frequent participation in governments of the 1950s helped to bring recalcitrant Catholics into the electoral process of the republic before its adherents migrated largely to the Gaullist movement.

All Christian Democratic parties confronted the growing secularization and prosperity of Western European societies. As a result, the parties themselves became more open and interdenominational. In the latter part of the twentieth century they were unable to retain their dominant positions as "parties of the people" in the face of effective challenges from the left by environmental, peace, and other protest movements. In Belgium, the Christian Democratic Party was hurt by the conflict between the Flemish and the Walloon sections of the country. Despite these developments, Christian democracy remained a significant political force in Italy, Germany, the Netherlands, and Belgium, and it was a major contributor to the post–World War II period of stability and peace on the Continent.

Parties in Latin America. The development of Christian democracy outside of Europe began in the period after World War II and was strongest in Latin America. In 1947, the Christian Democratic Organization of America (ODCA) was founded and eventually included eighteen countries. Reflecting the political landscape of Latin America in the late twentieth century, the Christian Democratic parties often found themselves operating in authoritarian as well as democratic societies. Christian Democratic parties ultimately elected presidents in a number of countries, including the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Chile, Venezuela, and Mexico, and in many countries these parties took strong positions against dictators and authoritarian regimes.

In Venezuela, for example, the Comité de Organización Política Electoral Independiente (COPEI), the Christian Democratic Party, led a ten-year fight against the dictatorship of Marcos Pérez Jiménez (1914–2001) from 1948 to 1958 and was a subsequent bulwark of the democratic system from 1958 until the late 1990s. In Mexico, Partido Acción Nacional (PAN) spent decades participating in sham elections. Although it knew it would be shut out of governing by the authoritarian Partido Revolucionario Institucional (PRI). PAN was building its organization, enabling it to ultimately compete in and win Mexico's first democratic presidential election in 2000. In Chile, the Partido Demócrata Cristiano (PDC) participated in competitive elections in the postwar years until the 1973 coup by General Augusto Pinochet (1915–2006), eventually emerging as a major player in the post-Pinochet democracy. In Peru, the Partido Popular Cristiano (PPC) was a major force in the 1950s democracy and worked for a return to democracy under the 1968 to 1980 military dictatorship. In Central America, El Salvador, Guatemala, and Costa Rica all saw strong Christian democratic movements, especially in the 1980s, although toward the end of the century their electoral fortunes waned.

The challenge of operating and growing under authoritarian regimes weakened Latin American Christian democracy's organizational capabilities, especially if the party were founded during a period of dictatorship. The regular fluctuation in many Latin American countries between dictatorship and democracy undermined the parties' ability to develop deep-rooted party structures similar to their European counterparts. The movements also saw the Church in Latin America distance itself from the Christian democratic movement, first as liberals in the wake of Vatican II criticized the parties for their conservative bent, and then in the 1980s and 1990s as conservatives saw the parties as too left-leaning. Still, despite these difficulties, Christian democracy remains a considerable force in many Latin American countries.

DEMOCRATIC PARTIES, CHRISTIAN

After WORLD WAR II, Christian Democratic parties constituted a major international political force, mostly in Europe but also in other parts of the globe, such as Latin America. A clear definition of Christian Democracy has proven elusive, a dilemma complicated by the number of parties, each of which approaches Christian teachings in its own way. Furthermore, while most Christian Democratic parties identify with the Catholic Church, this is not always the case. The German Christian Democratic Union embraces both Catholics and Protestants, Scandinavian parties have been predominantly Protestant, and the Greek Nea Demokratia has roots in the Orthodox Church.

Before World War II. Between the FRENCH REVOLUTION and the Second World War, Catholic politics took many forms, often in reaction to the inevitable secularization of the industrial age as well as to political secularism. Until FASCISM presented a more immediate threat, those secularists in the liberal and Marxist camps considered the Catholic Church to be the most persistent holdover of the ancient regime. Liberals led the initial attack on the Church. Committed to its defense, therefore, Catholic political thought acquired a negative reputation as critical of LIBERALISM and MARXISM. If liberals stood for democratic reform, then Catholics must oppose it. Because Marxists spoke for the workers, then Catholics must speak against the workers. Unfortunately for Catholic politics, such arguments played themselves out within contexts and terminologies developed by liberals and Marxists who dismissed their Christian foes as hopelessly conservative or, more precisely, reactionary and ultramontane, clinging to a nostalgic union of throne and altar. Battered by what it saw as incessant liberal attacks, as Stathis Kalyvas illustrates in his The Rise of Christian Democracy in Europe, the Church somewhat reluctantly identified with the conservative parties (Kalyvas 1996, pp. 43–61). This phenomenon established itself early, upon the fall of Napoleon in 1815, and later became particularly apparent after WORLD WAR I in Antonio Salazar's Portugal, Engelbert Dollfuss's (1892–1934) Austria, and, in a more complicated way, in the Spain of Francisco FRANCO. At the end of the Second World War, however, a new form of Catholic politics emerged in Christian Democracy, which proved enormously successful for the next half century. In their introduction to Political Catholicism in Europe, 1918–1945, Wolfram Kaiser and Helmut Wohnout deny a "straightforward continuity from interwar Catholic politics to postwar Christian Democracy" (Kaiser and Wohnout 2004, p. 5).

Prewar Predecessors and Inspirations. Postwar Christian Democracy, for example, identified more with social reform and democracy than had most of earlier Catholic politics, although one can easily locate prewar predecessors and inspirations. The words of Popes LEO XIII and PIUS XI, for instance, predated, but contributed to, the evolution of a Christian Democratic idea. Above all, Leo's 1891 Encyclical Rerum novarum gave direction to Catholic social thought and, by implication, politics, for more than a century. Alarmed by the harsh treatment of labor in industrial capitalism as well as by the seduction of atheistic socialism, Leo condemned exploitation of the workers and defended their right to organize. The state had an obligation to promote the interests of the poor, protect children from dangerous vocations, and ensure rest for all workers. Ten years later, Leo's Graves de communi re addressed Christian Democracy in a very watered-down form. Although it recognized the concept, the Encyclical aimed more at helping Christians than at forming a political party, and it still exhibited Church reluctance to sanction Catholic-inspired political action. Pius XI issued Quadragesimo anno in 1931, on the fortieth anniversary of Rerum novarum, in clear acknowledgment of his debt to Leo. The themes were the same, although expressed more bluntly and with more alarm.

Along with papal initiatives, a number of nineteenth and early twentieth century activists distinguished social and progressive Catholic politics and can be considered forerunners of later, full-blown Christian democracy. Among the most noteworthy were Félicité Lamennais, Bishop Wilhelm Emmanuel von KETTELER, and Don Luigi STURZO. The tragic career of the French priest, Lamennais, served as a cautionary tale for progressive, or liberal, Catholics in the first half of the nineteenth century. His ideas were condemned in Pope GREGORY XVI's 1832 Encyclical Mirari vos, as was his most important book, Paroles d'un croyant, in Gregory's Singulari nos. Bishop Ketteler was born in 1811 (Lamennais was born in 1782) and was of the next generation, one more deeply affected by the Industrial Revolution and by a more mature working class. A "sower of seeds," according to Paul Misner, he acquired an activist reputation in the Revolutions of 1848 and turned to the plight of the workers, later reaching for guidance to progressive liberals and even to the early social democrat, Ferdinand Lassalle (1825–1864) (Misner 1991, pp. 136–144). Born in 1871, the Sicilian priest Luigi Sturzo was ordained in 1894. Inspired by Rerum novarum, he worked to better the lives of peasants and to organize a Catholic political movement, at first unsuccessfully through the Opere dei congressi (disbanded by PIUS X in 1904). Then, after the First World War, Sturzo launched the Italian Popular Party (PPI) in Rome, a cross-class organization, Catholic, but ideally autonomous of the hierarchy. The HOLY SEE tolerated Sturzo's party but was never comfortable with its independence and its unwillingness to place the ROMAN QUESTION higher on its agenda. Benito MUSSOLINI's Fascist regime, launched in 1922, presented new problems to the Popolari. First, it seduced many conservative PPI figures and even accepted some as ministers in its first coalition cabinet. Second, the Fascists persuaded Pope Pius XI that he could negotiate with them over the Roman Question, and he, in turn, allowed the Popular Party to whither on the vine. In 1923 Sturzo resigned and left for two decades in exile, and the Party collapsed under Fascist pressure in 1926. Another Catholic Party, the German Center, an older organization than the Popular Party, suffered a similar fate at the hands of Adolf HITLER in 1933.

Impact of World War II. World War II strengthened the progressive and democratic side of Catholic politics through opposition to Nazi and Fascist ideologies and through wartime alliances that Catholics forged with other lay and Marxist enemies of Hitler and Mussolini. Catholics figured well in most of the resistance coalitions, from Belgium's Independence Front to Italy's Committee of National Liberation and to France's National Resistance Council, which was led by two of them—Jean Moulin (1899–1943), who died at the hands of Nazi torturers, and his successor, Georges Bidault (1899–1983). Other Catholics, who were active during the war and after, helped to clarify the movement in its own terms and illustrated the old mistake of forcing the round ball of Christian Democracy into the square hole of liberal-Marxist thought. Two such persons were the French thinkers, Jacques MARITAIN and Emmanuel MOUNIER. In such works as Christianity and Democracy, Maritain condemned the "pagan empires" and argued that the religion was necessary for true democracy. Mounier's idea of PERSONALISM echoed Leo XIII's defense of the worker's dignity and, according to the British scholar David Hanley, became:

> the most articulate version of CD doctrine ... [one which] ... sees society as composed not of individuals (as in the liberal paradigm), but persons. The person is an outgoing, fundamentally sociable being, whose destiny is realized not in competition (again, as with liberalism) but more through insertion into different types of community, be it neighborhood, church, family or nation. (Hanley 1994, p. 4)

The Christian Democratic stamp on postwar European politics proved to be enormous. In his 1936 book, Integral Humanism, Maritain had envisioned "a temporal regime or of an age of civilization ... whose animating form would be Christian and which would correspond to the historic climate of the epoch into which we are entering" (Maritain 1968, p. 132). Maritain's revelation was published in 1946 in Italy, where it enjoyed many echoes and inspired hope in circles that extended to the Rome of Pope PIUS XII, where it was discussed in the framework of a nuova Cristianità (New Christendom). And despite old reservations over the wisdom of Catholic political activity, the Holy See recognized Christian Democracy as a necessary element in bringing the new Christianity to people across Europe and beyond.

Gains in Western Europe. Denied any chance in Eastern Europe and kept in limbo under the authoritarian dictators on the Iberian Peninsula, Christian Democratic power exploded across continental Western Europe at the end of the war and almost created a hegemony that lasted in some places for more than four decades. The West German CDU emerged as the leading national party and, from 1949 until 1966, controlled the government continuously under Konrad ADENAUER (and Ludwig Erhard [1897–1977] from 1963). The Belgian Christian People's Party/Christian Social Party (CVP/PSC) won the first postwar election there in 1946 and kept power until 1955. The Catholic People's Party (KVP) was the most successful Dutch party and dominated cabinets from 1958 until the late 1960s, after which it merged with allies, particularly the Protestant Anti-revolutionary Party (ARP) to form a more broadly based Christian Democratic CDA in 1980. The Luxembourg Christian Social People's Party (CSV) won a majority in the first postwar election and maintained itself with at least a plurality for the rest of the century. Under Alcide de Gasperi and his successors, the Italian Christian Democracy (DC) triumphed in the 1948 elections and controlled the Parliament in Rome until 1994. Although it played a key role as a political faction, only the French Popular Republican Movement (MRP) failed to achieve the success enjoyed by its cousins elsewhere. It persisted as a major party through the Fourth Republic, however, until the re-emergence of Charles de GAULLE in 1958 signaled its decline.

Christian Democrats and Communism. Pope Pius XII and the Christian Democrats forged a united anticommunist policy during the Cold War. His 1949 excommunication of communists mirrored the adherence, also that year, of France, the Benelux nations (Belgium, the Netherlands, and Luxembourg), and Italy to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO). Still restricted by postwar measures, West German entrance was delayed until 1955. The same group of nations engineered the key first steps toward the European Union in the formation of the European Coal and Steel Community (ECSC) in 1951. The so-called inner six nations, led by a trio denounced by the French socialist Vincent Auriol (1884–1966) as "three tonsures under the same skull-cap"—Italy's de Gasperi, Germany's Adenauer, and France's MRP Foreign Minister, Robert Schuman (1886–1963), announced the ECSC which, after the 1955 Messina Conference hosted by the Italian DC Prime Minister Mario Scelba (1901–1991), followed by the Treaty of Rome (1957), evolved into the Common Market.

Christian Democrats also strove to leave their stamp on the economies and societies. They often used the phrase third way to distinguish their ideas from the lay (capitalist) and Marxist traditions, calling for an activist state while respecting the human person and the sanctity of family and private property. Nevertheless, CD parties suffered important internal debates between progressives and the more traditional capitalist voices. The Adenauer ministry, for instance, enfeebled the ambitious CDU Ahlen Program of 1947, whereas in Italy the bold plans of Amintore Fanfani (1908–1999) and Ezio Vanoni (1903–1956) met resistance among such figures as the pro-capitalist Giuseppe Pella (1902–1981). Social and cultural platforms aligned, in that the parties universally condemned the hedonism of modern life and promoted modest personal conduct. They advocated what might be called pro-family measures and stood against divorce and abortion. In the twenty-first century, the success of Christian Democracy appears to be mixed. The fall of the Soviet empire had some adverse effects in that, as it turned out, some portion of CD votes resulted merely from anticommunist fears, and electoral strength declined accordingly. The march of secularization also took its toll on Christian Democratic cultural verve. The loss of referenda votes on divorce (1974) and abortion (1981), for example, had devastating effects on the CD in Italy. Still, despite setbacks, from 1999 to 2009, the Christian Democratic bloc, known as the European People's Party, held the greatest number of seats in the European Parliament.

DENZINGER

The name Denzinger is synonymous with a Catholic "handbook of creeds, definitions and declarations on matters of FAITH AND MORALS" (Enchiridion Symbolorum Definitionum et Declarationum de Rebus Fidei et Morum) that has appeared in forty editions, from 1854 to 2005. The current fortieth edition of Denzinger contains two main parts: (1) a compilation of "symbols," or professions of FAITH, from early apostolic times through the fifth century, and (2) a chronological collection of "Documents of the Church's Magisterium," beginning with Pope CLEMENT I of ROME (c. AD 92–101) and continuing through the pontificate of Pope JOHN PAUL II to 2003.

The selected magisterial texts are arranged chronologically according to various pontificates (not all pontificates are represented). In addition to declarations and decrees of councils (both local and ecumenical), there are also selections from papal letters, bulls, constitutions, and encyclicals, as well as documents of various departments of the Roman CURIA, especially the Holy Office (later renamed the Congregation for the DOCTRINE OF THE FAITH). Not all of the decrees and canons of ecumenical councils are presented, but the most significant sections concerning faith and morals are included. For the most part, MAGISTERIAL DOCUMENTS (other than those of the ecumenical councils) are papal or Roman. The recent editions, however, include selections from the general conference of the Latin American bishops. Many of the early documents are in Greek, but Latin is the dominant primary language. In more recent editions, modern vernacular languages such as Spanish appear in the primary texts.

First Five Editions. The original 1854 edition of the Enchiridion was the idea of Heinrich Joseph DENZINGER, a priest and professor of dogmatic theology in Würzburg, Germany. Denzinger was distressed by what he perceived as a neglect of the positive documents on faith and morals promulgated by the authority of the Church. Thus, in his first edition, he compiled some 100 ecclesiastical documents in Latin translation that included symbols or professions of the faith, decrees and declarations of councils (both provincial and ecumenical), and papal decrees to the pontificate of Pope PIUS IX. Denzinger oversaw a total of five editions during his lifetime, and he expanded the selections to include excerpts from Pius IX's 1865 ENCYCLICAL Quanta cura (along with his "Syllabus") as well as passages from VATICAN COUNCIL I. Curiously, he did not include any of the texts of the Council of TRENT.

Sixth through Thirty-first Editions. The sixth through the ninth editions (1888–1900) of Denzinger were overseen by Ignaz Stahl (1833–1916), a privatdozent and honorary professor at the University of Würzburg. Under Stahl, the number of documents increased to 155 with the inclusion of documents from Trent, the constitutions of Vatican I, and more papal encyclicals. After Stahl's death in 1905, the Herder Publishing Company took over the production of all subsequent editions. The first nine editions had been produced by Oskar Stahel of Würzburg.

The tenth through thirteenth editions (1908–1921) were overseen by Clemens Bannwart, S.J. (1873–1937), and his assistant, Johannes B. Umberg, S.J. (1875–1959). Making use of the best research of his day, Bannwart completely revised the first part of Denzinger on the creeds. In addition, he reworked the systematic index according to ten main categories, an arrangement that figured largely in the handbooks of DOGMATIC THEOLOGY until VATICAN COUNCIL II. A special concern with the dangers of MODERNISM is evidenced by Bannwart's inclusion of thirty-four pages of documentation from Pope PIUS X's 1907 encyclical Pascendi dominici gregis.

Umberg is listed as the editor for the fourteenth through the twenty-seventh editions of Denzinger (1922–1951). Umberg was a specialist in SACRAMENTAL THEOLOGY, and he included more documents in that area, as well as references to the 1917 Code of Canon Law. He also reintroduced a section on MORAL THEOLOGY into the index, arranging it according to the decalogue.

The twenty-eighth through the thirty-first editions (1952–1957) were overseen by Karl RAHNER, S.J. In the twenty-eighth edition, Rahner asked for suggestions for a revised edition of Denzinger. In anticipation of the revision, only minor changes were made in the editions of this period.

Schönmetzer as Editor. The revisions foreseen by Rahner were undertaken by Adolf Schönmetzer, S.J., who is listed as the editor for the thirty-second through the thirty-sixth editions (1963–1976). In the thirty-second edition (1963), Schönmetzer included close to 150 more documents and expanded about 100 others. He revised the section on the creeds as well as the introductions, the numbering system, and the index. In the thirty-third and thirty-fourth editions, Schönmetzer included excerpts from the encyclicals of Pope JOHN XXIII and documents of Pope PAUL VI. However, he did not include any of the documents of Vatican II because he planned to publish these in a separate volume that also would include other recent magisterial documents. Schönmetzer did not see this project to completion.

Hünermann and Translations. In 1981, Professor Peter Hünermann (1929–) of the University of TÜBINGEN began work on a new bilingual edition of Denzinger. The idea was to completely update the Enchiridion with the addition of key texts of Vatican II and postconciliar documents. Among those who provided suggestions for the new documents was Bishop Walter KASPAR of Rottenburg-Stuttgart, who later became the cardinal-prefect of the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity. Hünermann and his assistants likewise revised the original texts according to the most recent critical editions and provided changes and additions to the introductions and index as needed.

Hünermann provided German translations on pages opposite to the original texts in Greek, Latin, and other languages. The numbering system of Schönmetzer was retained but expanded. In the thirty-seventh edition, which appeared in 1991, the creeds of the ancient Church comprised *1 to 76 (as in Schönmetzer), but the documents of the Church's Magisterium now went from 101 to 4858, with the last entry being John Paul II's 1988 apostolic exhortation Christifideles laici. The numbering of the texts to 3997 corresponds to that of Schönmetzer's thirty-sixth edition, but a new system from 4001 onward was devised to include the texts from Vatican II through the pontificate of John Paul II. After the thirty-seventh edition, of 1991, subsequent editions were published with additional texts added. The most recent edition is the fortieth, published in 2005. It has documents through John Paul II's 2003 encyclical Ecclesia de Eucharistia, bringing the total number of entries to *5093.

Since 1991, editions of Denzinger-Hünermann have appeared in various vernacular translations, including French, Spanish, Italian, and Croatian (an edition in Chinese is under preparation). Ignatius Press will soon publish an English translation of the fortieth edition. It will be the first English translation of Denzinger to appear since that of the thirtieth edition produced by Roy J. Deferrari (1890–1969) in 1957.

Neuner and Dupuis. A handbook in English that serves the same purpose as Denzinger in many respects is the volume edited by Josef Neuner and Jacques DUPUIS titled The Christian Faith in the Doctrinal Documents of the Catholic Church, which appeared in its seventh edition in 2001. Whereas the documents in Denzinger are arranged chronologically, those in Neuner and Dupuis are arranged topically according to headings such as Revelation and Faith and Tradition and Scripture. The documentation in Neuner and Dupuis is not as extensive as that of Denzinger, but it does have the advantage of topical arrangement for those who are interested in documents pertaining to a certain subject.

Although prominent theologians such as Karl Rahner and Yves Marie-Joseph CONGAR have warned about the dangers of "Denzinger theology," there is no doubt that the Enchiridion is an important resource for students, theologians, teachers, and pastors. The citing of creeds and magisterial statements by references to Denzinger continued in the Catechism of the Catholic Church and in the writings of Pope John Paul II and Benedict XVI.

DETERMINISM

Determinism is the belief that every event is necessitated by antecedent events and causal principles. Since events are necessary, determinism is opposed to the belief in freedom of the WILL. Philosophers have proposed three responses to this challenge: soft determinism, hard determinism, and libertarianism. Compatibilism, or soft determinism, argues that freedom of the will and determinism are not mutually exclusive. Incompatibilism, meanwhile, insists that determinism and freedom of the will are exclusive of one another. Advocates of this view are divided into two camps: those who accept determinism and reject freedom of the will as illusory are hard determinists, while those who defend freedom of the will are libertarians.

There are a variety of arguments for determinism. Logical determinism argues that all propositions about the future are either true or false, thereby implying that the outcome is now necessary. More common is physical (or causal) determinism, which argues that the scientific laws governing the material universe necessitate events. Finally, theological determinism follows from God's infallible foreknowledge, since whatever he knows must occur.

Logical determinism, first suggested by ARISTOTLE in his discussion of future contingent events (De Interpretatione 9), is based on the logical principles of bivalence (every proposition is either true or false) and the excluded middle (if a proposition is true, its negation must be false). For example, according to the principles of logical determinism, the statement "There will be a sea battle tomorrow" must be either true or false. In addition, this certainty implies that there is a logical necessity to this event's happening. This second proposition can be refuted, however, by noting that the truth of a proposition does not mean it is necessary. Thus, while a statement is necessarily either true or false, the event can nevertheless be contingent.

Physical determinism arose with the ancient atomists and Epicureans, was revived with the materialism of Thomas HOBBES (1588–1679), and has been the main concern of modern philosophers as science has uncovered the laws of the physical universe. These discoveries moved some to claim that humans can achieve complete knowledge of the future if they have sufficient knowledge of the present. Determinism has even withstood the development of quantum mechanics, since the inability to predict an event does not mean that it is not determined. Contemporary arguments for physical determinism assert that because neither past events nor the laws of the universe are under human control, the future is not under human control. This reasoning is persuasive because of its appeal to scientific laws, for the world makes sense only if there are sufficient reasons for what happens. To deny physical determinism, then, seems to entail that some events would be uncaused and random, thus undermining the intelligibility of the universe.

Some responses to determinism posit a DUALISM (e.g., Cartesian or Kantian), but this introduces more serious problems. A better solution is found in repudiating the reductionist METAPHYSICS on which this argument is based. Physical determinism assumes that because a part of reality is determined by physical laws, the whole must be likewise determined. But both animal and intelligent life endow the agent with powers that exceed inanimate matter. These intentional agents control their activity. In other words, the soul is a cause of movement, and so human activity is not passively determined by extrinsic forces. Moreover, one cannot simply assume that there are no causal principles other than physical laws without begging the question at hand.

Variants of physical determinism include biological determinism, in which genetics dictates behavior; economic or historical determinism, as in Marxism; and psychological determinism, in which character or desires determine reactions to stimuli. Psychological determinism concedes that animate beings are intentional agents, but it posits that intentional attitudes mechanically determine actions. Again, this reasoning is circular, for it must assume that the intentional attitude is not the result of free choice or deliberative decision.

The problem of theological determinism results from the INFALLIBILITY of divine knowledge. If God's knowledge cannot fail to be true, then events appear to be necessitated by that knowledge. The problem is exacerbated by the doctrine of divine simplicity, which asserts that God's INTELLECT and will are one, which means that God not only knows what is going to happen, he also wills it to happen. While some thinkers, such as process theologians, respond to this problem by surrendering divine infallibility and omniscience, orthodox solutions must respect God's infallible creative knowledge without negating freedom of the will.

St. AUGUSTINE (354–430) frames the problem in De libero arbitrio voluntatis (The Free Choice of the Will). After establishing that free choice is the cause of evil, he argues that foreknowledge is not causal, so that free choice does not preclude divine foreknowledge. One can know that an event will happen, but this knowledge does not entail that the knower causes the event. The will is a source of free action, so God knows what the will chooses and will choose, but this knowledge imposes no necessity on the event. Thus, Augustine argues for a compatibilism in which divine foreknowledge does not undermine the existence of free choice. Later philosophers developed this distinction, accepting the necessity of God's knowledge while rejecting the necessity of the event.

BOETHIUS (c. 480–525) takes up the issue in Book V of The Consolation of Philosophy, where he argues that God's knowledge is eternal and so outside of time. ETERNITY is the simultaneous possession of the whole of reality; consequently, God does not foreknow events, He simply knows what exists from a perspective outside time. Therefore, He knows that it is natural causes that make some events necessary and others contingent; in neither case does His knowing impose necessity upon contingent events.

These arguments are synthesized by St. THOMAS AQUINAS (1225–1274) in Summa theologiae 1a, q.14, a. 13. There are two essential elements in his solution: the eternal nature of God's knowledge and the distinction between primary and secondary causes. This latter point must be emphasized in light of divine simplicity, since God's knowledge cannot depend on creation. Therefore, Thomas distinguishes God's knowledge as the primary and ultimate cause of existence and created natures as the secondary and proximate causes of change. God creates human nature to be free; thus, there are free acts because of God's creative knowledge, not despite it. In this way, created natures act as causes in cooperation with the divine will. Thomas concludes, "Things known by God are contingent on account of their proximate causes, while the knowledge of God, which is the first cause, is necessary."

Later thinkers attempted other solutions. John DUNS SCOTUS (1266–1308), for example, emphasized the omnipotent divine will, while Luis de MOLINA (1535–1600) devised the hypothesis of divine "middle knowledge." These theories encounter difficulties, however, because they seem to compromise the independence of secondary causes. Adequate responses to the problem of determinism must conceive the main issues properly, including the reality of human nature as an intentional agent created by God to allow humans to act freely in a world that is largely determined by scientific laws.

DEVIL

The supreme evil spirit. The term devil is derived from the Greek word διάβολος, which etymologically means an accuser, a slanderer. In classical Greek the word διάβολος was applied as a noun or an adjective ("slanderous") only to men, and in this way it is used also in 1 Timothy 3:11; 2 Timothy 3:3; and Titus 2:3. The SEPTUAGINT, however, used the term ὁ διάβολος to translate the Hebrew term haśśāṭān (the accuser, the adversary), and so also in the New Testament ὁ διάβολος (the devil) is a common synonym for the somewhat less frequently used term ὁ σατάν or ὁ σατανᾶς (Satan). Other New Testament synonyms for the devil are BEELZEBUL, Belial, the Evil One (ὁ πονηρός: Mt 13:19, 38; Jn 17:15; Eph 6:16; etc., and most likely Mt 5:37; 6:13), the Accuser (ὁ κατήγωρ: Rv 12:10), the Tempter (Mt 4:3), the Great Dragon and the Ancient Serpent (Rv 12:9), the Prince of This World (Jn 12:31; 14:30; 16:11), and the God of This World (2 Cor 4:4). The only New Testament occurrence of the term "a devil" (without the definite article in Greek) is in John 6:70, where Jesus speaks of JUDAS ISCARIOT as a devil, no doubt because Judas was already in the power of the devil (Jn 13:2, 27). Although strictly speaking there is only one Devil, SATAN, the term is often used broadly in the plural (devils) as a synonym for demons (though never thus in the Bible).

Many Church fathers regarded Isaiah 14:12 ("How you have fallen from the heavens, O morning star") as a symbolic reference to the Devil. Because morning star was translated into Latin as Lucifer, this name has long been used as a synonym for the Devil and Satan. According to Catholic doctrine, the Devil and the other demons were created as good angels who became evil by "their own doing" (sed ipsi per se facti sunt mali: the profession of faith of Lateran IV [1215]: Denzinger-Hünermann [D-H] 2005, 800). The BIBLE does not record how the Devil and the other evil spirits fell from God's grace, but some scriptures (e.g., Isa 14:12; Rev 12:7–9; Lk 10:18; Jude 6; 2 Pet 2:4; and 1 Tim 3:6) have been cited as either symbolic or indirect references to the sin of Lucifer and the fallen angels. Some early Christian writers (e.g., TERTULLIAN, CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA) believed Genesis 6:1–4 referred to the sin of the angels who, as "the sons of heaven" married "the daughters of man." Subsequent Church fathers and theologians, such as St. THOMAS AQUINAS, rejected this explanation because the sin of pure spirits like angels could not be sensual but only spiritual in nature (cf. Summa theologiae 1a, q. 63, a. 2). Theologians have pointed to pride or envy (or a combination of the two) as the likely reasons for the Devil's fall. The Jesuit Francisco SUÁREZ (1548–1617) speculated that God revealed the image of CHRIST, the Incarnate Word, to the angels, as their Lord. Lucifer, because of his pride, refused to accept one who had assumed flesh as his Lord, and he persuaded other angels to join him in rebellion (cf. Suárez, De angelis, Book 5, chapter 12, n. 13).

The existence of the Devil was taken for granted by Catholics until relatively recent times. Under the influence of certain forms of biblical criticism, some scholars suggested that the Devil simply represents a mythological way of personifying evil—appropriate for biblical times but not for today. Vatican II, though, referred several times to the reality of the Evil One (cf. LG, 16 and 18; GS, 13), and references to the Devil continued after the council. In his homily of June 29, 1972, PAUL VI expressed his feeling that "from some fissure the smoke of Satan had entered into the temple of God" (da qualche fessura sia entrato il fumo di Satana nel tempio di Dio: Insegnamenti X 1972, 707). In his general audience of November 15, 1972, Paul VI stated that "one of the Church's greatest needs today is to be defended against the evil we call the Devil (il Demonio)" (cf. Insegnamenti X 1972, 1168–1173). In the same audience, he referred to the Devil as "the number one enemy, the preeminent tempter.... who knows how to make his way into us through the senses, the imagination and concupiscence; through utopian logic, or through disordered social contacts in the give and take of our activities." The pontiff noted that although not every sin is due to diabolic action, we must nevertheless keep guard against the Devil's influence with "moral vigor." Less than three years later, on June 26, 1975, the Congregation for the DOCTRINE OF THE FAITH issued a document, Christian Faith and Demonology, which provided the scriptural and historical support for the reality of the Devil and stated that the Devil's existence was a revealed dogma of faith.

During the pontificate of JOHN PAUL II (1978–2005), the Catechism of the Catholic Church (CCC) was published (1992 and 1997 in its edito typica). The Catechism upholds the traditional Catholic belief that "Satan was at first a good angel made by God" who became evil by his own doing (no. 391). With regard to

"the fall of the angels," the Catechism finds "a reflection of that rebellion in the tempter's words to our first parents: 'You will be like God'" (CCC, 392). The clear suggestion is that the sin of the Devil and the demons involve both pride and jealousy of God. The Catechism likewise affirms the irrevocable character of the sin of the Devil (CCC, 393) and his "disastrous influence" (CCC, 394). Satan's power is not infinite, and he cannot prevent the building up of God's kingdom. Still, it remains "a great mystery that providence should permit diabolical activity" (CCC, 395). The Catechism refers to the rite of exorcism by which the Church asks "in the name of Jesus Christ that a person or object be protected against the power of the Evil One and be withdrawn from his dominion" (CCC, 1673). In speaking of the final petition of the Lord's Prayer ("deliver us from evil"), the Catechism observes that, "in this petition, evil is not an abstraction, but refers to a person, Satan, the Evil One, the angel who opposes God. The devil (dia-bolos) is the one who 'throws himself across' God's plan and his work of salvation accomplished in Christ" (CCC, 2851).

DIOCESE

According to the Code of Canon Law, a diocese is, before anything else, "a portion of the people of God" (c. 369) possessing two major characteristics: first, dioceses are usually organized territorially, so that all the Roman Catholic faithful in a given territory belong to that diocese (c. 372); second, dioceses are under the immediate authority of a single diocesan BISHOP, who governs with the assistance of his presbyterium (c. 369).

By clearly identifying dioceses as "particular churches" within the Catholic Church, the Second Vatican Council, especially in its dogmatic constitution, Lumen gentium, and its decree Christus Dominus, moved the doctrinal understanding of a diocese beyond the predominately administrative model that was contained in the Pio-Benedictine Code of Canon Law (1917 CIC 215–216). While all dioceses are juridical persons (c. 373) capable of possessing temporal goods (c. 1255), they are more fundamentally and more properly understood as associations of the people who make the Church on earth present and operative (c. 369). This recognition that dioceses are made up of people is reflected in the enhanced possibility that groupings of the faithful, based on some factor other than their territorial proximity (e.g., language), may now be the basis for recognizing that grouping as a diocese (c. 372).

Dioceses are ruled directly by a single diocesan bishop (cc. 134, 375–376, 381), even if he is assisted by one or more auxiliary bishops or a coadjutor (cc. 403–411). Diocesan bishops are not delegates of the POPE, a point that is reinforced by noting that, although territorial prelatures and abbacies, and apostolic vicariates and prefectures, are generally "likened" to dioceses (c. 368), these institutes are not dioceses and lack a proper bishop; instead they are governed by a priest or bishop expressly in the name of the Roman Pontiff (c. 371).

Dioceses can be established (and by implication, modified, merged, or suppressed) only by the supreme authority of the Church (c. 373). Dioceses must be divided into parishes, but the regrouping of parishes into deaneries or vicariates is now optional (c. 374). The canonical distinctions between dioceses and archdioceses are insignificant; although archdioceses historically had considerable influence over matters in their suffragan dioceses, at present, archbishops or metropolitans have almost no governing authority over other dioceses in their provinces (cc. 435–438).

The governance of a diocese, under its bishop, is accomplished chiefly through the diocesan curia (cc. 469–494). The curia includes such notable figures as the vicar general and episcopal vicars (cc. 475–481), the chancellor (cc. 482–491), and the finance officer (c. 494). The position of the moderator of the curia (c. 473) is optional, although in default of such an officer, his duties are generally handled by the vicar general or the bishop. Treated separately in the law but still considered a part of the diocesan curia are tribunal officers such as the judicial vicar (c. 1420).

In addition to offices within the curia itself, other institutes assist in the governance of a diocese, including the PRESBYTERAL COUNCIL (cc. 495–501), and a special group of priests drawn from the presbyteral council known as the college of consultors (c. 502), the mandatory diocesan finance council (cc. 492–493), and the optional but very common diocesan pastoral council (cc. 511–514). A diocesan synod (cc. 460–468) may be convoked by the bishop and operates in a quasi-legislative manner; nevertheless, final synodal legislative authority rests unambiguously with the diocesan bishop, who alone sets the agenda of a synod and promulgates its provisions. Pio-Benedictine norms that required periodic convocation of diocesan synods (1917 CIC 356) were commonly ignored throughout the twentieth century and have been eliminated from the revised law.

Bishops represent their dioceses in juridical affairs (cc. 118, 393), but ecclesiastical stability demands that the loss of a bishop not threaten the survival of the diocese itself. Norms for the administration of so-called impeded or vacant sees have been in place for many centuries and today comprise a considerable block of canons (cc. 412–430). Finally, dioceses may take on a number of forms under civil law (various corporation models being most common), but in case of conflict between the demands of the canonical structures of a diocese and its civil form, the canonical requirements have priority (cc. 22, 1290).

DIVINE MERCY, DEVOTION TO

The Devotion to Divine Mercy is a devotion to God's love. The devotion requires that one ask for His MERCY, trust in it completely, and in turn spread His mercy by being merciful as well.

Our Lord appeared to Sr. Maria Faustina KOWALSKA and mystically revealed the devotion to her. Sr. Faustina saw a vision of Christ: His right hand extended in blessing and His left pointing to His heart, which emitted rays of white and red light, symbolizing the water of baptism and the blood of the Eucharist, respectively. Christ proclaimed this image, now known as the "King of Mercy," to be a vessel of grace to all who venerate it.

Due to the efforts of Pope JOHN PAUL II (1920–2005), the devotion gained worldwide recognition throughout the Catholic Church. Since Christ commanded Sr. Faustina to have the image painted in 1931, the Devotion to Divine Mercy has gained immense popularity.

Sr. Maria Faustina Kowalska and the Devotion Given to Her. Daughter of a carpenter, Helena Kowalska was born in Glogowiec, Poland, on August 25, 1905. At the early age of seven she felt called to a religious vocation, and after receiving her first Communion and completing only three years of a primary education, she pursued this calling at the age of seventeen.

In August 1925, Helena entered the Congregation of the Sisters of Our Lady of Divine Mercy, and in April the next year, she received her habit and the name Maria Faustina. During her time in the order, Sr. Faustina began experiencing mystical revelations and visions and was given spiritual gifts, including the gift of prophecy, the ability to read souls, and the gift of hidden stigmata.

In 1933 Sr. Faustina traveled to Vilnius, where she underwent many mystical experiences and met Fr.

Michael Sopocko, who became her spiritual director. Fr. Sopocko instructed her to write her diary, later entitled Divine Mercy in My Soul. In this work, despite her limited education, Sr. Faustina recorded her encounters with and visions of Jesus.

Among these, she recorded the four main aspects of the Devotion to Divine Mercy. First, she wrote of a vision of Christ asking the image of Divine Mercy to be painted as described above, with the signature "Jesus, I place my trust in you." This image became the face of the devotion.

Second, Jesus gave Sr. Faustina the Chaplet of Divine Mercy. In a vision, she saw an angel about to destroy a city but found herself saying the words, "Eternal Father, I offer unto Thee the body and blood, soul and divinity of Thy dearly beloved Son, our Lord Jesus Christ, in atonement for our sins and those of the whole world. For the sake of His Sorrowful Passion, have mercy on us." Because of her efforts, the city was saved (Kowalska 2007, p. 475). Later, Jesus told her to add the words "and on the whole world" to complete the prayer now known as the Chaplet of Divine Mercy (Kowalska 2007, p. 476).

Third, Jesus revealed the sacredness of the third hour. In her diary, Sr. Faustina records that this is the hour mercy is available for every soul. Thus, all ought to immerse themselves in His mercy and pray the chaplet and the STATIONS OF THE CROSS, or if duty does not permit these prayers, at least take a brief moment to pray for mercy (Kowalska 2007, p. 1572). Through Sr. Faustina, Christ revealed that the third hour of every day is a special time in which spiritual graces are available.

The fourth main aspect of the Devotion to Divine Mercy is Divine Mercy Sunday, which our Lord requested in fourteen of Sr. Faustina's visions. Christ desired the dedicated day to be the Sunday in the octave of Easter, and Pope John Paul II proclaimed it so on April 30, 2000, over sixty years after Sr. Faustina's death.

In May 1936 Sr. Faustina began to lose her health and wrote the diary out of obedience to Sopocko. In her last few months, Sr. Faustina was no longer able to write. On October 5, 1938, she made her last confession and died later that evening.

Pope John Paul II's Mission of Mercy. Through the work of Pope John Paul II, Devotion to Divine Mercy blossomed. While a cardinal, Karol Wojtyla began the informative process that lifted the temporary ban on the devotion that had resulted from a faulty translation of Sr. Faustina's diary. Six months later, Wojtyla was elected pope on October 16, 1978. He had a special devotion to Divine Mercy and believed it to be a special mission of his to spread its message.

In addition to his work as a cardinal, Pope John Paul II greatly supported the devotion in three ways. First, in his preaching and writing, especially in the encyclical Dives in Misericordia, he publicly praised and supported the devotion. Second, he canonized St. Faustina—the main voice of the devotion—on April 30, 2000. Third, in addition to St. Faustina's canonization in the Jubilee year, he instituted Divine Mercy Sunday, on which priests preach about God's mercy. There is no doubt that divine providence was at work with the election of a Polish pope who believed in and encouraged the Devotion to Divine Mercy throughout the world.

The Devotion to the Heart of Christ and the Divine Mercy. Catholics are not required to believe in private revelations as articles of faith even if approved by the Church, but thanks to the work of Fr. Sopocko, St. Faustina's confessor, and the Congregation of the Marians of the Immaculate Conception's revealing and teaching that the Devotion to Divine Mercy has its roots in tradition and scripture, the devotion is held as a part of public revelation. Pope John Paul II's proclamation of Divine Mercy Sunday makes the devotion a part of the liturgy, further legitimizing the devotion. In fact, the Devotion to Divine Mercy can be considered part of the Devotion to the Sacred Heart.

St. AUGUSTINE speaks of mercy arising from affections that come from the heart. Now, just as the rays of mercy issue forth from our Lord's heart in the "King of Mercy" image, so too does the Devotion to Divine Mercy issue from the Devotion to the Sacred Heart. As part of that devotion, devotion to His merciful love is to be seen as central to the Catholic faith.

DIVINE WORD, SOCIETY OF THE

(SVD, Official Catholic Directory #0420, Latin Title: Societas Verbi Divini) This religious congregation was founded in 1875 at Steyl, Holland, by St. Arnold JANSSEN (canonized October 5, 2003 by Pope John Paul II), who was a priest of the German Diocese of Muenster. His original plan was for an institute of German secular priests to labor in the foreign missions; lay brothers, however, were soon included and even outnumbered the clerics for many years. At first the members took private vows and followed the rule of Dominican tertiaries. After the first general chapter (1884), a new rule recast the Steyl enterprise into a religious congregation with public vows; it was approved by the local ordinary (1889) and the Holy See (1905). The congregation then numbered 2,000 members and students and was established on five continents and the island of New Guinea. Foundations were made in South America (Argentina) in 1889; in West Africa (Togo) in 1892; in the United States, 1895; in New Guinea, 1896; in Japan, 1907; and in the Philippines, 1909. In 1923, the congregation founded the first seminary in the United States for African-American men studying for the priesthood in Bay St. Louis, Mississippi. In 2003 the congregation opened their first house in Russia. In total, the Society of the Divine Word can be found in 70 countries spanning Africa, Asia, the Americas, and Europe. As of 2009, the Society of the Divine Word was the largest international missionary congregation in the Catholic Church, having 6,138 members (3,999 priests) (Catholic Almanac 2010, p. 467).

Activities. Mission and evangelization hold the chief place among the works of the society; every member must feel himself called to this duty. Schools of all kinds are maintained. Special emphasis is placed on the training of a native clergy. From its earliest years, the society accepted recruits from its missions. In the field of science, the most notable achievements have been in anthropology, under the leadership of the world famous ethnologist, Wilhelm SCHMIDT. His work continues to be carried on by the priest-scientists who form the Anthropos Institute, which has international headquarters in Switzerland and publishes a quarterly journal, Anthropos. Divine Word missionaries have traditionally furthered the apostolate of the press; they maintain their own printing plants to disseminate Catholic literature, chiefly magazines and pamphlets. The brothers, who are invaluable for their many technical skills, have made major contributions to this effort.

Work in the United States. The first Divine Word missionaries to the United States were two brothers who were sent to solicit subscriptions for the society's publications. When others joined them (1897), the community settled on a farm near Shermerville (now Northbrook), just north of Chicago, Illinois. Here they opened St. Joseph's Technical School (Techny), which on February 2, 1909, became the first Catholic foreign mission seminary in the United States. It was also the cradle of the nationwide CATHOLIC STUDENTS MISSION CRUSADE (CSMC), founded in 1918 by Clifford King, SVD. In the United States, the SVD houses are grouped into three provinces: Chicago (headquartered in Techny, Illinois), Southern (headquartered in St. Louis) and Western (headquartered in Los Angeles). The generalate is in Rome.

DIVINI ILLIUS MAGISTRI

On December 31, 1929, Pope PIUS XI promulgated the encyclical Divini illius magistri, known by the familiar translation "On Christian Education." This encyclical reminds all Christians that education is an obligation of the Church. Love for children involves concern for their human development, and, since they are children of God, concern for their spiritual perfection as well. This development cannot happen without direction. Since children cannot, as a rule, educate themselves, they require adult direction. Because in the modern world there is considerable confusion about methods and aims in education ("an absence of clear and sound principles," n. 2), the Church must use its wisdom to resolve this confusion. Accordingly, this encyclical, broadly speaking, was published to explain the nature and aims of education and to criticize philosophies of education contrary to Catholic wisdom.

Pius XI saw himself as continuing the work of his predecessors, especially LEO XIII and PIUS X, who drew attention to the special obligations of the Church in education. Both Leo XIII and Pius X endured challenges from the surrounding Italian secular society. Also beleaguered by secular politics, Pius XI wrote "On Christian Education" partly to defend the autonomy of the Church in its dealings with civil society. The pope probably had in mind both the interference of the Garibaldi family during the first Vatican Council, and the rise of MUSSOLINI's FASCISM in the 1920s.

The encyclical also relies on the work of Pius X and BENEDICT XV, who assembled and interpreted canon law. Their labors led to publication of the 1917 Code of Canon Law. Traces of the 1917 Code appear as the encyclical addresses the issues of the overarching right of the Church to educate, the autonomy of Catholic schools, and the relation of the family to civil society. The document responds to the times, especially in the pope's alarm over the growth of secular, even anti-Catholic education, inspired by Enlightenment philosophers, such as Jean-Jacques ROUSSEAU and the pope's contemporary John Dewey.

The encyclical has been influential. Catholic educators sometimes appeal to it as support for maintaining the identity and integrity of Catholic schools in a pluralistic society. Further reliance on the document may appear when educators, both in higher education and preuniversity schooling, insist that religious instruction is insufficient to make a school Catholic. The encyclical supports the view that a Catholic school is one in which the entire curriculum—in keeping with the integration of the human being as an embodied person—is rightly ordered so as to perfect the human person. Accordingly, Catholic education is as concerned with a child's development in gym class as it is with his or her development in religious instruction.

Some scholars believe that the last third of the text (nn. 60–102) takes up controversial issues that influenced PAUL VI in writing Humanae vitae. While Divini illius magistri and Casti connubii come from the pen of the same pope, and while the two contain theses about the family that are the same in content and similar in expression, it seems more likely that Casti connubii was more directly of concern to Paul VI in the composition of Humanae vitae.

For purposes of a summary, the encyclical is divided into three broad sections. Paragraphs 1 through 31 basically assert that the Church, in cooperation with the family, has supreme authority to educate. The Church, as a supernatural society, directs education to the ultimate end of human life, which is nothing less than eternal friendship with God. This section also condemns certain secular and naturalistic philosophies that invent systems of education presumably sufficient to ensure the perfectibility of individuals and society. These philosophies are historically naïve and ignore ORIGINAL SIN.

Paragraphs 32 through 59 explain the right relationship of the individual, the family, and civil society in education. By virtue of its supernatural authority and comprehensive vision of human life, the Church has a right to educate. By virtue of NATURAL LAW, the family has an inalienable right to nurture the young. Hence, the Church and the family properly cooperate to educate children. Grace perfects, but does not destroy, nature. The Church teaches the child to participate in the supernatural society, just as the family prepares the child to participate in the civil society.

The final section (nn. 60–102) identifies difficulties that result from failure to accept the Church's prescriptions toward integrating the roles of individual, family, and state in education. Church-based education inspires a kind of "integral humanism," as Jacques MARITAIN would later call it. Failure to achieve this integration has led to a disordered modern society and excused the excesses of authoritarian states (such as fascist Italy and the Soviet Union, n. 73). Conspicuous among these excesses is the usurpation of the family's authority in order to indoctrinate children politically. Other symptoms of disorder are coeducation, exaggerated athleticism (apparently a kind of neopaganism), sex education, secular schools, utilitarian schools, and even mixed schools (where non-Catholics attend schools with Catholics, a condition proscribed in the 1917 Code of Canon Law, canon 1374). The 1983 Code of Canon Law removes the prohibition of mixed schools. Moreover, leadership in Catholic schools further loosened limitations as the Church encouraged parents to collaborate closely with teachers and Church authorities in developing curricula and educational activities (a prescription highlighted in the 1983 Code). Parental involvement made openness to coeducation and mixed schools inevitable, for example. The reservations of 1917 and 1929 were deemed anachronistic.

DIVINIZATION (THEOSIS), DOCTRINE OF

The concept of divinization or deification (Latin, deus, god + facere, to make: "to make godly" or "to make into a god"), or theosis (godliness) in Greek, arose to explain humanity's transformation into, and everlasting union with, the divine. Although originally used in a pagan context to show the external exaltation of great rulers (apotheosis), early Christian theologians appropriated a theology of deification to teach how in GOD's becoming human, humans can become God. For at the heart of the Church's understanding of salvation is the wondrous claim that in Christ's sharing in humanity, God allows humanity to share in his divinity. Such an assertion is admittedly in need of careful elucidation, and that is why at §460 the Catechism of the Catholic Church enlists some of the great saints to clarify what is meant by deification: The Word became flesh to make us 'partakers of the divine nature' (2 Pet 1:4): 'For this is why the Word became man, and the Son of God became the Son of man: so that man, by entering into communion with the Word and thus receiving divine sonship, might become a son of God' (Irenaeus, Adversus haereses 3.19. 1). 'For the Son of God became man so that we might become God' (Athanasius, De Incarnatione §54.3). 'The only-begotten Son of God, wanting to make us sharers in his divinity, assumed our nature, so that he, made man, might make men gods' (Thomas Aquinas, Opusculum §57.1–4). As such, the doctrine of Christian divinization is rooted in sacred Scripture and subsequently made more explicit through a varied and wide-ranging set of metaphors.

Sacred Scripture. Because the human person is created in God's image (eikon/imago) and likeness (homoiosis/similitudo), God as a defining and final goal has a special claim on the human person that extends to no other creature (cf. Gen 1:27). Accordingly, an inextricable relationship between human flourishing and the divine life is established at creation: The human person becomes truly perfected only in an assimilative union with God. Since in their prelapsarian state ADAM and EVE could enjoy every natural good perfectly, SATAN's bidding them to "become gods" stands as the sole temptation capable of enticing humanity to disobedience (cf. Gn 3:5). Nonetheless, the Old Testament explains how creatures can be provocatively referred to as "gods." MOSES is as a god to Pharaoh (cf. Ex 7:1), and even the LORD himself stands in the assembly of gods (cf. Ps 82), a passage ratified by Christ in John 10:34: "Is it not written in your law, 'I said you are gods'?" To make sense of this divine plural (theoi/dii), Christians rely on the doctrine of participation to argue that the gods in question were not autonomous deities but sanctified creatures who now share in the only true God's life.

Such a shared intimacy in divinity was explained in Pauline terms by adoption (cf. Rom 8:14–17, Gal 4:5, Eph 1:5, 3:19), as the life of Christ being conformed within each of his faithful (cf. Gal 2:20, 4:19; Phil 3:21; Rom 8:29; 2 Cor 3:18), becoming heirs of the Kingdom of God, and co-reigning with Christ in all of his glory (cf. Eph 2:6; Col 3:4). As instrumental as these Pauline passages are, the classic text comes at 2 Peter 1:4—humans having been made participants in the divine nature. This use of participation (koinonia or methexis) is essential, as it distinguishes pure and absolute divinity from the graced state of those brought into the life of God.

The Gospels reveal how the humble and maltreated not only participate in the crucified Christ but in some way become identified with him: Matthew writes of how Christ is served in the poor and outcast (cf. Mt 25:31–46), Luke equates Saul's hectoring of the Church with the persecution of Christ himself (cf. Acts 9:4), and the rich Johannine metaphors of unity, as well as his highlighting the indwelling of the Holy Spirit (cf. Jn 14:17), all provide later theologians with ways of imagining how Christ extends his incarnation in the lives of his faithful.

Church Fathers. From these fruitful seeds, the doctrine of deification reaches full blossom in the post-Apostolic Fathers who, while prayerfully reflecting upon scripture, also relied on key Platonic principles, such as participation and the divinely iconic nature of the human soul, to stress the Christic renovation of the human person. Trained in the various schools of PLATONISM, early churchmen resituated PLATO's definition of the good life as humanity's likeness to God (cf. Republic 10.613B; Theaetetus 176A–B; Timaeus 90A; Laws 716B) into a thoroughly Christocentric worldview.

Even though CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA (c. 150–c. 215) is the first Christian to use an unambiguous form of theosis, the word did not receive any formal definition until Dionysius the Areopagite in the sixth century identified deification as "the attaining of likeness to God and union with him in so far as this is possible" (Ecclesiastical Hierarchy 1.3; PG 3.376A). ORIGEN (d. 254) describes divine contemplation in terms of theosis, measuring a creature's worth by participation in the divine nature (On First Principles 1.6.2). Athanasius (d. 373) provided Christianity with its most quoted and succinct deifying trope (Athanasius, De Incarnatione §54.3, as cited above); at the same time the Cappadocians stressed humanity's deliverance from corruption and mortality in terms of theosis, the divine image in humanity as not only restored but elevated into perfect oneness with the Word.

In Latin theology deificare never became an indispensable term, although the reality of deification characterizes most explanations of the Christian life: Incorporation into the Mystical Body, growth in sanctifying grace, and the indwelling of the Holy Spirit. AUGUSTINE champions the concept of deification more than any other Western Father. In such intriguing lines as: "Let us thus rejoice and give thanks, for we have been made not Christians, but we have been made Christ" (Homilies on the Gospel of John 21:8; quoted at CCC §795), or again, through true charity "there will be one Christ loving himself" (Homilies on the Epistle of John 10:3), the bishop of Hippo provides much of the western tradition with a way of stressing the graced identity between Christ and Christian. In his CHRISTOLOGY he emphasized the "great exchange" of the Word's humanity for our divinity, and in his ecclesiology he developed the totus Christus which enabled him to make sense not only of how Christ at times speaks on behalf of his Mystical Body, but how he associates himself with his members.

Scholasticism and Orthodoxy. In one form or another, most schools of medieval mysticism centered around union with God, sometimes described as a deification but most often not explicitly so. Especially of note here is the work of St. THOMAS AQUINAS (c. 1225–1274) and Gregory PALAMAS (c. 1296–1359). Aquinas saw the pinnacle of the Christian life as humanity "becoming gods," arguing that the only bliss (beatitudo) and sole end of the human person is his "full participation in divinity" (Summa Theologiae III.1.2, resp.). Drawing heavily from St. Symeon the New Theologian's (949–1022) insights into creatures beholding and hence becoming the divine light, Palamas centered his far-reaching theology of deification on the distinction between the essence and the energies of God. Although the human person can never become united with (and thus violate) the divine essence, the deified Christian does become wholly one with the uncreated energies of God, and thereby enjoys divine perfection. Moreover, in many mystical theologies and various schools of spirituality of the Middle Ages, such as found in Meister ECKHART (c. 1260–1328), NICHOLAS OF CUSA (1401–1464), and JOHN OF THE CROSS (1542–1591), deifying union with God was presented as the essence of the Christian life. This union was explained most often as a participation in the divine life uniting the divine image in humanity with the enfleshed Christ.

Reformation and Early Modern Period. After the divisions within Christendom in the West, theologians tended to mute any language of deification. It was certainly not a preferred term of the Reformers, and the Fathers at Trent likewise avoided any mention of deification as the final end of the Christian life. Recent studies have, however, sought to uncover deifying elements of sixteenth- and seventeenth-century Protestant thinkers, arguing that the object of sola fide (faith alone) is, in fact, Christ himself and that this unio cum Christo (union with Christ, to use Martin Luther's term) renders the created soul godly in proportion to the faith of each.

In a similar way, many dynamics of Christian deification also became manifest in the Catholic pieties of the early Modern period. For example, devotions to the Sacred Heart of Christ and to the IMMACULATE HEART OF MARY emphasize an identity between the living Lord (and by rightful extension, his Mother) and the believer. Promoters such as John EUDES (1601–1680) could therefore develop a spirituality stressing the Christian life as a continuation of Christ's own action in the lives of the baptized: "Your Lord Jesus belongs to you, but more than that, he longs to be in you, living and ruling in you ... He desires that whatever is in him may live and rule in you" (Heart of Jesus §1.5). Bearing the same message, yet in a tone more conducive to his missionary work in Thailand, Louis Laneau (1637–1696) returned to the Fathers to show how the essence of every religious impulse was the deifying union with God, which is central to the Christian faith.

The Modern and Contemporary Periods. Reacting to the overly rationalistic tendencies of the ENLIGHTENMENT, Christian thinkers sought to recover a sense of divine intimacy by restoring the transformative role of sanctifying grace to theological discourse. Some within the OXFORD MOVEMENT, as well as many theologians on the continent, worked assiduously to restore the patristic vision of deification to a central place within preaching and theological discourse. Edward PUSEY (1800–1882), for example, coined the captivating word engodding (Lenten Sermon 108), and Catholics such as Matthias SCHEEBEN (1835–1888), in the same way, reclaimed the highly Augustinian theology of the divine indwelling.

In the twentieth century, as peoples and whole nations were being torn apart, Pope PIUS XII stressed the divinely intended unity of humanity in his 1943 encyclical Mystici Corporis Christi, whereas in his pontificate JOHN PAUL II (d. 2005) was much more explicit in relying on metaphors of divinization in official writings (e.g., Catechism of the Catholic Church §460 as above, §654, §1996, §2009). Popular writers such as Joseph Columba MARMION, O.S.B. (1858–1923) and C.S. Lewis (1898–1963) presented the Christian life as becoming "other" or "little" Christs. Recent studies have also revealed deifying themes in some of the major twentieth-century theologians: Karl BARTH (1886–1968), Karl RAHNER (d. 1984), Hans Urs von BALTHASAR (1905–1988), and T.F. Torrance (1913–2007). During these same years, strong theologies of deification originated as well from various Russian Orthodox theologians such as Pavel Florensky (1882–1937), Sergius Bulgakov (1871–1944), and Vladimir Lossky (1903–1958), who rediscovered the Palamite understanding of participating in God's energies and thus the subsequent divine activity by the renewed imago Dei within each Christian life.

Final Overview of Major Theological Aspects of Deification. Whether the term is explicitly employed or not, the soteriology of deification runs throughout the best of the Christian narrative. An unfortunate trend of some recent studies, however, too facilely equates simple Scriptural images for metaphors of deification. For example, not every act of adoption nor every instance of participation is necessarily deifying. Be that as it may, Christian deification teaches that the divine has become human so humans can become divine, a transformation that is eternally participatory and adjectival. That is, it never abolishes human nature but actually perfects it. The saints, as Origen exhorted, are the only true living ones, and the only true living ones are the saints (Commentary on the Gospel of John 2:11). The human person is created to become his truest individual self by fulfilling his divine image and thereby growing in the likeness of God. Such a process is always ecclesial: Christ communicates his life to the members of his Mystical Body through the sacraments he established for such. Baptism initiates this new life by grafting the baptized onto Christ, whereas the Blessed Eucharist not only feeds and sustains its faithful recipients but actually effects humanity's divine transformation.

Central to this divine renovation is the role of the Holy Spirit. The Love who unites Father and Son continues this agency in creation by bringing believers to God as well as to one another. In any theology of deification, the Holy Spirit is therefore the true unifier who imparts the grace of adoption, enabling the sanctified to call God Abba (cf. Rom 8:15). In the words of CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA (c. 378–444), "Participation in the Holy Spirit gives human beings the grace to be shaped as a complete copy of the divine nature" (Thesaurus §13). Adopting and thus shaping the human person into a kindred copy of the divine, the Spirit also incorporates each into the Mystical Body. Here the faithful become as God: immortal, incorruptible, perfectly loving, and capable of dwelling eternally in paradise in the full glory of the children of the Father.

Becoming gods by grace in the Spirit is of course radically different than some religious movements that also promise the creature's divinization. For the Christian, deification is always an act of humble participation in God's own life, a gift realized only in the offering of the perfect humanity of JESUS CHRIST. For those enmeshed in Mormonism or in the NEW AGE MOVEMENT, for example, godliness is a matter of possession and not of participation, an attempt to become gods autonomously simply by discovering one's innate divinity. A more philosophically cogent and consistently Christian theology of deification, on the other hand, proclaims the good news of humanity's divine status only through Christ's spanning the deadly chasm caused by human disobedience. Consequently, only Jesus Christ as fully divine and fully human can bring the perfection for which every human heart yearns.

DJIDJOV, PAVEL, BL.

Baptized Joseph, priest and MARTYR; b. July 19, 1919, Plovdiv, Bulgaria; d. November 11, 1952, Sofia, Bulgaria; beatified May 26, 2002, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

Baptized Joseph, Pavel Djidjov was born to LATIN RITE parents. He spent his elementary years at St. Andrew's, an Assumptionist school, and then went on to the College of St. Augustine from 1931 to 1938. At the age of nineteen, he traveled to France to enter the Assumptionist novitiate. He took the name of Pavel and made his final vows on September 8, 1942, but he returned to Bulgaria when he became ill.

On January 26, 1945, in the Cathedral of Plovdiv, he was ordained for the Latin Rite. He then returned to the College of St. Augustine, where he continued his schooling in business management and social sciences while he taught there. He became the treasurer at the college, while Fr. Kamen VITCHEV, who was later arrested with him, served as rector. The Communists closed the college in 1948, but Fr. Djidjov continued to minister to the students. Because of his anti-Communist views, Fr. Djidjov came under surveillance by the secret service. The following year he took the position of treasurer and procurator of the Bulgarian ASSUMPTIONISTS. He was outspoken in defending Catholic rights, but he knew his time was limited. Shortly before his arrest, he indicated that it would soon be his turn. He and Fr. Vitchev were arrested on July 4, 1952.

In prison, they were abused and tortured. Forty Bulgarian Catholic priests were tried in the Bulgarian Supreme Court on September 29, 1952. Labeled as spies and members of a subversive organization, they were accused of undermining the government through crimes, terrorist acts, and plotting an insurrection against the USSR and Bulgaria. Their penalty, issued on October 3, was death by firing squad. They were shot on November 11, 1952, in the central prison of Sofia, Bulgaria.

For decades no one knew what had happened to them. When the Berlin Wall fell in November 1989 and Communist archives were opened to researchers, that the true story of their martyrdom became known. In September 19, 1995, the cause of Fr. Djidjov's martyrdom was taken up, along with those of Fr. Vitchev and Fr. Josaphat CHICHKOV, another priest from their congregation. During his apostolic visit to Azerbaijan and Bulgaria on May 26, 2002, Pope John Paul II delivered a homily in which he beatified Fr. Djidjov and his companions. The pope remarked on the priests' talents in educating the young and in generating vocations. He also held them up as examples of "faith and constancy in the face of suffering and imprisonment."

Feast: November 11.

DONATION OF CONSTANTINE

A spurious document, called also the Constitutum Constantini, composed most likely in the early 750s, the Donation of Constantine relies heavily on a genuine composition of the late fifth century, the so-called Leg-

The Donation. Saint Sylvester, who reigned as pope 314–335, is pictured here receiving a crown, symbol of temporal power over Rome, from the Roman emperor Constantine I, 280–337; fresco, c. 1246 Saint Sylvester Chapel, Santi Quattro Coronati (four crowned saints) church, Rome, Italy. THE ART ARCHIVE/DAGLI ORTI/THE PICTURE DESK, INC.

enda s. Silvestri. The Donation purports to be a constitutional grant of the Emperor CONSTANTINE I, by which he handed over to Pope SYLVESTER I imperial power, dignity and emblems, the LATERAN PALACE, and rulership over ROME and "all provinces, localities and towns in Italy and the Western hemisphere." The grant was supposedly Constantine's reward to the pope for the gift of Baptism and for the emperor's miraculous recovery from leprosy. Because the emperor considered it inappropriate to reside in the same city with the successor of St. Peter, he removed his residence to CONSTANTINOPLE, which thereby became the urbs regia, or capital city, of the empire.

Composition and Application. The model upon which this forgery drew had already described the conversion of Constantine in vivid terms, and it enjoyed great popularity. What the forger in the eighth century did was to mold the contents of this novelistic product into something approaching a constitutional document. The oldest surviving copy of the forgery is preserved in Paris (Bib. Nat. Lat. 2777) and is indubitably of eighth-century origin. This spurious grant was influential throughout the medieval period and served as a basis for a number of the papacy's claims. It was used first against the LOMBARDS by STEPHEN II in his negotiations with King PEPIN in 754. Although the authenticity of this grant was rarely impugned—as far as is known, only OTTO III called the document outright what it was—its validity was often questioned, especially by civil lawyers in the Italian universities. They maintained that Constantine had acted ultra vires (beyond his authority) by making such vast donations and grants. Indirectly the Donation stimulated the emergence of the thesis of inalienability, according to which no ruler was entitled to give away any of his essential governmental functions or any lands entrusted to him. This thesis gained great importance in the medieval kingdoms. The spurious nature of the grant was not exposed until the fifteenth century, when quite independently NICHOLAS OF CUSA and Lorenzo VALLA proved that it was a fabrication.

Place and Purpose. While with great likelihood the Donation can be assigned to the pontificate of Stephen II, the place of composition is not certain. But there are strong indications that it was fabricated in the papal chancery, the head of which was Christophorus. Many adverse judgments have been made on this document; but, like all medieval forgeries, it should be seen from the contemporary point of view and in its historic context. By the time of its composition, relations between the papacy and the BYZANTINE EMPIRE had reached the breaking point. The latter had not acknowledged the PRIMACY OF THE POPE, and, in the immediately preceding decades, imperial legislation favoring ICONOCLASM had gravely concerned the West, especially the papacy. Papal resistance to this legislation only brought forth from Constantinople further threatening measures, which, in one way or another, went back to the Council of CHALCEDON (Canons 17 and 28, though Pope Leo I had refused to approve canon 28; cf. Tanner 1990, p. 76). According to canon 17, the civil status of a city determined its ecclesiastical status. The application of this canon diminished the status of Rome and, therefore, of the pope, because the capital of the empire, the urbs regia, was that city in which the emperor and his government resided. The author of the Donation wished to show how Constantinople had become the urbs regia. In so doing the forger utilized the Legenda s. Silvestri, where this theme had already been explored. He presented the transfer of the government from Rome to Constantinople as a thing to which Sylvester had agreed.

Although, according to the Donation, Constantine had offered the imperial crown to Sylvester, the latter refused to wear it. This clearly implied that if he had so wished, Sylvester could have worn it, and that, therefore, Constantinople had become the urbs regia through the volition and acquiescence of the pope himself. Consequently, the pope could withdraw this permission and retransfer the crown from Constantinople to Rome, for the seat of the imperial government was where the imperial crown was kept. No doubt this was the forger's principal aim. The forgery was directed exclusively against Byzantium, although by virtue of its comprehensiveness and vagueness it could be used in the West, as in fact it was. The forger dealt with no less a problem than that of legitimate rulership in the Roman-Christian world, that is, of the ROMAN EMPIRE. The seat of the empire was at Constantinople, whose orthodoxy, however, was, in more ways than one, suspect. In demonstrating the historical changes ideologically, the author was compelled to constitute the pope a proper ruler in the West. And since no ruler could exist without governmental machinery, emblems, and territorial possessions, these too were granted, but were only a subsidiary feature of the document.

Clearly, for the papacy to exercise governmental functions, the constitutional and institutional enactments were of great value because they supplied the regal function of the pope and made him a true king and priest. The Donation was a construction whose obvious weakness was that it presented the regal function of the pope as derived from an imperial grant. When the full potentialities of the pope as the VICAR OF CHRIST were elaborated, the Donation could be dispensed with, as was done, in fact, by INNOCENT III.

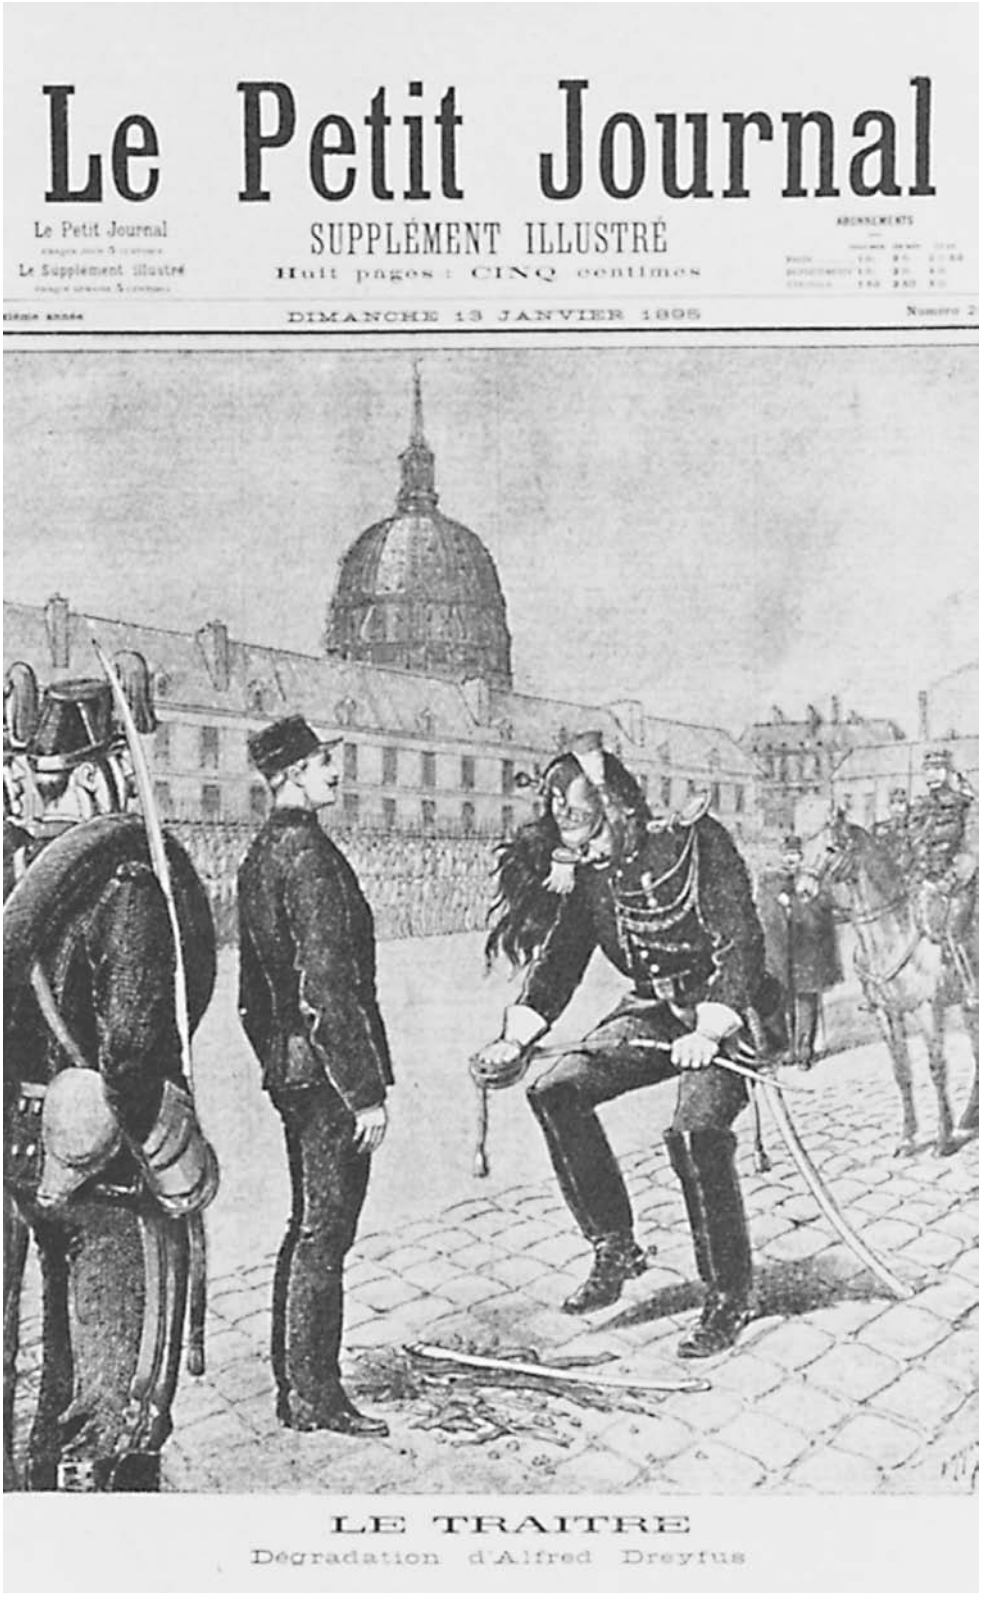
DREYFUS AFFAIR

The Dreyfus Affair was one of France's most significant political controversies during the period of the early Third Republic. It divided that nation and had an important effect on the French Catholic Church.



Alfred Dreyfus, a member of a prominent Jewish-Alsatian family, was assigned, as an artillery captain, to the General Staff in Paris in 1893. Soon after, however, on the basis of handwriting comparisons, he was accused of passing secrets to the Germans. In December 1894 he was found guilty of treason by a court martial. After being reduced in rank, he was sent to Devil's Island to be imprisoned for life. Then, in 1896, Lieutenant Georges Picquart, the chief of French military intelligence, uncovered evidence that another officer, Major Ferdinand Esterhazy, was actually the guilty party. However, rather than admit a mistake had been made, Picquart was silenced by his superiors and dismissed from the service.

The case of Alfred Dreyfus became a major divisive issue in France, with much of the French Catholic Church taking a position against Dreyfus and the claim of his innocence. In January 1898 Émile Zola wrote an impassioned defense of Dreyfus in an open letter titled "J'accuse," which was published in the Paris newspaper L'Aurore. Zola denounced both the civil and military authorities for their part in the case. In August of the same year, Lieutenant Colonel Hubert Henry confessed that, as Picquart's successor as the chief of intelligence, he had forged documents implicating Dreyfus. He was subsequently arrested and committed suicide. In June 1899 the Dreyfus case was brought before the Cour de cassation (Supreme Court of Appeal), which ordered a new trial. A second court martial, however, again found Dreyfus guilty, but ten days later the government of Premier Pierre Waldeck-Rousseau and President Émile Loubet nullified the verdict and pardoned Dreyfus. It was not until July 1906, however, that Dreyfus was fully rehabilitated by the Cour de cassation, returned to the army with the rank of major, and awarded the Legion of Honor. He went on to serve in World War I as a lieutenant colonel.

The Dreyfus case served as the catalyst for a major political and social crisis in France during the Third Republic. Extremists on both the Right and the Left used the affair to illustrate their disillusionment with the prevailing order. A strong ANTI-SEMITISM was unleashed in various factions in France, including the military and a large element in the Catholic Church, and the nation was sharply divided between "Dreyfusards" and "anti-Dreyfusards." Among the Dreyfusards were intellectuals (such as Anatole France and Charles Péguy), Socialists, radicals, Republicans, moderates, and antimilitarists, while the anti-Dreyfusards included factions of anti-Semites, clericals, and the nationalist Right. As a result of the Dreyfus Affair, a liberal government was voted into power and the military was reformed. There would also be significant repercussions for the Catholic Church in France.

Before the Dreyfus Affair, in the early 1890s, the VATICAN and a small number of influential French Catholics had sought a rapprochement (the Ralliement) between French Catholics and the anticlerical Third Republic. This was because Pope LEO XIII (1878–1903) had abandoned the intransigence of his predecessor, Pope PIUS IX (1846–1878), and sought to reconcile the Church with modern society. Thus, in November 1890, with papal approval, Cardinal Charles LAVIGERIE (1825–1892) urged the officers of the French Mediterranean fleet (a mostly royalist audience) to recognize "a great need for unity." Leo XIII perceived the adherence of French Catholics to the monarchist cause to be counterproductive, and in February 1892 the papal encyclical Au milieu des sollicitudes put the pontiff's full support behind the Ralliement.

The Ralliement achieved only limited success, however, although there were some prominent converts to the cause, such as Count Albert de Mun (1841– 1914). Resistance and mistrust against the Ralliement remained strong among both clericals and anticlericals, and the Dreyfus Affair served only to intensify these sentiments. The fact that the Ralliement had not significantly affected the political balance was underscored by the election results of 1898, as well as the general response to Zola's letter that same year. Indeed, the Dreyfus Affair demonstrated that any real reconciliation between French Catholics and Republicans, at least in terms of the preservation of the CONCORDAT OF 1801 and the Church's unique position in France, was difficult, if not impossible.

Unjust Punishment. This illustraition from Le Petit Journal, January 13, 1895, shows Captain Alfred Dreyfus standing at attention, while another soldier breaks his sword.

The Dreyfus Affair and its aftermath served as a watershed in the development of church-state relations in France. Just as the Dreyfus issue divided the nation at every level, it was also a unifying point for diverse anticlerical factions within the government. While the Ralliement policy had succeeded in making Catholicism significantly respectable in France, during the course of the Dreyfus Affair the Church was greatly discredited, and French Catholic rallies became superfluous to any political alliance. Moreover, the Socialists were generally no longer considered dangerous and became allies in a new national cause. To many French people, it had been the anticlericals and not the churchmen, and particularly not the Church establishment, that had championed fairness and justice during the Dreyfus Affair.

This was, of course, an oversimplification, for many Catholics had taken the side of Dreyfus. The pope himself indicated at various times that he believed in the French officer's innocence. However, this was not reported very much in the French press. Instead, the press usually reported that for every case of Catholic support for Dreyfus there were many more examples of extreme anti-Dreyfusard and anti-Semitic Catholic statements and acts. Among these were quotes from La Croix, the newspaper of the French Assumptionist order, stating that support for the military was more important than the actual resolution of Dreyfus's innocence or guilt.

After Dreyfus's second trial in 1899, when he was again found guilty of treason (this time with "extenuating circumstances"), the outcry for justice, as well as an explanation and revenge, was overwhelming. The object of this revenge became the religious congregations, whose teaching role had long been the subject of Republican dissatisfaction. The JESUITS in particular, with their military connections, as well as the ASSUMPTIONISTS and DOMINICANS, who had defended the army and unleashed strong anti-Semitic and anti-Republican rhetoric, were also convenient targets.

The French government responded strongly to these sentiments. Waldeck-Rousseau considered the congregations to have no roots in secular society and to be subversive elements who looked to ROME, not Paris, for leadership. Moreover, it was noted that the Concordat of 1801, which governed church-state relations in France, made no provisions for the regular clergy. Accordingly, the Law of Associations was passed on July 1, 1901. This law stipulated that existing religious corporations, including male and female congregations, had to apply to the government for authorization, especially to teach. If such authorization was refused, their corporate properties were to be sold off and their members dispersed.

In 1902, while the exact methods of application of the law were being considered, the results of the national election were announced, providing a further and more crucial test for church-state relations. The newly elected prime minister, Émile Combes, was strongly anticlerical and a determined opponent of the Catholic Church. He quickly implemented Waldeck-Rousseau's law on the religious congregations, which were immediately dispersed and their schools closed. In particular, the Assumptionist order, which was considered right-wing and anti-Semitic, and which had taken one of the strongest anti-Dreyfusard positions, was effectively dissolved. In all, eighty-one congregations of women and fifty-four of men, along with the schools that they ran, were closed. Then, going still further, Combes demanded that the traditionally religious French navy be purged of its Catholic practices.

Later in 1902, Combes deliberately sought a direct confrontation with Rome over the most pressing church-state issue: the right of the French government to nominate bishops. At this point, Pope PIUS X succeeded Pope Leo XIII as pontiff. In 1903 the problem was further exacerbated when Rome sought to dismiss two French bishops. In June 1904 they were summoned to Rome and ordered to resign. However, according to the Organic Articles, which were an addendum to the Concordat of 1801, it was illegal to obey a Roman summons without government permission. The tension between Rome and Paris rose steadily, but the final break was precipitated by a different matter: the Italian church-state dispute known as the ROMAN QUESTION.

A disagreement erupted over the April 1904 courtesy visit made by the president of France to the Italian king in Rome, whose loss the Vatican had steadfastly refused to recognize. Disputes between the Church and the French government continued, and in 1905 the Law of Separation was passed, effectively abrogating the Concordat of 1801 and ending the ties between CHURCH AND STATE in France. State salaries for priests and bishops were ended, and all Church property was, in theory, now controlled by the state. (The more moderate government of Aristide Briand, however, later allowed the Church to use its own property.) In February 1906 the Church officially responded. Pope Pius X issued his encyclical Vehementer nos, in which he condemned the unilateral separation. In reality, however, Rome was prepared to accept the legislation but was concerned with keeping it confined to its stated limits and intentions.

The Dreyfus Affair had persuaded French Republican leaders that a new set of anticlerical laws was needed, particularly in light of what they deemed the unacceptable nature of clerical influence in their country. They also pointed to the strongly anti-Dreyfusard attitude of most conservative Catholics in France. Thus, the Dreyfus Affair and its aftermath ultimately weakened the already unpopular Ralliement policy of Pope Leo XIII, and it prompted significant legislative changes regarding church-state relations in France, including the anticlerical laws of 1901 and the final Law of Separation of 1905.

DUFF, FRANK

Founder, Legion of Mary, lay apostle, author, lay observer at Second Vatican Council; b. Dublin, Ireland, June 7, 1889; d. Dublin, November 7, 1980.

Raised Catholic and employed in civil service, Frank Duff became involved in outreach to the spiritually and materially poor through the St. Vincent de Paul Society in 1913. Simultaneously, he became an avid reader of spiritual books and began taking his spiritual life seriously. In 1918, he obtained a copy of True Devotion to the Blessed Virgin Mary by St. Louis Marie Grignion de Montfort. Struggling with its meaning, he read it repeatedly upon the advice of a friend. While engaged in a final and forced reading, he received what he later termed a "divine favor" (Bradshaw 1985, p. 55). He suddenly realized with the interior conviction of a light given by the Holy Spirit that everything de Montfort said about the Blessed Virgin was completely true and nothing was exaggerated.

The LEGION OF MARY was born as a consequence of Duff's sharing his conviction about de Montfort's writings with others. Together with a group of thirteen women and Father Michael Toher, Duff held the first meeting of the Legion of Mary in Dublin on September 7, 1921 (Bradshaw 1985, pp. 67–69), the eve of the Feast of the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin. The distinguishing characteristic of this nascent group of lay apostles was the ardent desire to live a life of holy union with the Blessed Virgin, who is, as de Montfort describes, the Helpmate of her divine Son in the work of Redemption. In addition to this union leading to the sanctification of one's own soul, the Legion's vision was that any real union must blossom into the practical service of Jesus through Mary, exhibited through caring for the materially and spiritually impoverished.

In True Devotion, de Montfort prophesied that, as the world draws to its end, "those richest in grace and virtue will be the most assiduous in praying to the most Blessed Virgin, looking up to her as the perfect model to imitate and as a powerful helper to assist them" (de Montfort 1963, no. 46). Duff's life exhibited firmness of faith coupled with gentleness of spirit, humility, and extreme kindness toward all. His intimacy with Our Lady constantly nourished his conviction that in the poor he and the Legion served, Jesus Christ was "really present and appealing for help and compassion" (Bradshaw 1985, p. 97). Duff knew that the ability to touch and reclaim broken lives for Jesus Christ was a direct consequence of not only devotion to, but also complete dependence upon and even total consecration to, the Blessed Virgin, in accord with St. Louis de Montfort. As stated in the Legion's handbook, "the Legion aims to bring Mary to the world as the infallible means of winning the world to Jesus" (The Official Handbook of the Legion of Mary 1993, XXVII, 1). According to the divinely established order, the soul without the Blessed Virgin, who is the Mediatrix of All Graces, cannot lift itself to GOD or do God's work.

From the Legion's humble beginnings in Dublin, it quickly spread. The Legion became an answer to the prayers and urgings of Pope PIUS XI, who was "the Pope of Catholic Action." In 1931, Pius XI announced that it was his personal desire that the Legion of Mary would spread over the whole world (Bradshaw 1985, p. 102). The Legion of Mary now operates in more than 160 countries, with its active membership numbering more than two million. The handbook of the Legion of Mary has been published in more than fifty languages.

Not only was the Legion's involvement of lay people in a spiritual apostolate truly revolutionary prior to the Second Vatican Council, but it was also a prophetic catalyst for the work of the Council. On July 13, 1960, Pope JOHN XXIII declared: "The Legion of Mary presents the true face of the Catholic Church" (The Official Handbook of the Legion of Mary 1993, Appendix 1). In 1965, Duff was invited to be a Lay Observer to the final session of the Council. The very apostolic ideas he had advocated for decades became the official Church view. While in ROME, Duff gave numerous addresses to groups of clergy, religious, and students. In appreciation for what he had done for the Church, he received a round of loud and sustained applause when he was introduced to the Council (Bradshaw 1985, pp. 195–199). While such honors must have certainly humbled and delighted him, those closest to Duff knew that in his view the greatest honor would be contributing to the work that St. Louis de Montfort prophesied must characterize the Church in preparation for the Second Coming of Jesus Christ, namely, making the Blessed Virgin Mary better known and loved, so that Jesus Christ Himself could be more fully known and loved (Bradshaw 1985, p. 252; Montfort 1963, no. 50).

Duff's canonization process was opened in Dublin in 1989, nine years after his death. The cause for this Servant of God's beatification is actively underway. All of his writings, talks, letters, and documents have now been collected and are currently being reviewed.

DUPUIS, JACQUES

Belgian Jesuit priest, theologian, and teacher; b. Huppaye, Brabant Province, Belgium, December 5, 1923; d. Rome, December 28, 2004.

Jacques Dupuis was born into a devoutly Catholic, middle-class Belgian family. His father was an engineer, and Jacques came of age during the Second World War, when German forces occupied his country. After completing his studies at the Jesuit High School of the Sacred Heart in Charleroi, in Hainaut Province, he joined the Society of Jesus in 1941. He then completed a licentiate in letters at Namur, gained a licentiate in philosophy at Louvain, and in 1948 finally realized his desire of being sent to India as a missionary. He spent 36 years in India and remained a member of the Calcutta Jesuit Province for the rest of his life. At the age of 80, he spoke of his time in India, saying, "My exposure to the Indian reality has been the greatest grace I have received from God as far as my vocation as a theologian and a professor is concerned."

Dupuis studied theology at St. Mary's College in Kurseong, India (near Darjeeling), which looked across rich forests and tea plantations to the majesty of the Himalayan peak of Mount Kanchenjunga, the world's third highest mountain. After his ordination to the priesthood, he earned a doctorate at Gregorian University in Rome. Under the tutelage of Antonio Orbe, his doctoral thesis was on the early Christian scholar Origen (c. 185–254). He then went on to teach THEOLOGY, first in Kurseong, and then in Delhi when the theology faculty was transferred there in 1971.

From 1973 until 1977, Dupuis worked as assistant editor of the Clergy Monthly (which became the Vidyajyoti Journal of Theological Reflection in 1974). He went on to serve as editor of the journal from 1977 until 1984. He acted as theological adviser to the Catholic Bishops' Conference of India, while also doing work for the FEDERATION OF ASIAN BISHOPS' CONFERENCES (FABC). In 1973 he published The Christian Faith in the Doctrinal Documents of the Catholic Church. It grew from 711 pages in its first edition (which was co-edited by Josef Neuner, S.J.) to 1,135 pages in its seventh edition, which was published in 2001.

In 1984 Dupuis was transferred to Gregorian University, and a year later he became the editor of its quarterly journal, the Gregorianum. He quickly made the journal a means for promoting the teachings of VATICAN II, as it had once been. He showed himself to be a distinguished director of doctoral dissertations and a first-rate teacher in the licentiate program. His classes on CHRISTOLOGY and the theology of religions often drew well over two hundred students. From 1985 to 1995 Dupuis also worked as a consultant for the PONTIFICAL COUNCIL FOR INTERRELIGIOUS DIALOGUE, and he made a major contribution to their 1991 document, "Dialogue and Proclamation." As an interpreter he attended four of the bishops' synods held in Rome (1974, 1983, 1985, and 1987).

Throughout his life, Dupuis continued to write and publish books, including his 1994 work Who Do You Say I Am?: Introduction to Christology, which was written in English and also published in French, Italian, and Spanish. The book that made him widely known was also written in English (as well as appearing in French, Italian, Portuguese, and Spanish). This was Toward a Christian Theology of Religious Pluralism (1997). Over a hundred reviews in major journals, along with numerous articles in journals and chapters in books, evaluated his views. Toward a Christian Theology also brought Dupuis dozens of invitations to deliver lectures across Europe and in Asia and North America. His thoroughly researched and meticulously argued book addressed major questions that remain highly relevant: How can one profess FAITH in Jesus Christ as the one SAVIOR of all humankind and at the same time recognize the Holy Spirit at work in religions and cultures everywhere? What, from a Christian perspective, is the role of the world's religions as visible paths to SALVATION? A subsequent, more "popular," work, Christianity and the Religions (2001) clarified some of his positions and introduced the expression "inclusive pluralism, " which he used to sum up his theology of religions.

In late 1998 the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith (CDF) sent Dupuis a nine-page document challenging the views expressed in Toward a Christian Theology. His terminology came under fire, including his use of "decisive" rather than "definitive" to describe the historical redemption and revelation effected by Christ. He was also accused of endorsing false positions, such as his distinction between the eternal Word of God and Jesus of Nazareth. Yet the CDF could not produce evidence from his book to show that Dupuis was expounding opinions contrary to Christian and Catholic faith. Eventually, on February 27, 2001, the CDF published a "Notification" which simply said that the book contained "notable ambiguities and difficulties on important points, which could lead a reader to erroneous or harmful positions." But Dupuis was not asked to change a single line in his book.

Because of his fidelity to Christ and the Church, Dupuis found the whole affair disconcerting and wounding. To avoid possible misconceptions, the Notification of the CDF was included in a subsequent edition of Toward a Christian Theology of Religious Pluralism, and Dupuis expressed his assent to the theses it contained. Nonetheless, the book remains a classic in the post–Vatican II reappraisal of the status and value of "other" religious traditions. Dupuis died in Rome on December 28, 2004, and was buried in the Jesuit mausoleum in the city's major cemetery, the Campo Verrano. A Festschrift published in 2003 in honor of his 80th birthday, edited by Daniel Kendall and Gerald O'Collins, contains much information on his life and theology, as well as a complete bibliography of his writings up to 2003 and a full bibliography of reactions to Toward a Christian Theology of Religious Pluralism.

DURANDO, MARCANTONIO, BL.

Priest and founder of the Company of the Passion of Jesus the Nazarene (Nazarene Sisters), Turin, Italy; b. May 22, 1801, Mondovi, Italy; d. December 10, 1880, Turin, Italy; beatified October 20, 2002, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

Marcantonio was one of eight children born to a prominent northern Italian family. His father was regarded as a secular thinker, but his mother was a devout Catholic. The family was politically active in the Italian unification movement (the RISORGIMENTO), and two of his brothers held high civil and military positions; Marcantonio recognized a religious vocation, however. He attended the diocesan seminary at fourteen and the Congregation of the Mission of St. Vincent de Paul, and he was ordained on July 12, 1824. Though he hoped to be a missionary in China, he was assigned to local mission work. After six successful years, Fr. Durando was appointed superior of the Vincentian house in Turin, which became a spiritual hub and the site of meetings and retreats. He served there until his death.

Fr. Durando promoted the association for the Propagation of the Faith, which had been created in Lyon, France, in 1822. He brought the Daughters of Charity, an order cofounded by St. VINCENT DE PAUL, to northern Italy. These sisters first worked in military and civilian hospitals, but they grew quickly and set up units called Misericordie from which they managed schools, shelters, soup kitchens, nursery schools, and orphanages, among other social welfare organizations. Fr. Durando was actively involved in the order's management and spiritual guidance. He served as Vincentian Visitor of Lombardy for forty-three years and oversaw seven retreat houses. He also acted as the spiritual advisor to the Sisters of St. Joseph, the Sisters of St. Anne, the POOR CLARES, and the Repentant Sisters of St. Magdalene. Fr. Durando never lost his passion for mission work and, in 1855, he created the Brignole-Sale College in Genoa to train priests for assignments abroad. In 1865 he founded the Company of the Passion of Jesus the Nazarene (Nazarene Sisters). The members of this community were not eligible to join other religious orders because they had not been born into Church-sanctioned marriages. Fr. Durando's decision to organize this community caused considerable controversy among the conservative hierarchy of the Church. The congregation worked primarily as home hospice nurses comforting the sick and dying and bringing many into the faith.

Fr. Durando was a respected advisor to those who looked to him for spiritual guidance, and he was an example of dedication and selflessness to the religious and lay community. In beatifying him, Pope John Paul II said he "lived the faith and a burning spiritual zeal, shunning every kind of compromise or interior tepidity."

Feast: December 10.

E

ECCLESIA DEI COMMISSION

Ecclesia Dei is the name of the pontifical commission established by the motu proprio of the same name, issued by the initiative of Pope JOHN PAUL II on July 2, 1988, to respond to the schismatic act of the late Archbishop Marcel LEFEBVRE (1905–1991), who ordained four priests to the episcopate on June 30, 1988, without the papal mandate. By that act, which the pope characterized as "schismatic" (Ecclesia Dei §4), Lefebvre and the four bishops he ordained incurred automatic excommunication, according to §1382 of the Code of Canon Law. The motu proprio was a heartfelt invitation by the pontiff to those who were in sympathy with Lefebvre's movement not to follow him and thereby also incur excommunication. On the positive side the motu proprio officially recognized the legitimacy of an attachment to the previous liturgical tradition—the liturgical books in force in 1962, particularly the Roman MISSAL in its typical edition of 1962.

The commission was established "to collaborate with the bishops, with the Departments of the Roman Curia and with the circles concerned, for the purpose of facilitating full ecclesial communion of priests, seminarians, religious communities, or individuals until now linked in various ways to the Fraternity founded by Monsignor Lefebvre, who may wish to remain united to the Successor Peter in the Catholic Church, while preserving their spiritual and liturgical traditions, in the light of the Protocol signed on 5 May last by Cardinal Ratzinger and Monsignor Lefebvre" and to oversee the use of the previous Roman liturgy (L'Osservatore Romano 13 March 2009, 8). Whereas the canonical erection and supervision of religious institutes exclusively using the 1962 liturgical books was more easily accomplished, the provision of the Mass according to the 1962 Roman Missal constituted a greater problem. At the conclusion of the motu proprio, the pope's statement that "respect must everywhere be shown for the feelings of all those who are attached to the Latin liturgical tradition, by a wide and generous application of the directives already issued some time ago by the Apostolic See for the use of the Roman Missal according to the typical edition of 1962" had no real juridical force. It relied entirely on the good will of individual diocesan bishops, some of whom insisted that the Mass according to the 1962 Roman Missal, known variously as the TRIDENTINE MASS or the traditional Latin Mass, was against the spirit of the Second Vatican Council. They believed it should only be provided for those who couldn't adjust themselves to the changes introduced by Sacrosanctum Concilium, the Council's Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, and its subsequent application in the reformed liturgical books.

The difficult work of guiding the commission in its first formative years was entrusted to Cardinal Augustin Mayer (1911–). O.S.B. Mayer, the founder of the Liturgical Institute at the Benedictine faculty of Sant'Anselmo in Rome, was the former abbot of Metten, Germany; former secretary of the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life; and former prefect of the Congregation of DIVINE WORSHIP AND THE DISCIPLINE OF THE SACRAMENTS. His background equipped him well to cope with the numerous difficulties that he had to deal with in the first days, when there were no clear guidelines to follow and little juridical support. His years as president (1988–1991) were marked by sagacity and sensitive pastoral concern. Monsignor Camille Perl ably served as secretary of the commission from its inception until he was named vice president in 2008 and later retired in July 2009. Mayer's successor as president was Cardinal Antonio Innocenti (1991–1995), a career diplomat who had previously served as nuncio in Spain and prefect of the Congregation for the Clergy. His presidency (1991–1995) was marked by cautious and limited expansion of the work of the commission, as was that of his successor Cardinal Angelo Felici (1995–2000), another career diplomat who had already served as nuncio in France and prefect of the Congregation for the Causes of Saints.

The nomination of Cardinal Darío CASTRILLÓN HOYOS in April 2000, while he was also serving as prefect of the Congregation for the Clergy, marked a definite expansion of the work of the commission. The former archbishop of Bucaramanga, Colombia, took an immediate interest in bringing the four bishops consecrated by Archbishop Lefebvre and the Society of St. Pius X, comprised of the priests and seminarians under their leadership, into full communion with the Catholic Church and in providing a juridical basis for the celebration of the Mass and sacraments according to the 1962 liturgical books. The latter goal was codified in the motu proprio of Pope BENEDICT XVI, Summorum pontificum of July 7, 2007, for which Castrillón had laid the groundwork, as well as the preparation of a practical interpretation of the document, not yet published. A first step toward his former objective, the reconciliation of the Society of St. Pius X and its integration into the Church, was achieved on January 21, 2009, with the remission of the excommunication incurred by the four bishops Archbishop Lefebvre had ordained. This was an act of clemency by Pope Benedict, even while the four bishops themselves insisted that the original excommunication was invalid. Unfortunately, the situation immediately became complicated by an uproar in the media, after it came to light that Richard Williamson (1940–), one of the four bishops, had denied the extent of the HOLOCAUST of Jews under Nazi Germany. The pope had to insist on several occasions that he had been unaware of this and intended no slight to ISRAEL or Jews of the Diaspora.

This gesture of mercy on the part of Pope Benedict became at the same time a source of contention within the Church, and the pope addressed a letter to the bishops of the Church on March 10, 2009, explaining his motives. In it he stated that "until the doctrinal questions are clarified, the Society has no canonical status in the Church, and its ministers—even though they have been freed of the ecclesiastical penalty—do not legitimately exercise any ministry in the Church" (L'Osservatore Romano March 13, 2009, 8). Further, he indicated that it was his "intention henceforth to join the Pontifical Commission 'Ecclesia Dei'—the body which has been competent since 1988 for those communities and persons who, coming from the Society of Saint Pius X or from similar groups, wish to return to full communion with the Pope—to the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith." This he did officially by issuing his motu proprio, Ecclesiæ unitatem of July 2, 2009, which restructured the Pontifical Commission Ecclesia Dei, linking it organically to the Congregation for the DOCTRINE OF THE FAITH. With that restructuring Cardinal Castrillón ended his nine-year tenure as president when he reached the age of eighty, the same age at which his three predecessors had also relinquished the presidency. With the provisions of the new motu proprio, in 2009 the prefect of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Cardinal William Levada (1936–), also held the presidency of the commission. Monsignor Guido Pozzo, formerly an official of the congregation and adjunct secretary of the INTERNATIONAL THEOLOGICAL COMMISSION, was named secretary and charged with arranging the dialogue between theological experts of the HOLY SEE and those of the Society of St. Pius X.

As of 2009 matters remained open on two different fronts: whether the Society of St. Pius X will be reconciled to the Catholic Church and to what extent the celebration of the Mass and the Sacraments according to the 1962 liturgical books will become more established in the Church and whether eventually the ordinary (postconciliar) and extraordinary (1962) forms of the ROMAN RITE will coalesce.

ECCLESIA DE EUCHARISTIA

Ecclesia de Eucharistia is the title of the fourteenth and final encyclical letter of Pope JOHN PAUL II (in office 1978–2005). The name of the letter comes from its opening sentence: "Ecclesia de Eucharistia vivit (the Church draws her life from the Eucharist)." The encyclical consists of six chapters and a total of sixty-two sections or numbers. It is dated HOLY THURSDAY, April 17, 2003.

Context of the Encyclical. Thematically, the encyclical builds upon Vatican II's recognition of the Eucharistic sacrifice as "the source and summit of the entire Christian life" (Lumen gentium, no. 11). The letter, therefore, reflects upon the centrality of the Eucharist for the life of the Church. John Paul II also places the encyclical within the context of his annual letters to the priests of the world marking Holy Thursday, "the day of the Eucharist and the priesthood" (Ecclesia de Eucharistia, no. 7). He also notes that an encyclical dedicated to the Eucharist is a special way of "thanking the Lord for the gift of the Eucharist and the priesthood" in the twenty-fifth year of his pontificate, something he previously did in his book, Gift and Mystery (1996), published on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of his priestly ordination (no. 7). The encyclical likewise seeks to continue "the Eucharistic amazement" (no. 6) expressed in the apostolic letter, Novo millennio ineunte (2001), which marked the new millennium as well as the Marian link to the Eucharist within the context of the Year of the ROSARY (October 2002–October 2003).

Summary of Contents. In the introduction (nos. 1–10), John Paul reflects on the "cosmic character" of the Eucharist celebrated "on the altar of the world" in a way that unites heaven and earth (no. 8). He notes that the Eucharist is "the most precious possession which the Church can have in her journey through history" (no. 9). This is why the Church has taken "a lively concern" for the Eucharistic mystery reflected in the authoritative teachings of the councils and the popes (no. 9). In this context, he mentions the decrees of TRENT on the Eucharist and the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass, as well as the Eucharistic encyclicals of Popes LEO XIII, PIUS XII, and PAUL VI. Since Vatican II, he recognizes both highlights and shadows with respect to the Eucharist. While the liturgical reform of the Council "has contributed greatly to a more conscious, active and fruitful participation in the Holy Sacrifice of the Altar on the part of the faithful," there are also indications of the abandonment of Eucharistic adoration and the reduction of the Eucharistic mystery to a "fraternal banquet" (no. 10). In this regard, he expresses "profound grief" over reports of "Eucharistic practices contrary to the discipline of the Church," and he states that "the Eucharist is too great a gift to tolerate ambiguity and depreciation" (no. 10).

In chapter one, "The Mystery of Faith" (nos. 11–20), John Paul II reflects on the sacrificial meaning of the Eucharist, drawing upon the witness of Scripture and Church fathers such as St. AMBROSE and St. CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA. He affirms the fitting and proper use of the term "transubstantiation" as an expression of the mysterious transformation of the bread and wine into the substance of Christ's body and blood (no. 15). He also teaches that "the Eucharist is a true banquet, in which Christ offers himself as our nourishment" (no. 16), thereby linking the sacrificial meaning of the Eucharist to its significance as a meal or banquet. He reaffirms the traditional Catholic themes of the Eucharist as purification from sins (no. 17) and a "pledge of future glory" (no. 18). John Paul II likewise highlights the Eucharist as a "communion with the Church in heaven" (no. 19) and a stimulus for "our sense of responsibility for the world today" (no. 20).

Chapter two, "The Eucharist Builds the Church" (nos. 21–25), stresses "the causal influence of the Eucharist" that is "present at the Church's very origins" (no. 21). The Eucharist incorporates the faithful into Christ and helps them become a "sacrament" for humanity (no. 22). He reflects on "the inseparable activity of the Son and the Holy Spirit" at work in the Eucharist and the life of the Church (no. 22), and he notes how "the seeds of disunity" which are present because of sin "are countered by the unifying power of the Body of Christ" (no. 24). Thus, the Eucharist builds up the Church and "creates human community" (no. 24). John Paul II points to "the inestimable value" of the worship of the Eucharist outside of the Mass (no. 15). Eucharistic adoration enables the faithful, like the Beloved Disciple, to lie close to the breast of the Lord "in silent adoration," and this is why the practice of Eucharistic adoration outside of Mass has been "repeatedly praised and recommended by the Magisterium" (no. 25).

In chapter three, "The Apostolicity of the Eucharist and of the Church" (nos. 26–33), John Paul II considers how the Eucharist is linked to the apostolicity of the Church. In this regard, he explains how the ministerial priest, acting in persona Christi, is "a gift which the assembly receives through episcopal succession going back to the Apostles" (no. 29). With respect to ecumenism, he notes the unfortunate "lack of the sacrament of Holy Orders" and "the genuine and total reality of the Eucharist" in "the Ecclesial Communities that emerged in the West from the sixteenth century onwards" (no. 30). In light of this, the Catholic faithful, "while respecting the religious convictions of these separated brethren, must refrain from receiving the communion distributed in their celebrations, so as not to condone an ambiguity about the nature of the Eucharist" (no. 30). John Paul II also highlights the centrality of the Eucharist to the life and ministry of priests and to the worship and pastoral life of the Christian community. In this regard, he notes the incompleteness of Catholic communities without a priest, and he exhorts all "to pray with greater fervor" for priestly vocations (no. 32).

In chapter four, "The Eucharist and Ecclesial Communion" (nos. 34–46), John Paul II underlines the importance of the Eucharist for ecclesial communion in both its invisible and visible dimensions. He notes how invisible communion "presupposes the life of grace" and worthiness for reception (no. 36). In this regard, those who are conscious of grave sin or who "obstinately persist in manifest grave sin" are "not to be admitted to Eucharistic communion" (no. 37). In terms of visible communion, the Holy Father points out how the Eucharist unites the worshipping assembly to its own bishop and to the Roman Pontiff (no. 39). He also highlights the importance of Sunday Mass (no. 41) and examines the relationship of the Eucharist to ecumenical activity (nos. 42–46).

In chapter five, "The Dignity of the Eucharistic Celebration" (nos. 47–52), John Paul II relates how "architecture, sculpture, painting and music" have found in the Eucharist "a source of great inspiration" (no. 49). In light of the beauty and dignity of the Eucharistic mystery, he exhorts priests to celebrate the Eucharist "with great fidelity" (no. 52). Because various abuses have emerged, he mentions that he has asked "the competent offices of the Roman Curia to prepare a more specific document" on the proper norms for Eucharistic celebration (no. 52). (On March 25, 2004, this document appeared as the instruction Redemptionis Sacramentum, issued by the Congregation for DIVINE WORSHIP AND THE DISCIPLINE OF THE SACRAMENTS.)

Chapter six, "At the School of Mary, Woman of the Eucharist" (nos. 53–58), marks the encyclical as a contribution not only to Eucharistic theology but also to MARIOLOGY. Drawing upon some of the themes expressed in his Apostolic Letter for the Year of the Rosary, Rosarium Virginis Mariae (which includes the Eucharist as a "mystery of light"), John Paul II notes how Mary is "a woman of the Eucharist in her whole life" (no. 53). Not only is she a model of Eucharistic faith (no. 53), but she is also intimately linked to the sacrificial dimension of the Eucharist by her "spiritual communion" with the passion of her Son, which is made present at every Eucharist (nos. 56–57). The Holy Father recommends "re-reading the Magnificat in a Eucharistic key" (no. 58), as a "school" of Eucharistic contemplation. In the conclusion, he encourages the faithful to "listen to Mary Most Holy, in whom the mystery of the Eucharist appears, more than in anyone else, as a mystery of light" (no. 62).

Many of the themes of Ecclesia de Eucharistia provided the inspiration for the Apostolic Letter Mane nobiscum domine (October 7, 2004), which proclaimed the Year of the Eucharist (October 2004–October, 2005), the year in which John Paul II passed from this world.

EDUCATION, CATHOLIC (HIGHER) IN THE UNITED STATES

At the beginning of the twenty-first century, 16 percent (or 219 in total) of the Catholic colleges and universities in the world were in the United States, although U.S. Catholics made up only 6 percent (or 75 million) of the world's Catholic population at the time. These colleges and universities have some of the most mature and sophisticated curricula and research programs in Catholic institutions of higher learning worldwide. The vast majority of these institutions (over 90 percent) were founded by religious communities, while thirteen are women's colleges and twelve are diocesan institutions. Since 1963, eighteen new Catholic colleges have been founded in the United States.

The History of American Catholic Education. The beginnings of Catholic education in the United States were humble, however. Religious communities, especially women's congregations, founded boarding schools and academies as early as the seventeenth century. The Spanish FRANCISCANS opened a school in St. Augustine, Florida, in 1606, and the French Franciscans founded a school for boys in New Orleans in 1718 (the Ursuline Sisters founded a school for girls in 1727 in the same city). Early Protestant colleges included Harvard College (now University), founded in 1636; The College of William and Mary, founded in 1693; and Yale College (now University), founded in 1701.

Bishop John Carroll founded the nation's first Catholic college, Georgetown Preparatory Academy, in 1789. Located in Bethesda, Maryland, the school was later handed over to the JESUITS. Since there were relatively few Catholics in the nation at this time (an estimated 25,000 in 1776), the leaders of Georgetown welcomed students regardless of their religious tradition. By 1840, the Jesuits, SULPICIANS, DOMINICANS, and VINCENTIANS had all established colleges in America. Colleges for women followed later, with religious congregations of women establishing the College of Notre Dame of Maryland (in 1873), St. Mary-of-the-Woods College in Indiana (1894), Trinity College in Washington, D.C. (1897), and the College of New Rochelle in New York (1904).

By the middle of the nineteenth century, immigration had increased the number of Catholics in the United States considerably, though upon arrival they were confronted by a largely Protestant, and sometimes hostile, country. In 1884, at the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore, the American bishops decreed that every Catholic parish establish a grade school and that there should be a national Catholic University at which Catholics, especially priests and religious, could take up graduate studies. The CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA was founded five years later in Washington, D.C., under the direct control of the hierarchy, and its first class consisted of forty-six clerical students. Eventually, over fifty religious congregations of men built houses of study near the university. The university admitted its first lay students in 1895, and in 1905 it opened all its divisions to undergraduates, mainly for financial reasons. Until 1920, most students pursued their graduate education at the Catholic University.

The nineteenth-century Catholic colleges followed the European system. That is, they offered a six-year college program (four years of gymnasium followed by two years of college). By the late nineteenth century, however, the standard arrangement in the country was four years of high school followed by four years of college. Admissions officers at secular universities did not understand, and sometimes simply rejected, the undergraduate transcripts from Catholic institutions. By 1930, therefore, nearly all the nation's Catholic colleges had adopted the American educational structure.

The Twentieth Century. At the beginning of the twentieth century, religious orders of women began establishing more colleges. By 1926 twenty-five Catholic women's colleges existed, comprising more than one-third of the sixty-nine colleges then accredited by the Catholic Educational Association (founded in 1904, and renamed the NATIONAL CATHOLIC EDUCATIONAL ASSOCIATION, or NCEA, in 1927). Some of these colleges became quite distinguished (St. Catherine's in Minneapolis, for example, was recognized by the prestigious Phi Beta Kappa association in 1937), and at St. Mary's College in Indiana, Mother Madaleva established the first doctoral program in theology for women in the 1940s (women were not then admitted to such programs in men's universities).

From 1920 to 1960, the number of Catholic colleges and universities in the United States increased from 130 to 231. Enrollment increased during that same period, from 34,000 to over 300,000, a nearly ten-fold increase. From the beginning of the twentieth century, professionalism forced these institutions to increase their quality and become accredited, and it became necessary for their faculties to obtain graduate degrees and eventually publish. From the 1920s to the late 1950s, these colleges used neoscholastic philosophy to integrate their undergraduate curricula. The teaching of theology for credit did not become common until the 1950s and 1960s, however. Before then, theology was primarily taught to seminarians.

It is difficult to describe the powerful winds of change that swept through U.S. Catholic colleges and universities (and through the country in general) in the 1960s. At least four major forces contributed to the profound change: (1) the postwar economic boom, (2) the widespread dissolution of Catholic neighborhoods, (3) the cultural revolution of the 1960s, and (4) the Second Vatican Council. During the postwar years, the GI Bill made it possible for tens of thousands of World War II veterans to attend college. At the same time, the growth of the American economy and the rapid growth of the middle class allowed many urban Catholics to move to the suburbs where they found few Catholic schools and Catholic neighborhoods.

The cultural revolution of the 1960s involved a youth culture marked by money, rock music, drugs and greater freedom. The times strained the relationship between young people and their parents (the so-called generation gap) and distanced them from most normative institutions, including the Church and the government, which was waging the Vietnam War. Finally, VATICAN COUNCIL II (1962–1965) effectively changed the liturgical life of ordinary Catholics and profoundly affected the members of religious orders, many of whom left their communities in the latter part of the decade. It was a heady and difficult time, as well as a time of innovation and change for educational institutions.

The 1967 Land O'Lakes Statement represented one of the most powerful currents for change in Catholic higher education. A meeting was convened in Land O' Lakes, Wisconsin, by Theodore HESBURGH, the president of the University of Notre Dame. The meeting was attended by a group of prominent Catholic educators, and the statement they released argued that a Catholic university must have "a true autonomy and academic freedom in the face of authority of whatever kind, lay or clerical, external to the academic community itself." In subsequent years, however, it seemed that many educational leaders paid more attention to protecting that freedom and autonomy than they did to another important requirement of the statement, namely that "the Catholic university must be an institution, a community of learners or a community of scholars, in which Catholicism is perceptibly present and effectively operative."

By the late 1960s, Catholic colleges and universities in the United States began to transfer fiduciary authority for their institutions to boards of trustees largely composed of lay persons, many of them alumni who generously offered their skills (largely managerial and financial), loyalty, and wealth to these institutions. Meanwhile, the religious who taught and led these institutions dramatically decreased in number. At the same time, the military draft made going to college more attractive to many young men, at least as an alternative to going to Vietnam. Thus, enrollments swelled at Catholic universities, and many more professors had to be hired, nearly all of them lay persons. Some of these new hires had only master's degrees, and a few had doctoral degrees, but nearly all of their degrees had been acquired at secular universities.

At least partially as a result of this shift, major controversies about faculty governance and academic freedom exploded on several campuses. Court cases in Maryland and New York led to rulings stating that institutions that explicitly privileged the hiring of Catholic faculty were "pervasively sectarian" and not eligible for federal aid for residence halls and science buildings. Thus, both internal and external forces pushed many Catholic institutions to prove that they were not "pervasively sectarian."

In 1967 the Catholic historian Philip Gleason described the challenge Catholic colleges and universities faced if they were to remain Catholic:

> In what sense is a university Catholic if it is composed predominantly of lay professionals who employ, in their teaching and research, the same methods and norms as their counterparts in secular universities, and who are engaged in the pursuit of knowledge in autonomous spheres that are in no way dependent upon any overall "Catholic position"? What, in short, is the reason for the being of the Catholic college or university? (Hassenger 1967, p. 52)

On both the national and international ecclesial levels, moves were taken to help Catholic colleges and universities answer Gleason's question. The Second Vatican Council called for the first revision of Canon Law since 1917. That revision, completed in 1983, contained several canons on Catholic colleges and universities. In 1985 the Vatican began a worldwide process of consultation, which culminated in Pope John Paul II's 1990 apostolic exhortation, ex corde ecclesiae. JOHN PAUL II recognized in this document the need for institutional autonomy and academic freedom called for by the Land O'Lakes Statement, but just how these terms should be understood still remains to be seen. Ex corde ecclesiae developed more fully the identity and the mission of the Catholic university, providing an inspiring description of the identity and mission of the Catholic university.

The ASSOCIATION OF CATHOLIC COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES (ACCU) devoted most of its annual meetings in the 1980s and 1990s to issues surrounding mission and identity. One of the major concerns of the 1990s was precisely how the American bishops would implement the pope's 1990 Apostolic Exhortation. After years of debate and discussion with the leaders of Catholic higher education, the American bishops agreed on a largely pastoral form of implementation. However, under considerable pressure from Rome, they agreed at a subsequent meeting to include some juridical requirements specified in the 1983 Code of Canon Law, among them a MANDATUM that those who teach Catholic theology were to request from the local bishop.

The Twenty-first Century and the Future. The 220 Catholic colleges and universities in the United States (as of 2007) vary greatly in size and resources. As many as half of these institutions struggle to maintain enrollment, are almost completely tuition driven, and depend on alternative forms of instruction (e.g., distance education, weekend programs) to remain open. About twenty of them can afford to be selective in admitting students and benefit from their endowments. The rest of the institutions remain tuition driven and compete for students who enjoy a variety of choices. Only a few colleges for women continue to exist, most having merged in the 1970s and 1980s with coeducational universities.

Several major challenges face all these institutions. Two shall be mentioned here. First, there are the issues that come from funding—both the lack of funding and solid funding. On the one hand, for those institutions facing possible closure, finding financial resources becomes such a preoccupation that the mission and identity of the institution may fall out of view. On the other hand, for those few institutions with excellent funding, pressure to join the ranks of prestigious private and public institutions may also lead them, for quite different reasons, to be inattentive to their Catholic mission and identity. Moreover, the vast majority of Catholic colleges and universities are unable to offer generous financial aid packages, which means that few families have the financial resources to send their children to these schools. No Catholic college or university is able to meet the financial needs of all the students they admit, so need-blind admission is possible only at the very few institutions that have very large endowments.

A second challenge facing these institutions is hiring faculty and administrators who understand the mission and identity of Catholic higher education. While many Catholics have doctorates, few are Catholic intellectuals—that is, few are scholars who approach their disciplines with presuppositions that flow from the doctrine of creation, the Incarnation, and Catholic social thought, especially as it applies to the professions. Few faculty candidates, even Catholics, bring such intellectual vision to the academy. An increasing number of lay university presidents are chosen by the predominantly lay boards of trustees for their administrative and fundraising skills above all else. In the increasing absence of priests and religious as administrators and faculty (not all of whom provided intellectual leadership in the past), the Catholic mission and identity of these institutions needs to be located in more than Catholic presidents who are good administrators, campus ministries, and service programs, as important as all of these elements are.

Some steps are being taken to meet this second challenge. Colleges and universities are devising, with more or less success, ways to hire faculty and administrators who contribute to their distinctive religious missions. This has been achieved in some institutions through special appointments to endowed chairs, the appointment of "mission effectiveness" officers, the establishment of Catholic Studies programs, and closer attention to the content of the core curriculum. While it is forbidden by law in the United States to inquire about candidates' personal religious beliefs, it is perfectly legal to inquire as to whether they have the competencies to teach certain courses (e.g., Literature and Catholicism, Economics and Catholic Social Teaching, or Natural Law and Moral Norms) and how they will contribute to the mission of the institution. Besides careful attention to hiring, which may yield faculty open to but largely ignorant of Catholic intellectual traditions, colleges and universities are collaborating (as in the case of supporting the Collegium summer program), organizing, and promoting opportunities for faculty to learn about these traditions.

Finally, given the publication of Ex corde ecclesiae and its implementation in the United States, Catholic colleges and universities need to meet the challenges associated with being part of both the local and the international Church. Catholic higher education needs to help address the pastoral needs of the larger Church, just as bishops need to support the intellectual mission of the university. The academic freedom of individual professors needs to be respected, just as faculty members need to respect and contribute to the mission of a Catholic university. How these challenges are met will determine in large part the strength, distinctiveness, and future of Catholic colleges and universities in the United States.

EDUCATION, CATHOLIC (K THROUGH 12) IN THE UNITED STATES

Catholic K-12 schools have a long and distinguished history in the United States. As Harold Buetow points out in Of Singular Benefit (1970), they were originally founded in what are now Florida and Louisiana in the seventeenth century, though they experienced various conflicts with the Protestant British colonial government.

Nineteenth-Century Growth. Immigration spurred the establishment of Catholic schools in the mid-nineteenth century. Approximately 2.5 million immigrants, many of them Irish and Catholic, entered the United States between 1821 and 1850 (U.S. Census Bureau 1890). Many Germans, both Lutheran and Catholic, came to the United States at this time as well. These groups encountered the pan-Protestant common school, which had been founded by Horace MANN (1796–1859) in Massachusetts and were allegedly nonsectarian, although they featured the devotional reading of the King James Version of the BIBLE. The best known of Catholic difficulties with the public schools occurred in New York City in the 1840s, when Archbishop John HUGHES led an unsuccessful fight for a share of the tax funds for Catholic schools. Rebuffed, Hughes established the beginning of what has been referred to as the "Catholic school system."

German-American Catholics were especially active in support of Catholic schools, regarding the parish school as necessary to preserve their German heritage. The professional staff of Catholic schools was usually made up of religious women (nuns), and sometimes religious brothers, with many of the orders having European origins. Elizabeth SETON (1774–1821) founded the first order of American nuns, the SISTERS OF CHARITY, in 1809. Because of the foreign origin of many of the parents and teachers, the different languages they sometimes used, and their adherence to the pope as their spiritual head, Catholic schools were often seen by Protestant America as "foreign," and therefore "un-American."

Catholic Schools after the Civil War. The ANTI-CATHOLIC school movement intensified in the wake of patriotism for the Union engendered by the Civil War. The BLAINE AMENDMENT, which was nearly enacted by the U.S. Congress in 1875, would have prohibited any aid by the federal government to sectarian schools. In response, at the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore in 1884, the U.S. Bishops enacted a decree that required each parish to have a school within two years, unless the bishop of the diocese decided otherwise, and mandated that all Catholic parents send their children to these schools, unless the bishop exempted them. Despite these decrees, the heroic efforts of the women religious who staffed the schools (their number in the country grew from 6,000 in 1866 to 32,000 in 130 different religious communities by 1890 according to George C. Stewart in Marvels of Charity [1994]), and the sacrifices by Catholic parents, the number of parishes with schools increased only from 40 percent to 44 percent in the ten years after Baltimore III (Brown 1953, p. 323)

Catholic schools were an issue within and outside of the Church as the nineteenth century neared its end. Internally, some "liberal" bishops, led by Archbishop John IRELAND of St. Paul, Minnesota, sought a compromise with public education by turning parish schools over to the civil authority, with religion being taught after "official" school hours ended each day. Ireland's plan, the best known of several such compromises in the nineteenth century, lasted but a year and was heatedly criticized by a number of his fellow bishops, especially Archbishop Michael CORRIGAN of New York, Archbishop Frederick KATZER of Milwaukee, and Bishop Bernard MCQUAID of Rochester, New York. It took a plea from Cardinal James GIBBONS, the archbishop of Baltimore, to Pope LEO XIII for the pontiff to intervene directly and end the controversy. Leo called for Catholic schools to be zealously promoted, but he stated that it was up to the bishop of the diocese to decide when attendance at public schools could be allowed.

Externally, the existence of Catholic schools was felt by some Catholic leaders to be the biggest problem between American Catholics and their fellow citizens, who identified public schools with good American citizenship. The states of Illinois and Wisconsin attempted to regulate nonpublic schools within their borders. In Wisconsin, this attempt (the Bennett Law) was viewed by Catholic and Lutheran leaders as an effort to eliminate, or at least control, their schools. The law defined a school as one that taught subjects in the English language and required students to attend school in the public school district in which they lived. Catholic and Lutheran leaders held that parents, not the state, were the primary educators of their children, and attendance at public school was not necessary for citizenship. The law was repealed in early 1891.

The Early Twentieth Century. According to Buetow, Catholic school enrollment continued to increase in the early years of the twentieth century, going from 405,234 in 1880 to 1,701,219 in 1920 (p. 179). The presence of ethnic parish schools gradually diminished, however, due to the assimilation of Catholic immigrant families into American society. The efforts of some members of the American hierarchy and leading Catholic educators also contributed to this decline.

World War I, however, led to intensified opposition to anything "foreign." Once again, political attempts were made across the nation to eradicate Catholic schools as centers of "foreignism." The most dangerous of these efforts occurred in the state of Oregon, where a law was passed that would have required all children in the state between the ages of eight and fifteen to attend public schools, on the basis that public school attendance was necessary to develop good citizenship. It took a decision of the U.S. Supreme Court to stop this assault. In Pierce v. Society of Sisters (1925), the Court ruled that attendance at public schools was not necessary for citizenship, and that parents were the primary educators of their children. This period also witnessed the founding of the Catholic Education Association (CEA) in 1908, a national professional voluntary organization founded to serve Catholic education. The CEA became the NATIONAL CATHOLIC EDUCATIONAL ASSOCIATION (NCEA) in 1927.

Catholics schools, as was the case with their public counterparts, were overwhelmingly at the elementary level throughout the nineteenth century and into the twentieth. Secondary school enrollment, in the Catholic and public sectors, grew rapidly in the years between the two world wars. Buetow notes that Catholic secondary schools enrolled 284,736 students in 1,945 schools in 1936, while 7,929 elementary schools reported an enrollment of 2,102,889 (National Catholic Welfare Conference 1938, p. 21). This period marks the beginning of interparish high schools, which were usually coeducational. Previously, almost all Catholic secondary schools had been owned and operated by religious orders, and they were almost always single-gender institutions.

Church-state conflicts over education continued during the interwar period. Inspired by the rise of totalitarian states in Europe, Pope PIUS XI authored his encyclical, Divini illius magistri (On Christian Education) in 1929, in which he reaffirmed the "God-centered" nature of education and the primacy of the rights of parents as the educators of their children. In the United States two Catholic educators, Thomas Edward SHIELDS and George JOHNSON, both of the CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA (CUA), took leading roles in the professionalization of Catholic education. Shields, a psychologist, applied progressive education to Catholic schools, including the teaching of religion. He encountered opposition, however, especially from the conservative pastors who headed the parish schools. Shields was a prolific author, and he also founded Sisters College at Catholic University, which was established for the education of sister-teachers. Shields's pupil, George Johnson, was known as the "bridge builder" (between Catholic educators and between Catholic and public education). An NCEA official, Johnson spearheaded the Commission on American Citizenship, which developed curricular materials that fostered the principles of Christian democracy.

The Aftermath of World War II. Catholic schools continued to expand in the decades following World War II. In cities like Chicago, New York, Philadelphia, and St. Louis, Bishops labored to provide Catholic schools for the burgeoning suburban Catholic population. Catholic elementary schools reported an enrollment of 4,373,422 students in the 1961 to 1962 school year (p. 81), while Catholic secondary schools had 958,617 pupils that year (p. 82–83). Neil McCluskey, in Catholic Viewpoint on Education (1962), observed that private school enrollment, of which Catholic schools made up the vast majority, had grown by 119 percent between 1940 and 1960, while public schools had increased by only 42 percent (p. 91). In a number of regions, Catholic schools strained under the weight of such numbers.

The financial pressures on bishops and pastors to provide Catholic schools for Catholic children in this period were tremendous. Perhaps the pressure was felt even more deeply by the orders of vowed religious women who provided the low-cost personnel to staff the schools. Partially as a response to this pressure, the SISTER FORMATION CONFERENCE was formed in 1952 to prepare sisters for their ministry. The superiors of women religious orders were hard-pressed to staff the schools, and they were concerned about whether the religious were fully prepared, spiritually and professionally, when they were sent to teach in the schools.

Vatican II and Turmoil. The Second Vatican Council was opened by Pope JOHN XXIII in October 1962, and it contributed to a shaking of the very foundations of Catholic life in the United States, including Catholic schools. In 1964, Mary Perkins RYAN authored Are Parochial Schools the Answer? Catholic Education in Light of the Council, a book that was to cause consternation for the nation's Catholic educators. Ryan answered her question in the negative, arguing that Catholic schools had done well in serving a poor, besieged immigrant population, but that they had become anachronistic, clerical dominated, and served but a minuscule of the Catholic population. Ryan felt the focus of Catholic education should be on adult education and the liturgy.

At the same time, Msgr. O'Neil C. D'Amour, an NCEA official, called on Catholic schools to emphasize the professional, rather than the pastoral. This would include the creation of school boards composed of lay men and women at the parish and diocesan levels. In 1966, Andrew Greeley and Peter Rossi published the results of a study they had undertaken in The Education of Catholic Americans. They showed that Catholic schools were not divisive, that they did not impair the economic futures of their graduates, that they were most effective in imparting religious values to students who hailed from religious families, and that their graduates were more likely to be informed of the Church's doctrinal teaching.

The forces unleashed by VATICAN COUNCIL II had their effect. In the 1965–1966 school year, there were 5.6 million pupils in Catholic K-12 schools, making up 87 percent of nonpublic school enrollment and 12 percent of all students in K-12 American schools (Hunt and Kunkel 1984, p. 1). Stewart notes that there were 209,000 women religious, the majority of them serving in Catholic education, in the United States at this time (p. 449). By 1971–1972, Catholic school enrollment had plummeted to 4,034,785, a drop of over 1.5 million in six years, according to Kenneth Simon and W. Vance Grant in the Digest of Education Statistics (1987). Vowed religious, male and female, were leaving religious life; others, in line with the teaching of Vatican II that had urged the orders to research their original charisms in pursuit of their renewal, were opting for careers other than education. They were replaced by lay teachers, who commanded much higher salaries and benefits. At the same time, urban Catholics moved with increasing frequency to the suburbs, where there were few parochial schools and where the public schools had solid reputations.

With the election of the first Catholic U.S. president, John F. KENNEDY, in 1960, Catholics moved into the American mainstream, which led some Catholics to believe that Catholic schools were superfluous. The financial difficulties that plagued Catholic schools remained following the 1971 decision by the U.S. Supreme Court in Lemon v. Kurtzman. The Court adjudged the "purchase of secular services" from Catholic schools to be unconstitutional because it constituted "excessive entanglement" between church and state, and thus violated the establishment clause of the First Amendment.

It was in this context that the American bishops issued a pastoral letter, "To Teach as Jesus Did," aimed at stemming the defeatist attitude that had enveloped American Catholic schools. In 1976, the priest-sociologist Andrew Greeley and his colleagues claimed, in Catholic Schools in a Declining Church, that the laity still supported Catholic schools. In a controversial "Afterword," Greeley called for the hierarchy to get out of the school business and leave the field to the laity (1976, pp. 324–325).

The 1980s: The Decline Is Stemmed. Catholic schools experienced a slight upswing in the 1980s. Simon and Grant reported in 1987 that they entered the decade with 3,094,000 students, down approximately one million from 1971–1972. Yet the success of Catholic schools was recognized by scholars such as the eminent sociologist James Coleman. Greeley pointed to their success with minority students, in particular.

Government financial aid seemed more likely with the election of Ronald Reagan to the presidency. Reagan supported tuition tax credits, an idea championed by Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan of New York and Senator Robert Packwood of Oregon. That assistance was not to be forthcoming, however. At the end of the decade, there were 7,395 Catholic elementary schools and 1,324 Catholic high schools in operation, according to the U.S. Department of Education.

Catholic Education in the 1990s. Catholic educators were buoyed by the publication of Catholic Schools and the Common Good, coauthored by Anthony Bryk, Valerie Lee, and Peter Holland in 1993. These authors reported that Catholic high schools were successful due to decentralization; a shared set of ethical beliefs and a shared code of conduct on the part of faculty, students, and parents; smallness of size; and a curriculum that emphasized academics (pp. 298 and 304). In Catholic School Growth, 1985 to 1999 (2000), John Augenstein and Neal Meitler wrote that Catholic school enrollment increased by 3.8 percent during the years of their survey, although their market share declined from 6.3 percent to 5.6 percent during these years.

Financial realities became more disturbing for Catholic schools during the 1990s. In 2002, Theodore Wallace reported that 47 percent of Catholic school-age children attended Catholic schools in 1969, and that parishes paid 63 percent of the total cost of their schooling. By 1994, however, the percentage of Catholic children in Catholic schools had dropped to 18 percent, and the parishes paid 25 percent of the cost (p. 209). The escalating rate of tuition placed an enormous burden on middle- and lower-income Catholic families and resulted in a higher percentage of children from upper-income Catholic families in attendance at Catholic schools, with a corresponding decline of children from lower-income Catholic families.

Catholic Schools in the Third Millennium. Catholic school enrollment continued to decline in the early years of the third millennium. Figures from the NCEA in 2005, for instance, reveal that in 2004–2005 enrollment stood at 2,484,252—of which over 1.8 million were in elementary/middle schools (p. 1). It is interesting to note that minorities made up over 27 percent of that figure, and that over 325,000 of these students were not Catholic. That same year, 95 percent of the 160,153 member professional staff were lay persons, while only 5 percent were religious, of whom 3.7 percent were nuns, 0.7 percent were brothers, and 0.6 percent were clergy (p. 2).

These demographics have led to a number of developments. One is the sponsorship of Catholic private schools by religious orders. One consequence of this trend has been the development of methods to instill the charism of the respective order in the sponsored school. Another result has been the sponsorship by certain colleges and universities of students who volunteer to teach in under-resourced Catholic schools. These teachers commit to several years of teaching and living in community, and they have a communal spiritual life. The fourteen institutions involved (all but one Catholic) form the University Consortium for Catholic Education.

Several religious orders have started schools that are not tuition driven, such as the Cristo Rey high schools (modeled on the Cristo Rey Jesuit High School of Chicago). These schools enter into a partnership with the local business community and derive their support from that community. There are also a number of philanthropic groups that contribute to the financial support of Catholic schools, such as the Big Shoulders Fund in Chicago and the Children's Scholarship Fund (CSF) in New York City (the CSF also has many affiliates across the nation). These funds enable children from the lower socioeconomic classes, regardless of their religious affiliation, to attend Catholic schools, and in some instances their aid keeps the schools open. Catholic schools themselves have turned to marketing. Catholic high schools were the first to hire development directors, and a number of elementary schools, which have long been supported by parishes, have adopted the practice.

With the scarcity of clergy and vowed religious, lay Catholics have assumed leadership positions in Catholic schools in growing numbers, not only in the professional staff but in the rapidly expanding school board movement as well. These individuals have taken leadership positions in the ministry of Catholic education. Catholic K-12 schools in the United States, with a long and storied history of serving the Church and nation, have successfully met a myriad of challenges. They face, however, new and equally formidable challenges in the third millennium.

ELIA DI SAN CLEMENTE, BL.

Nun of the Order of Discalced Carmelites; b. January 17, 1901, Bari Vecchia, Italy; d. December 25, 1927, Bari Vecchia, Italy; beatified March 18, 2006, by BENEDICT XVI.

Christened Theodora Fracasso in the church of San Giacomo, Elia di San Clemente was one of nine children born to Joseph Fracasso and Easter Cianci. Four of her siblings died in early childhood. Her father, who had had little education because he left school to help his family, supported his wife and children with his painting and construction business. Her mother taught the children about God.

When she was about four or five, Dora, as her family called her, dreamed of a nice lady surrounded by blooming lilies. When she described the dream, her mother explained that she had seen Our Lady, and from that day on Dora had an ardent desire to live for God.

Dora went to third grade under the Stigmatine Sisters and, after a long, careful preparation, she received her first communion on May 8, 1911, at the age of ten. The night before her communion, she dreamed that St. Thérèse of the Child Jesus told her she, too, would become a nun. Dora then learned sewing and embroidery and became part of the Blessed Imelda Lambertini Society. She and her friends spent time in prayer and reading the GOSPEL and other religious books, including The Life of St. Teresa of Jesus as well as the lives of other saints.

On April 20, 1914, she became a novice in the Dominican Third Order. Because she was so young, she received special dispensation to make her profession on May 14, 1915, at the age of fourteen. In 1920 she entered the Discalced Carmelite Monastery of St. Joseph and took the name Sr. Elia di San Clemente. She taught embroidery to young girls but was dismissed from the position. Afterward she spent much of her time in her cell, sewing altar cloths. She made her solemn profession on February 11, 1925.

Beginning in January 1927, she had frequent, painful headaches that she called "her little brother." She refused medicine, because she said the headaches drew her to God. On December 21 she came down with a fever and headache, which were dismissed as her usual ailments. A doctor was not called until December 24, after she had gone into a coma. Her condition was diagnosed as possible meningitis or encephalitis. Sr. Elia died the following day at noon. She had said she would die on a feast day, and indeed she did. She left the world on Christmas, the day of Our Lord's birth. Sr. Elia was beatified March 18, 2006, at a Mass at the Cathedral of Bari presided over by Archbishop Francesco Cacucci of Bari-Bitonto, who called her "the little Saint Teresa of Italy."

EMMERICK, ANNA KATHARINA, BL.

Augustinian nun, mystic, stigmatic, and visionary; b. September 8, 1774, Flamschen, a village near Coesfeld, Westphalia, Germany; d. February 9, 1824, Dülmen, Westphalia; beatified by Pope John Paul II on October 3, 2004.

Anna Katharina Emmerick was born into a large peasant family. Her humble childhood was characterized by a profound piety, an extraordinary spirituality, and religious expressions of ascetic self-denial. At the age of twenty, after laboring as a seamstress, her ardent faith called her to the religious life. She sought to enter several convents, but was unsuccessful due to her poverty. In an effort to be accepted by the POOR CLARES in Münster, she attempted to learn the organ, but devoted herself instead to helping the poor family with whom she was lodging.

At the age of twenty-eight, she finally began her novitiate at the Augustinian convent of Agnetenberg in Dülmen and professed her religious vows one year later in 1803. Until the convent was forced to close in 1811, her years spent there were marked with much physical and emotional suffering. Her extraordinary spiritual gifts of ecstasy, religious obedience, and zeal soon made her the object of curiosity and jealousy among her religious sisters. Enduring persistent pain in body and soul, she understood her affliction to be the manifestation of the mystical crown of thorns, which she freely accepted when offered to her in a vision by CHRIST, her Divine Spouse. She attributed her frequent illnesses to her desire to take on the suffering of others.

In 1811 she began to experience severe pain in her hands and feet. The following year she received several recurring wounds on her body, each in the shape of a cross. Beginning in December 1812, the stigmata on her forehead, hands, feet, and side painfully bled and illuminated rays of light. Soon thereafter she fell bedridden and was unable to eat, consuming no food except the Holy Eucharist. Beginning the following year, after physicians and ecclesiastical authorities thoroughly examined her condition, she was frequented by a great variety of people. She continued to suffer her bleeding stigmata for the rest of her life, especially during LENT.

Of great significance are her striking visions of Christ's passion. Over a period of five years, the poet Klemens Brentano (1778–1842) copiously transcribed her visions in the most vivid detail. Anna Katharina likewise had visions concerning the life of the Blessed Virgin Mary, which Brentano also recorded. Encouraged by local bishops who regarded the visions as edifying inspirations of piety, Brentano eventually published the writings.

Anna Katharina was beatified by Pope JOHN PAUL II on October 3, 2004. In his homily the Holy Father referred to her as the "Mystic of the Land of Münster," who not only told of the sorrowful passion of Christ, but physically lived it in her body. Through her example of uniting her own suffering to the suffering of Christ, "she passes on to all the saving message: Through the wounds of Christ we have been saved."

ERRICO, GAETANO, ST.

Priest and founder of the Missionaries of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary, Secondigliano, Italy; b. October 19, 1791, Secondigliano; d. October 29, 1860, Secondigliano; beatified April 14, 2002, by Pope JOHN PAUL II; canonized October 12, 2008, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

The second of nine children, Gaetano was the son of pasta factory manager Pasquale Errico and his wife Marie Marseglia, a weaver. Gaetano applied for admission to the Capuchin and Redemptorist seminaries at fourteen; he was rejected by both orders because of his age. At sixteen, he was accepted into the seminary for the Diocese of Naples. Because his parents' financial circumstances prevented Gaetano from boarding at the seminary, he lived at home and walked five miles to and from school. The young seminarian was a daily communicant and devoted his free time to comforting the sick and promoting the value of a catechetical education among the town's youth.

On September 23, 1815, Fr. Errico was ordained in the cathedral of Naples. He was assigned to teach and distinguished himself in the field for twenty years. Fr. Errico also served as a parish priest. In 1818, during his annual retreat to the Redemptorist house in Pagani, in the diocese of Salerno, Fr. Errico received a vision of St. ALPHONSUS LIGUORI, in which he was told to found a new religious order and build a church dedicated to Our Lady of Sorrows in Secondigliano.

The humble priest accepted the challenge. Though early community support for the project was undermined by petty rivalries and concerns about the costs of the construction, Fr. Errico remained undeterred. Sustained by his dedication to the Blessed Virgin, he continued his work, and the church was completed; it was consecrated on December 9, 1930.

Fr. Errico also supervised the building of a nearby house that would serve as headquarters for the new congregation. Fr. Errico initially offered it as a place of retreat for priests, and he counseled his visitors on the importance of missionary work. He commissioned a statue of Our Lady of Sorrows from Neapolitan sculptor Francesco Versella, insisting that the final product be consistent with his vision of the Blessed Virgin. It was installed at Secondigliano in 1835 and became a destination site of pilgrims soon after. In 1836 Fr. Errico received a divine revelation that his new order be dedicated to the Sacred Hearts of Christ and the Blessed Virgin.

Fr. Errico drew statutes and obtained approval for the order; he opened a novitiate in October 1836. The congregation grew over the years, with several houses opening throughout southern Italy. In 1846 Pope PIUS IX granted final papal approval for the Missionaries of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary. Fr. Errico was elected superior general and, indeed, was known in the lay and religious communities as "O Superiore." Personally and through the work of the religious order he created, Fr. Errico served as a tireless champion for those who were sick or suffering physical or spiritual pain. He fasted and followed austere methods of personal penance and self-sacrifice and spent countless hours hearing confessions.

Fr. Errico died in 1860. In 1876 Pope LEO XIII declared him Venerable. In 1952 Salvatore Caccioppoli was cured, without medical intervention, of a life-threatening perforated duodenal ulcer after he prayed with a relic of Venerable Errico. Pope John Paul II approved the miracle and signed a decree of BEATIFICATION on April 14, 2001. In beatifying Venerable Errico, the pope noted the former's devotion to "welcoming and listening to penitents." He lauded Blessed Errico's commitment to proclaiming "the greatness of the mercy of God." At the canonization ceremony on October 12, 2008, Pope Benedict XVI declared that St. Gaetano Errico was "enrolled among the extraordinary priestly figures who tirelessly made the confessional the place for dispensing God's mercy, helping people to find themselves, fight against sin and progress on the path of the spiritual life."

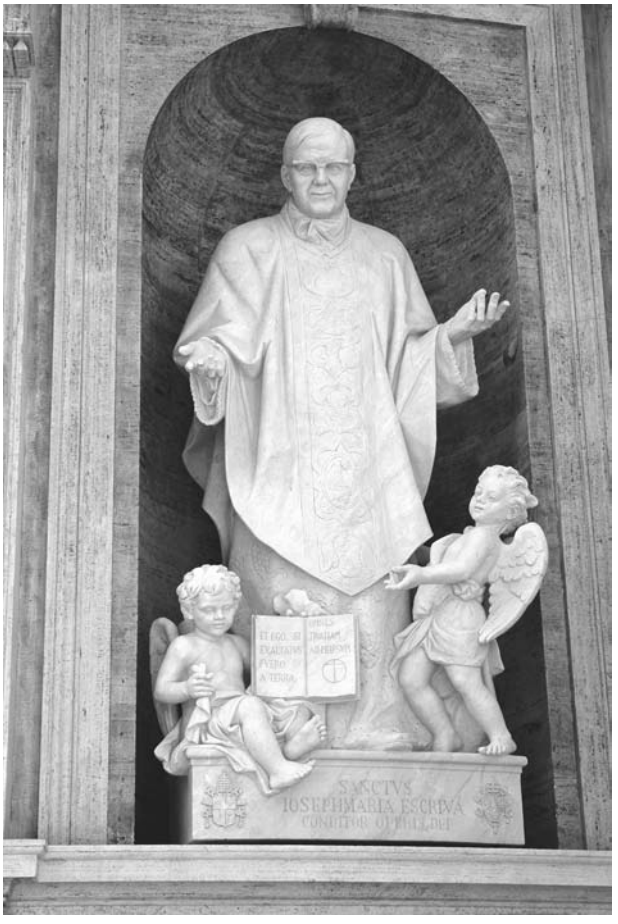
ESCRIVÁ DE BALAGUER Y ALBÁS, JOSEMARÍA, ST.



Founder of the Prelature of the Holy Cross and OPUS DEI; b. Barbastro, Spain, January 9, 1902; d. Rome, Italy, June 26, 1975; beatified May 17, 1992; canonized October 6, 2002, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

Early Life and Education. The second of six children of José Escrivá and María de los Dolores Albás, Josemaría Escrivá entered the seminary and began to study law at the University of Saragossa. He received a doctorate in law from the University of Madrid in 1939. Upon completing his seminary formation in Saragossa, he was ordained a priest on March 28, 1925. Later, he received a doctorate in theology from the Pontifical Lateran University, Rome. His priestly work began in the rural parish of Perdiguera and continued in Madrid, where he cared for university students, priests, workers, and people from all backgrounds, while dedicating many hours to children, the sick, and the poor.

Opus Dei. On October 2, 1928, upon seeing his vocation from God, he founded Opus Dei, so that all might realize that God calls them to holiness, each in their own place in the world. Thereupon, he dedicated his life to teaching that God calls us in the ordinary circumstances of life and that these ordinary circumstances become the very substance of sanctification when one works with a loving response to God's grace and with apostolic zeal for souls by striving to draw others closer to God. In the papal decretal letters of canonization (October 6, 2002), Pope John Paul II confirmed Escrivá's message by explaining that when work becomes a personal encounter with Christ, it is a wellspring of inexhaustible fruitfulness and a means for "lifting up the Cross and placing it on the summit of all human activity, so that the world is transformed ... from within, according to the Spirit of Christ, and reconciled with God" (Romano 2002, p. 198).

While celebrating Holy Mass in 1943, Escrivá received a new foundational grace that led to the birth of the Priestly Society of the Holy Cross within Opus Dei. The Priestly Society consists of priests who were lay faithful of Opus Dei and are incardinated into the prelature after ordination to the priesthood, as well as other secular priests who are called to live the vocation of Opus Dei by sanctifying their diocesan priesthood.

In 1946 Escrivá moved to Rome. While frequently traveling throughout Europe, he expanded and consolidated the apostolic work of Opus Dei and promoted a vast range of initiatives on all continents to promote human dignity and further advance the GOSPEL in society. In the last years of his life, from 1970 to 1975, while continuing to govern Opus Dei from Rome, he carried out an extensive work of catechesis throughout Latin America and in various European countries.

Scholarly and Spiritual Writings. In addition to historical, juridical, and theological writings, Escrivá wrote widely read spiritual books that have been translated into many languages, including The Way (1953), Holy Rosary (1953), and Christ Is Passing By (1974). International media interviews with Escrivá were collected in Conversations with Msgr. Escrivá de Balaguer (1968), a publication that concludes with his homily "Passionately Loving the World," delivered on the campus of the University of Navarre on October 8, 1967, in the presence of forty thousand people. The Way, first published in a shorter version in 1934 under the title Consideraciones espirituales, had sold five million copies in nearly fifty languages by 2009.

Beatification and Canonization. Addressing a crowd of more than 200,000 faithful gathered on May 17, 1992, in St. Peter's Square in Rome for Escrivá's BEATIFICATION, Pope John Paul II said that Escrivá "untiringly preached the universal call to holiness and apostolate" with "supernatural intuition" (L'Osservatore Romano 1992, p. 1). After his beatification, Escrivá's body was entombed in the main altar of the Prelatic Church of Our Lady of Peace in Rome, above the crypt where he had been buried after his death in 1975.

On December 20, 2001, John Paul II approved the decree super miro confirming a miraculous cure attributed to the INTERCESSION of Escrivá. In November 1992, an orthopedic surgeon, Dr. Manuel Nevado of Badajoz, Spain, was cured of cancerous, chronic radiodermatitis, in its third and irreversible stage, on his hands. The cure was very rapid (about two weeks), complete, lasting, and scientifically inexplicable and allowed Dr. Nevado to return to his professional work.

On October 6, 2002, in St. Peter's Square, John Paul II canonized Escrivá before a crowd even larger than that of his beatification. The overflow extended into the nearby streets and all the way to the Tiber River, even to Castel Sant'Angelo. In the decree of canonization, John Paul II declared Escrivá "the saint of ordinary life" (L'Osservatore Roman 2002, p. 198). And in a discourse on October 7, 2002, in St. Peter's Square, John Paul II declared that Escrivá's deep appreciation for divine filiation led him to teach how to contemplate "the tender face of a Father in God.... A Father who loves us ... and waits for a response of love from each one of us" (L'Osservatore Romano 2002, p. 8).

Escrivá challenged especially the laity to place Christ at the apex of all human activity by passionately loving the world. In a 2002 article titled "St. Josemaría: God Is Very Much at Work in Our World Today," Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger (Pope BENEDICT XVI) explained how Escrivá corrected an erroneous concept of holiness, understood as doing great or important things or being superior to others or living in a world apart. Rather, Ratzinger explained that, for Escrivá, holiness consists in being "simply transparent and available for God's work.... Being holy is nothing other than speaking with God as a friend speaks to a friend. That is holiness." Those who enjoy an uninterrupted conversation with God can dare to respond to the challenges of this world and, as Ratzinger concluded, "are no longer afraid because those who are in God's hands always fall into God's hands. This is how fear disappears and, instead, the courage is born to respond to the contemporary world."

EUPHRASIA OF THE SACRED HEART OF JESUS, BL.

Baptized Rose (Rosa) Eluvathingal, also known in religion as Blessed Eufrasia of the Sacred Heart of Jesus Eluvathingal; mother superior of the Congregation of the Mother of Carmel; b. October 17, 1877, Edathuruthy, Thrissur, Kerala, India; d. August 29, 1952, Ollur, Thrissur, Kerala, India; beatified December 3, 2006, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

Christened Rose Eluvathingal, Euphrasia of the Sacred Heart of Jesus was born to a pious mother, who taught her about St. ROSE OF LIMA, and young Rose aspired to be like the saint. At age nine, Rose had a vision of Mother Mary and, from then on, gave herself to God. Her father, the well-to-do owner of coconut plantations, wanted her to marry into wealth, so he opposed her entering the convent. Rose remained ardent in her devotion, and she fasted and prayed. Following her younger sister's sudden death, her father relented and allowed her to enter the convent of the Congregation of the Mother of Carmel.

Rose did not have an easy adjustment to religious life because she frequently suffered from illnesses, and the sisters even considered sending her away. She, however, received a miraculous healing that allowed her to become a postulant on May 10, 1897. She took the name Euphrasia of the Sacred Heart of Jesus and received the holy habit of Carmel on January 10, 1898. She made her perpetual vows on May 24, 1900, the day of the founding of St. Mary's Convent, where she served as novice mistress from 1904 to 1913. Sr. Euphrasia earned a reputation as the "Praying Mother." Carmelite sisters were cloistered, so she could not leave the convent, but many people came to her for help with problems. She trusted God's grace during her bouts of illness, some of which led to visions and others to tortures from evil spirits. Bishop John Menachery of Trichur Diocese asked her to write about her spiritual life, and he kept her letters, which proved inspirational.

Sr. Euphrasia did not feel qualified to take over as superior of the convent in 1913, but she was obedient when asked to do so. She put a statue of the Sacred Heart of Jesus in the center of the convent and turned the administration over to Him for the three years she held the post.

After her death on August 29, 1952, two children—one dumb and one lame—who visited her tomb claimed to be healed. Others also said miracles occurred there, including the remission of bone cancer. In 1990 her remains were moved to the convent chapel.

Pope JOHN PAUL II declared her Venerable on July 5, 2002, and Pope Benedict XVI, who beatified her on December 3, 2006, noted her charismatic gifts and her selflessness during an outbreak of cholera. Varkey Cardinal Vithayathil sent out a pastoral letter to be read in all Syro-Malabar churches on November 12, 2006, in which he praised her PATIENCE, HOLINESS, and stability in the faith.

Feast: August 29.

EUROPEAN UNION AND THE PAPACY

The European system of absolute state sovereignty was introduced by the Peace of Westphalia in 1648. The PAPACY, which is the world's oldest transnational institution, had reservations about the system from the start. Papal concerns intensified following the French Revolution of 1789 and during the Napoleonic Era (1800–1814), when nationalism bolstered state sovereignty in Europe. It was felt that this posed a threat to the multinational states such as Austria, Russia and the Ottoman Empire, and the Papal State, which formed the basis of the Pope's temporal power. This development was criticized in the nineteenth century by Pope GREGORY XVI (1831–1846) in his mirari vos of 1832, and by PIUS IX (1846–1878) in quanta cura and its "Syllabus of Errors" of 1864. Pius also opposed the risorgimento, the movement for Italian unification, due to similar objections. In fact, the papacy did not officially come to terms with Italy until the conclusion of the Lateran Accords of 1929.

Papal concerns about the dangers of excessive state sovereignty and nationalism prevailed during the early twentieth century, as nationalist agitation in the multinational Habsburg state and the Franco-German rivalry contributed to the outbreak of WORLD WAR I. During the course of that conflict, Pope BENEDICT XV (1914–1922) invoked an alternative system of international relations, and he later proved supportive of the League of Nations championed by President Woodrow Wilson of the United States at the Paris Peace Conference (1919–1920). Pius XI (1922–1939), like his predecessor, supported the league, and he also warned of the danger of excessive nationalism and state idolatry in his mit brennender sorge of 1937. His successor, PIUS XII (1939–1958), had to confront the consequences of WORLD WAR II, which he attributed, in part, to the excesses of national state sovereignty. Indeed, in his first encyclical, summi pontificatus (1939), he argued for a limitation on state authority. Confronted by the devastation of the war, Pius hoped that the United Nations, formed at the war's end, would prove more successful than the League of Nations in the preservation of peace.

Pius XII Favors European Integration. Within war-torn Europe, Pius championed economic and political integration as a means of easing people's suffering and effecting a reconciliation between the victors and the vanquished, while also serving to stop Soviet expansion into Western Europe. His vision was shared by the Christian Democratic leaders who emerged in the postwar period, including Robert Schuman of France, Konrad ADENAUER of West Germany, and Alcide de GASPERI of Italy. These men, and the parties they led, seconded the papal commitment of defending Western Europe against the Soviet Union and defending the "free" capitalist economy against the communist alternative.

Economic realities, as well as the emergence of the Cold War (1945–1990) and American pressure, contributed to the call for some form of supranational and intergovernmental European union. In fact, the first step toward integration followed the American insistence in 1947 on the establishment of a European organization to distribute the U.S. aid provided by the European Recovery Program, commonly known as the Marshall Plan. This led to the formation in 1948 of the Organization for European Economic Co-operation (OEEC) by seventeen Western European nations. A year later the Council of Europe was established to advance European integration. Its task proved difficult, however, as the Eastern European states, pressured by Joseph Stalin, refused to participate, and a number of Western European states, particularly Great Britain, were fearful of any infringement on their sovereignty and offered only a limited commitment. Pope Pius XII, citing the supranational nature of the Church, regretted the obstacles placed in the path of European union. In his Christmas message of December 1948, he again rejected absolute state sovereignty and invoked an alternative.

European Economic Integration. The resistance to political integration and the determination of a number of states to protect their national sovereignty led Europeanists, such as the French foreign minister Robert Schuman and the economist Jean Monnet, to call for a pooling of the continent's coal and steel resources and production. In May 1950 they proposed placing Franco-German coal and steel production under a common authority and having other European states join this economic entity. Following their suggestion, the Treaty of Paris was signed in April 1951, and in 1952 six countries—France, Germany, Italy, and the Benelux countries (Belgium, the Netherlands, and Luxemburg)—established the European Coal and Steel Community (ECSC). Britain, still concerned about the infringement of its sovereignty, refused to join, and it also rejected the European Defense Community (EDC), which was proposed in 1950 in order to provide for a unified European army. British unwillingness to participate, combined with other domestic factors, led the French to torpedo the EDC in 1954.

However, the French did not abandon plans for the establishment of economic integration, and they proposed the establishment of a European Economic Community (EEC). This was created by the Rome Treaties of 1957, which abolished tariffs between member states and made provisions for a common tariff on goods from non-EEC countries. These objectives were achieved by 1968 under the guidance of four entities: (1) the Council of Ministers, (2) a directing Commission, (3) the Court of Justice, and (4) the European Parliament. A separate treaty established the European Atomic Energy Community (Euratom). The objectives of the EEC were applauded by Pius XII, and he cataloged the advantages provided by the European organization.

The EEC confronted numerous obstacles, particularly the concern about the diminution of national authority, which delayed but did not stop further integration. To allay the fear of loss of sovereignty the Council of Ministers of the EEC was composed of the foreign ministers (or their representatives) of the various member states, the justices of the court were appointed by the member countries, and the European Parliament was composed of delegates from the various state parliaments. These concessions did not satisfy the British, who suspected that the EEC represented the first step toward European union, for which they were not prepared. Determined to preserve their sovereignty without restriction and retain their special relationships with the United States and the Commonwealth countries, the British refused to join the EEC. Instead, at the end of 1959, Britain formed the loosely structured European Free Trade Association (EFTA), together with Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Portugal, Switzerland, and Austria—popularly known as the "outer seven." The EFTA proved unable to compete with the "inner six," however, leading the British to apply for membership in the EEC in the 1960s. Paradoxically, their entry was now blocked by France's Charles de Gaulle, who charged that the British were not ready to participate in a European union. He was able to prevent their admission because the inclusion of new members required the unanimous approval of all the existing members. In July 1967, the ECSC, Euratom, and the EEC merged into the European Community (EC), indicating its political as well as economic aspirations.

European Political Integration. Only in 1973, when de Gaulle was dead, did France alter its position and approve the admission of Britain, along with Ireland and Denmark, into the European Community. This was the first of six enlargements of the EC. The years that followed saw the entry of Austria, Finland, Greece, Sweden, Spain, and Portugal, bringing the membership to fifteen. The year 1993 saw the completion of a single market and yet another name change. That year, the Treaty of European Union (also known as the Treaty of Maastricht) established the European Union (EU), whose membership soon increased. Following the fall of the Berlin Wall in 1989, the reunification of Germany and withdrawal of Soviet forces from Eastern Europe in 1990, and the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991, an additional twelve states were approved for admission into the EU, with ten entering in May 2004 (Cyprus, the Czech Republic, Estonia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Malta, Poland, Slovakia, and Slovenia). Bulgaria and Rumania were admitted in January 2007, bringing the total membership to twenty-seven. Several extra-European dependencies and overseas territories of member states—such the Azores, Canary Islands, French Guiana, and Martinique—also form part of the European Union.

European states that have been tentatively approved for membership are known as "official candidates." In 2007 these included Croatia, whose independence was recognized by the Vatican in 1992; Turkey, which applied for membership as early as 1987; and the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia. Other states, whose applications have not yet been reviewed and approved, are deemed "potential candidates." In 2007 these included Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Montenegro, and Serbia. Although the EU does not have an official capital, Brussels, which houses many of its offices and institutions, unofficially serves that role.

Nature of European Union and Papal Response. European integration has evolved in the post–World War II period. The nature as well as the numbers have changed, bringing many of the formerly Communist Eastern European and Baltic states into the Western orbit and, in the view of Pope JOHN PAUL II (1978–2005), weaning them from atheism and placing them within a Christian ambience. In this fashion, the EU has helped end the split between capitalism and communism, between democracies and dictatorships. Its expansion and evolution brought institutional changes, and 1979 witnessed the first direct election of members of the European Parliament, who serve a term of five years. The representation in the Parliament is based on population, and in 2007 Germany had the most seats (99), while Malta had the fewest (5).

One of the articles of the Treaty of Maastricht stipulated that those who wished to join had to have a governmental system based upon democratic principles. Subsequently, in a meeting at Copenhagen, the member states elaborated three other criteria for entry, known as the Copenhagen criteria: (1) the need for stable institutions to guarantee their democratic government, respect for human rights, and the rule of law; (2) a functioning market economy capable of coping with the competitive forces within the Union; and (3) the ability to implement the changes and practices determined by the members. The Vatican appreciated the EU's respect for human rights and its efforts to promote peace and prosperity in the European community and beyond. It concurred with the decision to abolish the death penalty and appreciated the EU's Latin motto: In varietate concordia (United in Diversity). John Paul II was supportive of the EU, though he did not approve all of its actions or all of the provisions of the Charter of Fundamental Rights that the EU proclaimed in Nice in December 2000, especially those articles that contradict the Church's teaching. His successor, BENEDICT XVI, who was elected in 2005, has taken a similar position of general support, with reservations about certain policies.

Although the population of Europe is religiously diverse, Christianity—in the form of Roman Catholicism, Protestantism, and Eastern Orthodoxy—remains the most widespread and influential faith in the officially secular European Union. The Christian contribution has been recognized by the EU's reference to Christianity as part of the "European heritage." Near the end of 1991, Pope John Paul II, concerned about the future of Catholicism in Europe, convoked the first Synod of European Bishops, which included seventy bishops from Western Europe and fifty from its eastern half. Its final declaration, which acknowledged the influence of Judaism and Islam in Europe, proclaimed the special role of Christianity on the European continent, which they insisted provided the basis for its foundation. Thus, the bishops and the Vatican have been distressed by those positions taken by the EU that challenge Church principles and teaching. In February 1994, John Paul II assailed the resolution by the European Parliament that supported the right of homosexual couples to marry and adopt children, claiming that it legitimized "moral disorder."

Subsequently, during the course of the Fourth World Conference on Women held in Beijing in September 1995, the Vatican delegation criticized the position taken by the representatives of the EU on population control as "anti-religious and anti-family." This opposition was outlined by Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, who in 2005 became Pope Benedict XVI, assuming the name of the patron of Europe. In his first encyclical, deus caritas est (God is Love), promulgated in December 2005, Benedict explained that the Church had no desire to govern the state, but that it could not ignore political developments. He thus showed himself to be determined to preserve Europe's Christian identity, and he looked to the Christian Democratic–European Democratic coalition, the largest political bloc in the European Parliament, to protect Christian interests. However, this coalition did not possess a majority and was reluctant to expose itself to the charge of being subservient to Rome. Nonetheless, Benedict XVI, like John Paul II before him, has continued to emphasize the Christian roots of Europe.

In 2004, a year before becoming pope, Ratzinger, who was the prefect of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, opposed Turkey's entry into the EU, adding his voice to those who objected to Turkey's entrance on the basis of its peripheral geographical location and its occupation of one-third of Cyprus. Benedict's opposition stemmed from his belief that a predominantly Muslim country would never fit into Christian Europe. Some charged, however, that his use of an anti-Muslim quotation in a speech at Regensburg University in September 2006 represented an attempt to revive the mentality of the crusades and exclude Turkey from the EU. The Vatican denied both accusations, and during Benedict's visit to Turkey, from November 28 to December 1, 2006, he abandoned his position against Turkey's entry into the EU, sought reconciliation with Islam, and prayed in Istanbul's famed Blue Mosque. Benedict's stance, as well as his apology for his use of the controversial quotation, was defended by José Manuel Barroso, the president of the European Commission, one of the three central organs of the EU.

Institutions of the European Union. The Treaty of Maastricht and the Treaty of Rome form the basis for the EU's laws, activities, and institutions. Its principal organs evolved from those of the EEC and the EC and include the European Parliament, the Council of the European Union, and the European Commission. One important change provided that the 785 members of the European Parliament would be elected directly by the citizens of the member states and share legislative power with the Council of the EU, formerly known as the Council of Ministers. The membership of the council is drawn from the ministries of the member states and chaired by the president or prime minister of the country assigned the task. The member countries take turns holding the presidency of the council, with each serving a six-month term. Membership in the council, as in the parliament, is based on population, so larger states such as Germany, France, Italy, and the United Kingdom each held 29 seats of the total of 345 in 2007, while tiny Malta was assigned only 3.

The rights of the smaller states are safeguarded by the provision stipulating that a unanimous vote is required for important matters, such as amending the treaties, initiating a new policy or program, or admitting additional states. Furthermore, since 2004, the European Commission, which functions as the executive of the organization, has been composed of one member from each member state. Likewise, the European Court of Justice is composed of one judge from each member state, who serves a six-year term. The role of the court is to assure that the laws of the EU are followed and its legislation and treaties properly interpreted. The EU has twenty-three official languages, and all but three of the twenty-seven members (Greece, Cyprus, and Bulgaria) utilize the Latin alphabet. In addition, there are some 150 regional and minority languages spoken by some 50 million people. Various religions are followed in the EU, but Christianity remains the largest faith.

Future of European Union. This supranational, intergovernmental EU, which is the world's largest political and economic conglomeration, is more than a confederation, for its legislation takes priority over that of member states. An agreement concluded in 1985 (the Schengen Agreement) provides for the collaboration of its police forces and activities as well as a common asylum and immigration policy. The United Kingdom and Ireland did not accept these terms, and the United Kingdom and others balked at aspects of the Union's monetary policies. In 2005 the EU adopted a comprehensive energy policy that involved a strenuous effort to control carbon dioxide emissions, though the results have been mixed. Furthermore, while some decisions are made by majority vote, the more important ones continue to require unanimity. Clearly, the EU is not yet a federal state, and several moves to enhance the sense of European citizenship and political centralization have been frustrated, particularly the 2004 attempt to provide an EU constitution. The proposed constitution, which was ratified by seventeen members, was rejected by French voters in 2005, and their rejection was repeated by the Dutch soon after. Thus, the future of European constitutionalism and the timetable for closer political union remain uncertain.

On the other hand, economic and fiscal integration have proceeded apace. The EU has a substantial budget, which is provided by custom duties on products imported from outside the EU, a percentage of the value-added tax on goods and services throughout the union, and contributions from member states based on their overall wealth. In 2002 euro notes and coins were adopted, and by 2007 the euro had become a strong international medium of exchange, competing with the dollar and replacing the currency of thirteen member states. The European Central Bank (ECB) has successfully managed the euro as well as the EU's monetary policies, and it has contributed to making the EU the world's largest economy and exporter of goods. Not surprisingly, many (though not all) of the European states that remain outside the union are anxious to join, and the Vatican has generally supported its expansion. While the HOLY SEE has not accepted or sanctioned all the actions and positions of the EU, it has been consistent in asserting the need for this transnational organization.

EX CORDE ECCLESIAE

Ex corde Ecclesiae ("From the Heart of the Church") is an APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTION issued on August 15, 1990, by Pope JOHN PAUL II. It was intended to supplement the Apostolic Constitution on ecclesiastical faculties and universities, Sapientia Christiana (1979), by providing for non-ecclesiastical universities and other Catholic institutions of higher learning a description of their nature and purpose and general norms to govern their activities.

Historical Prelude to Ex corde Ecclesiae. The Church's interest in learning goes back to APOSTOLIC times, and schools or academies for higher study emerged in the late Patristic and early medieval periods, often connected to monasteries or cathedrals. In the thirteenth century, the Church inaugurated the great universities of Europe in Bologna, Paris, Oxford, Cambridge, and elsewhere. With the advent of secular intellectual movements of the eighteenth-century ENLIGHTENMENT, the Church needed to reassert the importance of her colleges and universities. Along these lines, Vatican II upheld the essential role of Catholic colleges and universities in investigating new and current questions "according to the example of the doctors of the Church and especially of St. Thomas Aquinas" (Declaration on Christian Education, Gravissimum educationis, no. 11).

After Vatican II, social movements emphasizing freedom had an impact on Catholic higher education. The widespread resistance to the condemnation of contraception in Pope PAUL VI's 1968 ENCYCLICAL, Humanae vitae, led to the belief that there can be "responsible dissent" from magisterial teaching. During this time, numerous Catholic colleges and universities in the United States, formerly governed by religious congregations, opted for incorporation under boards of trustees consisting mostly of laity. Many presidents and leaders of Catholic colleges and universities also endorsed the 1967 Land O'Lakes statement, which asserted the need for a Catholic university "to have a true autonomy and academic freedom in the face of authority of whatever kind, lay or clerical, external to the academic community itself" (Gallin 1992, p. 7). Leaders of Catholic higher education issued similar (though not as radical) statements at conferences held in Kinesha, Africa (1968), and in Rome (1969 and 1972). In 1973, Cardinal Garrone, Prefect of the Congregation for Catholic Education, wrote a letter responding to The Catholic University in the Modern World, the document issued in 1972 by the participants at the ROME conference. The cardinal noted the need for each university "to set out formally ... its character and commitment as Catholic" and to "put into effect proper self-regulation in the sectors of faith, morality, and discipline" (Gallin 1992, p. 60).

In the 1970s, the Congregation for Catholic Education began work on new academic laws governing ecclesiastical faculties and universities, namely, those erected by the APOSTOLIC SEE of Rome. This work culminated in the April 29, 1979, Apostolic Constitution of John Paul II, Sapientia christiana. During his visit to the United States in the fall of 1979, John Paul II spoke at THE CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA to the presidents of Catholic colleges and universities. He made it clear that Catholic universities and colleges "are part of the Catholic community of evangelization," and therefore, "they have an essential relationship to the hierarchy of the Church" (Address to the Catholic University of America, October 7, 1979, no. 6). This countered the claim of institutional autonomy from "external" clerical control made in the 1967 Land O'Lakes statement. In this address, John Paul also underscored the role of bishops in safeguarding the "unity of faith and moral teaching" and the need for theologians to be open to "the truth and the light that comes from faith and fidelity to the Church" (no. 6).

In 1980, the Congregation for Catholic Education began work on a new document to address the nature of a Catholic university. After the revised Code of Canon Law was promulgated in 1983, there was also the need to incorporate what canons 807–814 say about Catholic universities. A preliminary schema or draft of the document appeared in 1985. Following several years of widespread consultation and revision, John Paul II's Apostolic Constitution, On Catholic Universities, Ex corde Ecclesiae (dated August 15, 1990), was issued.

The Document, Ex corde Ecclesiae. After an introduction (nos. 1–11), the text is divided into two parts. The first, "Identity and Mission" (nos. 12–49) briefly describes the nature of a university and locates Catholic identity in the Christian inspiration of individuals' and the whole community's "reflection in the light of the Catholic faith upon the growing treasury of human knowledge, to which it seeks to contribute by its own research," "fidelity to the Christian message as it comes to us through the Church," and an institutional commitment to the service both of the PEOPLE OF GOD and of the whole human family (no. 13). Research undertaken at a Catholic university should be characterized by the search for the integration of knowledge, a dialogue between faith and reason, ethical concern, and a theological perspective (nos. 15–20).

The next sections discuss the university community—teachers, students, and administrators (nos. 21–26)—and the university's place and role in the Church, both universal and local, and the responsibility of bishops to promote and assist in the preservation and strengthening of Catholic identity, with due regard to the autonomy of the sciences and to academic freedom in accord with the "principles and proper methods" of each disciple (no. 29). Theologians also "enjoy this same freedom so long as they are faithful" to "the principles and methods" which define theology "as a branch of knowledge" (no. 29).

The mission of the Catholic university is described, first, in terms of its service to Church (no. 31) and to society (nos. 32–37). For the latter the emphasis falls on the university's becoming an "instrument of cultural progress," bringing to bear Christian "ethical and religious principles," promoting social justice, and encouraging interdisciplinary research projects. The Catholic university should also be a place in which pastoral ministry assists an integration of faith and life, demonstrating this by opportunities for community worship and concern for the poor and those suffering injustice (nos. 38–42). The institution should promote the dialogue between the GOSPEL and culture, with special reference to local cultures and contemporary problems. It should in particular promote a dialogue between Christian thought and the modern sciences. It should encourage and contribute to cultural and ecumenical dialogue (nos. 43–47). In all these ways the Catholic university will make an indispensable contribution to the Church's primary task of evangelization (nos. 48, 49).

The second part of the document is devoted to eleven general norms to supplement other ecclesiastical legislation. Article 1 requires that the norms be applied locally and regionally "taking into account the statutes of each university or institute and, as far as possible and appropriate, civil law." The general norms are "to be applied concretely at the local and regional levels by episcopal conferences and other assemblies of Catholic hierarchy in conformity with the Code of Canon Law and complementary Church legislation" (General Norms, Article 1 no. 2). Article 2 legislates for the Catholic identity, which is to be made known in a public document and preserved by suitable means. Moreover, "Catholic teaching and discipline are to influence all university activities," and "any official action or commitment of the University is to be in accord with its Catholic identity" (Article 2 no. 4). All this should occur with due regard for the freedom of conscience of each person as well as "freedom in research and teaching … according to the principles and methods of each discipline" (Article 2 no. 5). Article 3 lists three different ways in which a Catholic university may be established: by the HOLY SEE, an episcopal conference, or a local bishop; by a religious institute or other public juridical person; by other ecclesiastical or lay people.

Article 4 entrusts the primary responsibility for maintaining and strengthening Catholic identity to the university itself and its officials. All teachers and administrators are to be informed about this Catholic identity and expected to promote or at least respect it in ways appropriate to the different disciplines. Catholic teachers, particularly in theology, are to be faithful to Catholic doctrine and morals, and others are to respect them. Article 4 no. 3 refers to canon 812 of the 1983 Code of Canon Law and states that, "Catholic theologians, aware that they fulfill a mandate (mandatum) received from the Church, are to be faithful to the Magisterium of the Church as the authentic interpreter of Sacred Scripture and Sacred Tradition." Non-Catholic teachers and students are to recognize and respect Catholic identity, and non-Catholic teachers are not to constitute a majority within the institution; education of all students is to include a formation in ethical and religious principles and courses in Catholic doctrine are to be made available.

Article 5 requires that the university remain in communion with the universal Church and with the local Church; bishops are to promote the good of the institution and have a right and duty to supervise the preservation and strengthening of their Catholic identity; the institution is to make periodical reports to the competent church authority on the university and its activities. Article 6 makes provisions for the pastoral ministry at the institution. Article 7 encourages cooperation among Catholic universities and between them and the programs of governments and other national and international organizations on behalf of justice, development, and progress. Articles 8 to 11 provide transitional guidelines for the application of these norms.

Application to the United States. After Ex corde Ecclesiae appeared in 1990, the U.S. Catholic bishops began a long process of dialogue and consultation to formulate guidelines for applying the norms of the constitution to the United States. An ad hoc committee of bishops and universities was formed, directed by Bishop John Leibrecht of Springfield-Cape Girardeau, Missouri. The desire was to produce norms for application that were acceptable to both the presidents of Catholic colleges and universities in the United States and the Holy See. After a 1993 draft proposal, another was produced in 1995, which some groups praised but others, such as the CARDINAL NEWMAN SOCIETY and the FELLOWSHIP OF CATHOLIC SCHOLARS, found deficient. A modified draft received widespread support at the November 1996 meeting of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops, and it was approved by a vote of 224 to 6. The Holy See, however, refused to give recognitio to the document because it lacked the "necessary juridical elements to resolve conflicts" (cf. Origins 27, June 12, 1997, pp. 53–55). A revised version of the document, which the U.S. bishops approved at their November 1999 meeting by a vote of 223 to 231, finally did receive the necessary approval, or recognitio, of the Congregation for Bishops on May 3, 2000. Published as The Application of Ex corde Ecclesiae for the United States in July 2000, the guidelines took on the force of particular law for the United States on May 3, 2001, and they are subject to review every five years.

Not all were pleased with the approved guidelines for implementing Ex corde Ecclesiae. Resistance mostly centered on the statement that "Catholics who teach the theological disciplines in a Catholic university are required to have a mandatum granted by competent ecclesiastical authority" (NCCB, The Application of Ex corde Ecclesiae for the United States, 2000, Part Two, Article 4, 4e, p. 16). Even though this requirement was already clearly stated in canon 812 of the 1983 Code and in Ex corde Ecclesiae itself (Article 4 no. 3), some groups were hoping the bishops would not enforce it. The CATHOLIC THEOLOGICAL SOCIETY OF AMERICA issued a sixty-one-page report arguing that the mandate could have a negative effect on "the credibility of Catholic academics and institutions" and receiving the mandatum could be "based on criteria that are ambiguous, ideological or idiosyncratic" (Academe, January–February, 2001). The U.S. bishops, though, seemed to dismiss such fears. At their June 2001 General Meeting, they endorsed a set of guidelines for issuing the mandatum to theologians in Catholic colleges and universities. These guidelines clearly affirm the need for the mandatum, but no penalty is specified for theologians who do not cooperate. The competent ecclesiastical authority, however, is directed to inform the authorities of the Catholic college or university of the theologian's noncompliance.

In addition to the mandatum, another significant element of Ex corde Ecclesiae has been the expectation that "any official action or commitment of the University" must be "in accord with its Catholic identity" (Article 2 no. 4). Groups such as the Cardinal Newman Society have invoked this directive to criticize funded groups at Catholic colleges and universities that promote legal abortion and/or homosexual relations. This requirement has also been used to protest awards being given to public officials who support abortion and/or other actions in violation of Catholic teaching. Ex corde Ecclesiae very likely was an influence on the U.S. bishops' June 2004 statement, Catholics in Political Life, which stipulates that, "the Catholic community and Catholic institutions should not honor those who act in defiance of our fundamental moral principles." This statement was widely cited by those who opposed the honorary doctorate of laws bestowed by the University of Notre Dame on President Barack Obama (1961–) at its May 2009 commencement.

EXCOMMUNICATION

The term excommunication (excommunicatus, ἀκοινώνητος) first appeared in Church documents in the fourth century. As the term suggests, excommunication involves a varying degree of "exclusion from the communion of the faithful" (1917 CIC, c. 2257§1). From the beginnings of Christianity, the central realization and embodiment of "the communion of the faithful" has always been the Eucharistic Communion. Hence, it is from the Eucharist, the center of the common socio-mystical life of the FAITHFUL, that the excommunicate is primarily excluded. This is the prime factor characterizing excommunication in all the stages of its historical development.

HISTORY

Excommunication has a long history in the Church. It is helpful, therefore, to begin this discussion with an overview of the major periods through which excommunication has passed on the way to assuming its modern form.

Excommunication in the New Testament. Faced with the scandal of a gravely sinful brother who resisted all correction and rebuke, the New Testament ἐκκλησία (ecclesia, that is, the early Christian community or primitive Church) was constrained to isolate such a sinner from its midst (1 Cor 5:2, 13), though without necessarily taking away his membership in the community (see 1 Cor 5:11). The Church was, however, no holy remnant ruthlessly ridding itself of sinners (see Mt 13:28–30); rather, it remained open to the return of the penitent sinner, so that the segregation of the obdurate sinner had a hopeful outlook (see 2 Thes 3:15; 2 Cor 2:5–11). Even when Saint PAUL uses a seemingly harsh curse, there is still the perspective of hope (see 1 Cor 5:4–5; 1 Tm 1:20).

Matthew 18:15–18 is the classical locus in which the Church, after having vainly tried to turn a sinful brother from his ways, is presented as competent to dissociate the sinner from its midst by a judgment that is divinely ratified. If there can be a "binding" of the sinner in his sinful alienation from God and from God's people, the alternative of a "loosing" of the same sinner always remains, providing the sinner repents and heeds the voice of the Church.

Patristic and Medieval Period. Two factors distinguish the penitential practice of the ancient Church from that of later ages. First, until about the sixth century the grave sinner was permitted to avail himself of the Church's sacramental penitential procedure only once in his lifetime. Second, the canonical, disciplinary phases of PENANCE, imposed by ecclesiastical authority, were closely inserted into the strictly sacramental elements of penance in a unified procedure. The grave sinner, resolved to make his peace with God in the Church, presented himself to the BISHOP, who assigned him, through a liturgical excommunication, to a special category of Christians with a separate and juridically inferior status in the Church. That is, the sinner now belonged to the class of penitents (ordo paenitentium). The Church also imposed a varyingly protracted period of public penitential works.

At the close of this period of onerous penance, during which the penitent was publicly cut off from the central life of the Church, the bishop lifted the liturgical excommunication. The penitent was then reconciled to God in the Church and was received once again into communion with the Church, primarily into the Eucharistic life of the Church and a sharing in its whole common life. The excommunication of the sinner was thus a part of the sacramental penitential process, done with the hope of an ultimate reconciliation with God in the Church. The ancient Church wished for as little dissociation as possible between what would now be called the internal and the external forums, or between sacramental penance and the canonical penalty of excommunication.

The decisive step in the widespread development of a canonical excommunication separated from sacramental penance was the gradual introduction, starting in the sixth and seventh centuries, of a sacramental penitential procedure that was repeatable. Once it became possible for the grave sinner to approach the Sacrament of Penance more than once, a more simplified procedure had to be introduced into sacramental penance. By about the eleventh or twelfth century, the external forms of the administration of Penance had become much the same as they are in the early twenty-first century. One result of this development was the gradual, clear emergence, from the seventh century onward, of a canonical disciplinary excommunication, dissociated from its former prominent place within sacramental penance. As a consequence, it was applied not to repentant, but to impenitent, sinners. By the High Middle Ages, and for centuries afterward, the interior and exterior forums were, both in theory and in practice, less intimately associated than in patristic times.

The Meaning of Excommunication to the Penitent. Once it has become clear to a member of the Catholic Church that any culpable dissociation from the common life of the Church marks some measure of disruption of the full interior life of grace in the Body of the Lord, there is less likelihood that members of the Church will exaggerate the admitted distinction between SIN and delict, and consequently between punishment and penance. Just as the theology of sacramental penance has regained a firmer ecclesial dimension, in that the res et sacramentum of the sacrament is often described as peace with the Church, so too can canonical excommunication be seen as a firmer delineation of the sinner's alienation from full communion. The lifting of the censure can thus be seen as a preliminary stage to the sacramental absolution, which confers on the repentant sinner the peace with the Church that signifies peace with God.

CANON LAW

Breaches of ecclesial FAITH or order may lead to the declaration or imposition of ecclesiastical penalties. Accordingly, Church members are deprived of certain spiritual or temporal goods of the Church, either temporarily or permanently. Expiatory penalties highlight the ecclesial goods of restoring community order, repairing scandal, and precluding further disciplinary violations. Censures or so-called medicinal penalties are geared much more toward reconciling the offending party with the community.

Excommunication in Canon Law. The most ecclesially significant censure is excommunication, described in the 1917 Code of Canon Law as exclusion from the communion of the faithful, which entails various inseparable effects (cc. 2257–2267). The present code, promulgated in 1983, does not define this most serious penalty, but simply specifies its inseparable effects, such as various prohibitions to one's involvement in the Church's public life (c.1331). The distinction between "forbidden" excommunicates and "tolerated" excommunicates found in the 1917 code is now gone. The first part of canon 1331 indicates the effects of any excommunication, while the second part describes specific effects of excommunication when there has been a formal intervention by ecclesiastical authority. This may involve either administrative procedure or judicial process before a collegiate court of three judges (c. 1425§1, 2).

An intervention may involve a declaration that an automatic excommunication (latae sententiae) has been incurred, or it may entail the infliction of a so-called ferendae sententiae excommunication, which means that the judgment of a court or superior is required. The intervention of Church authority lends a special solemnity to the legal situation and results in more serious restrictions on the penalized party.

Some restrictions affecting the excommunicated person are liturgical in character, such as the prohibition of active ministerial participation in the EUCHARIST and other acts of public worship, or the prohibition of celebrating the SACRAMENTS. During the code revision process, it was proposed that penance and anointing be exempted from the aforementioned prohibition, but it was finally decided that the excommunicated person needed to have the penalty remitted before receiving any sacraments. Some restrictions flowing from excommunication are governmental in nature, such as prohibitions of holding various ecclesiastical offices, exercising various ministries or functions, or positing acts of governance. If an excommunication has been formally inflicted or declared, the affected person is also barred from enjoying privileges already acquired; validly acquiring any ecclesiastical dignity, office, or function; and receiving certain ecclesiastical income.

The current law is somewhat circumspect about establishing censures, especially excommunication. Such penalties are reserved for the most serious disruptions of ecclesiastical order (cc. 1318; 1349). Not surprisingly, the revised law notably reduces the number of excommunications specified in the 1917 code. Nine ecclesiastical offenses may make a guilty party liable to an excommunication—seven involve latae sententiae or automatic penalties, while two entail ferendae sententiae penalties. The following offenses may lead to a latae sententiae excommunication: apostasy, heresy, schism (c. 1364§l); violation of sacred species (c. 1367); physical attack on the pope (1370); absolution of an accomplice (c. 1378§l); unauthorized episcopal consecration (c. 1382); direct violation of confessional seat by confessor (c. 1388§2); and procuring of an abortion (c. 1398). Two offenses may warrant a ferendae sententiae excommunication: pretended celebration of Eucharist or conferral of sacramental absolution by one not a priest (c. 1378), and violation of the confessional seal by an interpreter or those other than confessor (c. 1388§2).

The trend toward reducing the number of offenses for which excommunication may be incurred latae sententiae, a trend that appeared as early as 1869 under Pope Pius IX, is reflected, as noted above, in the revised Western canon law, and it can be seen even more clearly in the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches (promulgated in 1990), which precludes the automatic incurrence of any sanction, excommunication or otherwise (c. 1402 of the Eastern Code).

The incidence of excommunication has been rising since the mid-1990s, both at the universal level (where excommunications have been imposed or declared in response to illicit or invalid presbyteral and episcopal ordinations) and at the local level (where excommunications have been threatened or applied in response to abortion, offenses against ecclesiastical authority, and physical violence against the innocent). In all such cases, however, one must recall the implications of canon 16, whereby the results achieved in one case are not necessarily indicative of the results to be obtained in similar cases.

Finally, it is important to distinguish between the canonical penalty of excommunication, whose most visible element may be the denial of participation in the Eucharist, and the operation of various sacramental disciplinary norms, particularly canon 915, by which one might be prohibited from approaching the Eucharist. Excommunication is always a response to a canonical crime, while a formal denial of the right to receive Holy Communion, outside of excommunication cases, is a response to gravely offensive, but not specifically criminal, behavior. The juridical requirements to be satisfied prior to the declaration or imposition of excommunication are considerably higher than those to be met prior to suffering a denial of the Eucharist under canon 915, and the reconciliation process for those laboring under canon 915 is simpler than those visited by the sanction of excommunication.

FABRIS, EUROSIA, BL.

Known after her marriage as Eurosia Fabris Barban, also known as Mamma Rosa; mother of nine, caretaker of orphans, member of the Franciscan Third Order; b. September 27, 1866, Quinto Vicentino, Italy; d. January 8, 1932, Torri di Quartesolo, Vicenza, Italy; beatified November 7, 2005, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

Eurosia Fabris, called Rosina by her family, was born to a farming family in 1866. Luigi and Maria Fabris, her parents, moved to Marola when Rosina was four. Because her help was needed on the farm and with household chores, Rosina completed only two grades in elementary school. She had learned to read and write, so she used religious books such as the Holy Scriptures and the Catechism to improve her abilities.

As she grew older, Eurosia helped her mother with dressmaking and later taught this skill to young girls. She made her First Holy Communion at age twelve. Eurosia joined the Association of the Daughters of Mary and taught catechism to children. By the time she was eighteen, many men wanted to marry this pious, hard-working young woman, but she turned them all down.

The following year, a woman in her village died and left behind two daughters, Chiara Angela and Italia, both under the age of two. Their father was caring for ill, querulous relatives, so Rosina took care of the children and cleaned house for them every morning before going off to the fields to work. Her family and the parish priest urged her to marry the father of the young girls. Rosina was reluctant to live in a household with three quarrelsome men, but she agreed to do God's will. After praying about the matter, she wedded Carlo Barban on May 5, 1886. They raised the two girls and were blessed with seven more children.

Mamma Rosa, as she was now called, loved and sacrificed for her husband and children. She was thrifty but never neglected sharing with the poor. Known for her diligent prayer life and spirituality, Mamma Rosa raised her children in the Christian faith, and three of her sons went on to become priests.

She cared for the sick, including her husband, Carlo, who died in 1930. Mamma Rosa, a member of the Franciscan Third Order, or Secular Franciscans, worked to maintain always that spirit of poverty and joy in her home until her death on January 8, 1932, at the age of sixty-five.

Pope PIUS XII held her up as an example for Christian families, and Pope JOHN PAUL II proclaimed her Venerable on July 7, 2003. On February 3, 2005, after settling some misunderstandings among those who were promoting her cause, the diocesan curia of Padova initiated the BEATIFICATION and canonization process. On November 7, 2005, Archbishop Cesare Nosiglia of Vicenza, Italy, presided over a beatification Mass, and Cardinal José Saraiva Martins read the formula for Fabris.

Feast: January 8.

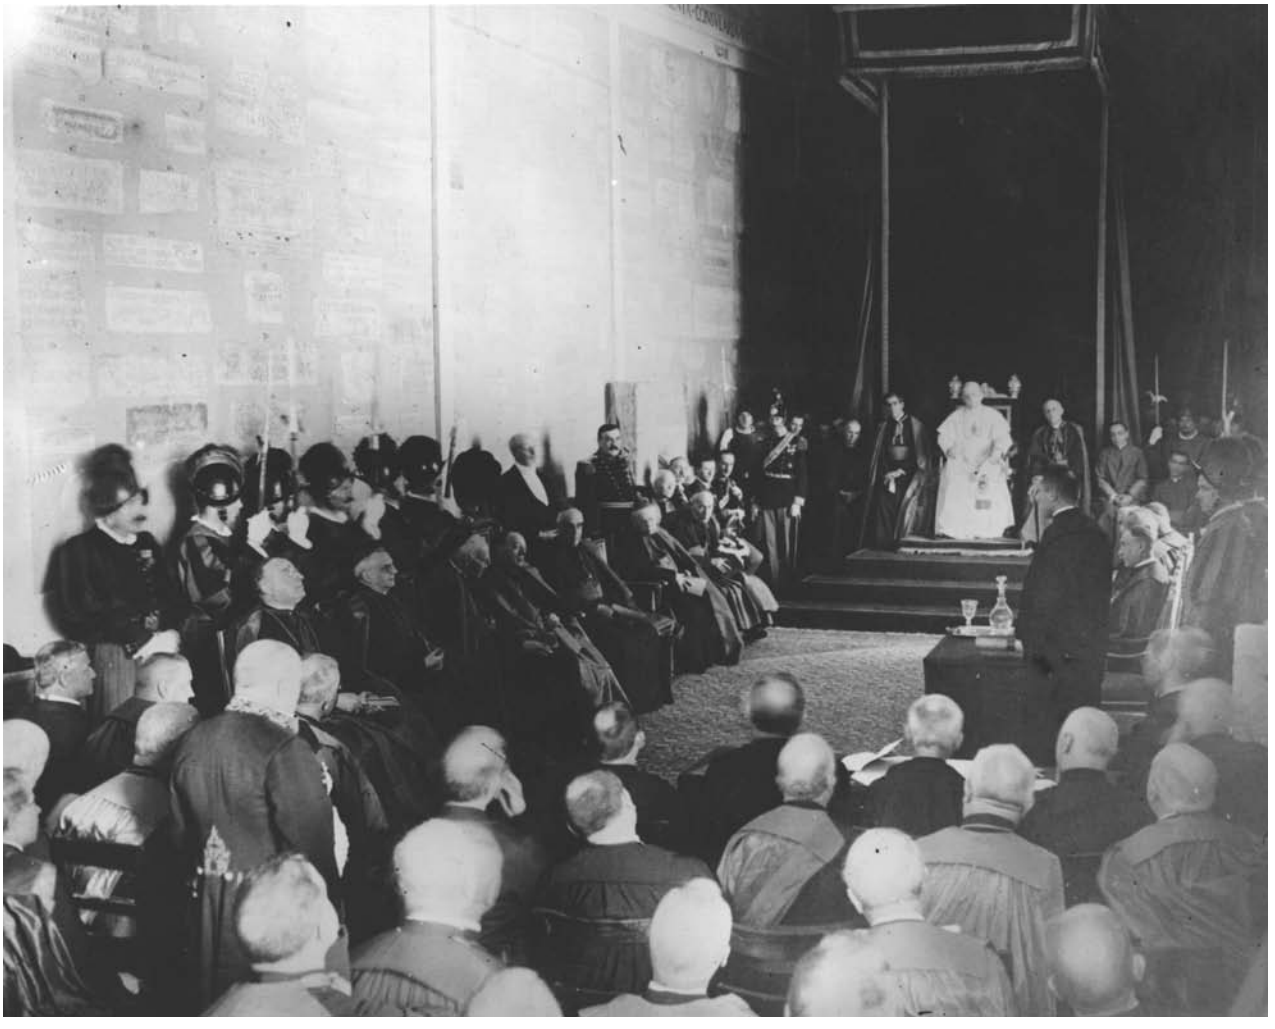
FASCISM

The period between the two world wars (1919 to 1939) saw the rise of a new political movement called "fascism," which spread rapidly across much of the European continent. In its wake, democratic institutions were uprooted, labor movements were destroyed, educational systems were "reformed" in order to create a new fascist youth, and novel uses of mass propaganda were employed to spread the movement's hypernationalistic ideology. Most shocking of all, however, was the attempt to exterminate, in a virtual "holocaust," an entire people, European Jewry—an attempt unprecedented in the annals of civilization.

Since the end of WORLD WAR II, scholars and laymen alike have attempted to understand the fascist movements and to make sense of the Holocaust, or Shoah. How could the cultured nations of Europe, with their strong Christian traditions, fall under the spell of an ideology that sparked a second world war and unleashed the horror of the Shoah? What was the response of the Catholic Church to fascism? Did it, as some argue, ignore the evils of fascism for the sake of political accommodation? Or was its relationship with the fascist movements of the interwar period more complex and nuanced?



To answer these questions, one must first understand the nature of fascism. This was not a monolithic movement, nor was it a generic concept. Since its birth in the chaos of post–World War I Italy, the term fascism has been indiscriminately applied to movements of the political radical right that flourished in the 1930s and 1940s in Europe and, much less so, in Latin America. There are, however, serious problems inherent in such a blanket use of the term, including the inability to reach an objective assessment of the relationship between the Church and fascist movements.

Furthermore, in examining the interaction between fascism and Catholicism, one must recognize the Church's heterogeneous nature. The papal response to fascist movements, while critically important, was not the sum and substance of the Catholic reaction. In countries where fascism flourished, Catholic bishops, lower clergy, Catholic lay movements, political parties, newspapers, intellectuals, and prominent laypersons held a variety of views and followed diverse courses of action. The Catholic interaction with fascism was thus genuinely complex.

Defining Fascism. Historians have long debated the origins of fascism. Some have argued that the intellectual seeds of the movement were sown in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries in a counterculture that rejected the rationally ordered progress of the industrial age. The work of the naturalist Charles DARWIN seemed to justify theories of racial superiority, while the followers Friedrich NIETZSCHE rejected bourgeois life and looked to the coming of a group of "supermen" who would sweep away the rottenness and sterility of the nineteenth century. In Austria and Germany, this intellectual reaction against reason included proponents of the superior attributes of the German people, or volk, and went hand-in-hand with virulent ANTI-SEMITISM. The Futurists in Italy added to this philosophical maelstrom with their glorification of speed, action, and violence and their disdain for the "old order." A modern world that was fast-paced and shorn of traditionalism, led by an elite cadre of men of action, and with power based upon exaggerated nationalism and the uninhibited pursuit of power—this was the pre–World War I intellectual vision that was, in part, the harbinger of the Fascist regimes to come. The political disasters and human carnage of WORLD WAR I and subsequent revolutions, depressions, and inflations created a social vacuum that, for many, the ideology of fascism seemed able to fill.

Fascism may have had antecedents prior to World War I, but it crystallized as a political force and ideology in Italy in the 1920s, and it eventually developed local and national varieties in Europe and beyond, until its advance was halted in 1945. Since then, historians have disagreed on many aspects of the fascist experience, but scholars have tended to coalesce around a general understanding that explains fascism in terms of what it stood for and what it was against. Indeed, while there were many types of fascist movements and regimes, the varieties of fascism shared certain basic characteristics.

All fascist movements were hypernationalistic and sought to do away with the existing political structures in their countries and replace them with an authoritarian or dictatorial model. Their goals were to re-order society in its entirety, to offer a form of social integration that they believed would do away with the destructive class warfare of the Marxists and the parasitic control and dominance of wealthy capitalists. This was to be accomplished through a single political party and through a form of government that was called "corporatism" or "national socialism." Fascists decried parliamentary government, but they used the referendum as a mechanism to appeal to the "will of the people."

Pope Pius XI (1922–1939). Seen here in audience, Pius XI was a strident opponent of communism. He viewed the anticommunism of Fascism favorably. TOPICAL PRESS AGENCY/STRINGER/GETTY IMAGES

Fascists glorified violence, and they developed paramilitary party organizations, used modern methods of mass mobilization, and effectively exploited the emotions of huge choreographed rallies that were replete with symbols, music, and myths. In some instances, this myth-making embraced neo-pagan concepts of religion and the outright rejection of institutional churches. Fascists saw themselves as creating a new order that would sweep away the old. There was thus a strong emphasis on the culture of youth, exalting the young, and asserting the nation's rights above those of parents and other institutions in educating the young.

To bring about this revolution, fascism had to destroy pre–World War I European political and social structures. The fascist movements were antiliberal, anticommunist, antidemocratic, anticonservative, anticlerical and even somewhat anticapitalist. Striving for totalitarian societies, fascists sought to eliminate rival institutions, ideologies, and groups. They attacked all opposition political parties, but they especially despised those that they believed emphasized social differences at the expense of the nation, such as workers' parties or clerical parties. As hypernationalist movements, they were unalterably opposed to international institutions and ideologies, such as communism, international socialism, the League of Nations, the Catholic Church, Freemasonry, and the Jews, whom they deemed a stateless people with questionable loyalty to the nation in which they resided.

While other political regimes of the time shared certain fascist characteristics, they were not necessarily fascist. These included General Francisco Franco's Spain, Admiral Nicholas Horthy's Hungary, Engelbert Dollfuss's Austria, as well as the wartime Nazi client states of Slovakia and Croatia. Some historians have described these states as being ruled by "varieties of fascism," arguing that there are sufficient commonalities to do so. However, Franco, Horthy, and Dollfuss never articulated the need for a totalitarian state, nor did they assert the preeminence of the state over family and religion. These regimes are therefore more properly understood as right authoritarian or radical right in nature, for they relied for support upon monarchy and appealed to the Catholic neocorporatists. These regimes generally supported existing social hierarchies, opposed the secular irrationalism of the fascists, depended upon the military, and were skeptical of paramilitary forces.

Catholicism and Fascism. The view that Catholicism and fascism somehow had a great deal in common is based on a number of factors. Vatican diplomacy in the interwar period sought to protect Catholic interests by concluding treaties, or concordats, with various nations. These concordats, however, often had the unintended consequence of giving Fascist regimes a measure of legitimacy and respectability in the eyes of the Catholic faithful. Concordats were signed, for example, with Fascist Italy in 1929 and Adolf Hitler's Germany in 1933 in an attempt to ensure the continuance of Catholic education, lay activist movements, freedom of worship, and a functioning clergy and independent hierarchy. The concordat policy proved ineffective, however, for the Church's rights under these treaties were frequently ignored by fascist regimes.

The papacies of PIUS XI (1922–1939) and PIUS XII (1939–1958) were marked by an unflagging opposition to communism, which the Church perceived as a mortal enemy of religion. Therefore, the anticommunism of the fascist movements and regimes of the radical right was favorably viewed by the Vatican, the local hierarchies, and most of the lower clergy. In Italy, for example, at the height of the 1920 "Red Scare," many conservative Catholics and churchmen pleaded unsuccessfully with Don Luigi STURZO to ally his Catholic-oriented Italian Popular Party (PPI) with the Fascists to stop the Communists.

In many countries, regimes of the radical right used the social language of papal encyclicals to put forth concepts of the corporatist state that criticized capitalism and communism alike. These nations instituted a modern form of medieval corporatism that regulated relations between labor and capital, while also organizing parliaments on the basis of trades and vocations in order to eliminate class conflict. Italy, Spain, Austria, Portugal, Hungary, Slovakia, and Croatia were nations that gave lip service to the teachings of Pope Leo XIII's Rerum novarum, and they thus took on, from time to time, the patina of being "Catholic" regimes. Usually, the adoption of corporatist ideas and institutions was greeted warmly by local Catholic hierarchies and clergy.

Finally, comparisons were drawn between the Church's traditional anti-Judaism and the strident anti-Semitism of many fascist movements. European Catholicism's opposition to the Jews was founded on popular theological perceptions. It stemmed from the Jewish "rejection" of Jesus and included charges of "Christ killing" that had been common among Christians for centuries. The Church sought to convert Jews to Catholicism, but its anti-Judaism often resulted in engendering strong prejudices and acts of discrimination. Nazi and fascist anti-Semitism, however, was rooted in racial, not religious, theory. Jews, whether Christian converts or not, were seen as racially inferior, unredeemable, and destined for segregation and eradication. This latter view was never accepted by the Church and was frequently condemned in the interwar period by the Vatican and by Catholic leaders.

At the Fulda Episcopal Conference of 1931, German bishops reacted to Hitler's racist and supernationalist ideology by forbidding Catholics from joining the National Socialist (Nazi) Party and ordering the clergy to refuse communion to anyone wearing a swastika. However, the influence of anti-Judaism on the European masses may well have left them more susceptible to the more virulent anti-Semitism of HITLER and his Nazis. Almost half a century later, Pope JOHN PAUL II recognized this when he stated, "In the Christian world [of the 1930s and 1940s], the wrong and unjust interpretations of the New Testament relating to the Jewish people contributed to soothing consciences to the point that when a wave of persecutions swept Europe fueled by pagan anti-Semitism,... the spiritual resistence of many was not that which humanity expected from the Disciples of Christ" (Coppa 2006, p. 310).

Genuine Fascist governments took power in Italy and Germany in the interwar period, while quasi-Fascist regimes of the radical right arose in the midst of the chaos of World War II in smaller states like Croatia, Slovakia, Hungary, and Romania. The existence of Catholic political parties, most notably the Center Party in Germany and the PPI in Italy, usually caused problems for the Fascists at the ballot box. The Nazis, for example, did not succeed in penetrating the Catholic regions of Germany to the same extent they did in Protestant areas. The Center Party, which represented both the urbanized and rural Catholic population, largely held on to its voters through the 1933 elections, when the Nazis managed to garner only about 24 percent of the Catholic vote. In Italy, the PPI was a less developed Catholic party in that it was only able to compete when the papal non expedit, which urged Catholics not to engage in politics, was completely lifted in 1919. However, with its strong appeal to social justice and Catholic principles, the PPI still managed to compete against both the Fascist and Socialist parties in post–World War I Italy. In Spain, the Spanish Confederation of the Autonomous Right (Confederación Española de Derechas Autónomas, or CEDA), a Catholic party led by José María Gil Robles, drew its support from the peasantry and provincial middle classes, and it competed head-to-head with the Falangists until its dissolution during the Spanish Civil War. Spanish Catholics, however, generally continued to regard the fascist Falange with suspicion. Across Europe, wherever Catholic political parties existed, they often opposed fascist and radical-right parties and competed for votes from the same socioeconomic strata.

In many ways, Catholicism was incompatible with fascism. The Church could not accept the domination of the state over all aspects of life; it rejected hypernationalism as anathema to the universal nature of man; it fought to retain its privileges in education; and it denied the racism of fascist ideologies. Whenever right-wing authoritarian regimes began to toy with totalitarianism and racism, the hierarchies and clergy in those countries reacted negatively. Although there were instances of individual prelates and clergy supporting fascists, the Church was more favorably inclined to traditional authoritarian governments and movements that did not embrace the revolutionary aspects of fascism, such as Franco's Spain, pre-Anschluss Austria, Vichy France, and Slovakia. These regimes tended to repudiate the class struggle, accept corporatism and its critique of both capitalism and socialism, oppose communism, and regard the Church as a pillar of society.

Papal Reactions to Fascism. Pius XI and Pius XII presided over the Church during the years of fascism and dictatorship in Europe. Pius XI, who appointed Eugenio Cardinal Pacelli (later Pius XII) as his secretary of state in 1930, was a strong and outspoken leader. Both Pius XI and Cardinal Pacelli were rabid anticommunists, and they put their faith in a foreign policy based upon treaties with individual nations that protected the rights of the Church. The Vatican signed concordats with all types of governments, including fascist and radical-right regimes, and it was believed that these agreements would protect Catholic interests better than native Catholic political parties could do.

In 1929 the LATERAN PACTS between the Vatican and Fascist Italy put an end to the ROMAN QUESTION and included a concordat that governed church-state relations in Italy. Catholicism was recognized as the state religion, and the Church was granted recognition and protection of its religious and lay institutions. In 1933 the Vatican signed a concordat with the new Nazi government in Germany, and Pius hoped that this would protect Catholic institutions and youth movements from Nazi harassment. In both Italy and Germany, however, the Catholic political parties (the PPI and the Center Party, respectively) were outlawed when Benito MUSSOLINI and Hitler consolidated their power.

Pius XI's papacy was replete with examples of his staunch antifascism and his disdain for the tenets and policies of this new ideology. Early on, Pius articulated a firm opposition to anti-Semitism and racism as fundamentally incompatible with Christianity. He condemned the quasi-fascist ACTION FRANÇAISE as racist and pagan, although it outwardly professed loyalty to the Church. He criticized the totalitarian bent of Italian Fascism in his encyclical Non abbiamo bisogno (1931), and he asserted the Church's rights in education in Divini illius magistri (1929). Pius also supported the expressions of hostility to Nazism by German bishops in 1931 both at the Fulda Conference and in Bavaria and Prussia, where the hierarchies, even before Fulda, jointly condemned Nazism as contrary to the Faith.

After the 1933 concordat with Germany was concluded, relations between the Vatican and the Nazis did not improve. The sterilization laws, promulgated only months after the concordat's signing, brought vociferous papal protests. In 1934, the Holy Office condemned the Nazi ideologue Alfred Rosenberg's Myth of the Twentieth Century, a rambling diatribe against Christianity. Pius then asked the Holy Office to undertake a broad condemnation of the errors of Nazism. The report, which was never publicly issued, was completed in March 1935 and concluded that Nazism and Catholicism were inherently incompatible. On issues ranging from racism to education to the suppression of the Catholic press, Pius made more than thirty protests against Nazism between 1933 and 1936. His criticisms culminated in the encyclical Mit brennender Sorge (1937), which denounced the treatment of the Church in Germany, rejected Nazism's totalitarian claims, and protested Nazi efforts to divide the human race on racial grounds.

In the year that followed the publication of this encyclical, Pius XI continued his outspoken attack on Nazism, despite voices in the Vatican that argued for a more diplomatic approach. The Jesuit journal Civiltà Cattolica published a series of articles critical of the fascist tendencies toward racism and totalitarianism. Pius himself instructed Catholic universities and seminaries to articulate a Catholic basis for opposition to Nazi theories, calling them "ridiculous." When the Austrian primate, Theodor Cardinal INNITZER, gave the Nazi salute upon leaving a voting booth during the plebiscite approving the Nazi takeover of Austria, he was summoned to Rome by an angry pontiff and saw his power curtailed in his diocese. Pius was outraged as he witnessed Italy move closer to Germany. When Mussolini issued Italy's first set of racial laws, the pope condemned them and urged Italian Catholics to ignore them. In a final act, as Pius grew steadily more infirm, he instructed an American Jesuit, John La Farge, to draft an encyclical condemning the evils of anti-Semitism, racism, and racial myths. The draft, entitled Humani generis unitas, was completed in late September 1938, but it did not reach the pope until three weeks before his death in February 1939. It was never published.

Pius XI's closest collaborator, Cardinal Pacelli, was quickly elected pope in 1939, taking the name Pius XII. Although Pacelli had carried out the Vatican's policies toward fascism in the 1930s as secretary of state, he was more cautious than Pius XI. He agreed with Pius XI that fascism was a serious threat to Catholicism and incompatible with the Faith, but he did not share his belief that the papacy had a moral responsibility to speak out regardless of the consequences. On more than one occasion, Pacelli served as a moderating voice and a brake on Pius XI, as the Vatican struggled to deal with increasing Fascist and Nazi threats. The fact that Cardinal Pacelli was elected in a conclave that lasted just one day indicates that there were many cardinals who shared his more prudent approach toward the dictators.

There is a great deal of controversy surrounding the papacy of Pius XII during the years of World War II. His detractors claim that he abdicated moral responsibility with his "silence" in the face of the monstrous crimes of the Holocaust, while his defenders point to his wartime statements and his quiet diplomacy on behalf of the Jews. It is clear that Pius XII took a careful and diplomatic approach to the coming of the war, scrupulously avoiding any public perception of favoritism for one side or the other. He sought to preserve diplomatic channels with all combatants and protect the Church's interests. Pius XII feared that an energetic and outspoken policy would only create more misery for the persecuted and more problems for the FAITHFUL.

In his first encyclical, Summi pontificatus (1939), the new pope condemned, in more subtle language than his predecessor, the deification of the state and the destruction of the principle of human solidarity. Pius XII attempted to keep Italy out of the war and expressed sympathy with the peoples of the Low Countries when the Nazi war machine overran them. In 1940, the Vatican condemned anew the German sterilization laws and Vatican radio denounced atrocities that had been reported at the Dachau concentration camp. However, Pius's condemnations were largely of war in general and of unspecified violations of human rights. His reluctance to condemn specific regimes and crimes applied to both sides equally, as he remained largely silent concerning the atrocities of both Nazi Germany and Soviet Russia.

In Pius's 1942 Christmas radio broadcast, the pontiff alluded to the destruction of the Jews by expressing sorrow for those who, through no fault of their own except their race or nationality, were being killed or condemned to a slow death. By May 1942, some officials in the Vatican Secretariat of State began to realize that Jews were being systematically destroyed in Nazi-occupied Europe. Although the pope was aware that some in the Church thought that he would cede the moral high ground by failing to speak out forcefully and specifically, he steadfastly held that public protests and a loss of strict neutrality would only make matters worse. It was not until 1945 that the pope finally expressed publicly what he held privately, branding Nazism a "satanic spectre" that was absolutely contrary to Christianity.

Although Pius XII may not have raised a clear and unmistakable voice of protest, the Church quietly assisted many victims of Fascist and Nazi atrocities. In Croatia, Slovakia, Romania, Vichy France, and Hungary, the Vatican and its allies intervened to assist Jews caught in the Nazi genocide. Many were hidden or given false baptismal certificates or visas to travel to safety in Spain and Portugal, Catholic countries that the Vatican persuaded to cooperate in rescuing Jews. During the Nazi occupation of Rome, thousands of Jews were hidden inside the Vatican and within Church buildings, including the papal summer residence in CASTEL GANDOLFO. Although it is difficult to know exactly to what extent Pius was involved in these activities, it is certain that key Vatican officials and many clergy were specific actors in the rescue of Jews.

The Catholic Church and Fascism in Retrospect. Catholicism's reaction to fascism from 1920 to 1945 was complex. In part, this was a function of the varieties of fascism itself, from Italian Fascism to Nazism to an array of authoritarian regimes of the radical right that were, in many aspects, not fascist at all. Strictly speaking, fascist ideology was incompatible with Catholicism. Pope Pius XI and Catholic leaders made this argument repeatedly in the 1920s and 1930s, although this did not prevent many rank-and-file Catholics from supporting fascist movements. This incompatibility was seen as particularly stark in Catholic circles during the rise of Hitler and Nazism. Unlike Italian Fascism and the neofascism of right-wing authoritarian regimes, Nazism made no pretext of compatibility with Catholicism. Its overt paganism, racism, and totalitarianism brought into sharp focus the fact that Catholicism and fascism could not exist side-by-side for any length of time.

Perhaps the most difficult issue surrounding the Church's interaction with fascism is arriving at an objective understanding of the early papacy of Pius XII. There is no doubt that Pius XII shared his predecessor's views on the evils of fascism and Nazism. They differed, however, in their views on the most effective response to those evils. Pius XI believed that the Church had to speak out, clearly and forcefully, against fascist tendencies in society. Pius XII was convinced that keeping the Vatican neutral in wartime and relying upon diplomacy was the surest way to oppose fascism while doing the least harm to Catholicism and to the victims of Nazi terror. The correctness of this policy is still debated in historical circles.

FAWKES, GUY

English conspirator; b. Stonegate, Yorkshire, England, April 13, 1570; d. Old Palace Yard, Westminster, England, January 31, 1606, by hanging.

Although not the originator or leader of the so-called Gunpowder Plot of 1605, Guy Fawkes has survived in history and legend as the symbol of Catholic resistance to the English Reformation. The thwarting of his spectacular plan to blow up the Royal Family and the members of Parliament has been commemorated over the centuries, and his given name has long served as a contemptuous epithet.

The England of Fawkes's childhood was characterized by religious and political ambivalence. Although the Church of England was established by law, many still adhered to Catholicism and were tacitly tolerated. Some still hoped for a return to the "old faith." Such a likelihood diminished in the 1580s after the execution of Queen Elizabeth's (1533–1603) cousin and heir presumptive, Mary Stuart (1542–1587), exiled queen of Scotland, and the outbreak of war with Spain.

Fawkes, the son of a Protestant lawyer in Yorkshire, was officially an Anglican until his father's death and his mother's marriage into a Catholic family. He was thereafter raised as a Catholic in his step-family, and his relatives and friends seem to have been exclusively Catholic. Despite the formal war still being carried on between England and Spain through the end of the century, the decision of young men like Fawkes to enlist in the Spanish army was not regarded as treasonable or even unusual. He was commissioned as an ensign, or junior lieutenant, and served for a number of years against the Dutch in Flanders. Although there is no evidence that Fawkes rendered particularly distinguished service, his experience with various types of munitions would later lead to his connection with the Gunpowder Plot.

The death of Queen Elizabeth in 1603 was at first regarded by many as opening up new possibilities in political and religious affairs. The monarch was succeeded by King James VI of Scotland (1566–1625), son of her old rival, Mary Stuart. Now King James I of England, his attitude toward Catholics was not at first entirely clear. Irish Catholic rebels, for instance, had welcomed Spanish invaders into their country in 1601, but they now fancied that James might be more sympathetic to them than Elizabeth had been. England's Recusants (as the Catholics were formally called in England) shared similar speculations. James I soon demonstrated the skills of evasion and manipulation in matters of religion and politics that would characterize his reign. Only the most optimistic Catholics persisted in the belief that he would do something for them. His conclusion of a peace treaty with Spain in 1604 effectively ended any notion that the champions of the COUNTER REFORMATION would pursue any intervention in the British Isles.

Fawkes, having found neither fame nor fortune in Spanish Flanders, returned to England during this period of frustrated hopes among his old friends and soon became a member of a conspiratorial band ready to employ desperate measures. The members in this circle of militants knew Fawkes and were perhaps somewhat inclined to exaggerate his military expertise. They concocted a plan to slay the lords and magnates of England, all at a single stroke, by blowing up Parliament in full session with the king enthroned in their midst. As James I had lost all his credibility with the Catholic plotters, they proposed to replace him with his daughter, Princess Elizabeth (1596–1662), who was rumored to have Catholic sympathies. It was not clear that these beliefs were well founded or that, even if they were, the princess could be diverted from the parliamentary chamber where she would otherwise be killed with her family.

Fawkes now stepped forward to the center of what came to be known as the Gunpowder Plot. Whether he actually conceived the idea of placing hundreds of barrels of gunpowder beneath the parliamentary session or merely assured his friends that he could handle the task for them, Fawkes was now the effective leader of the enterprise. With almost unbelievable good fortune, the conspirators discovered that a cellar beneath the Houses of Parliament was vacant and available for rent to anyone who had anything to store there. Furthermore, no one paid any attention to the dozens of barrels of unknown content that were placed there in the autumn of 1605 during the days leading up to the meeting of the Houses of Parliament.

As with so many other details of this plan, the exact circumstances under which it was discovered are in dispute. One account asserts that a warning to absent himself from the scheduled meeting was sent to a Catholic lord who was still entitled to occupy his hereditary seat. This gentleman then supposedly passed the suspicious message on to the authorities. In any case, the officers of Parliament decided to make a belated inspection of the cellar on November 5, 1605, where they discovered not only a vast store of gunpowder but also Fawkes himself.

Most of the conspirators fled from London but were tracked down and killed. Fawkes was given a summary trial, but with his intentions so obvious and apparently readily admitted by him, his fate was inevitable. He was sentenced to the traditional punishment for high treason: to be hanged, cut down while still alive, and hacked into pieces. In January 1606, Fawkes was taken to a place of public execution. He escaped the more ghastly elements of his sentence, however, by the quick death of a broken neck. Some accounts say that he contrived this more dignified death by leaping from the scaffold before the hangman could adjust the noose properly. In another version of the story, King James himself ordered the hangman's knot to guarantee a quick death for the would-be assassin, whom he admired for his courage.

Almost from the day of his execution, Fawkes became a historical personage. The Gunpowder Plot and its ringleader would long serve as justification for fear and loathing of Catholics on the part of English Protestants. Taken as evidence of religious fanaticism and loyalty to a foreign prince (the POPE), Fawkes and the conspiracy would be invoked for some 200 years as justification for discrimination against and persecution of Catholics by English Protestants.

Each year the anniversary of the plot was celebrated by burning an effigy known as the Guy. Children marched through the streets chanting, "Do you remember the 5th of November, Gunpowder treason and plot?" In time, guy became a verb signifying to mock or torment, and the Guy, originally a noun signifying the effigy made for burning, became a label applied to anyone who was to be treated dismissively. Still later the word guy became a casual reference or even form of address used toward both men and women. By the early nineteenth century Guy Fawkes the traitor was being presented in works of fiction as a patriot, champion of freedom, or noble idealist, and this reversal of identity has persisted into the era of film and television.

FELIŃSKI, ZYGMUNT SZCZĘSNY, ST.

Archbishop of Warsaw and founder of the FRANCISCAN SISTERS of the Family of Mary; b. Wojutyn in Volinia, Russia (present-day Ukraine), November 1, 1822; d. Kraków, Austria (present-day Poland), September 17, 1895; beatified August 18, 2002, by Pope JOHN PAUL II; canonized October 11, 2009, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

Zygmunt (Sigmund) Feliński was raised in a devout Catholic, Polish family. He was eleven when his father died and sixteen when his mother was exiled to Siberia for advocating on behalf of the local farmers. Feliński was learned and cultured. From 1840 to 1850, he studied mathematics at the University of Moscow and French literature at the Sorbonne in Paris. He also took part in the revolt of Poznan in 1848. Feliński returned to Poland in 1851 and joined the diocese of Zytomierz as a seminarian. He was sent to the Catholic Academy of St. Petersburg for his formation and was ordained on September 8, 1855. His first assignment was at a parish in St. Petersburg, followed by a position as professor of philosophy and as spiritual director at the Ecclesiastical Academy. Feliński founded the Congregation of the Franciscan Sisters of the Family of Mary in 1857.

On January 6, 1862, Pope PIUS IX appointed Feliński archbishop of Warsaw, and he was consecrated on January 26, 1862, in St. Petersburg. The Warsaw he inherited had just undergone a siege by the Russians, who had retaliated against the city for its uprising against Russia in 1861. Upon his arrival in February 1862, Archbishop Feliński reconsecrated the cathedral of Warsaw, which had been profaned by the Russian Army, and reopened the city's churches. For the next sixteen months, he regularly visited the parishes and charitable organizations, reformed the programs for the formation of priests, and started an orphanage.

In early 1863, Feliński protested Russia's violent response to the "January Revolt" by resigning from the Council of State, and he petitioned Czar Alexander II (1818–1881) to end the violence. On June 14, Feliński was exiled to Siberia for twenty years. During this time, he became known as the "holy Polish bishop." He cared for the needs of his fellow prisoners, and even managed to build a Catholic church. In 1883 Russia permitted him to enter semi-exile, and Pope LEO XIII transferred him from the archbishopric of Warsaw to the titular See of Tarsus. He left Siberia for the town of Dzwiniaczka (present-day Ukraine). During the next twelve years, he pastored the local people, built the town's first school, and built a church and convent for the Franciscan Sisters of the Family of Mary.

Archbishop Feliński died in Kraków on September 17, 1895. In the HOMILY at his canonization Mass, Pope Benedict XVI noted:

> In every situation he retained his steadfast trust in Divine Providence and prayed: "O God, protect us not from the tribulations and worries of this world … only multiply love in our hearts and obtain that in deepest humility we may keep our infinite trust in your help and your mercy." Today his gift of himself to God and to humankind, full of trust and love, becomes a luminous example for the whole Church.

FELIX OF NICOSIA, ST.

Lay brother; b. Nicosia, Sicily, November 5, 1715; d. Nicosia, May 31, 1787; beatified February 12, 1888, by Pope LEO XIII; canonized October 23, 2005, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

Felix's devout mother, Carmela, had him baptized on the day of his birth, naming him Philip James. His father, Philip Amoroso, a poor shoemaker, had died a month earlier. Philip James grew up working in a shoemaker's shop near the friary at Nicosia, where his desire to join the order would grow over the years. At age twenty, he began petitioning the order for admittance, but his illiteracy proved to be an obstacle. At twenty-seven, after eight years of petitioning, he entered the Capuchin Order at Mistretta on October 1, 1743. He received the name Felix after St. FELIX OF CANTALICE, the first Capuchin saint. He professed his vows on October 10, 1744, and was assigned to the friary at Nicosia, contrary to the custom of the Capuchins, who generally did not assign friars to their hometowns, where family and friends might distract them.

During the forty-four years of his religious life, Felix served his brethren in the duties of a lay brother, especially as a seeker of alms. He was renowned for his charity, especially toward the sick and prisoners, and for his austere penances, constant prayer, and his power of miracles, which earned him the title thaumaturgus, or wonderworker. He was deeply devoted to the Eucharist and to the Blessed Mother. Each Friday, he contemplated the death of the Lord. For thirty-three years he lived under a superior who considered it his role to sanctify Felix by subjecting him to relentless severity and fantastic humiliations, all of which he heroically endured. He succumbed to an illness while working at the friary, and died there on May 31, 1787.

Felix was beatified by Leo XIII on February 12, 1888; three years later, his remains were transferred to the Cathedral of Nicosia. In April 2004, during the pontificate of Pope JOHN PAUL II, Felix's cause was advanced by the Congregation for the Causes of Saints. He was canonized by Pope Benedict XVI on October 23, 2005. During the canonization ceremony, Pope Benedict pointed to Felix's powerful experience of God's love. At all times, Felix would state, "So be it for the love of God." The pope described Felix as "humble ... austere and penitent, faithful to the most genuine expressions of the Franciscan tradition." The pope further observed that the love of God molded Felix, who lived out this love in service to his neighbor: "Bro. Felix helps us to discover the value of the little things that make our lives more precious, and teaches us to understand the meaning of family and of service to our brothers and sisters, showing us that true and lasting joy, for which every human heart yearns, is the fruit of love."

FELLOWSHIP OF CATHOLIC SCHOLARS

The Fellowship of Catholic Scholars (FCS) is an organization of academics and scientists dedicated to supporting and developing Catholic doctrine in an intellectual and social environment that its members believe is often biased against such teachings. The group was formed in 1977 to promote interdisciplinary intellectual activity. Many of its original members belonged to specialized Catholic academic organizations that they felt had moved away from ORTHODOXY. A number of them also believed that their own careers had suffered, even to the point of losing teaching positions, because they did not conform to a prevailing orthodoxy of dissent.

The Origins of the Fellowship of Catholic Scholars. Strong public dissent from the 1968 papal encyclical Humanae vitae laid the seeds for the FCS, but it was not founded until nine years later. In early 1977, Monsignor George A. Kelly, a New York archdiocesan priest and professor at St. John's University, made a cross-country trip in order to interest scholars in forming such a group. Later that year a group of like-minded scholars met to discuss the possibility, and in August 1977 the decision was made to form the FCS. Its first annual convention was the following April in Kansas City, Missouri.

The FCS published a "Statement of Purpose" in the first edition of its newsletter (December 1977), in which it stated the following:

> We wish to form a fellowship that is gladly obedient to the Word of God spoken in His Catholic Church. We accept willingly in faith the defined teachings of the Church's ordinary and universal Magisterium.... Aware of the duty scholars have to serve the whole community of faith, we wish to give whatever assistance we can to the Church in answering contemporary questions. (Whitehead 2006, p. 280)

Since then, the FCS has particularly involved itself with LITURGY, ECCLESIOLOGY, and religious education, and it has addressed disputed moral questions, especially those related to sexual ethics and life issues. In addition, historical, literary, sociological, artistic, and scientific subjects that have religious implications have been examined.

The Scholarly Role of the Fellowship of Catholic Scholars. From its beginning, members of the FCS have been conscious of being "countercultural" in American Catholic intellectual life. Thus, the group strongly and officially supported the HOLY SEE's document Ex corde ecclesiae (From the Heart of the Church), which defined the nature of Catholic higher education, even though most American Catholic colleges and universities were resistant to it. A condition of tension has often existed between the official hierarchy of the Church and various leading Catholic thinkers, but the FCS holds that Catholic scholarship must exist in harmony with official teaching, a position described as "faith seeking understanding." The FCS regarded Pope JOHN PAUL II as both an authoritative teacher and a thinker who led the Church into a new era of intellectual vitality.

In the beginning, many FCS members envisioned a close working relationship with the American bishops, many of whom had experienced theological dissent in their own dioceses. On the whole, however, the bishops proved to be cautious in entering into such a relationship. Thus, while individual members of the group have been consulted by particular bishops, there has been no established relationship between the FCS and the hierarchy. Indeed, the FCS has often been critical of position papers generated by official bureaucracies at both the national and diocesan levels.

Activities of the Fellowship of Catholic Scholars. While generally dubbed "conservative," the FCS has confined itself exclusively to issues with clear religious and moral implications, and it has avoided political questions as such. Similarly, its religious conservatism has been limited to doctrinal questions and has not extended to such things as the restoration of the Tridentine liturgy, to take just one example. While many of its members are Thomists, the order includes scholars from other traditions that are compatible with theological orthodoxy, such as the phenomenology of John Paul II.

The FCS publishes the Fellowship of Catholic Scholars Quarterly (formerly the Fellowship of Catholic Scholars Newsletter), as well as an annual anthology of the papers read at its convention. The organization bestows an annual John Cardinal Wright Award (named after the American prelate who became prefect of the Sacred Congregation of the Clergy) on an outstanding scholar, and an annual Patrick Cardinal O'Boyle Award (named for the late archbishop of Washington) on an individual who has shown singular zeal on behalf of the Church over his or her lifetime. It also occasionally bestows awards on Catholics in public life who have shown a notable commitment to the moral teachings of the Church.

The organization has about a thousand members, including "regular" members who possess terminal degrees in their fields. Other members are designated as "associates." While theologians are the largest single group, followed by philosophers, there is significant representation from other disciplines.

FERNANDES, BARTOLOMEU DEI MARTIRI, BL.

Also known as Bartolomeus a Martyribus or Bartolomeu dos Mártires; archbishop of Braga; b. May 3, 1514, Verdela, Portugal; d. July 16,1590, Viana do Castelo, Portugal; beatified November 4, 2001, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

Baptized Bartolomeu dos Mártires (Bartholomew of the Martyrs), Bartolomeu dei Martiri Fernandes was the son of Domingos Fernandes and Maria Correia. In 1528 he entered the Dominican Order. After his profession on November 20, 1529, he completed his studies and went on to teach PHILOSOPHY at the college of St. Dominic of Lisbon from 1538 to 1540; he then taught theology at the college of Batalha for the next eleven years.

In 1551 he earned a master's degree in Salamanca, Spain, after which he spent two years in Évora as the royal tutor of Dom António, son of the Infante Dom Luis. In 1558 Queen Catherine chose him as archbishop of Braga. He did not want the appointment, but he obeyed his superior and received the episcopal consecration the following year in the church of St. Dominic in Lisbon.

From October 4, 1559, on, he devoted himself to his large archdiocese and to writing. He also opened schools of MORAL THEOLOGY for the clergy to encourage them in HOLINESS. Known for his pastoral visits and evangelization, he shared his commitment in composing the Catechism of Christian Doctrine and Spiritual Practices. Another of his thirty-two works, Stimulus Pastorum, was distributed at the councils of Vatican I and Vatican II.

From 1561 to 1563, he participated in the Council of TRENT, where he presented more than two hundred sixty petitions and summaries of request for reform. Both PIUS IV and St. Charles BORROMEO respected him and often asked for his advice. Following the council, the archbishop held a diocesan synod in 1564 and the Provincial Council of Braga in 1566.

When the plague and a famine struck, the archbishop gained a reputation for great charity; he often gave from his own pocket to alleviate suffering. Sometimes criticized for his poor appearance, he responded that he would not spend money on himself that could be better used to help the poor.

He resigned on February 23, 1582, and moved to the Dominican convent of the Holy Cross in Viana do Castelo, where he gained a reputation for HUMILITY. He dedicated himself to prayer and religious study and, while his health permitted, went out on foot to preach and share all that he had with the poor—even giving up his own bed and his pension. He suffered during his final years of illness until his death on July 16, 1590. GREGORY XVI declared him Venerable in 1845. Pope John Paul II, who beatified him on November 4, 2001, praised his zeal and commended him for his contributions to Church reform at the Council of Trent.

FILIPPINI, LUCY, ST.

Foundress of the Pontifical Institute of the RELIGIOUS TEACHERS FILIPPINI; b. Tarquinia, Italy, January 13, 1672; d. Montefiascone, March 25, 1732; beatified June 13, 1926 by Pope PIUS XI; canonized on June 22, 1930 by Pope Pius XI.

As a child Lucy helped her pastor teach catechism. Cardinal Marc'Antonio BARBARIGO, Bishop of Montefiascone, sent lucy to a monastery of nuns when she was sixteen. There, under his guidance, she prepared for her future mission. She remained at the monastary until 1692, when she joined St. Rose VENERINI (canonized October 15, 2006, in Rome by Pope BENEDICT XVI) in the work of educating the poorer girls of the diocese until she took over the girls education completely in 1694. On October 15, 1704, the community was formally established, receiving their rule and habit from the cardinal and pronouncing their Oblation. After the death of the cardinal in 1706, the community was called to Rome by CLEMENT XI, developing into the institute of today, which is under the sponsorship of the Apostolic Almoner. As of 2009, 1,100 Religious Teachers Filippini were active in Albania, Brazil, England, Ethiopia, Eritrea, Ireland, India, Italy, Switzerland and the United States.

St. Lucy was noted for her great virtue and, through the schools that she founded, many were brought closer to God. She hoped that her students would, inturn, convey to their parents and relatives what they learned during their instruction, and in this way become "so many young teachers as well." When she died of cancer at the age of sixty, she was laid to rest in St. Peter's Basilica in Rome.

Feast: March 25.

FINALY AFFAIR

The Finaly Affair (1945–1953) began as a judicial case in France involving the custody of two Jewish orphans of the SHOAH: Robert (b. 1941) and Gérald (b. 1942) Finaly. The affair polarized the French nation and became an international crisis when some in the French Church refused to allow the boys, who had been illegally baptized in 1948, to return to their relatives, despite the ruling of the Grenoble Court of Appeals in favor of their family. The Finaly Affair became a symbol of the strained relations between Church and SYNAGOGUE.

Dr. Fritz Finaly (1906–1944) and his wife Anni Schwarz (1915–1944), Austrian Jews, fled Nazi persecution in 1939 and settled in La Tronche, a suburb of Grenoble, where their two sons, Robert and Gérald, were born. The family circumcised both boys, in spite of the risks that this entailed in a Nazi-occupied country. Fearing for their lives, the Finalys gave their two young sons to a Catholic nursery, St. Vincent de Paul. Because of the children's young age, the boys were entrusted to the municipal nursery of Grenoble, directed by Antoinette Brun (1894–1988). On February 14, 1944, the doctor and his wife were deported to Auschwitz, where they were murdered.

Shortly before the Liberation, in February 1945, Finaly's sister Marguerite Fischel, living in New Zealand, located her two nephews and contacted Brun to express gratitude to her and to request custody of the boys. She obtained visas for the children to move to New Zealand in May 1945. Brun gave different excuses for not allowing the boys to leave. In November 1945, Brun convened a family council that did not include Finaly relatives. She asked for custody of the children but failed to report Fischel's request to the magistrate. Believing that all family members had perished, the magistrate named Brun temporary guardian of the boys. With the power of her temporary guardianship, Brun proceeded for the next three years to obstruct all attempts by Finaly relatives to contact her or the children.

In 1948 the family decided that Hedwig and Moshe Rosner, the boys' aunt and uncle living in Israel, should become their guardians because they lived closer to Grenoble. They appointed their friend Moïse Keller (1907–1982) as legal representative. Upon learning that Brun had baptized the boys without their consent in 1948, the family initiated judicial proceedings against Brun for custody of the children.

French Clergy Involvement. Beginning in 1948, Brun entrusted the two boys to the nuns of Our Lady of Zion, who became responsible for their Catholic education and upbringing. Many clergy at that time believed that baptized Jewish children had to be separated from their Jewish relatives because they belonged to the Church.

On June 11, 1952, the Grenoble Court of Appeals ruled that Rosner was the permanent guardian of Robert and Gérald and that Brun was obligated to turn over the children to her or to Keller. With the help of nuns of Our Lady of Zion, Brun arranged to hide the children. Mother Superior Antonine enrolled the children under false names in a school directed by Our Lady of Zion in Marseille. Antonine asked Cardinal Pierre Marie Gerlier (1880–1965) for advice regarding the case of the Finaly children. In September 1952 Gerlier and his attorney gave Antonine permission to hide the Finaly boys. The children were transferred from school to school, wearing disguises and given false identification. The Finaly Affair now involved open revolt against French law.

No member of the Church hierarchy in France or in any other country ever publicly denounced the hiding or illegal baptism of the boys or called for their return to their family. A division of opinion existed among French Catholic clergy and their faithful during the affair. While progressive clergymen such as Paul Démann, Pierre Chaillet (1900–1972), and Bishop Alexandre Caillot (1861–1957) believed that the boys' baptism was illegal and wanted to see the children returned to their relatives, conservative clergymen, including Bishop Léon-Albert Terrier (1893–1957) and Cardinal Maurice Feltin (1883–1975), believed that the baptism imposed a duty to remove the converts from the influence of non-Christians.

An International Crisis. In February 1953 Gerlier contacted Cardinal Pla y Deniel of Toledo, Spain, to convince him to hide the Finaly children so they would not be returned to their family (ADL, Gerlier, 1953). The boys were led by Basque priests across the Pyrenees into Spain on February 13 and hidden in a monastery in Lazcano (known today as Laskao). The government of Francisco FRANCO opposed releasing the children.

International awareness of the Finaly Affair grew during February to June 1953. The affair created a polemic in the French press as anti-Semitic calumny suggested comparisons with the DREYFUS AFFAIR and anti-clericalism reappeared in France. The Israeli Knesset and spokespeople from many other nations made appeals to return the children to their family.

Rabbi Jacob Kaplan (1895–1994) became chief negotiator representing the Jewish Consistory. Kaplan worked with Chaillet, who represented the French Church. They reached an accord on March 6, 1953, to return the children to Rosner and to respect the boys' religious preferences, once the children had been found. While agreeing in principle to negotiations, Gerlier allegedly followed papal directives to prevent the boys' return to their family. In his letter to Cardinal Pla y Deniel, Gerlier wrote about his conversation with PIUS XII, who reportedly advised him: "We must do everything possible to safeguard the right of these children to remain Christian" (ADL, Gerlier, February 12, 1953).

Role of Pius XII. On January 23, 1953, Pope Pius XII reportedly advised Gerlier to hide the Finaly children:

> If the definitive court ruling is contrary to [Brun], it would be advisable for this woman to resist in all ways possible the order to turn the children over [to the aunt], and to adopt all means that may slow down the execution of a court ruling that violates their rights. (CDJC, Ribière 1953)

In his correspondence with Gerlier during 1953, Pius XII expressed an unwillingness to support the return of the boys without guarantees that the children's Catholic education and faith would be protected, and that all lawsuits against clergy would be dropped (Lazarus 2008, pp. 52–54).

Release of Children. On June 26, 1953, the Finaly boys were released to their family. They settled in Israel with Rosner and returned to their Jewish faith. The children's release was due in large part to Kaplan and Keller's efforts to raise international awareness of the affair. The French Supreme Court ruling of June 23, 1953, in favor of Rosner put pressure on the French Church. Gerlier's emissary, Germaine Ribière (1917–1999), and Basque monk Maur Elizondo freed the children.

Consequences of the Affair. Following the resolution of the Finaly Affair, Kaplan dropped charges against Our Lady of Zion, which then underwent an ideological transformation. The order rededicated its mission from conversion of Jews to engagement in Jewish-Christian dialogue. Leaders of Our Lady of Zion worked with Cardinal Augustin BEA (1881–1968) during the Second Vatican Council and made important contributions to Nostra aetate. The Finaly Affair contributed to accelerating Vatican II and acted as a catalyst for Jewish-Christian rapprochement. It united French Jews and strengthened Kaplan's position as chief rabbi.

FINDYSZ, WŁADYSŁAW (LADISLAUS), BL.

Priest, MARTYR for the faith, b. Krościenko Niżne, near Krosno, Poland, December 13, 1907; d. Krościenko Niżne, August 21, 1964; beatified June 19, 2005, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

Ladislaus Findysz, the son of Stanislaus Findysz and Apollonia Rachwal, joined the Marian Solidality as a young student. At age twenty, he entered the seminary in Przemyśl and was ordained a priest on June 19, 1932. Fr. Ladislaus served in numerous parishes before being appointed pastor of Saints Peter and Paul parish in Nowy Żmigród on August 13, 1942. He and the rest of his town were expelled by the Germans on October 3, 1944, being permitted to return on January 3, 1945. In 1946 Fr. Ladislaus came under the surveillance of the secret service when he defended Greek Catholics from expulsion by the Communist regime. He was then suspended from teaching catechism classes by the government in 1952, and on two occasions was not permitted to live within the boundaries of his parish. Church officials recognized his passion for the Faith by giving him the title of honorary canon in 1946 and awarding him the rochet and mantelletta (honorary clerical garments) in 1957. The following year, Fr. Ladislaus founded the Conciliar Works of Charity, a letter campaign to exhort parishioners living in irregular moral situations to reorder their lives.

Fr. Ladislaus's commitment to fallen-away Catholics led the Communist authorities to accuse him of forcing citizens to participate in religion. On November 25, 1963, he was interrogated, arrested, and later sentenced to two-and-a-half-years imprisonment. During this time, he suffered greatly from malnutrition and physical, psychological, and spiritual abuse. Prior to his arrest, Fr. Ladislaus had undergone an operation to remove his thyroid gland. In prison, complications during his recovery went uncared for and a cancerous growth in his esophagus also went untreated. Although lower courts denied his petition for release due to health reasons, the supreme court in Warsaw granted his request and released him on February 29, 1964. This was too late to treat the cancer, however, and Fr. Ladislaus died on August 21, 1964.

Fr. Ladislaus was recognized as a martyr for the Faith on December 20, 2004, becoming the first Polish martyr under COMMUNISM. His BEATIFICATION was approved by Pope JOHN PAUL II and scheduled for April 24, 2005, but it was delayed due to the death of the Holy Father. Fr. Ladislaus was beatified by Pope Benedict XVI on June 19, 2005. The beatification ceremony was held in Piłsudski Square in Warsaw at the close of a Eucharistic Congress. Cardinal Józef GLEMP, then archbishop of Warsaw, presided over the beatification.

Feast: August 21.

FLESCH, MARGARET, BL.

Known in religion as Mother Rose or Mother Mary Rose Flesh; also known as Margherita Flesch; foundress, Franciscan Sisters of the Blessed Virgin Mary of the Angels; b. February 24, 1826, Schönstatt, near Koblenz, Germany; d. March 25, 1906, Waldbreitbach, Germany; beatified by Pope Benedict XVI, May 4, 2008.

Christened Margaretha, Margaret Flesch was the first of seven children born to an impoverished oil miller. When she was about six, her mother died, and the family moved to Niederbreitbach, hoping to better their financial position. Ten years later her father died, leaving sixteen-year-old Margaret and her stepmother to care for the six younger children. Margaret worked as a day laborer, collected herbs to sell, and made crafts to support the family. By the time she was twenty-five, the family no longer needed her income, so she and her epileptic sister Marianne moved into tiny quarters in the Cross Chapel in Waldbreitbach, Germany. They spent little on themselves, but instead used their funds to help the needy. Margaret felt called to serve the sick and orphaned, so she took some orphans into her home while she continued to work her day job. She also taught home economics at nearby schools.

Two other women joined her in 1856. In 1861 a pastor offered them an apartment in nearby Hausen, but after they moved, they found it unlivable. That spring they constructed a building on Waldbreitbacher Chapel Mountain, where they could care for the sick. They moved into the home on November 11, 1861.

In Cross Chapel on March 13, 1863, the three women professed vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience to God. Margaret took the name Rose and became the first general superior of the FRANCISCAN SISTERS of the Blessed Virgin Mary of the Angels. Seven women joined them, and Mother Rose opened a mission house. In spite of KULTURKAMPF (1876–1881), German policies that restricted the Catholic Church and resulted in the imprisonment of many priests, Mother Rose's congregation grew swiftly. By 1878, when she ended her term as superior general, 105 sisters served twenty-two houses. From that point on, she stayed in the background, so much so that few sisters knew she had founded the community. By the time of her death on March 25, 1906, the congregation had expanded to 900 sisters and 72 mission houses. In 1923 they sent the first missionaries to the United States. Over the next fifty years, the congregation expanded into the Netherlands, Brazil, Portugal, and Africa.

The cause for Mother Rose's beatification was introduced in ROME in 1957, but the process was delayed until 1987. About eighty years after her death, Mother Rose's remains were moved to the Motherhouse Church. She was beatified in Trier, Germany, on May 4, 2008.

Feast: March 25.

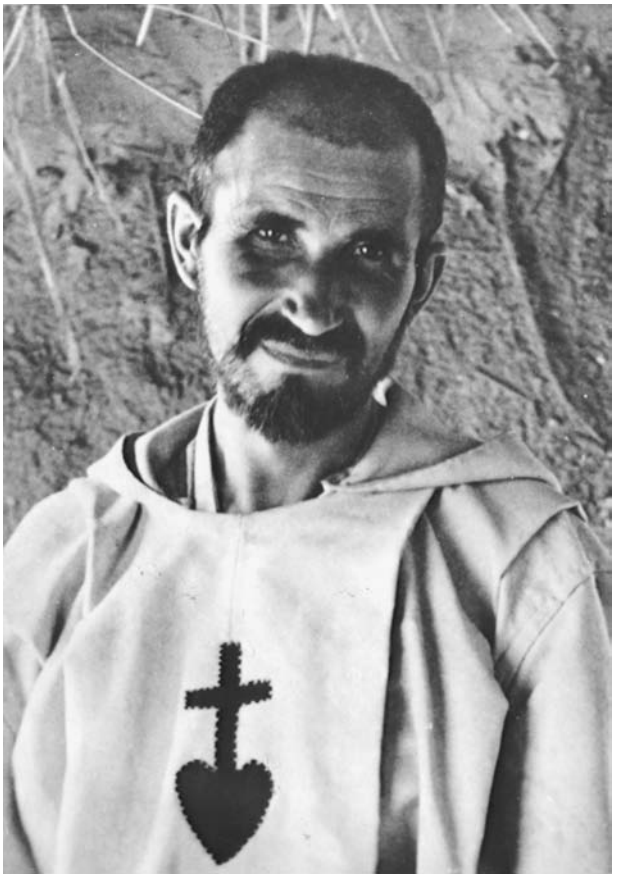
FOUCAULD, CHARLES EUGÈNE DE, BL.

Priest, hermit, MARTYR; b. Strasbourg, France, September 15, 1858; d. Tamanrasset, Algeria, December 1, 1916; beatified November 13, 2005, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

Charles Eugène de Foucauld, who came from a distinguished and devout family, was left an orphan in 1864 and was entrusted to the care of his maternal grandfather, a retired colonel. While pursuing his secondary studies at Strasbourg and Nancy, Foucauld lost his faith. So deeply did he plunge into dissipation that he had difficulty in completing his military education at Saint-Cyr (1876) and at the cavalry school in Saumur (1878). He received a commission as a second lieutenant, but he was discharged for disorderly conduct at the garrison of Pont-à-Mousson (1881). He was soon restored to his rank and regiment during a native revolt in the Sahara. In the ensuing eight-month campaign, he turned from his dissolute ways and distinguished himself in the field for bravery and leadership qualities.



When Foucauld returned to France, he could not adjust to garrison life and resigned his commission. He then returned to the Sahara to engage in exploration. After a year spent in Algiers studying the local language and customs, he passed two years in the desert disguised as the Jewish servant of a rabbi (1883–1884). His topographical, ethnological, social, and military findings were published as Reconnaissance au Maroc, 1883–1884

(1888), which won him recognition from the Geographical Society of Paris.

Deeply impressed by the desert solitude and the religiousness of the Muslims he encountered, Foucauld reconsidered the Christian faith that he had lost. Once he moved to Paris, he accepted the invitation of Abbé Henri Huvelin (1830–1910) to confess and receive Holy Communion (October 1886). With characteristic intensity he began to live a life of prayer and asceticism, seeking to imitate the humility of Jesus. On a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, he joined the TRAPPISTS in the Monastery of Notre Dame des Neiges in Nazareth (1890), but he soon transferred to a poorer house at Akbès in Syria (1890–1996). In search of even greater poverty and self-sacrifice, he transferred to the Abbey of Staoüeli in Algeria (1896). The superior there sent him to Rome to study theology, but he left the Trappists before ordination and returned to Nazareth to live as a servant of the POOR CLARES (1897–1900). Working as a poor gardener and living in a shed outside the convent, he was eventually convinced that he was called to become a priest, a call connected to bringing Eucharist to the poor in remote regions. In 1901 he was ordained at Viviers.

Thereupon, he went back to the Sahara and established a hermitage at Beni-Abbès on the Morocco-Algeria frontier (1901). He sought to bring Christianity to the Muslim desert tribes, not by preaching but by good example. By his life of contemplation and charity, he aimed to show himself as a man of God and as "the universal brother," and thereby to prepare the way for later missionaries. In his hermitage, which he called "la Fraternité du Sacré-Coeur de Jésus," he kept the Blessed Sacrament always exposed and spent long hours in adoration. In 1905 he penetrated deeper into the Sahara and set up his hermitage in the Ahaggar Mountains near Tamanrasset. Respected by the Tuareg tribesmen, who revered him as a Marabout or holy man, Foucauld was able to learn a great deal concerning their customs and language. The desert, however, did not shield Foucauld from the effects of WORLD WAR I (1914–1918). As a Frenchman in Algeria, he was a target. In 1915 he began transforming his hermitage into a small fort that would serve to protect the population of Tamanrasset from raiders on camelback.

On December 1, 1916, Foucauld was lured outside of his fortified hermitage by one of the Tuaereg, who had been bribed by members of the militant Senusi sect. He was bound and killed by a single gunshot to the head. Foucauld had no disciples during life, but the publication of his personal papers inspired the founding of the LITTLE BROTHERS OF JESUS (1933) and the LITTLE SISTERS OF JESUS (1936).

Bl. Charles Eugéne de Foucauld. This hermit and martyr inspired the founding of two religious orders: Little Brothers of Jesus and Little Sisters of Jesus.

The first steps toward Foucauld's BEATIFICATION were taken by the prefect apostolic of Ghardaia in 1927. In 1947 the relevant documents were forwarded to Rome. In December 2004, Pope JOHN PAUL II approved the decree recognizing the miraculous healing of Joanna Citeri Pulici, an Italian, from cancer. Foucauld was beatified on November 13, 2005, in Rome by Pope Benedict XVI, who emphasized Foucauld's insight that Jesus, by joining us in our humanity, invites us to universal brotherhood.

498 MARTYRS OF THE SPANISH CIVIL WAR, BB.

Martyrs; 2 bishops, 24 priests, 462 religious, 1 deacon, 1 subdeacon, 1 seminarian, and 7 laity; d. various cities in Spain, 1934–1937; beatified October 28, 2007, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

These 498 martyrs of the Spanish Civil War (1936–1939) were men and women, clergy and laity, murdered because of their faith by Republican forces before and during the conflict. They ranged in age from sixteen to seventy-eight and came from all strata of society. Most were Spanish; however, the list includes martyrs from France, Mexico, and Cuba.

The Spanish Civil War decided the power struggle between the elected government of the Second Spanish Republic, which had come to power in 1931 and included Communists and anarchists, as well as groups with more moderate political views, and the opposition, known as Nationalists, comprised of a broad range of political factions that had common anti-Communist sentiments. The Republican government was firmly anticlerical, and militias carried out a program of oppression and violence against Catholic clergy and laity, who were mostly aligned with the Nationalist movement. It is estimated that almost seven thousand Church clergy were murdered by the Republican government.

Accounts of these deaths note the extreme brutality of the killers and the terrible suffering of the victims. Despite this, the martyrs maintained dignity in the face of cruelty and derision and extended forgiveness to their persecutors. Bartolomé Blanco Márquez (1914–1936), a twenty-one-year-old leader of CATHOLIC ACTION, in a letter from prison, said "May this be my last will: forgiveness, forgiveness, forgiveness," and he asked his relatives "to avenge me with the vengeance of a Christian: returning much good to those that have tried to do me evil." Bishop Cruz Laplana y Laguna (1875–1936) refused efforts by local authorities to help him avoid arrest because the plan required him to remove his clerical garb and pretend to be a lay person. He was shot by firing squad; reportedly, his last words were, "May God forgive you, as I forgive and bless you."

Some critics say that the new blesseds, while certainly victims of religious persecution, should not be considered martyrs; others challenge the Vatican's motives, arguing that the BEATIFICATION is really a condemnation of the socialist leadership in Spain. There are some allegations that individuals in the group were responsible for immoral and violent political and criminal acts of their own. However, Church records and witnesses' accounts support the martyrs' great faith and their unwillingness to subjugate the teachings of Christ to secular mores, even in the face of death.

Pope Benedict XVI reminded pilgrims to the beatification that "the supreme witness ... is not an exception reserved for only a few individuals, but a realistic possibility for the entire Christian People." At the Mass of beatification, Cardinal José Saraiva Martins said the new blesseds "expressed their love for Jesus Christ, their fidelity to the Catholic Church and their intercession with God for the whole world," and he noted that they forgave and "even prayed for" those who persecuted them.

The martyrs are listed below organized by their religious affiliations. Also included are their birth and death dates along with the city where they were martyred. In some cases this information could not be established, and so was not included. Where place of death could not be confirmed, we have listed their possible sites of martyrdom.

FRANCIA, ANNIBALE MARIA DI, ST.

Founder of the Rogationist Fathers of the Heart of Jesus and the Daughters of Divine Zeal; known as the "father of orphans and the poor"; b. Messina, Sicily, Italy, July 5, 1851; d. Messina, June 1, 1927; beatified October 7, 1990; canonized May 16, 2004, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

Annibale Maria di Francia was the son of a noble family headed by Francis di Francia, marquis of Santa Catarina, and his wife Anna Toscano. When Annibale was two, his father, who was papal vice counsel to Pope PIUS IX, died. Stories about Annibale's days in a Cistercian boarding school (1858–1866) describe acts of the heroic compassion that characterized his entire life. When the school was closed during the revolution of 1866, the Sicilian poet Felice Bisazza (1809–1967) tutored him. Annibale used his writing skills to compose poetry (The Hymns of July First), prayers, and pamphlets, as well as articles for his uncle's periodical, La Parola Catolica.

From his childhood, Annibale had a unique love for the Eucharist, even becoming a daily communicant. In prayer before the Blessed Sacrament when he was seventeen, he understood the necessity of the Lord's command: rogate ergo, Latin for "pray therefore," referring to Matthew 9:38: "Pray therefore the Lord of the harvest to send out laborers into his harvest." At eighteen, Annibale recognized his call to the priesthood. A month before his ordination on March 16, 1878, he encountered a blind youth, Francis Zancone, who introduced him to the need for charity. Thereafter, he joyfully dedicated himself to the spiritual and temporal relief of the most neglected, beginning in the neighborhood of Avignone in Messina. He established evening and boarding schools for boys, a kindergarten for girls, and orphanages dedicated to St. ANTHONY OF PADUA (to whom Annibale later built a shrine in Messina). Like others who heroically give of themselves, he encountered opposition, but received the support of Archbishop Giacomo Guarino, as well as John BOSCO. For the physically poor, especially children in the Anthonian orphanages, Annibale begged from door to door.

For the purpose of praying for vocations to the priesthood and religious life and for caring for needy children and the poor, Annibale formed the Rogationist Fathers in 1897 and Daughters of Divine Zeal in 1887. Bl. Mélanie Calvat, one of the visionaries of LA SALETTE, spent a year at the female institute (1897–1898), helping Annibale firmly establish it following some setbacks. Orphanages run by the sisters multiplied quickly after 1902 to meet each new crisis in Italy (e.g., earthquakes, cholera, war). Additionally, to invite others to unite spiritually to pray for vocations, Annibale established a HOLY ALLIANCE for bishops, prelates, and priests, as well as the Pious Union of Evangelical Prayer for laity.

For many years, Annibale was the spiritual director for the writings of Luisa Piccarreta (1865–1947, cause opened in February 1994), who recorded private revelations on the divine will. Among the nineteen volumes to which Annibale gave the nihil obstat (lit: "nothing hinders"), a form of official Church approval for publication, were Piccarreta's The Virgin Mary in the Kingdom of the Divine Will and The Hours of the Passion of Our Lord Jesus Christ.

Throughout his life, Annibale conscientiously fulfilled his priestly obligations, showed Christlike love to the most vulnerable, and trusted completely in divine providence. The Rogationists have expanded beyond the borders of Italy to other countries in Europe, as well as to Argentina, Brazil, India, Korea, Papua New Guinea, the Philippines, Rwanda, the United States, and Vietnam. In beatifying Annibale on October 7, 1990, Pope John Paul II held him up to the Church as the "authentic precursor and zealous teacher of the modern pastoral ministry of vocations."

During the canonization Mass of May 16, 2004, Pope John Paul said that in St. Annibale's love for others he sensed the urgency of Jesus' words rogate ergo. The pope stressed the duty of prayer for vocations—an "unceasing and universal" task—that Annibale had left to the Rogationist Fathers and to the Daughters of Divine Zeal. With Annibale's work, "a great movement of prayer for vocations rose up within the Church." In his HOMILY, the pope noted that Annibale frequently exhorted others to "Fall in love with Jesus Christ," an expression that resonates with young people of today as well: "I hope with all my heart that the example of Fr. Hannibal Mary Di Francia will guide and sustain such pastoral work even in our times."

In a papal address to pilgrims in Rome the day following the canonization, John Paul emphasized Annibale's Marian devotion. He had received the name Maria at baptism, and his love for Our Lady continued throughout his life. He often invoked the Blessed Virgin under the names "Mother of the Church" and "Mother of Vocations." Annibale recommended devotion to Our Lady as the "secret to holiness and the special glory" for the Rogationists and his Daughters. Immediately before his death, he had the grace of a comforting vision of Our Lady.

FRANCISCANS, CONVENTUAL

The movement of FRIARS into the main cities of Europe that took place in the 1240s was one of the main currents of change within the Franciscan movement that officially began in 1209, when a primitive rule of life was approved by Pope INNOCENT III. Along with the convents that sprung up around the educational centers of the major cities, friars were attracted to the cities because of the call of pastoral ministry, that is, the care of souls. These friars proved to be useful to the papacy and local bishops in the pastoral care of the people in the urban environment. Obedience to Church leaders in regard to pastoral ministry often meant that friars had to make compromises when it came to the strict observance of poverty.

In the centuries that followed, friars working in large parishes grew increasingly involved in the social, economic, and political life of the cities. This entailed a downside, from the perspective of the Observant Franciscans, namely, the temptation to accumulate goods and money from the ministries in which they were engaged. Certain friars became involved in ecclesiastical and social circles that enticed them to serve the powerful and thereby be involved in the structures of power and prestige. In order to maintain the lifestyle that came with this power and prestige, oftentimes friars would seek privileges and dispensations from living in accord with the strict Franciscan approach to poverty. This attempt to find compromise and accommodation in a Franciscan environment came at a cost, primarily in the form of protests by those who believed friars were betraying the embrace of poverty envisioned by Francis and the earliest companions and legislated in the Franciscan Rule and the Testament of Francis.

In many cases, the Conventual way of life was based on the economic system in which the fixed incomes of pastoral work gave friars a stable form of life in the cities where they lived. The income and goods that were generated from their pastoral work and the donations from their churches would not only allow stability of lifestyle (they did not have to beg, but instead they worked for their living). Also, these resources would be passed on to the poor of the cities. The ownership of goods was therefore only temporary, in the sense that they would be passed on to others, but it was also permanent in that it allowed for stability in the maintenance of the friaries. The large convents in which they lived were emblematic of this: they were "fortresses of faith" that allowed a regularized life of prayer, study, and work. They were also centers of social outreach. Friars of various reform movements saw this stability of life as a violation of the Rule of Francis, according to which friars were to work not for tomorrow but only the present day.

In the early Franciscan movement friars also became more involved with cultural things, such as art, architecture, literature, music, and highly developed liturgy. Throughout western Europe, there was a tremendous increase in the building of Franciscan churches in the 1240s, and friars became very much involved in the material construction and decoration of their own churches. The edifices of these churches were built primarily after the style of preaching churches, but the walls and side chapels showed great flourishes of the decorative arts (primarily frescos and stained glass). The income to provide this art came for the most part from the rich and powerful families of the cities, with whom friars were socially and economically involved. Many of the Franciscan churches being built in the major cities of Italy served multiple purposes—they were centers of spirituality for the administration of sacraments and for preaching, but they were also aesthetic centers, given the abundance of artistic work that filled their walls. The Conventuals excelled in music, as evidenced by a number of famous composers, choirs, organists, and other musicians. A major focus of many of the Conventual churches was a rich and vibrant celebration of the liturgy of the Eucharist and a lively devotional life that led people to a fuller celebration thereof (which was also a hallmark of Jesuit churches of the Baroque period).

Because many of the large convents also served as educational centers or were located near independent centers of higher learning, the Conventuals participated in the arts and sciences of these educational places. They were involved in many of the applied sciences, such as astronomy, cartography, mathematics, and psychology. In some cases, such as the large friary in Paris, the Franciscan way of life was at least partly influenced by the the scholarly lifestyle.

"Conventual" means living the life of a convent or friary, and the Conventuals tended to be more "monastic" in terms of everyday living. Large convents led to a much more developed practice of the regular life, which included Mass and the liturgy of the hours in common. A typical feature of the Conventual way of life is the house chapter, a monthly meeting of the friars of the convent or friary. The chapters fostered much more autonomy of the individual friaries within each province (juridical zone based on location) and the order at large.

Numerically the Conventuals are much smaller than the other two major groups of First Order Franciscans. The decreasing number of Conventuals in Europe and the United States has meant a loss of the richness of Conventual tradition within many of the convents of the order and the loss of the centers of Conventual living. Nearly defunct in the late 1900s, they have since grown. Currently the Conventuals are growing in numbers in Africa, Asia, and Latin America.

FRANCO, FRANCISCO

Spanish political and military leader; b. El Ferrol, Spain, December 4, 1892; d. Madrid, Spain, November 20, 1975.

Francisco Franco Bahamonde descended from a family of naval officers. He was destined for a career in that service but became an army cadet after his country's great naval defeat in the Spanish American War of 1898. He graduated from military academy in 1910 and rose rapidly in rank, serving mostly in North Africa. His courage and leadership in battle against Muslim rebels singled him out for advancement, and when he was promoted to brigadier general in 1926, he was the youngest general in any European army. Franco showed an early gift for self-publicity while commanding the newly created Spanish Foreign Legion, whose exploits he arranged to be portrayed in films. A national hero, he was honored by King Alfonso XIII (1886–1941), who was best man at his wedding. Franco's bride, Carmen Polo (1900–1988), whom he married in 1923, was a deeply religious woman who influenced her husband to become a more observant Catholic. Named head of the Military Academy at Zaragoza (1928), the young general experienced only a brief interruption in his success after the proclamation of the republic in 1931, which led to the termination of his appointment.

During the early 1930s, Franco held several regional commands, thanks to his ability to preserve a stance of political neutrality and to remain apparently aloof from the intrigues of his fellow officers. In 1936, however, he discarded his mask of detachment and emerged as one of the principal leaders of a military revolt that was to change the course of Spanish history. From his headquarters in Morocco, he led the Army of Africa (composed of Foreign Legion and colonial troops) across the Strait of Gibraltar and soon gained dominance in southern Spain.

Takes Power after Crusade. Between the summer of 1936 and early 1939, Franco led what came to be known as the National Crusade against the republic, whose supporters he denounced as godless communists and betrayers of all of Spain's most sacred traditions. His principal associates among the military rebels having died or been pushed aside, Franco emerged as chief of state and commander in chief of the armed forces. In a bloody civil war that involved not only his own Nationalist troops but also Republican forces made up of civilian loyalists drawn from party militias of the Spanish Left and regional separatists, Franco called on the aid of German and Italian Fascist leaders in what would later be considered a rehearsal for World War II. By the time the remnants of the Republican forces retreated across the Pyrenees into French internment camps, over 100,000 soldiers and civilians had been killed in battle or murdered, imprisoned, or forced into exile. The true winner of the war was Francisco Franco himself. Franco would remain the undisputed master of Spain for the rest of his life.

Various political groups, including monarchists who expected that he would merely be regent until the return of Alfonso XIII, found themselves subordinated to the man who was now referred to as El Caudillo, a title of leadership analogous to Adolf HITLER's Fuehrer and Benito MUSSOLINI's Duce. Franco would exercise power through a police state based on a minor political party founded before the Civil War, the Falange (Phalanx). Around this nucleus he built the National Movement. No other parties were permitted to exist. All democratic institutions were abolished or reduced to nullity, and the cult of personality supplanted that of royalism.

World War II Years. The immediate aftermath of Franco's victory saw Spain sunk in economic ruin and desperate POVERTY that left large segments of the population near starvation. While El Caudillo busied himself arranging for the construction of a massive memorial to the war (The Valley of the Fallen) and assembling the loyalist prisoners necessary to construct the monument to their own defeat, he was confronted by the outbreak of a world war in September 1939. Barely able to sustain his own country amid domestic problems, he was plagued by demands from Germany and Italy to repay their recent military assistance to him. At the same time, France and Britain (and later the United States) denounced him as an international pariah. The Caudillo's adroit maneuvers to bring Spain back into some semblance of internal sustainability were matched by his skill in dealing with the Fascist regimes, whose demands ranged from a free passage across the country for German troops to attack Gibraltar to the repayment of a blood debt by Spanish troops being shipped to fight alongside the Axis forces.

Franco welcomed Hitler to a conference at his border with occupied France in 1940 but baffled the Fuehrer with a long string of reasons why Spaniards could not welcome their friends into Spanish territory at that moment. He fended off further demands for payment of debts until Germany had launched its invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1941. Ultimately Franco supplied a division of Spanish "volunteers" to fight on the Russian Front along with several squadrons of warplanes, but he withdrew all of these units after the Eastern Campaign turned against Hitler.

Cold War and New Directions. For all his maneuvers, Franco nevertheless reached the end of World War II in an even worse position: on the losing side. Only the almost immediate start of the Cold War saved him from permanent contempt and isolation. Counting on time to heal old resentments and Spaniards working abroad and sending remittances to support their families (and their county), the Caudillo concentrated on winning over American politicians who were prepared to welcome any ally, no matter how unsavory, in their global confrontation with Communism. By 1952 Spain had negotiated a treaty to lease several naval and air bases to the United States. The outcast nation, which had been excluded from membership in the UNITED NATIONS and was not invited to join the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), now became a de facto collaborator in the defense of the West against Communism. Franco thus emerged with a degree of legitimacy in the role that he had claimed for himself by force of revolution when he declared war on his own leftist countrymen in 1936. The early 1960s presented El Caudillo with new opportunities for enhancing his national and international prestige. At home, he began, very slowly and cautiously, an experiment in liberalization. These positive gestures affected both economic and political policies and led some to hope that there was indeed light at the end of a tunnel of dictatorship. Advisers who permitted themselves to be regarded as moderates hinted that a democratic MONARCHY might be created in the not too distant future. Touristic aspirations exchanged the scowling face of FASCISM for a smile of welcome. At last, shepherded by their American patrons into the United Nations, Spaniards began to feel, once again, a sense of being members of the international community.

Final Years. As Franco entered the final decade of a regime that could end only with his own demise, he created a complex of laws that designated a legitimate heir to Alfonso XIII as his own personal choice for successor. With this gesture, the man who had ruled for decades with all the pomp and pretense of a king finally decreed that Juan Carlos (1938–), the grandson of his old master, Alfonso XIII, would be his heir. At the same time that he assured conservatives, both civilian and military, that their values would still be protected, he raised the hope of reformers that he had now accepted the principle of evolution, guaranteeing that all would come out right at the end. Astute Spanish observers doubted this "soft landing," after an era of dictatorship, could be achieved. Those abroad who posed as expert analysts of Spain prophesied that Communism would surge up as soon as Franco was gone and precipitate a catastrophic battle with the forces of tradition.

Franco, Francisco (1892–1975). Spanish political and military leader.

Franco and the Church. Many predicted that the outcome of El Caudillo's departure would be decided by the role of the Catholic Church. Their calculations were, however, belied by a review of the period since Franco had first raised the flag of rebellion in 1936. His relationship to the Church had been ambivalent, and her response to him had been inconsistent. What could a careful examination of Franco's policies and the VATI-CAN's reply to his claims tell the world about the ultimate outcome of Spain's Francoist experience?

Prior to the uprising in July 1936, the natural ANTICLERICALISM of most Republican supporters had been held in check by the republic's desire to maintain order, just as the Church had sought to achieve a modus vivendi with the government. The uprising unleashed a torrent of proletarian rage and ideological resentment against the clergy and confirmed the opinion of most conservatives that Catholicism was the only secure protector of everything that Spain held most dear. Hundreds of priests and at least a dozen bishops fell victim to leftist fury while surviving prelates fulminated against the infamy of the Loyalists. Franco was hailed as the Church's protector almost from the beginning of the military insurrection. His forces were excused for their most ruthless actions, and he loudly proclaimed his solidarity with the Spanish hierarchy. After his victory in 1939, he was heaped with unreserved praise by prelates who placed in his hand the relics of Spain's greatest historical achievements, such as the banner carried in triumphant battle against medieval Moors and the sword borne by Don Juan de Austria (1547–1578), conqueror of the Turks at the victory of Lepanto in the sixteenth century. Republican refugees assured their friends abroad that Franco was the embodiment of Catholic fanaticism and invoked the "black legend" that had built up around Spanish extremism over the centuries. Journalists spoke freely about the Spanish Inquisition as if that long-extinct institution were ready to inflict a reign of sectarian terror upon Franco's enemies. Facile generalizations linked the Vatican not only with the new Spanish regime but also with the Fascist dictatorships that were now about to launch a great war against Western DEMOCRACY.

The truth was more prosaic. The PAPACY and its leading supporters in Spain welcomed Franco's reinstatement of Catholic teaching in schools and Catholic doctrines on ABORTION, DIVORCE, and other matters that had been legalized by the republic, as well as a whole range of positions dear to conservatives throughout the Western world, even if they were neither Catholic nor Spanish. Franco was prepared to be accommodating on most of these questions. He was more pragmatic than doctrinaire. His prime concern was solidifying his power base and exalting his own status. He wanted to enjoy the power and deference granted to monarchs in the Age of ABSOLUTISM. Whenever a rivalry between the divine right of secular monarchy and the divine mandate claimed by the papacy arose, Franco proved just as assertive as any medieval king, clashing with ROME and those local prelates who seemed more loyal to the supreme pontiff than to the supreme leader in Madrid. This pattern of Church-state relations became more evident as World War II ended in 1945 and Franco spent the next decade trying to enhance his country's image and influence. Some of the very bishops who had sung his praises in 1939 now warned against his tendency to flatter international opinion and even to open Spain to the blandishments of American Protestantism. These critics were quickly marginalized by a dictatorship that wanted its hierarchy to be as submissive as its bureaucracy.

Franco's drive to conclude a treaty with the United States that would open Spanish bases to the NATO alliance in 1952 was also calculated to secure the respectability of United Nations membership (which came three years later). He was, at the same time, determined to achieve a concordat with the Vatican that would settle pending Church-state disputes. This, too, was attained in 1952. As with his goal of regularizing Spain's international political status, El Caudillo was determined to clear away the negative implications of the right to name Spanish bishops and to interfere with non-Catholic residents of Spain.

Franco found Pope JOHN XXIII and Pope PAUL VI troublesome when new tendencies in Church doctrine conflicted with what he considered the good order of Spanish society. Aided by fellow conservatives at home and abroad, he was generally able to restrict the pace of change. This became easier when his own advisers persuaded him that a degree of so-called liberalism was warranted in the ongoing management of Spain's affairs. In both CHURCH AND STATE issues, nevertheless, he retained an ultimate commitment to what he considered to be prudent programs. Moreover, no POPE or priest could persuade him to yield on his own prerogatives.

Much has been made of the influence of OPUS DEI. Founded in 1928 by the Spanish priest (later canonized) Josemaria ESCRIVÁ DE BALAGUER Y ALBÁS, it has been both praised and criticized. This organization, which has the character of a religious order with categories of laypeople as active and influential members, has come to be regarded by many in Spain and overseas as sinister. Ironically, it has been viewed with the sort of suspicion that conservative Catholics have long directed toward Freemasonry. Some, on the other hand, saw its "infiltration" during the Franco era into government ministries (as well as universities and businesses) as a positive development, facilitating a more open and progressive trend in Spain. Like most analyses of the Church's role in Spain, the facile characterization of Opus Dei as a secret power wielder ignored the fact that Franco would tolerate no encroachment on his total authority. He was ready to monitor initiatives from the Church with as much suspicious rigor as organizations in civil society.

For all the supposed trend toward progressivism and modernization during the last decade of Franco's life, he was still determined, at the end, to control a Spain that he had shaped in his own image and likeness. Thus, when he breathed his last in November 1975, he left the leading personalities of Church and state uncertain of what was going to become of them or their country. Some have said that it was the final joke of a man not usually given to humor. Having created modern Spain, he now demanded of those who had helped him or hindered him that they show what they could make of his legacy. Like all of the other institutions of twentieth-century Spain, the Church, despite its pretensions to universality, was obliged to work within what Franco had left to it. It would be well into the next century before the leaders of Spanish Catholicism could judge any more clearly than other institutional leaders what the future held for them.

FRASSINELLO, BENEDETTA CAMBIAGIO, ST.

Married foundress of the Congregation of the Benedictine Sisters of Providence (Suore Benedettine della Provvidenza); b. October 2, 1791, Langasco (near Genoa), Italy; d. March 21, 1858, Ronco Scrivia, Italy; beatified May 10, 1987; canonized May 19, 2002, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

Benedetta Cambiagio was the daughter of Giuseppe and Francesca Cambiagio, who moved to Pavia while Benedetta was still young. Following a mystical experience in 1811, Benedetta wanted to devote herself to prayer in a convent, but instead she complied with her family's wishes and married Giovanni Battista Frassinello on February 7, 1816. In 1818 the couple agreed to live in continence as "brother and sister." During that time, Benedetta cared for her younger sister Maria, who was suffering from intestinal cancer. Following Maria's death in 1825, the couple chose to enter religious life: Giovanni joined the Somaschi Fathers, while Benedetta took the habit of the URSULINES of Capriolo. However, illness forced Benedetta to leave the convent and return to Pavia, where she decided to help abandoned girls. By request of Bishop Luigi Tosi (1763–1845) of Pavia, Giovanni left his monastery to assist her in this task.

Although Benedetta was appointed "Promoter of Public Instruction" and the couple publicly vowed perfect CHASTITY, they suffered criticism for the unusual relationship. Moreover, Benedetta's work to educate young girls troubled those in power and even some religious leaders. In 1833, with her husband and five companions, Benedetta founded the educational Institute of Benedictine Sisters of Providence, which continues its work in Italy, Spain, and several African and South American countries. In 1838 the couple turned over their work to the bishop and retired to the village of Ronco Scrivia, where they opened a girls' school. Benedetta helped to guide the newly formed congregation of BENEDICTINES until her death in 1858.

Benedetta was beatified in Rome by Pope John Paul II on May 10, 1987. On the feast of PENTECOST in 2002, the pope raised Benedetta to the glory of the altars. During his HOMILY at the canonization Mass in Rome, the pope observed that the "precious inheritance" Benedetta left to her congregation was her commitment to the love of God. She had abandoned herself totally to doing the will of God in all things: "With boundless confidence in the Lord's goodness, she abandoned herself to his 'loving Providence,' deeply convinced, as she liked to repeat, that one must 'do everything for love of God and to please him.'"

FREINADEMETZ, JOSEPH, ST.

Priest and missionary; b. Oies, Val Badia, Italy, April 15, 1852; d. Taikia, China, January 28, 1908; beatified October 19, 1975, by Pope PAUL VI; canonized October 5, 2003, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

Joseph Freinademetz was the fourth of twelve children born to peasant farmers Giovanmattia and Anna Maria Freinademetz; they lived in a mountainous region then part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. An intelligent and devout child, Joseph attended local school before boarding at a German school in Bressanone. He graduated from college in 1872 and went on to study at the seminary at Bressanone. He was ordained on July 25, 1875.

Fr. Freinademetz was assigned to a parish in the town of St. Martin in Thurn. He was much appreciated in the community, but after two years, he decided to pursue his interest in missionary work. He contacted Fr. Arnold JANSSEN (canonized on October 5, 2003, by Pope John Paul II), who had founded the Divine Word Missionaries in 1875. Fr. Janssen arranged for Fr. Freinademetz to transfer to the mission house in Steyl, Netherlands, for training.

In 1879 Fr. Freinademetz and Fr. John Baptist Anzer (1851–1903) were sent to China, where they first settled in Hong Kong. In 1881 the young missionaries moved to a part of South Shantung that had been given to the mission order by the diocese and began their work. The priests built a chapel in Puoli, where most of the area's Catholics lived. A gifted linguist who spoke several languages, Fr. Freinademetz had learned the local dialect and took on most of the duties of traveling throughout the region, preaching and bonding with the people. Through hard work and his true respect and admiration for and identification with the Chinese, he earned their trust, and by 1888 had converted about one thousand people from many villages. Fr. Freinademetz understood the importance of building a community of catechists to assist in spreading the teachings of the Church, and he wrote a teachers' manual in Chinese to assist them. He and Fr. Anzer recruited local priests and missionaries and devoted themselves to the education and spiritual development of new clergy. They built a seminary in Puoli, later moved to Tsining, and a retreat house.

Fr. Freinademetz and his colleagues faced persecution due to political conditions in China and the widespread view that Christians were avatars of European imperialism. Oppression and violence increased during wars between China and France, and later China and Japan, during which two members of the Divine Word Missionaries were killed. The Boxer Rebellion (1900) saw a peak in violence; hundreds of missionaries were murdered, but Fr. Freinademetz, undeterred, continued his work. In later years, Fr. Freinademetz saw the pervasive westernization of China as the greatest threat to the future of his adopted people; he spoke against secularism and temporal opportunism.

Fr. Freinademetz was chosen to be diocesan administrator during several periods when Bishop Anzer, and later his successor, were away. Fr. Freinademetz served as rector of the order's seminary and visitator, a post to which he was appointed by Fr. Janssen; in the latter capacity, he visited every member of the order in 1896. From the order's retreat house in Taikia, he acted as provincial superior, responsible for the spiritual life of all missionaries in the province.

Fr. Freinademetz died after becoming ill while providing care and spiritual comfort to victims of a typhus outbreak. In canonizing him in 2003, Pope John Paul II observed that the new saint "made a gift of himself to the Chinese peoples of southern Shandong" and that he "imitated Jesus, who saved men and women by sharing their existence to the very end." In a visit to his birthplace in 2008, Pope BENEDICT XVI remarked that St. Joseph Freinademetz "shows us that faith does not mean alienation for any culture, for any people."

Feast: January 29.

FUSCO, ALFONSO MARIA, BL.

Priest, religious founder; b. Angri, Italy, March 23, 1839; d. Angri, February 6, 1910; beatified October 7, 2001, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

Alfonso Maria Fusco was the first of five children born to Aniello Fusco and Josephine Schiavone. It was through the intercession of St. ALFONSUS DE LIGUORI that they were able to conceive their first child after four years of marriage. Alfonso was educated by priests in his early years, and at the age of eleven, he entered the Seminary of Nocera dei Pagani. He was ordained in 1863. In 1869 he joined the Congregation of Nocerini Missionary Priests. In 1873 he became cantor in the collegiate church in Angri, and then in 1897 became canon. He was known among the clergy for his diligence and zeal. The laity sought after him for the Sacrament of Reconciliation, and he was well loved by needy youth.

While in the seminary, Fusco was called in a dream to found an orphanage and an institute of sisters. This dream was fulfilled some fifteen years later, though not without obstacles. In 1878 he established the Congregation of the Baptistine Sisters of the Nazarene (Sisters of St. John the Baptist) with four devoted women. The order and the school for young orphans grew quickly, but they were forced to rely on divine providence for their basic needs. Fr. Fusco also faced continuing trials from two senior clergymen, who tried to remove him from the institute. In 1889 he opened a second house for needy youths, and went on to open several more throughout Italy. On the morning of February 6, 1910, Fr. Fusco died in his bed surrounded by the Sisters of St. John the Baptist.

There are over seventy-five graces attributed to his INTERCESSION, but the miracle highlighted for his BEATIFICATION was the complete healing of a young Zambian boy, Gershom Chizuma, from cerebral malaria. The cause for his beatification was opened in 1929. On January 9, 1976, Fr. Fusco received the title of VENERABLE, and in 2001 he became a BLESSED in Rome along with Archbishop Ignatius MALOYAN, Émilie TAVERNIER GAMELIN, Nikolaus GROSS, Euthymia UFFING, Tommaso Maria FUSCO, and Eugenia PICCO. The HOMILY, delivered by Pope John Paul II, connected each of the new blesseds to the theme of Habakkuk 2:4 that the just shall live by faith. The section dedicated to Fr. Alfonso Fusco highlighted the great works of his life.

FUSCO, TOMMASO MARIA, BL.

Founder of the Daughters of Charity of the Most Precious Blood; b. Pagani, Italy, December 1, 1831; d. Pagani, February 24, 1891; beatified October 7, 2001, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

Tommaso Fusco was the seventh of eight children born to the pious family of the noblewoman Stella Giordano and her husband, Dr. Antonio Fusco. Baptized

Tommaso, he later added "Maria" to his name out of devotion to Our Lady. When both his parents died, Tommaso's uncle Giuseppe, a priest and schoolteacher, took over the youth's early education. In 1847 Tommaso entered the seminary of Nocera, as had several of his brothers before him. He was ordained in 1855. Shortly thereafter, he began teaching catechetical classes for boys at his home and holding "evening chapel." In 1857 he joined the Congregation of the Missionaries of Nocera and became an itinerant missionary in southern Italy. In 1860 he became chaplain and spiritual director of the Shrine of Our Lady of Carmel in Pagani.

Continuing to teach from his home, Fr. Fusco began in 1862 to train priests in the ministry of confession. In the same decade, he founded the (Priestly) Society of the Catholic Apostolate to consolidate unity among the priests in his diocese and to aid missions among the common people. He also published a periodical funded by contributions from local priests. The society received papal approval in 1874.

In 1867 Fr. Fusco drew up the rule of life for the Institute of the Handmaids of Charity of the Most Precious Blood, whose purpose was to serve orphans. Now known as the Daughters of Charity of the Most Precious Blood, the order was officially recognized in 1873. The next year, Fr. Fusco became parish priest for the church of San Felice e Corpo di Cristo in Pagani.

Toward the end of his life, Fr. Fusco patiently endured persecution at the hands of envious fellow priests. He died on February 24, 1891, of liver disease. The cause for his BEATIFICATION was initiated in 1955, and the diocesan proceedings began in 1957. The HOLY SEE declared him VENERABLE in April 2001, and in July 2001 it recognized his INTERCESSION in the miraculous healing in 1964 of Maria Battaglia in Sicily.

In October 2001 Fr. Fusco became a BLESSED in Rome along with Archbishop Ignatius MALOYAN, Émilie TAVERNIER GAMELAN, Nikolaus GROSS, Euthymia ÜFFING, Alfonso Maria FUSCO, and Eugenia PICCO. The HOMILY, delivered by Pope John Paul II, connected each of the new blesseds to the theme of Habakkuk 2:4 that the just shall live by faith. The section dedicated to Bl. Tommaso Fusco highlighted his gift of faith.

G

GALEN, CLEMENS AUGUST GRAF VON, BL.

Cardinal, bishop of Münster, Germany; b. March 16, 1878, Dinklage, Oldenburg, Germany; d. March 22, 1946, Münster; beatified by Pope Benedict XVI, October 9, 2005.

Clemens August Graf was the son of Count Ferdinand Heribert von Galen and Elizabeth, Countess of Spee. After being educated by the JESUITS in Feldkirch, he studied at the Catholic University in Freiburg, Germany; the Jesuit theological college in Innsbruck, Austria; and the diocesan seminary in Münster, Germany. He was ordained in 1904. Following parish work in Berlin, he became pastor of St. Lambert's, Münster (1929). Having denounced the godlessness of Germany after World War I in his book Die Pest des Laizismus und ihre Erscheinungsformen (1932), von Galen became an outspoken critic of Adolf Hitler's regime after his consecration as bishop of Münster (1933). His sermons attacked Nazi racial doctrines, totalitarian methods, and state confiscation of religious property. He was critical, too, of the Gestapo, the policy of euthanasia for insane and "unproductive" members of society, and the efforts to undermine youth. Von Galen displayed no concern for his personal safety, but Hitler, fearing that the support of Westphalia might be entirely lost, seems to have ordered that no restraints be placed on the "Lion of Münster." After WORLD WAR II, the bishop continued his denunciation of injustices under the occupation authorities. He was created cardinal on February 17, 1946, shortly before being stricken with a fatal attack of intestinal paralysis.

In recognition of his courageous opposition to the atrocities committed by the Nazi regime, von Galen was declared venerable by Pope JOHN PAUL II on December 20, 2003, and on October 9, 2005, he was beatified by Pope Benedict XVI. The VATICAN in 1995 affirmed a miracle attributed to von Galen's intervention, which involved a sixteen-year-old Indonesian boy suffering from a severe attack of appendicitis that would have been fatal. The boy's life was saved after his nurse invoked von Galen's intercession. At the Mass of beatification in the Vatican Basilica, the homily of Cardinal José Saraiva Martins laid great emphasis on von Galen's profound faith, which called him to follow his Christian duty by bravely and publicly denouncing the Nazi government in its disrespect for the sanctity and dignity of human life. In the midst of depraved and destructive social policies, van Galen's unshakable commitment to living the GOSPEL encouraged the German people to do the same. Regarding his own integrity and responsibility as bishop, von Galen stated: "The good Lord gave me a position that obliged me to call what was black, black, and what was white, white, as outlined in episcopal ordination." Von Galen forever serves the Church and the German people in his testament to the veracity and superiority of Christian moral doctrine, demonstrated through the examples of his personal life and his ecclesiastical authority, in denouncing any regime or social policy that disrespects human life, however powerful or threatening it may be.

GALLICAN LIBERTIES

In 1594, the French jurist Pierre PITHOU, a former Protestant, published The Liberties of the Gallican Church (Recueil des libertés de l'Église gallicane). Its eighty-three articles represented a critique of both papal power in France and the power of French bishops versus royal authority. The articles stand as a veritable code of Gallicanism.

The claims were further embodied in the book published in 1636 by the brothers Pierre (1582–1651) and Jacques Dupuy (1586–1656), titled The Rights and Liberties of the Gallican Church, with Their Proofs. Subsequently, in 1663, as King LOUIS XIV attempted to extend royal Gallicanism, the Sorbonne endorsed the principles of Gallicanism. In 1682, the French prelate Jacques-Bénigne BOSSUET drew up the Gallican Articles, which he presented in his Declaration of the French Clergy (Déclaration du clergé français) in an effort to clarify the theological justification for Pithou's theses. They were also published in an official statement that same year by the Assembly of the French Clergy, which had been convened by order of Louis XIV for that purpose. Their principles are reducible to four statements, known as the Four Gallican Articles. In summary, they are:

1. That St. Peter and his successors, the popes, and in fact the Church itself, have received from God power only over spiritual matters and matters concerning salvation and not over temporal affairs. As such, kings and sovereigns are not, by God's will, subject to any ecclesiastical authority in temporal matters. Moreover, they cannot be deposed by papal authority, nor can their subjects be dispensed from obedience or allegiance by the same.
2. That papal authority does not supersede the decrees of the Council of CONSTANCE (1414–1418), as stated especially in its fourth and fifth sessions, which were approved by the HOLY SEE and confirmed by the practice of the entire Church, including the Gallican.
3. That the exercise of papal authority must also be regulated in accordance with the canons of the Church and that the customs and constitutions practiced in the Kingdom of France by the Gallican Church must be respected, obeyed, and remain inviolate. Therefore, papal authority must be exercised with respect for local and national church usages.
4. That although popes have "the principal part in questions of faith" and their decrees apply to all Churches, papal judgments are not irreformable unless confirmed by the consent of the universal Church through general councils.

King Louis XIV ordered that the articles be taught in all French universities as classic expressions of French national Catholicism, or Gallicanism. Because the articles were unacceptable to ROME, however, various French bishoprics remained vacant for many years. Pope ALEXANDER VIII (1689–1691) proclaimed null and void the declarations of the Assembly of the French Clergy concerning papal authority but allowed the French Crown to retain the revenues from such bishoprics. Meanwhile, Louis XIV forbade the bishops whom he had nominated to seek their bulls in Rome. In 1693, however, in a compromise with Pope INNOCENT XII (1691–1700), Louis XIV stated that he would no longer insist on the French clergy's unconditional adherence to the articles. For his part, the pope promised to ratify the appointment of bishops made by the king and reaffirmed King Louis's right (known as the regalia) to collect revenues from French bishoprics throughout the kingdom. This compromise resulted in the rule of Gallicanism in the French Church until the FRENCH REVOLUTION of 1789. The Gallican Articles continued to be taught in France throughout the same period.

Gallicanism, the tradition in French Catholicism to resist complete papal authority over the universal Church, was a combination of various political positions and theological doctrines supporting the relative independence of the French Roman Catholic Church and the French government in their relations with the papacy. Four distinct, but closely related, forms of Gallicanism existed. Theological Gallicanism denied the absolute papal supremacy, arguing instead for the supremacy of ecumenical councils. Royal Gallicanism upheld the particular rights of the French monarch in the French Church and upheld the independence of the French crown from Rome in all temporal affairs. Ecclesiastical Gallicanism sought to retain for the French hierarchy a certain amount of administrative independence from Rome. Parliamentary Gallicanism, which developed later and represented a position taken by the French parlements, advocated the complete subordination of the French Church to the state and even advocated the government's intervention in matters of finance and discipline.

A number of these aspects of Gallicanism were in theory developed during the crisis of the Great WESTERN SCHISM (1378–1417), particularly the conciliar theories that asserted the supremacy of general councils over the popes. At that time, the University of Paris, under the aegis of Jean GERSON and Pierre d'Ailly (1350–1420), formulated the principles of theological Gallicanism to support and justify the withdrawal of obedience by France (1398, 1407) and the convocation of the Council of Constance (1414–1418). These theories were further developed at the Council of BASEL (1431–1449).

In 1438, King Charles VII of France (1402–1461) formalized these same views in the PRAGMATIC SANCTION of Bourges, which represented the effort of the French clergy to assert certain articles that had been put forth at the Council of Constance. Thus, conciliarism can be seen as an earlier form of Gallicanism.

But if such Gallican provisions disappeared from French laws, their principles continued to influence the schools of theology and parliamentary jurisprudence. They even emerged at the Council of TRENT (1545–1563), where French theologians, bishops, and delegates consistently upheld them, especially in terms of the question of whether episcopal jurisdiction comes directly from God or through the pope and whether or not the council must seek confirmation of its decrees from the supreme PONTIFF. Invoking the Liberties of the Gallican Church, a section of the French clergy and members of parlement opposed the publication of the decrees of that council. Finally, the crown published only those that seemed to be ordinances emanating from the royal authority.

Toward the end of the sixteenth century, as a reaction to Protestantism's denial of all papal authority, Gallican sentiment declined among the French clergy and to an extent in the parlements despite Pithou's publication of the Gallican Liberties. But the assassination of King HENRY IV (1610), which was exploited to move public opinion against ULTRAMONTANISM, precipitated a strong revival of GALLICANISM that steadily increased. During the reign of Louis XIV (1643–1715) it was also supported by the Jansenists and within the royal court.

During the eighteenth century, Gallicanism spread into other parts of Europe, notably the Low Countries and Germany, where it took the form of FEBRONIANISM and Josephism. However, the development of Gallicanism would eventually be curtailed by the French Revolution, which removed one of its cornerstones by overturning royal power. Initially, a large part of the French clergy, who generally supported Gallicanism, accepted the Revolution's CIVIL CONSTITUTION OF THE CLERGY (1790), but as the Revolution became more extreme and deposed the monarch, much of the clergy and the hierarchy moved closer to Rome.

With the CONCORDAT OF 1801, and especially its addendum, the Organic Articles, the French government made an effort to revive the Ancient Gallican Liberties, and even the obligation of teaching the articles of 1682, but ecclesiastical Gallicanism never fully revived. Finally in 1869, with the Vatican Council, particularly its proclamation of papal infallibility and its condemnation of most of the Gallican Articles, Gallicanism almost disappeared. It survives only in the teachings of the Old Catholic Church.

GALVÃO, ANTHONY OF SAINT ANNE, ST.

Franciscan priest, founder, first Brazilian native elected to sainthood; b. 1739, Guaratinguetá, São Paulo, Brazil; d. December 23, 1822, São Paulo; beatified October 25, 1998, by Pope JOHN PAUL II; canonized May 11, 2007, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

Antonio Galvão's socially prominent, devout father encouraged his son's religious vocation by sending him to study (1752–1756) at the Jesuit seminary of Belém. Eventually, Antonio entered the novitiate of the Alcantarine Franciscans at Macacu near Rio de Janeiro (1760), professed his solemn vows (1761), and was ordained a priest (1762). Upon completing his studies in 1768, he was appointed porter at St. Francis Friary in São Paulo and engaged in priestly ministry.

While serving as chaplain to the Recollects of St. Teresa (1769–1770), Fr. Galvão met the mystic nun Helena Maria Espírito Santo. With her, in 1774, he founded the convent of Our Lady of the Conception of the Divine Providence, a women's religious community that initially required no vows. Following Helena's death in 1775, Galvão continued to nurture the community—the Recolhimento de Nossa Senhora da Luz (Recollects of Our Lady of Light)—by writing its rule and ensuring the completion of its convent and church (dedicated in 1802). The community was incorporated into the Order of the Immaculate Conception in 1929.

In addition to this work, Galvão served as novice master in Macacu (1781), guardian of St. Francis Friary in São Paulo (1798, 1801), definitor (1802), visitator general, and chapter president (1808). He founded St. Clara Friary in Sorocaba in 1811. Above all, he responded to his religious vocation by caring for the poor, sick, afflicted, and enslaved. In his declining years, Galvão lived at the Recolhimento da Luz, where his mortal remains are enshrined in its church. On March 8, 1997, he was declared VENERABLE.

Pope John Paul II beatified Galvão on October 25, 1998. The pope called Galvão "a fervent worshiper of the Eucharist, a teacher and defender of Christian charity, a prudent counselor for the spiritual life, and a defender of the poor." Many miracles have been attributed to Galvão, whom Brazilians continue to seek at the monastery where he is buried. Two cures in particular advanced Galvão's cause for canonization, including that of an infertile woman with a malformed uterus, who, through Galvão's INTERCESSION, was able to carry her child to term.

More than a million people attended the canonization in São Paulo on May 11, 2007. During the Mass, Pope Benedict XVI remarked that, as with Christ, the poor and the sick journeyed to Fr. Galvão because of his burning charity. The pope further noted that many had sought out Galvão as a confessor because of his zeal, wisdom, and prudence.

Fr. Galvão stands out as a distinctly Marian saint. He defended Mary's title of "Immaculate" during his life, though he did not live to see the dogmatic definition offered by Pope PIUS XII in 1854. Galvão also stands out in a unique way among the saints through his devotion of Marian consecration—a gift he had made of himself "irrevocably" from his youth and one he encouraged for his spiritual daughters. In the canonization Mass, Pope Benedict directed believers to the saint's love for Our Lady, saying that Galvão had left a "fine example" for true Marian devotion:

> Mary, Mother of God and our Mother, stands particularly close to us at this moment. Frei Galvão prophetically affirmed the truth of the Immaculate Conception. She, the Tota Pulchra, the Virgin Most Pure, who conceived in her womb the Redeemer of mankind and was preserved from all stain of original sin, wishes to be the definitive seal of our encounter with God our Savior. There is no fruit of grace in the history of salvation that does not have as its necessary instrument the mediation of Our Lady....There is a phrase included in the formula of his consecration which sounds remarkably contemporary to us, who live in an age so full of hedonism: "Take away my life before I offend your blessed Son, my Lord!" They are strong words, the words of an impassioned soul, words that should be part of the normal life of every Christian.

GARCÍA ZAVALA, MARÍA GUADALUPE, BL.

Baptized Anastasia, Superior General of the religious congregation Handmaids of St. Margaret Mary and the Poor, Guadalajara, Jalisco, Mexico; b. April 27, 1878, Zapopan, Jalisco, Mexico; d. June 24, 1963, Guadalajara, Mexico; beatified by Pope John Paul II, April 25, 2004.

María Guadalupe García Zavala showed unusual compassion for the poor and sick, even as a young girl. The daughter of Fortino García, who ran a religious goods shop, and Refugio Zavala de García, she was one of eight children, two of whom died as infants. María was taught at home by her aunt, who was a nun.

The young María often visited the Basilica of Our Lady of Zapopan, beside her father's shop. She joined the St. Vincent de Paul Society and cared for the sick to demonstrate her love for God. She was engaged to be married but broke off the engagement at twenty-three, saying JESUS was calling her to serve him by helping the poor and the sick.

Her spiritual director, Father Cipriano Iñiguez, asked María to help him found a religious congregation to help the poor who needed hospitalization. They established the Handmaids of St. Margaret Mary (Alacoque) and the Poor on October 13, 1901.

María became a nurse at the hospital, where she gave special care to the elderly and helped feed and clothe the poor of the community, showing motherly compassion. She taught the other sisters by example to be sincerely and joyfully "poor with the poor." Father Cipriano Iñiguez died in 1931, and Mother María was assigned director of the Conference of St. Margaret Mary; she was named Superior General one month later.

When the Catholic Church was persecuted in Mexico (1911–1936), Mother María, fondly known as Mother Lupita, provided sanctuary for the priests and the archbishop. When times were hard, she and the other sisters begged for offerings to meet their patients' needs.

Eleven foundations were established in Mexico during her lifetime. As of 2009, the congregation had twenty-two, in Mexico, Peru, Iceland, Greece, and Italy.

Mother María died at eighty-five, after a two-year illness. The VATICAN later recognized a miracle of healing after a Chicago truck driver with severe pancreatitis prayed for Mother Lupita's intercession. She was beatified by Pope JOHN PAUL II on Easter Sunday in 2004. The pope said during the homily, "Mother 'Lupita' ... lived the motto which she left to her daughters: Charity to the point of sacrifice and perseverance until death."

GARIBALDI, GIUSEPPE

Italian military and nationalist leader; b. Nice, France, July 4, 1807; d. Caprera Island, near Sardinia, June 2, 1882.

Giuseppe Garibaldi's reputation as the most popular political figure in the history of modern Italy rests on solid ground. His modest social origins, easy manner, and physical appearance contributed to his image as a man of the people who lacked pretensions and fought selflessly for the causes he embraced. His native town of Nice was part of Napoleonic France at the time of his birth, but from an early age he identified with the Italian culture of the city. At the age of sixteen he set out to pursue his father's trade as a seaman, journeyed in the Mediterranean, worked his way up the chain of command, and served as a lieutenant in the navy of the Kingdom of Sardinia. His political awakening is ascribed to the influence of Henri de SAINT-SIMON, whose ideas reached him on his voyages by contact with followers of the French social theorist. He joined Giuseppe MAZZINI's Young Italy, took part in the unsuccessful conspiracy of 1834, and escaped abroad under sentence of death. From 1835 to 1848 he made a name for himself fighting in South America, most notably for the cause of Uruguayan independence. In these early ventures the qualities of leadership, physical courage, and resourcefulness in dangerous situations emerged—the same qualities that would make him the preeminent figure in the struggle for Italian independence.

In 1848 Garibaldi offered his military services to Pope PIUS IX, whose early liberal reforms endeared him temporarily to Italian patriots. Receiving no reply from the pope, he sailed for Italy nonetheless, offering his services to King Charles Albert of Piedmont-Sardinia, who was at war with Austria. Rebuffed, he obtained a command in Lombardy, where insurgents were also fighting the Austrians. When the Austrians prevailed, he fought for the Roman Republic of 1849. His gallant actions in Lombardy and ROME burnished his reputation as a courageous fighter for the cause of liberty and earned him more years in exile. He returned to Italy in 1854, settling on the island of Caprera, which became his place of refuge. In 1859 he was given a command in the Sardinian army and once again fought well against the Austrians. The next year he led the legendary expedition of "The Thousand" to Sicily, which resulted in the political unification of most of the Italian peninsula in 1861, minus Rome and Venice. He fought against the Austrians in 1866, when Italy gained Venice, and in 1862 and 1867 he led volunteers in two unsuccessful attempts to take Rome, which was finally seized by the Italian regular army in September 1870. Garibaldi's republican sentiments did not prevent him from cooperating with monarchists for the sake of national unity.

Garibaldi held on to a few fundamental principles that appealed because of their simplicity. He regarded the cause of Italian independence as part of the larger struggle by all oppressed nationalities to gain respect and dignity. He proclaimed himself a democrat, championed universal suffrage, and even spoke against war; but he argued that the people must be trained to fight for their liberty, and that in times of emergency power should be entrusted to a temporary dictator. He was not fundamentally antireligious, but anticlerical sentiments eventually dominated his mind. He was married in the Church to his first wife, the Brazilian Anita Riveiro da Silva (1821–1849). He professed belief in a Newtonian God that was regulator of the natural order, and in the TRANSMIGRATION OF SOULS. The ANTICLERICALISM of his later years was motivated largely by papal opposition to Italian unification and by concern that a religious education would undermine the people's sense of PATRIOTISM and readiness to fight for their own liberty. His name has served as a rallying cry to patriotic Italians of virtually all political persuasions.

GIACCARDO, TIMOTEO, BL.

Baptized Giuseppe Domenico Vicenzo Antonio (Joseph Dominic Vincent Anthony) Giaccardo; publisher, Pauline priest, founder of the Pious Disciples of the Divine Master; b. June 13 1896, Narzole (diocese of Alba), Cuneo, Italy; d. January 24 1948, at Rome; beatified October 22, 1989 by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

His parents were peasant farmers who began instilling in their son a strong spirit of prayer from infancy. Giaccardo met Bl. James ALBERIONE (beatified on April 27, 2003 by Pope John Paul II), founder of the Society of St. Paul, while serving Mass at St. Bernard's Church in Narzole in 1908. Giaccardo entered the diocesan seminary in Alba (1917), but he received his bishop's permission to join the Paulines, despite the bishop's initial caution about the new society. Giaccardo was ordained in 1919 as the first priest of the new order, taking the name Timothy upon his profession in 1920.

Giaccardo's ministry consisted of writing, editing, and distributing religious material. In addition, he helped in the formation of younger members of the order as a teacher of theology and served as vocation director. In 1926, he was entrusted with founding the society's first house in Rome. There he edited the weekly The Voice of Rome and managed the pressroom. He was recalled to Alba to direct the motherhouse, but sent back to Rome in 1946 as provincial superior of the Society of St. Paul and vicar general of the congregation.

Recognizing the importance of prayer to support the active ministries of the Pauline Family, he established the nucleus of the contemplative branch, the Sister Disciples of the Divine Master. When the Holy See opposed the division of the Daughters of St. Paul, Giaccardo was given the delicate task of persuading Vatican authorities to approve the community, which happened in 1948.

Although Giaccardo was Alberione's chosen successor, he died shortly after the approbation of the new contemplative order. His body was laid to rest in the lower crypt of the Basilica of Mary, Queen of Apostles, next to the house he founded.

During the beatification Mass, John Paul II declared: "Timothy Giaccardo, the first disciple of Father Alberione, interpreted fidelity to his own priestly vocation as proclaiming the Gospel through the press, thereby having an even broader and deeper effect on his brothers and sisters. Thus he proposed to spread the Gospel and the Church's teaching through the modern means of social communication, which he saw as the principal and typical apostolate of the modern world." He is the patron saint of publishers.

GINARD MARTÍ, MARÍA DE LOS ÁNGELES, BL.

Baptized Angela, known in religion as Mary of the Angels, professed religious sister, Congregation of the Zealous Sisters of Eucharistic Adoration, martyr; b. April 3, 1894, Llucmajor, Majorca, Balearic Islands, Spain; d. August 26, 1936, shot and killed by a firing squad in Dehesa de la Villa, Madrid, Spain; beatified by Pope Benedict XVI, October 29, 2005.

The third of nine children born to Margherita Martí Canals and Sebastiano Ginard Garcia, Angela Ginard Martí made her first Holy Communion on April 14, 1905, at which time she felt called to religious life. After the family moved to Palma de Majorca, Angela and her two older sisters helped support the family. Young Angela regularly went to Mass, recited the Holy Rosary, and prayed for others.

Angela sought her parents' permission to enter the convent when she was twenty years old, but they asked her to wait, because they still needed her at home. They consented when she was twenty-seven, and she entered the Congregation of the Zealous Sisters of Eucharistic Adoration on November 26, 1921.

Upon her first vows, she became known as Sister Mary of the Angels. She received an assignment in Madrid, then in Barcelona, and then again in Madrid, where she was appointed superior of the convent.

When the Spanish Civil War broke out in 1936, the Catholic Church was persecuted by the Republican militia. Desperate to stop the killing and destruction, Sr. Mary of the Angels offered her life as a martyr, if it were God's will. When she and the sisters had to flee the convent on July 20, 1936, she told them, "All they can do to us is to kill us, nothing more."

She lived in hiding with a family until August 25, when she was betrayed by a porter. Militiamen came to arrest her and the landlord's sister. Sr. Mary saved the other woman's life by telling the soldiers, "I am the only nun here." The troops forced her to walk to Dehesa de la Villa, where a firing squad shot and killed her at sunset on August 26. Her remains were found in a common grave.

On April 19, 2004, Pope JOHN PAUL II approved the decree of martyrdom for her beatification. She was proclaimed blessed by Pope BENEDICT XVI's representative, Cardinal José Saraiva Martins, on October 29, 2005. The pope venerated her relics and said that through community service and long adoration of the Holy Sacrament, Sr. Mary prepared herself "to give her life as a supreme expression of love for Christ."

GIUSSANI, LUIGI

Italian priest and teacher, founder of lay group COMMUNION AND LIBERATION; b. Desio, Italy, October 15 1922; d. Milan, February 22, 2005.

Luigi Giussani entered the minor seminary of St. Peter Martyr in 1933, and in 1937 he entered the major seminary of Venegono in Milan. After being ordained a priest in 1945, he taught dogmatic and oriental theology at the seminary for the next twelve years. At that point, a casual encounter with some young people on a train made him realize how foreign the Faith had become to a people that, historically, were strongly Catholic. Following this realization, he decided to abandon what looked to be a successful academic career in order to dedicate himself to the education of young people in the beauty of the Incarnation, the reasonableness of faith, and the fullness of humanity disclosed in Christ.

In 1954, Giussani began to teach religion at Milan's Berchet Classical High School, where, with some of his students, he began a movement called Gioventù Studentesca (Student Youth, or GS), which originally emerged from within Azione Cattolica (CATHOLIC ACTION). Giussani's educative work structured Christian life according to the dimensions of culture, charity, mission, liturgy, and poverty. He taught that Christ is the meaning of all things. This teaching took on a variety of forms, including a critical and public engagement with the most varied issues and a weekly meeting—first called "radius" and later "school of community." This meeting is a focused, personal confrontation with Christian existence as it is expressed both in magisterial documents and in Giussani's own texts. Every Sunday, thousands of GS members went to a rural area south of Milan to share the lives of the poor children, and thus learn the meaning of charity. Giussani gave spiritual exercises twice a year, and he taught the prayer of the liturgy of the hours and the Church's musical tradition in order to present the life and meaning of Christian LITURGY and PRAYER. Starting in 1962, the missionary impulse of the movement moved many to leave Italy for other countries.

Gioventù Studentesca soon became a self-standing reality that, after Giussani began to teach theology at Milan's Catholic University in 1964, took the name Comunione e Liberazione (Communion and Liberation, or CL). This name, coined by university students in 1968, was meant to indicate that man's true liberation is not the fruit of any ideology or man's efforts, as Europeans generally believed in the 1960s. Instead, according to this view, only Christian communion can really make man free. Although CL members are of all ages, its mature expression is the Fraternity of Communion and Liberation, founded by Giussani and pontifically recognized as a lay association by John Paul II in 1982.

Monsignor Giussani witnessed the beauty of consecrated life and motivated hundreds to follow Christ in that path. In 1964 he founded Memores Domini, which was recognized as a pontifical lay association in 1988 and is composed of CL members who follow a vocation of total dedication to God while living in the world. Some CL members founded the Sisters of Charity of the Assumption in 1993, while others became diocesan priests or joined the Cistercian Trappists of Vitorchiano. A few of them, under the close guidance of Giussani, founded the Benedictine monastery of Cascinazza in Milan. His charism also educates men for the ordained priesthood with the Fraternity of the Missionaries of St. Charles Borromeo, a society of apostolic life of pontifical right founded by Monsignor Massimo Camisasca, one of Giussani's first students. Giussani died in Milan on February 22, 2005. Cardinal Joseph RATZINGER presided at his funeral, which was attended by over 40,000 people. The movement of Communion and Liberation is now present in over 70 countries.

Giussani's written work (over fifty volumes) grew out of the concrete experience of Christian faith lived in dialogue with those he was educating. His most widespread and cited work is a trilogy that (1) sets out a path toward the truth of man (2) revealed by Christ, whose divine life and saving presence (3) can be met and lived in the Church. The trilogy is thus comprised of The Religious Sense (1997), At the Origin of the Christian Claim (1998), and Why the Church? (2001). Giussani's work aims at overcoming a misconception of Christianity as a theory or a helpful ethical system. His work teaches that Christianity is rather the event of the encounter with Jesus Christ, God's presence in history. The event of Christ reveals man to himself and educates him to recognize and adhere freely to what man most truly desires: to live out his constitutive relation with the paternal Mystery, whose existence is revealed within man's experience but whose face remains unknown until Christ discloses it. The baptized person is therefore a new creature, one whose ontology constitutes the root of that truly moral existence determined by the ever-new following of Christ, in the Church and at the Church's service, for the sake of the world.

GOJDIČ, PAVOL PETER, BL.

Baptized Peter, known in religion as Pavol; priest, bishop; b. July 17, 1888, Ruské Pekľany, near Prešov, Slovakia; d. July 17, 1960, Leopoldov, Slovakia; beatified by Pope JOHN PAUL II, November 4, 2001.

Peter Gojdič was born in Ruské Pekľany, near Prešov, Slovakia, to Greek Catholic priest Štefan Gojdihc and Anna Gerberyová. He was ordained a priest on August 27, 1911.

He joined the Order of St. Basil the Great at Černicia Hora, and he adopted the name Pavol when he took the habit on January 27, 1923. In 1926 he became administrator of the eparchy of Prešov. He said his goal was "to be a father to orphans, a support for the poor and consoler to the afflicted."

On March 25, 1927, he was consecrated bishop at the Church of Harpaš. He erected new parishes and built an orphanage and a school, becoming known as "a man with a heart of gold" for his kindness and charity.

Pope PIUS XI appointed him residential bishop of Prešov on August 8, 1940. He was given jurisdiction over the Greek Catholics in all of Czechoslovakia on January 15, 1946.

When the Communist Party came to power in 1948, Bishop Gojdič resisted its attempts to make the Greek Catholic Church submit to Russian Orthodoxy. On April 28, 1950, the state outlawed the Church, and Bishop Gojdič was arrested. The so-called high-treason bishops—Gojdič, Vojtaššák, and Buzalka—were tried in January 1951. They were given life sentences in prison, fined 200,000 crowns, and deprived of their civil rights.

Over the next ten years, Bishop Gojdič was transferred from prison to prison. Although he was offered release many times, on the condition that he renounce his faith and serve in the Russian Orthodox Church, he always refused.

On his seventieth birthday, Pope PIUS XII sent him a telegram in prison, assuring him his heroism would not be forgotten. Due to illness and mistreatment, Bishop Gojdič died in the prison hospital. As he had wished, it was on July 17, 1960, his seventy-second birthday. He was buried in the prison cemetery at Leopoldov as Prisoner 681.

His remains were moved in 1968 to Prešov, where, in 1990, after the dissolution of the Soviet Union, they were transferred to the Cathedral of St. John the Baptist. Bishop Gojdič was decorated posthumously with the Order of T.G. Masaryk, second class, and with the Cross of Pribina, first class.

In his homily, Pope John Paul II said the bishop "profoundly shared the saving mission proclaimed by Christ" (Luke 19:10) and, because of his suffering, "now [shared] the same crown of glory."

GONZÁLEZ, EMMANUEL GÓMEZ, BL.

Also known as Manuel, priest, missionary, MARTYR; b. São José de Ribarteme, Spain, May 29, 1877; d. shot to death at Feijão Miúdo, Três Passos, Brazil, May 21, 1924; beatified October 21, 2007, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

Emmanuel Gómez González was the son of José and Josefina González of the diocese of Tuy, Spain. Ordained a priest on May 24, 1902, Fr. González served in his home diocese for two years and then asked to serve in the neighboring diocese of Braga, Portugal, where he was a parish priest from 1905 to 1913. When persecutions of the Church began in 1913, he was permitted to sail to Brazil on an evangelizing mission. He began serving as a parish priest in Saudade, in the diocese of Santa Maria, on January 23, 1914.

Fr. González was transferred in December 1915 to a large parish in the same diocese, at Nonoai. In eight years of evangelism there, he significantly increased the number of faithful, ministering especially to the native Indians. He also served as administrator for the remote vacant parish of Palmeiras das Missões.

Fr. González founded a school at Nonoai; one of the students, (Bl.) Adílio DARONCH, was an altar server who often accompanied him on his pastoral visits. After HOLY WEEK in 1924, the two set out on an assigned mission to visit a colony of European planters in Três Passos. The priest and Adílio, then fifteen, had no idea that they would be endangering their lives by passing through territory controlled by revolutionaries.

After stopping in Palmeiras to administer the sacraments, the two continued on to a military colony, where Father González celebrated Mass for the last time, on May 20. In spite of a warning by local Christians not to enter the Três Passos forest, the zealous priest pressed on. The next day, when he and Adílio stopped to ask for directions, some soldiers offered their aid. The soldiers led them to a remote forest plateau near Feijão Miúdo, where revolutionaries bound them to two trees and shot them to death. Their remains were removed to the parish church at Nonoai in 1964, and a monument was built at the site where they were martyred.

Fr. González and Adílio were beatified in a 2007 ceremony by Pope Benedict XVI's representative, Cardinal José Saraiva Martins, in Frederico Westphalen, Brazil. In his HOMILY, Cardinal Martins observed that Father González and Adílio "defied the dangers and disregarded the threats, offering their holocaust together, so that their final communion might shine aloft like a light in human darkness held hostage by hatred and violence."

GOOD SHEPHERD, CATECHESIS OF THE

Founded in ROME in 1954 by two Italian laywomen, Sofia Cavalletti and Gianna Gobbi, the Catechesis of the Good Shepherd (CGS) is a unique approach to the religious formation of children between the ages of three and twelve. Cavalletti, a scripture scholar, and Gobbi, a Montessori teacher, sought to engage the whole child through movement, sensorial materials, work, and song—through a kind of lived experience—and thus nurture the child's deep love for and communion with God. By carefully observing children for many years, they concluded that young people are fully capable of joyous peace and quiet contemplation—virtues we tend to think are only possible for adults. Using the child's joy as a criterion, they found that children responded to the deepest, most essential message of the Christian announcement, particularly to the message of a tender God who cherishes his people and calls them by name: the GOOD SHEPHERD.

Cavalletti and Gobbi worked with children and made their observations in a so-called atrium. Originally conceived by Maria MONTESSORI, this room is specially designed and equipped with the aim of preparing children for fuller participation in the liturgical and sacramental life of the Church. The name for the room comes from the architecture of early Christian churches, where the atrium was a front courtyard in which catechumens were instructed. The materials in the atrium are movable, adapted to children's sizes, interests, and abilities, and they invite children to look, touch, and move around. The atrium and its specially prepared materials are at the heart of the Catechesis of the Good Shepherd.

The atrium is not viewed as a classroom, lest religious faith be considered as one among many academic subjects; rather, it is an environment where the child, through contemplatively working with the materials and hearing the word of God, can absorb and ponder the INCARNATION, the KINGDOM OF GOD, the Paschal Mystery, baptism, and the Eucharist. The catechist in the atrium setting is not viewed as a teacher but as a colistener, whose main task is to nurture discretely the child's relationship with God and to provide an environment where the child may enter into conversation with Christ, the teacher.

Using Maria Montessori's principles, Cavalletti and Gobbi developed materials to introduce children to Scripture and the liturgy. Refinements of the catechesis over the years lead the two women to keep only those materials that evoked joy, reflection, and contemplation in children. They found these appealed to children of all cultures and economic conditions and included such items as a miniature altar, a tabernacle, vestments, a baptismal font, and small dioramas with movable figures, depicting both the parables and historical events in the life of Christ.

CGS is divided into what the Association for the Catechesis of the Good Shepherd calls three "pathways to God's Kingdom." The first, Level I, is for the three- to six-year-old child, who, they have observed, "is particularly capable of receiving and enjoying … the announcement of God's love, in the person of the Good Shepherd, who died and is risen." The other Scripture passages that evoked that the same joyous response were the parables describing the Kingdom of Heaven, namely, those concerning the mustard seed, the yeast, the seed of grain, the pearl of great price, and the hidden treasure.

Level II is for ages six to nine. It cultivates children's developing moral capacity, their desire to respond actively to the gift of God's love. The primary image for this level is Christ the True Vine, to whom we are attached as branches. The moral life is seen as an organic development of the relationship with the person of Christ, a fruit of "remaining" in the Vine. The Sacrament of Reconciliation, introduced at this age, is described as removing blocks or obstacles that prevent the vivifying sap from flowing into the branch. The child is also invited to ponder the moral life through parables such as those concerning the wise and foolish virgins, the good Samaritan, the insistent friend, and the Prodigal son. These parables assist older children's need to grow in their relationship with God, as well as with the wider community of friends, family, and the Church. The bible is introduced at this level. Salvation history is introduced in the large framework of three significant times: CREATION, redemption, and PAROUSIA. Children are simultaneously invited to consider what their own roles and tasks might be to bring about the kingdom of God.

In Level III, nine- to twelve-year-old children continue to grow in knowledge of the Sacraments and Salvation history. The material focuses on a typological reading (i.e., a prefigurative reading of the Old Testament, which interprets events, persons, and things as a foreshadowing of events, persons, and things in the New Testament) of biblical narratives that are also liturgically significant: Creation, the Fall, the Flood, the Covenant, and the Exodus. The Jewish understanding of "memorial" is used to deepen appreciation for the Eucharist. Children look more intently at the history of God's collaboration with the human race as the unfolding of His plan. In the great book of this history, children understand that they, too, have been given a blank page on which to write.

The appeal of CGS is very broad. According to the National Association, it is present in thirty-five countries and interest continues to spread worldwide. With its focus on the emotional needs of the child, the essential Christian message, and attentive listening to Scripture, CGS has attracted Christians of many denominations. Atriums have been established not only in Catholic homes, schools, and parishes, but also in a variety of other Christian settings. As of August 2009, there were 957 registered atriums in the United States; while predominantly Catholic, about a third are run by Episcopalians. Some atriums supplement the CGS materials with explicitly Catholic devotions such as the ROSARY and celebrations of the saints. Many parishes have found a way to introduce into their customary religious education classrooms the sense of home, work, and conversation that is characteristic of the CGS.

GORAZDOWSKI, ZYGMUNT, ST.

Priest and founder of the Bonus Priest Association and the Congregation of the Sisters of St. Joseph, Lviv, Ukraine; b. November 1, 1845, Sanok, Poland; d. January 1, 1920, Lviv; beatified June 26, 2001, by Pope JOHN PAUL II; canonized October 23, 2005, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

The second of seven children, Zygmunt was part of a pious Roman Catholic family. Though difficult living conditions and a series of lung ailments challenged him from an early age, Zygmunt completed his primary education in Przemysl, Poland, and decided to pursue further studies in the law at Lviv University. Recognizing a vocation for the priesthood, he left the university in his second year and entered the Latin Catholic Seminary in Lviv. Despite the need for medical treatment, and after a long period of convalescence, Gorazdowski was ordained in the LATIN RITE on July 25, 1871.

In his first six years as a priest, Fr. Gorazdowski served the communities of five towns in the Lviv region. In 1877 he was appointed to St. Nicholas parish in Lviv, where he worked for the next forty years. Fr. Gorazdowski distinguished himself by his great works of charity. During a serious cholera outbreak in Wojnilow, the young priest demonstrated selfless dedication by caring for the afflicted and attending to the final rites and burial of those who succumbed, despite the extreme danger of contagion.

Fr. Gorazdowski's personal commitment to working for the sick, poor, and powerless is undisputed. Moreover, seeing great needs, the dedicated priest acted to establish a variety of organizations to address the issues and bring together like-minded people to better serve the community. Among others, he established a soup kitchen where the poor members of the community and students without financial means could have meals on a daily basis. He founded an institution that offered people who had been reduced to begging an opportunity to do voluntary work. Fr. Gorazdowski's program offered the participants an avenue by which they could regain self-respect and find their way back into the regular workforce. He also established a home for single mothers and abandoned children, a hospice for the dying and chronically ill, and a teacher's college.

Fr. Gorazdowski promoted catechetical studies and wrote and published several editions of a popular catechism. Based on his regard for German priest Alban Stolz, he wrote Educational Norms and Principles, for use by teachers and parents. He established St. Joseph's Polish-German Catholic School, providing lessons in both languages.

To assist in the preparation and development of priests, Fr. Gorazdowski started the Bonus Pastor Association. In 1884 he established the Congregation of the Sisters of St. Joseph, a group that would work in the many organizations that he had created or otherwise supported. The order continues its charitable and educational mission in several countries in Europe and Africa.

On December 20, 1999, Pope John Paul II venerated Fr. Gorazdowski on the basis of his heroic virtues. On April 24, 2001, the Congregation for the Causes of Saints promulgated a decree regarding a miracle attributed to Fr. Gorazdowski. The miracle was approved by Pope John Paul II, who beatified the priest on June 26, 2001. In extolling Fr. Gorazdowski's unflagging devotion to those in physical and spiritual need, the pope said, "His apostolic activity was bolstered by a commitment to charity which knew no pause," and he noted that his "creativity and dedication in this area were almost boundless." In canonizing him, Pope Benedict XVI spoke of Fr. Gorazdowski's devotion to the Holy Eucharist and said that "[l]iving Christ's offering urged him toward the sick, the poor and the needy."

GREELEY, ANDREW M.

Priest, author, scholar, and educator; b. February 5, 1928, in Oak Park, Illinois, a Chicago suburb; son of Andrew T. Greeley, a broker, and Grace McNichols Greeley.

Although only a high school graduate, Andrew M. Greeley's father was an avid reader who respected knowledge. Both he and his wife were devout Catholics, but neither wore their piety on their sleeves. For them, being a Catholic was as natural as breathing, as Andrew junior noted in his autobiography Confessions of a Parish Priest (1986). Greeley and his two sisters attended the local parish school, staffed by nuns. When one of them asked the boys in her class how many wanted to be priests, young Greeley was one of those who raised his hand—and he later fulfilled this pledge.

In 1942 Greeley enrolled in a Quigley Preparatory Seminary, where the course of study was arduous. Yet he was usually able to complete his homework during the hour-long trolley ride home. Students were expected to hear mass every day before classes. Greeley said he enjoyed this time at Quigley, calling it five good years. His positive evaluation flowed partly from the fact that he discovered the works of John Henry NEWMAN, Joseph CONRAD, Charles Dickens (1812–1870), William SHAKESPEARE, and G.K. (Gilbert Keith) CHESTERTON while at Quigley. In 1947 Greeley graduated from Quigley and entered the major seminary of St. Mary of the Lake (Mundelein), which he described as a comfortable ivory tower that did not facilitate maturity. Instruction was from textbooks, but Greeley educated himself by studying contemporary French theologians. From his reading he came to view the Church as people, not hierarchy, and deemed many religious principles as alterable and undetermined rather than fixed or rigid.

In 1950, Greeley received a bachelor's degree, in 1952 his Bachelor of Sacred Theology, and two years later his License of Sacred Theology. That same year he was ordained a priest. Between 1954 and 1963, Greeley served as assistant pastor of Christ the King Church in Chicago, widely attended by American Irish parishioners who had achieved upper-middle-class status. His experience among what he called "spoiled rich kids" stirred his interest in young people and led to his first book, Strangers in the House: Catholic Youth in America (1961), in which he attempted to explain the apathy among teenagers, as well as the absence of a worthwhile tradition of youthful radicalism.

The book reflected the training Greeley was receiving as a graduate student in sociology at the University of Chicago, where in 1961 he received his master's degree and the following year his doctorate, which opened doors for him. Beginning in 1963 he lectured in sociology at the University of Chicago, where in 1991 he was appointed a professor of social science. Between 1962 and 1968 he was senior study director of the National Opinion Research Center (NORC) and, beginning in 1973, he served as director of the study of American Pluralism.

Greeley has written more than 100 nonfiction books. Some examine the American Catholic Church from a sociologist's perspective. In The Hesitant Pilgrim: American Catholicism after the Council (1966), Greeley attempted to envision the future direction of the Church and to understand its response to the Second Vatican Council. His book From Backwater to Mainstream: A Profile of Catholic Higher Education (1970) concluded, among other things, that Catholic schools were not vital to the durability of American Catholicism. Greeley has also explored the American priesthood in Uncertain Trumpet: The Priest in Modern America (1968), which delved into the problems confronting the Church in America, including the looming instability within the priesthood.

Subsequently, Greeley and his staff at NORC finished a thorough two-year appraisal of the priesthood in the United States, authorized by United States Council of Catholic Bishops. The results, based on replies to questionnaires from roughly 6,000 priests, distressed many bishops, who doubted the study's conclusions. They deplored the fact that Greeley focused on the divide between the hierarchy and parish priests. At the same time, they questioned his finding that roughly one-third of the priests surveyed never said the BREVIARY, and one-fifth had given communion to non-Catholics. They could not be pleased by his report that a majority of priests rejected the Church's teachings on birth control, DIVORCE, and necessity of celibacy, whereas roughly 70 percent of the priests did not consider MASTURBATION a MORTAL SIN. In turn, Greeley reportedly retorted that he found the present leadership of the American Church wanting.

Aside from his work for the Church, Greeley has written extensively about ethnicity. In Why Can't They Be Like Us? America's White Ethnic Groups (1971), he championed the pluralism and the heterogeneity that ethnic loyalties have contributed to American life. Noting the positive function of ethnicity in America, he maintained that an ethnic cultural tradition offered a source of identification in a complex society. A year later, Greeley turned his attention to the American Irish in That Most Distressful Nation: The Taming of the American Irish (1972). Here Greeley argued that the Irish had arrived in America too early to catch the wave of ethnic pride that was generated among later groups, such as the Italians and the Poles. Indeed, much to Greeley's chagrin, the American Irish, in their effort to fit into the American society, had virtually become white Anglo-Saxon Protestants (WASPs).

Finally, Greeley has written more than fifty novels, which have reached a wide audience, and has also contributed regularly to diocesan newspapers. Moreover, he is associate editor of the Review of Religious Research and is a member of the editorial board of Sociological Analysis and the Catholic Sociological Society. His fictional works have brought him a considerable fortune, most of which he has given away. Among other charities, he has contributed more than $1 million to religious causes and pledged another million to Chicago's inner-city schools.

No stranger to controversy, Greeley, when asked how he would like to be remembered, said "nothing but a loud-mouth Irish priest"—a name some have apparently hurled at him—"would not be a bad epitaph."

GREGORIAN CALENDAR

On February 24, 1582, Pope GREGORY XIII (1572–1585) published the bull Inter gravissimas, which formally introduced a new calendar that would begin in October of that year. The new system took its name from the pope, and the Gregorian calendar was eventually adopted by most of the world's nations. Like its predecessor, the Julian calendar (of which the Gregorian is but a variant), the Gregorian calendar is a solar calendar consisting of twelve months and 365 days, except for leap years, which have 366 (and which, with important exceptions, are divisible by four).

Calls for reform of the calendar had already surfaced in the fifteenth century, and they were repeated at the council of TRENT in 1563. Astronomical advances at the time confirmed what common sense suggested: The passage of the seasons had diverged from the days of the calendar year. In particular, the vernal (spring) equinox had drifted to later in the year. By 1545 it differed from the Julian calendar by ten days, so spring and summer were getting later and later, which also affected the calculation of the date of Easter Sunday, which was calculated on the basis of the vernal equinox. Thus, both practical and liturgical usage demanded an adjustment in the calendar.

The Julian calendar was named after Julius Caesar, who established a calendar reform in the year 46 with the help of the famous Alexandrian astronomer Sosigenes. Like other Roman calendars before it, the Julian calendar had weeks of seven days and years of twelve months. It did, however, initiate new rules for the calculation of leap years. In antiquity the year was calculated at 365.24219 days, and the Julian calendar called for one hundred leap years in each cycle of four hundred years, which by the fifteenth century had proved to be too many. The Gregorian calendar revised this usage.

The Italian astronomer Aloysius Lilius (c. 1510–1576) had, by the mid-sixteenth century, calculated that the solar year was in fact 365.2425 days long. The reform of the calendar, then, essentially consisted of two steps. First, Inter gravissimas declared that October 4, 1582, would be followed by October 15, 1582. Thus were ten days simply stricken from the calendar. Second, a new method of calculating leap years was introduced. Whereas the Julian calendar simply made each year in four a leap year, the Gregorian calendar said that leap years must be divisible by both one hundred and four hundred, a rule which particularly applied to the last year of a calendar century. Thus, the years 1600 and 2000 were leap years, but 1700, 1800, and 1900 were not, nor will 2100 be.

The Gregorian calendar, in spite of its mathematical and astronomic rigor, was not immediately adopted everywhere, since a reform of the calendar was, for many people, not merely a matter of the tables of planetary motion and arithmetical calculations. Professors at the University of Paris feared that the Gregorian calendar amounted to an admission that the ancient church had erroneously calculated the date of Easter. In addition, the adoption of the calendar served as a historical barometer for the Catholic COUNTER REFORMATION. The calendar was, of course, adopted immediately in Spain, France, Portugal, Poland, and most of Italy—the Catholic regions of Europe with friendly ties to the papacy. The Catholic states of the German Empire adopted the calendar in 1583, over the initial reservations of Emperor Rudolf II, who feared that the adoption of a papal initiative would intensify religious divisions in the empire.

Protestants, however, greeted the news of the new calendar with derision. Many claimed that the pope aimed to confuse Christians about the date of the end of the world, so that they would be unready for the Second Coming, although there was no agreement about precisely what that year would be. The first Protestant country to accept the Gregorian was Denmark. Lutheran Sweden first attempted to establish the calendar gradually, beginning in 1700. That country then decided to eliminate the eleven leap years between 1700 and 1740. This hesitation caused many inconveniences, however, and King Charles XII abandoned the project altogether in 1713 and reverted to the Julian. Sweden remained on the Julian calendar until the Gregorian was wholly adopted in 1753, making it the last country of Latin Christendom to do so. Great Britain, where antagonism to a calendar named after a hated pope ran deep, converted to the Gregorian calendar only in 1752, by which time eleven, rather than ten, calendar days had to be removed: The Calendar Act of that year declared that September 2 was to be immediately followed by September 14.

The calendar caused tensions even within the Catholic communion. Eastern-rite Catholics, such as the Melkites of Syria, believed that the new calendar cast doubts on the church's indefectibility, and some reacted against it by returning to the Orthodox communion. Indeed, well into the twentieth century, some Eastern Catholic churches continued to follow the Julian calendar, even though the Roman Catholic Church used the Gregorian. Even in the early twenty-first century, many Eastern Catholics still use the Julian calendar, although many Eastern Catholics in North America follow the Gregorian.

The Gregorian calendar was also anathema to the Orthodox Church, although many Orthodox outside of Greece and Russia adopted the so-called revised Julian calendar in 1923, when a synod held in CONSTANTINOPLE proclaimed that the following October 1 would instead become October 14. The synod also provided for a new calculation of leap years, thus adopting the Gregorian approach without having to credit the PAPACY. Greece adopted the revised Julian for purposes of government and commerce, but not for worship. Many Orthodox Christians still follow the Julian calendar, believing it to be more ancient, apostolic, and patristic.

The scientific and mathematical superiority of the Gregorian calendar also meant that most countries could adopt it for secular purposes. For instance, Shinto Japan did so in 1873, and the militantly atheist Soviet Union adopted it in 1918.

GREGORIAN UNIVERSITY

Established by St. IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA, the founder of the Jesuit order, on February 18, 1551, the Pontifical Gregorian University, ROME's oldest Catholic college, has long been considered the world's preeminent Catholic university for Theology and many other disciplines. The Jesuit university has been called the training ground for saints and popes by virtue of its long list of famous Catholic priest alumni.

Early History. Staffed mostly by JESUITS, the university was first called the School of Grammar, Humanity, and Christian Doctrine, but it was better known as the Jesuit Collegio Romano, or Roman College. It was opened on February 22, 1551, on Capitoline Hill in Rome at the site now called the Piazza Collegio Romano. Ignatius initially founded the college to pilot curricula, teaching methods, and university texts for the benefit of other colleges. He envisioned the college as a "university of all nations," intending that its increasingly multinational graduates would have an international impact ("Gregorian University Foundation: Who We Are"). Its original lodgings consisted of a simple house rented with money donated by St. Francis BORGIA, the third general of the Jesuit order and Pope ALEXANDER VI's great-grandson. By year's end, the school was forced to relocate to a larger house owned by the Frangipani family to accommodate the growing number of students. Enrollment was 250, and Hebrew was added to Greek and Latin in the curricular offerings.

In 1552, Pope JULIUS III granted the college permission to bestow academic degrees, and the departments of Philosophy and Theology, for which the university is most famed, were added, along with several professorships in various disciplines. To accommodate increasing enrollment, which had reached 800, the college again relocated in 1557 to the Salviati house. After three years there, the college secured several houses donated for its use. By 1563, when enrollment totaled more than 1,000 students, course offerings in Aristotelian moral philosophy and Arabic were expanded. A motu propio by Pope PAUL IV on January 17, 1556, granted permission to the Roman College to bestow doctorates in philosophy and theology. Because St. THOMAS AQUINAS's pedagogy in Summa theologiae had made a favorable impression on Ignatius, Aquinas's ideas were emphasized in the college's early years.

Soon renowned as Latin Christendom's finest university, in 1584 the Collegio Romano was rechristened the Papal Gregorian University in tribute to Pope GREGORY XIII, afterward considered the university's founder and protector, having saved the college from its long-standing financial difficulties. In 1582 Gregory XIII had provided new quarters and an endowment for the college when it was forced to move yet again because of rising enrollment. Whether engaged in the study of the humanities, science, or church teaching, students from around the world flocked to the Gregorian University, which possessed many of the RENAISSANCE's most highly regarded faculty.

By 1591, the university served 2,100 students. Graduates included the missionaries Matteo RICCI and Roberto di NOBILI.

The university achieved its greatest reknown in philosophy and theology, subjects in which it continues to excel. Philosophy professor Francisco SUÁREZ, who developed the basis for his later work Disputationes metaphysicae while teaching at the Roman College in the early 1580s, and theology professors such as Gabriel VÁZQUEZ and the Jesuit Robert BELLARMINE influenced thinkers for more than a century. The university also gained fame in the areas of mathematics, physics, and ASTRONOMY during the seventeenth century, when it was at the forefront of scientific inquiry. One of its graduates and professors, Father Christopher CLAVIUS, the famous Jesuit astronomer and mathematician, created the GREGORIAN CALENDAR, which was proclaimed by Gregory XIII in 1582; introduced the decimal point in 1593; and exerted a strong influence on Galileo GALILEI. Scientific successors to Clavius at the Roman College included the astronomers Christopher Grienberger (1564–1636) and Christoph Scheiner (1573–1650) and the scientist and mathematician Father Athanasius KIRCHER.

The Gregorian University has been governed by the Jesuit order except during the time of the order's suppression from 1773 to 1814 and for ten years afterward when the college was entrusted to secular clergy for the purpose of hosting a secular Roman seminary. Pope CLEMENT IV had succumbed to anticlerical pressure from the Bourbon kingdoms of France, Naples, and Spain to disband the ultramontanist Jesuits. By the time Pope LEO XII restored Gregorian University to the Jesuits in 1824, at which time the secular Roman seminary was relocated, the university had lost some of its earlier academic vitality.

History from Vatican I to Vatican II. In 1873 the university's lodgings and the library's collection of 45,000 books and manuscripts were confiscated by the Kingdom of Italy. The university relocated its classes to the Borromeo Palace and was awarded the title Pontifical University of the Roman College by Pope PIUS IX. However, after the state's seizure of the buildings of the Collegio Romano, most people came to refer to the institution only as Gregorian University, and enrollment fell for several years. In 1876, a chair of Canon Law was added to the college's offerings by order of Pius IX.

In response to Aeterni Patris, the August 4, 1879, encyclical by Pope LEO XIII calling for a restoration of Thomistic philosophy in Catholic seminaries, Gregorian University was the first Catholic seminary to replace some of its professors to reflect the pope's theological wishes. The Jesuit Louis BILLOT, a devoted Thomist who taught philosophy at the university from 1885 to 1910 and had Eugenio Pacelli (later Pope PIUS XII) as one of his students, was such a staunch opponent of MODERNISM that his ideas, and even his words, can be detected in some of the passages of Pope PIUS X's 1907 encyclical against modernism, Pascendi dominici gregis. The change in professors revived the earlier international character of the university's faculty, which had been largely lost during the 1773–1814 suppression of the Jesuits and the ten years of absence which followed. (The Jesuits were revived by 1814, but their presence at the Gregorian was not reestablished until 1824.) By the end of the nineteenth century, the university had diminished its commitment to scientific study.

Enrollment pressures at the university combined with the City of Rome's wish to expand into the land occupied by the Borromeo Palace prompted Pope BENEDICT XV to buy new land for the university around the Piazza della Pilotta in 1919. Construction on the university's new buildings began in 1927 during the pontificate of Pope PIUS XI. On November 4, 1930, the Gregorian was moved to its present location at the end of the Quirinale hill in downtown Rome, only steps from the Trevi Fountain. While outside of Vatican City, the university's new buildings remained part of VATICAN territory because of the right of extraterritoriality granted by the 1929 Lateran Treaty with the Benito MUSSOLINI government. The massive main building, constructed of travertine stone, accommodated twenty-two auditoriums, some of which had 1,800 seats, housing for 100 professors, and many scientific laboratories that were considered modern in the 1930s. The six-story library, built in 1928, houses six reading rooms and offers space for 800,000 books, with emphasis on theology, philosophy, culture, and literature.

Since Pius XI's September 30, 1928, motu propio Quod maxime, Gregorian University has been connected with the Pontifical Biblical Institute, founded by St. Pius X in 1909, and the Pontifical Oriental Institute for Eastern Christian Studies, founded by Benedict XV in 1917 as part of a university consortium. In 1972 the Gregorian University Foundation was initiated in the United States for the purpose of funding scholarships and underwriting the expenses of the Pontifical Gregorian University Consortium. By the decision of Pius XI on June 21, 1932, the chancellor for all three of the separate colleges within the consortium is the CARDINAL prefect of the Congregation for Catholic Education. The vice grand chancellor for the three colleges is the superior general of the Society of Jesus. The rector of Gregorian University has since 1932 been chosen personally by the pope to administer the university for a three-year term.

Among the many notable professors at the Gregorian University in the early twentieth century were the moral theologian Arthur VERMEERSCH, who wrote a popular summation of moral theology; canon law professor Felix Cappello (1879–1962), whose advice helped pave the way for Vatican II; and theology professor Giuseppe Filograssi, who consulted with Pope Pius XII on the definition of the Assumption.

In 1952, an Italian Jesuit priest named Alighiero Tondi, vice director of the Institute of Higher Religious Culture connected to the university, sparked media attention when he became active in the Communist Party, claiming that Catholicism was antiquated. He subsequently married a Communist politician and in 1965 returned to the Church. In 1954, Carlo Boyer, Prefect General of Studies and dean of the theological faculty of the Pontifical Gregorian University, announced to an ecumenical group of religious leaders that there could be no unity among Christians outside of the Catholic Church, an opinion believed to be held by the Vatican at the time and reported in the Vatican daily newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano.

History since Vatican II. This view contrasted sharply with that later voiced by other Gregorian University notables during the spirit of ecumenism ushered in by the pontificate of Pope JOHN XXIII. The Jesuit Augustin Cardinal BEA, former professor of scripture at the university, was selected by John XXIII to seek an improved Catholic dialogue with believers in the Orthodox and Protestant faiths. The renowned Jesuit theologian John Courtney MURRAY was the leading contributor to Dignitatis humanae, the 1965 Vatican II document on religious liberty. The university's appointment of Hervé Carrier (1921–), a Canadian Jesuit professor of the sociology of religion, as its new rector in 1966 was seen as representative of the efforts of Catholic universities worldwide to revise their curricula to accommodate the goals of the ecumenical council.

In the year following the close of the Second Vatican Council, the university served 2,900 students, taught by 117 Jesuits, six secular priests, and three lay professors. Reflecting the Church's newfound spirit of ecumenism, in 1969 Gregorian University hosted a symposium on ATHEISM cosponsored by the Vatican Secretariat for Non-Christians (now the PONTIFICAL COUNCIL FOR INTERRELIGIOUS DIALOGUE) and the University of California at Berkeley.

In the late 1960s the Greg, as it is affectionately called, became coeducational, with laywomen and nuns in regular clothing taking classes. In recent years, the university's students have hailed from over 150 nations and territories and included believers in the Protestant, Orthodox, and Muslim faiths. About three-quarters of the roughly 3,800 students at Gregorian University are priests, seminarians, and nuns. About 20 percent of students are laymen and laywomen. Students reside off campus. Of the 380 professors, Jesuits continue to teach the majority of classes.

Since the 1970s the curriculum has remained conservative under pressure from the Vatican, despite the identification of many of its students and professors with what they might call more progressive DOCTRINE. One example of the discouragement of DISSENT against traditional interpretations of Church doctrine and administrative structure was the Jesuit order's 1973 suspension of José María Díez-Alegría (1911–), a professor of sociology at the Gregorian University who expressed sympathy for parts of Karl MARX's philosophy and criticized Vatican wealth. In 1998, the Congregation for the DOCTRINE OF THE FAITH conducted an investigation of Jacques DUPUIS, S.J., a CHRISTOLOGY professor at the university from 1984 to 1998 and editor of Gregorianum, the university's theological journal.

The university currently possesses six faculties—in theology, philosophy, canon law, Church history, MISSIOLOGY (evangelization), and social sciences—and four university postgraduate institutes (Psychology, Spirituality, Religious Sciences, and Religion and Culture, which includes the Cardinal Bea Center for Judaic Studies). In recent years, the Philosophy and Theology departments have increased their emphasis on the study of the connection between their disciplines and that of science and nature. The university also offers studies in communications, Marxism, and numerous other fields.

More than a third of the students study theology, seeking one of three degrees, a professional baccalaureate (S.T.B.), equivalent to a Master of Divinity degree in the United States; a two-year graduate licentiate in a specialized area (S.T.L.); or a doctorate (S.T.D.).

In 2005 the university opened a new congress hall named after alumnus Matteo Ricci, the sixteenth-century Jesuit missionary to China. In 2006 the university initiated an interdisciplinary program of study for lay students and canceled Latin courses, which lacked a sufficient number of paying students. Gregorian University has sponsored numerous conferences on interreligious dialogue. In May 2007 the university offered courses on the Vatican's international relations to Muslim diplomats. That same year, seminarians and priests from the Pontifical Gregorian University squared off against those from fifteen other pontifical institutions of higher learning in vying for the first Clericus Cup, a soccer championship for Catholic clergy in Rome.

Role and Impact. Conceived by St. Ignatius as a "university of all nations, for the defense and propagation of the faith and for the training of wise and qualified leaders of the Church and society," the Gregorian University has served as a major center of scholarship and a house of formation for many a future church leader, teacher, missionary, and Catholic university president ("Gregorian University Foundation: Who We Are"). Long considered primarily a training ground for priests, especially prospective church leaders, the Gregorian University opened its doors to an increasing number of laymen and for the first time, to women, after the reforms ensuing from Vatican II. Hundreds of nuns and laywomen now attend the Gregorian University annually.

The PAPACY has offered consistent and strong support for the university. During an address to the student body in 1979, Pope JOHN PAUL II complimented the Gregorian University for its centuries-long commitment to integrating theology into its varied curricula. In his November 3, 2006, visit to the university, Pope BENEDICT XVI praised the Gregorian University as an essential part of the ministry of the Jesuits.

Eight of the past eleven popes either taught or studied at the Gregorian University. Of the university's roughly 12,000 living alumni, over one-fifth of the current bishops and about one-third of the cardinals today have studied at the Gregorian University. Philosophical and theological tracts written by many of the university's professors have been read at seminaries throughout the world. Examples of the plethora of famous works published by university professors include: Francis A. Sullivan's (1922–) Magisterium, Jacques DUPUIS's The Christian Faith, and Vatican II: Assessment and Perspectives, Twenty-five Years After, a three-volume collaboration by sixty-eight professors from the Gregorian Consortium, edited by René Latourelle (1918–). The writings of other theological titans at the Greg, such as Zoltan Alszeghy (1915–1991), Charles Conroy (1943–), Dermot Cox (1939–), Robert Faricy (1926–), Josef FUCHS, John Navone (1930–), Gerald O'Collins (1931–), and Jared Wicks (1929–), have also been popular religious works.

Alumni. Its alumni include twenty saints, thirty-eight beatified individuals, sixteen popes, hundreds of cardinals, and thousands of bishops. Among the saints are Jesuit Cardinal Robert Bellarmine, a Doctor of the Church and the patron of Gregorian University; John OGILVIE, Scotland's only native-born saint; and Father Maximilian KOLBE, a martyr at AUSCHWITZ-BIRKENAU. Among the popes are Pius XI, Pius XII, PAUL VI, and JOHN PAUL I. Among the cardinals are Laurean Rugambwa (1912–1997) of Tanganyika, the Church's first black cardinal; William Cardinal Levada (1936–), Prefect of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith; and Edward Cardinal Egan (1932–), Archbishop of New York. Among the bishops who graduated was Oscar ROMERO, the martyred Archbishop of El Salvador. Other famous former students include: Don Luigi STURZO, founder of Italy's Partito Popular party, the predecessor to Italy's Christian Democrats; Monsignor Edward Joseph FLANAGAN, founder of BOYS TOWN in Nebraska; and longtime Notre Dame President Theodore Martin HESBURGH, C.S.C. The American theologians Avery Cardinal DULLES, Richard P. McBrien (1936–), and David Tracy (1939–) all studied at Gregorian University.

Pope Benedict XVI, while not a graduate, served as a visiting professor of DOGMATIC THEOLOGY at Gregorian University in 1972–1973. Among other visiting professors of note are Owen Chadwick (1916–) of Cambridge (1986), Jürgen Moltmann (1926–) of Tübingen (1987), and George Lindbeck (1923–) of Yale (1989).

Scholarly Publications. About 700 articles and books are published annually in a myriad of languages. Among the university's twenty-two major academic journals are Gregorianum, the university's theological journal; Periodica de re morali canonica liturgica, a well-respected journal read in seminaries around the world; Analecta Gregoriana; Archivum Historiae Pontificiae, a journal founded in 1963 to document the history of the papacy; and Miscellanea Historiae Pontificiae.

GUADALUPE, OUR LADY OF

Founded on an old tradition, this image and sanctuary is one of the most famous in all Latin America, and devotion to it has increased in modern times. According to tradition, on Dec. 9, 1531, St. Juan Diego CUAUHTLATOATZIN (canonized at the Basilica of Guadalupe by Pope John Paul II on July 31, 2002), a man more than 50 years old, saw the Virgin Mary at Tepeyac, a hill northwest of Mexico City. She instructed him to have the bishop build a church on the site. Three days later in a second appearance she told Juan Diego to pick flowers and take them to the bishop. When he presented them as instructed, roses fell out of his mantle and beneath them was the painted image of the Lady.

Documentary Basis. The oldest documentary evidence of this event comes from the interpreter. Since Juan Diego did not know Spanish and Bishop Zumárraga did not know the Indian language, Juan González served as interpreter. González was, at 18, a fortune seeker whom the bishop had sheltered, taught, and ordained, and who became a canon of the cathedral. After Zumárraga died, González gave up his canonry and devoted himself to the evangelization of the native peoples. At the same time he left his papers to Juan de Tovar, whose brief summary of them in Nahuatl was kept in the library of Tepozotlán because Tovar entered the Society of Jesus in 1572. The summary is preserved in the Biblioteca Nacional de México and is of importance as a document based on the evidence given by a witness to the meeting of Juan Diego and Bishop Zūmárraga. However, it is not a detailed account.

A better-known document is the Valeriano Relation, drawn up between 1560 and 1570. It was written by Valeriano and a group of Native Mexicans under the direction of Fray Bernardino de SAHAGÚN. First used by Miguel Sánchez, the document was published by Luis Lazo de la Vega in 1649. There are manuscript copies in several North American libraries, and in Paris a version prepared by Picardo in the 18th century. It has two parts: a direct account of the event, the nucleus of the tradition, and an account of the miracles worked in the sanctuary or through the invocation of the Virgin Mary in this manifestation. The first part, prepared by the students of Tlatelolco under Sahagún's direction, is arranged in a literary fashion, according to Nahuatl stylistics, but the facts coincide with those in the Tovar document. The account of the miracles, also written in Nahuatl, is much later and includes events of the 17th century. Thus it is most important for the study of the progress of the devotion and the cult in that century. Some have attributed this part of the Relation to Carlos de Alva Ixtlilxóchitl. There is little evidence for this, although the document is contemporary with the Texcocan historian.

Among the minor documents are at least 15 Anales de los Indios. These give communal testimony of the most notable happenings in the native world and include many references to the Tepeyac apparitions. While it has been stated that Bishop Zumárraga made special reports on this event, none is extant; and it is probable that none was ever written. Reports on such supposed supernatural events were not required until the Council of Trent.

The second archbishop of Mexico, Alonso de Montúfar, was a great promoter of the devotion to Our Lady of Guadalupe. In the Provincial Council of 1555, he, along with other bishops, formulated canons that indirectly approved the apparitions, for the order to abolish and prevent the worship of images and the propagation of traditions not well founded did not mention the Guadalupan image and devotion to it. Canon 72 ordered the examination of songs sung at native feasts and dances for taint of paganism; some testimony indicates that these included songs in honor of the apparition of Mary, but no authentically Guadalupan songs are extant. In 1666 a formal inquiry was made from February 18 to March 22 in order to give authority to the tradition. Information concerning the endurance of the tradition and the general belief in it was given by witnesses, some of them centenarians. References to early events are vague and rather weak. The investigation was not canonical or timely, since it was held 135 years after the event. Another was made in 1723, by order of Archbishop Lanziego y Eguilaz. These have no value except to bear witness to the permanence of the tradition. Of even less value are some of the inquiries that were held during the 19th century.

Cult and Its Extension. The first sanctuary was erected about 1533. It is the little hermitage that rests in the foundations of what was for many years a parish church. In 1556 Archbishop Montúfar began the erection of this second church. In 1695 the first stone of the new sanctuary was laid in the place it now occupies. The sanctuary was solemnly dedicated in 1709. With the additions made in 1893 and the following years, and again in the 1930s, this was the basilica of 1964. However, plans were then being made for a new church.

The image was carried to various parts of the world, particularly after the religious of the Society of Jesus were expelled from the Spanish dominions (1767). But the diffusion had started even earlier. In Italy and France the image and the tradition were already known. In 1564 Andrés DE URDANETA carried an image with him on the first formal expedition to the Philippine Islands. One was taken to Puerto Rico. Those who returned from the Indies spread the devotion in Spain. A well-known image is to be found in Trent and another, which made miraculous demonstrations in 1796, is now located in Rome, where it is enshrined in the church of S. Nicola in Carcere Tulliano.

In 1746 the knight BOTURINI BENADUCCI promoted the solemn and official coronation of the image. The coronation took place in 1895, with pontifical authority and the attendance of a great part of the episcopate of the Americas. This coronation was made later in various parts of the world: in Santa Fé, Argentina (1928), and later in Los Angeles, Calif., in several places in Europe, and even in Asia, where the image was placed in a Hindu temple.

In 1737 the Most Holy Mary of Guadalupe was chosen as the patroness of the city of Mexico. In the course of the year, other important cities of the country followed suit. In 1746 the patronage was accepted for all of New Spain, which then embraced the regions from Upper California to Guatemala and El Salvador. In 1754 BENEDICT XIV approved the patronage and granted a Mass and Office proper to the celebration of the feast on December 12. In 1757 the Virgin of Guadalupe was declared patroness of the citizens of Ciudad Ponce in Puerto Rico. In 1910 PIUS X declared the Virgin Patroness of Latin America, and in 1935 PIUS XI extended the patronage to the Philippines. PIUS XII, speaking in 1945 on the occasion of the 50th anniversary of the coronation, stated that the Virgin of Guadalupe was the "Queen of Mexico and Empress of the Americas" and that she had been painted "by brushes that were not of this world." JOHN XXIII assisted at a coronation in a church in Rome and gave the image special praise in his brief discourse. On January 22, 1999, Pope JOHN PAUL II declared Our Lady of Guadalupe the Patroness of the Americas. By a decree dated March 25, 1999, the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of Sacraments mandated the obligatory celebration of the Feast of Our Lady of Guadalupe on December 12 throughout the Americas.

GUÉRIN, MOTHER THEODORE, ST.

Founderess of the SISTERS OF PROVIDENCE OF ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS, Indiana; b. October 2, 1798, Etables-sur-Mer, Brittany, France; d. May 14, 1856, St. Mary-of-the-Woods, Indiana; beatified by Pope JOHN PAUL II, October 25, 1998; canonized by Pope BENEDICT XVI, October 15, 2006.

Christened Anne-Therese by her parents, Laurent, a lieutenant in Napoleon's navy, and Isabelle Guérin, she was one of four children, two of whom died tragically by fire in early childhood. The Guérin family suffered another terrible loss in 1813, when Laurent was murdered during his journey home from military service. Anne-Therese briefly attended a local primary school, but she was taught principally by her mother. Her education was supplemented when a young seminarian cousin came to live in the Guérin household. He provided instruction in theology, history, and philosophy. Though she had professed her desire to enter a religious community when she was only ten years old, Anne-Therese set aside her own wishes in order to care for her mother, who had fallen into a deep depression after the murder of her husband. From the tender age of sixteen until she was twenty-six, Anne-Therese not only cared for her ailing mother but was also the teacher and guardian of her younger sister, Marie Jeanne, her only surviving sibling. After a decade of selfless care for her mother and sister, Anne-Therese's dearest wish was realized when, after finally recognizing the depth of her daughter's desire to enter a religious order, Isabelle gave her daughter her blessing. Anne-Therese entered the Congregation of the Sisters of Providence at Ruille-sur-Loire, where she took the religious name Sr. St. Theodore. Having taken her final vows on September 8, 1825, Sr. St. Theodore embarked on a varied and successful career as an educator, teaching in Rennes for eight years before being transferred to Soulaines. It was during her time in Soulaines that the University de France awarded her a medal for excellent teaching methods.

In the summer of 1839, the new bishop of Vincennes, Indiana, Celestine de Halandiere, called for volunteers to travel to the United States to bring "the French religious spirit" to his new flock. Though initially uncertain that she was capable of such an undertaking, Sr. St. Theodore pledged herself to the endeavor. She and five other members of her order—Sr. Olympiade Boyer, Sr. St. Vincent Ferrer Gagé, Sr. Basilide Sénéschal, Sr. Mary Xavier Lerée, and Sr. Mary Liguori Tiercin—joined the ranks of indomitable Catholic pioneer religious and left France in July 1840. Their terrifying sea voyage to the United States took forty days, and though the sisters suffered terrifying storms, a hurricane, and unremitting seasickness, Sr. St. Theodore and her companions found joy in the beauty of God's creation. They spent their days in prayer, which deeply touched the other passengers on the ship, and in marveling in the beauty of the ocean. As Sr. St. Theodore wrote in her journal, "How grand, and what a religious pensiveness seizes the soul on beholding the ocean above and the ocean below—symbol of God's eternity!"

The remainder of their journey—taken alternately by steamboat and stagecoach—finally ended in October 1840, when they arrived at St. Mary-of-the-Woods, Indiana. They stepped from the stagecoach into a wilderness. The only sign of civilization was a small farmhouse across a ravine, which was owned by the Thralls family. The sisters, four American postulants, and the Thralls family lived together in the house for a month until, in November of that year, the diocese purchased the land and the house became the first convent for the Sisters of Providence of St. Mary-of-the-Woods. In July 1841, St. Mary's Academy for Young Ladies was established, an institution that became St. Mary-of-the-Woods College, the oldest Catholic liberal arts college for women in the United States. Over the next nine years, Mother Theodore also established parish schools throughout Indiana, in addition to two orphanages and another school in Illinois. Her accomplishments are all the more extraordinary given the poor health from which she suffered throughout her life and the rough conditions in which she spent her last sixteen years.

On May 14, 1856, after a lifetime of service, Mother Theodore Guérin died at St. Mary-of-the-Woods. She was buried in the sisters' cemetery, and her own words were used on her monument: "I sleep but my heart watches over this house which I have built."

The first miracle attributed to Mother Theodore occurred in 1908, when Sr. Mary Theodosia Mug prayed at Mother Theodore's tomb to be cured of breast cancer and an abdominal tumor. When she awoke the next day, Sr. Mary Theodosia was cured. The second miracle was performed in 2001, when Philip McCord, an employee of the Sisters of Providence, prayed to Mother Theodore to restore the sight in his right eye so he could be spared a risky corneal transplant. He had been declared legally blind, as his sight was rated 20-800 in one eye and 20-1000 in the other. When he returned to the doctor a few weeks later, he was informed that the dangerous swelling in his right eye had disappeared and he no longer needed an operation. A routine laser treatment was performed, and his sight was fully restored.

Pope Benedict XVI canonized Mother Theodore Guérin at the Vatican on October 15, 2006. In his sermon, the Holy Father stressed Mother Theodore's devotion to the words of Christ: "Go, sell everything you own, and give it to the poor … then come, follow Me." Praising her for responding "unreservedly to the call of the divine Teacher," Pope Benedict also emphasized her complete reliance throughout her life on the goodness of Divine Providence.

GUERRERO GONZÁLEZ, ANGELA DE LA CRUZ, ST.

Foundress of the Sisters of the Cross; b. Seville, Spain, January 30, 1846; d. Seville, March 2, 1932; beatified November 5, 1982; canonized May 4, 2003, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

Angela de la Cruz (Angela of the Cross) was baptized María de los Ángeles (Mary of the Angels) Guerrero González. She was one of fourteen children (eight of whom died before reaching adulthood) and was known in her family as Angelita. She had a special devotion to Our Lady of Good Health and prayed the ROSARY with her family from her youth.

The growing sanctity of this uneducated daughter of a simple family was recognized by Fr. Torres Padilla as Angela was working in a shoe factory in Seville. After she was initially rejected by the CARMELITES of Seville because of her poor health, she turned her attention to helping the sick during a cholera epidemic. She was admitted in 1868 to the Daughters of Charity, despite her health, but was forced to leave because of illness.

In November 1871, Fr. Torres suggested that she live as a religious in the secular world. Thereafter, she professed an annual private religious vow and recruited peasants as sisters in the Company of the Cross to serve the sick and needy in rural areas. When they were not serving the poor and the dying, the sisters dedicated themselves to contemplation and silence. The year following the founding of the congregation on August 2, 1875, the sisters heroically ministered to victims of an epidemic in Seville. Angela became known as the Mother of the Poor. Twenty-three more convents were established during her lifetime.

Angela was beatified in Seville by Pope John Paul II on November 5, 1982, for her service to the poorest of the poor, and for her spirituality in a life of poverty, detachment, and humility. She was canonized in Madrid on May 4, 2003, alongside four other Spanish saints, with whom, the pope observed, she shared "an unshakable adherence to the risen and crucified Christ," as well as a "decision to imitate him." During his HOMILY, the pope emphasized her simplicity, holiness, and "spirit of mortification." Through her Company of the Cross and its ministry, Angela, in her exceptional love for the poor, had an "enormous impact on the Church and society of Seville in her day."

GUEST HOUSE

Guest House, founded in 1956 by Austin Ripley, is a lay-governed apostolate that provides treatment services for Catholic clergy and religious suffering from alcoholism and other addictions. It provides treatment without regard to the ability of a diocese or religious congregation to pay for the services. Ripley, himself a recovering alcoholic, established the first Guest House in Lake Orion, Michigan, in the sixty-seven-room mansion previously owned by William Scripps, the publisher of the Detroit News. This location continues to serve as the organization's headquarters.

The assistance and intervention of Edward Cardinal Mooney, then the archbishop of Detroit, was necessary for Ripley's project to bear fruit. After Ripley experienced a frustrating start in Chippewa Falls, Wisconsin, Cardinal Mooney interceded with the Holy See, which pronounced Ripley's concept of a lay-run treatment center for priests a "holy and worthy enterprise." Cardinal Mooney then assisted Ripley in finding the funding necessary to open his center in the Archdiocese of Detroit. Ripley's treatment approach was to prepare priests to receive the benefits of the twelve-step program of Alcoholics Anonymous and to provide treatment in the Benedictine Rule of hospitality, under which each guest is received as Christ himself would be received (hence, the name "Guest House"). It was felt that the natural inclination of priests to be helpers to others impeded their ability to receive help themselves, thus necessitating specialized treatment to make recovery from alcoholism possible. Modern treatment research bears out the improved success of specialized treatment programs for persons with addictions.

Ripley's program became an immediate success, and there was soon a waiting list of up to two years. He resolutely maintained a maximum of twenty priests in his treatment center in order to prevent the sense of an institutionalized environment for the clergy in treatment. As a result, an additional facility was opened in Rochester, Minnesota, in 1969, and this greatly expanded the number of priests who could receive services. The world-renowned Mayo Clinic continues to provide medical services for the priests in treatment.

The number of priests admitted to Guest House began to decline in the 1980s, and it was forced to close its Lake Orion facility in 1992 and consolidate treatment in Minnesota. In 1994 the Lake Orion location was reopened for the treatment of women religious with alcoholism. It has since expanded to include services for women religious with addictions to eating, gambling, and spending.

More than 7,000 priests and religious have undergone treatment at Guest House since it opened. The facilities provide treatment that addresses the physical, mental, and spiritual aspects of the person with an addiction, and treatment generally lasts from three to six months, depending on the complexity of the issues. Outcome studies, which measure the results of treatment, have been done, beginning with a study by the Jesuit sociologist Father Joseph Fichter in 1974. That study demonstrated that 75 percent of those treated at Guest House maintained a lifetime of abstinence from alcohol.

Guest House added halfway-house services for clergy in 1999 in a lakefront home in Lake Orion, Michigan. Since the decline in number of priests in the 1970s and 1980s, Guest House reversed the lowering number of admissions in 1996 and reached a twenty-year high in persons treated in 2006.

Expanded educational services by Guest House in the twenty-first century marked efforts to prevent, as well as to treat, addictions among clergy and religious. A series of on-campus seminars for the leadership of women's religious communities called "Walking with the Wounded" began in 1997. Programs for seminarians offered at seminary locations provide instruction in the awareness of personal risk for addiction and the competencies necessary for effective ministry to addicted parishioners or students. A new subsidiary, Guest House Institute, was created in 2005 to provide the educational and research activities of Guest House.

Guest House continues to be governed by a lay-controlled board of trustees from across the United States, although clergy and religious representation is included on the board. The archbishop of Detroit appoints a bishop as Guest House's Episcopal Moderator, a role designed to facilitate ecclesiastical problem solving. Guest House's former residents serve in all fifty states and in dozens of other countries.

GUÍZAR VALENCIA, RAFAEL, ST.

Bishop of Veracruz, Mexico; b. Cotija, Michoacán, Mexico, April 27, 1878; d. Mexico City, June 6, 1938; beatified January 29, 1995, by Pope JOHN PAUL II; canonized October 15, 2006, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

Rafael Valencia Guízar was one of eleven children born to the wealthy hacendados Prudencio Guízar González and Natividad Valencia Vargas. His brother Antonio became bishop of Chihuahua. Rafael's studies were begun at home and completed in the seminary of his native Diocese of Zamora; he was ordained on June 1, 1901.

Missionary Work. From the first, the future bishop felt an overwhelming impulse to work as a home missionary. He had physical and spiritual gifts that fitted him for this work, and eight days after his ordination he began his first missionary journey, which lasted almost two years. While assigned to the diocesan seminary as spiritual director, Guízar continued his mission work by founding with his own funds a school for poor girls. On June 3, 1903, he also founded the Congregation of Missionaries of Our Lady of Hope with a special college in Jacona, Michoacán, as well as another college for boys in Tulancingo, whose graduates he hoped would enlist in large numbers in his missionary congregation. The missionaries were to dedicate themselves to work in Mexico and the neighboring nations.

In 1905 Guízar became spiritual director of a seminary in Zamora. There, he emphasized among his students Eucharistic and Marian devotion. In June 1910 Guízar was forced to order the dissolution of his foundation of missionaries. Neither the disappointment of the failure of his personal foundation nor the honors that he received dimmed the zeal of this priest for the missions, and by 1910 he had preached innumerable missions in six Mexican states, especially in southeastern Mexico.

The chaos in Mexico consequent on the fall of President Porfirio Díaz (1830–1915) ended the home missions but opened for the young priest new opportunities to serve the souls of his fellows. Disguised as a peddler, a homeopathic physician, or an accordion player, Guízar traveled with the armies of the revolution, ministering to the wounded and preaching whenever the opportunity presented itself. Often he returned from these missions of mercy with his hat and clothes pierced with bullet holes. Often too, his priestly ministrations would rouse the anger of the revolutionary leaders, and on numerous occasions he was condemned to death. His success in escaping this supreme penalty made him a marked man in so many areas that he finally fled to Guatemala in 1916.

Under the name of Rafael Ruíz, he was able to resume his life as a home missionary, and in one year he officiated at the marriages of seven thousand couples. In 1917 Guízar landed in Cuba, and until the end of 1919 he preached 143 missions there. While preaching a mission in the cathedral of Havana in August 1919, Guízar was told that he had been named bishop of Veracruz. His first reaction was to flee to Colombia, where he preached for about four months. But on November 30, 1919, Archbishop Tito Trocchi consecrated Guízar bishop in Havana, and on January 4, 1920, he arrived in Veracruz. His arrival coincided with a disastrous earthquake in a number of cities of his diocese, and the new bishop immediately went to help his stricken people. With the permission of his brothers, he sold the beautiful pectoral cross of gold set with precious stones that they had given him, used the money for the poor, and thenceforth wore a cross made of brass.

Reaction to Persecution. During his episcopate, Guízar faced persecution, as did his brother bishops, especially after Plutarco Elías Calles (1877–1945) came to power. Guízar had his own particular cross in the person of the governor of Veracruz, Adalberto Tejeda (1883–1960), who on June 17, 1931, decreed that he would permit only one priest for each 100,000 inhabitants. Guízar, recognizing that this decree made it physically impossible for the priests to carry out their duties, closed all the churches in the state in order to force the situation on the attention of the people. Tejeda answered with a decree ordering that the bishop should be shot wherever he was found in the state. At the time, Guízar was in Mexico City, but he ordered his secretary to drive as rapidly as possible to the governor's palace in Jalapa. He boldly walked into the governor's office, stating that he respected authority and that he wished to spare the governor's lieutenants the trouble of shooting him. The daring move paid off because the surprised governor did not dare shoot the bishop.

Thus, Guízar was free to organize more than three hundred Eucharistic centers, where his priests could minister to the people in ever-increasing numbers while the churches were closed. He was even able to maintain a seminary with more than one hundred seminarians, who, though forced to move from place to place, were able to complete their studies and be ordained. In this way, the diocese counted more priests at the end of the period of persecution than at its beginning. Worn out with his work, Guízar died in Mexico City in 1938. In 1950 his body was exhumed and found to be incorrupt. Thereafter, his remains were translated to his titular chapel in the cathedral of Veracruz.

Beatification and Canonization. The cause for his BEATIFICATION was introduced in Rome on August 11, 1958. At Bishop Guízar's beatification in 1995, Pope John Paul II said that "no difficulty prevented him from fulfilling his missionary tasks." Guízar's spirituality, the pope stated, was based upon his love for the Eucharist and devotion to the Blessed Mother. Since Guízar was a bishop of faith and action, his attention was ever centered upon the salvation of the souls entrusted to his pastoral care.

In March 2006, the VATICAN accepted the testimony of a team of medical doctors and the conclusions of a theological commission, approving the supernatural character of a miracle attributed to Guízar's INTERCESSION: the healing of an unborn boy with a developmental defect. The boy was born completely healthy. On April 28, 2006, Pope Benedict XVI signed the decree approving the miracle and paving the way for the canonization.

During the canonization in Rome, Pope Benedict praised the virtues of the "bishop of the poor," who despised the power and wealth of the world, and thus received a hundredfold the inheritance of the kingdom of Christ. "Imitating the poor Christ, he renounced his goods and never accepted the gifts of the powerful, or rather, he gave them back immediately." The pope strongly emphasized the pride of place Guízar put upon the seminary: "The example of St. Rafael Guízar y Valencia is a call to his brother bishops and priests to consider as fundamental in pastoral programs, beyond the spirit of poverty and evangelization, the promotion of priestly and religious vocations, and their formation according to the heart of Jesus!"

GUTIÉRREZ, GUSTAVO

Peruvian theologian, priest, and philosopher; b. Lima, Peru, June 8, 1929.

Gutiérrez grew up in a humble neighborhood in Lima, where he experienced a lack of material wealth but never lacked the love of a caring family. At a young age he suffered from osteomyelitis, which kept him bedridden from twelve to eighteen.

Formative Years. Gutiérrez graduated from Marist High School in Lima. From 1947 to 1950 he attended the School of Medicine at San Marcos University. At the same time he studied humanities at the Catholic University of Lima. In 1951 he traveled to Belgium to pursue studies in philosophy and psychology at the University of Louvain, which he concluded in 1955. From 1955 to 1959 he studied theology at the Catholic University of Lyon, and from 1959 to 1963 he was at the Gregorian University and the Catholic Institute of Paris. He was ordained to the priesthood in 1959. As a theologian he participated in the 1968 Medellín Conference, and he attended the Conference of Puebla in 1979 as a personal adviser to a group of Latin American bishops.

Theology of Liberation. In 1968 Gutiérrez gave a lecture in a meeting of priests and laypeople in the town of Chimbote, Peru. This lecture became the first draft of his major work of theology and best-known book, A Theology of Liberation, which was first published in 1971. European theologies, especially political theologies developed by scholars such as Johannes Metz, were the main source of inspiration for Gutiérrez. In A Theology of Liberation, which is considered the first major synthesis of LIBERATION THEOLOGY, Gutiérrez clearly articulates a new vision of theology as a critical reflection on praxis, that is to say, a reflection based on experience and social reality. Gutiérrez raises questions such as, How can we talk about God in a continent (e.g., Latin America) where millions of people live in extreme poverty and injustice? He believed that the task of theology must involve a reflection on the concrete social and economic conditions of people. But Gutiérrez went beyond reflection. Ideas like SALVATION within history convinced him of a need for Christians to act and eventually played a transformative role in many Latin American societies.

His theological reflections also draw from literature and poetry, especially those of Peru. His books are filled with quotations and excerpts from major Peruvian literary figures such as poet César Vallejo and novelist José María Arguedas.

The reception of Gutiérrez's ideas and of liberation theology in general has been positive, despite criticisms and clarifications from the CONGREGATION FOR THE DOCTRINE OF THE FAITH. As Gutiérrez himself remarked in several interviews, liberation theology has been incorporated in the mainstream of Catholic thought and practice. Ideas like the preferential option for the poor are now common in Catholic discourse. The documents of the Conferences in Medellín, Puebla, and Santo Domingo—an important pastoral legacy of liberation theology for the Church in Latin America—still resonate in contemporary Church statements. A Theology of Liberation remains the most influential source of liberation theology. It has been translated into English, French, German, Italian, and many other languages. Gutiérrez's books have been the subject of countless studies, reviews, and doctoral dissertations worldwide.

The continued relevance of Gutiérrez and liberation theology lies in the fact that the poor now have a central position in the theological discussion and in the life of the Church. The Catholic Church and Christian churches in general have found in this perspective a language and a source of inspiration in the difficult struggle for justice in our world. In a 2006 article, Christian Duqoc, teacher and friend of Gutiérrez, calls him a theologian of the unexpected who rescued the poor from the forgotten side of history to a pivotal position in history.

Other Writings. Gutiérrez is a most prolific theologian, as he has written on topics such as liberation spirituality, the Bible, and history. He has penned many reflections on Christian spirituality, which have enriched his theological perspective. Unfortunately, some of his critics have failed to take into account this side of his theological work, and have judged him solely on the basis of his political theology. In his books We Drink from Our Own Wells and On Job, both based on biblical readings, Gutiérrez outlines a vision of spirituality rooted in the Hebrew prophets, wisdom literature, and the Gospels.

Gutiérrez also contributed to historical theology with a book on the sixteenth-century Dominican friar Bartolomé de las Casas, In Search for the Poor of Christ. This volume is a reflection on the audacity of las Casas to create a theology in the midst of oppression of the native population, for which the Catholic Church was partially responsible. Gutierrez quotes las Casas—"God did not die for gold"—as a way to convey the point that God's message cannot be used to justify conquest and colonization. His admiration for las Casas also influenced his decision to become a member of the Dominican order in 1999.

His numerous travels, honorary degrees, awards, and teaching positions have given Gutiérrez international recognition as a public intellectual in Church circles and beyond. His work among the poor in the Rimac parish of Lima, Peru, has been honored with the award of the Prince of Asturias (Spain), and he has received an honorary degree from Yale University. In his native Peru, newspapers frequently publish interviews with Gutiérrez in which he reflects on Peruvian life from a theological perspective.

H

HADDAD, JACQUES GHAZIR, BL.

Capuchin Franciscan priest, founder of the Franciscan Sisters of the Holy Cross of Lebanon; baptismal name Khalil, also named Abuna Yaaqub (Arabic); b. February 1, 1875, Ghazir, Lebanon; d. June 26, 1954, Lebanon; beatified by Pope BENEDICT XVI, June 22, 2008.

Khalil Haddad was the third of five children of Boutros Saleh and Shams Yoakim. After studying Arabic, French, and Syriac, in 1892 he moved to Alexandria, where he taught Arabic at the Christian Brothers' College. When he was nineteen years old, after receiving permission from his father, Khalil Haddad joined the Capuchins near Ghazir and received the religious name Jacques. He was ordained in 1901 in Beirut and was appointed director of schools for the Capuchin Friars in Lebanon.

From 1903 to 1914 he was an itinerant preacher, walking across Lebanon and appearing in Syria, Palestine, Turkey, and Iraq, earning the title "Apostle of Lebanon." During that time, in his capacity as director of schools, he fostered the growth the order's work in education. By 1910 he was overseeing nearly two hundred schools. His preaching in the region was interrupted in 1914, when Turkey entered WORLD WAR I. In the aftermath of the war he founded soup kitchens and orphanages.

In 1919 he erected a large cross and built a chapel dedicated to Our Lady of the Sea at Jall-Eddib, a hill seven miles north of Beirut. Originally founded as a place of prayer, by 1950 the establishment became an important psychiatric hospital.

In 1920 he founded the Franciscan Sisters of the Holy Cross of Lebanon to assist him in his charitable work. He continued to found charitable institutions in many regions of Lebanon, including: the House of the Sacred Heart, an orphanage for girls, in 1933; the Hospital of Our Lady, which served the elderly, in 1948; St. Joseph's Hospital, one of the most important medical centers in the region, in 1949; and St. Anthony's house for beggars, in 1950.

After spending more than fifty years preaching, praying, and serving Lebanon's poor and sick by founding hospitals, schools, orphanages, and soup kitchens, Haddad died of leukemia on June 26, 1954.

He was declared venerable by Pope John Paul II on December 21, 1992. After the miraculous cure of Martha Khattan, whose cancer was in advanced stages, Haddad was beatified at a June 22, 2008, Mass in Beirut, celebrated by Cardinal José Saraiva Martins, C.M.F., Prefect for the Congregation of the Causes of Saints.

Feast: June 26.

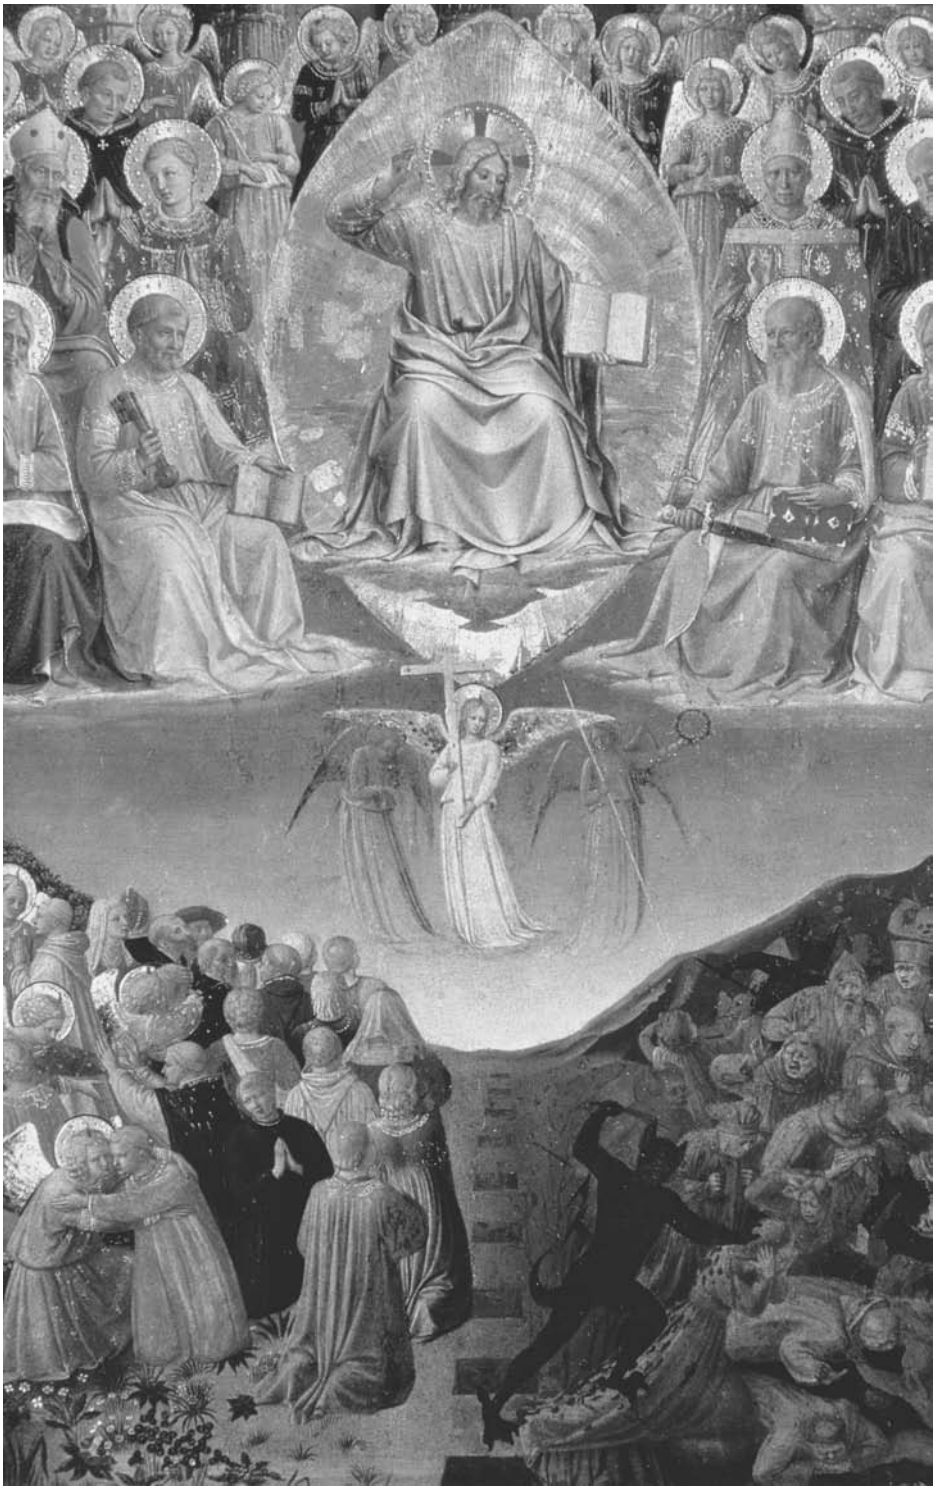
HELL (THEOLOGY OF)

This article outlines the theological concept of Hell and then traces its development in the fields of dogma and of theology. Developments that occurred after Vatican II are also noted.

Theological Concept. To construct an adequate theological concept of Hell is not easy. Christ did not speak of Hell to convey information about an object beyond present experience but as a decision to which the human person is called by the proclamation of the gospel. Ideas of Hell that appeared in the course of Christian theology varied according to the different concepts from which they were derived. To elaborate a theological idea of Hell that interprets all the elements, with their priorities, of Christian belief in Hell, the concept of the KINGDOM OF GOD is essential.

The kingdom of God was the dominating concept Jesus used in proclaiming His gospel (Schnackenburg 1963, p. 94). Jesus did not create this idea; it was, in the form of the kingdom of heaven, one current in the thought-world of His Jewish contemporaries. But the content Jesus gave to this concept was original (H. L. Strack and P. Billerbeck 1965–1969, pp. 172–184). He used it as an eschatological metaphor that expressed God's merciful love for the human race and the divine saving will for creation. For Jesus the metaphor of the kingdom of God gathered the whole of the history of SALVATION into a unity, as it was the focal point of the self-manifestation of God. When the theological idea of Hell is derived from and controlled by the concept of the kingdom of God, its eschatological character and relation to the mercy and saving will of God receive due priority.

Deriving the theological idea of Hell from the kingdom concept respects its nature as an objective reality. For Christian theology the kingdom metaphor expresses the conviction that God's saving will is realized in the exalted Jesus and the humiliated Satan. The theological idea of Hell is designed to express the second part of this statement, and the construction of the idea should reflect this.



The theological idea of Hell expresses a present reality as well as something still to come. This too is reflected in the way Jesus used the kingdom metaphor. There is the Lordship of Jesus that will continue until all things are subject to Him (1 Cor 15:27); there is what that Lordship prepares for: that God may be all in all (1 Cor 15:28). To be adequate, the theological idea of Hell needs to be elaborated in terms of the Lord Jesus (Jn 17:2) and of God all in all.

Given the Christian belief in Hell, one function of theological reflection is to explain the possibility of Hell in as far as that is possible. Here, too, the advantage of deriving the idea of Hell from the kingdom metaphor is apparent. Intimately associated with the kingdom is the issue of belief (Mk 1:15). The possibility of Hell is made intelligible by the concept of UNBELIEF. The theological idea of Hell does not explain unbelief, a problem that involves human freedom and God's will (Hoskyns 1947, p. 295), but it clearly indicates the eschatological character of the object, the Lord Jesus, and of the testimony, that of the Spirit, involved in unbelief. The theological idea of Hell supposes the mystery of the Father sending the Son and the Holy Spirit, with the reality of the saving work within the human race (Eph 2:14) and on the cosmic level (Col 1:20) that this implies. Hell is not justified in terms of SIN alone; behind sin is unbelief (Jn 16:9). The concept of sin is one pole of God's recognition of human historicity; REPENTANCE is the other. The theological idea of Hell is designed to convey this meaning.

The theological idea of Hell uses SATAN, who "sins from the beginning. To this end the Son of God appeared that he might destroy the works of the devil" (1 Jn 3:8). Constructed on this model, the idea of Hell indicates the result of unbelief: persons become like Satan (1 Jn 3:10), because their attitude toward God—who is disclosed in the Lord Jesus and in the testimony of the Holy Spirit—is similar to that of Satan. Using this model, the ultimate meaning of Hell is metaphorically expressed in the words: "And the light shines in the darkness" (Jn 1:5).

The classical theology of the West approached the problem of Hell mainly from the angle of retribution for sin. This idea of Hell is built from the analysis of the concept of sin and developed by using analogously the concepts of sanction, perfection, and retribution drawn from morals, metaphysics, and religion. Theology today approaches the problem of Hell as separation from God.

Dogmatic Development. Belief in the possibility of Hell has always been present in the Church. Since New Testament times the doctrinal statement of belief in the mystery of Hell is found in the professions of faith. The early Fides Damasi states this retribution will take place when Christ returns to judge the living and the dead: "aut poenam pro peccatis aeterni supplicii" (Denzinger-Schönmetzer 1965, 72); so too the Quicumque: "qui vero mala [egerunt], in ignem aeternum" (Denzinger-Schönmetzer 1965, 76). In 1201, Pope Innocent III distinguished between Hell as the deprivation of the beatific vision (for those who die with original sin only) and Hell as everlasting torment for those who die with actual mortal sins (Denzinger-Schönmetzer 1965, 780). The important profession of faith used in the dialogue between East and West, at the Second Council of Lyons in 1274 and again in 1385, states belief in the mystery of Hell in the context of the retribution that takes place immediately after death: "Illorum autem animas, qui in mortali peccato vel cum solo originali decedunt, mox in infernum descendere, poenis tamen disparibus puniendas" (Denzinger-Schönmetzer 1965, 856). Although there is no creedal statement of belief in Hell, the creedal statement that Christ will return to judge the living and the dead entails the doctrinal statement of belief in the possibility of Hell.

Two points of this statement of belief in Hell have been formally defined. In 543, in a definition reflecting the faith of the Church of the East and West, the punishment of the demons and the damned was declared unending. The ninth of the so-called canons against Origen reads: "Si quis dicit aut sentit, ad tempus esse daemonum et impiorum hominum supplicium, ejusque finem aliquando futurum … an. s." (Denzinger-Schönmetzer 1965, 411). And in 1336, the constitution Benedictus Deus, by defining the doctrine that retribution takes place immediately after death, indicated that the punishment of the damned begins immediately after death. "Diffinimus insuper, quod secundum Dei ordinationem communem animae decedentium in actuali peccato mortali mox post mortem suam ad inferna descendunt, ubi poenis infernalibus cruciantur" (Denzinger-Schönmetzer 1965, 1002). These two definitions emerged in the course of the long debate within the Church concerning the return of Christ, the PAROUSIA. The content of this belief is complex; the return of Christ is associated with other events, such as the END OF THE WORLD, the RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD, and the divine judgment.

To determine the nature of these events and the way they are related to one another and to the return of Christ is not easy. The interpretation of the eschatological statements found in the New Testament and the evaluation of the imagery they employ is beset with difficulties. In the second century Justin held that the punishment of the demons and the damned is delayed until after the final judgment (1 Apol. 28; Dial. 5.3). The great apologist (Dial. 80) deduced this from his interpretation of the Christian doctrine of the resurrection of the body, an interpretation influenced by Jewish eschatology in the form of CHILIASM. Known as the dilatio inferni theory, Justin's opinion was widespread in the West until the sixth century, when the teaching of Gregory the Great (Dial. 4.27) superseded it.

Those who understood the return of Christ according to the theory of chiliasm read the eschatological statements of the Scriptures in a purely literal sense. Origen reacts strongly against these literalist believers (De prin. 2.11.2). In doing this he translates the sufferings of the damned into spiritualized terms (De prin. 2.10.4). The real punishment of the damned is their sense of separation from God. According to his theory of APOCATASTASIS, Origen (De prin. 1.6.2) understands these punishments as remedial and as ending when final restoration is reached (In Ezech. hom. 1.2).

Origen's influence on the understanding of Hell was considerable. He was largely responsible for the disappearance of chiliasm and so restored the return of Christ to its eschatological setting. By questioning the purpose of the punishment of the damned, he opened the way for the interpretation of scriptural statements about remedial punishment, the FIRE OF JUDGMENT, and PURGATORY. Thus, belief in Hell was stated in the context of an individual's retribution at death.

Origen attempted to provide an intelligent understanding of the traditional belief in Hell. The result at which he arrived was eventually declared by the Church incompatible with that belief. What he attempted remains a problem. His positive contribution to the solution of that problem was, besides showing the folly of relying on the purely literalist reading of scriptural statements about the sufferings of the damned, to place the understanding of Hell within Christian belief in the saving work of Christ and in God's merciful love for humankind.

After Origen, some interpretations mitigated the unending punishment of the damned by maintaining that these punishments would end for Christians (Jerome, Ep. 119.7; Ambrose, In Ps. 36.26), or for certain categories of Christians, such as those who always retained belief in Christ or those who had received the Eucharist. These views, under the influence of Augustine's teachings (Denzinger-Schönmetzer 1965, 112–13), eventually gave way before the traditional belief in the unending punishment of the damned. Others, for whom this belief was incompatible with their belief in the MERCY OF GOD, resolved the problem of the punishment of the demons and the damned by the theory of conditionalism, in which the demons and the damned will be annihilated, or by the theory of universalism, which postulates the final restoration of all things, including the demons and the damned. These views are excluded by the dogmatic statement that the punishment of the demons and the damned is unending. But the fact that such views continue to be held by some Christians is a reminder of the problem involved in understanding the traditional belief in the mystery of Hell. The Church concurred with the belief in unending punishment of the demons and the damned, but this is not to be equated with the total expression of the Church's belief in the mystery of Hell; nor can belief in Hell in that form alone provide an adequate basis for the elaboration of the theological idea of Hell.

Theological Development. The various ideas of Hell elaborated during the course of theology were influenced by the different categories used to integrate the theology of Hell within a systematic theology. In his category of apocatastasis, Origen described Hell as the ultimate stage in the process by which all things return to their primeval order. When Origen's followers hardened his speculations into a doctrine of universalism, the Church excluded this idea of Hell: "Si quis dicit ... restitutionem et redintegrationem fore daemonum aut impiorum hominum, an. s." (Denzinger-Schönmetzer 1965, 411). The Church's long reflection on belief in the return of Christ resulted in a clearer identification of the different eschatological events and states, both at the collective and at the individual level. Thus, scientific theology, when it emerged in the West during the twelfth century, was better placed to work out a theological idea of Hell. Peter Lombard integrates the theology of Hell into his systematic theology, Libri 4 sententiarum, using the category of resurrection (3 Sent. prol.). This category he linked, by way of the category of Sacrament, to the category of Christ the Samaritan restoring man from the effects of sin—infirmity and death. Lombard's theological speculation about Hell is mainly confined to discussing questions arising from scriptural statements and patristic opinions, especially those of Augustine (4 Sent. 43–50).

Thomas Aquinas (In 2 sent. prol; Summa theologiae 3a, prol.) more fully exploited Lombard's categories, but he died before completing his own systematic theology (Summa theologiae); what is included under the rubric Resurrection (Summa theologiae 3a, suppl., 69–99) is taken from his earlier work (In 4 sent. 43–50). Aquinas traces the horizons within which an intelligent understanding of belief in Hell is possible: the place of the will in fault and punishment (In 4 sent. prol.), the mutability and fixity of the created will (angels': Summa theologiae 1a, 63–64; men's: Comp. theol. 174). By working out these horizons in the concrete situation, revealed in FAITH, of the creature's freedom and of God's GRACE, he indicates the mystery of Hell. He was aware, too, of the relation of the theology of Hell to pneumatology (Comp. theol. 147). These possibilities for the development of the theology of Hell were little exploited by later theologians. During the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, theological interest was chiefly confined to Books 1 and 2 of Peter Lombard's Libri sententiarum. And when in the following century Aquinas's Summa theologiae became the text used in the theological faculties, the incompleteness of that work caused eschatology and the theology of Hell to be isolated from their traditional place within theology. L. Lessius, De perfectionibus moribusque divinis 13.24, inserts the theology of Hell under the rubric Judgment and Wrath of God. C. Mazzella's De Deo creante (Disp. 6) places it with the theology of man. Until recent times, a similar treatment of the theology of Hell was common in theology manuals (e.g., A. Tanquerey's). Retribution for sin is the dominant feature of the idea of Hell developed by these theologies.

The category of revelation is increasingly used to integrate the theology of Hell, and eschatology, within systematic theology (e.g., in Schmaus's work). This category of revelation introduces into the theology of Hell the concepts of the kingdom of God and of unbelief. Both concepts express personal realities and entail a concept of freedom: the freedom in which a person rejects the self-giving that another freely makes. In this context separation from God is the theological idea of Hell. And by reference to the divine self-giving manifested now in the Lord Jesus and to be manifested when God is all in all, this idea of Hell as separation from God is worked out. The consequence of this separation from God is expressed in the idea of Hell as retribution for sin; the theological concepts of damnation and hellfire are used to interpret this consequence. While respecting the mystery of God's dealings with unbelief, this theology of Hell makes a statement of belief in the mystery of Hell that is wider in form than the present doctrinal statement of that belief. But it is aware that the truths its idea of Hell interpret cannot be held together in logical equilibrium (Jn 17:12).

Developments since Vatican II. Vatican II does not treat the topic of Hell in any extensive way. It does, however, assume it in a number of passages that warn of the possibility of not being saved. Lumen gentium 14 states: "Whosoever, therefore, knowing that the Catholic Church was made necessary by Christ, would refuse to enter it or remain in it, could not be saved." Moreover, Catholics who fail to respond to God's grace "in thought word and deed, not only shall they not be saved but they shall be the more severely judged" (Lumen gentium 14). In speaking about the end times, Lumen gentium 48 cites the Scriptures that affirm the images of Hell as "the eternal fire" (Mt 25:41) and the darkness where there is "weeping and gnashing of teeth" (Mt 22:13; 25:30).

Vatican II also upholds the universal salvific WILL OF GOD, citing 1 Timothy 2:4 that the "Savior wills that all men be saved" (Lumen gentium 16). Within this context, the possibility of salvation of non-Christians is affirmed if, "through no fault of their own," they do not know the GOSPEL of Christ or his Church but "sincerely seek God and moved by grace strive by their deeds to do His will as it is known to them through the dictates of conscience" (Lumen gentium, 16). The possibility of salvation for non-Christians, however, does not take away the duty of Christians to preach the Gospel, because salvation can only come through Christ and a relationship to the Catholic Church—a truth upheld both at Vatican II (cf. Ad gentes 7) and later reaffirmed by the Congregation for the DOCTRINE OF THE FAITH in its declaration, Dominus Iesus of the year 2000 (cf. Dominus Iesus 2000 20–22).

Pope PAUL VI affirms the reality of Hell in his Credo of the People of God (1968) where he states that those who have refused "the love and piety of God" will go "to the fire that is not extinguished" (no. 12). During the pontificate of Paul VI, the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith sent a letter to the bishops of the world, On Certain Questions Regarding Eschatology (May 17, 1979). While recognizing that "neither Scripture nor theology provides sufficient light for a proper picture of life after death," the traditional teaching on Hell is affirmed in these words: "She [the Church] believes that there will be eternal punishment for the sinner, who will be deprived of the sight of God, and that this punishment will have a repercussion on the whole being of the sinner" (no. 7).

Pope JOHN PAUL II, in his 1994 book, Crossing the Threshold of Hope, mentions the difficulty some thinkers, such as Origen, Sergé BULGAKOV, and Hans Urs von BALTHASAR, had with "the problem of Hell," and he raises the question: "Can God, who has loved man so much, permit the man who rejects Him to be condemned to eternal torment?" (p. 185). The POPE responds by noting that Christ's words about Hell in Matthew 25:36 are "unequivocal." Nevertheless, > the Church has never made any pronouncements in this regard. This is a mystery, truly inscrutable, which embraces the holiness of God and the conscience of man. The silence of the Church is, therefore, the only appropriate position for Christian faith. Even when Jesus says of Judas, the traitor, "it would be better for that man if he had never been born" (Mt 26:24), his words do not allude for certain to eternal damnation. (pp. 185–186)

John Paul II also touches on Hell in his General Audience of July 28, 1999. He notes that eternal DAMNATION is not from God's initiative, "because in his merciful love he can only desire the salvation of the beings he created" (no. 3). Hell results for "the creature who closes himself to God's love." Damnation, therefore, "consists precisely in definitive separation from God, freely chosen by the human person and confirmed with death that seals his choice forever. God's judgement ratifies this state" (no. 3). The Holy Father speaks of eternal damnation as "a real possibility" though "we are not granted, without special divine revelation, the knowledge of whether or which human beings are effectively involved in it;" but the "thought of Hell and even less the improper use of biblical images must not create anxiety or despair, but it is a necessary and healthy reminder of freedom within the proclamation that the risen Jesus has conquered Satan, giving us the Spirit of God who makes us cry 'Abba, Father!'" (Rom 8:15; Gal 4:6) (no. 4).

The Catechism of the Catholic Church (1997) mentions Hell as the result of dying in MORTAL SIN "without repenting and accepting God's merciful love" (no. 1033). It describes Hell as a "state of definitive self-exclusion from communion with God and the blessed" (no. 1033). The Catechism likewise affirms the traditional teaching on the ETERNITY of Hell (no. 1034).

Because Hell is mentioned in the context of self-exclusion, the question has been raised whether unbaptized babies can be saved, because they never made a personal choice against God. The deprivation of sanctifying grace, due to ORIGINAL SIN, had led to the speculation of a state of LIMBO for these unbaptized babies, where they would be deprived of the BEATIFIC VISION but given some type of "natural joy." The Catechism of the Catholic Church states that people have reason to hope that God has a way of saving these unbaptized babies, though it must remain on the level of hope not certitude (no. 1261).

Some had thought that Pope John Paul II, in his ENCYCLICAL, Evangelium vitae [EV] 99 assured women who had an ABORTION that their child was "living in the Lord." Because of the possibility for misinterpretation, a change was made in the definitive text of EV 99 as it appeared in the Acta apostolicae sedis 87 (AAS 1995, 515). Instead of telling women that their aborted child was "living in the Lord," they were instead instructed to entrust their child to the Father and his mercy "with hope" (cum spe).

The INTERNATIONAL THEOLOGICAL COMMISSION (ITC) took up the question of the fate of unbaptized babies in a document published April 19, 2007. The commission concluded in The Hope of Salvation for Infants Who Die without Being Baptized "that there are theological and liturgical reasons to hope that infants who die without baptism may be saved and brought into eternal happiness, even if there is not an explicit teaching on this question found in Revelation" (ITC 2007, opening section). Contrary to some reports, the commission did not entirely rule out the thesis of limbo because it "remains a possible theological opinion" (no. 41).

In terms of theological speculation, considerable attention has been given to the 1986 book by the Swiss theologian Hans Urs von Balthasar (1905–1988), Was dürfen wir hoffen? (What may we hope for?), which was published in English in 1988 under the title, Dare We Hope "That All Men Be Saved?" Balthasar avoided absolute universalism or apokatastasis, because he admitted that Hell is everlasting for the demons. With respect to the fate of humans, however, Balthasar, like the Jesuit Karl RAHNER (1904–1984), maintained that God's universal salvific will (cf. 1 Tim 2:4) made the salvation of all humans a real possibility. Although Balthasar did not claim the salvation of all people as a fact, he did believe that there was an obligation to hope for the salvation of all (Balthasar 1988, pp. 211–221).

Balthasar's position received support from many, including Father Richard John Neuhaus (1936–2009), the editor of the journal, First Things. Many others, however, such as Dale Vree, the editor of New Oxford Review, found Balthasar's position problematic from the viewpoint of the Catholic tradition. Some criticized Balthasar for giving too much weight to the private revelations of mystics and not enough attention to magisterial statements (O'Connor 1989, pp. 13, 16). Others suggested that Balthasar's "trajectory" runs counter to Church teaching even if he does not explicitly reject Catholic DOCTRINE (Flannery 1991, p. 479). A moderate assessment of Balthasar's position was provided by Avery Cardinal DULLES (1918–2008), who described it as "at least adventurous" because it "runs against the obvious interpretation of the words of Jesus in the New Testament and against the dominant theological opinion down through the centuries, which maintains that some, and in fact very many, are lost" (Dulles 2008, p. 393).

HELL, HARROWING OF

Some twentieth-century theologians have subjected the articles of faith to radical processes of demythologization and questioning. The fifth article of the APOSTLES' CREED, "Jesus descended into Hell, and on the third day he rose from the dead," has been particularly assailed. It is not easy for modern scientific and often materialistic minds to understand, much less to imagine, these truths. Examining the problem of the image of the abode of the dead and JESUS' harrowing of HELL from Scriptural images and concepts to the iconographical and theological efforts can help to make it more understandable. The Descent, or as it has been referred to in medieval English terminology, "the harrowing of Hell," presents the interesting and urgent task of reinterpretation without eviscerating it of theological and pastoral content. Both JOHN PAUL II and BENEDICT XVI addressed both topics and attempted to expound the rich significance of both the Descent and the RESURRECTION.

The Theological Problem. This article of faith immediately questions one's ability to speak about the metahistorical, or disembodied, dimensions of Jesus' redemptive work. No human being saw the Descent or the Resurrection. Indeed one cannot see these anymore than one can listen to the Father speak to the Eternal Son about His future INCARNATION. But is it possible to imagine referring to those realities without falsifying them, without inventing unacceptable myths, without imagining an unacceptable otherworldly geography? How can one pretend to speak about the condition of the "souls of the dead" in an authentic, rational, honest way without falling into temporal and spatial falsification? Is theology only to address reason and not the inescapable human need to imagine what one believes? Even if one accepts the need to represent—not just to conceptualize but also to represent a belief—how is it possible to judge the validity of such representations or images lest they betray the original contents of the FAITH that is to be transmitted through them? Imaginative representations of the harrowing can obscure the contents of faith, but should they all be banished as incompatible with contemporary secularity?

This is not only a problem for theology, with its notions and concepts, but for literature, for words evoke images even if they do not describe these images. It is an even more pressing problem for iconography, which pretends to represent in an authentic way to avoid giving a false image or idol of an eternal truth. How can a mystery be represented in a visual manner while making an accurate historical, liturgical, and theological statement? All of ESCHATOLOGY is perilously close to vanishing if society cannot speak or represent these ineffable realities. Are people necessarily bound to a dualistic, supposedly Hellenistic, non-Hebraic understanding of the human condition if they speak of souls of the dead? Can they make any credible statements about invisible realities at all? The need to defend the analogical, but truthful, character of the theological discourse immediately comes to the fore.

Believers have always sought to translate the words of Scripture into the visible, sensible way. Indeed ISRAEL did not develop an idea of God, but rather had an experience of God, before its sages developed a theology of God. The content of the mysteries of faith cannot be evacuated because they cannot be subjected to physical/material or strictly historical evidence. Since mankind is forced to speak of mysteries such as God, the holy angels, and the souls of the dead only in terms they can experience, that is, in spatial and temporal terms, they have to accept the limitations of language and visual images while not denying the ability to speak authentically about such spiritual realities. Israel and the Church, precisely by generating images of the realm of the dead and Jesus' relationship to it, were witnessing to their vital faith in fundamental convictions about God's action on behalf of mankind. Preaching faith in Yahweh or Jesus as Lord is not contrary to authentic images, to religious imagery (be it poetic or descriptive, speculative or artistic representations). These images should be purified so as not to acquire an independent life of their own, detached from the other elements of belief.

Old Testament Images. The HEBREWS' evolving notions of the condition of the dead tended to be austere in comparison to the flamboyant imaginations and highly developed views of the afterlife of their successive pagan neighbors, be they Egyptians with their netherworld monsters, Canaanites, Babylonians, or Greeks and Romans with their tourist trips to HADES to satiate mortal men's curiosity about the realm of the dead. Among the pagan visitors to Hades were Ulysses, Aeneas, Theseus, Hercules, and Orpheus. The Hebrews resisted speculating about the fate of the dead, and to invoke the deceased was punishable by death. They did not submit easily to mythological imaginations of the abode of the dead.

Yet, in the oldest strata of the Old Testament, when they mention the abode of the dead, they affirm the survival of a particular individual, even when they wrap it in the phrase "he was gathered up to his ancestors" (Gn 15:15; 25:8; 47:30; 49:33; Dt 31:16; Jgs 2:10; 2 Sm 7:12; 1 Kg 2:10). The dead were not "nothing," meaning they were not annihilated, but the living could barely relate to them, and they certainly could not do anything for them. The Hebrews held a rather desolate view of this terminal state of existence. The notion of the abode of the dead is present in most, if not all, literary genres of the Jewish Scriptures and is present in the intertestamental and apocryphal literature as well.

The shadowy Jewish concepts of the abode of the dead or the afterlife are varied and evidence a complex evolution. Normally the Hebrew dead were buried, so the notion of a hole in the ground unto which the dead descend is basic to the notion of SHEOL (cf. Is 38:18; Nm 16:30ff; Jb 7:9; Is 14:4–19; Ez 32:18ff; Ps 106:9). Because the Hebraic cosmological concept envisioned Earth as standing above underground primeval waters that God tamed as He created (cf. Dt 33:13; Prv 3:20, 8:24; Am 7:4; Ps 24:2, 136:6; Jb 26:5), waves and slimy muck were intimately associated with Sheol, or as it was translated into Greek: the Abyss, or Hades (cf. Ps 5:10, 55:24, 69:16; Jb 9:31). God was conceived as One who triumphed over the watery chaos, a notion that was also common in Mesopotamian cosmologies (cf. Ps 46:3; 69:2,3,15,16; 92:9–10; 93:2ff; 104:7). Sometimes the waters were personified by water monsters called LEVIATHAN and Rahab that were defeated by Yahweh (cf. Ps 74:13, 89:10ff).

The poetic language with which the abode of the dead is described not only in the Psalms but also in the Prophetic and Wisdom literature is theologically charged with a wealth of intuitions as it attempts to describe the "spiritual" condition of the dead by diverse images that entail an eschatological geography as well as personified powers of Death. Sheol was a land of darkness, and the souls who inhabited it were literally rephaim, or shadows (cf. Ps 5:10, 55:24, 69:16; Jb 9:31; Prv 21:16; Is 14:9, 29:14). The dead slept because they could not look forward to any better day (Jb 14:12; Is 26:19; Jer 51:39; Ps 39:16; Dn 12:2). No light, life, or hope ever penetrated this chaotic world of eternal solitude (cf. Ez 26:20), a house of silence where no praises of the Lord were heard (cf. Ps 94:17; Is 38:18 ff; Ps 6:5ff, 115:17ff, 142:8), this everlasting prison (cf. Ps 88:9; Jb 12:14; Lam 3:7), where the presence of all the dead consoled no one. If remembrance of Yahweh was the prelude to blessing and praising Him, there was none of that in Sheol; it was a land of forgetfulness and of the forgotten (cf. Ps 88:6). All who entered it lost hope of exiting. This was symbolized by the all-powerful, barred gates of Hell that closed behind everyone who entered, never to open again (cf. Is 38:10; Jb 38:17; Ps 9:14; Jon 2:7). Death was seen as aggressive, like unto a hunter (cf. Ps 124), with claws (cf. Jb 17:16), open jaws (cf. Ps 46:3), with an insatiable throat that swallowed all (cf. Nm 16:31–33; Is 5:14; Ps 69:16), and a sterile womb that bore no offspring (cf. Prv 30:16; Is 5:14; Sir 51:7).

In Sheol souls were separated from God, who is the source of life; they had no positive relation with Him. Psalms 88 and 49 give terrible descriptions of Sheol that defy God to have mercy on the poor and destitute souls who inhabit it. Only the Resurrection of Jesus will answer the heart-wrenching sadness and accusations of the unique and hopeless in Psalm 88. In SIRACH the sullen primitive image of the abode of the dead is still vibrant (cf. Sir 14:17, 22:11, 41:1–7, 9:17). The Book of Qohelet (ECCLESIASTES) is rather skeptical and nihilistic in its understating of the afterlife: A living dog is better than a dead lion (cf. Eccl 9:4ff). This book implies that in Sheol all reason, intelligence, and consciousness of individual existence was lost (cf. Eccl 9, 10). It denies any meaningful existence of the souls of the dead: They have no sense of their identity; they are anonymous shadows and certainly have no hope. In a sense the SADDUCEES defended the beliefs about the condition of the dead and the impossibility of the resurrection manifested in Ecclesiastes.

The later writings of the Old Testament, including some Psalms, and some important, though difficult, passages of the PROPHETS, attest to an increasing interest in and more hopeful view of the afterlife. The abode of the dead increasingly becomes an intermediate state of the soul, not a terminal fate. Certain passages of ISAIAH 26 and 19 and Wisdom (3:1ff, 4:16ff, 5:2–23) attest not only to the existence of the souls with self consciousness, but with a degree of enjoyment and life-giving relationship with God. This is the case with Psalms 49, 73, and 16, where the souls of the dead have substantive individuality. The Jewish idea of the survival of the individual soul is much older than the notion of the resurrection of the body (Sayés 2006, p. 49). The PHARISEES subscribed to these developed, more hopeful notions of the afterlife. The notion of the resurrection also limited the length of time of passage through the state of death.

Jewish intertestamental literature, especially 4 Maccabees and the Book of Jubilees, speaks of immortal souls. These books are much closer to the cultural world that Jesus lived in than Qohelet (Sayés 2006, p. 55). 1 ENOCH speaks of different abodes for the dead: The righteous are not with the wicked, whereas 2 BARUCH conceives of Sheol as a place where all souls are guarded until final judgment. 4 Esdras speaks of two abodes of the dead: one where the souls experience joys, and the other where the wicked experience pain. It speaks of the womb of death begetting souls in travail (cf. 4 Esdras 4:40–43). The Psalms of SOLOMON speaks of a Sheol from which the just souls rise and of one for the wicked where they remain forever in punishment. 1 Enoch speaks of a PARADISE where the Patriarchs are living, and where the souls expect a MESSIAH (22:9–13, 61:12, 70:4).

Some of these writings speak of visits to Sheol by famous personages. 1 Enoch speaks of a special figure who will come to the abode of the dead. The relationship of the angels to the abode of the dead is also quite developed in this apocryphal Jewish literature at the end of the first century BC and the beginning of the Christian era.

New Testament Imagery. Jesus himself refers to the abode of the dead in various ways. Jesus speaks of the Hell of damnation rather frequently, but here He refers to the abode of the dead who await the resurrection and REDEMPTION. When He charges St. PETER with the keys of the Kingdom, He speaks of His power over the gates of Hell (cf. Mt 16:18). He speaks of the three days in the womb of the Earth, just as JONAH was in the womb of the whale (Mt 12: 40). He also speaks of the paradisiacal state of LAZARUS, who dines with ABRAHAM (cf. Lk 16:19–31). He speaks of the ransacking of the powerful man who does not guard his belongings (Mk 3:27). Jesus walking over the raging waves of the Sea of Galilee gives a powerful reference to His power over death, so frequently symbolized in the Old Testament as chaotic waters (Mk 6:46–51). His power over death is clearly affirmed not only in the revivals of the dead that He performed but also in His statements that even the dead shall hear His voice and that He is the Resurrection Himself; He is Life Himself.

The New Testament shows a notable reserve in describing the specific circumstances of the Resurrection. There is a certain reticence to describe what happened to Christ during His disembodied state. The first witnesses of the risen Christ made use of the available Old Testament imagery of the abode of the dead to express their conviction that Jesus the Christ was the universal SAVIOR of mankind. Preaching the mystery, the central event of Christian faith, could not just remain with the empty tomb. If Jesus had extended His powerful realm over the Abyss of the Dead, how were the APOSTLES to proclaim it? The Psalms were amply harvested for imagery expressing the triumph, not only of the Creator God, but of Jesus Himself as the Victor over the powers of evil, death, and sin.

The credal statement "He rose from the dead (anastasis ek nekron)" (1 Thes 1:10; Mk 9:9; Mt 17:9, 27:64; Lk 24:46; Jn 2:22, 20:9, 21:14) already implies the abode, not just an empty cemetery tomb. The images used by the first preachers to describe the Resurrection refer to the abode of the dead. Jesus, the Firstborn from the dead, can only be understood in reference to PROVERBS 30:16: "the sterile womb has finally given birth to One." In Acts 2:24ff, St. Peter speaks of the ropes of Hades not being able to retain the Messiah.

The katabasis/anabasis scheme presented by St. PAUL in Romans 10:6–7, Philippians 2:10, and Ephesians 4:8–10 presents a humiliating descent that starts with the Incarnation and culminates with the death-descent of the soul to the lower regions of the Earth, only to become the starting point of the Resurrection to the highest abode of the living God, from whence Christ had commenced His coming down in order to be taken up. All of those states of His life were salvific. St. Gregory Naziazen's soteriological principle must be observed: What was not assumed was not saved. To save the dead, Christ chose to share their condition as a disembodied soul.

Other New Testament texts also imply the Descent, the victory of Christ over death, in poetic language that implies liberation from the abode of the dead. In Colossians 2:15, for example, He has taken captives to HEAVEN, much like emperors used to display in public their defeated enemies. In Hebrews 2:14–15, Jesus liberated from the fear of death those who awaited SALVATION and had to wait for Him in order to enter the Heavenly sanctuary. St. Matthew in 27:51–54 speaks of the power of the dying Jesus' voice to crack open the stones, the tombs, and the veil of the Temple as the direct cause of the rising of the just, who will enter JERUSALEM after the Resurrection of Christ. The APOCALYPSE also clearly states that Jesus, who has subjected all creatures in the air, on the sea, on the ground, and under it has the keys of Hades (Rev 1:18). The much more ambiguous texts that literally speak of the Descent and Jesus' preaching to the dead in 1 Peter 3:18ff and 4:6 brittle with serious problems and, with the exception of CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, are not used until the COUNTER REFORMATION as texts that avow this article of faith in the Scriptures.

Apocryphal Imagery. The rich apocryphal literature of both Jewish and Greek Christians delighted in describing the combat between Jesus and SATAN. Indeed it is from one such apocryphal book, the Acts of Pilate (fourth century), also called the Gospel of Nicodemus, that Christian iconography, preaching, and theater derived or strengthened some, though not all, of the best known and recurring imagery of the Harrowing of Hell (Kartsonis 1986, pp. 13–16). Jean Daniélou goes as far as saying that the Descent article is foreign to the New Testament and is purely a Jewish Christian dogmatic development that was accepted by common tradition (1964, p. 233). He says that the Gospel of Peter 41–42 is the first writing that speaks explicitly and openly about the Descent and only in the sense of Jesus preaching to the Old Testament (OT) saints. The next stage of development is the actual salvation of these saints, and the final development will be the overthrow of the demonic powers and Death itself.

The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, in particular that of Levi 4 and 18, speaks of the Messiah liberating the just from the power of Death. The Testaments of Dan and Benjamin 8 also attest the Descent mystery. The Odes of Solomon are also rich in depicting Christ's liberation of the Old Testament just, especially the very beautiful Odes 42:11–20 and 17:7–17 (Quenot 1997, p. 75), where the actions of Christ are noted in detail: Jesus descends to Sheol, proclaims His victory over the Satanic powers, delivers the saints held captive, places His Name on their heads and their faith in His heart, and ascends to heaven with them. Ode 17 portrays the encounter between Jesus and the saints as a baptismal mystery. Ode 22 also praises the mighty Jesus who descends and ascends from the bonds of death. The apocryphon of Jeremiah, a Christian midrash, speaks of how God remembered the dead and Jesus went down unto them to proclaim the good news.

Iconographic Tradition of the Descent. Scriptural imagery offers firm notions of the importance of the redemptive work of Christ's soul during His time as a disembodied soul. But Sacred TRADITION upholds the justified utility of icons that provide illustrative visual images (not just verbal images) that correspond to the KERYGMA as representations. Holy images often enable the faithful to grasp intuitively what the richest texts are unable to express fully. Early Christian artists exhibited a marked reluctance to depict the representation of the Resurrection of Christ (Kartsonis 1986, p. 19). They frequently used allegorical or symbolic representation of it (with OT scenes such as Jonah's emergence from the whale, the raising of Lazarus, or the phoenix), but they resisted description of it beyond its notional assertion; indeed there seems to have been an iconographic vacuum, even though secondary events surrounding the Resurrection were portrayed, such as the Marys bringing the myrrh, or the tomb filled with exploding light and overthrown guards, or the angels announcing the empty tomb (Kartsonis 1986, pp. 21–22). The artists were much more reticent than the preachers to expand on the theme of the activities of Christ's soul during His state as a dead man. But, the image of the CRUCIFIXION was a relative latecomer in Christian art as well, since it appears to have only been represented in a descriptive manner in the fifth century (Kartsonis 1986, p. 33). It seems Christological controversies, in particular the need for Christ to remain perfect God and perfect Man not only in life, but also in death, finally overcame the initial hesitation to represent the dead, dying, or rising Christ (Kartsonis 1986, p. 38).

The Harrowing of Hell has a very important presence in the iconographical traditions of the ROMAN CATHOLIC, Byzantine, Coptic, and Ethiopian churches. These liturgical traditions accent different aspects of the mystery that is presented to the faithful. The Roman Catholic tradition is rooted in late Patristic representations of the mystery. The first dated icon of the Descent is a fresco at Santa Maria Antica on the Roman Forum (seventh century). The mandorla, or almond-shaped explosion of light that surrounds Christ, who has a scroll (of the GOSPEL) in His hand, is a forceful illustration of the will and energy of Christ's divinity, united to His soul, as He tramples Hades, depicted as a muscular ancient pagan god, and then raises ADAM from his tomb (Kartsonis 1986, p. 71). EVE is present but next to Adam, in a secondary, passive role. The dark naked body of the trampled Hades contrasts significantly with the lightness of the LOGOS. The liturgical use of Psalm 24 encouraged the association of the door symbolism with the theme of the Descent (Kartsonis 1986, p. 77). The Descent is also depicted in eighth-century frescoes in the Lower Basilica of St. Clement in Rome, accentuating the theme of Christ bringing light into the darkness of Hell. Since this representation emphasizes the triumph of Jesus over Satan, they seem to adapt ready-made allegorical models of imperial iconography (Kartsonis 1986, p. 10). The scroll is replaced by a staffed cross, and fiery flames appear in some other eighth-century Roman portrayals of the Descent (Kartsonis 1986, p. 83).

The figures of King DAVID and Solomon appear in the early ninth-century depiction of the descent in the chapel of St. Zeno in St. Prassede in Rome. It also offers the first surviving depiction of an angel in the Descent mystery. During the MIDDLE AGES, beginning with the ninth century, this mystery continuously adds triumphal twists to the struggle between Jesus and the Devil, the raiding siege by Christ of Satan's abode, and the manifestation of His superior power over the souls of the dead. This includes the fettering of Satan as well as the inclusion of angels beating down the minions. The souls of the Old Testament saints are usually portrayed as naked beings that are liberated from their roasting condition by a warrior Christ who crushes a trampled Satan or stabs him with a patriarchal Cross or the flag of the Risen One. The hellish topography of the abode of the dead is overemphasized in the West, concomitant to the confusion between the lower world (inferus) and Hell itself (infernus). Hell/Hades is sometimes represented as a fortress that is assailed by Christ. In other instances the abode of the dead is represented as Leviathan's open mouth or Hell riddled with flames. But by the eleventh century, another representation of the Resurrection of Christ started to take firm root in the West: Christ rising bodily from the tomb (Quenot 1997, p. 74).

The Scholastics gave a new twist to the image of the abode of the dead when they began speaking of this as the LIMBO of the Fathers, Patriarchs, and Prophets. This transient limbo was an effort to distinguish their abode from the state of damnation, of eternal suffering. The image of Abraham's bosom, which comes from the parable of Lazarus in Luke, also distinguished the abode of the holy dead from the fate of the damned, Hell itself. Jesus harrowed, emptied, redeemed the souls of the just whom Satan unjustly prevented from entering the gates of heaven that Adam's sin had closed. The representation of the bosom of Abraham was thus another version of the Descent mystery.

The Descent became a common iconographical composition, especially in Sinai and Cappadocia between the eighth and tenth centuries (Quenot 1997, p. 73). The pictorialization of the Resurrection in the Byzantine iconographical tradition makes its appearance later than the other major scenes in the Christological cycle that eventually configured an important part of the iconostasis. It does not draw its imagery from the texts of the Gospel, yet it achieved a great popularity in all the Eastern Churches (Kartsonis 1986, p. 3). The image that finally crystallized in the Middle Byzantine period, in the tenth century, shows Jesus extending His hand to touch the life-giving pulse of Adam. Though compositional variants exist of Christ's attitude toward Adam, the essential message is still the same: Jesus, the Creator Logos Incarnate, is re-creating Man. The icon refers simultaneously to the Resurrection of Christ as well as to Adam and all mankind (Kartsonis 1986, pp. 5, 6). Jesus died and rose for all.

During the early RENAISSANCE in Italy the depiction of the Descent became more historically illustrative, abandoning the medieval notion of naked and almost anonymous Patriarchs being snatched from the devil by the victorious Lord. In all probability this is due to a strong Byzantine influence. The particular Patriarchs and Prophets tend to be identified with individual traits or signs: NOAH with his Ark, Abraham with his knife over the head of Isaac, JOSHUA with his military helmet, St. JOHN THE BAPTIST with his disheveled hair, MOSES with the two "horns of light" or the Ten COMMANDMENTS, David with his crown and harp, and some prophets with a scroll from their announcements concerning the Messiah's mission.

In the middle of the sixteenth century, in particular in Italy, the representation of the mystery became more problematic as the nude figures of the Old Testament saints became more sensuous and distractive. Even in Spanish religious painting of the seventeenth century, which was very discreet and austere, some sensuality accompanies this representation of Christ's descent into the Limbo of the Fathers. In Latin American religious art, the Descent was still represented rather sparingly from the sixteenth century to the eighteenth century in both the viceroyalties of Mexico and Peru.

During the Middle Ages and into the Baroque period the Descent was also present in dramatic performances, especially those celebrated during HOLY WEEK. As late as 1803 an Italian musician named Antonio Salieri (1750–1825) composed an oratorio with a libretto written by Luigi Prividali, with the theme of Jesus in the Limbo of the Fathers.

By the sixteenth century the Eastern churches also started to borrow from the Latin West the rising from the tomb motif (Quenot 1997, p. 74), though at times they combined it with the Descent and also the saints entering Heaven with Jesus. The affirmation of the holiness of the Old Testament saints, and their representation, however, resurged during the nineteenth century in Catholic churches, and neo-Gothic stirrings arose even among the Anglicans.

The Coptic and Ethiopian iconographical traditions are heavily indebted to the Byzantine tradition, and, after the sixteenth century, to Latin themes as well. In their particular manner, they also exult the triumphal Christ who tramples Death and raises the frequently naked Adam and Eve who cling to His cloak. Many variations on a common theme also appear in this iconographic tradition.

Mystery of Descent Assailed by Protestants. Martin LUTHER abhorred the distinction between soul and body to such an extent that he did not admit to an intermediate state of the soul after death and before the general resurrection of the dead. Most other Protestants also questioned the Biblical foundations of this article of faith. They were distraught by icons and more so by some of the medieval representations of the dramatic harrowing of Hell, which was tainted by supposedly non-Biblical, Greek, or philosophical falsification of the faith. They abandoned this mystery altogether. With the advent of radical "enlightened" rational Biblical exegesis, any belief in an intermediate state of the soul was considered a betrayal of Biblical faith.

The mystery of the Descent was defended and explained in the Catechism of the Council of Trent for Pastors, "The Roman Catechism," (Part I, Article V). However, the Protestant attack on the mystery as well as the immodest representations of late Renaissance artists explains the gradual visual disappearance of this article of faith from the iconographical landscape of the Roman Catholic Church. After the sixteenth century, the representation of the Resurrection was increasingly limited in Western art to Christ's bodily rising from the tomb. In this image the rich soteriological implications of Christ's triumph over Death for mankind are not present at all. History is not explicitly or visibly redeemed by Jesus, and His Resurrection is only a future hope for mankind, until the Second Coming. This hesitation to visually represent the Descent also explains many of the faithful's lack of understanding of the contents of the creedal statement.

Sacred Liturgy and Catechism. It is worthy of note that one of three new Eucharistic prayers approved after the Second Vatican Council by a Decree of the Congregation of Rites dated May 23, 1968, as one of the four options in the Roman MISSAL, Eucharistic Prayer IV, itself an adaptation of the so-called Alexandrian Anaphora of St. Basil, speaks explicitly of Christ's descent to the dead in the anamnesis. Since the Mass' Eucharistic prayers have definitive creedal value and are reliable witnesses of the Church's faith, this solemn recognition of the importance of this mystery of faith is very significant. The Congregation for Divine Worship in its 2002 Directory for Popular Piety and Liturgy attempted to reintroduce the contemplation of the mystery of the Descent alongside the contemplation of the dead body of Christ and of his Mother's hope in His Resurrection (section 146).

The new Catechism of the Catholic Church (nos. 631–637) also offered a synthesis of the images of the Descent and reaffirmed its role in the general scope of belief not only in Christ's true experience of death but also in its soteriological significance as an essential aspect of His Paschal mystery and in the triumph of God's love over death.

Recent Papal Statements. As part of his catechesis of the CREED, Pope John Paul II in his General Audience of January 11, 1989, devoted an entire AUDIENCE to explaining the Descent of Christ into the Limbo of the Fathers. In his June 20, 2001, explanation of the LITURGY OF THE HOURS, he also referred to the Descent connotations of Psalm 23 (24). Pope John Paul II, when he spoke of Hell as a condition, not a place, made a significant contribution to a more correct understanding of eschatological realities. The abode of the dead is also a state of the soul of dead people. In his catechesis of the Canticle of King Hezekiah in Isaiah 38 on February 27, 2002, he also referred to the Descent. In his November 2001 visit to the Parish of Santa Maria, Mater Dei, in ROME, he also referred to the Descent mystery.

Pope Benedict XVI also spoke of the Descent mystery as part of the celebration of the Eucharist (Angelus, September 11, 2005). In his homily on the occasion of the baptism of some adults in ST. PETER'S BASILICA in the Easter Vigil on April 7, 2007, he also mentioned the Descent mystery. In his ENCYCLICAL on Hope, Spe Salvi (37), he speaks of the Descent as a very personal, dark suffering that makes a human being experience profound solitude and abandonment. "Why have you abandoned me?" cries Psalm 22(21). Pope Benedict XVI is convinced this Psalm is given full meaning by Jesus on the Cross as the very psychological expression of the experience of Descent itself.

Recent Theological Developments. After the Tridentine and post-Tridentine theologians' defense of Descent mystery, especially Robert BELLARMINE, Francisco SUÁREZ, and Dionysio Petavio, the Descent was left in limbo itself. But in the twentieth century, a significant interest in the explanation of this article of the creed occurred. French scholars stressed the need to demythologize this article of faith and return to the core or original sense of the mystery (Christian Duquoc, Jean Galot, and Louis Lochet). Hell is not a reference to a childish view of cosmology but a way of describing man's relationship to God. Some stretch the mystery's content into a personal, spiritual dimension: Jesus descends to my hell, my vices, my dark spaces, my unconscious secrets, my solitude, my indifferences and alienations (Houziaux 2003, pp. 214–215).

Italian and Spanish theologians did not pay much attention to the topic and instead repeated the classical and traditional affirmations about it. Marcello Bordoni insisted that more than another way of saying that Jesus truly died, this article is an intrinsic part of Jesus' Paschal experience, an essential aspect of His Ascension, emphasizing the Greek insistence on it being part of Christ's universal triumph over the bonds of death for all mankind, not just for himself (Bordoni 1986, pp. 535–537). An American theologian, Martin Connell, however, affirmed the need to preach the mystery of the Descent as a necessary counterbalance to a culture that denies death itself.

Among late-twentieth-century theologians, however, the German speaking seem the most interested in giving fresh, alternate explanations of the Descent. Karl RAHNER, for example, identifies Hell with the state of cosmic-universal death, the ultimate consequence of Christ's Incarnation. Hans KÜNG eliminates this article altogether as having no real content for modern man, but meaning only that Jesus really died. In his view it has no reference to psychological suffering, and the Cross itself is enough to offer salvation to all. There is no clear New Testament affirmation of this activity of Christ after His death and before His Resurrection. Hans Urs von BALTHASAR discusses the Descent mystery as central to the Paschal TRIDUUM, the core of the whole Christological edifice. He avoids the term Descent in favor of Christ's "going to the dead" to evangelize them, as 1 Peter 3:19 suggests. It is an essential soteriological event: Jesus' proclamation and realization of God's triumph over death and suffering on behalf of all those who had died before him and would die afterward. The Descent is Jesus' solidarity with all mankind in death, the utmost kenotic experience, His experience of the state of extreme suffering, the poena sensus of the damned.

Born on Holy Saturday, April 16, 1927, Joseph Ratzinger was already bound by his birth day to the Descent mystery, celebrated in the Church the very day he was born. Ratzinger has written insistently on eschatological topics and co-authored with Johann Auer a dogmatic theology course. For this course he wrote the volume on eschatology: Eschatology: Death and Eternal Life. There he gives a synthetic exposition of the theology of death both in the various schools of Hebraic theological reflection and in the diverse books of the Jewish Scriptures as well as in the New Testament. He develops a fundamentally dialogical view of life: Man is created for communion with God. Since Ratzinger stresses that, for an Israelite believer, life is communion with God, death is not non-existence, but it is "no life." He criticizes the Lutheran teaching that eliminated the intermediate state of the soul after death and before the general resurrection (Ratzinger 2007, pp. 119–120, 247–249). He is rightly critical of the unsustainable theory developed by some theologians who envision an immediate resurrection after death, and he also dismisses the shaky supposedly Biblical rejection of the immortality of the soul (Ratzinger 2007, pp. 119–161, 241–274).

Ratzinger extensively addresses the notion of Sheol or Hades and its concomitant issue of the immortality of the soul not only in the Scriptures but also in the FATHERS OF THE CHURCH and in the medieval Magisterium. His description of the redemptive value of the death of Christ is reinforced by some passages of the later Old Testament books, where death is not perceived as a disaster or as an abolition of any relationship with the living, or with God Himself. In the passages of the Suffering Servant on Isaiah, as well as in the books of Wisdom, DANIEL, and Maccabees, death and suffering are given a purifying and redemptive value. The death of holy believers can have a vicarious value on behalf of others. Death is not only a biological necessity but a spiritual happening. It strikes at the heart of every human being's desire for eternity, of connectedness with God and others. Death indeed was the expulsion from the sphere of love and relationships. Jesus' cry on the Cross, "Why have you abandoned me?" (Mk 15:34), is his verbalization of his sense of impending death. Life for Jesus is full communion and dialogue with the Father. Death is thus absolute disconnectedness with the Father. Jesus' sharing the experience of being dead literally makes love triumph over death, because it transforms the state of non-communion with the Father into a situation where He is now present in the Son in the midst of death. Paradise is being with Christ in the Father's love. Ratzinger thus defends the redemptive power of the Descent in a very original manner.

In his well-known Introduction to Christianity, Ratzinger devotes a subsection to the mystery of the Descent within the explanation of the creedal formulas regarding Jesus Christ in chapter 9. He affirms that the traditional Scriptural texts that evidence this mystery are too difficult and ambiguous to ground this truth; thus he proposes a text that has no Patristic or Medieval precedence: Jesus' cry from the Cross (Mk 15:34) is his verbalization of his Descent unto Hell. Jesus' Descent is God's silence. God is not only Word, but He is also silence. When Jesus dies, God embraces man's universal fear of the solitude of death, of existential insecurity. Hell and death speak of the same absolute solitude where no voice penetrates; the gates that not even love could break are shattered by Jesus' entering utter solitude. After Jesus rises from the dead, death itself is no longer hellish.

In his 2007 book Jesus of Nazareth, Ratzinger speaks frequently, vividly, and insightfully about the aspects of the Descent that are already present in the earthly life and ministry of Jesus. He sees the anticipation of Jesus' Descent in his going into the "liquid sepulcher" of the JORDAN's waters when He was baptized, which Byzantine iconography sometimes represented akin to the cave of the dead (cf. Lk 11:22) and which the Liturgy of the Hours evokes as part of the theology of the Cross. Ratzinger correctly recalls the Old Testament association of the dangerous waters of the ocean with death, vanquished by the Creator God, and again put in their place when the PEOPLE OF GOD crossed the RED SEA. In His Baptism Jesus plunged into a sign of his death (the waters of the Jordan River) only to rise victorious over its prefiguration.

When he discusses the temptations of Jesus in the Judean desert, Ratzinger suggests that Jesus' Descent does not refer only to his personal state of death but to his walking through human history, from its beginning in Adam, to suffer its total consequences and thus be able to redeem it. Jesus did not jump from the roof of the Temple, but he was willing to jump into the utter abandonment and defenseless solitude of the dead as an act of God's love toward man. When Ratzinger explains the Beatitude concerning the pure of heart that shall see God (cf. Mt 5:8), he says that Jesus was able to ascend to the vision of God in his Resurrection because he was first able to "descend" into humble service and then unto the very Cross of death. When he explains the parable of Lazarus and the rich man from Luke 16:19–31, Ratzinger underlines the fact that Jesus speaks of the intermediate state of the soul between death and resurrection and, in so doing, approves the essential truth of this notion, which is a provisional bosom of Abraham, not the GEHENNA of eternal damnation.

I. EARLY CHURCH

The word αἵρεσις in classical Greek signified a school or party. It was used by the Hellenists to designate a philosophical school and by Josephus to describe the Jewish theological sects.

The primitive Christians were considered at first another school or sect within Judaism (Acts 24:5; 14:28, 22). But among themselves the early Christians quickly distinguished between those who accepted the doctrine as preached by the Apostles and received by the Church, or assembly of the faithful, and those who tried to adapt the Christian message to their own personal, doctrinal, or disciplinary notions (1 Cor 11:19; Gal 5:20). What the Church rejected in thought or deed was heretical. Thus both the doctrines propagated by the Gnostic sects and the QUARTODECIMAN adherence to the Jewish paschal calendar were condemned as heretical (Hippolytus, Philos. 7:18, 19).

Second and Third Centuries. During the second century little distinction was made between heresy and SCHISM, and the criterion of true faith and practice appealed to was that of the Roman Church. The earliest collection of heretical doctrines was made by JUSTIN MARTYR in his Syntagma against all heresies. This work is mentioned by Justin himself (1 Apol. 26:8). RENAEUS in his Exposé and Refutation of the False Gnosis, usually quoted as Adversus haereses, used the Syntagma of Justin and mentions a Contra Marcionem that appears to be part of Justin's work (Adversus haereses 4.19.9). The exposé concentrates on the Valentinian Gnostics but also gives a résumé of the beginnings of Gnosticism with the teachings of Simon, Menander, and other early sectaries.

During the reign of Pope ZEPHYRINUS (199–217), HIPPOLYTUS OF ROME wrote a Syntagma directed against all heresies; it is cited by Eusebius of Caesarea (Ecclesiastical History 6.22) and by Photius (Bibliotheca codex 121). A fragment of this work, the Contra Noetum, has been discovered and published by Pierre Nautin. Hippolytus wrote also an Elenchus or collection of thirty-three heresies from that of the Naassenians to that of Noetus, together with their refutations. It is known under the incorrect title of the Philosophumena. The author traces each doctrinal aberration to a school of false philosophy but in general follows Irenaeus for his information. The work seems likewise to have been synthesized by TERTULLIAN as an appendix to his De praescriptione. Jerome (De Viris illustribus 74) attributes an Adversus omnes haereses to VICTORINUS OF PETTAU (d. 304).

Treatises of Epiphanius and Augustine. Epiphanius of Constantia between 374 and 377 composed a Panarion or box of antidotes against all heresies. He names and refutes eighty heresies, relying on Irenaeus and Hippolytus for the older doctrinal errors, and citing the writings of heretics themselves for the more recent heresies. The Panarion was used by Filastrius of Brescia (d. 397) for his Liber de haeresibus (385–391).

Toward 428 AUGUSTINE wrote a De haeresibus for the deacon Quodvultdeus; it is in the main a catalog of eighty-eight heresies. The last eight cited, however, including Pelagianism, give evidence of his personal study and knowledge. THEODORET OF CYR (d. c. 460) wrote a compendium of heretical fables (c. 451) in five books, claiming that he culled these false doctrines from his reading of the early Church Fathers. For ARIUS, Eudoxius, NESTORIUS, and EUTYCHES, he cites primary evidence. At the close of the patristic period, JOHN DAMASCENE (d. 749) lists a catalog of heresies as the second part of his Source of Knowledge. Only the three final heresies mentioned, namely, Islam, ICONOCLASM, and the Paulician heresy, are examined from contemporary evidence.

Church Condemnations of Early Heresies. Popes, bishops, councils, and creeds condemned various heresies in the early Church, either directly or indirectly. In the second century, Marcion's repudiation of the entire Old Testament and all the Gospels, except that of Luke, was censured by St. Irenaeus (c. 130–200), the Bishop of Lyons, who affirmed the four Gospel canon and the scriptural status of the Old Testament. The Council of Rome in 382 condemned the Trinitarian heresy of Sabellius (the reduction of the three divine Persons to three modes or names) as well as Tritheism, the understanding of the Trinity as several gods (cf. Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 154, 176). Pope Leo I, in his letter to Bishop Turibius of Astorga of July 21, 447, condemned Patripassianism, the heretical belief that the Father suffered as the Son on the Cross (Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 284).

The Symbol of Nicea-Constantinople of 381 proclaimed Jesus as "true God from true God, begotten not made, consubstantial to the Father" (Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 150) in direct opposition to the heresy of Arius (c. 260–336), who taught that the Word of God was a divine-like being created in time. The Council of Ephesus of 431 condemned the heresy of Nestorianism, which rejected Mary as Theotokos (birthgiver or Mother of God) and reduced the Incarnation to the moral union of two persons, the Word of God and the man Jesus. The Council of Chalcedon of 451 reaffirmed the condemnation of Nestorianism and also repudiated Monophysitism, the heresy that only one nature exists in Christ after the Incarnation (Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 302). The Third Council of Constantinople of 681 condemned Monothelitism, the heresy that teaches that only one will exists in Christ (Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 558–559). The Second Council of Nicea, in 787, repudiated Iconoclasm, the heresy that rejects the use of sacred images or icons (Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 600–603). The heresy of Pelagianism was not only rejected by St. Augustine; the Council of Ephesus also censured it in 431, via the condemnation of Celestius, the follower of Pelagius (Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 268).

II. MEDIEVAL PERIOD

During the Middle Ages both eastern and western Europe were essentially Christian societies. Thus, heresy, a body of doctrine substantially differing in some aspect from the doctrine taught by the Church, had reverberations in the secular world as well as in the Church. The early Christian community, essentially a minority Church (especially in the West) before Constantine's Edict of Religious Toleration (313), had been shaken in the fourth and fifth centuries by such major heresies as ARIANISM, DONATISM, NESTORIANISM, MONOPHYSITISM, and, in the West, by Pelagianism. In the sixth and seventh centuries, while Europe was absorbed in regrouping after the mass migrations of the barbarian nations, the BYZANTINE EMPIRE remained split over the question of Monophysitism, complicated also by the controversy over the THREE CHAPTERS, and the East turned to MONOTHELITISM in its attempt to reestablish religious unity throughout the empire.

Earlier Middle Ages. When the West revived its interest in learning in the eighth and ninth centuries—a phenomenon often labeled the CAROLINGIAN RENAISSANCE, but with its religious facets called the Carolingian Reformation—new study of the inherited theology of late antiquity resulted in the exposure of the first truly "medieval" heresies. The FILIOQUE controversy had overtones of heresy, as did the contemporary predestination and Eucharistic controversies, the latter spearheaded by the opponents PASCHASIUS RADBERTUS and RATRAMNUS. ADOPTIONISM flourished and died. The pantheistic concept of the world, inherent in the Stoic and Neoplatonic philosophy behind Arianism, seems to have received some impetus from the writings of JOHN SCOTUS ERIUGENA—although it is probable that this was the result of misunderstanding Eriugena's thought. At the same time the BYZANTINE CHURCH and State were convulsed by the great struggle over heretical ICONOCLASM.

High Middle Ages. With the revitalization of all facets of life in Europe during the High Middle Ages, heresy once again became an issue in the religious and secular worlds. Despite the CLUNIAC and GREGORIAN reforms, the eleventh century saw the return of the Eucharistic heresy in BERENGARIUS OF TOURS, who adopted the older teachings of Ratramnus. During the twelfth century—the century of the CRUSADES, of the CISTERCIANS, and of the nascent medieval universities—the CATHARI, the most serious heretical threat with which the Middle Ages had to contend, arose. The religious equilibrium of the early twelfth century became unbalanced by the sporadical heresies of PETER OF BRUYS and his PETROBRUSIANS, of HENRY OF LAUSANNE, and of ARNOLD OF BRESCIA, all of whom advanced certain antisacramental and antisacerdotal ideas, and by AMALRIC OF BÈNE and his AMALRICIANS, who were essentially pantheists. But only the Cathari, with their roots in the DUALISM of the BOGOMILS and PAULICIANS, had a viable doctrinal framework. The heresy, originally Eastern, was brought to Europe after the Second Crusade and by 1175 counted members in northern France, the Rhineland, and Italy, but especially in southern France, the Midi. There, the orthodox Christian Church waged spiritual and material war on the strongholds of the Cathari (or ALBIGENSES). The Cistercians, the Albigensian Crusade, the inquisition, the University of Toulouse, and, most importantly, the MENDICANT ORDERS finally proved effective, and by 1300 Catharism had been defeated in Europe.

The same twelfth century also saw the rise of serious non-Manichaean heresies. Although heretical fringe groups, such as the Judaizing Passagini and the followers of radicals (e.g., ÉON OF STELLA or TANCHELM at Antwerp), were of only passing interest, a number of heresies arose from the contemporary demand for extreme Church reform in the spirit of apostolic poverty and preaching. These heresies shook the religious foundations of all Europe. Although the same spirit had motivated orthodox reform interests among the PATARINES, HUMILIATI, and FRANCISCANS, the original ideal of evangelical poverty deviated in the WALDENSES into an antisacerdotal heresy. In 1173 Valdés of Lyons, a layman, renounced all his worldly possessions, took a vow of poverty, and began preaching to the people. As the Poor Men of Lyons grew more numerous, Pope LUCIUS III and Emperor FREDERICK I BARBAROSSA agreed at Verona in 1184 that Waldenses who preached without permission or who attacked the Church's hierarchy or Sacraments would be branded as heretics, but that others would be accepted as orthodox. Thus small sects of Waldenses stayed within the Church, although the greater number eventually fell into antihierarchical heresy. The Waldenses were never as strong numerically as the contemporary Cathari; they were banned from the empire in 1253, and from that time on their membership decreased except in the valleys of the Piedmont and the Briançonnais, where they survive into the twenty-first century.

The Church's Magisterium reacted to the Waldenses and the Cathars on several occasions. In 1208 Pope Innocent III prescribed a Profession of Faith for the Waldenses (Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 790–797), and in 1215 the Fourth Lateran Council proclaimed a Profession of Faith (Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 800–802) that specifically repudiated the errors of the Albigensians and the Cathars concerning the creation of the material world and the origin of evil.

In the twelfth, but especially in the thirteenth, century, groups of heretical spiritualists became discernible in European society. Molded by essentially Catharist ideas wedded to the ideology of JOACHIM OF FIORE, the various groups all adopted an extreme stand on poverty as a protest against the possessions of the Church. Thus the Franciscan SPIRITUALS, as corrupted into the FRATICELLI under ANGELUS CLARENUS, were declared heretical by Pope JOHN XXII. Amalrician ideas, now combined with rejection of the sacramental Church, lived on among the BROTHERS AND SISTERS OF THE FREE SPIRIT who were found in Swabia and along the Rhine from the twelfth to the fifteenth centuries. A similarly oriented group were the APOSTOLICI, founded by Segarelli of Parma (burned 1300) and his successor Fra DOLCINO (burned 1307).

Later Middle Ages. The major heresy of the fourteenth century was that initiated by John WYCLIF, who adopted Berengarius's Eucharistic position concerning the permanence of bread and wine after consecration and propounded questionable doctrine concerning the Church and the ownership of property. He was silenced in May 1377 by Pope GREGORY XI and was finally condemned after his denial of TRANSUBSTANTIATION (c. 1380). The LOLLARDS, who adopted Wyclif's radical views on lordship, grace, the Sacraments, and the temporal power of the papacy, ceased to exist effectively after 1431.

In the meantime, however, Wyclif's teachings became of primary importance in Bohemia, where they influenced John HUS, leader of the reform movement in Prague. The Council of CONSTANCE in 1415 censured forty-five errors attributed to Wyclif and thirty attributed to Hus (Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 1151–1195, 1201–1230). Although Hus was condemned and burned as a heretic at Constance, some scholars believe his only formal heresy was his rejection of the primacy of the pope's jurisdiction. His followers, the HUSSITES, adopted the full teaching of Wyclif and abandoned orthodoxy as they denied transubstantiation and other traditional Catholic teachings. Emperor SIGISMUND led crusades against the Hussites for fifteen years until their defeat in 1436; the Catholic UTRAQUISTS (moderate Hussites), however, survived alongside the orthodox Catholics in Bohemia until Lutheranism arose. The radical Hussite ideas were revived in the BOHEMIAN BRETHREN, a group that provided a direct link between the Hussites and the Protestants of the sixteenth century.

Repression. The medieval concept of a kingdom as a morally unified society explains the cooperation of Church and secular power in repressing heresy during the Middle Ages. Medieval man believed that civil society, to survive, had to adhere to a well-defined moral system. When HUGH OF SAINT-VICTOR declared that "the spiritual power must institute the temporal that it might exist," and when Pope BONIFACE VIII asserted in UNAM SANCTAM that the Church had both swords, spiritual and temporal, they meant that the contemporary civil powers, deriving their justification from Christian moral doctrine, depended necessarily on the fountainhead of that doctrine. Thus, temporal power was expected to react against doctrines that undermined its own position. To cite an extreme example, when the Cathari branded pregnancy and normal sexual intercourse as Satan's work or when they counseled their members to commit suicide (endura), contemporary society felt that such action could not go unpunished. The Church's attitude toward the challenges of heresy resulted in much conflict between men, such as the eleventh-century Bishop WAZO OF LIÈGE or BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX, who insisted that faith was a matter of persuasion, and others, such as Pope INNOCENT III or St. DOMINIC, who approved of the Church repressing heresy. Similar tension is found in the two attitudes of St. AUGUSTINE, one stressing the voluntary character of faith and the other underlining the right of society to compel its members to good actions. Prominent medieval Christians realized that the repression of heresy remained essentially a pastoral problem and that a delicate balance was required between justice and charity: leniency in the chastisement of heresy could endanger the faith of others, but excess zeal in administering justice might be a major impediment to the apostolate. In practice, the Church's medieval antiheresy campaign adopted the process of legatine inquest and the cooperation of ecclesiastical and civil power to stamp out heresy that had gained a popular following.

III. MODERN PERIOD

Heresies upon condemnation do not die but reappear, often with vigorous new growth. Thus the primitivism (the search for a more authentic Christianity in the infancy of the Church) that is found in evangelical Protestantism, as well as Modernism, was already a cry of the Montanists of the second century. The Neoplatonist mysticism of the medieval Beghards and Beguines, condemned at the Council of Vienne (1311), appeared once again in the behavior of the Spanish ALUMBRADOS of the sixteenth century and again later in the Quietist movement. Conciliarism, formulated at the University of Paris by Conrad of Gelnhausen and Henry of Langenstein and expressed in an extreme form by PETER OF AILLY and JEAN GERSON at the Council of Constance (1414–1417), persisted in the many types of Gallicanism. Moreover, the theories of Church and State that appeared during this modern period were influenced by caesaropapist ideas of the Roman emperors, the exaggerated charges of the French legists of Philip the Fair and the equally pretentious claims of the papal curialists, the doctrine of dominion by grace of John Wyclif, the proimperial theses in the Defensor pacis (1324) of MARSILIUS OF PADUA, the power politics of Niccolò MACHIAVELLI's Il principe (1513), and the Venetian theorist, Paolo Paruta's Discorsi politici (1599). Therefore many heresies of this period are more noted for their eclecticism than for their originality.

The reunion Council of Florence (1439–1445) repudiated Conciliarism and affirmed papal primacy (Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 1307–1309). The Fifth Lateran Council of 1513 defended the immortality of the individual human soul against the Neo-Aristotelian philosophers of Padua who either doubted or denied the survival of the individual rational soul after death (Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 1440–1441).

Protestantism. It is principally on the dogmas of justification, predestination, and sacramental theology that the reformers departed from orthodox belief. Though expressing divergent views on these theological doctrines, they agreed that the Bible must be the sole source of faith that rejected or neglected tradition.

Lutheranism. The theology of Martin LUTHER as synthesized in the Book of CONCORD (1580) was still creedal, accepting the Apostolic, Nicene, and Athanasian formulas, but avowing Scripture as the sole and constant guide of the Christian. Luther taught the total depravity of man after the Fall, which left him powerless before indomitable concupiscence to perform deeds of merit, so that he is justified by his faith in Christ alone and the imputation of His merits. This rejection of all forms of synergism, whereby the human will can or should cooperate with grace, leaves God the sole agent in converting the soul to justification. Of the Sacraments, only two were sanctioned by Scripture: baptism, incorporating the recipient into membership of a nonhi-erarchical church, and the Lord's Supper, commemorating the redemptive act. In place of transubstantiation Luther defended consubstantiation in which Christ becomes present in the substance of the elements, not hypostatically, but in a transcendent, though real, manner.

Reformed Theology. The doctrines of the Reformed Churches, based upon the tenets and church organization of Huldrych ZWINGLI, Martin BUCER (BUTZER), Heinrich BULLINGER, and, principally, John CALVIN, also rely upon the Bible as sole source of authority and accept the fundamental Lutheran doctrine of total human depravity. Calvin established the principles of his system in the Institutes (1536), where he taught that God by divine ordinance disregards the acts of the creature and predetermines him to salvation or doom. It is God's unconditioned will, independent of any foreknowledge of merit or demerit, that determines justification.

This image of an inexorable God was resisted by Jakob Arminius, the Dutch divine, who asserted against Calvin that divine sovereignty is compatible with human will and that grace is not irresistible. The propositions of this modified conception of CALVINISM were drawn up in the Remonstrance (1610) by Simon Episcopius (1583–1643) and defended unsuccessfully at the Synod of Dort (1618). Though rejected by Calvinists, ARMINIANISM spread to England and eventually divided Methodism into the moderate party of John WESLEY and the strict Calvinists, led by George WHITEFIELD.

Zwingli, who formulated his doctrine in the sixty-seven theses (Zurich 1523) and in Bullinger's First Helvetic Confession (1536), was more insistent on reliance upon Scripture and upon primitivism. To restore the Church to its original simplicity he removed the liturgy, turned the conduct of his church over to congregational direction, and gave ultimate control of its revenues to civic tribunals. Zwingli met with Luther, Philipp MELANCHTHON, and Johannes OECOLAMPADIUS at the Colloquy of Marburg (October 1–4, 1529) to attempt a doctrinal compromise, but their theories upon the presence of Christ in the Eucharist were irreconcilable. After Zwingli's death (1531), Calvin, Guillaume FAREL, and Bullinger met in Zurich in 1549, where they formulated the Zurich Consensus on the Eucharistic presence; by 1580 ZWINGLIANISM and Calvinism became the Reformed Church.

Radicalism. The ANABAPTISTS (Zwichau Prophets, Swiss Brethren, Jorists, Hutterian Brethren, Melchiorites, Familists, and MENNONITES) constituted a more radical Protestant motion that appealed to an infallible Scripture and an apocalyptic expectation. Their theories of Christian communism, put into practice in the polygamic kingdom of Münster, made them particularly unloved by conservative Protestants as well as Catholics. The Radicals were characterized by the phenomenon of prophetic charism that had been a by-product of Christian heresies since the primitive Church. It appeared in the hysteria of the Montanist prophetesses, Priscilla and Maximilia, and the Circumcellions of the fifth century who brought Donatism into ridicule; the rantings of the eleventh-century Cathars and later medieval mystics; the exhibitionism of the Jansenist convulsionaires at the cemetery of St. Médard (1731); the prophecies of the Calvinist CAMISARDS who terrorized eighteenth-century France; the feats of revivalism of the American frontier; and the glossolalia (speaking in tongues) that appeared in some twentieth-century Protestant sects.

The Council of Trent (1545–1563) condemned most of the heresies associated with Protestantism without mentioning any of the Protestant reformers by name. The formula of condemnation typically used in the Tridentine canons was: "If anyone says ... anathema sit." Among the most notable heresies repudiated at Trent were Luther's denial of free will (Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 1554), the Anabaptist rejection of infant baptism (Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 1625–1627), the denial of the Mass as a sacrifice (Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 1751–1759), and the rejection of the invocation of the saints and the veneration of their relics and images (Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 1821–1825).

Baianism and Jansenism. The Council of TRENT established a body of dogma, but could not prevent further heresy in the question of grace and human justification. Michael BAIUS and John Hessels, Flemish theologians of the University of Louvain, believed that Catholic reaction to Protestantism had turned too far and that the great villain dividing the Church was Scholasticism, especially in its Thomistic expression. For the dialectic of the schoolmen, Baius substituted greater use of scriptural and patristic sources, especially Cyprian, Jerome, Ambrose, and Augustine, since Protestants most often appealed to these. Baius's fundamental tenet was God's creation of man in a state of natural integrity, so that after the Fall all his actions were motivated by a nature vitiated toward concupiscence and thus evil to God. Accordingly, after the Redemption, only those actions that proceed from a perfect love of God are of merit. Justification is a continuing process of works that merit heaven only if motivated by perfect charity in a triumphant battle over concupiscence. These elements of Baianism as found in the Opuscula and the seventy-nine propositions condemned by Pius V in the bull Ex omnibus afflictionibus of October 1, 1567, have been criticized as Pelagian, Calvinistic, and Socinian.

Far more reaching in its effect was the theology of Cornelius JANSEN, Louvain professor and bishop of Ypres, who with his friend Jean Duvergier de Hauranne, Abbé of St. Cyran and guide of the consciences of the nuns of PORT-ROYAL from 1636, planned to save the Church from Protestantism, from Jesuits, for whom Jansen had an eminent dislike, and from itself. This was to be achieved again by clearing Scholasticism from the path that led back to Augustine and to the simplicity of the primitive Church. Jansen exposed his doctrine in the AUGUSTINUS, published posthumously (1640) and for whose preparation he read the works of Augustine ten times, and for his anti-Pelagian tractates, thirty times. Like Baius he asserts man's creation in a state of natural integrity, so that fallen man is radically depraved and at the mercy of concupiscence. In his redeemed state man is still drawn to earthly delectation (delectatio terrestris), unless impelled by an irresistible heavenly impulse (delectatio coelestis). Thus man is irresistibly attracted to good or evil, depending upon which delectation prevails (delectation victrix). As a corollary he discouraged the use of the Sacraments of the Eucharist and Penance. The first was to be received rarely and as a reward for virtue; the second held worthless unless repentance was motivated by perfect love of God. The course of this heresy was a series of ineffectual condemnations, reprisals, insincere submissions, subterfuges, and casuistry that continued even after CLEMENT XI's sweeping condemnation in 1713 in the bull UNIGENITUS. In Holland Jansenists were involved in the irregular consecration of Cornelius Steenhoven as archbishop of Utrecht (1723), which led to schism with Rome. These Utrecht Jansenists remained separated and later allied themselves with the Old Catholic party, which declared against papal infallibility in 1870.

Laxism. Contemporary with the Jansenist crisis were the disputes among theologians over the degrees of probability needed for a licit moral action. The Jesuits accepted and taught the theory of probabilism (it is licit to act on a probable opinion even though the opposite is more probable), but the Jansenist Blaise PASCAL in his Lettres provinciales (1657) attacked it as dangerous casuistry. This opened an active controversy with George Pirot, S.J. (1599–1659), whose L'Apologie pour les casuistes (1657) widened the scope of licit probability to the extreme of laxity. The book was proscribed by the Parlement of Paris, the Sorbonne, and censored by the Holy Office in 1659. Laxism was further condemned by Alexander VII by decrees of September 24, 1665; March 18, 1666; and May 5, 1667. Innocent XI condemned sixty-five laxist propositions on March 2, 1679. Tutiorism (it is not allowed to follow even the most probable among probable opinions) as expressed by the Irish Jansenist John SINNICH in Saul Exrex (1662), was also condemned by Alexander VIII on December 7, 1690.

Quietism and Semiquietism. Mysticism is a borderland infrequently traversed, so the expression of the phenomena that occur there cannot be easily touched with precise phrase. Thus the great Rhineland mystic, Meister Eckhart (d. 1327) was accused of being pantheistic and Beghardic; SS. Ignatius Loyola, Teresa of Ávila, Francis Borgia, and Joseph Calasanctius were suspected of the Neoplatonic tendencies of the Alumbrados. In the seventeenth century, however, a great revival of quietistic mysticism occurred. Miguel de MOLINOS in his book, Guía espiritual, taught a complete contemplative passivity before God. The soul in seeking interior annihilation can allow all license to carnal desire, acts of which are not blameworthy but produce a salutary disinterestedness to sensible devotion as well as personal salvation. Though denounced by the Holy Office (1685), Quietism in a modified form became prominent through the Barnabite François Lacombe (c. 1640–1715) and his more famous disciple Madame GUYON (Jeanne Marie Bouvier de la Motte). They accepted the doctrine of pure love from Molinos's theology, according to which the soul becomes powerless to act in its own interest. This thesis was expanded in Madame Guyon's Moyen court et très facile de faire oraison (1685) and the Explication des maximes des saints (1697) of her follower, François FÉNELON, eminent churchman and, at the time of the appearance of his book, the governor of Louis XIV's grandson, the duke of Burgundy. Madame Guyon was arrested and imprisoned (1695) at Vincennes, Vaugirard, and the Bastille, where she signed a retractation. Fénelon's book, after two years of bitter controversy with Jacques BOSSUET, was condemned by Innocent XII in the letter Cum alias, on March 12, 1699.

Caesarism. From the time of Protestantism, State interference in the affairs of the Church was much more significant than the ancient Byzantine CAESAROPAPISM or the pope-king quarrels of the Middle Ages. Now that Europe contained Christian communities no longer a part of Catholicism, opposition of monarchs to Rome was not only political but touched faith or was founded upon principles that could destroy beliefs.

Anglicanism. The divorce proceedings that effected the English schism and set Henry VIII at the head of a national church did not yet place England in heresy. The six Henrician articles (June 1539) attest to the king's demand for orthodoxy. During the short reign of his son Edward VI (1547–1553), Continental Protestantism took hold. Peter Martyr Vermigli and Martin Bucer were instrumental in the formation of the Edwardine

Ordinal (1550). Thomas CRANMER, long an admirer of the Lutheran movement, produced the revision of the Book of COMMON PRAYER in 1552, and in the next year prevailed on the king to sign the forty-two Articles of Religion into the law of the land. Edward's action effectively established England as a Protestant nation, and the king as its religious arbiter, a position that was strengthened by the Stuart claim to authority by divine right within their hereditary line of succession. In the later development of ANGLICANISM, the Erastian idea of State ascendancy over the Church in ecclesiastical matters took hold in the Westminster Assembly (1643) and in the ideal secularization of the church as conceived by Thomas Hobbes.

Gallican Liberties. In sixteenth-century France a distrust of Rome and its ultramontane foreign policies sometimes resulted in papal alliances with French enemies, especially the Hapsburg emperor. When the French crown felt oppressed, it appealed to the libertés de l'Église gallicane, which it could proudly trace back to King Clovis and his Merovingian successors. The concordat between Leo X and Francis I in 1516 annulled the Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges (1438) that had accepted many of the conciliarist decrees of the Council of Basel (1431–1437); GALLICANISM, however, persisted and came to a crisis when Louis XIV attempted to extend the regalia (royal right to the revenues of vacant sees) to all the sees of France. Innocent XI (1676–1689) repudiated this usurpation of right and threatened ecclesiastical sanction. In reply Louis gathered the clergy of France who adopted the Four Gallican Articles of 1682, which were conciliarist and limited the exercise of papal primacy to the customs of the French Church. Though Louis and Innocent came to terms in 1693, these articles became a formula of anti-Romanism adopted when convenient elsewhere in Europe.

Febronianism and Josephinism. In Germany the suffragan bishop of Trier, Johann Nikolaus von HONTHEIM, under the pen name of Justinus Febronius, attacked Roman power as compared to papal primacy and as founded upon the False Decretals and advocated an ecclesiastical order regulated as much as possible by episcopal and civic control. These ideas, absorbed by Hontheim from the Gallican canonist of Louvain, Zeger Bernhard van ESPEN, led the archbishops of Mainz, Trier, Cologne, and Salzburg to assert their grievances against Rome at a congress at Bad Ems in Hesse-Nassau, even though Clement XIII had condemned FEBRONIANISM in 1764. The Punctation of Ems, issued August 25, 1786, restrained appeals to Rome and declared papal bulls to be conditioned upon the acceptance of the German episcopate. The force of Febronianism was felt in the empire and expressed in the policies of Empress MARIA THERESA and her son, JOSEPH II, whose Toleration Edict of 1781 suppressed certain religious orders, placed exempt monasteries under diocesan control, and required civic authorization for publishing papal documents. Leopold II, Grand Duke of Tuscany and brother of the emperor, introduced Josephinist ideas to northern Italy. In 1786, under the presidency of Scipione de' RICCI, Bishop of Pistoia-Prato, a synod passed reform measures based upon the Gallican articles, eighty-five of which were condemned by Pius VI in the bull Auctorem fidei, August 28, 1794.

Kulturkampf and Old Catholics. In the nineteenth century Caesarism appeared in the anti-Romanism of Chancellor Otto von Bismarck. His KULTURKAMPF oppressed the Church, interfered in its educational processes, limited its disciplinary powers by the May Laws (1873), and exiled religious orders. Unexpectedly, this oppression effected a Catholic revival in Germany and strengthened the Catholic political party. The publication of the Syllabus errorum by Pius IX on December 8, 1864, and the definition of infallibility by Vatican Council I (1870) aroused the resistance of Johannes J. I. von DÖLLINGER, who met with some professors at Nuremberg and Bonn, where it was agreed that the pope's measures would paralyze the Church. Despite Döllinger's disapproval, they formed the schismatical church of Old Catholics, receiving episcopal succession from the bishops of the Church of Utrecht, in schism since 1723. The Old Catholics, with affiliated churches in the Netherlands, Poland, and the United States, retain most of the Roman rite (but in the vernacular), allow a married clergy, and make the Sacrament of Penance optional.

Traditionalism. Much Catholic thought in the nineteenth century grew as a reaction to the philosophies of the Enlightenment or as an attempt at adaptation. Against the primum mobile, the depersonalized god of the rationalists, the skepticism as expressed in David Hume's Treatise of Human Nature (1738), and the sophistication resulting from new technology and travel abroad, especially during England's Augustan age, some Catholic theologians proposed theories of traditionalism, placing the norm of human certitude in the sens commun rather than in distrusted individual intellectual ability. The traditionalists, Casimir Ubaghs, Louis E. BAUTAIN, Augustin BONNETTY, and Hugues Félicité de LAMENNAIS, tried to revive faith, just as the ontologists, Vincenzo GIOBERTI and Jakob Frohschammer, by their central tenet that God is the first object of our intelligence, established an optimistic rationalism. Georg HERMES attempted to adjust theology to Kantian philosophy, and Anton GÜNTHER, after studying the pantheistic idealism of Georg HEGEL and Friedrich von SCHELLING, proposed that it was within human power to deduce the mysteries of the Trinity and Incarnation.

All these figures were condemned. Bautain was removed from his chair of philosophy at Strasbourg by Bishop Lepappe de Trévern in 1834; Ubaghs was censored by the Holy Office, September 21, 1864; Bonnetty was denounced by the Congregation of the Index on June 11, 1855; Gioberti's writings were placed on the Index on January 14, 1853; Hermes was condemned by the brief Dum acerbissimas on September 26, 1835; Günther's works were doomed by the Index on January 8, 1857; and propositions from the books of Rosmini-Serbati were condemned by a decree of the Holy Office on December 14, 1887. (In 2001, however, the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith qualified these condemnations to prepare the way for Rosmini's eventual beatification in 2007.) Frohschammer, professor at the University of Munich, refused to submit to the condemnatory letter of Pius IX, Gravissimas inter, which found unorthodox propositions in his Einleitung in die Philosophie und Grundriss der Metaphysik (1858), and was suspended. Lammenais believed the future of the Church in post-Napoleonic France would be brighter if its dependent affiliations with the restored monarchy were replaced by a Catholic liberalism. Together with several French intellectuals, such as Charles de MONTALEMBERT and Jean B. LACORDAIRE, he published the brilliant L'Avenir (1830–1831), advocating freedom of the press, freedom of speech, and labor unions; the magazine, however, was suppressed for indifferentism by Gregory XVI in an encyclical Mirari vos on August 15, 1832. The adherence to Royalism among many of the French clergy persisted into the twentieth century, when a number rallied to the monarchist crusade of Charles MAURRAS and his collaborator, Léon DAUDET. Pius XI denounced their publication, L'Action Française on December 20, 1926.

Modernism. A more pervading heresy was the complex of movements condemned under the name of MODERNISM by Pius X in the decree, Lamentabili sane exitu of July 3, 1903, and the encyclical Pascendi dominici gregis of September 8, 1907. Attempting to reconcile the Church with the present, Modernism viewed Scholastic Aristotelianism no longer suitable to illustrate and defend Christian belief. The prominent Modernists, Maurice BLONDEL, Lucien LABERTHONNIÈRE, Alfred LOISY, Édouard LE ROY, Eudoxe I. MIGNOT, Antonio Fogazzaro, Romolo MURRI, Friedrich von HÜGEL, and George TYRRELL, composed no theological school or consistent doctrine, but they agreed upon the necessity of reconciling the Church with modern times. From their writings the following beliefs appeared: dogmatic statements have a spirit that is absolute and fixed and a form that is relative and mutable; Christ's messianic mission and His divinity are not to be sought from Scriptural sources, whose authors were subjected to the limitations of all human historians, but deduced from the conscientia christiana; the Christ of history is thus less than the Christ of faith, and it is not important to know whether He instituted a church, since the Holy Spirit guides its progress; and in Christianity there is a religious immanence that effects a continual evolution and pragmatic adaptation to historical situations.

Americanism. By the end of the nineteenth century the term "adaptation" meant a dangerous tampering with faith, as is witnessed in the so-called heresy of AMERICANISM. From a French translation of a biography of Isaac T. HECKER, founder of the Paulists, Roman theologians extracted statements that advocated adapting the external form of the Church to modern American life and extolled the active virtues (humanitarianism, democratic fellowship) to the depreciation of passive virtues (subjection to authority, humility). By an Apostolic Letter to Cardinal James GIBBONS of Baltimore, TESTEM BENEVOLENTIAE on January 22, 1899, Leo XIII cautioned against these notions, and, by referring to them as Americanism and implying that they were widespread, created what F. Klein called a phantom heresy (Klein 1949).

The Fathers of Vatican Council II chose not to condemn any errors by means of anathemas. At the same time, the pastoral constitution Gaudium et spes cited many errors prevalent in modern society. Debates upon the floor of the council and continual written discussions on its schema emphasized the need to consider theological realities in their place in the stream of history. In terms of understanding heresy, they emphasized the difference between the rejection of an eternal, unchanging truth and the rejection of its changing historical manifestation.

IV. AFTER VATICAN II

The popes, since the ending of Vatican II in 1965, have mostly relied upon the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith (CDF; formerly the Holy Office) to defend the integrity of the faith and to guard against real or potential heresies. In some cases the CDF has issued documents noting certain dangerous movements or theological trends. For example, in 1984 it issued the Instruction on Certain Aspects of the "Theology of Liberation" to warn against the politicization of the Gospel, the appropriation of Marxist analysis, and the use of violence in movements of social liberation. In 2000 it published the declaration, Dominus Iesus, On the Unicity and Salvific Universality of Jesus Christ and the Church to warn against new forms of religious indifferentism and relativism.

Since Vatican II the Church has mostly dealt with individual theologians by means of notifications issued by the CDF. Hans KÜNG, for example, was censured in 1975 for (among other things) denying the dogma of papal infallibility. In 1979 the CDF decreed that he could no longer teach as a Catholic theologian. Many believe that the CDF's 1973 declaration, Mysterium Ecclesiae, was intended as a rejection of Küng's positions.

In 1984 the CDF warned Edward Schillebeeckx, O.P., about his thesis that, in extraordinary circumstances, someone other than an ordained priest could offer the Eucharist. The year before, with Schillebeeckx in mind, the CDF issued a letter to the bishops of the world titled, Sacerdotium ministeriale, making it clear that only an ordained priest could offer a valid Eucharist.

In 1985 the CDF published a notification regarding the 1982 book Church: Charism and Power of Leonardo Boff, O.F.M. The CDF criticized the book for challenging the hierarchical nature and unicity of the Church. On November 30, 2000, the CDF issued a notification regarding some publications of Professor Dr. Reinhard Messner because they obscured apostolic succession and the divine institution of the Sacrament of holy orders. In 2004 the Congregation published a notification on the book Jesus: Symbol of God by Roger Haight, S.J., because of this work's inadequate view of the divinity of Christ. In 2006 a similar notification was issued by the CDF for two works of Jon Sobrino, S.J., because they obscured the divinity and salvific work of Jesus Christ.

Although these theologians received notifications from the CDF, since Vatican II the Magisterium has been more concerned with teaching the Catholic faith than with censuring and punishing heretics. As Pope John XXIII declared in his October 11, 1962, opening of the Second Vatican Council: "Nowadays, however, the Spouse of Christ prefers to make use of the medicine of mercy rather than that of severity" (Abbott 1966, p. 716).

HIGGINS, GEORGE GILMARY

"Labor priest," monsignor, on staff of the UNITED STATES CONFERENCE OF CATHOLIC BISHOPS, scholar, columnist; b. Chicago, Illinois, January 21, 1916; d. LaGrange, Illinois, May 1, 2002.

Monsignor George Higgins was born, raised, and ordained a priest in the Archdiocese of CHICAGO. His father, a postal clerk with an eighth-grade education, loved to read. He took his son to a reading by the English writer G.K. CHESTERTON, and the two also went to hear Franklin Delano Roosevelt speak at the 1932 Democratic Convention. Because of this paternal influence, Higgins was a voracious reader all his life, and he had a consuming interest in the issues and people of public life. The young priest was sent to Washington, D.C., to undertake advanced studies in economics, and he received a Ph.D. from the CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA in 1944. For the remainder of his life, he made the nation's capital his home and Catholic social teaching his life's work.

In 1944 Monsignor Higgins joined the staff of the Social Action Department of the United States Catholic Welfare Conference (the predecessor of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops). He would eventually become the director of the social action department of the conference, and for nearly five decades he assisted the U.S. bishops and guided the conference's work in areas of worker rights, economic justice, and social action. He was a leader in areas of civil rights, ecumenism, and JEWISH-CATHOLIC RELATIONS. At the Second Vatican Council, Higgins was on the Preparatory Commission on the Lay Apostolate, and he served as peritus, or expert, for the council, participating in a daily press panel where he helped interpret all four sessions of the Vatican II to the world.

As a leader of a generation of "labor priests," Higgins represented the Catholic Church to the American labor movement (and the labor movement to the Church) for more than 50 years. He claimed that he had never turned down an invitation to pray at a labor meeting, and his invocations often drew more applause than the speeches that followed. However, Monsignor Higgins offered much more than a clerical presence. For example, he was a powerful advocate and ally of Cesar Chavez of the United Farm Workers, and he helped mediate contracts between farmworkers and growers from California to the Great Lakes. For three decades, he chaired the United Auto Workers Review Board, dealing with disputes within the union. He was a powerful and persistent advocate for workers and their unions in the Church and the broader society.

Higgins served on many boards and committees, including the Bishops' Committee on Farm Labor, the American Arbitration Association, the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, and the Martin Luther King Jr. Fund of the United Farm Workers. He was an early supporter of SOLIDARITY in Poland, and he spoke at the organization's first congress. He was also an official adviser to the U.S. Delegation to the Belgrade Conference on Human Rights.

Monsignor Higgins was a pioneer and respected leader in interfaith and ecumenical activities, especially Catholic-Jewish relations. For this work, he was publicly recognized by the International Catholic-Jewish Liaison Committee, which is sponsored by the VATICAN and the International Jewish Committee for Interreligious Consultations.

From 1945 through 2001, Higgins wrote "The Yardstick," a syndicated column that appeared in Catholic newspapers. In his nearly 3,000 columns, Higgins offered weekly commentary on ecclesial and public issues, with a regular focus on economic justice and the applications of the Church's social teaching in national and Catholic life.

In 1980, Higgins retired from his position as secretary for research at the Bishops' Conference. For the rest of his life, he lived and taught at the Catholic University of America. His continuing energy, commitment, and eloquence were demonstrated as he traveled to countless conferences, labor rallies, picket lines, and organizing campaigns. He stood with janitors, hospital workers, coal miners, and auto workers, and he continued to champion the Solidarity movement.

Higgins's entire ministry reflected his personal credo, drawn from his mentor and predecessor at the Bishops' Conference, Monsignor John A. Ryan: "Effective labor unions are still by far the most powerful force in society for the protection of the laborer's rights and the improvement of his or her condition. No amount of employer benevolence, no diffusion of a sympathetic attitude on the part of the public, no increase of beneficial legislation, can adequately supply for the lack of organization among the workers themselves" (Higgins with Bole 1993, p. 228).

Higgins received numerous prestigious awards from labor, academic, and religious organizations, including the Laetare Medal (2001), the highest honor given by the University of Notre Dame (which had previously named its labor studies center in his honor), and the Presidential Medal of Freedom, conferred at the White House in 2000. Monsignor George Higgins was, to many, the quintessential "labor priest," and as such he was a leading architect, advocate, and articulator of Catholic social action in the United States in the twentieth century.

HITLER, ADOLF

Leader of National Socialist (Nazi) Party, chancellor of Germany (1933–1945); b. Braunau am Inn, Austria, April 20, 1889; committed suicide in Berlin, April 30, 1945.

Adolf Hitler was the fourth child of Alois Hitler, a customs officer in Upper Austria, and Clara Pölzl. The child was illegitimate, but Alois and Clara were married some months into the pregnancy. Named Adolfus on his birth certificate, the child was baptized by Father Ignaz Probst.

In order to marry Clara, his second cousin, Alois received a dispensation from Rome. Altogether, Alois fathered nine children, including a child of a pre-marital liaison and four who died as infants. His children with Clara were Gustav (1885), Ida (1886–1888), and Otto (1887). Adolf's siblings who survived were Edmund (1894–1900) and Paula (1896–1960). With his second wife, Franziska (Fanni) Matzelberger, Alois had fathered two children, Alois Jr. and Angela, who later became Adolf's half-brother and half-sister. Alois's marriage with his first wife, Anna Glässl, was childless. Alois had been born illegitimately to Anna Schicklgruber. He had been baptized Aloys Schicklgruber, which he had changed to Alois Hitler in 1876. The most likely contender for paternity of Alois was Johann Georg Hiedler (or Hüttler, or Hitler); the names commonly were interchangeable and meant "smallholder." Speculation that Adolf's grandfather had been Jewish has been unsubstantiated.

As a customs official, Alois provided his family with a comfortable middle-class existence. He received a promotion in 1892 that caused the family to move to the historic city of Passau, and another promotion in 1894 prompted a relocation to Linz. Family life was unharmonious. As a child Adolf was extremely willful and had strong opinions. His mother was loving and protective, while his father was authoritarian and stern. Throughout his life Adolf remained closely attached to his mother.

Early Life. Adolf was an average student at school, receiving poor grades in history, geography, and drawing, though he was impressed by the baroque architecture of the local cathedral in Linz. He was confirmed on May 22, 1904, when he was fifteen. An ill-tempered boy, Adolf enjoyed taunting his teachers, and he was expelled from school in 1905. He remained in Linz for two and a half years, practicing his drawing, painting, and writing poetry. He dreamed of redesigning the architecture of Linz. According to a childhood friend, August Kubizek, Hitler was impatient, temperamental, and a compulsive and emotional speaker. He was also quite determined to become an artist, and this determination carried him to Vienna.

Unfortunately, Hitler's application to the Academy of Fine Arts in Vienna was rejected. He then drifted aimlessly, read indiscriminately, discussed politics with acquaintances, and frequently attended the operas of Richard Wagner. His resources were soon exhausted, however, and he resorted to living in a homeless shelter and selling small paintings. He would later claim that his anti-Semitism originated during his years in Vienna, but this is not the case. He was, however, influenced by two powerful ANTI-SEMITIC politicians, the extreme nationalist Georg von Schönerer and the mayor of Vienna, Karl Lueger.

Hitler's anti-Semitism cannot be understood without reference to Lanz von Liebenfels, a former monk who propagated occult racial views. Liebenfels depicted Aryan Germans as exalted beings, and Jews and other races were categorized as inferior "animal men." Hitler was also influenced by the life and ideas of Richard Wagner, whose operas later inspired the staging of Nazi ceremonies. Underlying all of his ideas was the social Darwinist belief in the struggle for survival. Yet it was racial anti-Semitism that was at the core of his developing ideology, in which the Jews were held to be responsible for all of society's ills, including capitalism, Marxism, DEMOCRACY, PACIFISM, and even PROSTITUTION. Hitler believed that the German race and blood had been contaminated by the Jews, whom he considered to be akin to a virus that had to be eradicated. This belief led eventually to the horror of the HOLOCAUST (SHOAH).

World War I and National Socialism. In order to escape being drafted into the Austrian army, Hitler moved to Munich. When World War I broke out, however, he enthusiastically volunteered for the Bavarian army and served on the western front as a messenger. He attained the rank of corporal and received the Iron Cross, First Class, for his bravery. The war gave his life a purpose that it had previously lacked. He was temporarily blinded in a gas attack, and he thus heard of Germany's defeat and surrender while recovering in a military hospital. Like so many other Germans, he could not bring himself to believe that Germany had lost the war. Instead, he chose to believe the "stab in the back" legend, which claimed that Germany's defeat was caused by weakness on the home front and a Jewish-Marxist conspiracy. Hitler later claimed that he had experienced an epiphany while in the hospital, and he became convinced that he was called to enter politics and save Germany.

After his recovery, Hitler was assigned to an army barracks in Munich. Like so many other Bavarians, he was surprised at the success of the November Revolution, which was led by the Independent Socialist Kurt Eisner and overthrew the Bavarian monarchy. In September 1919, Hitler was recruited as a military spy and was sent to observe the German Workers' Party (DAP), a small right-wing, racist, nationalist party in Munich. The party leadership was impressed with Hitler, and he was invited to join. Because of his speaking ability, enthusiasm, and ability to organize rallies, he quickly became the party's most popular spokesman. In 1920 the party's name was changed to the National Socialist German Workers' Party (NSDAP), though it came to be known as the Nazi Party. A paramilitary organization called the Sturmabteilung, or SA (commonly known as the Storm Troopers or Brownshirts) was organized to protect meetings, and a 25-point program declared the party's opposition to capitalism, democracy, and the Jews.

By 1922 membership in the Nazi Party, which appealed to the lower and upper middle classes, had grown to approximately six thousand. University students, with their nationalist idealism, also found the party attractive, as did the Bavarian elite, who hoped for the restoration of the Wittelsbach monarchy. On November 9, 1923, Hitler headed an alliance of right-wing groups in an attempt to take over the Bavarian government and march on Berlin. Their attempt, the so-called Beer Hall Putsch, failed, however, and Hitler was imprisoned in Landsberg. It was here that he dictated the first volume of Mein Kampf (My Struggle) to a fellow Nazi, Rudolf Hess. In the book, Hitler discussed his role as leader of the Nazi movement and outlined the ideas that he would follow once he achieved power. His principal original ideas concerned propaganda methods and mass psychology. Thus, his incarceration became a significant turning point in his career.

The Rise to Power. After his early release from prison, Hitler struggled to regain control of the Nazi Party from two challengers, Gregor and Otto Strasser, who had stronger socialist leanings than Hitler. By July 1926, the control of the party under Hitler was established and best expressed through the führerprinzip, a concept of leadership that was dictatorial and related to Hitler's ideas of racial struggle and the establishment of a volkstaat (racial state). In order to mold the German people into a völkish community, Hitler believed that his will had to be dominant. This leadership cult also was an important means by which unity was maintained in the highly factionalized Nazi Party.

Political stability and moderate prosperity had returned to the Weimar Republic, and through the efforts of the foreign minister, Gustav Stresemann, Germany's international position had improved. In 1925 the war hero General Paul von Hindenburg was elected president. For his part, Hitler now decided to acquire power constitutionally, and he began to compete with other parties in the political process. After 1928 the Nazi electioneering effort was redirected toward the rural voters and the lower middle class in small towns. Party membership increased to 108,000 in 1929, and the new members were committed to Hitler's leadership. The Nazi Party also won a new respectability by forming a temporary alliance with the right-wing German National People's Party (DNVP) in a campaign against the restructuring of Germany's debt through the Young Plan. With the onset of the Great Depression, the Nazis won an unprecedented 107 seats in the Reichstag elections of September 14, 1930.

Hitler's appointment as chancellor on January 30, 1933, was the culmination of a political process that began with the creation of an authoritarian presidential system in 1930. This gave the president the power to choose the chancellor by emergency decree, regardless of majorities in the Reichstag. From 1930 through 1932, the Nazi electoral machine staged very dynamic campaigns that included demagogic oratory and street violence. These campaigns were astutely geared to appeal to different social groups, with emphasis on anticommunism, nationalism, and Christian values. The party's anti-Semitism was downplayed at this time. In the Reichstag elections of July 31, 1932, the vote for the Nazis rose dramatically, increasing their delegates to 230, which made them the largest party. Although Hitler lost the presidential election in 1932 to Hindenburg, he nonetheless received almost 37 percent of the vote. In these elections the Nazi vote was weak in the big cities and strong in the small towns and countryside. From a denominational perspective, their vote was strongest in rural Protestant areas and weakest in rural Catholic southern Bavaria. By the end of 1932 the membership in the Nazi Party had risen to 400,000, quadruple the size of the regular army. Backroom deals by Hindenburg's friends and advisers determined the rise and fall of three chancellors: Heinrich Brüning, Franz von Papen, and General Kurt von Schleicher. Waiting for his opportunity, Hitler finally agreed to become chancellor in an alliance with the Nationalists that made the Catholic nobleman Franz von Papen the vice chancellor.

A dictatorship was quickly created by political manipulation and terrorism. Ruling by emergency decrees, civil liberties were restricted on February 28, 1933, after the Reichstag building was burned. The Enabling Act of March 23, 1933, made it possible for Hitler to legally establish a dictatorship. The police came under Nazi control, and Hitler quickly secured the support of the army. The Communist Party was brutally suppressed, some Catholic leaders were killed, other political opponents were placed in concentration camps, and in what is now known as the Blood Purge, Ernst Röhm and some other leaders of the SA that Hitler viewed as rivals were assassinated by members of the Schutzstaffel (SS, or "Elite Guard") in June 1934.

As part of the seizure of power, all state governments and organizations were banned or taken over by the Nazi Party. In 1935 the Nuremberg Laws were passed, depriving Jews of their German citizenship and prohibiting future marriages between non-Jews and Jews. Hitler's popularity with ordinary Germans, and with many Catholics, was probably based on his promises to restore Germany's national pride, overcome social divisions, and create a new community inspired by German ideals.

Concordat with the Vatican. In 1929 the LATERAN PACTS were concluded between the VATICAN and the Italian government under Benito MUSSOLINI, and Hitler hoped to come to an agreement with the PAPACY as well. Hitler's interest in a concordat arose from his realization that the Church was a fundamental obstacle to his establishment of a dictatorship. He was also aware that a concordat would provide an endorsement of his government by the papacy. Consequently, Hitler pursued a sham conciliatory policy toward the Church, and the German bishops dramatically reversed their earlier condemnations of National Socialism. While the Catholic Center Party could have blocked the Enabling Act (March 1933), which gave Hitler dictatorial powers, it did not.

Both PIUS XI and PIUS XII maintained that the concordat was first sought by the German government, which offered numerous concessions that the Vatican could not refuse. Already under the threat of hostile acts by Nazi officials, a concordat was quickly negotiated, with the expectation in ROME being that it would serve as a legal wall in defense of the Church. It was hoped that the provisions of the concordat would be observed, but as Cardinal Pacelli, the Vatican secretary of state, expected, numerous violations soon occurred. The Church protested, but their petitions went unanswered.

A second phase of the struggle against Hitler's dictatorship lasted from 1936 to 1940. The most dramatic event in this phase was the issuance of the famous papal encyclical, Mit brennender Sorge (With Deep Anxiety), which condemned the ongoing persecution of the Church in Germany. The encyclical enraged Nazi leaders to such a degree that even greater repression occurred. There was soon to be one significant success for the Church, however. On September 1, 1939, Hitler issued the order for compulsory euthanasia for all persons with incurable diseases. On August 3, 1941, Clemens von GALEN, the Bishop of Münster, made a public speech in which he protested against the regime's euthanasia program. This courageous act pressured the Nazi government to back down, and Galen's popularity kept the Nazis from acting against him with significant force. Galen also intended to denounce the persecution of the Jews, but was restrained by Jewish leaders in Münster for fear of reprisals. He was made a cardinal after the war. Nevertheless, the persecution of the Church by the Nazi regime continued, and at times it appeared to be aimed at Christianity itself.

The Road to War. Hitler claimed that his foreign policy was defensive and peaceful in nature and designed to include all Germans in one state. Secretly, however, he planned for war. By 1936 he changed the balance of power in Europe through a "diplomatic revolution." In October 1933, Hitler withdrew Germany from the League of Nations, then negotiated a nonaggression pact with Poland, a naval pact with Great Britain, started rearmament and introduced military conscription, both of which violated the Versailles Treaty. He concluded a secret treaty with Italy that established the so-called Rome-Berlin Axis and occupied the demilitarized Rhineland in 1936. In 1938 he felt confident enough to annex neighboring Austria. He also secured the borderlands of Czechoslovakia, known as the Sudetenland, where many Germans lived. The infamous Munich Agreement of September 1938 allowed Hitler to occupy the Sudetenland, and this was soon followed by the occupation of the rest of Czechoslovakia. Believing that England and France would continue their policy of appeasement and not honor their defensive alliance with Poland, he ordered the invasion of Poland on September 1, 1939, starting World War II.

Hitler's true intentions concerning the Soviet Union were only gradually revealed. The conquest of Russia was first presented as a way to defeat Great Britain, then as the acquisition for living space, and finally as a preemptive strike against an imminent Soviet invasion. It was during 1941 that Hitler gave the order for the GENOCIDE of the Jews, known as the Final Solution, which was planned at the Wannsee Conference on January 20, 1942. No one has ever found any documents that prove Hitler gave the order to annihilate the Jews, but his approval was indispensable for Heinrich Himmler and the SS to execute the policy. In 1941 Hitler assumed direct control of the military, and his meddling in tactical planning would later contribute to the disastrous German defeats in North Africa and at Stalingrad. Shortly after the Normandy invasion on June 6, 1944, by the Allies, an unsuccessful attempt was made to assassinate Hitler and take over the government. On July 20, 1944, Colonel Klaus von Stauffenberg, a Catholic officer who had regular contact with Hitler, carried out the plot by planting a briefcase containing a bomb near Hitler during a briefing. However, another officer inadvertently moved the briefcase before it went off, and Hitler survived the explosion. As the war came to an end and the Soviets surrounded Berlin, Hitler hid in his bunker, married his mistress, Eva Braun, and committed suicide with her on April 30, 1945.

Hitler and the Catholic Church. Hitler was no more than a nominal Catholic who occasionally attended Mass and continued to pay his church taxes. He never officially left the Church. While the Nazi Party supported a vague "positive Christianity," Hitler's real goal was to convert the German people to the PAGAN Nazi worldview by undermining the beliefs of Catholics through public morality trials and a propaganda program that would make the clergy look ridiculous. To give the impression that he favored Christianity, he proclaimed that Christianity was the foundation of national morality and the family, and he distanced himself from the more radical Nazis like Alfred Rosenberg. He tolerated the churches in order to secure the loyalty of Christians, and he never repudiated their legal right to conduct services. His real intention was to destroy them after the war.

Most German Catholics supported Hitler's wars, and they probably would not have been willing or able to oppose Hitler's policy against the Jews even if Pope Pius XII had vigorously protested against the genocide. With all the evils that Hitler perpetrated during World War II, he and the other Nazi leaders who were raised Catholic, such as Joseph Goebbels, Himmler, and Martin Borman, were never excommunicated.

Hitler's most notorious attempt to undermine the Catholic Church was his 1943 plan to seize and loot the Vatican, kidnap Pope Pius XII, and perhaps even have him killed. The plot had further ramifications, in that it was linked to a Nazi threat to silence the pope concerning the deportation of the Jews of Rome to death camps. Hitler loathed Pius and considered him a rival in a struggle for the allegiance of Christians around the world. Far from having defended the dictator, as some critics have alleged, the pope had demonstrated his contempt for Hitler in 1939 and 1940 by his active participation in an unsuccessful plot led by General Ludwig Beck to overthrow the dictator.

In 1943 the coup against Mussolini and the entry of the German army into Rome brought the hostility between the two leaders to a head. General Karl Wolff, a chief of staff of Himmler, became SS commander in Italy and was chosen to carry out the abduction. Wolff, however, who was a Protestant, delayed and sabotaged the kidnap plan. He and other conspirators approached the pope and argued that his silence about the impending roundup of the Jews could save his life, and perhaps even soften the blow against the Jewish community. Wolff also convinced Hitler that the deportation of the pope would seriously hinder the German war effort. From the pope's point of view, he had prevented the pillage of Rome until it could be liberated by the Allies.

HOLY CROSS, CONGREGATION OF

(CSC; Official Catholic Directory #0600 brothers, #0610 priests) Founded in France in 1837, its members include priests and brothers dedicated to parochial education, social justice, spiritual renewal, and foreign mission work. The congregation has a generalate in Rome, six provinces in the United States, three in Canada, two in Bangladesh, and one in India.

Origin and Development. The Congregation of Holy Cross was founded March 1, 1837, at Le Mans, Sarthe, France, by Blessed Basil Anthony MOREAU (beatified September 15, 2007, by Pope BENEDICT XVI), who united into one religious institute the Congregation of the Brothers of St. Joseph—founded in 1820 at Ruillé-sur-Loir, Diocese of Le Mans, by Canon Jacques-François Dujarié—and the Auxiliary Priests of Le Mans—which Moreau himself had founded in 1835. The Brothers of St. Joseph had been established to provide primary education for children in rural villages where the FRENCH REVOLUTION had practically destroyed the previously existing system for the education of the children of the common people. To counteract the evil influences of the Revolution in the more strictly religious and spiritual order, the Auxiliary Priests had taken as their specific aim assistance of the parish clergy in different dioceses, particularly by preaching parish missions and retreats.

In 1835, Dujarié's ill health led Bishop Jean-Baptiste Bouvier of Le Mans to entrust to Moreau the direction of the Brothers of St. Joseph. After first attempting to govern the two communities separately, Moreau united them into one institute. The Brothers of St. Joseph had some time earlier begun to adopt perpetual religious vows, whereas the Auxiliary Priests were still diocesan priests living in community while engaging in joint apostolic activities under the direction of their superior. However, on Aug. 15, 1840, Moreau pronounced his perpetual vows in the presence of Bouvier and was followed by several of his first collaborators, among whom was Edward F. SORIN, CSC, first superior of the congregation in the United States and first president of the University of Notre Dame, Indiana.

The congregation, composed of priests and brothers, was granted a papal decree of praise on June 18, 1855, and definitive approval was decreed on May 13, 1857. It had been Moreau's original intention to include in the organization a congregation of religious women that he had founded as the Marianite Sisters of Holy Cross. However, the sisters were eventually excluded from the approval granted by Rome, and Moreau was instructed to govern them as a separate and autonomous community. They later developed three distinct congregations, in France, the United States, and Canada. From the beginning the apostolate of the Brothers of Holy Cross, formerly the Brothers of St. Joseph, was confined to education, especially on the primary level, in France. The Priests of Holy Cross, on the other hand, devoted themselves to both teaching and the works of the sacred ministry.

Early in its history, the Congregation of Holy Cross extended its activities outside France, establishing houses in Algeria (1840), the United States (1842), Canada (1847), Italy (1850), and India (1853), in addition to scattered temporary foundations in Poland and the French Caribbean possessions. In 2009 foundations existed in Bangladesh, Brazil, Canada, Chile, France, Ghana, Haiti, India, Ireland, Italy, Kenya, Mexico, Peru, Tanzania, and the United States, organized into thirteen provinces and seven religious districts.

Special Characteristics. According to its pontifically approved constitutions, the Congregation of Holy Cross is a clerical institute of pontifical right, composed of two societies that, while canonically united, remain nevertheless distinct and, within the limits determined by the constitutions, autonomous. The distinction of the two societies within the congregation is established on the provincial and local levels, where each society has its own government and administration. Union between the two societies is maintained by the same general administration, under a priest as superior general, and a general council composed of an equal number of priests and brothers; by the observance of the same constitutions and the use of the same manual of prayers and religious practices; and by the canonical visitation of all the houses of the congregation by the superior general or his delegate.

In the priests' society there are two canonical classes of religious, namely, priests or clerics and brothers. The brothers' society has only one class of religious, engaged either in teaching or in other activities. All the perpetually professed members of the congregation enjoy full active and passive voice in the government of the congregation, irrespective of occupation. The members of each society have a special name: Priests of Holy Cross (earlier called Salvatorists) and Brothers of Holy Cross (formerly known as Josephites). Under the general name of Religious of Holy Cross, all belong to the same religious institute known as the Congregation of Holy Cross or Congregatio a Sancta Cruce (CSC). The name of the congregation does not come from the Holy Cross, but from the suburb of Le Mans, called Sainte-Croix (Holy Cross), where Moreau established the first motherhouse of the congregation.

Local houses, provinces, and religious districts are, in principle, autonomous according to the prescriptions contained in the constitutions, that is, they are composed of members of the two societies of the congregation, and are governed by superiors chosen from among the religious of that society which has jurisdiction. It pertains to the provincial superiors to establish coordination between the activities proper to each society or common to both, and to determine what assistance shall be provided by each society in its respective provinces.

Because of this common direction and pooling of efforts, the members of one society may be employed in the houses or activities of the other society. The priests of the congregation often serve as chaplains in the houses of the brothers, according to ordinances drawn up by the respective provincial superiors regulating the residence, duties, and rights of these chaplains.

Purpose and Constitutions. The congregation has as its general goal the glory of God and the perfection of its individual members through the practice of the simple vows of poverty, chastity and obedience. The nature of the vows is, in general, identical with the traditional significance of the vows in similar congregations.

The special goals of the congregation, as specified in the constitutions, are: to follow Christ, to serve all people, believers and unbelievers alike, and to spread the Gospel and to work for the development of a more just and humane society.

In the first years of the congregation, each society of priests, brothers, and sisters had its own particular constitutions. At the time of papal approval in 1857 there existed only one summary text of constitutions for both priests and brothers. Each society, nevertheless, retained its own particular capitular rules, which were more detailed than the constitutions and served as a commentary on them. Some years later, the capitular rules were likewise unified into one volume for both societies. The text of both the constitutions and the capitular rules underwent successive modifications over the years. Finally, the general chapter of 1950 undertook a complete revision of the rules and constitutions, synthesizing them into one text henceforth known as the Constitutions of the Congregation of Holy Cross.

The constitutions were revised by the general chapter of 1968 to bring them into accord with the Second Vatican Council's call for the renewal of religious life. They were again separated into constitutions, which can be amended only with the approval of the Holy See, and statutes, which can be amended by an absolute majority of the general chapter. The governance of the congregation was decentralized so that the superior general was henceforth elected to a six-year term renewable once. His role became to "guide and govern," and many of his powers were given to the provincial superiors and their councils. After 1968, only a general chapter, not the superior general, could establish and suppress provinces.

The 1974 general chapter established an annual meeting of provincial superiors with the general administration as the Council of the Congregation. The general chapter of 1980 proposed that the office of superior general should not be restricted to priests, but should be open to any member of the congregation professed for at least ten years. This proposal was repeated by the general chapters of 1986, 1992, and 1998, but was not approved by the Holy See. The general chapter of 1986 rewrote the constitutions in an exhortative rather than a canonical style.

Activities. The congregation developed extensively in the United States where, in 2001, it had its greatest number of members and apostolic works. Three provinces of priests have headquarters located respectively at Notre Dame, Indiana; Bridgeport, Connecticut; and Austin, Texas. Three provinces of brothers have administrative centers at Notre Dame; New Rochelle, New York; and Austin. The Notre Dame province of priests is affiliated with the University of Notre Dame and the University of Portland in Oregon. It also owns Ave Maria Press, which publishes spiritual books and religious educational materials, and is engaged in multiple other phases of educational, parochial, social justice, and spiritual renewal in the United States. The Bridgeport province is affiliated with King's College in Wilkes-Barre, Pennsylvania, and Stonehill College, in North Easton, Massachusetts, in addition to parish and spiritual renewal ministry. The province is also responsible for Holy Cross Family Ministries, founded as the Family Rosary Crusade by Rev. Patrick J. Peyton. The Austin province is engaged in parochial work in Louisiana, Texas, and Mexico.

The Notre Dame brothers' province conducts high schools in two dioceses and Holy Cross College at Notre Dame, and directs schools for exceptional and needy boys in the United States. The brothers' provinces of New Rochelle (four dioceses) and Austin (four dioceses) engage in the same general type of apostolic work; St. Edward's University, Austin, is affiliated with the brothers of that province.

In Canada, the chief house of the priests' province is the Oratory of St. Joseph in Montreal, made famous by Brother André Besette, CSC, as an international center of devotion and pilgrimage in honor of St. Joseph. The Collège Notre-Dame, Montreal, is under the direction of the Canadian brothers' province. There are also other educational, parochial and missionary activities in other localities throughout the provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick. The Canadian priests' province directs the Fides publishing house, one of the largest religious publishers in Canada. The English Canadian priests' province is engaged in education, sponsoring schools in Welland and St. Catherine's in Ontario, and in parish work in Nova Scotia, Ontario, and Alberta.

Just as in the United States and Canada, the congregation carries out a twofold apostolate of education and parish ministry elsewhere in the world. In Bangladesh, the priests' province conducts Notre Dame College in Dhaka and staffs parishes throughout the country. The brothers' province conducts high schools in Dhaka and Chittagong. In India, the priests' province is engaged in education and parish ministry in the North East Territory, while the brothers conduct several schools in southern India.

There is one novitiate in Cascade, Colorado, used by all the provinces in North America. Other novitiates are located in India, Bangladesh, Ghana, Haiti, Peru, and Uganda. Houses of studies are maintained in Montreal, Notre Dame, and San Antonio in North America, and in Nairobi, Kenya; Santiago, Chile; Port-au-Prince, Haiti; Dhaka, Bangladesh; and Bangalore, India.

The priests' Notre Dame province in the United States is responsible for the district of Chile and, together with the New Rochelle brothers' province, for Uganda, Kenya, and Tanzania. The Canadian priests' Montreal province is responsible for districts in Haiti and Brazil. The Bridgeport priests' province is responsible for the district of Peru. The Canadian brothers' province is responsible for the brothers' district in India. The brothers' province of Austin operates two colleges in Brazil.

Since its foundation, the congregation has furnished to the Church several members who were raised to episcopal rank, including Cardinal John Francis O'Hara, Archbishop of Philadelphia (1951–1960) and most recently, Bishop Daniel R. Jenky, who was appointed the head of the Diocese of Peoria, Illinois, in January 2002.

In 2009 its members numbered 1,523 (734 priests), including two archbishops and eight bishops, in 221 houses (Catholic Almanac 2010, p. 467). Thirty percent of the members in 2009 were serving outside of North America and Europe.

HOLY CROSS, CONGREGATION OF SISTERS OF THE

(CSC; Official Catholic Directory #1920, 1930) In 1841 Bl. Basil Anthony MOREAU (beatified by Pope Benedict XVI on September 15, 2007) founded at Le Mans, France, the MARIANITES OF HOLY CROSS, a female counterpart to his community of priests and brothers. Out of the missions of the sisters in the United States and Canada, the Congregation of Sisters of the Holy Cross emerged.

In 1843 four Marianite Sisters of Holy Cross left France for the United States to join Father Edward SORIN, whom Moreau had sent to Indiana two years earlier. There, the sisters cared for the domestic service at the college (later University of NOTRE DAME) that Sorin had founded at South Bend. In addition, they opened their first school at Bertrand, Michigan, six miles north of Notre Dame. Their first pupils included Potawatomi Indians, deaf mutes, orphans, and neighboring children.

Additional sisters, trained by Mother Mary of Seven Dolors Gascoin, arrived from France and soon American girls also joined the community. One of the latter group, Eliza Gillespie, was sent to France for her novitiate. Upon her return to the United States, Mother Angela GILLESPIE greatly improved the congregation's educational program. In 1855 the community moved the convent, novitiate, and school to St. Mary's, Notre Dame, Indiana. Between 1855 and 1882, 45 schools were opened in the United States, and a curriculum of studies was organized and adapted to parochial and private schools.

With the outbreak of the Civil War the sisters responded to the government's call for nurses and were the first to serve on the hospital ship, Red Rover, plying the Mississippi, where fighting was heaviest. At the sacrifice of schools, which had to be closed temporarily in Washington, D.C., 80 members of the Holy Cross community staffed eight military hospitals in Illinois, Kentucky, Tennessee, Missouri, and the District of Columbia. This experience in hospital work later expanded into a large network of training schools and hospitals in the United States and clinics in foreign missions. In 2000, through a consolidation of resources with the Sisters of Mercy's Detroit Regional Health System, the Sisters of the Holy Cross hospital system became Trinity Health, the fourth largest Catholic healthcare system in the United States.

During the 1860s, communications with the motherhouse in France became increasingly difficult; accordingly, the government of the sisters was transferred from Moreau and the French motherhouse to Sorin and the province of Indiana. The sisters in France obtained papal approbation in 1869; those in the United States continued to live according to the rule given to them by Moreau. In 1882, with the permission of Bishop Joseph Dwenger of Fort Wayne, Indiana, they canonically elected Mother M. Augusta Anderson as superior general. Papal approbation of the U.S. Sisters of the Holy Cross was obtained in 1889.

Through the years, the community has exercised leadership in developing higher education for women. In the earliest curricula of what later became St. Mary's College, Notre Dame, Indiana, modern languages, artists-in-residence, and liberal and fine arts were integral. Following the establishment (1887) of the Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., one of its early rectors, Bp. Thomas SHAHAN, organized and conducted summer schools at St. Mary's. In 1874 St. Catherine's, a Holy Cross school in Baltimore, Maryland, held what was probably the first teacher-training institute for women under Catholic auspices. The establishment in 1944 of the Graduate School of Sacred Theology at St. Mary's, where lay and religious women can earn advanced degrees in sacred doctrine, was the work of Sister M. Madeleva Wolff, with the cooperation of eminent theologians.

When the Holy See assigned the missions in Bengal, India (1852), to the priests of Holy Cross, the sisters likewise became missionaries there. The American congregation has continued this work. In 1934 Rose Bernard Gehring, CSC, responding to episcopal and papal requests, organized a native sisterhood in Pakistan named the Associates of Mary, Queen of the Apostles. In 1947 the sisters opened a mission area in São Paulo, Brazil, where they conduct secondary schools and village mission stations. Graduates of St. Mary's College, Notre Dame, work as lay missionaries with the sisters in both Pakistan and Brazil. As of 2009, 509 sisters living in 101 houses were spread all throughout the United States, Bangladesh, Brazil, Uganda, Ghana, Mexico, India, and Peru (Catholic Almanac 2010, p. 489).

HOLY FAMILY, SONS OF THE

(Congregatio Filiorum Sacrae Familiae, SF; Official Catholic Directory #0640) This congregation of priests and brothers was founded in 1864 by St. José MANYANET Y VIVES (canonized by Pope JOHN PAUL II, May 16, 2004) in Tremp, Lerida, Spain. It was granted final approval by the Holy See in 1901. The purpose of the congregation is to promote devotion to the Holy Family and to foster Christian family life. This apostolate is accomplished through the education of youth and the organization of a family movement consisting of instruction in the faith and in the management of the ideal Catholic home. The early development of the congregation was slow and uncertain; political upheavals and persecutions, especially during the Spanish civil war, brought the society close to extinction. Not until the reconstruction in Spain in the 1940s did the Sons of the Holy Family begin to prosper. Since then they have spread outside Spain and have founded new schools and institutions. By the 1960s they were well established as a teaching society in Spain, Italy, and Argentina.

The Sons of the Holy Family came as missionaries to the United States in 1920 and worked in the Diocese of Santa Fe, New Mexico, among the Spanish-speaking people of the Southwest. The generalate is located in Barcelona, Spain. The United States headquarters is located in Silver Spring, Maryland. In 2009 there were 140 members living in 92 houses (Catholic Almanac 2010, p. 467).

HOPKO, VASIL', BL.

Also known as Basil; priest, bishop, MARTYR; b. Hrabské, Slovakia, April 21, 1904; d. Prešov, Slovakia, July 23, 1976; beatified by Pope JOHN PAUL II, September 14, 2003.

Vasil' Hopko was born in poverty to Vasil' Hopko and Anna Petrenko. His father died when the boy was one year old, and his mother left Slovakia for the United States when he was four (they reunited twenty-two years later). Cared for by his grandfather until age seven, Vasil' then went to live with his uncle, Demeter Petrenko, a Greek Catholic priest.

After attending the Greek Catholic Seminary of Presŏv, Hopko was ordained a priest on February 3, 1929, and he went to serve the Greek Catholic parish in Prague.

In 1936 he returned to Prešov, and in 1941 he was appointed secretary of the bishop's Curia. In 1943 he became professor of moral and pastoral theology at the Theological Faculty in Prešov, where he became the first editor of the magazine Blahovistnik (Gospel Messenger).

After WORLD WAR II, the Czechoslovakian Republic fell under Soviet Bolshevik and atheist influence. Facing the threat of COMMUNISM, (Bl.) Bishop Pavol Peter GOJDIČ of Prešov asked the HOLY SEE for an auxiliary bishop to help him defend against the attacks on the Greek Catholic Church. Fr. Hopko was ordained a bishop on May 11, 1947.

On April 28, 1950, the Communists declared the Greek Catholic Church of Czechoslovakia dissolved; Bishops Gojdič and Hopko were among those who refused to accept the dissolution.

After a show trial, on October 24, 1951, Bishop Hopko was condemned to fifteen years in prison, where he was beaten, starved, deprived of sleep, and forced to walk for hours. In failing physical and emotional health, he was released in May 1964 and transferred to a home for the aged at Osek in Bohemia.

He continued to contribute to the resurgence of the Greek Catholic Church, which occurred on June 13, 1968, during the "Prague Spring." On December 20, 1968, Pope PAUL VI confirmed his appointment as auxiliary bishop for all the Greek Catholic faithful in Czechoslovakia.

Bishop Hopko died on July 23, 1976, in Prešov. An autopsy revealed that he had been slowly poisoned in prison; his body had a level of arsenic a thousand times above established human tolerance. Because his death resulted from his imprisonment, he is considered a MARTYR.

In his homily on September 14, 2003, in Bratislava, Pope John Paul II called him a "radiant example of faithfulness in times of harsh and ruthless religious persecution."

Feast: June 23.

HÖSS, CRESCENTIA, ST.

Baptized Anna; eminent mystic of the Franciscan Third Order; b. Kaufbeuren, Bavaria, October 20, 1682; d. Kaufbeuren, April 5, 1744; beatified October 7, 1900; canonized by Pope JOHN PAUL II on November 25, 2001.

The sixth of eight children of a weaver and a barber-surgeon, from her childhood she showed unusual spiritual maturity and special regard for VIRGINITY. Known for her exceptional intelligence and beautiful singing voice as a youth, Höss's desire to enter the convent was initially frustrated. Subjected to scrutiny by the other sisters because of her lack of a dowry, her entrance was aided by the benevolence of a Protestant burgomeister who had often come to hear her sing at the local Mass, and she was accepted as a novice in 1703. There she endured continued trials that developed her religious perfection and allowed her to deal charitably with her fellow sisters and those they served. Appointed portress in 1710, she became well known for her hospitality, and soon many came to seek her counsel. Receiving hundreds of letters each year, from both poor and aristocratic individuals, Höss's reputation as a wise spiritual counselor became one of the hallmarks of her life as a sister. During her appointments as mistress of novices (1717) and superior (1741), her directives were known to be marked with keen discernment, decisiveness, and charity. She also displayed a continued interest in the arts, as she commissioned paintings often depicting her mystical experiences and composed songs and poems. She continued to experience visions, ecstasy, and mystical suffering of the Passion until her death.

Beatified on October 7, 1900, Höss was canonized after the miraculous recovery of a young girl who had nearly drowned in 1986. On November 25, 2001, during the canonization Mass in VATICAN CITY, John Paul II recalled how she had used her God-given talents for the service of the Kingdom, and he described her as a "midwife" who "helped those seeking counsel to bring forth the truth in their hearts."

Feast: April 6 (formerly April 5).

HOUBEN, CHARLES OF MOUNT ARGUS, ST.

Baptized Johannes Andreas; Passionist missionary priest; b. December 11, 1821, Munstergeleen, The Netherlands; d. January 5, 1893, Dublin, Ireland; beatified by Pope JOHN PAUL II, October 16, 1988; canonized by Pope BENEDICT XVI, June 3, 2007.

The fourth of eleven children of his parents, Peter Joseph and Elizabeth, Houben had difficulties with his studies, but he persevered and realized his religious vocation. From an early age Houben displayed a deep interior life, as he would regularly stop by the local church on the way home from school and frequently participate in adoration of the Blessed Sacrament. At the age of nineteen he entered the military. After serving for five years (1840–1845), Houben entered the Passionist novitiate at Ere (1845), took his vows (1846) and the name Charles of St. Andrew, and was ordained (1850). Thereafter he worked among the poor and humble in England. In July 1857 he was assigned to the newly established Mt. Argus Retreat House in Dublin, Ireland, where he immediately began to celebrate Mass twice a day and hear confessions from morning to evening, to accommodate the large number of people who came to Mt. Argus. Though initially given the task of collecting donations to help pay for the monastery's building costs, Houben quickly became known for his generosity in offering counsel and blessings to those who would come to the monastery and call for him. Many testified to miraculous cures through these blessings, and crowds of both Catholics and non-Catholics began to gather at Mt. Argus daily, traveling from all over Great Britain and even from America. Ill and exhausted from his ministry, Houben was sent to England in 1866, in hopes of regaining health. In 1874 he eventually returned to Dublin, where he would spend the rest of his life. Houben suffered patiently in his later years; he died in 1893 of erysipelas from a leg wound he had received twelve years earlier in a carriage accident. Since 1949 his relics have been interred in the Passionist church at Mt. Argus.

Beatified in 1988, Houben would be canonized after the miraculous cure of Adolf Dormans of Munstergeleen, who suffered a ruptured appendix that had infected other internal organs.

Houben was then canonized on June 3, 2007, in VATICAN CITY, where Benedict XVI recalled the saint's constant devotion to the "Crucified Christ" and the testimony of his life that had caused the Passionist superior to observe at his funeral: "The people have already declared him a saint."

HUMILIS DE BISIGNANO, ST.

Franciscan religious; christened Lucia Antonio; b. Bisignano (Cosenza), Italy, 1582; d. Bisignano, November 26, 1637; beatified January 29, 1882, by Pope LEO XIII; canonized May 19, 2002, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

Born to Giovanni Pirozzo and Ginevra Giardino and raised in an agricultural village in southern Italy, Humilis de Bisignano was recognized, even at an early age, for his faith and Christian zeal. He was known to attend daily Mass and to constantly ponder the life and message of Christ while laboring in the fields.

As a young man, Humilis became a member of the Sodality of the Immaculate Conception, which encouraged devotion to the Blessed Virgin and personal holiness. His renown for piety and humility continued to grow. A story is told in which Humilis was publically struck in the face. Rather than respond with force, he restrained himself and, following the witness of Christ, offered the other cheek. Although he desired to enter the religious life at the age of eighteen, Humilis was accepted as a postulant nine years later when he presented himself to the Franciscan order. He became a lay brother with the Observant Franciscans, taking the name Humilis on September 4, 1610, the day of his profession.

His life as a lay Franciscan consisted of manual labor and unskilled jobs entrusted by his superiors. His daily tasks included gardening and petitioning for alms, while being occupied by prayer and service to the community. Additionally, Humilis was devoted to sharing with the poor of Mesoraca, the town housing the friary.

Over the course of his life, Humilis was known for two great gifts, his holiness and his impressive theological understanding. In terms of holiness, Humilis demonstrated tremendous dedication to prayer as well as personal mortifications. He was devoted to fasting and took on difficult ascetic practices. Additionally, humility became his trademark. Humilis took seriously the rule of the order and lived a life of simple obedience to his superiors. In addition to his humility, piety, and prayerfulness, he was also given to ecstasies. These experiences were so frequent that he was known as the "ecstatic friar." However, these spiritual occurrences provided an added cross for Humilis to bear, as his superiors tested him rigorously in order to discern the reality and fruitfulness of these ecstatic episodes. However, being a humble servant, Humilis persevered in prayer and fidelity.

Beyond his exceptional spirituality, Humilis was regarded for his impressive learning and wisdom. Although he was raised in a working family and remained illiterate throughout his life, Humilis showed such profound understanding of the scriptures and theology that he left theologians baffled. Word of his acumen spread quickly, and Humilis was summoned to Rome by Pope GREGORY XV for council. Humilis remained in Rome for several years, serving Gregory XV as well as URBAN VIII in a theological capacity. Upon his return from Rome, he continued to serve others in the friary. In 1628 Humilis petitioned his superiors to take part in the missions, but, with characteristic humility and obedience, accepted their denial. He remained dedicated to prayer, community life, and the needs of the less fortunate until his death on November 26, 1637.

Humilis was beatified on January 29, 1882, by Pope Leo XIII and canonized on May 19, 2002, PENTECOST Sunday, by Pope John Paul II. In his HOMILY, John Paul II compared St. Humilis's life to the experience of the Apostles in the upper room when the risen Christ offered to them the gift of his peace. John Paul II explained that St. Humilis "became the constant bearer of the peace of Christ which is also the principle that has to inspire social peace." Focusing on Humilis's personal holiness and love of his neighbor, John Paul II highlighted the profound witness given by this new saint's "joyful and encouraging invitation to meekness, kindness, simplicity, and a healthy detachment from the transient goods of this world."

HURTADO CRUCHAGA, ALBERTO, ST.

Jesuit priest; b. Viña del Mar, Chile, January 22, 1901; d. Santiago de Chile, August 18, 1952; beatified October 16, 1994, by Pope JOHN PAUL II; canonized October 23, 2005, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

Alberto Hurtado Cruchaga, known as the "Apostle of the Poor," experienced poverty himself following the death of his aristocratic father when he was four. While attending the Jesuit Colegio San Ignacio (1909–1917) in Santiago, he spent his Sunday afternoons attending the city's poor. He postponed entering the Jesuit novitiate until August 14, 1923, in order to support his family, complete his military service, and earn a law degree (August 1923) at the Catholic University of Santiago. In the midst of his law studies, Hurtado remained committed to serving the poor, organizing a legal clinic for workers and participating in a study circle dedicated to the reading of the Church's social encyclicals.

Hurtado entered the Jesuit novitiate at Chillán (1923–1924) and Córdoba, Argentina (1925). After professing his first vows on August 15, 1925, he continued his studies in the humanities, philosophy, and theology in Spain (1927–1932), Ireland, and finally Belgium, where he was ordained at Louvain in 1933. After completing his final year of training at Drongen, he returned to Santiago de Chile in 1936 to teach theology at the Colegio San Ignacio and pedagogy at Catholic University of Santiago.

As a teacher and frequent retreat master, Fr. Hurtado affected the lives of many young men. He fostered more than one hundred priestly vocations and led others to committed service as laymen. In 1941 he undertook the chaplaincy of CATHOLIC ACTION's youth movement in Santiago, and later nationally. In 1944, having been moved by the experience of being approached by a suffering, homeless man, the charismatic priest challenged female retreatants to assist the city's poor:

> Christ roams through our streets in the person of so many suffering poor, sick, dispossessed and people thrown out of their miserable slums; Christ huddled under bridges, in the person of so many children who lack someone to call father, who have been deprived for many a year of a mother's kiss upon their foreheads.... Christ is without a home! (Centro de Estudios y Documentación "Padre Hurtado" de la Pontificia Universidad Católica de Chile)

Their response resulted in the first donations to help found El Hogar de Cristo (Christ's Home), housing for homeless children, which would eventually be extended to adults, providing vocational training and rehabilitation. In 1945 to 1946, while studying sociology at the Catholic University of America and residing with the Jesuit community at Georgetown University in Washington, D.C., Fr. Hurtado visited Fr. FLANAGAN's Boys Town in Nebraska, finding inspiration for his own Chilean project, and in 1946 El Hogar de Cristo began its inaugural year.

The following year, Hurtado founded the Chilean Trade Union Association (ASICH) based on the social teachings of the Church. His last years were spent extending his work and the social teachings of the Church. He died in 1952 of pancreatic cancer.

Hurtado's most famous composition is Is Chile a Catholic Country? (1941). Between 1947 and 1950, he wrote on the Church's social teachings, including Social Humanism, On Unions, and The Christian Social Order. In 1951 he founded the journal Mensaje (Messages) to further explain magisterial teaching on social justice.

Hurtado was beatified on October 16, 1994. The final miracle for his canonization occurred in 1996 when Vivian Galleguillos Fuentes, a sixteen-year-old Chilean girl, left brain-dead and comatose after an automobile accident, was miraculously healed after her father prayed at El Hogar de Cristo.

Hurtado was canonized in Vatican City on October 23, 2005, during the Mass that concluded the Synod on the Eucharist and the Year of the Eucharist. In his HOMILY, Pope Benedict XVI highlighted Hurtado's Jesuit formation, prayer, and frequent adoration of the Eucharist as the source of his apostolate to the poor, stating that the saint wished to "identify himself with the Lord and love the poor with this same love."

Feast: August 18 (Jesuits).

I

IGNATIUS OF SANTHIÀ, ST.

Baptized Lorenzo Maurizio Belvisotti; priest; b. June 6, 1686, Santhià, Italy; d. September 22, 1770, Turin, Italy; beatified April 17, 1966, by Pope PAUL VI; canonized May 19, 2002, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

Lorenzo Maurizio was the fourth of six children born to Pierpaolo Belvisotti and Maria Elisabetta Balocco; the family was financially secure and well-positioned socially. The Belvisottis suffered a great loss when Pierpaolo died while Lorenzo was still a child. The boy was educated under the supervision of a priest and realized that he had a vocation to religious life. Fr. Belvisotti was ordained in the Diocese of Vercelli in 1710.

Fr. Belvisotti became first a canon and then a parish priest. Though he was situated to advance in the hierarchy of the Vercelli Diocese, he felt the call to a more contemplative life. To the surprise of many, he joined the Friars Minor Capuchin of Turin in 1716, and took the name Ignatius. During his year as a novice, the thirty-year-old priest was placed under the guidance of a very young member of the order, a situation that he accepted with characteristic humility. On May 24, 1717, he was professed in the order. Fr. Ignatius served as a SACRISTAN at the convent of Saluzzo and an assistant novice-master at Chieri. In 1723 he was assigned to the Convento del Monte in Turin. Each of the convent's eighty-seven priests performed daily Mass; Fr. Ignatius served ably in the very difficult role of sacristan. In 1731 Fr. Ignatius became the novice-master at the convent of Mondovi, where he remained for thirteen years, until an eye disease of unknown etiology forced his resignation from the post. In accounts of the episode, Fr. Ignatius is said to have given his own eyeglasses to a Franciscan novice, Bernardino da Vezza, who could not continue missionary work due to severe vision problems. The novice was healed of his condition, however, at the same time Fr. Ignatius acquired an infection that took two years to heal.

After his recovery, Fr. Ignatius was assigned as senior chaplain to the Piedmontese armies of the King of Sardinia, Charles Emmanuel III. The king's army was engaged in repelling invading French and Spanish forces, and the Capuchins, upon request of the sovereign, furnished medical care and spiritual guidance. Fr. Ignatius worked long hours comforting the sick and dying in the hospitals and on the fields of battle. In 1746 hostilities ended, and Fr. Ignatius returned to Convento del Monte, where he remained until his death, in the roles of spiritual instructor and confessor to the lay brothers. Even at an advanced age, the priest visited the sick and poor of Turin and participated in the Franciscan duty of begging alms to support the work of the convent. Fr. Ignatius gained a reputation as a devout and obedient servant of God, and many visited the convent to ask for his blessing. In the final two years of his life, he was confined to the convent's infirmary, where he continued to hear confessions and provide a spiritual example to his Franciscan brothers and the lay population. At his death, he had served as a Capuchin friar for fifty-four years.

On March 17, 1827, Pope LEO XII venerated Fr. Ignatius. Pope Paul VI beatified him on April 17, 1966. In his homily, the pope called the new Blessed "admirable in every aspect of his Franciscan life." On December 20, 2001, the Congregation for the Causes of Saints promulgated a decree regarding a miracle attributed to Blessed Ignatius of Santhià. The miracle was approved by Pope John Paul II. In canonizing St. Ignatius of Santhià, the pope said the priest "lived uniquely the mission of forgiving sins and of guiding men and women on the paths of evangelical perfection.... Even today he continues to remind everyone of the values of poverty, simplicity and authentic Christian life."

Feast: September 22.

IMPRIMATUR

In Latin Imprimatur means Let it be printed, indicating the permission granted by the BISHOP of a DIOCESE to print or publish a book or other material written by a ROMAN CATHOLIC on matters regarding the FAITH AND MORALS. This permission is given by the bishop or the local ordinary and follows the Nihil obstat (nothing hinders), a declaration by the censor appointed by the bishop that the writing is free of errors regarding faith and morals. The censor works with the author in case of inaccuracies or other problems. When a member of a religious order writes a work, the superior issues the Imprimi potest or Able to be printed.

Neither the Nihil obstat nor the Imprimatur indicates that the censor or ordinary agrees with the content of the book, that it is free of inaccuracies, or that it can be considered an official text of the Church. It simply states that the book does not contain anything that contradicts Catholic DOGMA and morals. The Nihil obstat and Imprimatur appear in front of the book as typed stamps and signatures (with name and title) followed by the date and place of signing. Subsequent versions or editions of the work require a new Imprimatur, which can be revoked if doctrinal errors are discovered upon further examination.

History of the Imprimatur. The scope, modality, and procedures of the Imprimatur have changed during the history of the Church. The early Church proscribed the Apocrypha, or noncanonical Scriptures, and various councils and synods did the same with heretical and superstitious writings as well as forgeries of acts of martyrs and PENITENTIALS. The Decretum gelasianum (405) of Pope St. INNOCENT I is considered the first Roman Index of prohibited (forbidden) books. Preventive censorship was requested as early as the fourth century by St. AMBROSE and in the fifth by GENNADIUS. With the numerous heresies of the twelfth to fourteenth centuries, prohibitions of books became numerous, and decrees were issued against heretical translations of the BIBLE, and restrictions were imposed on reading the Bible in the vernacular, the language of a country or locality.

By papal statutes in 1342 the professors of the University of Paris had to submit their lectures to the chancellor and THEOLOGY professors before distributing them to the booksellers. In the fourteenth century all the universities had similar statutes. However, as long as the books were handwritten and literacy remained restricted, there was no need for preventive censorship. This changed in the fifteenth century with the invention of the printing press (1440). Pope SIXTUS IV granted the right of censorship to a few German dioceses. Later in 1487 INNOCENT VIII prescribed censorship for the entire Church and in 1515 entrusted its implementation to the bishops (the equivalent of the Imprimatur) and to the inquisitor. The printing press, the explosion of knowledge, the secularizing influence of the RENAISSANCE, and the Protestant Reformation made it imperative for the Church to preserve the uniformity of teaching and LITURGY. The General Inquisition took charge in 1542 of the supervision of books and in 1543 composed a catalog of forbidden books.

The Council of Trent (1545–1563) in 1546 established that any religious book needed an Imprimatur from the Church. In the sixteenth century various catalogs of forbidden books were published by political and ecclesiastical authorities, but the 1559 catalog of the INQUISITION was the first Roman list meant for the whole world; it was also the very first one that bore the title Index. Emphasis was put on education: In 1560 the CONFRATERNITY OF CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE

(CCD) was established and in 1566, the first general Catholic catechism—Catechismus romanus—was issued, although there had been prior, a less-universal CATECHISMS. A commission was appointed in 1562 to draft an Index of Forbidden Books, and in 1564 Pope PIUS IV published the Index librorum prohibitorum that served as a guide for future censors and compilers: All heretical, superstitious, and immoral (obscene) books were prohibited as well as all Latin translations of the Bible. EXCOMMUNICATION was decreed for those who possessed and read heretical books.

The updating of the Index and punitive sanctions included the establishment of the Congregatio indicis librorum prohibitorum (1571), the abolition of the excommunication for publishers and authors not submitting their works to censorship by PIUS IX (1869), the reforms by LEO XIII (1897) and PIUS X (1905), in addition to numerous papal bullaria, dispositions of various dicasteries of the Roman Curia, and decisions of the Roman Rota, the Catholic Church's highest tribunal. Rejection of the vernacular versions of the Bible, the Index of Forbidden Books, and the Imprimatur were among the major mechanisms to preserve the purity of DOCTRINE.

Developments during the 1800s to 1900s. The upheavals of the FRENCH REVOLUTION and the Napoleonic era, including the promulgation of the Napoleonic code in 1804, combined with the growing SECULARISM of society, impelled the Catholic Church to codify its laws. The various collections of ecclesiastical laws and decrees that had begun in the early centuries of Christianity culminated during the Tridentine reform in the Corpus iuris canonici, but changes were needed, as was noted during the VATICAN COUNCIL I (1869–1870). However, the alleged opposition of the Roman Curia delayed the systematization of Church laws until 1904 when Pius X authorized the codification of the canon law. The code was completed in 1917 through a laborious process and promulgated for the ROMAN RITE by BENEDICT XV in 1918 as Codex iuris canonici with a clear centralizing intent and the inclusion of new norms. Canon 1398 provided that prohibited books could not be published, read, held, sold, translated, or passed on (an all-inclusive prohibition). Canon 1399 prohibited editions of Sacred Scriptures by non-Catholics; books written by anyone propagating HERESY or attacks on religion and good morals in any form; books written by non-Catholics on religion, except if proven acceptable; books dealing with VISIONS, apparitions, superstitions, MAGIC, or divinations; books advocating DUELING, SUICIDE, or DIVORCE; books with obscenities; liturgical books at variance with those approved by the APOSTOLIC SEE; and books dealing with apocryphal INDULGENCES or with portraits of JESUS, Mary, and saints that were at odds with Church decrees.

Developments since the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965). With the assistance of a young Joseph RATZINGER, Cardinal Joseph Frings (1887–1978) leveled a sharp criticism of the Holy Office (known before 1908 as the Holy Roman and Universal Inquisition). Lumen gentium, the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church gave renewed importance to the bishops who collectively succeed the college of the Apostles and who govern the Church "in communion" with the successor of Peter. Pope PAUL VI reorganized the Congregation of the Holy Office and renamed it Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, providing new procedures to examine doctrines. The 1975 decree Ecclesiae pastorum reorganized the matter of book censorship and stated that the pastors of the Church have the duty and the right to be vigilant and condemn books and writings that attack faith or morals. The decree demanded that the publication of writing concerning the faith and morals should be submitted to the Church's approval. This mandate was reiterated in canon 823 of the 1983 Code of Canon Law. Canon 823 states that the pastors of the Church (the pope and bishops) have the right and duty to demand that any writing destined for public distributions, prepared by the Christian faithful (no longer books written by everyone) and touching on faith or morals be submitted to their judgment before publication (pre-publication censorship). Canon 824 states that the permission to publish a book must be sought by the local ordinary of the author or the place where the book is published. Canon 825 provides that the "approval" of the Apostolic See or the conference of bishops, not just the ordinary, is required to publish original texts of the sacred Scriptures or their translation, which must be accompanied by necessary and sufficient annotations, into vernacular; the local ordinary has jurisdiction over books of prayers. In canon 827 the Imprimatur is requested for three types of books: (a) catechisms and catechetical material (and their translations), though not for writings about catechetics; (b) textbooks in scripture, theology, canon law, Church history, as well as religious, moral, and other sacred disciplines. Reference here is made to all levels of schooling that take place in official Catholic schools. It recommends that non-textbook writings in all these disciplines be submitted to the local ordinary. Canon 828 requires previous approval of the ordinary for the reprint of official decrees and acts (proceedings) of the Church. Meanwhile, Canon 838 on liturgical books establishes a clear hierarchy of jurisdictions and competencies. Article 2 reserves to the Apostolic See to order liturgy for the universal Church, including liturgical books; article 3 states that the conference of bishops can publish vernacular translations of liturgical books only after prior review of the Holy See; article 4 authorizes the local bishop to issue liturgical norms "within the limits of his competence."

In 1984 two American bishops were asked to withdraw their Imprimatur on a catechism and on a book on sexual MORALITY. In 1998 the U.S. bishops withdrew their 1995 Imprimatur on a Psalter under instruction of then Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger. Some critics see in these interventions an indication of centralization and of the erosion of the principle of SUBSIDIARITY. However, canon law is based on theological principles and, therefore, its practice is based on the Magisterium of the collective governance of the Church. Moreover, it seems reasonable to expect the assistance of the experts of central Congregations in matters of Scriptures and difficult theological issues that affect the whole Church. The new norms guarantee due process and other rights to authors who come under scrutiny. The writing under scrutiny goes through a multi-step process of evaluation, beginning with experts, then going to a standing committee of experts of the Congregation, then to all the members of the congregation, and finally to the pope. The author under scrutiny is given an opportunity to respond, but if the reply is judged insufficient a Notification of his erroneous propositions is published. Notifications issued from the 1960s to 2006 with an explanation of the issues and the reasons for the Notification can be read on the Congregation's Web site, available at http://www.vatican.va/roman_curia/congregations/cfaith/index.htm.

The guarantee of uniform teaching by a hierarchical structure stands out as an exception in twenty-first century society, which is often described in terms of relativization of cultural and disciplinary boundaries as well as fragmentation of social institutions. The millennial continuity of the Church governance and the individual and institutional integration once provided by the state are in sharp discontinuity with the much needed governance of global affairs that is described by some in terms of "chaos theory" and by others with references to "Empire" or military hegemony.

INTERDICT

Second only to EXCOMMUNICATION in terms of severity, according to the Code of Canon Law (c. 1331), the ecclesiastical penalty of interdict essentially prohibits one's access to the Church's liturgical and sacramental life (c. 1332). Evidence of what eventually developed into the modern form of interdict can be found as early as the Patristic Age, but the sanction reached its zenith only under Pope INNOCENT III. Since that time, however, interdict has been in slow, steady decline. Post–Vatican II calls to drop interdict entirely from what would be the Johanno-Pauline Code were rejected, but with each major reform of penal canon law, interdict gives additional signs of drifting toward desuetude.

Because interdict is an ecclesiastical penalty, it can only be imposed in response to criminal violations of ecclesiastical law (cc. 221, 1311–1312, 1400–1401). Notwithstanding that the conduct criminalized in canon law today is gravely morally wrong in itself, interdict is most properly understood in the specific context of crime, not sin. However, because interdict is classified along with excommunication and suspension as a canonical censure (c. 1312), interdict has as its primary goal the reform and reconciliation of the offender. The possibility of applying interdict as an expiatory penalty (olim vindicative penalty) was eliminated during the postconciliar reform of canon law.

A single norm of the Johanno-Pauline Code, canon 1332, describes interdict as if it were a mitigated form of excommunication; indeed, in most respects, interdict is distinguishable from excommunication only in that interdict does not affect an offender's ability to serve in ecclesiastical office (such as is also seen in the norm on suspension, c. 1333). But some important aspects of interdict are lost if it is regarded only as a hybrid between excommunication and suspension. First, while suspension can only affect clerics, interdict (like excommunication) can be imposed on any member of the faithful. Second, unlike excommunication (but like suspension), interdict is not understood to affect one's juridical communion with the Church (1917 CIC 2268). In this light, it becomes clear why occasional references to interdict as a "minor excommunication" should be read with caution: Excommunication implies a juridical break in communion between an offender and the Church, whereas interdict connotes no such rupture. Moreover, minor excommunication, properly so-called, differs from modern interdict in several respects, including its manner of incurrence and the scope of its consequences. Finally, most authors after Vatican I have held that minor excommunication had been eliminated under Pope PIUS IX's great reform of penal law in 1869, an opinion that was confirmed by the Holy Office as early as December 1883.

Modern interdict prohibits an offender from having ministerial (generally understood as leadership) participation in liturgy and restricts (with certain exceptions, cc. 1335, 1338) one's right "to celebrate the sacraments or sacramentals and to receive the sacraments" (c. 1332). Incidentally, the fact that the modern prohibition regarding reception of the sacraments is complete, instead prohibiting an offender only from certain sacraments as was repeatedly urged during the revision process, is a sign that the Church is not ready to dispose of interdict from her penal system.

The number of offenses for which interdict is an express possibility is small: physical attack on a bishop (c. 1370); inciting animosity or hatred against the APOSTOLIC SEE or an ordinary (c. 1373); promoting an association that plots against the Church (c. 1374); simulation of certain sacraments (c. 1378); simoniac celebration of a sacrament (c. 1380); false accusation of a confessor (c. 1390); and attempted civil marriage by a religious (c. 1394). To these, however, should be added several penal norms that authorize the imposition of a "censure" without specifying the type of censure (cc. 1366, 1372, 1385, and 1390), and a number of norms that authorize the imposition of an unspecified "just penalty" in response to delictual behavior (e.g., cc. 1365, 1369, 1393).

Interdict, like other censures, can be incurred automatically (latae sententiae) or imposed or declared formally (ferendae sententiae), depending on the penal norm in question, but interdict formally incurred carries with it somewhat higher consequences (c. 1332). In any case, canon law's preference that formal procedures be followed in the penal cases (cc. 221, 1314, 1341–1342) should be recalled. So, too, should the fact that one "who withdraws from contumacy" has a right to relief from interdict (c. 1358). A few non-penal but noteworthy consequences of interdict can be found in other books of the revised code, for example, the inability of those under interdict to serve as godparents (c. 874) or as the official witnesses of a Catholic marriage (c. 1109).

Perhaps the most notable change between the former Pio-Benedictine discipline on interdict and that found in the revised law is that interdict today can be applied only to specific human persons. Earlier norms by which interdict could be applied to a class of persons based solely on the fact of their membership in a group (such as all members of a religious house), or upon all persons in or attached to a territory (such as all persons residing in a parish or city), have been eliminated. Whatever might be said in defense of such penalties at other points in history, it was concluded that indiscriminate punishment of persons without showing a personal culpability was inconsistent with justice in general and with the medicinal goals of censures in particular. Even before the formal elimination of territorial or class interdicts from current canon law, territorial or group interdicts were rarely applied out of concern for their impact on the innocent residents of territories or members of those classes.

INTERNATIONAL THEOLOGICAL COMMISSION

Pope PAUL VI, in response to a recommendation made during VATICAN COUNCIL II and the specific proposal of the 1967 SYNOD OF BISHOPS, established the International Theological Commission (ITC) on April 28, 1969. The function of the ITC is "to study doctrinal questions of major importance in order to offer advisory assistance to the Holy See and, in particular, the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith." It has only a consultative and not a deliberative voice in the functioning of the ordinary Magisterium of the Church.

Format. The commission consists of thirty members chosen by the pope from names recommended by the cardinal prefect of the Congregation for the DOCTRINE OF THE FAITH (CDF) after consultation with the national episcopal conferences. The members, representing various nations and diverse schools of theology, are chosen for their proficiency in one or another of the theological disciplines and for their fidelity to the Magisterium. The initial appointment is for five years and may be renewed for another quinquennium. The cardinal prefect of the CDF presides over the commission and is assisted in the administration by a secretary general.

When the commission was first established in 1969, it had among its members many of the most prestigious Catholic theologians of the time. Several had been periti at the Second Vatican Council: Hans Urs von BALTHASAR, Louis Bouyer, Yves CONGAR, O.P., Philippe Delhaye, André Feuillet, P.S.S., Henri de LUBAC, S.J., Gerard Philips, Karl RAHNER, S.J., Joseph RATZINGER, and Rudolf Schnackenburg. The English-speaking theological community was represented by Barnabas AHERN, C.P., Walter Burghhardt, S.J., and Bernard LONERGAN, S.J. Several of these were reappointed for the second quinquennium (1974), and they were joined by Edouard Hamel, S.J., and Jean-Marie TILLARD, O.P. (Canada), and John Mahoney, S.J., (England). Half the appointees named to the commission in 1980 by Pope JOHN PAUL II were holdovers; new members included Michael Ledwith (Ireland), Carl PETER (United States), Walter Principe, C.S.B. (Canada), John Thornhill, S.M. (Australia), and Christoph von SCHÖNBORN (Switzerland).

In 1986 a new term of the commission began. Among the members were the distinguished theologians Hans Urs von Balthasar and Georges Cottier, O.P. (Switzerland), Giuseppe Colombo (Italy), Jean Corbon (Lebanon), Philippe Delhaye and Jan Walgrave, O.P. (Belgium), and Joachim Gnilka and Walter Kasper (West Germany). At the time of their appointment in 1986, Bonaventura Kloppenburg, O.F.M. (Brazil) and Franc Perko (Yugoslavia) were auxiliary bishops. The English-speaking world was represented by John Finnis (England), Gilles Langevin (Canada), Michael Ledwith (Ireland), Carl Peter and William May (United States), Francis Moloney, S.D.B. (Australia), and Felix Wilfred (India). Professors Finnis (Oxford University) and May (The Catholic University of America) were the first laymen to be appointed to the commission. By the end of the quinquennium in 1991, several members had been named diocesan bishops and were no longer eligible to serve on the commission, whose function is to offer informed advice to the Magisterium. By reason of their position as residential bishops, Walter Kasper, André-Jean Léonard (who had been appointed to the commission to replace the deceased Walgrave), Jorge Medina Estevez (Chile), a member from the beginning, and Franc Perko all belonged to the Magisterium.

Among internationally significant theologians appointed to the commission in 1992, Colombo, Corbon, and Gnilka continued to give their prestigious service. They were joined by Joseph Doré, S.S., (France), Adolphe Gesché (Belgium), Hermann Pottmeyer (Germany), and Max Thurian (Switzerland and Italy). Langevin, Ledwith, May, and Moloney, joined by Avery DULLES, S.J. (United States), Charles ACTON (England), Sebastian Karotemprel, S.D.B. (India), and Joseph Osei-Bonsu (Ghana), represented the English-speaking theological community. A longstanding member of the Commission, Christoph von Schönborn, O.P., and three first-time members, Joseph Doré, S.S., Norbert Strotmann Hoppe, M.S.C. (Peru), and Joseph Osei-Bonsu, were appointed bishops during the course of the quinquennium. Professor Gösta Hallonsten (Sweden) was a new lay member of the commission, replacing Professor Finnis. During the course of the quinquennium, Max Thurian passed away and was not replaced.

Appointees in 1997 for a new quinquennium included holdovers Pottmeyer and Gesché, as well as three-termers Francis Moloney, S.D.B., Jean-Louis Bruguès, O.P., and Henrique Noronha Galvão. They were joined by new members: Roland Minnerath (France), Bruno Forte (Italy), Gerhard Müller (Germany), and several lesser known theologians. The anglophone world was represented by Charles Acton (England), Christopher Begg and Joseph Di Noia, O.P. (United States), George Karakunnel and Sebastian Karotemprel, S.D.B. (India), Thomas Norris (Ireland), Anthony Ojo (Nigeria), and Luis Tagle (Philippines). An obvious effort was made to internationalize the commission further with the appointments of Tanios Bou Mansour, O.L.M. (Lebanon), Fadel Sidarouss, S.J. (Egypt), and Rafael Salzar Cardenas, M.Sp.S. (Mexico). The increased internationalization of the commission has had the unintended result of a diminution of the representation of the European centers of theological learning and, to some extent, a lessening of the expertise of the group as a whole. It has also made communication more difficult, especially in the subcommissions where instantaneous translation is not generally available.

Of the theologians appointed in 2004, Santiago del Cura Elena, Bruno Forte, Pierre Gaudette, Roland Minnerath, and Thomas Norris were holdovers. Before the first meeting Forte and Minnerath were elevated to the episcopacy; during its quinquennium Basil Cho (Korea) and Ignazio Sanna (Italy) also received episcopal ordination; at its termination its new Spanish secretary, Luis Ladaria, S.J., was ordained archbishop and appointed secretary to the CDF. The commission's international composition was clearly manifested with the nomination of Peter Damian Akpunonu (Nigeria) and Leonard Santedi Kinkupu (Democratic Republic of the Congo), Savio Hon Tai-fai (China), Paul Rouhana (Lebanon), and Dominic Veliath, S.D.B. (India). Eastern Europe was well represented with Tomislav Ivančić (Croatia), István Ivancsó (Hungary), and Jerzy Szymik (Poland). This commission was notable for the first inclusion of female theologians: Sara Butler, M.S.B.T. (United States) and Barbara Hallensleben (Switzerland). Other representatives of the anglophone world included Anthony Kelly, C.Ss.R. (Australia), John McDermott, S.J. (United States), and Paul McPartlan (England). Latin America contributed Geraldo Borges Hackmann (Brazil), Ricardo Ferrara (Argentina) and Antonio Castellano, S.D.B. (Chile). Western Europeans, however, still dominated with the Dominicans Serge Bonino (France) and Giles Emery (Switzerland), as well as Adelbert Denaux (Belgium), Jan Liesen (Holland), and Johannes Reiter and Thomas Söding (Germany).

In the first thirty years the commission had only two presidents. Cardinal Franjo Seper, prefect of the CDF during the latter part of Pope Paul VI's pontificate, presided from 1969 to 1981. Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger became president in 1981, when Pope JOHN PAUL II appointed him as prefect of the CDF. With his election to the papacy he resigned the presidency and named Cardinal William Levada prefect of the CDF. Monsignor Philippe Delhaye of Belgium served as secretary general of the commission from 1972 until 1989, when ill health forced him to resign. Cardinal Ratzinger appointed Georges Cottier, O.P., of Switzerland to replace Delhaye in 1990. Cottier was replaced by Luis Ladaria, S.J., of Spain in 2004.

Procedures and Themes. The commission begins each quinquennium with a wide-ranging discussion of a number of theological issues that the members regard as worthy of the HOLY SEE's attention. The themes that are chosen for examination become the focal points of the commission in the following four years. In its early years the commission examined and published documents dealing with sacerdotal ministry (1971); the unity of faith and theological pluralism (1972); the apostolicity of the Church and APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION (1973); criteria for the knowledge of Christian morality (1974); the relation between the Magisterium and theologians (1975); Christian SALVATION and human progress (1976); and the sacrament of marriage (1977). These were followed by published statements dealing with the selected questions in CHRISTOLOGY (1979); theology, christology, and anthropology (1981); reconciliation and PENANCE (1982); and the dignity and rights of the human person (1983). In commemoration of the twentieth anniversary of the close of Vatican II, the commission published a document on selected items in ECCLESIOLOGY (1984); and in 1985 it published a commentary on four propositions dealing with Jesus' self-consciousness and His awareness of His mission.

The four themes selected by the commission for study during the quinquennium beginning in 1986 were: faith and inculturation; interpretation of DOGMA; fundamental MORAL THEOLOGY; and current questions in eschatology. The commission established in 1992 devoted itself to an examination of contemporary SOTERIOLOGY; Christianity in relation to other religions; a contemporary presentation of the mystery of God; and the Eucharist. The commission established in 1997 directed its attention to the Church and the sins of the past; the permanent diaconate; the inculturation of revelation; and the theology of CREATION.

In response to many bishops' requests concerning the issue of LIMBO, a topic which has been omitted from the Cathechism of the Catholic Church, the 2004 ITC replied with "The Hope of Salvation for Infants Who Die without Baptism." To assist bishops with moral questions it published "The Search for a Universal Ethic: A New Look at Natural Law," the first document approved unanimously by the commission.

The procedures of the ITC follow a routine. After the selection of the themes to be studied during the quinquennium, the president appoints subcommissions to examine them and draft a working paper, the instrumentum laboris, that serves as the basis for discussion and debate by the commission as a whole. When the members agree upon and approve a final text, the document is submitted to a plenary session of the commission for formal approval. The CDF receives the finished documents and decides how best to use the work of the ITC. Some documents have been used as a resource for the CDF, and others have been published. The commission's study that resulted in the 2000 document Memory and Reconciliation: The Church and the Sins of the Past took on a particular significance. On the second Sunday of Lent of that year, Pope John Paul II made the presentation of the document a highlight with his own memorable comments at an event marking the celebration of the Jubilee Year.

On July 25, 2009, several new members were appointed to the ITC joining those continuing from the previous quinquennium. Charles Morerod, O.P. was named the new secretary of the ITC, replacing Luis Ladaria, S.J., who had been ordained archbishop and appointed the secretary of the CDF in 2008. On November 19, 2009, Dr. John C. Cavidini of the University of Notre Dame was added to the commission. The first plenary session of the 2009–2114 quinquennium was held November 30–December 4, 2009, with special consideration given to the question of theological methodology.

IRAQ, WAR IN (CATHOLIC CHURCH AND)

The Iraq War began in late March 2003 with the aim of toppling the regime of Iraqi president and dictator Saddam Hussein. It was launched by the United States with the support of several allied countries, most particularly Great Britain. Pope JOHN PAUL II, supported by bishops from the United States and around the world, actively sought to prevent it. Although Saddam was captured shortly after the invasion and executed in 2006, the Iraq War showed little sign of ending as of the beginning of 2010. The Iraq War was a watershed event of the first decade of the twenty-first century with major ramifications for the United States, the Middle East, and the international community. From a Catholic perspective, the war in Iraq can perhaps first be understood according to the roles played by three major actors: Saddam, who was the object of the invasion; U.S. President George W. Bush, who decided on the invasion; and Pope John Paul, who cautioned against it.

The Dictatorship of Saddam Hussein. Saddam's brutal exercise of power was certainly a precipitating factor of the war. He had become secretary-general of Iraq's ruling Ba'ath party and president of Iraq in 1979, ruthlessly concentrating all power in his hands. From 1980 to 1988 Iraq engaged in a destructive war with Iran, in which the United States supported Saddam with financial and military assistance. In 1991, Iraq invaded and occupied Kuwait, from which it was expelled by a United Nations (UN) coalition force assembled by President George H.W. Bush. The UN imposed sanctions on Iraq to prevent it from again wielding aggression. These restrictions, which were interpreted to include the elimination of weapons of mass destruction and an almost complete trade embargo on Iraq, reduced Iraqi sovereignty over the semi-autonomous region of Kurdistan and "no-fly zones" and helped reduce Saddam for the remainder of the 1990s to a declining, although still obstreperous, force in the Middle East. As a result of the economic sanctions under Saddam's brutal regime, the 1990s were a decade of misery for the Iraqi people.

The Lead-Up to War. From the beginning of his presidency in 2001, George W. Bush made the removal of Saddam Hussein from office the centerpiece of his foreign policy, especially after the terrorist attacks on the United States on September 11, 2001. He presented three major reasons, as summarized in a January 16, 2003, article by Professor Michael Klare: to eliminate Saddam's weapons of mass destruction; to quash Saddam's role in international terrorism, as part of an announced "War on Terror"; and to promote democracy in Iraq and throughout the Middle East (Klare 2003). On January 29, 2002, President Bush declared Iraq, Iran, and North Korea an "Axis of Evil." On June 1, 2002, he presented a new strategy for American foreign and military policy, which came to be called the Bush Doctrine. This doctrine, as it was codified in the September 20, 2002, "National Security Strategy of the United States" issued by the administration's National Security Council, proclaimed the unilateral right of the United States to engage in preemptive military actions to eliminate threats to its safety and to promote democratic regime change. In a speech to the UN General Assembly on September 12, 2002, Bush accused Saddam of threatening "the lives of millions and the peace of the world." President Bush accused Saddam of supporting terrorist organizations and demanded that the UN take action against Iraq or "the United States of America will make that stand." On October 16, 2002, Bush obtained from the U.S. Congress the "Authorization for Use of Military Force Against Iraq Resolution of 2002" as the president determined to "be necessary and appropriate." However, obstacles remained to the plan for war. UN weapons inspectors were unable to find weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, and Chief UN Inspector Hans Blix reported that Saddam, who had earlier ejected weapons inspectors from Iraq, was finally cooperating with arms inspections. The UN was not willing to authorize the United States and its allies to take armed intervention against Iraq, unlike prior to the 1990 Gulf War. As a consequence, on February 23, 2003, the United States withdrew a UN resolution seeking authorization for a military solution.

Pope John Paul II and the Iraq War. Throughout the twentieth century the popes were fervent opponents of war, beginning with BENEDICT XV's efforts to mediate an end to World War I. After the horrors of World War II, Pope JOHN XXIII wrote the Encyclical "Pacem in Terris" ("Peace on Earth"), and Pope PAUL VI, in a visit to the UN on October 4, 1965, proclaimed, "No more war, never again war. Peace, it is peace that must guide the destinies of people and of all mankind." In this tradition, Pope John Paul II urged a diplomatic solution to the conflict with Iraq. On February 8, 2003, he reminded the world, "One should not give up, as if war is inevitable" (2). On March 5, 2003, John Paul sent Cardinal Pio LAGHI as envoy to President Bush. Laghi delivered a personal letter from the pope and stated that the United States must take "into account the grave consequences of such an armed conflict: the suffering of the people of Iraq and those involved in the military operation, a further instability in the region and a new gulf between Islam and Christianity." On March 16, 2003, in his address before the midday Angelus in St. Peter's Square, John Paul II declared, "There is still time to negotiate. There is still time for peace" (United States Conference of Catholic Bishops [USCCB] Web site, "Church Leaders on the Threat of War in Iraq"). On March 22, 2003, shortly after the invasion, John Paul repeated, "Violence and weapons can never resolve the problems of man" ("To the Staff of the Italian TV Channel Telepace" 2003, 2). On March 25, he declared that "war used as an instrument of resolution of conflicts was rejected, even before the Charter of the United Nations ... except in the case of defense against an aggressor" ("To the Military Chaplains" 2003, 4). Likewise, the UNITED STATES CONFERENCE OF CATHOLIC BISHOPS issued four major statements on September 13, 2002, November 13, 2002, February 26, 2003, and March 19, 2003, rejecting the notion that the looming war in Iraq would be justified. The Catholic bishops in Iraq also pleaded against the war, with special concern for the historic Chaldean community of approximately 600,000 Iraqi Catholics, along with the Iraqi Assyrian Christian population, some of the last flourishing Christian communities in the Middle East. Speaking on VATICAN radio on January 9, 2003, for example, Chaldean Bishop Shlemon Warduni warned that an invasion would devastate his country.

Nevertheless, several American Catholics allied with conservative politics, who were wont to be supporters of John Paul II, found themselves in disagreement. George Weigel, author of a splendid biography of John Paul II, was perhaps the most articulate and vocal supporter of the theory that the war in Iraq was justified under Catholic doctrine and wrote in a March 31, 2003, article in America in favor of "proportionate and discriminate armed force against the Saddam Hussein regime" (Weigel 2003, p. 10). In February 2003, the prominent Catholic writer and philosopher Michael Novak made a trip to the Vatican to argue the American case for war, under Catholic principles.

Progress of Iraq War and Just War Theory. The allied invasion of Iraq in the spring of 2003 swiftly succeeded in defeating the Iraqi army, capturing Saddam, killing his sons Uday and Qusay and grandson Mustafa, and decimating his loyalists and henchmen. Nevertheless, those events turned out to be the beginning rather than the end of the Iraq War. Over the next six years, Iraq descended into chaos as its historical treasures were looted, its infrastructure crippled, and its population riven by sectarian violence. Acts of terrorism and violence against allied troops and Iraqi civilians by insurgents, militia men, and foreign subversives escalated. The once flourishing Christian churches were left exposed to persecution and more than half their population forced to flee in the wake of the invasion. Reputable estimates, such as by the medical journal the Lancet, indicate that as many as six hundred thousand Iraqi civilians died through 2006 as a result of the conflict, with four million Iraqis made refugees. Supporters of the war praised the removal of Saddam's dictatorship, the beginnings of free elections, and the 2007 surge of American troops, which brought an improved measure of security to Iraqi population centers. Still, it could be argued that of President Bush's three war aims, laudable as they were, none was accomplished: weapons of mass destruction were not found in Iraq (although developed in North Korea and Iran during the course of the war); Islamic terrorist groups, such as al-Qaeda, once enemies of Saddam, infested Iraq; and even the war's supporters were hard put to argue that Iraq had become a stable democracy and a beacon for the Middle East. The HOLY SEE had been dismissed by some war advocates for naïvety in light of Saddam's threats, but the bombing of civilians, fratricide between Sunnis and Shiites, increased hostility among religious factions in the Middle East, prisoner abuse at Abu Ghraib, debates about whether captured prisoners were subjected to interrogation techniques akin to torture, and attacks on Iraqi Christians seemed to render prophetic John Paul II's warnings about the "evils and injustices that all war brings" (Catechism of the Catholic Church, 2327).

Popes John Paul II and BENEDICT XVI and bishops throughout the world continued humanitarian efforts through the course of the war in Iraq. The future of the beleaguered Chaldean community remained uncertain, as symbolized by the 2008 kidnapping and murder of Archbishop Paulos Rahho. And voices called for a better understanding of the Church's just war doctrine. It is certainly startling that, applying the same criteria for war as expressed in paragraphs 2307 through 2314 of the Catechism of the Catholic Church, prominent lay American Catholics—whose goodwill can hardly be doubted—reached opposite conclusions from the Holy See. Several explanations can be ventured, all of which raise questions about whether these proponents of military action applied the criteria for a just war in the "rigorous manner" demanded by the CATECHISM. It is certainly natural to be well-disposed to the actions of one's own leaders, but the Holy See is compelled to take a more universal perspective. The ultimate responsibility for deciding on just war criteria lies with the competent public authorities—but the competence of the American authorities could have been called into question by the alleged use of manipulated data, evidence of a personal enmity to Saddam, and most of all by the failure of the U.S. Congress to declare war—even though Article Eight, Section One of the U.S. Constitution vests Congress with the exclusive authority to do so. As Iraq had not attacked the United States, an attempt was made to extend just war criteria to preemptive wars, but as Cardinal Joseph RATZINGER pointed out in an interview published by the Italian newspaper Avvenire on September 21, 2002: "The concept of a 'preventive war' does not appear in the Catechism of the Catholic Church" (Zenit 2002). Certainly it is hard to conceive of a war against an Iraq nation steadily contained and weakened over the course of the 1990s as necessary for self-defense as required by just war doctrine, especially when its advocates trumpeted it as a means to promote democracy, remove an objectionable leader, and transform the Middle East. George Weigel in his March 31, 2003, article suggested that just war doctrine does not contain a "presumption against war" (p. 8), but this is in seeming contradiction to a century of papal teaching and the very message of "the Prince of Peace" (Catechism of the Catholic Church 2330).

Perhaps the just war doctrine must be understood in the context of modern times and from the perspective of centuries of wars hopefully begun and horrifically ended. The concept of a just war was certainly an advance over pagan celebrations of conquest, plunder, and pillage. But the modern era had seen the creation of governmental bodies to promote international diplomacy and peaceful relations, such as the UN, described by Vatican spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls as the "guarantor of international law" (USCCB Web site, "Church Leaders on the Threat of War in Iraq"). Simply put, modern war is too deadly for its initiation to be left to partisan judgments that do not harmonize with an international framework that itself articulates the moral and jurisprudential criteria for self-defense. It seems absurd for nations to wage war on behalf of UN resolutions in a manner not authorized and even contradictory to UN directives. As papal envoy Cardinal Laghi elaborated on a modern notion of a just war in his March 5, 2003, address: "The Holy See maintains that there are still peaceful avenues within the context of the vast patrimony of international law and institutions which exist for that purpose. A decision regarding the use of military force can only be taken within the framework of the United Nations."

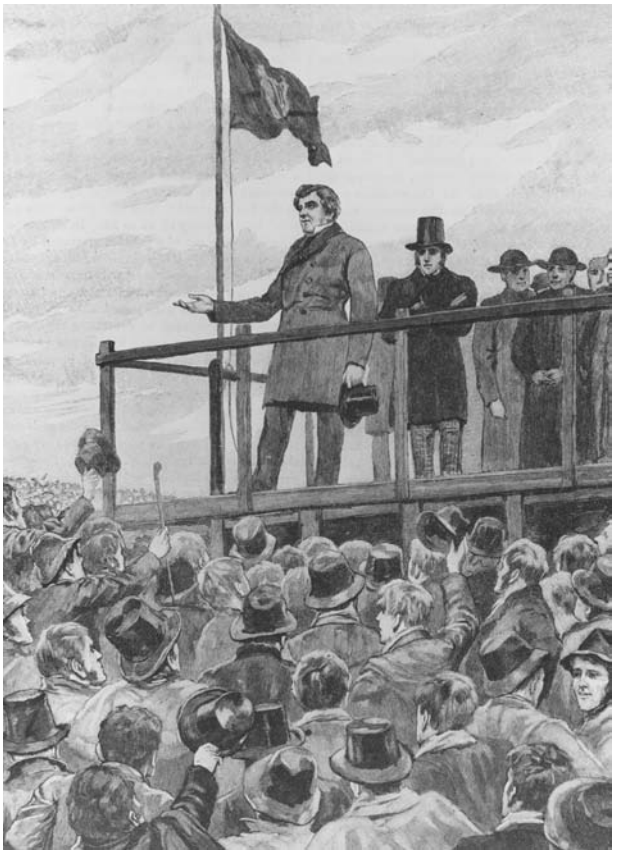
IRISH NATIONALISM AND THE PAPACY

Arnold J. Toynbee's magisterial A Study of History (1934–1961), in reviewing more than a dozen distinctive civilizations, defined "Far Western Christian Civilization" as the merger of Celtic culture and western European Christianity in Ireland. By the end of the fifth century, paganism in Ireland had yielded to Catholic missionaries from the Continent. Whichever of the versions of St. Patrick's life and work one accepts, the Irish proved remarkably open to the new religion. Over the millennia, Ireland has remained synonymous with the triumph of Catholicism.

The story behind the image is complex, however. The medieval Irish had no intention of abandoning all of their traditional customs and practices, which ranged from the tonsure of the clergy (derived from the Druids) to clerical marriage. They celebrated Easter according to their own calendar, attached monastic communities to clan chieftaincies, and treated bishops as mere itinerant consecrators without jurisdiction. It was not until the early twelfth century that a diocesan structure was completely established in Ireland and a hierarchy organized along this structure was recognized. Such a system had been established by early missionaries in the fifth and sixth centuries, but it was soon supplanted by a monastic system that stayed in place for centuries. In short, the Church in Ireland mingled Celtic practice with Latin rules. The decrees of ROME were implemented only when convenient, and they were often ignored altogether.

It was not surprising, then, that successive popes regarded their flock in Ireland as eccentric or even heretical. By the 1160s, HENRY II of England had been charged with the task of imposing discipline upon his unruly neighbors across the Irish Sea. This monarch's invasion of Ireland derived a certain legality from papal approval, and some Irish bishops actually welcomed the Anglo-Norman conquest, which had been formalized by 1200. Nevertheless, Rome's alliance with England would, over time, be held against the PAPACY by some Irish patriots.

Whatever ambivalence lingered during the ensuing centuries, the English Reformation of the early 1500s brought about a clear identification of Catholicism with Irish nationalism. HENRY VIII (1509–1547) was not only the first English ruler to call himself King of Ireland, he also described himself as the founder and "Only Supreme Head on Earth of the Church of Ireland." Most of the Irish people remained loyal to the papacy, however, and Catholicism became clearly identified with the traditional structure of Irish society.



Several rebellions culminated in an offer by the Irish resisters in 1599 to accept Queen Elizabeth I as their rightful sovereign, provided that she restore a whole panoply of traditional Irish rights, including the free exercise of Catholicism and the return of banished Catholic clergy and confiscated Catholic property. When this offer was rejected, Irish Catholic leaders recognized the king of Spain (the leader of the COUNTER REFORMATION) as king of Ireland. A failed Spanish invasion in 1601 opened a century of religio-political warfare. The "plantation" of thousands of Scottish Presbyterians established by the British in the northern province of Ulster introduced a new complicating factor into Irish history that would have lasting consequences. Finally, the presence of a papal nuncio in Ireland as the de facto overseer of a major Catholic rebellion in the 1640s merely confirmed the English opinion that "Irish" and "Catholic" had become synonymous.

When King JAMES II (1633–1701), who had imprudently embraced Catholicism, was driven from England during the Glorious Revolution of 1688, his coreligionists in Ireland gave him shelter and fought on in his name until 1691. Throughout the eighteenth century, the Irish Catholic loyalty to the Jacobite cause (deriving its name from Jacobus, the Latin for "James") confirmed the English perception of "Irish Popery." Jacobite volunteers served in the armies of France and Spain during the frequent wars between England and the Bourbon monarchies. Catholics in Ireland, meanwhile, were denied all civil rights and the open practice of their religion was forbidden.

With the onset of the FRENCH REVOLUTION (1789) and the spread of revolution across Europe, England and the papacy found themselves drawn into an alliance. The papacy, which had formerly named bishops for Irish sees and smuggled exiled Jacobites into their homeland to preside over a clandestine clergy, was now permitted to function freely in Ireland, and Catholics were gradually freed from many of the legal strictures under which they had labored. Catholic officers (many of them former soldiers under Louis XVI) were granted commissions in the British forces, and Catholics were admitted to the legal profession and permitted to acquire landed property. By the end of the Revolutionary and Napoleonic Wars in 1815, the papacy had gone through many vicissitudes, and it came to appreciate the value of collaboration with London.

Ireland, on the other hand, had ceased to exist as a separate kingdom (a status which it had preserved since the sixteenth century). By the Act of Union of 1801 it became part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. Irish political nationalism had seemingly become a dead letter, and its adherents had scattered, with many going to America. During the next three decades, Irish public life was centered on the figure of Daniel O'CONNELL (1775–1847), a lawyer and parliamentarian who was prepared to accept the Union (at least for the time being) while concentrating on a full restoration of religious equality. His campaign for "Catholic Emancipation," carried on from 1823 to 1829, was aimed at eliminating the last of the so-called Penal Laws that had been imposed on Catholics after the Jacobite War of the 1690s. In pursuit of this goal, O'Connell formed what was, in effect, the first mass-based democratic political movement in the Western world, called the Catholic Association. He enlisted, for a nominal membership fee, tens of thousands of Catholics, whom he mobilized in pressure groups and led in mass rallies. Money contributed by the members of the Catholic Association was used to buy ownership of newspapers that would support the cause of emancipation.

The key to O'Connell's success was his enlistment of the Catholic hierarchy, which provided him with a parish structure for collecting funds. These funds were sent to the headquarters of the Catholic Association in Dublin. There was thus a Church-based framework for what was, in everything but name, an Irish political party. Some of the bishops were too innately conservative to favor popular movements, while others were suspicious of a leftward trend in contemporary politics, but most of the clergy saw O'Connell's enterprise as the only real hope for attaining emancipation. By 1829 the British government had decided to support the concept of equal civil rights, and it granted Catholic Emancipation. O'Connell and other Catholics were now eligible for election to a seat in the Union Parliament.

O'Connell's death in 1847 marked the beginning of a new epoch in the relationship between the Church and Irish nationalism. Once Catholic Emancipation had been attained, Rome could take advantage of new opportunities in Ireland by working through an expanded hierarchy and cooperating with the British regime. It was no longer necessary to flirt with radicalism—and the papacy of the strongly conservative PIUS IX (1846–1878) was one in which nationalism anywhere in Europe was regarded as radical. Moreover, the last years of O'Connell's life saw his relatively moderate nationalism challenged by the revival of the Irish separatist movement that had been associated with the French Revolution. The Young Irelanders and their successors, the Fenian Brotherhood, were the heirs of those who had sought to break entirely with England in the 1790s. From the late 1840s through the 1870s, they pursued a policy of armed struggle aimed at achieving an Irish republic.

Many of these radical nationalists regarded O'Connell as a mere pawn of London and Rome. The fact that many of the new nationalist leaders were Protestants or Deists, like their predecessors in the 1790s, further repelled the VATICAN. Plus IX sought to meet the forces of disarray in Catholic Ireland by introducing a vigorous new hierarchical structure. He also sought to make the best of the years of the Great Famine and massive emigration by supporting the development of a sober orderly society on the ruins of the old Celtic culture. These policies were generally comparable with those of Victorian England. When a new nationalist leader, Charles Stewart Parnell, emerged in the 1880s, his Protestantism and open contempt for the Irish bishops made him a target of the hierarchy's enmity. His downfall in 1890 was equally gratifying to London and Rome.

During the first years of the twentieth century, most of the Irish, clergy and laity alike, seemed satisfied with the continuance of the United Kingdom in its current form. However, by the eve of the First World War, a resurgence of the Fenians, with their commitment to separatist republicanism, brought a new crisis. The Easter Rebellion of 1916 and the Anglo-Irish War of 1919–1921 brought an abrupt end to the Irish Question as it had evolved over the previous 200 years. Except for the six predominantly Protestant counties of northeastern Ulster, Ireland became a self-governing Dominion of the British Empire, and in 1949 the completely sovereign Republic of Ireland was born. Catholicism emerged as the dominant religion, and the Catholic Church in Ireland developed its own relations with Rome and achieved the imposition of its own standards and values on most aspects of Irish life.

Some Irish nationalists, who had never truly accepted the partition of the island and condemned the ongoing membership of the "Six Counties" in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, blamed a supine Catholic leadership for the frustration of their ultimate national goals. These unreconstructed rebels—grouped in the Sinn Fein (Ourselves) Party and its armed wing, the Irish Republican Army—launched a new war against England in 1969 that lasted for nearly thirty years. It was essentially focused in Northern Ireland, which had a two-thirds Protestant population. Sectarian killings mounted to over 3,000 during this period, which came to be known as "the Troubles."

Although many religious leaders insisted that the conflict was political, the tendency was to assume that all Catholics in the province were republicans—and to punish them accordingly. Despite international indignation, Christian leadership in Northern Ireland proved largely ineffectual in ending the conflict. It was not until a cease-fire was brokered by the president of the United States and the prime ministers of Britain and the Irish Republic in 1998 that the worst of the fighting came to an end. Even then, Catholic and Protestant antagonism in Northern Ireland had become so ingrained that a power-sharing provincial government was not established until early 2007.

Once known as the Land of Saints and Scholars, Ireland was famed for its role in preserving Western civilization during the Dark Ages, dispatching Christian missionaries all over Europe (and later throughout the world), and creating a distinctive cultural heritage. The collapse of Christian unity affected Ireland with particular intensity. The forces of religion and nationalism became entwined in a prolonged and bitter struggle that tore apart the lives of many, and only time will tell if this conflict has truly reached its end.

IRWA, JILDO, BL.

Catechist, MARTYR; b. Bar-Kitoba, Kitgum, Uganda, 1906; d. Paimol, Uganda, October 18, 1918; beatified by Pope JOHN PAUL II, October 20, 2002.

Jildo Irwa was the son of Acholi tribesman Okeny Irwa and his wife, Ato. Taught by the Comboni Missionaries, who founded the mission of Kitgum in 1915, Jildo was baptized on June 6, 1916, at about ten years of age, and he was confirmed on October 15 of the same year.

Irwa's life and fate were entwined with that of another young catechist, Bl. Daudi OKELO, of Payira, who was four years older. Irwa worked as Okelo's assistant as they spread Christianity in northern Uganda. Through his lively spirit and playful insistence, Irwa brought many children to the faith, encouraging them to study the catechism.

In November 1917, Irwa volunteered to go with Okelo to Paimol, a troubled village in the Upper Nile basin, to replace a catechist who had died. Afflicted by smallpox, famine, slave trading, and the ousting of tribal leaders, Paimol was a dangerous place for Christian missionaries. Young Irwa and Okelo were harassed and threatened but continued their work. Although friends encouraged them to leave, they refused to run away, saying, "It will be as God wills it to be."

At daybreak on October 18, 1918, four men came to Irwa and Okelo's hut and demanded that they stop teaching the catechism. When they refused, the men dragged Okelo outside and speared him. One man gave Irwa a chance to escape because he was only a boy, but Irwa replied in tears, "We have done nothing wrong. For the same reason you killed Daudi you must also kill me, because together we came here and together we have been teaching God's word." One of the other men then pushed Irwa outside the hut and, holding up the catechism, speared him, as another stabbed him in the head with a knife.

The name of the place where Irwa and Okelo were killed, originally Palamuku, was changed to Wi Polo ("In Heaven") in tribute to the "Our Father" prayer, which the young catechists had been teaching, and as a testimony to their heavenly reward.

In his homily of BEATIFICATION, Pope John Paul II called Irwa and Okelo "models and intercessors for catechists throughout the world, especially in those places where catechists still suffer for their faith, sometimes facing social marginalization and even personal danger."

IZQUIERDO ALBERO, MARÍA DEL PILAR, BL.

Foundress, Missionary Work of Jesus and Mary, Madrid, Spain; b. July 27, 1906, Zaragoza, Spain; d. August 27, 1945, San Sebastián, Spain; beatified November 4, 2001, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

María Pilar was born into a pious family of modest means. Though she had almost no formal education, she developed an ethic of charity and devotion at a young age, and she was greatly valued in her community. Foreshadowing the challenges she would face throughout her life, at twelve María Pilar was stricken with a disease of unknown etiology and spent four years hospitalized at a clinic in Alfamén. She recovered and took a job at a shoe factory in her hometown.

In 1926 María Pilar fell and broke her pelvis. In 1927 she developed cysts so severe that she lost her sight and became paraplegic. This disease remained undiagnosed, and she spent twelve years in and out of hospitals. Throughout she maintained a strong faith in God, and her home became a spiritual center for many. With the start of the Spanish civil war in 1936, María Pilar turned her thoughts to the ideal of promoting a culture of charity modeled on the life of Christ. On December 8, 1939, the Feast of the IMMACULATE CONCEPTION, María Pilar was spontaneously cured of her blindness and paralysis. She put herself to work organizing a community to implement the concepts she had been formulating over the prior three years.

In Madrid, María Pilar and a group of followers calling themselves Missionaries of Jesus and Mary ministered to the poor. Though the community was sanctioned by the bishop of Madrid, his approval was soon withdrawn. María Pilar was barred from doing any apostolic work until 1942, when the bishop granted approval for the reformed community now called the Pious Union of Missionaries of Jesus, Mary and Joseph. Two years later, a recurrence of her illness and petty jealousies and allegations of impropriety combined to impact the group's work negatively. María Pilar voluntarily withdrew from the community and, with nine others, settled in San Sebastián, where she died at the age of thirty-nine.

María Pilar's congregation again reorganized and was renamed the Missionary Order of Jesus and Mary; it received canonical approval in 1948. Over 200 members of the order serve the poor around the world. In beatifying María Pilar, Pope John Paul II noted that "[h]er life bore the mark of constant, and not just physical, suffering." He prayed that the life story of the new Blessed would "renew in us a deep commitment to the service of the needy so that the present world may become the witness of the renewing force of the Gospel of Christ."

JACINTO DE LOS ÁNGELES AND JUAN BAUTISTA, BB.

Zapoteca martyrs; b. San Francisco Cajonos, Oaxaca, Mexico, 1660; d. San Pedro at Tanga Hill, Oaxaca, Mexico, September 16, 1700; beatified August 1, 2002, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

Jacinto de los Ángeles and Juan Bautista, Zapoteca Indians from the state of Oaxaca in southern Mexico, were martyred on September 16, 1700, near San Pedro at Tanga Hill (known today as Monte Fiscal-Santos) and beatified by Pope John Paul II three centuries later in the Basilica of Our Lady of Guadalupe in Mexico City.

Both men were born in 1660 in San Francisco Cajonos in Oaxaca. Jacinto de los Ángeles, a descendant of a Zapoteca tribal chief, was married to a woman named Petrona, with whom he had two children, Juan and Nicholasa. Juan Bautista was married to Josefa de la Cruz, with whom he had a daughter named Rosa. Both men were lay Catholics who held the position of fiscal de iglesia, which can be translated as "attorney general of the church." Fiscales de iglesia held a critical position between Mexico's native peoples and the Church. This title was granted after years of faithful service, and the fiscales were charged with assisting the local religious by guiding the newly evangelized people in faith and moral practice. Jacinto and Juan assisted two Dominican priests, Fr. Alonso de Vargas and Fr. Gaspar de los Reyes.

On September 14, 1700, Jacinto and Juan alerted Fr. Vargas and Fr. Reyes that an idolatrous ceremony was to be held that evening. Deciding to intervene, the fiscales and the priests went to the ceremony and reproved the idolaters, who fled with their faces covered. The four Catholics seized the idolaters' ceremonial instruments and took them to the convent.

The next day, the fiscales learned that the idolaters planed to retaliate and took refuge in the convent. That evening, a group of masked men reached the convent carrying spears and clubs. They threatened to kill everyone present unless Juan and Jacinto were handed over. When Fr. Vargas and Fr. Reyes refused to give the men up, the mob threatened to torch the church. They then forced their way into the convent and reclaimed their ceremonial instruments. They also set fire to Juan Bautista's house. The two fiscales finally gave themselves up because they feared for the safety of the others.

Before he was taken away, Jacinto asked the priests to hear his confession and give him Holy Communion. He said that he wished to "die for love of God and without using weapons." Juan, for his part, challenged the mob, saying, "Here I am. If you have to kill me tomorrow, do it now instead." When the two men were beaten and tortured, they did not defend themselves. Rather, they asked their opponents: "If your religion is authentic, why don't you build temples for public worship instead of practicing at night to trick the poor Christians who are ignorant?"

After further torture at a nearby prison, Jacinto and Juan were brought to San Pedro. There, on September 16, they were thrown from a summit and their hearts were cut out and fed to dogs. Their remains were later moved to the Church of Villa Alta. In 1889 the martyrs' remains were entrusted to Bishop Eulogio G. Gillow y Zavalza of Oaxaca (1841–1922), who took them to the Cathedral of Oaxaca. The site of the two men's martyrdom has become a pilgrimage destination.

At the BEATIFICATION Mass, which incorporated seven different Indian languages, Pope John Paul II praised the Indian martyrs as examples of "how one can reach God without renouncing one's culture." He added that the beatified Zapotecs "encourage indigenous people today to appreciate their cultures and languages and above all their dignity as the children of God."

JACOBINS

The Jacobins were a radical political club which, as the largest and most powerful political club of the FRENCH REVOLUTION of 1789, played a central role in its events. Known also as the Jacobin Club, the group was founded in 1789 as the Friends of the Constitution, also known as the Club Benthorn, which was formed at Versailles as a group of Breton deputies to the Estates General. In Paris the club met in a former Dominican monastery on the rue St. Jacques, hence the name. Both the Count de Mirabeau and Maximilien ROBESPIERRE were early members. Although it had only 3,000 members in Paris, the club controlled 1,200 related societies throughout France, thereby giving it enormous political power. At first a moderate organization, the Jacobin Club had a diverse membership. (Besides Mirabeau and Robespierre, who ultimately took control, members included such leading figures of the revolution as Emmanuel Sieyès, Charles de Talleyrand-PÉRIGORD, Antoine Barnave, the Abbé Grégoire, the Duc de Aiguillon, and the Marquis de Lafayette.) The club also expanded its membership to include others besides deputies. (Arthur Young became a member in this way in 1790.)

At first the Jacobin Club was not distinquished by radical or unconventional political views, and it even ostensibly supported the monarchy. But, after the attempted escape of King Louis XVI in 1791 and the affair of the Champ-de-Mars, opposition to a royal form of government began to grow. The Jacobin Club was radicalized also by the departure of its conservative members to form the more moderate Feuillants Club in July 1791. After the fall of the monarchy, Robespierre became a central figure in the club, and his faction in the National Convention of late 1792 became known as the Jacobins. At first a minority, they were also called "the Mountain" or "Montagnards," because they sat together in the highest seats in the convention. They questioned the war with Austria and supported more revolutionary measures within France. In the spring of 1793, the Jacobins, supported by the Parisian mob, increased their power and dominated the convention. They gained more control in the coup d'état of May 1793. Maintaining power until the summer of 1794, the Jacobins repeatedly removed from the convention those deemed disloyal or opposed to the revolution and the Republic, a process that culminated, during their final months in power, with the vast purges known as the Reign of Terror. Led by Robespierre, they established the so-called Republic of Virtue, which lasted until their final purge of 9 Thermidor 1794 (July 27). At that point, Robespierre himself was denounced and, unable to hold on to power, the Jacobin Club was dissolved in the fall of that year. Various attempts to reestablish and reorganize the club were made in 1794 and 1799, but in that latter year, with members scattered, it was completely disbanded.

The success of the Jacobins was due in large part to their encouragement of liberty and PATRIOTISM among the people. Also, they were well organized and quickly gained control of important political positions within the governments of the revolution, in particular the Committee of Public Safety and, through it, the National Convention which itself had vast powers. Trusted by the general populace, especially the so-called sans-culottes—members of the poorer classes—the Jacobins satisfied calls for FREEDOM, equality, and social progress. Identified with the purity of the revolution, the Jacobins were seen as its defenders as France faced war from both within and outside the nation. Cultivating the idea of "citizenship," the Jacobins sought to rally the people to uphold the gains of the revolution and to create a new national identity.

Opposed to both ATHEISM and the Church, the Jacobins aggressively continued the policy of de-Christianization that had begun already in the earlier stages of the revolution. The main goal was the elimination of Catholic religious practices and of the Church itself in France. It was in one sense an extension of certain rationalist and materialist theories of the Enlightenment. Waged against Catholicism and eventually all forms of Christianity, the de-Christianization program included the destruction of all external forms of worship and devotion, including crosses, statues, and church bells, as well as the institution of the Cult of Reason and soon of the Supreme Being and the enactment, in late 1793, of a law making all nonjuring priests and any who harbored them subject to execution. Soon after, the Goddess of Reason was installed in Notre Dame Cathedral in Paris.

In legislative terms, the 1790 Civil Constitution of the Clergy had already confiscated all Church property and made all clerics employees of the State. In 1792 the National Assembly legalized DIVORCE and at the same time dissolved the Church's authority to record births and marriages—responsibilities that were then assigned to the State. During the September Massacres of 1792, three bishops and more than 200 priests were killed by angry mobs. Meanwhile, anti-Church legislation continued to be enacted, and the GREGORIAN CALENDAR was replaced by a Republican one that deliberately disposed of Sundays and saints' days. Towns and streets bearing the names of saints were renamed. The de-Christianization of France reached its peak during the Jacobin control and the rule of Robespierre in 1794. In the Reign of Terror (mid-1793 to mid-1794), hundreds more clerics and nuns, along with many other citizens, were massacred in Paris, Lyon, and other cities, as well as throughout the countryside. While the Terror's victims were from all socioeconomic and professional classes; Catholic clergy likely suffered the greatest proportional persecution, however. Thousands also fled the country before and during this period, and thousands of churches and monasteries were closed. In the Catholic region of the Vendée, where the population rebelled against the Jacobin veneration of the "tree of liberty" and the installation of revolutionary symbols in place of religious ones, the persecution of practicing Catholics and clergy was especially intense. Indeed, the long and intense Vendean revolt against Jacobin rule was in large part based in Catholic resistance to the government's de-Christianization policies.

To replace both Catholicism and atheism, Robespierre officially instituted the Cult of the Supreme Being. The formal inauguration of this new faith was held in Paris just a few weeks before Robespierre's downfall. In the aftermath of the fall of Robespierre and in turn the Jacobins, elements of the program of de-Christianization subsided. A law of 1795 made religious worship legal once again, but external signs of devotion, such as public processions or ringing church bells, were still forbidden. As late as 1799, Catholic priests were still being arrested and imprisoned or deported. That same year French forces invaded ROME and removed Pope PIUS VI, who died in exile in Valence. The policy of de-Christianization would only formally end with Napoleon Bonaparte's Concordat of 1801.

JÄGERSTÄTTER, FRANZ, BL.

Layman and MARTYR; b. May 20, 1907, St. Radegund, Austria; d. August 9, 1943, Brandenburg, Germany; beatified October 26, 2007, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

Born into poverty, Franz was the son of Rosalia Huber and Franz Bachmeier, unmarried servants; his father was killed during WORLD WAR I. In 1917 Franz's mother married Heinrich Jägerstätter, a farmer, who adopted the boy. Franz became an avid reader when his step-grandfather took an interest in the boy and shared his own love of books and learning.

In 1933 Franz became the father of a daughter, Hildegard, from a relationship with Theresia Auer. Though some in his family questioned paternity, Franz had a close relationship with the girl and was on cordial terms with her mother. In 1936 he married Franziska Schwaninger, with whom he had three daughters. In this settled environment, Franz began to take a more serious interest in his faith; he became a SACRISTAN in the parish church and was a daily communicant.

Franz was an early opponent of the Nazi regime and in 1938 voted against the annexation of Austria, the only person in St. Radegund to do so. Fear of fascist reprisals caused many in the village to shun him, but Franz remained firm in his beliefs. In 1940 he was inducted into the military. He was twice released from service and allowed to return to his family based on the efforts of local authorities. At home Franz continued to be vocal in his condemnation of the Nazis, and clear that he would never fight in the war. In 1943 he was recalled to active service. He appeared in response to the order, but announced that, as a conscientious objector, he would not fight. He was arrested, held for a time in Linz, and then transferred to Berlin. Having been refused the possibility of serving in a noncombatant role, Franz was court-martialed and found guilty of sedition on July 6, 1943; he was condemned to death. On August 9, 1943, at Brandenburg, he was executed by beheading.

Though some speculate that Franz was motivated by a self-destructive religious fervor, and that he forfeited his life in a campaign of resistance that had no possibility of succeeding, the life of this simple man is a stark illustration of the power of CONSCIENCE in opposition to evil. Awaiting execution, Franz wrote, "I am convinced that it is best that I speak the truth, even if it costs me my life." Cardinal José Martins Saraiva, during the Mass of his BEATIFICATION, said that Franz was an example to Christians "to live their faith with coherence and radical commitment, even accepting extreme consequences if necessary."

JAKI, STANLEY L.

Benedictine monk (final profession May 13, 1944), priest (ordained June 29, 1948), professor, writer; b. Györ, Hungary, August 17, 1924; d. Madrid, Spain, April 7, 2009.

Stanley L. Jaki ranks as one of the foremost Catholic thinkers of the present era, in his profound historical, philosophical, and theological studies on the relations between science and religion and also on CHRISTOLOGY and ECCLESIOLOGY. He studied in Rome (1947–1950) at the Pontificio Ateneo Sant'Anselmo, under C. Vagaggini, who greatly stressed a proper appreciation of the historical role of St. THOMAS AQUINAS. His doctoral dissertation in theology was Les tendances nouvelles de l'ecclésiologie (New tendencies in ecclesiology [1956]), which aroused much interest at the beginning of the Second Vatican Council. In late 1950, because of the cruel Stalinist oppression in Hungary, he was sent to Saint Vincent's Archabbey, Latrobe, Pennsylvania, to teach creation theology (inter alia), and study the two famous allocutions of Pope PIUS XII to the Pontifical Academy of Sciences dealing with the proofs of God's existence in the light of modern science (February 21, 1943, and November 22, 1951). In December 1953 Jaki suffered complications from a tonsillectomy, and for ten years lost the use of his vocal cords; he then pursued advanced studies in physics at Fordham University, under the Nobel Prize–winner Victor F. Hess, publishing his doctoral thesis in 1958. He was a fellow at Princeton University (1960–1962), and took part in various graduate seminars in the history and philosophy of science. In 1966 his first major work, The Relevance of Physics, was published by the University of Chicago Press.

Jaki was the author of over fifty books and 150 articles, many of which have been translated into various languages, including French, Italian, Spanish, Hungarian, Polish, Russian, and Chinese. His translation of Immanuel KANT'S Universal Natural History and Theory of the Heavens links Kant's weaknesses in science with his IDEALISM, which locates reality in ideas perceived by the mind rather than in the external, objective world. In his translation of J.H. Lambert's Cosmological Letters of the Arrangement of the World Edifice, Jaki has offered scholars of the history of science the first translation of a classic of the history of COSMOLOGY.

In addition to his critique of the various forms of EMPIRICISM and idealism, both ancient and modern, Jaki argued that the history of science has repeatedly been used unfairly and inaccurately as an anti-Christian ideological tool, especially by a long line of French anticlerical propagandists, from the ENCYCLOPEDISTS to George Sarton and Alexander Koyre. Jaki stressed the importance of the work of Pierre Duhem (1861–1916), who argued that the ancient Greeks failed in science because of their belief in eternal cycles. In his Science and Creation, Jaki extended this concept vastly to include all ancient cultures He accounts for the "stillbirths of science" in all major ancient cultures on the basis of the absence, in all of them, of belief in creation out of nothing and in time. Jaki further illustrated how science became a self-sustaining enterprise only in the medieval Christian West, as a result of the impact of Christian faith in the INCARNATION upon the doctrine of creation. For Jaki, all science is cosmology: Each basic scientific law reveals something all-encompassing about the universe, the reality of which he defended from scientific, philosophical, and theological perspectives.

Jaki is an heir to the methodical REALISM of Étienne GILSON. Jaki also regarded G.K. CHESTERTON and Jacques MARITAIN as important influences upon his realist perspective concerning the cosmos. He has also explored in detail the thought of John Henry Cardinal NEWMAN (1801–1890) and corrected a variety of common misperceptions of the famous English churchman, especially those approaches that diminish Newman's deep appreciation of the Church and the SUPERNATURAL.

The central strand in Jaki's work is respect for all facts, historical and physical, a respect for objective knowledge across its full spectrum, of the material world as known by scientists, of the God we know through the material world and through His revelation, of the teaching of His Incarnate Son, of the authority vested by Christ in Peter and his successors, and of the teaching they give us in His Name.

From 1965 Jaki was on the faculty of Seton Hall University at South Orange, New Jersey; from 1975 he was a distinguished professor in that faculty. International recognition for his work on science and religion came on May 12, 1987, when he received the Templeton Prize for Progress in Religion. In September 1990 Pope JOHN PAUL II named Fr. Jaki an honorary member of the Pontifical Academy of Sciences. Fr. Jaki offered guest lectures at over fifty major universities, colleges, and research institutes in North America, Europe, and Australia, and was an invited lecturer at over twenty-five congresses, symposia, and colloquia, including various plenary meetings of the Pontifical Academy of Sciences, the World Congress of Catholic Physicians, New York (1998), and the International Giordano Bruno Conference, Rome (2000). He delivered the Gifford Lectures at the University of Edinburgh in 1974–1975 and 1975–1976. The lectures were published as The Road of Science and the Ways to God. He was also invited as the Olbers Lecturer, Bremen (1970); Fremantle Lecturer, Balliol College, Oxford (1977); Hoyt Fellow, Yale University (1980); McDonald Lecturer, University of Sydney (1981); McDermott Lecturer, University of Dallas (1983); Wethersfield Institute Scholar (1986, 1987, 1992); Farmington Institute Lecturer, Oxford University (1988, 1989); and Forwood Lecturer, University of Liverpool (1992); as well as receiving other guest lectureships in France, Belgium, the Netherlands, Germany, Italy, Spain, Greece, Hungary, Sweden, Japan, and Australia. Fr. Jaki held honorary doctorates from Central Michigan University (1974), Franciscan University of Steubenville (1986), St. Anselm's College (1988), Marquette University (1989), St. Vincent College (1989), Fordham University (1991), and Seton Hall University (1991). In addition to his honorary degrees and lectureships, Fr. Jaki's honors also include the Lecomte du Nouy Prize and Medal (1970), the Templeton Prize (1987), and the Széchenyi Medal of the Széchenyi Társaság (Hungary, 1997). He also held memberships in Sigma Xi, the History of Science Society, Olbers Gesellschaft (Bremen), Hellenic Society for Humanistic Studies (Athens), Academie Nationale des Sciences and Belles-Lettres et Arts de Bordeaux (membre correspondent).

Fr. Jaki died, following a heart attack, on April 7, 2009, in Madrid, and is buried at the Archabbey of Pannonhalma (Hungary), in the crypt of the Chapel of Our Lady.

JANSSEN, ARNOLD, ST.

Founder of the Society of the Devine Word; b. november 5, 1837, Goch, in the Rhineland, Germany; d. January 15, 1909, Steyl, Netherlands; beatified by Pope PAUL VI, October 19, 1975; canonized by Pope JOHN PAUL II, October 5, 2003.

Arnold Janssen was the second of seven children born to Gerhard and Anna Katharina Janssen, and his parents impressed upon him and his siblings the importance of the Church's missionary needs. After passing a state examination to teach natural sciences in the secondary schools in Bonn (1859), he studied for the priesthood in Münster and was ordained in 1861. For the next twelve years, he taught science in a secondary school in Bocholt. From 1867, he was also diocesan director of the APOSTLESHIP OF PRAYER, which he promoted throughout Germany by publishing a periodical and distributing free leaflets.

After relinquishing his teaching duties in 1873, he devoted himself to propagating devotion to the Sacred Heart and mission work. With four companions, he opened a house to train German priests for foreign missions. Because of the anti-Catholic atmosphere of the KULTURKAMPF in Germany at the time, they selected a site for this house in the Netherlands at Steyl, near the German border. Janssen's original plan for a missionary society whose members would not take religious vows crystallized in 1885 into the Societas Verbi Divini (SVD), translated as the Society of the DIVINE WORD, a congregation with simple vows.

The brothers operated the presses in his large printing establishment at Steyl, publishing journals and almanacs that actively recruited volunteers for the mission field. Although Janssen never traveled from Steyl due to his health and age, he continually worked to organize missions around the world, and many of his letters to the mission congregations have been preserved by the society. During Janssen's term as the first superior general, the order grew rapidly and spread to China, Togo, New Guinea, Japan, the Philippines, and Latin America, instituting secondary schools in most of these mission plants. In 1889, Janssen founded the HOLY SPIRIT MISSIONARY SISTERS to educate girls in mission territories. He also founded the cloistered Sisters Servants of the Holy Ghost of PERPETUAL ADORATION, dedicated to perpetual adoration and prayer for SVD missionaries. In the United States, the society began a school and printing press at Techny, Illinois, and also founded a number of schools for black children in Mississippi. By 2009, the SVD included more than six thousand missionary personnel operating in more than seventy countries worldwide.

The Roman decree introducing Janssen's cause for beatification was issued in 1942. He was beatified on October 19, 1975, by Pope Paul VI. On December 20, 2002, Pope Fohn Paul II decreed that Pamela Avellanosa, a fourteen-year-old girl from Baguio City, Philippines, who had been rendered comatose after a bicycle accident, had been miraculously healed after intercession through the Blessed Arnold Janssen. He was later canonized by Pope John Paul II on October 5, 2003. In his canonization homily, the pope remembered Janssen as one who "zealously carried out his priestly work, spreading the Word of God by means of the new mass media, especially the press."

Feast: January 15.

JERUSALEM, LATIN PATRIARCHATE OF

A Latin presence in JERUSALEM dates back to the origins of Christianity in Jerusalem. The primitive Church of Jerusalem in Roman Judea (Province of Syria Palaestina), being Judeo-Christian, practiced the Judeo-Christian rite. Its first bishop was James the Less. Until the second Jewish War, when HADRIAN turned Jerusalem into the Roman colony of Aelia Capitolina (AD 135), all the bishops of Jerusalem were Jewish Christians probably connected to Jesus' family. This colony became a new community worshipping in the Syriac Rite. At this time, when Jerusalem became a suffragan bishopric of the capital, Caesarea, Mark became the first Gentile bishop of Jerusalem. All of his twelve successors bore Latin names. The Council of Nicea (AD 325) reduced Jerusalem to fourth place among suffragan sees in the Holy Land.

Once Constantine moved the imperial capital to Constantinople in AD 330, Latins and the LATIN RITE (initially synonymous with the Western Church) became a more established presence. The Latin Rite, therefore, is an authentic rite of PALESTINE and the most ancient of the three principal rites practiced there. The Patriarchate of Jerusalem came into being when the Patriarch Juvenal (422–458) obtained approbation from the Council of CHALCEDON (AD 451) to have primacy over Palestine as it raised the bishop of Jerusalem to the rank of patriarch. At this time the institution of the oriental patriarchates occurred (though use of the term patriarch became common only a century later), so that Jerusalem, together with ROME, Constantinople, ALEXANDRIA, and ANTIOCH, formed the Pentarchy.

The CRUSADES established the Latin Kingdom (1099–1291) whose ecclesiastical primate became the Latin Patriarch of Jerusalem. July 15, 1099, marks the official date of the erection of the Latin Patriarchate of Jerusalem. In 1187 Jerusalem was conquered by the Muslims forcing the patriarchal seat to move to Acre until the city was defeated in 1291. It then moved to Cyprus and, after 1374, to Rome. Therefore, from 1291 until its re-establishment in 1847, the Latin Patriarchate of Jerusalem had only titular patriarchs. The Franciscan Custos of the Holy Land (Grand Master of the Order of the Holy Sepulchre) held the title of patriarch from 1342 to 1830 under the Papal Bull Gratiam agimus by Pope CLEMENT VI (unless someone was specifically appointed in the honorary office). The restoration of resident Latin patriarchs of Jerusalem with jurisdiction occurred in 1847 with the Apostolic Brief Nulla celebrior in response to the needs of Latin Catholics and to the growing threat of Protestant proselytism. Thus, the Latin Patriarch of Jerusalem is the Latin Rite Catholic archbishop of Jerusalem with jurisdiction for all Latin Rite Catholics in ISRAEL, the Palestinian Territories, Jordan, and Cyprus.

The first modern patriarch, Monsignor Joseph Valerga (1847–1872), established Catholicism in Transjordan from where it had been absent for six hundred years and opened the first mission in Beit Jala in 1853, where he also established in 1857 the seminary that had been founded in 1852. After seven Italian predecessors, the indigenization of the patriarchate began in 1987 when Michel Sabbah (1933–) became the first Palestinian patriarch, followed in 2008 by Fouad Twal (1940–), a Jordanian. With five patriarchal vicars (one for a Hebrew-speaking vicariate in Israel) and three auxiliary bishops, the Latin patriarch is responsible for the cure of souls within his diocese, supervising the extensive patriarchate school system, overseeing numerous Catholic religious communities, and fostering Catholic unity, ecumenical relations, and diplomatic relations with Israel, the Palestinian Authority, and Jordan.

JEWISH-CATHOLIC RELATIONS (PUBLIC)

The New Testament, the foundational text of Christianity, may best be understood as an internal Jewish argument about what JUDAISM is and ought to be. It represents a set of strongly held views written mostly by Jews, addressed to other Jews, arguing about Judaism. Its newness lies not so much in its moral teachings, which in the main fall within the range of Jewish teachings, but in the fact that it refracts Jewish teaching, tradition, law, and liturgy through the radical lens of the death and resurrection of the Jew, JESUS of NAZARETH, whom it affirms is CHRIST, the promised MESSIAH and, more, the SON OF GOD.

To the extent that the New Testament records a protracted family argument, it reflects something of the bitterness of family quarrels, especially in its later passages. There are, however, more fundamental continuities than discontinuities between the Christian and the rabbinic readings of the Scriptures the two traditions share in common. A statement of the PONTIFICAL BIBLICAL COMMISSION, The Jewish People and Their Sacred Scriptures in the Christian Bible (2002), argues that Christians not only can, but should, learn from Jewish interpretations of Scripture.

The Patristic Period. In the Patristic literature, as the Church became more and more gentile and less and less Jewish, Jews as a people were increasingly seen, not from the inside as fellow members of one PEOPLE OF GOD, but from the outside as the Other. This negative "teaching of contempt" against Jews and Judaism was developed in the early centuries by the FATHERS OF THE CHURCH for a number of historically understandable, if today no longer defensible, reasons. At the heart of all the negativity lay the idea that the Jews were collectively guilty for the death of Jesus and that subsequent generations of Jews continued collectively to bear this guilt. The teaching was that GOD, angry at the Jews, punished them by destroying the temple and sending them into exile. It became common in Patristic times for Christian apologists to point to the destroyed temple as proof that God was angry at Jews, which proved inversely, they felt, that Jews must have done something terrible for God to be that angry at them. It must have been worse than killing a prophet. For God to become so angry, Jesus must have been more than a man. He must have been God's own Son! Thus the destruction of the JERUSALEM Temple was used as an inverted proof for the divinity of Christ. The Church Fathers were worried when the emperor Julian, called the Apostate in Christian history, declared that he would rebuild the Temple in Jerusalem and were inordinately happy when he died before he could do so, pointing to this as yet another proof of Christian triumph.

A significant question needs to be asked at this point: Given the level of anti-Judaic rhetoric of the period, why was it that, of all of the various religions existing in the ROMAN EMPIRE during the fourth century, when Christianity attained political power through Constantine and his successors, Judaism alone was allowed to survive and continue to be a religio licita (a licit religion)? The answer to this is found in the writings of St. AUGUSTINE, whom many attack as being anti-Jewish. True, Augustine does not disagree with the collective guilt charge, and he uses typically negative rhetoric in affirming it. But if one looks closely at one of the key passages those critical of Augustine cite, where he states that as murderers of Christ they have the mark of Cain on them, it is not necessarily negative in its outcome, though it is in its rhetoric. What is the mark of Cain? It is God's protective mark. God reserves to Himself the right to deal with the Jews and nobody else is to touch them. Augustine goes on to talk about how the Jews continue to worship as their fathers and mothers did and must be allowed to do so. The Jews worship, after all, the way God taught them to worship. The Jews, and the Jews alone, give witness to the validity of their BIBLE as God's word, which Christians need, because the New Testament needs the Old to provide the fullness of its witness. Augustine's achievement should not be understated. He came up with this remarkable set of insights in direct contradiction to many of the writings of those who came before him, including his own mentor, Ambrose of Milan.

Pope St. GREGORY the Great (r. 590–604) was persuaded by Augustine's arguments and began to put them into canon law. Judaism became, for the papacy, not only a licit religion but one that had the special protection of the papacy (cf. Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 480). On a number of occasions over the centuries, Jews petitioned the pope, who served as a court of last recourse in those times, against local rulers, both clerical and lay, who would persecute them. And thus it was that Judaism survived over centuries.

1096: A Historic Turning Point. The first millennium of the relationship between Jews and Christians was, in retrospect, not all that terrible. Some nasty incidents occurred, but nothing like what happened in 1096 and subsequently. In 1096 the First Crusade was launched, and that is when things began to go terribly wrong. A huge mob of people who had missed the boats used to transport the crusaders decided to travel to the Holy Land on their own, and began the long march through Europe to reach their destination. As they were going up the Rhineland Valley in what is today modern Germany, they came up with the idea: "Well, if we're going over to fight infidels, why don't we take care of the infidels in our midst?" And so they attempted to forcefully convert or kill all the Jews they found. Bishops along the way tried to save their Jews and strongly opposed the crusading mob's actions. They failed, however, to stop the slaughter. The bishop of Mainz hid the Jews in his own palace, but the mob broke in and killed them all. Some of the bishops did save Jews, one by hiding them in his various country places, so a remnant of that Jewish community of the Rhineland Valley survived. Christian and Jewish chroniclers agree that upwards of 10,000 Jews were killed. The mob never made it to the Holy Land, though. The Catholic king of Hungary got word of what had happened in the Rhineland, gathered his troops, and destroyed the mob when they reached his lands.

It was only after this great, unprovoked bloodletting that the things typically associated with the negative treatment and portrayal of Jews began. Before that period, the classic model of Jewish blindness and Christian triumph was illustrated in the statues on French Gothic cathedrals: one, ecclesia, the church, resplendent and beautiful; the other synagoga, the synagogue, also a beautiful woman, but portrayed blindfolded, with the tablets of the LAW falling out of one hand and the broken staff of the law held in the other. That was the level of Christian triumphalism before the CRUSADES. It was essentially theological. It was not racial in any sense. After the first Crusade, however, there appear much uglier portrayals of Jews, such as the infamous Judensau on the cathedral in Regensburg, Germany. The Judensau, as the name indicates, was a large female pig, a sow, portrayed with Jews suckling on her teats. This is denigration of a qualitatively different sort than the juxtaposition of a beautiful triumphant woman with that of an equally beautiful, albeit defeated, one.

Only after 1096 did the tradition of the demonization of the Jews begin in earnest. One can find some precedent for the demonizing of Jews, that is, their identification with the DEVIL, with Jews being shown as having horns and even the forked tail of the devil in the world. Thus Jews began to be depicted as an incarnation of pure evil in the world, rather than simply blind for having failed to recognize their own Messiah.

From 1096 to 1492. Beginning in the twelfth century, expulsions of Jews occurred in every country in western Europe except for Italy, specifically the Papal States, which took in Jewish refugees from Spain and elsewhere, because papal canon law required allowing Jews to worship freely as Jews. It prohibited the forced conversion of Jews (cf. Canon 8 of Nicea II [787]; Tanner, 1990, pp. 145–146). There exist in archives letters from the Roman Inquisition to the Spanish Inquisition, indicating the former's disapproval of what they felt was the brutality of the latter. These letters were ignored, but not in the Papal States, where the law of the Church regarding the treatment of Jews prevailed even in the worst of times.

It is not surprising, then, in the twentieth century during the Holocaust, that Italy was one of the few countries that saved over 75 percent of its Jews. And wherever the Italian Army went, the Jews were safe. Had the Italian Army been given the city of Thessalonica in Greece, for example, that very ancient, now lost, community would have been saved. Benito MUSSOLINI did get the trains running on time, but he was not able to get anywhere near as many Jews on them as the transportation administrator, Adolf Eichmann (1906–1962), who was in charge of all the trains designated to transport Jews to the concentration camps, wanted.

Modern Racial Anti-Semitism. This brief history thus far leads to the question of how to define terms and to the careful distinctions that need to be made. It was not until the eighteenth century, when the West had the language of the ENLIGHTENMENT, that modern racial ANTI-SEMITISM could have been invented. Racialism is a fairly recent concept, perhaps originating as a justification of the European slave trade. By defining Africans as less than human, Europeans could justify treating them like animals. If one applies this concept of race, unknown in the ancient or medieval world, to the peoples of Europe, Europe's perennial other, the Jews, will lead the list. The Jews, originally labeled blind and guilty of deicide, condemned by God to wander the face of the earth, had been turned in the late MIDDLE AGES into agents of evil. Now they became, by race, both subhuman and still agents of evil. Whereas in the Middle Ages, they could convert to Christianity and become equal to other Christians, in racial theory this was impossible. One can change one's religion but not one's race.

So a new and vastly more dangerous set of ideas began rattling around in Europe, and not just in the lower classes. VOLTAIRE (François-Marie Arouet, 1694–1778) argued that no matter what one did for Jews, they could still not be trusted to fit into "enlightened" French society. They were doomed to be dangerous because of their race. Classical composer Richard WAGNER's (1813–1883) anti-Semitism, similarly, is well known. Indeed, the philosopher Friedrich NIETZSCHE (1844–1900) broke with Wagner in part because Nietzsche could not tolerate Wagner's racial hatred of Jews. It was this distinctively modern set of ideas, radically different from those of the preceding centuries, though unlikely to have occurred to anyone without the centuries of the Church's teaching of contempt, that made it possible to conceive what had been before that inconceivable: genocide, the systematic murder of an entire race.

There are, then, at least three broad categories of anti-Jewishness over the centuries: (a) the theological anti-Judaism of the Fathers of the Church; (b) the denigrating anti-Jewishness of the Middle Ages; and (c) modern racial, genocidal anti-Semitism. These are different categories. It was not always and everywhere like it was when it was at its worst, as, in fact, many people seem to believe. One tends to project back into history the worst of the racism of the twentieth century. But Jews, over the centuries, even with the expulsions, blood libels, pogroms, and other cruelties kept choosing, in large numbers, to stay within Christendom when, for example, they could have moved to Muslim countries. They could have left Christian lands altogether. They did not. More often than not, Jews moved from Western to Eastern Europe to stay within Christendom. And that can only be because, in a lot of times and in a lot of places, they did reasonably well living among Christians, at least as well as their relatives living under Muslim domination.

Nostra aetate,* no. 4. In 1962, when the Second Vatican Council began, there was still a collective Christian sense, which was assumed but had never debated as such in any ecumenical council prior to Vatican II, that the Jews collectively were responsible for the death of Jesus. This notion persisted, so the Fathers of the Church or bishops at any of these councils never made a formal statement about it. Nor was there ever any doctrinal pronunciation on the matter. With Nostra aetate the Church took its first serious look at the issue of God's relationship with the Jewish people and the relationship of the Jewish people to the Church. Given the backdrop of the HOLOCAUST and the terrible realization of what a consistent denigration of Jews and Judaism could lead to, the scales fell off Christian eyes. They began to read Romans 9 to 11, which was the last doctrinally significant statement in the history of the Church before Nostra aetate, in a new light, seeing the positive things it had to say about Jews and Judaism for the first time since not long after St. Paul penned his reflections. If one reads Nostra aetate, all fifteen sentences of it, one will not find any references to the Patristic writings, making it very distinct as a Second Vatican Council document, because the authors of other documents relish in quotations from the Fathers and Doctors of the Church.

The first result of this relooking at the New Testament by Nostra aetate authors revealed that it is very difficult, based on the New Testament texts themselves, to conclude any collective guilt of Jews, then or now, for the death of Jesus. All three SYNOPTIC GOSPELS, for example, speak of a plot by the chief priests and the elders (not the PHARISEES) in collusion with Pilate and portray Jerusalem as so pro-Jewish that Jesus had to be arrested at night, for fear of a riot by Jews if they saw it happening.

To presume that all Jews in Jesus' time were guilty of his death is an incredibly far-fetched idea. Most Jews lived outside Jerusalem, indeed, outside of ISRAEL at the time. (The Diaspora was already a reality long before the destruction of the Temple.) How could they even have known he was on trial until long after it had taken place? So it is only simple historical reality to say with Nostra aetate that Jews cannot be presented in Catholic classrooms or from Catholic pulpits as accursed by God or rejected as if this followed from sacred Scripture.

Without that, the rest of the teaching of contempt crumbled. If the Jews cannot be blamed as a people for the death of Jesus, there is no reason for God to punish the Jews. The individual Jews who took part in it—Caiaphas (high priest AD 18–37) and his priests—did what they did. But as the Catechism of the Council of TRENT said in 1566, Christians bear more guilt for the death of Jesus than do the Jews, for in their sins Christians crucify Christ knowingly, because they are aware that Christ died for their sins, whereas what the Jews did was done in ignorance: "They know not what they do" (Lk 23:34).

The council took a renewed look at Romans 9 to 11, where St. Paul meditates upon God's "irrevocable" covenant with the Jewish people. The council felt it necessary at long last to take seriously Paul's notion that God's ongoing choosing of the Jewish people continues after the Christ event, that God's covenant with them will endure, as God promised the Jews, "forever." God, the council Fathers decided when the issue was put before them, spoke the truth to the Jews, a truth He did not take away or change when Christ came. Thus framed, the issue becomes: Is God true to His promises? If so, then God's covenant with the Jews endures. If not, then everyone is doomed. If God has not remained true to the divine promise to Jews, unequivocally and as He gave it to them, then what grounds do Christians have to feel confident that God will remain true to them? They have sinned as grievously as Jews over the centuries, arguably more grievously, for they had more power and resources to sin with.

Similarly, the council noted that it is when searching into her own mystery that the Church encounters the mystery of Israel, for the Church is an offspring of God's People, the Jews. There is inevitably, then, a sacred bond between Christians and Jews. The council adapted Paul's image of root and branch, with the root being biblical Israel and the branches being Christianity and rabbinic Judaism. Nostra aetate thus challenged the Church to come up with a new vocabulary to describe its unique relationship with the Jewish people, which, Pope JOHN PAUL II famously stated in Mainz in 1983, is not just an external relationship as it is with all other world religions, but a relationship internal to the Church, the relationship between its Scriptures. Catholics are only just, as Cardinal Walter KASPER, the president of the Pontifical Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews (CRRJ), has said on a number of occasions, at "the beginning of the beginning" in pondering and drawing out the implications of these conciliar and papal insights.

Implementing Nostra aetate, no. 4. In January 1967, the UNITED STATES CONFERENCE OF CATHOLIC BISHOPS (USCCB) issued, as a follow up to the council, the first set of "Guidelines for Catholic-Jewish Relations" ever issued in the history of the Church. These guidelines (updated in 1985) noted the significance of the dialogue in America, because it enjoys the world's largest Jewish community that has, like the Catholic Church, numerous institutions of higher learning to engage in the effort of mutual understanding and enrichment. It set forth major areas that could be explored together, such as the common scriptures, liturgies, and common social values, areas in which the two communities could work together for the benefit of society as a whole. Any attempt at proselytizing was, of course, to be avoided within the context of the dialogue of mutual esteem called for by the council.

In 1973 the French bishops issued their own initial statement on the relationship of the Church and the Jewish people, exploring some of the theological themes opened up by the council and reflecting upon the significance for Jews of their ingathering into the land of Israel at that time. In 1974, with these two documents at hand, the Holy See issued its own "Guidelines and Suggestions for Implementing the Conciliar Declaration, Nostra aetate, (n. 4)." These reaffirmed the council's condemnation of anti-Semitism and called for the Church and the Jewish people to jointly witness to the shared values and common understanding of the meaning of human history and its destiny at the end of time. The Holy See noted with theological precision that although Christians affirm that Christ fulfilled the biblical promises, they yet await, with Jews, their "perfect fulfillment" with, as the VATICAN's 1985 "Notes on the Correct Way to Present Jews and Judaism in Preaching and Catechesis of the Roman Catholic Church" put it, "the coming or return of the Messiah," which Christians and Jews await together and toward which they are jointly called to prepare the way.

The 1985 Notes also for the first time, citing a 1975 statement of the U.S. bishops, affirmed not only the ancient Jewish religious attachment to the land of Israel but also affirmed the existence of the State of Israel, not as a theological entity, but with reference to international law. In 1998 the Holy See issued We Remember: A Catholic Reflection on the Shoah, which called on Catholics to preserve the memory of the Holocaust as a memoria futuri, memory for the sake of educating future generations on the tragic lessons the Church and all humanity must take from it. The document acknowledged, with repentance, that Christians on all levels, including popes, were involved in developing the negative image of Jews and Judaism that Nazism exploited to spread its distinctly different racial anti-Semitism. In 2000 the U.S. bishops approved their own document implementing We Remember.

It is important to note that all of these documents, including Nostra aetate itself, have been met with concerns as well as appreciation by the Jewish community. These questions have been a vital part of the ongoing evolution of Church teaching on Jews and Judaism, helping Catholics understand better what areas need to be clarified and thought through more carefully.

In the JUBILEE YEAR 2000, Pope John Paul II fulfilled a dream that he had spoken of since early in his pontificate, to visit the Holy Land, the sacred geography where Jesus, the Jew of Nazareth, was born, preached his saving truths, and died at the hands of the Roman Empire. In so doing, John Paul II fulfilled another dream as well, quite consciously and purposefully, a dream also of the Jewish people and at the same time a dream of the Fathers of the Church who had gathered for the Second Vatican Council thirty-five years earlier: the dream of reconciliation between the Catholic Church and the Jewish people. Few pilgrimages in the two millennia of Christian history have had such pregnant hopes and such significant results.

John Paul II's pontificate saw more progress in Catholic-Jewish relations and certainly more dramatic gestures toward the Jewish people by the bishop of ROME than occurred during the reigns of all of his predecessors combined. This remarkably open pope telegraphed his hopes for all to see, yet moved with magisterial prudence, step by step, toward goals that appeared impossibly distant on the horizon when he first assumed his office in 1978.

The pope spoke on Judaism on numerous occasions and in a remarkably wide range of locations throughout the world. Virtually wherever he traveled, a Jewish community existed, whether large, as in the United States, or tragically small, as in the tiny remnant of the once-flourishing Jewish community of Poland; and, wherever he went, he sought out those communities to extend reconciliation and affirmation of the infinite worth of Judaism's continuing proclamation of the name of the One God in the world.

The papal talks and gestures provide a record of a profound spiritual pilgrimage for the pope and the Church, almost two millennia after the Church's birth as a Jewish movement in the land and among the people of Israel. One finds in these talks and gestures a growth and development in the pope's understanding of and appreciation for how "the Jews define themselves in the light of their own religious experience" (CRRJ 1974, prologue, cited by the pope in his first address to representatives of Jewish organizations, March 12, 1979 [Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 5]). This development teaches the Church how it, too, must reinterpret its relationship to the Jewish people as "people of God."

Motivation. The pope spoke of the Jewish friends of his youth on many occasions, including in his personal reflection, Crossing the Threshold of Hope, and in meeting with some of the few survivors during his prayerful visit to the Israeli memorial to the victims of the Holocaust (Shoah), Yad VaShem, on his Jubilee pilgrimage there in 2000. The pope grew up in Wadowice in the 1930s, one of many Polish towns which, like much of Poland, has endured shifting sovereignties over the centuries. Had he been born thirty years earlier, Karol Wojtyła would have been an Austrian citizen, though, indubitably, a Pole at heart. Jews made up a substantial minority of Wadowice's citizens in Wojtyła's youth, as they had for centuries. Poland, indeed, at that time enjoyed the distinction of having the world's largest Jewish population and the greatest concentration of Jewish centers of learning in Jewish history. Jews had been welcomed into Poland throughout the late MIDDLE AGES after they were exiled from most of the countries of Western Europe. By the time of Wojtyła's youth, they had been an integral part of Polish society and history for nearly a thousand years, enriching it culturally, intellectually, and (though not all Poles would acknowledge this) spiritually as well. There were anti-Semitic Catholics in Wadowice, of course, but according to Jerzy Kluger, one of the pope's childhood friends, these were relatively few and normally contained by other Polish Catholic youth.

When Nazi Germany invaded Poland, the centuries long and mutually beneficial co-existence of Polish Jews and Polish Catholics was forever destroyed. In an astonishingly brief period of time, the ancient Polish-Jewish community, many close friends of Wojtyła's youth, were systematically hunted down by the Germans, concentrated first in newly erected ghettos and then into labor camps, and, finally, systematically murdered. Poles who know their history say that this loss of the significant Jewish segment of Polonia represents one of the greatest tragedies of Polish history.

This great loss happened on Polish soil to its Polish citizens of Jewish descent. For Wojtyła the loss was both national and personal. And it was unhealable. Poland would never, could never, be the same again. John Paul II remained to his dying day quite attached to the friends of his youth, organizing and continuing regular class reunions of his high school classmates—those who survived the war—not only when he was archbishop and cardinal, but even as pope. When he spoke of feeling still the presence of the Jewish victims of Nazi genocide, as he did at the 1994 Vatican concert memorializing them on Yom HaShoah that year, he was believed. The Holocaust, for this pope, was a personal event. It happened not to them, but to him, to his friends, and to his friends' parents, relatives, and families. It is no wonder, then, that no one, Jewish, Christian, or secular-academic, has done more to defeat Holocaust denial than John Paul II. He evoked this sense of personal loss and remembrance poignantly during the Yom HaShoah Concert:

> Among those who are with us this evening are some who physically underwent a horrendous experience, crossing a dark wilderness where the very source of love seemed dried up. Many wept at that time, and we still hear echoes of their lament. We hear it here too; their plea did not die with them but rises powerful, agonizing, heartrending, saying, "Do not forget us!" It is addressed to one and all. Thus we are gathered this evening to commemorate the Holocaust of millions of Jews. The candles lit by some of the survivors are intended to show symbolically that this hall does not have narrow limits. It contains all the victims: fathers, mothers, sons, daughters, brothers, sisters, and friends. In our memory they are all present, they are with you, they are with us. (Fisher and Klenicki 1995, pp. 188–189)

Rabbi James Rubin, one of the organizers, was standing quite close to the pope when John Paul spoke these words. The pope, Rabbi Rubin reports, could see real faces of real people in his mind as he spoke. He spoke the words to them, the murdered friends of his youth.

The pope's personal stake in what happened to the Jews of Europe, the families and the friends of his youth, explains much about the concentration on Catholic-Jewish relations that so marked his pontificate. His personal caring also launched him on a journey of theological discovery, of careful reconsideration of the essential nature of the Church's understanding of its relationship with the people of Jesus and Mary—the Jews—and of the faith they have held dear through centuries of discrimination and persecution.

Building a Theological Bridge of Hope and Reconciliation. The ongoing papal reconsideration over the years and gradual, step-by-cautious-step redefinition of ancient theological categories represent the fruits of a painstaking effort, supported by the efforts of Catholics and Jews in dialogue throughout the world, as the pope acknowledged ("Historic Visit to the Synagogue of Rome" [1986], no. 4; Fisher and Klenicki 1995, pp. 60–73), to articulate anew the mystery of the Church in the light of a positive articulation of the abiding mystery of Israel. The results have been as breathtaking as they have been painstaking.

Progress since the Second Vatican Council has been measured in small steps: a word uttered here to clarify an awkward phrase there; a slightly less ambiguous wording to replace a more ambiguous, potentially misleading theological formula; and so forth. But the direction is clear and the basic message starkly unambiguous: The Church is not alone in the world as People of God. The Church is joined by the Jewish people in its proclamation of the oneness of God and the true nature of human history, which Jews and Christians alike pray daily, and through their prayers, proclaim universally (cf. CRRJ 1985, II, 9–11). The following thematic categories serve to organize some of these small steps and interventions by which Pope John Paul II sought to frame and to move forward the Church's side of historic dialogue between Catholics and Jews.

Spiritual Bond between the Church and the Jewish People. The notion of a "spiritual bond" linking the Church and the Jewish people ("Abraham's stock") was central to the Second Vatican Council's "Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions," Nostra aetate. It became a major theme of John Paul II's own reflections on the subject over the years, one that he constantly tried to probe and refine. In his first address to Jewish representatives, for example, he interpreted the conciliar phrase as meaning "that our two religious communities are connected and closely related at the very level of their respective identities" (Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 4), and he spoke of "fraternal dialogue" between the two.

Using terms such as fraternal and addressing one another as brothers and sisters reflect ancient usage within the Christian community. They imply an acknowledgment of a commonality of faith, with liturgical implications. It was an ecumenical breakthrough, for example, when the Second Vatican Council and Pope PAUL VI began the practice of addressing Orthodox and Protestant Christians in such terms. John Paul II's extension of this terminology to Jews is by no means accidental. The relationship reaches to the very essence of the nature of Christian faith itself, so that to deny it is to deny something essential to the teaching of the Church (cf. Notes, I, 2). The spiritual bond with Jews, for John Paul II, was properly understood as a "'sacred' one, stemming as it does from the mysterious will of God" (Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 56).

In bringing this lesson home, the pope used startling and powerful language. In his important allocution to the Jewish community of Mainz, West Germany (1980), he likened the relationship to that between "the first and second part" of the Christian Bible. The dialogue between Catholics and Jews is not a dialogue between past (Judaism) and present (Christianity) realities, as if the former had been "superseded" or "replaced" by the latter, as certain Christian polemicists would have it. "On the contrary," the pope made clear in Mainz, "it is a question rather of reciprocal enlightenment and explanation, just as is the relationship between the Scriptures themselves" (cf. Dei Verbum, 11; Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 15).

In this vein the pope also moved Catholics to formulate more sensitive biblical terminology. The pope cautioned against interpreting the "old" in "Old Testament" to mean that it has been abrogated in favor of the "new;" he suggested using the phrase "the Hebrew Scriptures" ("Address to the Jewish Community in Australia" 1986; Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 83).

In the pope's view, so close is the spiritual bond between the two peoples of God that the dialogue is properly considered—unlike any other relationship between the Church and a world religion—to be "a dialogue within our Church" (Mainz 1980; Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 15). Interpreting Nostra aetate during his visit to the Great Synagogue of Rome, the pope brought these themes to a dramatic culmination:

> The Church of Christ discovers her "bond" with Judaism by "searching into her own mystery" (Nostra Aetate, 4). The Jewish religion is not "extrinsic" to us, but in a certain way is "intrinsic" to our own religion. With Judaism, therefore, we have a relationship which we do not have with any other religion. You are dearly beloved brothers and, in a certain way, it could be said that you are our elder brothers. (Rome 1986; Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 63)

A Living Heritage. The phrase, "elder brothers," used here with caution, raises the question of how the pope dealt with the sometimes awkward (for Christians) question of the Church's spiritual debt to Judaism. This debt has been acknowledged, traditionally—as in the medieval canon law exception allowing Jews freedom of worship (within certain limitations), a right granted to no other religious group outside Christianity.

Yet the acknowledgment often came negatively. For many Christians over the ages, for example, the application of the term elder brother to the Jews would have conjured images of apologetic interpretations of the younger/elder brother stories of Genesis in which the younger brother takes over the heritage or patrimony of the elder (e.g., Esau and Jacob). The powerful imagery of the Gothic cathedrals of Europe is another example of this. Juxtaposed on either side of the portals of many medieval cathedrals is a statue of the Synagogue (portrayed in the physical form of a woman), her head bowed, holding a broken staff of the Law, with the tablets of the Ten COMMANDMENTS slipping from her fingers, and a statue of the Church, resplendently erect and triumphant. The pairings symbolized for the medieval artists the passage of the covenant from Judaism to Christianity.

Pope John Paul II sought to reinterpret ancient apologetics and to replace negative images with positive affirmations. In his address to the Jewish community in Mainz, he cited a passage from a declaration of the bishops of the Federal Republic of Germany, issued earlier that year, calling attention to "the spiritual heritage of Israel for the Church." He added to the citation, however, a single word that removed any possible ambiguity and opened up a new area of theological reflection, calling it "a living heritage, which must be understood and preserved in its depths and richness by us Catholic Christians" (Mainz, 1980; Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 14).

In March 1982, speaking to delegates from episcopal conferences gathered in Rome from around the world to discuss ways to foster improved Catholic-Jewish relations, the pope confirmed and advanced this direction in his thought:

> Christians have taken the right path, that of justice and brotherhood, in seeking to come together with their Semitic brethren, respectfully and perseveringly, in the common heritage, a heritage that all value so highly.... To assess it carefully in itself and with due awareness of the faith and religious life of the Jewish people as they are professed and practiced still today, can greatly help us to understand better certain aspects of the life of the Church. (Fisher and Klenicki 1995, pp. 18–19; italics added)

The "common spiritual patrimony" of Jews and Christians, then, is not something of the past but of the present. Just as the Church, through the writings of its doctors and saints and the statements of its councils, has developed a rich tradition interpreting and clarifying its spiritual heritage, so has Judaism developed, through rabbinic literature and the TALMUD, through Jewish philosophers and mystics, what was given to it in its founding by God (cf. Notes, VI). John Paul II called Christians to understand the "common spiritual patrimony" not only positively, but assertively, as a joint witness of God's truth to the world: "Jews and Christians are the trustees and witnesses of an ethic marked by the Ten Commandments in the observance of which man finds his truth and freedom" (Rome 1986; Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 65).

Permanent Validity of God's Covenant with the Jewish People. Underlying the previous considerations is a central message, implicit in the teaching of the Second Vatican Council, that John Paul II made explicit. Not only Nostra aetate but also the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, Lumen gentium, drew upon the strong affirmation of St. Paul in Romans 11:28–29 when seeking to define the role of the Jewish people in God's plan of salvation, even after the time of Christ: "On account of their fathers, this people [the Jews] remains most dear to God, for God does not repent of the gifts He makes nor of the calls He issues" (Lumen gentium 16).

Logically, the conciliar affirmation means that Jews remain God's chosen people in the fullest sense ("most dear"). This affirmation, the pope teaches, is unequivocal and in no way diminishes the Church's own affirmation of its own standing as people of God. In Mainz the pope addressed the Jewish community with full respect as "the people of God of the Old Covenant, which has never been revoked by God" and emphasized the "permanent value" of both the Hebrew Scriptures and the Jewish community that witnesses to those Scriptures as sacred texts (Mainz 1980; Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 15).

In meeting with representatives of episcopal conferences, the pope stressed the present tense of Romans 9:4–5 concerning the Jewish people, "who have the adoption as sons, and the glory and the covenants and the legislation and the worship and the promises" (Rome 1982; Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 18), while also affirming "the universal salvific significance of the death and resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth" (Rome 1982; Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 18). The pope did not seek a superficial reconciling of these two great truths but affirmed them both together, commenting: "This means that the links between the Church and the Jewish people are founded on the design of the God of the Covenant" (Rome 1982; Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 18).

The pope's remarkable formulation in Australia distilled years of theological development: "The Catholic faith is rooted in the eternal truths of the Hebrew Scriptures and in the irrevocable covenant made with Abraham. We, too, gratefully hold these same truths of our Jewish heritage and look upon you as our brothers and sisters in the Lord" (Australia 1986; Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 83).

Catechetics and Liturgy. Pope John Paul II insisted that this renewed vision of the relationship between Judaism and Christianity must permeate every area of church life. In his address to representatives of episcopal conferences, for example, the pope stressed the need for Catholics to know the Jewish roots of their liturgy, and for catechesis to involve a full appreciation of the Jewish heritage (Rome 1982; Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 19). In his response to the International Conference of Christians and Jews, the pope noted that the "great common spiritual patrimony" shared by Jews and Christians rests on a "solid" foundation of "faith in a God ... as a loving father ... in a common basic liturgical pattern, and in a common commitment, grounded in faith, to all men and women in need, who are our 'neighbors'" (cf. Lev. 19:18, Mark 12:32, and parallels) (Rome 1984; Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 42). Catechesis and the liturgy itself have as a primary goal making clear the "spiritual bond" that links the Church to the people Israel (cf. Notes 1985, II, VI). Also the often tragic history of Christian-Jewish relations over the centuries needs to be made clear to Catholic youth (Rome 1984; Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 42).

At the time of his visit to the Rome synagogue, John Paul II reminded "my brothers and sisters of the Catholic Church" of the 1974 Guidelines and the 1985 Notes issued by the Holy See's Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews. The pope concluded that "it is only a question of studying them carefully, of immersing oneself in their teachings, and of putting them into practice" (Rome 1986; Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 64).

The Catechism of the Catholic Church duly reflects these papal concerns flowing out of the Second Vatican Council. In the section on the Creed "Jesus Christ Suffered under Pontius Pilate, Was Crucified, Died and Was Buried" (571–598), the Catechism devotes considerable attention to a nuanced discussion of Jesus' relationship to his people, Israel; to God's Law, the Torah; to the Jerusalem Temple; and to "Israel's Faith in the One God and Savior." Rather than pillorying the Jews as earlier catechisms might have done, it stresses the "ignorance" of "the Sanhedrin's tragic misunderstanding" (591). It is noteworthy that the Catechism speaks specifically of certain "religious authorities of Jerusalem," as did Nostra aetate, rather than collectively of the Jews as a people. The Catechism reminds the reader of the depth of the mystery of salvation in Christ, and, indeed, of the "act of faith" itself. It stresses the "divisions among Jewish authorities concerning Jesus' death," so that readers will not stereotype the religious leadership of the Jews of Jesus' time, much less the people as a whole. The Catechism devotes two very strong paragraphs to debunking any remaining temptation that Christians might have to blame the Jews as a people, then or now, for Jesus' death: "Jews are not collectively responsible for Jesus' death" (597), and "all sinners were the authors of Christ's passion" (598).

Paragraphs 839 and 840 similarly summarize both papal themes and statements of the Holy See's Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews, especially the 1985 Notes. The Jewish people are called (following the wording of the revised "Good Friday Prayer for the Jews" in the Roman MISSAL) "the first to hear the Word of God." "The Jewish Faith," the Catechism states, "unlike other non-Christian religions, is already a response to God's Revelation in the Old Testament." Jews and Christians, the section concludes, are similarly posed in the perspective of the history of salvation: "When one considers the future," Jews and Christians "tend toward similar goals: expectation of the coming (or the return) of the Messiah." The Catechism represents the official teaching of the Magisterium and as such provides a solid doctrinal basis for theological dialogue between the Church and the Jewish people leading toward joint witness to sacred truths both share in common as well as joint action for the betterment of humanity.

Condemnations of Anti-Semitism and Remembrances of the Shoah. In his first audience with Jewish representatives, John Paul reaffirmed the Second Vatican Council's repudiation of anti-Semitism "as opposed to the very spirit of Christianity," and "which in any case the dignity of the human person alone would suffice to condemn" (Rome 1979; Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 5). The pope repeated this message in country after country throughout the world, calling on Catholics, especially in Europe, to remember, "in particular, the memory of the people whose sons and daughters were intended for total extermination" ("Homily at Auschwitz" 1979; Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 7). From the intensity of his own experience, the pope was able both to articulate the uniqueness of the Jewish experience of the Shoah and to revere the memory of all of Nazism's millions of non-Jewish victims. (The pope would have, it may be appropriate to say, agreed unreservedly with the formulation of Elie Wiesel (1928–): "Not every victim of the Holocaust was a Jew, but every Jew was a victim.")

In his 1987 address to the Jews of Warsaw, the pope acknowledged the priority as well as uniqueness of Jewish suffering in the Shoah: "It was you who suffered this terrible sacrifice of extermination: one might say that you suffered it also on behalf of those who were likewise to be exterminated" (Warsaw 1987; Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 99). From this, he derived the very significant theological insight that the Jewish witness to the Shoah is for the Church as well as for all of humanity, a "saving warning," indeed a continuation "in the contemporary world" of the prophetic mission itself. The Church, in turn, is called to listen to this uniquely Jewish proclamation and to unite its voice to that of the Jewish people in their continuing "particular vocation" to be a light to the nations.

The order of the pope's theological reflection on the Shoah is important. As he stated in a 1987 letter to Archbishop John L. May (1922–1994), an "authentic" approach first grapples with the "specific" and, therefore, specifically Jewish reality of the event. Only then, and with this continually in mind, can one begin to seek out its more "universal meaning" (Fisher and Klenicki 1995, pp. 100–101).

In Miami the pope spoke of the "mystery of the suffering of Israel's children," and he called on Christians to learn from the "acute insights" of "Jewish thinkers" on the human condition and to develop in dialogue with Jews "common educational programs which ... will teach future generations about the Holocaust so that never again will such a horror be possible. Never again!" (Miami 1987; Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 108). From "the suffering and martyrdom of the Jewish people," understood within the context of their "constant progression in faith and obedience to the loving call of God" over the centuries, then, one's remembrance of the Shoah may lead to "a much deeper hope ... a saving cry of warning for the whole human race" (Vienna 1988; Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 121), a prophetic "prick of conscience" that may tell us "what message our century [can] convey to the next" (Mauthausen 1988; Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 118).

Over the years Pope John Paul issued strong statements condemning acts of terrorism against synagogues and Jewish communities, sending messages of sympathy for their victims. He also seldom missed a chance to remind Europeans of the Shoah. He frequently cited the statement of the Thirteenth International Catholic-Jewish Liaison Committee meeting held in Prague with its call for Christian teshuvah (repentance) for anti-Semitism over the centuries as well as its statement that anti-Semitism is "a sin against God and humanity" (cited in Pontifical Council on Christian Unity 1990, no. 75, 4:172–178), to place that joint statement firmly within Catholic teaching. On September 26, 1990, in his annual Jasna Góra meditation celebrating the feast of Our Lady of Częstochowa, the pope spoke as a Pole to his fellow Poles, reminding them:

> There is yet another nation, a particular people, the people of the Patriarchs, of Moses and the Prophets, the heirs of the faith of Abraham.... This people lived arm and arm with us for generations on that same land which became a kind of new homeland during the Diaspora. This people was afflicted by the terrible deaths of millions of its sons and daughters. First they were marked with special signs, then they were shoved into ghettos, isolated quarters. Then they were carried off to the gas chambers, put to death simply because they were the sons and daughters of this people. The assassins did all this in our land, perhaps to cloak it in infamy. However, one cannot cloak a land in infamy by the death of innocent victims. By such deaths the land becomes a sacred relic. The people who lived with us for many generations has remained with us after the terrible death of millions of its sons and daughters. Together we await the Day of Judgment and Resurrection. (Pontifical Council on Christian Unity 1990, no. 75, 4:172)

On Friday, October 31, 1997, John Paul II convened in Rome a symposium of theologians and historians to analyze the relationship between Christian anti-Judaism and modern, racial anti-Semitism. He saw the former as a contributing cause leading to the development of the latter, though by no means the only (or even the main) cause. He spoke of how centuries of Christian anti-Judaic teachings based upon serious "misunderstandings" of the New Testament itself, had by the twentieth century so "lulled the consciences" of many Christians in Europe that when the test came with the rise of Hitler and his ideology of anti-Semitic hatred, they "failed to act as the world had a right to expect" (John Paul II, October 31, 1997).

Similarly, the 1998 Vatican document We Remember: A Reflection on the Shoah noted the distinction between Nazism's racist ideology and traditional Christian theological polemics against Judaism and the "blindness" of the Jews themselves and by implication the historic fact that the latter paved the way for the former by its constant, centuries-old attribution of negative stereotypes to Jews and Judaism, lulling the conscience, as it were, of a continent. The document concluded with this call to repentance:

> At the end of this millennium the Catholic Church desires to express her deep sorrow for the failures of her sons and daughters (toward the Jews) in every age. This is an act of repentance (teshuvah), since as members of the Church we are linked to the sins as well as the merits of all her children.... It is not a matter of mere words, but indeed of binding commitment.... We pray that our sorrow for the tragedy which the Jewish people has suffered in our century will lead to a new relationship with the Jewish people. We wish to turn awareness of past sins into a firm resolve to build a new future in which there will be no more anti-Judaism among Christians or anti-Christian sentiment among Jews, but rather a shared mutual respect as befits those who adore the one Creator and Lord and have a common father in faith, Abraham. (National Conference of Catholic Bishops 1998, p. 54)

In the week prior to his Jubilee Year pilgrimage to Israel, on the first SUNDAY of LENT, 2000, during the Mass at St. Peter's, the pope modified the penitential rite into a prayer for forgiveness for the sins of Catholics throughout the past millennium. The prayer is remarkable in many ways. It divides the sinfulness of the repentant Church into seven categories, one of which is the centuries of sins against the Jews. A few days before the pope's liturgical prayer, the INTERNATIONAL THEOLOGICAL COMMISSION, chaired by then Cardinal Joseph RATZINGER (Pope Benedict XVI), issued a lengthy document that defines with greater specificity what the calls for God's forgiveness meant in each case. Section 5.4 of the document, referring to We Remember, quite specifically raises the question of the Church's ancient teaching of anti-Judaism and the Holocaust: "it may be asked whether the Nazi persecution of the Jews was not made easier by the anti-Jewish prejudices imbedded in some Christian minds and hearts."

Finally, during his historic pilgrimage to the Holy Land, John Paul observed a moment of prayerful silence at Yad VaShem, Israel's memorial to the victims of the Holocaust, and then intoned:

> In this place of memories, the mind and heart and soul feel an extreme need for silence. Silence in which to remember. Silence in which to try to make some sense of the memories which come flooding back. Silence because there are no words strong enough to deplore the terrible tragedy of the Shoah. My own personal memories are of all that happened when the Nazis occupied Poland during the war. I remember my Jewish friends and neighbors, some of whom perished while others survived.... We wish to remember. But we wish to remember for a purpose, namely to ensure that never again will evil prevail as it did for millions of innocent victims of Nazism.... As Bishop of Rome and successor of the Apostle Peter, I assure the Jewish people that the Catholic Church, motivated by the gospel law of truth and love and by no other consideration, is deeply saddened by the hatred, acts of persecution and displays of anti-Semitism directed against Jews by Christians at any time and in any place. In this place of solemn remembrance, I fervently pray that our sorrow for the tragedy which the Jewish people suffered in the twentieth century will lead to a new relationship between Jews and Christians. Let us build a new future in which there will be no more anti-Jewish feeling among Christians or anti-Christian feeling among Jews, but rather the mutual respect required of those who adore the one Creator and Lord, and look to Abraham as our common father in faith. (Jerusalem, March 23, 2000)

Many Israelis in attendance—survivors, politicians, religious leaders, and security officers—cried. Prime Minister Ehud Barak (1942–), himself a former general not given to sentimentality, spoke equally from his heart:

> When my grandparents, Elka and Shmuel Godin, mounted the death trains at Umschlagplatz near their home in Warsaw, headed toward their fate in Treblinka—the fate of three million Jews from your homeland—you were there, and you remembered. You have done more than anyone else to bring about the historic change in the attitude of the church toward the Jewish people, initiated by the good Pope John XXIII, and to dress the gaping wounds that festered over many bitter centuries. (Jerusalem, March 23, 2000)

Land and State of Israel. On December 30, 1993, representatives of the Holy See and the State of Israel signed in Jerusalem the Fundamental Agreement that would lead the way to full diplomatic "normalization of relations" between the two. On August 16, 1994, the apostolic pro-nuncio Archbishop Montezemolo (1925–) was accepted as the first ambassador of the Holy See to the Jewish State. As the Fundamental Agreement acknowledged, this was not just a moment of international diplomacy between two tiny Mediterranean states. It was a theologically significant moment in the nearly two-millennia-long history of the relationship between the Jewish people and the Catholic Church.

John Paul II's references to Israel over the years were positive ones, as they were as well toward the Palestinians as a people. This supportive attitude was expressed as early as his apostolic letter Redemptionis anno (1984), and he cited it many times after that. The implications for Catholic religious education preaching this papal affirmation on the right of the Jewish State to existence and security were drawn out in theological terms in the 1985 Notes, which distinguished between land, people, and State of Israel, affirming each appropriately. In the process the Vatican document gave a positive theological interpretation of the Diaspora as Israel's universal and "often heroic" witness to the world. Christians are invited to understand this religious attachment of Jews to the land of their forefathers, which finds its roots in biblical tradition, without, however, making any particular religious interpretation of this relationship. The existence of the State of Israel and its political options should be envisaged not in a religious perspective but in reference to the common principles of international law.

Over the years John Paul II increasingly expressed his deep concerns over and profound hopes for the Holy City:

> Jerusalem, called to be a crossroads of peace, cannot continue to be the cause of discord and dispute. I fervently hope that some day circumstances will allow me to go as a pilgrim to that city which is unique in all the world, in order to issue again from there, together with Jewish, Christian and Muslim believers, [the] message of peace (Rome 1991; Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 144).
>
> What a blessing it would be if this Holy Land, where God spoke and Jesus walked, could become a special place of encounter and prayer for peoples, if the Holy City of Jerusalem could be a sign and instrument of peace and reconciliation. (Rome 1992; Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 162)

This is, again, language redolent with theological nuance in Catholic terms. "A sign and instrument of peace and reconciliation" is specifically sacramental language. To use it of an earthly city, albeit one with a "heavenly" analogue according to both Jewish and Christian traditions, is breathtakingly daring from one point of view. Catholic reverence for the Holy City of Jerusalem is not political but born of the sacredness of the city expressed in the psalms that the Church prays daily.

In March 2000 the Holy Father made a historic and, for him, long-awaited trip to the Holy Land, stopping en route at Mt. SINAI in Egypt (where God revealed the Ten Commandments to the Jewish people). He prayed at the ancient monastery there with the Greek Orthodox monks who keep penitential vigil at the foot of the mountain. The papal pilgrimage took John Paul first to BETHLEHEM and JERICHO in the Palestinian Authority. Then he went as a pilgrim to NAZARETH and Jerusalem, sites pregnant with sacred memories for Jews and Christians alike. As a pilgrim he prayed, not only at Christian sites but at Jewish ones: the Western Wall (the Kotel), the only remnant of the Temple of Jerusalem at which Jesus prayed and which he sought to cleanse, and Yad VaShem, Israel's profoundly moving memorial to the six million lives so brutally ended by Nazism. Despite the distracting extent of the media's coverage of the event and the various ongoing differences in viewpoint between Catholics and Jews, the pope's prayers were healing ones, offering reconciliation to both ancient communities.

Although the visit to Yad VaShem understandably and rightly garnered the central attention during the pope's trip, it may well be that in the long run his simple prayer at the Western Wall will have the longest and most profound impact. For this gesture marked the definitive end of the ancient polemical stance of the Catholic Church toward Judaism: the aptly named "teaching of contempt." According to this teaching, the Jews were not only ignorant of the true fulfillment of their (and also the Christian) Scriptures in the New Testament, they were willfully so.

For nearly two millennia, Jews have prayed at the Western Wall, all that was left of the Jerusalem Temple compound after the Romans destroyed the city following the second Jewish revolt. Now came the bishop of Rome, the successor of St. Peter, to pray at the Kotel as a humble pilgrim who acknowledged the full validity of Jewish prayer on its own terms at the site over the centuries. The Western Wall is for Jews the central physical remnant of Biblical Israel, that is, the central symbolic referent for Jews as a people and for Judaism as a four- to five-thousand-year-old faith tradition. The pope expressed no hesitation in his religious affirmation of Judaism, no political, theological, or social caveat. Once the pope prayed at the Wall, Jewish-Christian relations would never again be the same.

In Jerusalem, as well, the pope met with the two chief rabbis of Israel—a meeting of dialogue not diatribe, a meeting of reconciliation after centuries of alienation. It was a meeting neither the pope's nor the chief rabbis' parents' could have dreamed to be possible in their wildest imaginations. The pope seized the opportunity not just of a lifetime but of the millennium.

Controversies and Dialogue. While the pontificate of John Paul II was marked by the most solid and extensive advances in Catholic-Jewish relations, it also saw some vocal controversies. These revolved, not surprisingly, around the two key events of Jewish history in the twentieth century: the Holocaust and the State of Israel. The substantive position of the pope on both of these issues has been stated already. A series of incidents with regard to the Shoah greatly increased awareness of the fragility of the contemporary dialogue between the two communities.

In 1982 the pope met with Yasir ARAFAT, the leader of the Palestinian Authority who at the time was seen by many—and by all Jews—as nothing more than a terrorist. In 1987 the pope met with Kurt WALDHEIM, the newly elected president of Austria whose hidden Nazi past was then being revealed. The 1987 meeting with Waldheim precipitated a crisis for Catholic-Jewish relations in the United States because it came just weeks before the pope's visit, which was scheduled to open in Miami with a meeting with several hundred Jewish leaders from around the country.

Also controversial was the beatification in 1987 and canonization in 1998 of Edith STEIN, Sr. Benedicta of the Cross, a Jewish convert whose canonization raised questions in Jewish minds about the Church's intentions with regard to proselytism as well as its memory of the Holocaust. Was the Church about to launch a missionary effort targeted at the Jews? Was the Church trying to appropriate the Shoah to its own lexicon of suffering, thus whitewashing Christianity's role in paving the way for the death camps? (Papal statements on Edith Stein, along with Catholic and Jewish commentaries can be found in Sullivan 2000).

Although the Holy Father had nothing to do with the problem but only with its resolution, the Auschwitz convent controversy of the late 1980s absorbed a huge amount of energy and generated painful reflection, especially among the European Catholic hierarchy. In 1984 CARMELITE nuns in Poland established a small, cloistered convent in an abandoned building adjacent to the AUSCHWITZ-BIRKENAU death camp complex. A well-meaning priest in Belgium, without the knowledge of the nuns, decided to raise money for it. The flyer he sent around to do this spoke of the convent as representing "the triumph of the Cross over Auschwitz." Auschwitz is the world's largest Jewish cemetery and, for Jews, symbolic of the Shoah. Again, Jews feared that the Church was trying to take over the Holocaust for its own purposes, blurring the Jewish specificity of the Shoah.

Controversies arose over the causes of canonization of two popes, PIUS IX and PIUS XII. Pius IX may have been put forward by the Congregation for the Causes of Saints of the Holy See to remind Catholics of the importance of continuity in Catholic TRADITION, because he was the pope who called the First Vatican Council. The memory of Pius IX is quite negative in the Italian Jewish community. At the beginning of his pontificate, Pius IX freed Jews from the ghetto of Rome, but later reinstated it. To make matters worse, there was also the case of Edgardo Mortara, a young Jewish boy whose Catholic nanny swore she had secretly baptized him as an infant. Because of this alleged baptism, Pius IX ordered the papal police to take the boy from his parents. Edgardo was raised in the Vatican, despite a worldwide outcry, became a priest, and died in 1942 in Belgium shortly before the Nazi invasion of the Lowland countries. The Mortara family was and is a very prominent one in the Italian Jewish community. The memory of their bitter loss of their child was still very fresh to them. The criticism of Pius XII was that he failed to speak out with sufficient explicitness on the fate of the Jews and that the Holy See did not do enough to prevent or oppose the Holocaust. Father Pierre Blet, one of the editors of Vatican archival material documenting Pius's policies concerning the deportation of Jews strongly repudiates the charge, and some Jewish scholars have been persuaded by the evidence, whereas others are reserving judgment until the full disclosure of the Vatican archives from Pius XII's pontificate.

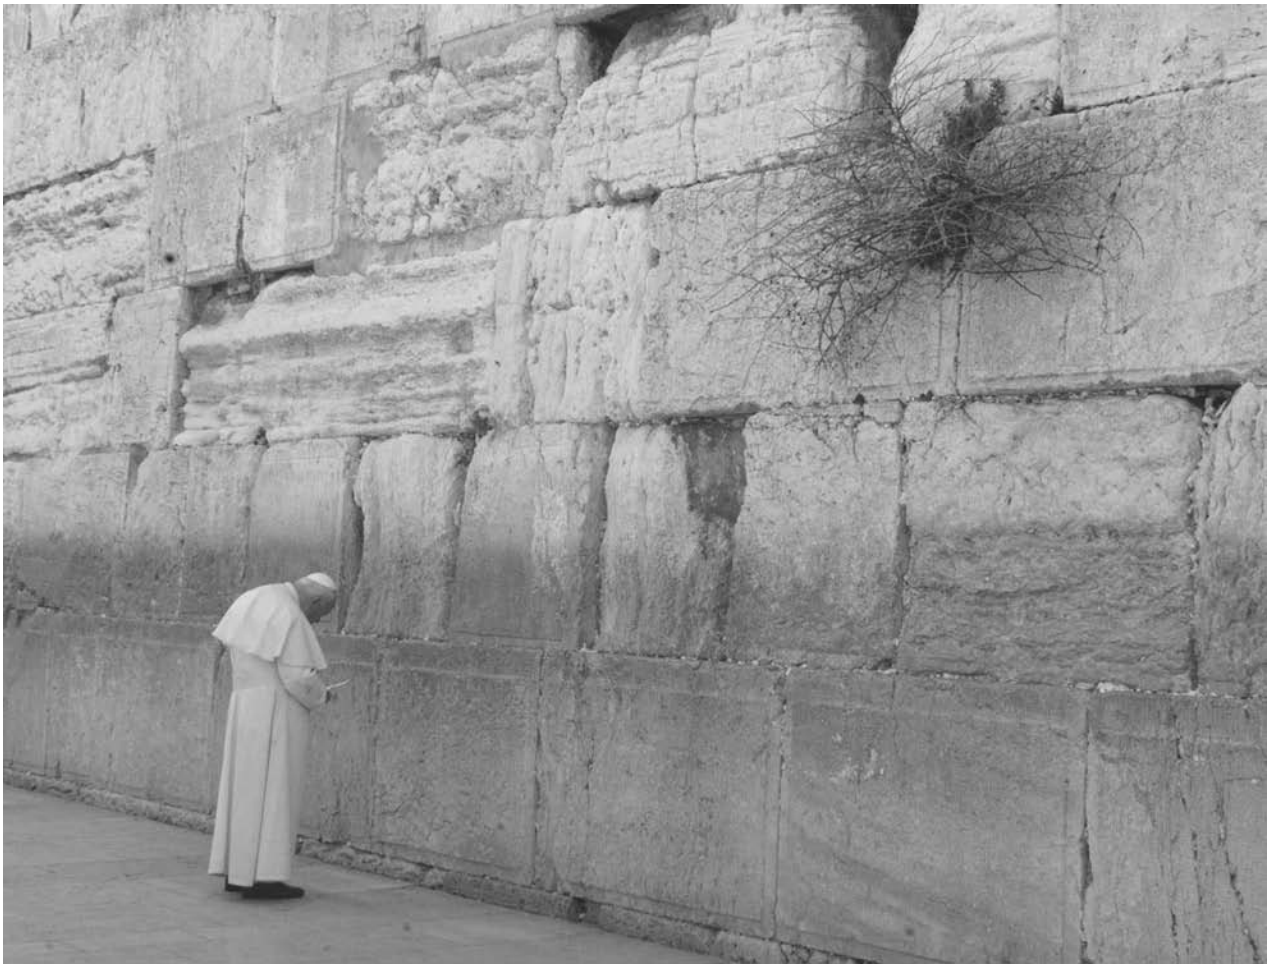
Each of these controversies has its specifics and, especially on the symbolic level from the Jewish perspective, commonalities with the others. Indeed, some Jewish commentators have perceived a rather ominous pattern in these incidents: an attempt not so much to deny as to appropriate the Holocaust for the Church.

It must be said, first, that in each of these events there has been, if one takes the time to look, a papal response. The Holy See's responses tend to address the substance of Jewish concerns and do not always have an eye to media relations. In the meeting with Arafat, for example, the Vatican secretariat of state on the day of the meeting issued a tersely worded statement defining the meeting as not intending to give any credence whatsoever to Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) claims and explaining that the pope was meeting with Arafat to express humanitarian concerns for the Palestinian people and to exhort him to eschew violence against Jews. The Catholic press picked this up, but neither the Jewish nor the secular media did much with it. The result was that many Jews still speak of the pope embracing Arafat. He did not; the photo shows only a rather distant handshake, nothing resembling an embrace at all. Catholics, on the other hand, were rather satisfied that the pope, while meeting with Arafat, took the occasion to lambast him about PLO terrorism.

Likewise, a careful reading of the text of the pope's homily in beatifying Edith Stein reveals that, far from seeking to foster conversionism, as some have charged, the pope took the occasion to acknowledge the uniqueness of the Shoah for the Jews and to urge Catholics to greater sensitivity to the trauma suffered by the Jewish people. Again, the Catholic press tended to emphasize these healing elements of the pope's talks whereas the Jewish press expressed concern over what they saw as the possibility of a new wave of proselytism.

So, too, with John Paul II's visit to Austria in 1988. What the pope actually did and said during his meeting with the Jewish representatives in Vienna and later that same day in Mauthausen was reported very differently by and for the two communities. Understood on their own—which is to say, Catholic—terms, the pope's actions in these very authentically sensitive areas for Jews do not carry the symbolic weight or intent that the Jewish community appears to derive from them. For Catholics the pope's meetings with Arafat and Waldheim did not in any way give credence to either figure as such; in the course of his pastoral work, the pope, like any priest, meets many different individuals, and, like any head of state, meets with numerous people of whom he may or may not personally approve.

But it must also be said that this is exactly the problem. Catholics do not understand sufficiently the suffering and trauma that lie behind these largely symbolic (for Jews more so than for Catholics) actions on the part of the pope. The symbolism is very different on both sides. And while John Paul II, perhaps more than any other pope, was sensitive and open to Jews and Judaism, he acted, as in a very real sense he needed to act, as a Catholic. Both sides need, then, an understanding of each other's symbolic referents and a very real measure of mercy toward each other's words and gestures.



A Vision for the Future: The Call to Joint Witness and Action in History. Central to Pope John Paul's vision of the Christian-Jewish relationship is the hope that it offers an opportunity for joint social action and a witness to the One God and the reality of the KINGDOM OF GOD as the defining point of human history. In his address in Mainz, the pope called this "third dimension" of the dialogue a "sacred duty": "Jews and Christians, as children of Abraham, are called to be a blessing for the world [d. Gen. 12:2ff] by committing themselves to work together for peace and justice among all peoples" (Mainz 1980; Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 16).

Such joint action, for John Paul, is far more than simple good neighborliness. It is a fulfillment of the essential mission of both Judaism and Christianity, for, "certainly, the great task of promoting justice and peace [cf. Ps. 85:4], the sign of the messianic age in both the Jewish and Christian tradition, is grounded in its turn in the great prophetic heritage" (Rome 1984; Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 32). The possibility of a joint proclamation by word and deed in the world, which yet avoids "any syncretism and any ambiguous appropriation" (Rome 1986; Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 64), is seen by the pope as no less than a divine call:

> The existence and providence of the Lord, our Creator and Saviour, are thus made present in the witness of our daily conduct and belief. This is one of the responses that those who believe in God and are prepared to "sanctify his name" [Kiddush ha-Shem] [cf. Matt 6:91] can and should give to the secularistic climate of the present day. (Rome 1985; Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 54)

This way of collaboration "in service of humanity" as a means of preparing for God's Kingdom unites Jews and Christians on a level that, in a sense, can be said to be deeper than the doctrinal distinctions that divide them historically. "Through different but finally convergent ways we will be able to reach, with the help of the Lord, who has never ceased to love his people (Rom 11:1), true brotherhood in reconciliation and respect and to contribute to a full implementation of God's plan in history" (Rome 1982; Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 20). That "full implementation" the pope defines in religious terms. It is a "society ... where justice reigns and where ... throughout the world it is peace that rules, the shalom hoped for by the lawmakers, Prophets, and wise men of Israel" (Rome 1986; Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 65). To use the words of the 1985 Notes to summarize Pope John Paul II's thoughts on Christian-Jewish relations, one can say that it is his vision that through dialogue:

> We shall reach a greater awareness that the people of God of the Ancient [Hebrew] Scriptures and the New Testament are tending toward a like end in the future: the coming or return of the Messiah—even if they start from two different points of view. Attentive to the same God who has spoken, hanging on the same word, we have to witness to one same memory and one common hope in Him who is the master of history. We must also accept our responsibility to prepare the world for the coming of the Messiah by working together for social justice, respect for the rights of persons and nations, and for social and international reconciliation. To this we are driven, Jews and Christians, by the command to love our neighbor, by a common hope for the Kingdom of God, and by the great heritage of the Prophets. (CRRJ 1985, II:10–11)

The note that Pope John Paul placed in the Temple Wall in Jerusalem in 2000 was, by prior arrangement, immediately taken to Yad VaShem to be preserved and displayed there for future generations of Jews and Christians: "God of our fathers, you chose Abraham and his descendants to bring your Name to the Nations. We are deeply saddened by the behavior of those who in the course of history have caused these children of yours to suffer, and asking your forgiveness, we wish to commit ourselves to genuine brotherhood with the people of the Covenant" (March 26, 2000). The note distills in simple language much of what the pope had come to Israel to say to the Jewish people as the head of the Catholic Church and, in this instance, undoubtedly for all of Christianity. Jewish-Christian relations would never be the same. In a letter to the chief rabbi of the Rome synagogue on its 100th anniversary (May 22, 2004), John Paul II brought together several key themes:

> Not only the Sacred Scriptures, which to a large extent we share, not only the liturgy but also very ancient art forms witness to the Church's deep bond with the Synagogue; this is because of that spiritual heritage which without being divided or rejected has been made known to believers in Christ and constitutes an inseparable bond between us and you, the people of the Torah of Moses, the good olive tree unto which a new branch was grafted (cf. Rom 11:17). (John Paul II, May 22, 2004)

When John Paul II died, the Jewish world mourned his passing alongside Catholics. Many wondered if the great progress in relations John Paul II had made would continue or be slowed by his successor.

Pope Benedict XVI: The Pilgrimage Continues. At the beginning of his pontificate, Pope BENEDICT XVI stated clearly that with regard to Jews and Judaism, he would follow in the footsteps of his predecessor. In many ways he has. He visited a synagogue in Cologne, Germany, as John Paul II went to the Great Synagogue in Rome. He went to and prayed at Auschwitz, the infamous Nazi death camp, condemning anti-Semitism and holocaust denial.

In April of 2008, he met with the leaders of the world's largest Jewish community at the POPE JOHN PAUL II CULTURAL CENTER in Washington, D.C., as his predecessor had met with the American Jewish leadership in Miami in 1987, and also made a last-minute addition to his schedule to visit a synagogue, becoming the first pope to visit an American synagogue. And in May of 2009 he visited Israel, repeating there his predecessor's prayerful visits to Yad Vashem, Israel's memorial to the victims of the Shoah, and to the Western Wall (Kotel), placing there a prayer for peace between Israel and the Palestinians.

A few examples of what he said on these occasions will illustrate the depths of Benedict's dedication to fostering lasting relations with the Jewish people. At the John Paul II Center, Pope Benedict noted that Passover (Pesah) was approaching, so gave a special greeting:

> While the Christian celebration of Easter differs in many ways from your celebration of Pesah, we understand and experience it in continuation with the biblical narrative of the mighty works which the Lord accomplished for his people. At this time of your most solemn celebration, I feel particularly close, precisely because of what Nostra aetate calls Christians to remember always: that the Church received the revelation of the Old Testament through the people with whom God in His inexpressible mercy concluded the Ancient Covenant. Nor can she forget that she draws sustenance from the root of that well-cultivated olive tree onto which have been grafted the wild shoots, the Gentiles (Nostra aetate, 4). In addressing myself to you I wish to re-affirm the Second Vatican Council's teaching on Catholic-Jewish relations and reiterate the Church's commitment to the dialogue that in the past forty years has fundamentally changed our relationship for

Pope Benedict XVI and Jewish-Catholic Relations. *Pope Benedict XVI is presented with a gift by Sephardic chief rabbi Shlomo Amar, second from left; Israel's Ashkenazi chief rabbi Yona Metzger, second from right; and Israel's Chief Rabbinate director-general Oded Wiener, left, as President of the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity Cardinal Walter Kasper looks on during their meeting in the pontiff's summer residence of Castel Gandolfo, Italy, Thursday, September 15, 2005. > the better. Because of that growth in trust and friendship, Christians and Jews can rejoice together in the deep spiritual ethos of the Passover, a memorial (zikkaron) of freedom and redemption. (April 18, 2008)

Arriving at Ben Gurion airport in Israel on May 11, 2009, the pope immediately addressed the significance of the Shoah, reaffirming the Church's commitment to remembering, side by side with the Jewish people, the fighting and victims of all manifestations of anti-Semitism, and announcing his intention > to honor the memory of the six million Jewish victims of the Shoah, and to pray that humanity will never again witness a crime of such magnitude. Sadly, anti-Semitism continues to rear its ugly head in many parts of the world. This is totally unacceptable. Every effort must be made to combat anti-Semitism wherever it is found, and to promote respect and esteem for the members of every people, tribe, language and nation across the globe.

Finally, on August 9, 2009, in Rome, the pope noted the feast days of two saints, Edith Stein and Maximilian KOLBE, both of whom died in Auschwitz, Stein as but one of the six million Jews murdered by the Nazis in the Shoah. He said:

> The Nazi concentration camp as every death camp, can be considered an extreme symbol of evil, of the hell that comes to earth when man forgets God, and when he is replaced, usurping from him the right to decide what is good and what is evil, to give life and or to take life. (Catholic News Agency 2009)

Such activities and strong affirmations have helped to move forward the Catholic-Jewish relationship. Benedict's tenure, however, has not been without controversy, any more than was that of his predecessor. The first controversy arose when the pope allowed widespread usage of the Tridentine, or pre-Vatican II, liturgy, for in that liturgy there was the rather infamous prayer for the conversion of Jews, with its references to the "blindness of the Jews," to the "lifting of a veil from their heart," and to their "being pulled from darkness."

Benedict, however, rewrote the GOOD FRIDAY prayer, the only revision in the old liturgy that he made. He eliminated the blatant negatives. The prayer as it now reads has two sentences. The first prays that the Jews will come to Christ, but does not say when. The second paraphrases the ending of Romans 9–11, a passage relied on by the Second Vatican Council, in which St. Paul states that "all Israel will be saved" when the "fullness" or "abundance" of the GENTILES comes to Christ, which is eschatological. Read this way, as both Cardinal Walter Kasper of the Holy See's Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews and the Vatican secretary of state have said it should be read, the prayer is eschatological, in no way a call for efforts to convert the Jews in the present time.

The second controversy stung the German pope in a more personal way. Hoping to heal a schism that had its origins in dissatisfactions with the Second Vatican Council, the pope remitted the excommunications of four bishops of the Society of St. Pius X (SSPX), who had been ordained by Archbishop Marcel Lefevre (1905–1991) in defiance of the orders of the pope. It turned out that one of the four was not merely conservative theologically but a rabid anti-Semite and Holocaust-denier. Did the pope mean to sanction such views? He did not, but the resulting turmoil was, to put it mildly, explosive. The pope once again condemned anti-Semitism and Holocaust denial and took the unusual step of writing an explanatory letter to the world's bishops. In it, the pope admitted that he had not known the full record of the bishop in question and that the Holy See should have investigated more closely, using the Internet, and deplored the setback in relations between Catholics and Jews. He stated that for the full reconciliation of the SSPX with the Church, the former would have to acknowledge to the Congregation for the DOCTRINE OF THE FAITH that such teachings as those of the renegade bishop were false, and that the teachings of the Second Vatican Council on this and other matters of contention were valid. As of 2009, the SSPX had not done so.

In the United States, efforts for deeper dialogue between Catholics and Jews led to a document issued on August 12, 2002, by Catholic and Jewish scholars titled "Reflections on Covenant and Mission." Because of some questions raised about this document, the Committee on Doctrine and the Committee on Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs of the USCCB released "A Note on Ambiguities Contained in Reflections on Covenant and Mission," dated June 18, 2009. This note explained that the 2002 document was not an official statement of the USCCB, and it likewise tried to clarify some perceived ambiguities in the original 2002 "Reflections." On August 18, 2009, leaders of the American Jewish Committee, the Anti-Defamation League, and Conservative, Reform and Orthodox Judaism expressed their joint concern that paragraph seven of the USCCB's Note (of June 18, 2009) appeared to state that, for Catholics, dialogue with Jews is a means of proselytism or a disguised invitation to baptism and that God's covenant with the Jews had been abrogated at the time of Christ. By way of response, on October 2, 2009, Cardinals Francis E. GEORGE and William Henry KEELER, along with Archbishop Wilton Gregory (1947–) of Atlanta, Georgia; Bishop William Lori (1951–) of Bridgeport, Connecticut; and Bishop William Murphy (1940–) of Rockville Centre, New York, issued a joint response announcing that two final sentences of paragraph seven of the June 2009 Note would be excised and affirming the ongoing validity of God's covenant with the Jewish People. At the same time, they also released a statement of "Six Principles for Catholic-Jewish Dialogue" in order "to promote deeper bonds of friendship and mutual understanding between the members of our two communities."

In conclusion, it can be said that relations between Jews and Christians, over the centuries, have had their ups and downs, with the nadir reached during the period of the Shoah, but a new beginning with fresh hope was made by the Second Vatican Council and the efforts of many Catholics, with the leadership of the popes, showed fruitful results, but much is yet to be done.

JEWISH-CATHOLIC RELATIONS (THEOLOGICAL DIMENSIONS OF)

The major disagreements between Jews and traditional Christians (i.e., those who accept the canon of the New Testament and the theological decisions of the first seven ecumenical councils) focus on the mystery of GOD and the person of the MESSIAH. The antithetical approaches to the questions of three persons in one God and the person of the Messiah, believed by Christians to be JESUS of NAZARETH, true God and true man, will not be set aside; however, clarification of the Catholic understanding regarding the Jewish stance can remove generalized accusations of blindness and/or malice. A review of key passages of the New Testament will set the stage for presentation of theological issues.

The Gospel on Jewish Leaders. The New Testament texts present the public ministry of Jesus as a progressive revealing of his personhood and mission in the context of growing opposition from Jewish leaders and teachers. The religious authorities in the Temple of JERUSALEM claimed to be the guardians of proper interpretation of the Sacred Scriptures (TORAH of MOSES, Prophets and Writings, the latter not yet a "closed canon") as well as mediators of sacrificial worship. They were supported by the SADDUCEES, nobles, and others who benefited from a stable relationship with the Roman military presence. During and after the time of Jesus, some of those who became high priests were accused by their contemporaries of compromise with the Romans (Brown 1994, pp. 315–660). This involved decisions that emphasized expediency rather than the pursuit of justice (see John 11:45–53).

The PHARISEES respected the role of the priests in worship, but they insisted that Moses had received an oral Torah along with the written Word, which was handed on to JOSHUA and to succeeding generations of prophets and teachers down to their own time (see Mishnah Abhot 1:1). Through prayerful study these Pharisees learned to interpret the commandments and apply them to their own time. Jewish life was centered on the Temple, where the divine Presence was experienced, and they brought this into their daily lives by imitating priestly practices of prayer. Thus, people were encouraged to find meals and the marital relationship as contexts for recognizing that God's presence imbues all facets of life. People are called to purify themselves to be prepared for holiness, that is, a life separated from sin and oriented forward to the coming of the KINGDOM OF GOD. These principles, linked to observance of the Decalogue and other commandments governing one's relationship with God, neighbor and nature, provided a deep spiritual understanding of life (Frizzell 1994, pp. 53–55).

The presentation of ideals may lead to fanatical extremes, breeding intolerance of the seeming flawed existence of the uneducated. Jesus defended his disciples when they were accused of laxity and pointed to inconsistency and hypocrisy on the part of some Pharisees (Mt 15:1–20; Mk 7:1–23) (Frizzell 1980, pp. 87–91). Unfortunately the evangelists did not distinguish between groups within the Pharisaic movement. The seven woes against the Pharisees (Matt 23:1–39) were directed against the strict House of Shammai, which at that time was more influential than the more tolerant House of Hillel (Finkel 1974, pp. 134–143). Jesus was patient with the limitations of the general populace but criticized his peers, those who claimed to be teachers and protectors of the correct way to keep the commandments (see Mt 22:15–45 par.).

The GOSPEL in its fourfold presentation became the texts which, for Christians, corresponded to the Torah of Moses as the high point of the early Christian liturgy of the WORD; the Gospel was the prime focus for the homily. By the early second century, the majority of Christians were of Gentile origin. They failed to see the debates and accusations in the Gospels as evidence of inner-family quarrels, with the Jewish use of sharp critique and name-calling as a challenge for listeners to examine their consciences. Rather than noting the continuity of the Israelite prophet's role as an admonisher of leaders, these preachers declared that Jesus was expressing alienation from his Jewish roots. The general tendency of a younger group to protest against the perceived inadequacies (legalism, ritualism, hypocrisy) of the older community is evident in much early Christian preaching and apologetics. Some preachers created volatile situations in Christian-Jewish relations in various parts of Europe and the Middle East by using negative generalizations and accusing all Jews, even those of subsequent generations, of malice toward Jesus in his PASSION (e.g., Mt 27:25).

The issue of responsibility for Jesus' condemnation cannot be ignored. The Passion narratives describe the involvement of the Temple priests and their collaborators; the final judgment was in the hands of Pontius PILATE. "True, the Jewish authorities and those who followed their lead pressed for the death of Christ; still, what happened in his passion cannot be charged against all the Jews, without distinction, then alive, nor against the Jews of today" (Vatican II Nostra aetate, 4).

New Testament Sources. The documents of the New Testament span a long period, from Paul's letters to the Gospels and Acts two or more decades later. However, these theological presentations of the work of Jesus and the apostles are grounded in oral traditions that can be traced back to the infant church and/or to the public ministry of Jesus.

Paul of Tarsus. The Pharisee who received the name Saul at circumcision (Phil 3:4–6) expressed his commitment to God by persecuting the early Jewish Christians (Gal 1:13; 1 Tim 1:12–15). After Jesus was revealed to him (Gal 1:15–16, Acts 9 par), he channeled his zeal in nonviolent service of the Gospel. At times, he expressed his defense of the Christian minorities in terms that echoed pagan bigotry: Jews "displease God and oppose all men" (1 Th 2:14–16). The generalized accusation that they "killed both the Lord Jesus and the prophets" should be read in the light of his statement that God's hidden wisdom was not known to "the rulers of this age, for if they had known, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory" (1 Cor 2:6–8).

Later, Paul's Letter to the Romans discussed Christian-Jewish relations in a more extended and calm reflection. Using techniques from Jewish interpretation of the Scriptures and preaching, he analyzed the rejection of the Gospel by many Jews of his time. First, he listed seven gifts of God to the Jewish people (Rom 9:4–5), gifts that perdure after the time of Jesus. The mystery of election, typified in the choice of the younger sons, ISAAC and JACOB, is derived from divine mercy (9:6–29, 11:30–32) and is linked to righteousness, a divine gift to which the initial human response is faith (3:21–4:25; 9:30–33). The Messiah is the goal of the Torah (10:4), for which Moses ascended and Jonah descended (10:6–8 in light of ancient Jewish tradition interpreting Deut 30:12–13). Paul interpreted Isaiah 65:1–2 as a contrast between the favorable lot of Gentile converts and "a disobedient and contentious people" (Septuagint) in Romans 10:19–21. However, God has not rejected His people (11:1), and a remnant has always remained faithful (11:2–10). The GENTILES' acceptance of the Gospel should stimulate a holy jealousy among Jews (11:11, 14), for all are consecrated and sanctified by the first fruits of dedication to God and endowed with strength from the root of the cultivated olive tree onto which the Gentiles have been grafted (11:16–24). "A hardening has come upon part of Israel, until the full number of the Gentiles comes in, and so all Israel will be saved" (11:25–26). The Jews are beloved because of the patriarchs, "for the gifts and calling of God are irrevocable" (11:25–29). In regard to such a mystery, Paul's theological reflection rooted in prayer becomes a doxology (11:33–36). (See Frizzell in Kessler 2005, pp. 383–385; Romans 9–11.)

In the "Declaration of the Church's Bond with the Jewish People" (Nostra aetate), the Fathers of the Second Vatican Council drew heavily on Paul's Letter to the Romans, quoting 9:4–5. Theologians must continue to draw upon the insights of Paul's Letters, taking into account the vicissitudes of history and the misuses of the Sacred Scriptures in polemics over the centuries.

Matthew, Mark and Luke. The SYNOPTIC GOSPELS have been the subject of intense study over many centuries. During the difficult decades from 1920 to 1950, German scholars dominated the scholarly scene. Their methods were often compromised by their presuppositions, denying miracles and doubting the reliability of oral traditions. In recent decades the contributions of Jewish scholars in ISRAEL and in English-speaking areas, along with the discovery of the Qumran (Dead Sea) Scrolls, have brought new respect for the historical value of the Gospels. The comparative study of sources and the appreciation that each evangelist was a theologian serving the needs of a local church have enabled scholars to explain differences in the records, noting ways in which the narratives allow ecclesial communities to answer urgent questions and solve disputes. In this way a deeper understanding of Jesus' teachings and their application to the Christian life contribute to an appreciation of both continuity and new insights in the Gospel.

The Fourth Gospel. The Gospel according to JOHN is rich in Jewish sources, especially regarding the Temple liturgy. However, the frequent use of the term the Jews to designate the opponents of Jesus has led to generalizations that preachers and teachers have applied to all Jews. Careful study has shown that the Jews are implicated in all threats against the life of Jesus except in John 11:45–54, where chief priests and Pharisees consult and the reason is political. Elsewhere the motivation is religious (5:18; 8:59; 10:31–33; 19:7), so the phrase the Jews designates the Temple leaders and those following them (Frizzell in Radici 2000, pp. 127–146).

Off-quoted words of Jesus to the Samaritan woman, "salvation is from the Jews" (John 4:22) should be understood in relation to the work of the Messiah, whose "hour" will bring people to worship the Father in spirit and truth (4:23–24). Tension between Jews and Christians is described in 9:22 and 16:2–3, the only texts that speak of Christians being put out of the synagogue. "Indeed the hour is coming when whoever kills you will think that he is offering service to God" (16:2). From the Christian perspective this involved an erroneous conscience (see Phil 3:6). Was this text used to offset the charge of deicide? Rather, the pattern of popular teaching was often to accuse the Jews of killing Jesus, knowing that He was the SON OF GOD. The ancient concept of solidarity between leaders and the entire community was applied (perhaps unwittingly) to indict all Jews of the time and even those of later generations. However, at the time of Jesus, Jews were scattered widely throughout the ROMAN EMPIRE and beyond; many did not follow the Sadducean model of adherence to the priests as teachers, so the image of a monolithic expression of Jewish practices is erroneous.

Another stereotype developed from the application of John 8:44 and Apocalypse 2:9 and 3:9 (synagogue, i.e., assembly, of Satan). This originally referred to specific groups, not to all Jews and synagogues. Thus, in Epistles 40–41 of St. AMBROSE and eight sermons of St. John Chrysostom, all Jews were depicted in the service of the devil. This judgment, attributing malice and evil to the essence of Jewish prayer, has caused grave harm to Jews over the centuries.

The Second Vatican Council. Pope JOHN PAUL II repudiated the accusation of diabolical servitude by visiting the main synagogue of Rome on April 13, 1986. In preparation for the JUBILEE YEAR, he led a penitential service on March 12, 2000, in which he asked God to forgive the sins of Christians against seven groups, including the Jews. Later that month, his pilgrimage to Jerusalem included a visit to the Western Wall, where he inserted the same prayer into a crevice between the stones. In this and many contexts, the Polish pope set the tone for the Church to develop in the new millennium.

In discussing this history, one should distinguish between ANTI-SEMITISM and ANTI-JUDAISM. The former term describes anti-Jewish prejudice, discrimination, and bigotry in all its forms. The rather common tendency to ascribe negative characteristics to an entire group in a society can lead easily to generalizations and stereotypes that affect individuals and their group adversely. This has been devastating for the Jewish people, a minority in so many societies. The term anti-Judaism is used increasingly to describe Christian bigotry as a result of "long standing sentiments of mistrust and hostility" (National Conference of Catholic Bishops [NCCB] 1998, p. 51). The effects on Jews may be the same as other forms of anti-Semitism, but the distinction allows Christians to focus on the precise factors that made their prejudice so virulent over so many centuries. Nazi anti-Semitism was "based on theories contrary to the constant teaching of the Church on the unity of the human race and on the equal dignity of all races and peoples" (NCCB 1998, p. 51). Christian leaders combated this ideology, but many ordinary people listened rather to the Nazi propaganda that stressed the continuity of their regime's discriminatory legislation and atrocious attacks on the rights and very persons of Jews with the laws, persecutions, and expulsions of earlier times.

The different forms that anti-Jewish bigotry takes in the present situation should be recognized so that Christians, whose leaders have worked diligently to overcome "the teaching of contempt" for Jews and Judaism, will stand with the Jewish people, both locally and in the national and international arenas, in a concerted effort to unveil and defeat all forms of anti-Semitism. This is a sin against God and humanity and should be recognized by all to be a particularly virulent and long-standing form of intolerance (Pontifical Commission for Justice and Peace 1988).

Theological Issues. by definition theology must be grounded in faith and prayer, so that effort to elucidate aspects of the mysteries of god and creation should be made in this spiritual context. Christian theologians learn from Moses and the other prophets, from psalmists and sages, as from Jesus and the Apostles, to find the principles that have guided the Church's doctrinal and moral message. From these foundations of the Church Magisterium the following reflections develop to face the challenges of the Christian faith in regard to the Jewish people.

Covenant: Old and New. In his address to the Jewish community of Mainz, Germany, on November 17, 1980, Pope John Paul II spoke of "the meeting between the people of God of the Old Covenant, never revoked by God (cf. Rom 11:29), and that of the New Covenant, which is at the same time a dialogue within our Church, that is to say, between the first and second part of her Bible" (Fisher 1995, p. 15). The reference to "the Old Covenant never revoked by God" has led some scholars to include the Sinai Covenant, but others to restrict it to the covenant with ABRAHAM (Gen 15) (Lohfink 1991).

Since the Greek term diatheke may be rendered as covenant or testament, this term for Christians designates the Sacred Scriptures (2 Cor 3:14) as well as the solemn agreement God initiated in favoring Abraham's descendants. God's gift may be unilateral or bilateral. First, God called Abram to respond in faith to the promissory pact wherein God gave the Land to his descendants. Abram's only response was the act of faith, accepting the gift (Gen 15:1–21). The covenant of circumcision was bilateral, with God's promise that the patriarch would be the father of many nations, signified by changing his name to Abraham. This would be an everlasting covenant for him and his descendants, with the land of Canaan as an everlasting possession (Gen 17:1–21). The command to walk before God and be blameless (17:2) was completed by the covenantal sign of male circumcision.

The Sinai Covenant, celebrated fifty days after the Exodus from EGYPT, was a bilateral agreement whereby the Israelites became a "kingdom of priests and a holy nation" (Ex 19:6), oriented to the service of God in the Land, guided by the commandments (Ex 20–23). The commandments govern the human relationships with God, neighbor, self, and nature. Sins of idolatry and injustice were at the forefront of prophetic indictments of the leaders and ordinary people over the generations. The favorite model for these teachers to present the covenant and its demands was marriage (Hos 3:1; Ez 16:15–52). As bride and spouse, Israel is expected to be faithful to her one Lord. Idolatry is called adultery, yet God will forgive and restore her (Jer 3:1–13).

The new covenant promised by JEREMIAH (31:31–34) and its analogues in EZEKIEL (11:19; 16:59–63; 18:31; 34:25–31; 36:22–28) were realized when the people returned from the Babylonian exile and rebuilt the Temple. However, the hope for restoration of all twelve tribes was not achieved. Instead, prophet and psalmist pointed to the goodwill of people from the nations and the desire of some to unite with the Jews (Zech 2:10–12; 8:20–23; Is 56:3; Ps 87). Both the Qumran texts and the New Testament refer to the "new Covenant" (CD 6:19; 8:21; 20:12; 1 Cor 11:24–25). The renewal of Temple worship under a revitalized priesthood (Zech 3:1–10) gave evidence that God had restored the COVENANT bond with his people. Although the Qumran leaders rejected the Hasmonean line of high priests, Jesus and the first generation of his followers frequented the Temple. At the Last Supper Jesus opened the new covenant to believers from among the nations, who were also beneficiaries of divine forgiveness (Mt 26:27–28 and Jer 31:34). The mission to "the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Mt 10:6, 23; 15:24) points to Jesus' expectation for the restoration of the twelve tribes (Jer 31:31; Ez 37:15–28), after the Church's mission to make disciples of all nations (Mt 28:19–20; see 10:23, 19:28). The Great Commission should be seen in the light of Jesus' demand that all Christians be one in service of the Father so that the world will know Jesus' mission (Jn 17:21–23). Worldwide missionary efforts have been less fruitful because Christians have neglected to become one fold under one shepherd (Jn 10:16–17) (Frizzell 1981, pp. 141–150). Rather than aggressive proselytizing, only the witness of a Christian response to the Gospel call to imitate God (Mt 5:48; Lk 6:36; Jn 17:21–23) will stimulate a holy jealousy on the part of Jews (Rom 11:11).

The renewal of the bilateral covenant with the reciprocal bond between God and his people (Lev 26:12; taken up in Jer 31:33; 32:38–40; Ez 36:28) is implied by Paul in his list of seven privileges of Israel, especially the covenants (plural in most manuscripts) and worship (Rom 9:4–5). Although the promises to Abraham regarding the nations (Gen 12:3; 17:4) are seldom mentioned by the prophets (see Is 51:1–2), Israel's mission to the nations is an integral part of Temple worship. The role of the Servant to bring justice to the nations will be the result of the divine mission to be "a covenant of the people, a light for the nations" (Isa 42:1, 6; see 49:6). This is a task for the PEOPLE OF GOD in the context of hope for the Messiah.

The Gospel tradition contains a comparison between old and new with images of garments and wineskins (Mt 9:14–17; Mk 2:18–22; Lk 5:33–39). Luke alone includes a comment about old and new wine: "The old is good" (5:39). "This verse is merely another way of commenting on the incompatibility of the 'old' and the 'new'; it expresses the negative attitude of Jesus' opponents" (Fitzmyer 1981, p. 597). Rather, this may acknowledge that those who were imbued with the Pharisees' spirituality and had learned only superficially Jesus' teaching would prefer to retain their tradition. Their attitude need not be merely negative; they may have been testing and holding fast to what they found to be good (1 Thess 5:19–21). The interpretation that their minds were hardened and that a veil remains when they read the Old Testament (2 Cor 3:12–18) is linked to faith in the person of Jesus as the Christ. However, as Paul wrote to the Christians of Rome: these Jews are elect, "beloved for the sake of their forefathers" (Rom 11:28). Their continuing role in the divine plan is to be evaluated in a benign, rather than judgmental, manner. So that Christians can learn the depths of Jewish insights into their Sacred Scriptures, the Christian scribe and teacher should be "like a householder who brings out of his treasure what is new and what is old" (Mt 13:52).

The learned treatise known as "The Letter to the Hebrews" contains a lengthy discussion of themes of CHRISTOLOGY and ECCLESIOLOGY related to covenant and tabernacle. As SON OF DAVID, Jesus is high priest after the model of MELCHIZEDEK, who has entered the heavenly sanctuary after his unique self-offering on the cross. In quoting Psalm 95 in Hebrews 4:1–11 and in using the SEPTUAGINT of Jeremiah 31:31–34 (in chapter 38:31–34) in Hebrews 8:7–13, the author refers to the inadequacy of the tabernacle in the wilderness. This reminds the reader of the Damascus Document in the Qumran texts that discuss this community's dispute with the Hasmonean priests and their claim to be "the people of the new covenant in the land of Damascus" (CD 6:19; 8:21; 20:12).

Drawing on Exodus 25:40 and 26:30, Hebrews rightly notes that the earthly tabernacle is but a copy of the heavenly reality. Just as the mysterious Melchisedek represented the priesthood exemplified uniquely by Jesus (Heb 5:1–10), so is Jesus "the mediator of a better covenant, founded on better promises" (8:6). The summary review of the PONTIFICAL BIBLICAL COMMISSION document of 2002 said Hebrews meant that "the covenant announced and prefigured in the Old Testament is fulfilled. It is not simply a renewal of the Sinai covenant, but the establishment of a covenant that is truly new, founded on a new base, Christ's personal sacrificial offering" (cf. 9:14–15) (Pontifical Biblical Commission 2002, p. 108). This section concludes with the assessment that "Israel continues to be in a covenant relationship with God, because the covenant-promise is definitive and cannot be abolished. But the early Christians were also conscious of living in a new phase of that plan, announced by the prophets and inaugurated by the blood of Jesus, 'blood of the covenant,' because it was shed out of love (cf. Rv 1:5[b]–6)" (Pontifical Biblical Commission 2002, p. 109).

In recent decades a number of Jewish scholars have emphasized the Covenant of God with NOAH on behalf of all creation (Gen 9:8–17) and the rabbinical teaching that the nations must observe only the seven Noahide laws to achieve salvation. Thus those among the nations who reject idolatry, murder, adultery, theft, false witness, and cruelty to animals, and establish courts to achieve justice will be pleasing to God. This approach implicitly dismisses the Christian claim to relate to God through messianic hope rooted in the call of Abraham and the teachings of the prophets. Is the title "righteous of the nations" sufficient from the perspective of Christian self-definition? The Pauline description of Gentile Christians becoming adopted children of Abraham through faith and Baptism (Gal 3:26–29) implies a closer relationship than the common human descent from our protoparents. This should not be interpreted as replacing the Jews but of a collaborative bond that invites Christians to a humble union with God's people.

The Jewish theologian Franz Rosenzweig (1886–1929) used the image of the Star of David to depict a two-fold covenant experience. Israel as "eternal people" is already with God the Father at the center of the star. Christianity and ISLAM carry its rays of light to the world at large, presenting a witness to the one God, so that the nations can overcome idolatry. However, such a dual covenant theory places the Jewish people beyond history and does not take into account the space dimensions of the human situation added to the scenario through the dramatic creation of the State of ISRAEL. Like other nations, the Jewish state faces the challenge "to uphold and observe the human right to freedom of religion and conscience..." (Fundamental Agreement 1993, p. 1).

Salvation of Jews. During the Nazi period Irene Harand (1900–1975), an Austrian Catholic laywoman, challenged her fellow believers to recognize that the command to "love your neighbor as yourself" (Lev. 19:18; Rom 13:8–10, etc.) cannot exclude the Jews. The fact that this was not obvious to all constitutes an indictment of preachers and teachers in the Church. Even those Jews who were opponents of the Church and the Christian political parties in European countries should have been viewed from the Gospel perspective (Mt 5:43–48). Unfortunately, the fact that some Jews were linked with anti-Christian political groups led many to consider all Jews to be dangerous opponents of the FAITH. Even in times less politically charged than those in Europe of the 1930s, antipathy and animosity experienced in the home and on the street are difficult to overcome but must be countered by balanced teaching. This means that adult education is of great importance; it must be founded in the New Testament, "conformed to the truth of the Gospel and the Spirit of Christ" (Nostra aetate 4), interpreted in the light of guidelines offered by the HOLY SEE (Fisher and Kelenicki 1990, pp. 29–50).

Matthew recorded the Gospel challenge to Christians: "Unless your righteousness exceeds that of the scribes and Pharisees, you will never enter the Kingdom of Heaven" (5:20). Examples follow that give Jesus' insights into the commandments and their observance (5:21–48). Jesus criticized some teachers for laxity (5:19) or hypocrisy (15:3–9), yet commended others. Thus a rich young man was told to keep the commandments to gain eternal life (19:16–22). The parable of the sheep and goats introduces corporal acts of mercy as the basis for gaining entrance into the kingdom (25:31–46). The commandments must be observed; this obedience and the service of others in need will be the basis for hearing the LORD's welcome into eternal life. Christians might emphasize the importance of faith, but this must lead to deeds that respond to the heavenly Father's will (7:21–23; see James 1:22–25). Surely Judgment Day will bring a surprise to those who deny that observant and charitable Jews will enter the Kingdom.

Just as JOHN THE BAPTIST exhorted Jews who were proud of their Abrahamic pedigree to "bear fruit that befits repentance" (Mt 3:8), so Christians in every age should focus on a life of good deeds, responding to the covenantal gifts that provide the basis for a life of service. The Decalogue and the call to imitate God's holiness by acts of mercy have been presented by prophets and teachers in both traditions.

Those Christians who badger Jews to accept Jesus as their personal SAVIOR fail to grasp the biblical message about judging (Mt 7:1–2; James 4:11–12). The burden of European history weighs far more heavily on Jews than on others. The explicit invitation to become a Christian led Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel (1907–1972), a theologian much appreciated by Pope PAUL VI, to reply: "I would rather go to Auschwitz." Although the pope repudiated forced Baptism during the First Crusade, this memory comes to mind immediately for those who know Jewish history. What Christians see as fulfillment, most Jews call apostasy.

The philosophy of dialogue, developed by Ferdinand Ebner (1882–1931), an Austrian Catholic, and applied by Martin BUBER to Jewish-Christian relations, calls for each partner to respect the personal self-understanding of the other (Stahmer 1968, p. 148). Each should stand open to learning from a person of similar background in the other faith. Any intention to change the other's faith involves a betrayal of trust and becomes an attempt to control or manipulate the other person. Through dialogue both sides may change, but each person usually integrates the insights into the principles and values deriving from his or her own heritage. All partners should witness to their faith and practice in an exemplary fashion, which should stimulate all to excellence.

The situation is different when someone of any, or no, faith background asks for guidance in personal growth that may involve conversion. For decades the Reform and Conservative movements in Judaism have been engaged in outreach programs for the unchurched and for baptized Christians as well. No people from any faith should be expected to "hide their light under a bushel basket" (Mt 5:14–16). Granted that people of a religious commitment dislike hearing of a departure from their fold, this does occur and those in ecumenical and interfaith dialogue must acknowledge the fact.

Prayers for the Jews. Over the centuries in Catholic countries, HOLY WEEK has been the context for tensions with the Jewish community, resulting at times in persecution. The tragic irony of bad theology and catechesis has led pious people to lash out against their neighbors. On GOOD FRIDAY the proclamation of the Passion was in Latin, as were the Solemn Orations and the IMPROPERIA (Reproaches) sung during the veneration of the CROSS. Most of the laity would not have understood the prayers, so much depended on the homily as a guide into the spiritual benefits of their participation. Thus the clergy had a serious responsibility as teachers, so that the liturgy would challenge people to acknowledge that they are in need of divine mercy. This is clear from the congregation's refrain to the Reproaches: "Holy God, Holy and Mighty One, Holy Immortal One, have mercy on us." The use of Micah 6:3–4 and themes from Israel's wilderness wandering were intended to be typological (see 1 Cor 10:6), but many interpreters focused on "the Jews" in sermons and in learned commentaries (Frizzell and Henderson 2001, pp. 197–203).

"Lex supplicandi statuit legem credendi" (The rule of petition establishes the norm for belief). This original form of the laconic "Lex orandi, lex credendi" focuses on prayer of petition, and rightly so; these prayers should not be mere lip service but should be reflected in the daily lives of the faithful. The concern of Catholics should not be on how prayers sound to outsiders, but with the integrity of their own prayer lives. Because petitionary prayer is linked to action and Christians wish to prepare the way for the final days by their deeds, praying for "the conversion of Jews" (not merely for moral dimensions of everyone's life but for faith in Jesus as Messiah and Son of God) could lead easily to concrete and focused efforts to convert Jews in their midst. Such was the practice of an annual obligatory sermon for the Jews of Rome in the MIDDLE AGES. The Church now recognizes that such practices are contrary to the dignity of the other. The advice of GAMALIEL might be applied to the survival of the Jews through the ages: "Therefore, in the present case I advise you: Leave these men alone! Let them go! For if their purpose or activity is of human origin, it will fail. But if it is from God, you will not be able to stop these men; you will only find yourselves fighting against God" (Acts 5:38–39).

Before the Second Vatican Council, the adjective already had been deleted from the prayer title "Pro perfidis Judaeis," and the deacon was instructed to tell all to kneel for the silent period before the oration as in the other petitions. The English translation "For the Perfidious Jews" had been changed to Unbelieving, (i.e., to lack of faith in Christ), but the prayer spoke of "Jewish faithlessness" and "the blindness of that people so that they may acknowledge the light of your Truth, which is Christ, and be delivered from their darkness."

The prayer prepared for the 1970 Roman MISSAL of Pope Paul VI acknowledges in the introduction that the Jews were "the first to hear the Word of God" and asks "that they may continue to grow in the love of his Name and in faithfulness to his covenant." Then the oration recalls that long ago God gave his promise to Abraham and his posterity. "Listen to your Church as we pray that the people you first made your own may arrive at the fullness of redemption." The Christian understanding of the divine plan clearly states that the Messiah who is to come at the consummation of history is the risen Jesus of Nazareth. The traditional Jewish hope for the coming of the Messiah relates to the pilgrimage of the nations to Jerusalem, the place of divine judgment (Isa 2:1–5; Joel 3:9–12). "The Church awaits that day, known to God alone, on which all peoples will address the Lord in a single voice and 'serve him of one accord'" (Zeph 3:9) (Nostra aetate, 4). Facing a secular world of doubts and contrasting opinions, those who adhere to the biblical heritage can work together in mutual respect to prepare for a better future, within history and ultimately beyond time. "As Christians and Jews, following the example of the faith of Abraham, we are called to be a blessing for the world [cf. Gen 12:2ff]. This is the common task awaiting us. It is therefore necessary for us, Christians and Jews, to be first a blessing to one another" (Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 169).

Christology. Christian faith in Jesus is rooted in the doctrine of the Trinity and in the unique nature of His conception (the Virgin Birth) and in His RESURRECTION from the dead. From the beginning He was a "sign of contradiction" (Lk 2:34), but in early times the older community left a meager record of debates with Christians.

As the Church grew and encountered established Jewish communities in the great cities of the Roman Empire, St. AUGUSTINE of Hippo (354–430) postulated that the Jews had a role as "witness people." If pagan intellectuals questioned the antiquity of biblical prophecies, the Christian teacher could point to the Jews. They would acknowledge that Isaiah and the other prophets were authentic.

Deep devotion can often be accompanied by intolerance and impatience toward the unenlightened, so the commitment of orthodox Christians to the Gospel and the adherence of Jews to the Torah led on occasion to confrontations. In general, polemical literature is destined for the community of the given teacher and/or writer, so members of the other group may receive only garbled versions of various arguments. In both communities the depiction of the other was far from courteous.

In the past century or so, some Jewish thinkers have come to a positive assessment of Jesus as a teacher within the great line of Jewish learning (Buber, Borowitz, Flusser). They may not deal with the central questions of Christian faith, but they do not interpret Jesus in light of the dismal experience of Jewish-Christian encounters over the centuries.

In recent decades Christian scholars have made great progress in their discussion of the varied background to the New Testament and Rabbinic Judaism. The Qumran (Dead Sea) Scrolls and other archaeological discoveries have cast light upon the Hasmonean-Herodian period in the Land, and comparisons among known texts have given great assurance concerning the antiquity of Jewish pseudepigraphical (falsely ascribed) literature preserved in Greek and other translations. These advances have been incorporated into many commentaries on the Gospels and other New Testament texts. Rather than referring to this period as Late Judaism, giving the impression that the Jewish faith and culture became fossilized after the two defeats by the Roman legions (AD 70 and 135), scholars now speak of Early Judaism, depicted as a vibrant and varied development from the time after the Babylonian exile (586–538 BC).

Jesus is placed fully within the dynamics of the liturgical and intellectual life of the Jews living in the Land; as He moved from Galilee to JUDAEA, He encountered the spiritual leaders of the time in several places and entered into debate with them. Although John differed from the Synoptics regarding the number of visits to Jerusalem, both traditions emphasize the experience of pilgrimage as a key to understanding Jesus' teaching and actions. Pilgrims adopted simple garments and developed patterns of prayer to prepare for their communal encounter with God in the Temple. They might encounter hostility and danger on the way. When Jesus sent the apostles on their first mission, He oriented them toward the Kingdom in their service of "the lost sheep of the house of Israel" in an exchange of gifts (healing for hospitality). They would face persecution, but the Spirit would inspire their response (Mt 10:5–23; Lk 9:1–6, 10:1–16). The coming of the kingdom through acceptance of God's manifest presence in the works of the Messiah and the collaborators sent in His Name prepared the entire convoked community ("Church") for the risen Lord's worldwide commission (see Lk 9:51–24:49; Acts 1:3–8; and Frizzell 1982, pp. 365–367). A number of related themes are presented in essays on the biblical background for reflections on the Mother of Jesus (Frizzell, 1995, pp. 26–40; 1999, pp. 38–59).

At times Christian theologians have developed doctrine upon New Testament texts that they interpreted without reference to the Biblical culture. For example, the Synoptic Gospels state that "the curtain of the Temple was torn in two from top to bottom" (Mt 27:51; Mk 15:38; Lk 23:45). In the light of Jewish mourning practices, this might be seen as the rending of the garment on the death of a loved one, a sign that the Father is mourning the Son's death. Over the centuries many Christian teachers have interpreted this to signify the end of Temple worship, saying its validity ceased at the time Jesus died. This interpretation fails to take into account Luke's message that after Jesus ascended, the disciples "returned to Jerusalem with great joy and were continually in the Temple blessing God" (Lk 24:52–53); according to Acts this practice continued. Thus, early Christians saw a place for Temple worship, as well as for participation in synagogue services, in their life of prayer. The theologian's task should be grounded in a careful analysis of the biblical heritage, so that the result of study will be "conformed to the truth of the Gospel and the Spirit of Christ" (Nostra aetate 1965, 4).

Moving toward Mutual Respect. The Second Vatican Council recommended the two communities move toward "that mutual understanding and respect which is the fruit, above all, of biblical and theological studies as well as of fraternal dialogues" (Nostra aetate 1965, 4). This positive development has built on the work of pioneers in Europe during the most difficult period of recent history. The years since the 1960s have been a time of growth in collaboration on a number of levels. Christians have much to learn from Jewish scholars and, together, leaders of communities can built alliances that unite them "in the face of the evils which are still threatening: indifference and prejudice, as well as displays of anti-Semitism" (Fisher and Klenicki 1995, p. 169).

Rabbi Asher Finkel

I. ROMAN AND BYZANTINE PERIOD (67–622)

The history of the Jewish people is primarily the history of their religious development and, at the same time, in the Old Testament period, the history of man's salvation. From the time God made ISRAEL His chosen people through His covenant with them on Mount SINAI, the TORAH, or the Mosaic LAW, has been regarded by the Jewish people as the center of their life, and since the Babylonian Exile, the Jews have considered the study and fulfillment of this law their principal duty.

The history of the Jews reveals its real and deep meaning only if one concentrates attention on the religious element in it. The same is true of the post-Biblical era, which for the Jewish people on the whole was an almost uninterrupted period of suffering and persecution. Even the unfriendly attitude Christendom has shown the Jews throughout the centuries must be considered. The objective, chronological presentation of the most important events in the history of the Jews is neither tendentious nor accusatory. The external happenings in this history, frightful though they frequently were, especially in recent times, have always been subservient to the very special plan of God, whose call and gifts of grace to Israel are, according to the testimony of Saint Paul (Romans 12:29), irrevocable. Justice can be done to the history of the Jews only if it is primarily regarded as the expression of God's inscrutable government of the world.

The post-Biblical era is reviewed here in a survey of the seven main periods of the Jewish history: (1) the Roman and Byzantine period (AD 67–622); (2) the Islamic period (622–1096); (3) the period of the CRUSADES and the Spanish INQUISITION (1096–1492); (4) the period of the RENAISSANCE and the Reformation (1492–1650); (5) the beginning of the modern era (1650–1750); (6) the emancipation (1750–1948); and (7) contemporary history (1948–2009).

The history of the Jews in the Roman and Byzantine Period (67–622) was marked by their first revolt against ROME (67–70), which brought about the destruction of JERUSALEM; by their second revolt under BAR KOKHBA (132–135), which ended in the complete devastation of PALESTINE; and by the survival of the Jews in the Babylonian and other Diasporas.

First Revolt. The ever-increasing tension between the Jews and the Roman authorities in Palestine reached its breaking point when the tyranny of the Roman governor Gessius Florus (64–66) provoked the Jews to open, armed rebellion against Rome. The military preparations on the Jewish side were supervised by Joseph ben Mattathiah, who later, under the name of Flavius JOSEPHUS, left to future generations, together with other historical writings, a description of this revolt in his Jewish War. The Jewish military forces, however, could not withstand the legions of the Roman General Vespasian (AD 9–79) and, after heavy losses, withdrew to Jerusalem. A siege of several months followed; the city was conquered by Vespasian's son Titus (AD 39–81) in the year 70 and, together with its Temple, utterly destroyed. The Roman soldiers, after inflicting a terrible massacre on the population, led thousands of Jews away into slavery.

The national catastrophe of the year 70 made a renewal of religious life imperative for the Jews. From that point on they placed emphasis on the academies. While Jerusalem was still under siege, Rabbi JOHANAN BEN ZAKKAI, with wise foresight, obtained permission from Titus to settle with his disciples at Jamnia, which now became the new seat of the SANHEDRIN. Even after the year 70, the Jews of Palestine retained a certain amount of local autonomy, which the Romans sanctioned by conferring on GAMALIEL (II), the head of the Jamnia academy, the title of patriarch. The main concern at this time of the doctors of the Law, among whom Rabbi AKIBA BEN JOSEPH was outstanding, was in the field of HALA KAH, that is, the interpretation of the various prescriptions of the Law that assured for the future that the observance of the commandments of the Torah would hold the first place in the life of the Jewish people.

Second Revolt. Meanwhile the hand of Rome lay heavy on the land, and several uprisings occurred among the Jews, sometimes, as in 115, extending into the DIASPORA; all of them were cruelly suppressed. The limit was reached in 132, when the Roman Emperor HADRIAN decided to erect a heathen sanctuary on the site of the ruined Temple. The whole population rose in protest under the leadership of Simeon bar Koziba, called Bar Kokhba by his disciples. For three years he held the country under his control. But the conquest of Bether by the Roman legions put an end to this last attempt to regain national independence. The Judean population was decimated, and the remnant of those seeking to maintain their religious and national life sought refuge in the mountains of Galilee, because strictly enforced laws made every practice of the Jewish religion liable to severe penalties.

Under the Emperor Antoninus Plus (138–161) conditions became better for the Jews, and they even received some local autonomy. The leading Jewish academies now concentrated on codifying all the extra-Biblical traditions that until then had been handed down only orally, but that, due to the unfavorable conditions of the time, were in danger of being entirely lost. This work is mainly contained in the MISHNAH, completed by the Patriarch Rabbi JUDAH HA-NASI about AD 200. The gradual dissolution, however, of Palestinian JUDAISM could not be checked, and, with the abolition of the patriarchate in 425, its whole political life was practically extinguished.

Babylonian Diaspora. In Mesopotamia, where, following the first (Babylonian) destruction of Jerusalem (587 BC), a Jewish colony grew in importance, the political situation—first under the Parthians and then under the Sassanians—was considerably better than in Palestine. The Jews were subject to an exilarch, whom they acknowledged as their official head and whose authority extended to all the Jewish communities in the Persian Empire; they thus enjoyed considerable autonomy. Academies for the study of the Law were established in the chief centers of Jewish life. The most important of these were the academies of Sura and Pumbedita, which were founded by two famous doctors of the Law, Rab (175–247) and Samuel (175–254). The heads of the Babylonian school, who later held the title of gaon, were regarded as the highest religious authority in Judaism.

The discussions of the scholars both in Palestine, especially in the academies of Caesarea and Tiberias, and in BABYLONIA concerning the religious decisions of the Mishnah were in turn codified and resulted in the two Talmuds—one of Palestine, inaccurately called the Jerusalem TALMUD, and the other of Babylonia. The former was completed toward the end of the fourth century and the latter toward the beginning of the sixth. From this time on, the norms of the Talmud formed the supreme guide for the religious life of Judaism. At the same time other ancient traditions were likewise being recorded, and these were passed down in the MIDRASHIC LITERATURE, which is partly of a halakic-juridical character and partly of a haggadic-edifying character. All these writings constitute what is known as the ancient rabbinical literature.

Jewish Diaspora in Other Countries. Besides those in Mesopotamia, Egypt, and Asia Minor, Jewish communities also existed in most of the commercially important areas of the ROMAN EMPIRE. The catastrophes that the Jewish nation suffered in Palestine did not, on the whole, seriously affect the juridical status of the Jews in the Diaspora. They were the only people in the empire who, for recognized religious reasons, did not have to take part in the official state worship.

During the first Christian centuries, the cleft widened between Judaism and rising Christianity. The latter, despite periodic waves of persecution, grew stronger and stronger and, thanks to the well-organized activity of its missionaries, made considerable progress everywhere. Since Christians who converted from paganism soon vastly outnumbered Judeo-Christians, Christian doctrine had to be adapted for these converts from the heathen world; hence, a more and more noticeable alienation appeared between Judaism and Christianity, which subsequently had a decisive influence on the relations between the two religions throughout the centuries (cf. Wilde 1949).

With the Edict of MILAN, which Constantine the Great issued in 313, the way opened for Christianity to become the official state religion. Consequently the juridical status of the Jews changed, and against them a large number of theologically biased laws were enacted, limiting their freedom of action and increasingly discriminating against their social life. A short period of relief for them occurred under JULIAN THE APOSTATE (361–363), who even considered rebuilding the Temple of Jerusalem. But under Theodosius II (408–450), the regulations against Jews in the Theodosian Code remained from then on a fixed part of all subsequent laws regulating Jewish life in Christian countries.

Following the invasion by the barbarians, Jewish communities shared in a common misery, but, even in the new states these invaders eventually founded and in which the rulers converted to Christianity, the general situation of the Jews hardly improved. The popes of Rome, particularly Gregory the Great (590–604), objected to the persecutions and forced conversions of the Jews, yet even canonical regulations increasingly limited the freedom of the Jews.

Especially oppressive were the conditions in the BYZANTINE EMPIRE, where the Jews were accused of colluding with the enemies of the country, particularly the Persians. Thus, Emperor Heraclius (610–642), during whose reign the Persians conquered Jerusalem, forbade all practice of the Jewish religion. At that time in Europe, too, the expulsion of the Jews had already begun, as in France under King Dagobert (626). The condition of the Jews was terrible also in Spain, where, in the last centuries of Visigothic domination, regulations made in the provincial synods of Toledo rendered the exercise of Jewish worship practically impossible.

II. ISLAMIC PERIOD (622–1096)

Despite certain discriminatory legislation, the Jews generally prospered in the lands conquered by Muslims, and, in the mutually beneficial symbiosis between Judaism and ISLAM, Jewish medieval culture reached its greatest heights, especially in Spain. Some scholars, such as Bat Ye'or, however, argue that in places other than Spain, Jewish communities were not well treated by Muslim rulers.

Jewish-Arabic Symbiosis. A new era began for Judaism with the appearance of Islam on the scene of history and with the establishment of the caliphate. At the height of the Islamic power, the caliphate was able, after several internal ruptures, to subject to Arab hegemony under the law of the Prophet all the nations from India to the Atlantic Ocean and from Arabia to the borders of the Pyrenees.

MUḤAMMAD, who had borrowed much from Judaism and whose initial success in Arabia was due largely to the great religious influence of the Jews on the peninsula and to the spiritual preparation that this had made possible, hoped that the Jews would embrace his religious system with open arms. Their resolute opposition, however, led also in Islam to laws of segregation, which resulted especially in laying on the Jews, as well as on the Christians, heavy financial burdens and in relegating them to a merely tolerated position at the edge of the Dâr el-Islâm (the Muslim world). However, it protected them, as well as the Christians, from forced conversion, because Islam regarded each group as a People of the Book, that is, a community that participated in a stage on the road of divine revelation.

In spite of this legislation, which, moreover, came into full force only after the decline of Muslim supremacy, the position of the Jews in the Islamic countries was more favorable, to a greater or lesser degree, than it had been under Christian rule. To earn a living they now turned more and more to trade—a development greatly fostered by their international connections, whereas until then agriculture and small industry had been their main occupations. In cultural matters a certain symbiosis developed between the Jews and the Arabs, which was furthered by the relationship between their languages (both Hebrew and Arabic being Semitic languages) and in the sphere of religious concepts, which led to a new efflorescence in Jewish intellectual life.

The Jews soon adopted Arabic as their everyday language, and this aroused in them a new interest in Hebrew, the language of their own sacred literature. Thus, this became the age of the first great Hebrew grammarians. The position of the exilarch was confirmed by the caliphs who resided in Baghdad, near ancient Babylon, and the Babylonian academies received a fresh impetus, so that their heads, called geonim (plural of gaon), were able, through their circular letters, to direct Jewish life throughout the world. Through the Arabs, Jewish scholars became acquainted also with the ideas of ancient philosophy, from which until then they had kept aloof—with the exception of Philo, who had but little influence on official Jewish thought. For the first time, Jewish theology left the way of purely inner meditation on the treasures of tradition and adopted the system of Islamic theologians, the KALĀM, which is the interpretation of revealed truths with the help of philosophical principles.

In the second half of the eighth century, opposition to the Talmudic practices as they were handed down and carried out by the Babylonian academies became noticeable in Judaism. Taking up ancient concepts and the tendencies of several sects, adherents of this movement, who gathered around Anan ben David (c. 715–c. 795) of the exilarch family, denied the binding force of oral traditions codified in the Talmud. They called themselves Benê Mikrā (Sons of the Scriptures), a term related to the word Karaism, because they accepted only the Sacred Scriptures as their sole law. The Karaites met a resolute opponent in Gaon SA'ADIA BEN JOSEPH (c. 882–942), the first Jewish religious philosopher. With the death of the rabbi and philosopher Sa'adia, centers of Jewish learning in Mesopotamia declined, which coincided with the fall of the caliphate of Baghdad. In the eleventh century the office of the exilarch, after it was combined for a short time with that of the gaon, disappeared. The centers of Jewish learning in Palestine were restored to new vigor for a short period under the Egyptian Fatimid Dynasty (969–1171), but the conquest of Jerusalem by the Crusaders in 1099 put an end to all Jewish life in the Holy Land.

Spanish Period. The Jewish-Arabic symbiosis reached its climax in Spain, where, after the Muslim army in 711 conquered Toledo, a development began that culminated in the tenth century with the establishment of the caliphate of CÓRDOBA. Jewish scholars and wealthy Jews occupied prominent positions, such as those held by Hasdai Ibn Shaprut (c. 915–975) at the court of Córdoba and by Samuel ha-Nagid (993–1055) in Granada. Religious philosophers, mystics, scholars, and poets could freely develop their genius, and so in Spain there was a new flowering of Hebrew literature. The great work of religious philosophy by Solomon ben Judah ibn Gabirol (1020–1050), called AVICEBRON by the scholastics, became universally known. IBN PAQUDA wrote The Duties of the Heart (c. 1080), a widely circulated work that many generations of Jews used as a source of spiritual direction. Moses ben Jacob IBN EZRA (c. 1060–1139) left to posterity a large number of elegiac poems. Judah ben Samuel ha-Levi (c. 1085–c. 1140), who lived about the same time, was the greatest poet of the era. In his Songs of Sion, the intense longing of the Jewish people for the days of their past glory finds eloquent expression, and in his Kuzari he left them a highly prized apologia of Judaism. Abraham ben Meïr IBN EZRA, also a gifted poet, is better known for his valuable commentary on the Scriptures.

The greatest personality of this period is without doubt Moses ben Maimon (1135–1204), or MAIMONIDES, as he is also called. He was concerned primarily with proving that faith and reason do not contradict each other. For this purpose he made use of the categories of Aristotelian philosophy, which at that time was enjoying the increasing and special interest also of the Muslim philosophers. In his Guide to the Perplexed, Maimonides endeavored to solve the seeming contradictions between religion and philosophy. His most important work is the Mishneh Torah (Repetition of the Law), or Yad Hazaka (Strong Hand), a clear, systematic summary of the whole of Talmudic erudition. In the Book of Knowledge, a commentary on the Talmud, Maimonides sets forth his well-known thirteen basic dogmas of Judaism.

III. PERIOD OF THE CRUSADES AND SPANISH INQUISITION (1096–1492)

In Spain the situation of the Jews grew worse with the Reconquista (718–1238), the reconquest of the country by the Christian princes.

After a few centuries of relative freedom following the Carolingian revival, the Jews suffered from restrictive laws and active persecution in western Europe during the era of the Crusades and the later MIDDLE AGES; these reached their climax in the Spanish Inquisition.

West-European Jewish Communities. After the disturbances of the so-called migration of the nations, CHARLEMAGNE, at the beginning of the ninth century, was the first to reunite under a single rule the countries that were later called France, Germany, and Italy. The condition of the Jews in these lands now noticeably improved. New Jewish communities formed in various places, and previously existing ones took on new life and played an important role in the development of commercial relations. On the whole, the situation remained unchanged, in spite of repeated attacks by ecclesiastics, in the states that evolved from the Carolingian monarchy.

The Jewish communities enjoyed far-reaching rights of self-government, and in the tenth century important Jewish schools arose for the first time in western Europe. One of the foremost authorities was Rabbi Gershom ben Judah, "the Light of the Exile" (c. 960–c. 1040), who taught at Mainz and adapted the norms of Old Testament and Talmudic law to the changed conditions of the European Jews, as, for instance, by his prohibition against polygamy. Rabbi Shelomoh ben Yiṣḥaq of Troyes, more commonly known as RASHI, who lived at this time (1040–1105), was the greatest commentator on the Bible and Talmud that Judaism ever produced. In Italy, too, growing Jewish communities everywhere displayed a vigorous intellectual life.

The Crusades. The Crusades, however, ushered in a sudden change in the conditions of the Jews. The ill-will against the Jews that other religions had fostered through the centuries now burst forth in violence and deepened the chasm that separated Christians and Jews.

During the First Crusade (1096), the Jewish communities of the Rhineland especially suffered, and the Second Crusade (1146–1147) repeated the same outrages, in spite of the courageous intervention of Saint BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX on behalf of persecuted Jews. This age, too, witnessed the first appearance of the calumny of Jewish ritual murder, that is, the allegation that Jews murdered Christians to obtain blood for the Passover and other rituals. This libel raged on for centuries despite all papal counter-declarations and prohibitions. During the Third Crusade (1189), the measures the German princes took to protect the Jews proved more successful, but now it was mainly the Jewish communities in England that had much to suffer.

The Crusades brought with them a complete revolution in the Jewish way of life. Everywhere, ancient anti-Jewish laws were again enforced and augmented by new regulations, even in the field of Canon Law. Where it had not yet been the custom, Jews were ordered to live in separate districts or GHETTOS and to wear a distinctive costume (the Jewish hat and yellow patch). As Christians now engaged in commerce on a constantly increasing scale, Jews were increasingly forced out of this livelihood. Because the Third Council of the LATERAN (1179) renewed in full rigor the prohibition against taking interest on loans, this forced the Jews, for whom this law did not apply, into the pawn and loan business, which, besides the old-clothes trade, was one of the few ways left for them to earn a living, provoking numerous chain reactions of anti-Jewish outrages. Almost all social contact between Jews and Christians ceased, and Jewry, which, in keeping with the admonitions of such FATHERS OF THE CHURCH as St. AUGUSTINE and St. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM, was allowed a bare subsistence at the edge of the Christian community, began to live a life entirely of its own. The situation lasted practically until the era of the emancipation. These various regulations and phenomena did not manifest themselves uniformly everywhere; great differences existed in the various countries. From this time on, expulsions of the Jews took place periodically. They began in France, where, after the payment of much money, the Jews were allowed to return several times. England followed suit in 1290, but here the expulsion remained in effect for several centuries. Jews were forced to listen to Christian sermons and religious discussions, their own literature was strictly censured, and the Talmud was forbidden and frequently burned in public squares.

The Spanish Tragedy. At the beginning of the thirteenth century, with the victories of the Christian princes in all parts of Spain except the enclave of Granada, the Reconquista of this country was practically complete. But the importance of the Jews in every field was too great to allow a rigorous enforcement of anti-Jewish laws. Nevertheless, the Inquisition began in Spain, and in 1265 the great Jewish scholar Moses ben Maimon, called also MAIMONIDES, was among those who were forced to leave the country.

In the inner-Jewish sector, a battle now began over recognizing or condemning Maimonides' writings. As early as the middle of the twelfth century, Abraham ben David of Posquières (c. 1125–1198) had violently opposed the great teacher's use of philosophical principles in the exposition of divine revelation, and in the thirteenth century Rabbi Solomon ben Abraham (1235–1310) condemned Maimonides' writings at Montpellier and handed them over to the Inquisition. In Spain itself the strict Talmudic system had been recently strengthened through the efforts of Rabbi Solomon ben Adret (c. 1235–1310), but Maimonides' viewpoint found adherents in Hasdai ben Abraham CRESCAS (1340–1410) and his disciple Joseph ALBO (c. 1388–1444), the author of the Book of the Principles of Faith.

In the field of religious legislation, Maimonides' ideas gained the upper hand. In the spirit of his Mishneh Torah, Rabbi Jacob ben Asher (c. 1269–c. 1340) wrote his Arba Turim (c. 1300), a commentary on the Talmud that later formed the basis for the Shulḥan Aruch of Rabbi Joseph ben Ephraim CARO (1488–1575). The latter work, with the glosses of Rabbi Moses Isserles of Kraców (1520–1575), was adapted to conditions in central and eastern Europe and has remained the basis of all rabbinical interpretations of the Talmud.

Increasing external difficulties and internal religious struggle caused an ever larger group of Jews to turn to the mysticism of the CABALA, which likewise went back to ancient traditions and which began its irrepressible march of triumph through the Jewish world after the still mysterious discovery of the ZOHAR by the Spanish-Jewish mystic, Moses de Leon (1260–1305).

The general situation of the Jews in Spain now noticeably deteriorated; in 1391 and in 1412 excesses of cruelty ensued, and a large number of Jews, known as MARRANOS, submitted, through fear, to the pretense of being baptized. When, toward the end of the fifteenth century, the kingdoms of Castile and Aragon were united, the Inquisition, primarily against the Marranos, was reactivated under the leadership of Tomás de TORQUEMADA, and in 1492 a decree was issued that all Jews who refused to be baptized must leave Spain within three months. This spelled the end, after more than 1,000 years, of Spanish Judaism. Many refugees first migrated to neighboring Portugal, but six years later they were expelled from this country too; others went to Turkey, where they were given asylum, or to other lands in the Mediterranean area, where numerous communities were founded of Sephardic Jews, who spoke their Spanish dialect of Ladino.

IV. PERIOD OF THE RENAISSANCE AND REFORMATION (1492–1650)

Although the humanism of the Renaissance did not result in any noticeably humane treatment of the Jews in Europe and the disturbances that accompanied the Reformation added to their sufferings, both the Ashkenazi Jews of Poland and the Sephardic Jews of the Mediterranean lands and western Europe were able to preserve and develop their typically Jewish way of life.

General Situation. In Germany, after the massacres during the Crusades, when numerous Jews fled to Eastern Europe (bringing with them their German dialect, Yiddish), conditions became somewhat stabilized, although ominous warnings of danger were ever-present. As imperial kammerknechte (chamberlains), the Jews were placed under the direct protection of the emperor, but they paid a heavy tax for this privilege. Later, in 1355, the Golden Bull of Charles IV (1316–1378) gave the local princes the right to collect this tax. Yet this did not protect the Jews from the constantly recurring bloody outrages and pillages, such as occurred in 1298 (under Rindfleisch), from 1336 to 1339 (the "Armleder" massacres), in 1337 (the Desecration of the Hosts incident in Deggendorf, Bavaria), in 1348 to 1349 (the outbreak of the Black Death and the accusation of poisoning of wells), and in 1421 (the Vienna Geserah, ritual murder accusation). In 1434 the Council of BASEL renewed the old anti-Jewish regulations as part of the Church's Canon Law, and the Franciscan friar JOHN CAPISTRAN took it upons himself to aid the execution of these laws everywhere, which caused a new outbreak of serious persecution.

At the beginning of the Reformation, the situation of the Jews looked as if it would improve. But when Martin LUTHER admitted that his expectations for their conversion had come to naught, the benevolence that he had first shown the Jews out of reverence for them as PEOPLE OF GOD turned into hostility that found expression in a series of anti-Jewish pamphlets. One positive aspect of the Reformation, in the eyes of the Jews, was the revival of interest in the study of Hebrew, which brought renowned Christian scholars in contact with learned Jews.

The Catholic COUNTER REFORMATION, too, led to a renewal of the strict application of anti-Jewish laws. These laws now affected the Italian Jews also, who, despite their relatively small number, had played a significant role in the cultural sphere because of their contact with the Renaissance. In Italy, for instance, the first Jewish printing press was set up, and the first Hebrew books were printed. But because of the inauspicious omens of renewed persecution, the centers of Jewish life moved to other countries where better conditions prevailed.

Polish Judaism. During the Crusades the dukes of Great Poland fostered Jewish settlements, because those nobles saw in this a chance to bring their country into the network of international commerce. In spite of the resolute resistance of the clergy, Boleslas of Kalisz (1221–1279) issued a statute in 1264 that was very favorable to the Jews. Later, King Casimir the Great (1310–1370) admitted into his realm a large number of Jews who had fled from the persecution that had broken out after the Black Death. With a few interruptions, this favorable situation lasted under the Lithuanian Jagiellos. During the reign of Sigismund III (1588–1632), the condition of the Jews in Poland deteriorated as a result of the anti-Jewish propaganda of the JESUITS, though the Jewish communities there had grown so strong and were so well organized that they withstood these attacks with ease.

In Poland the autonomous Jewish system of community government reached the peak of its development. Every community of importance was directed by a kahal, a body of notables elected yearly that conducted all the administrative affairs. Juridical matters were entrusted to the rabbis, and a court of appeals met every year in Lublin at the time of the annual fair in that city and in conjunction with the assembly of the various kahals. The highest court of appeals in Poland was the Council of the Four Countries (Great Poland, Little Poland, Podolia-Galicia, and Volhynia); Lithuania had the Council of the Great Communities.

The kahal was especially interested in education. Every community had a heder (elementary school), and many of them also had a yeshivah (Talmudic academy). In both of these, exclusively Jewish disciplines were taught and studied, which soon assured Polish Jews a great intellectual superiority and their leading rabbis an undeniable authority.

The Sephardic Sphere. The Jewish immigration from Spain into Turkey continued long after 1492 with a flow of Marranos who had found unbearable the activities of the informers and secret police that the Inquisition encouraged. Many Spañolos, such as Don Joseph Nassi (1566–1590), reached positions of great influence at the Sublime Porte (the Ottoman imperial court).

In 1517 the Turks occupied Egypt and thereby became the rulers of Palestine as well. Groups of refugees migrated to the Holy Land; new communities arose in the cities of Jerusalem, Hebron, Tiberias, and especially Safed (in Galilee). Safed became the seat of a new school of cabalists. Its founder, Jacob Berab (1474–1541), who had settled there in 1534, was followed in 1538 by Rabbi Joseph ben Ephraim CARO, the author of the Shulḥan Aruch, and by his close friend, Solomon Alkabeṣ (c. 1501–1580). Among the great sages in the cabalistic school of Safed were Rabbi Isaac LURIA (1534–1572) and his disciple and brother-in-law, Moses Cordovero (d. 1570). Luria's teachings, with their pronounced messianic spirit, found an able propagandist in his disciple, Ḥayyim Vidal Calabrese (1543–1620).

Under the pressure of the Jewish expulsion from Spain and of the consequent sufferings, Messianic movements started in various places; their beginnings were connected with the names of David Reubeni (c. 1490–c. 1536) and Solomon Molcho (d. 1532). Later, their climax was reached in the person of Shabbatai Ṣevi of Smyrna (1626–1676). Many respectable Jewish personalities, among whom were learned rabbis, hailed Shabbatai as the promised Messiah. Even after his conversion to Islam, the Messianic movement did not fully die out but provoked heated discussions in the Jewish communities. Similar to that of Shabbatai Ṣevi, a movement in Poland was inspired by Jacob FRANK (d. 1791), who eventually converted to Christianity.

An important new wave of immigration started in the seventeenth century when Marranos from Portugal found refuge in Holland. The Dutch, who had shaken off Spanish domination toward the end of the sixteenth century, showed the refugees, whom they let settle wherever they wished, a toleration that was most unusual in those days. A large Jewish community arose in Amsterdam and soon flourished under the leadership of such renowned Ḥakamim (sages) as Manasseh ben Israel (c. 1604–1657). Amsterdam also was the home of the great Jewish thinkers Gabriel (Uriel) ACOSTA (d. 1640) and Baruch SPINOZA (d. 1677), both of whom, however, came in conflict with rabbinic authorities and fell under the ban of the synagogue. After the Dutch revolution of 1649, some Portuguese Jews from Holland settled in England for the first time since the expulsion in 1290. Colonies of Marranos were established also at Bordeaux and other places in southern France, where they were known as new Christians. Genuine Jewish communities did not exist in France until 1648, when Alsace-Lorraine was incorporated into the French kingdom.

V. BEGINNING OF THE MODERN ERA (1650–1750)

From the middle of the seventeenth to the middle of the eighteenth centuries, the situation of the Jews in Poland grew more desperate, but they found spiritual consolation in the pietist movement of ḤASIDISM. In the rest of Europe, the Jews suffered the usual series of persecutions.

Economic Situation in Eastern Europe. In the seventeenth century the position of the Jews in Poland became more and more untenable, although up to that time they had lived there in relatively tolerable circumstances. The revolt of the Cossacks under Bogdan Chmielnicki (c. 1595–1657) in 1648 destroyed hundreds of Jewish communities in the Ukraine and in Volhynia, and caused numerous deaths. The subsequent wars and disturbances brought much misery on all the other Jewish settlements in Poland. Meanwhile the tax burden weighed ever heavier on the Jews there. Polish merchants and artisans gradually drove the Jews out of business, and many were obliged to live as tenant farmers on the estates of the nobility, which in turn aroused the hatred of the exploited peasantry against them, so that bloody outrages occurred constantly.

Religious Reaction: Ḥasidism. The Jewish reaction to these oppressive conditions arose from within, on the religious level. Since the late medieval period, and especially since Isaac Luria, the cabala influence on all Jewish life had constantly grown. Conversely, in Poland, the center of Jewish learning, opposition arose against the Talmudists' stress on man's intellectual faculties.

On this background appeared, about 1730, the figure of Rabbi Israel ben Eliezer (1698–1760), called Ba'al Shem Tov, who founded the Ḥasidim (the devout). The teaching of Ba'al Shem (Master of the Name, i.e., of God), set forth in popular stories, emphasized—without calling into question the traditional doctrines—the absolute superiority of the pious life expressed by devout prayers of the heart and an ardent love of God, all based on the Lurian cabala. Under Ba'al Shem's successor, Rabbi Dov Ber of Mezhirich (d. 1773), the Ḥasidic movement received a firm structure and continued to spread, especially in Podolia, Galicia, and Volhynia, despite the strong opposition of the Mitnagdim (opponents), whose spokesman was the greatest Talmudist of his time, Gaon Rabbi Ella of Vilna (1720–1797). In the following generation Ḥasidism split into numerous local groups, each of which were at times under the leadership of a Tzaddik (saintly miracle-working rabbi). Ḥasidism was the last great religious movement in Judaism.

Situation in Germany and Austria. In the Germanic countries, too, the Jews had hard times during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Pogroms and outrages were their constant lot. At the beginning of the sixteenth century, the old communities of Frankfurt am Main and Worms suffered hardships because of the so-called Fettmilch revolt. In 1670 the Jews of Vienna, some of whom as financiers had rendered valuable services to the Hapsburg emperors during the THIRTY YEARS' WAR, became victims of a decree of expulsion. Bohemia, which, especially in Prague, had the largest Jewish community in the Hapsburg countries, attempted to limit the Jews population by a family-control law that permitted only the oldest son of a family to marry.

VI. EMANCIPATION (1750–1948)

After the Jewish emancipation, largely the result of the eighteenth-century ENLIGHTENMENT and the FRENCH REVOLUTION, the Jews adapted to the new conditions with various degrees of success. But the waves of modern anti-Semitism finally broke over them with such fury that they were almost annihilated by the Nazis. An indirect outcome of this was the Zionists' establishment in Palestine of the Jewish State of Israel.

The Enlightenment and the French Revolution. Although the old regulations concerning Jews remained unchanged, liberal ideas broadcast in France, especially by the ENCYCLOPEDISTS, increasingly made themselves felt. The first Jew of this time who made contact with modern thought was the Berliner Moses Dessau, better known as Moses Mendelssohn (1728–1786). Being an important philosopher himself, he endeavored to have his fellow believers, who had remained almost completely unaffected by the intellectual movements of the modern age, reach the stage of cultural development their contemporaries had achieved. He was one of the first Jews to write in High German, and he translated the Bible into this language—a very bold enterprise at that time, because he appeared a heretic to tradition-minded rabbis.

The first real civic emancipation of the Jews, which liberated them after centuries from the ghettos and made them equal to their fellow men, with full human rights, was a result of the French Revolution. The effective legal measures, however, met with stubborn opposition from the Christian population, especially in Alsace. At the invitation of Napoleon, the Great Synagogue met at Paris in 1807 to settle relations between the Jews and the State. The emperor applied the consistorial system to the Jews also, and thus put an end to the previous autonomy of their communities. In countries occupied by Napoleon, such as Italy, Holland, and Westphalia, the Jews were likewise given civil rights. In other countries the development was much slower and not without setbacks.

Reactions within the Jewish Communities. The emancipation and its forerunners caused a complete revolution within Judaism. The traditional framework of Jewish life, which had remained practically unchanged for centuries, now collapsed in western Europe, and along with it the Jewish system of instruction and education shattered. At this time a new type of Jew came into being, who, while retaining his Jewish faith, was also a full-fledged citizen of a country and consequently more assimilated into the life and culture of his non-Jewish environment. Since many progressive Jews thought that emancipation was proceeding too slowly, the Baptism Movement widely affected various social strata among Jews who looked upon Baptism as an entrance into Christian society.

This development, which, within a few years, transplanted the Jews from the Middle Ages into the modern world, advanced so fast that it took some time until counterforces stemmed the constant loss in the ranks of the Jews. The religious institutions of Judaism, particularly those connected with synagogue service, endeavored to adapt, by means of suitable reforms, to the changed conditions of the time. The leaders of the movement in Germany were Samuel Holdheim (1806–1860), Abraham Geiger (1810–1874), and Ludwig Philippson (1811–1889). Such attempts at reform provoked violent opposition from those attached to the traditional forms. The latter found a militant spokesman in Rabbi Moses Sofer-Schreiber of Pressburg (1773–1839), who opposed on principle any innovation. Zacharias Frankel (1801–1875), the founder of the Jewish theological seminary of Breslau, the first modern institution for the education of rabbis, represented a conservative, conciliatory movement, which later gained the upper hand in most of the Jewish communities in Germany. Samson Raphael Hirsch (1808–1888) became the spiritual father of the new German-Jewish orthodoxy that recognized the necessity of modern education while holding fast to the old. In this period of intellectual innovation, the Science of Judaism was born under the Altmeister Leopold Zunz (1794–1886) and the historian Heinrich Graetz (1817–1891) as well as under several others.

Progressive civil emancipation of the Jews made some advances in certain countries, but only the year 1848 brought decisive change. The real, or at least theoretically and legally granted, equality was effected in Germany with the founding of the German Empire in 1870 to 1871, and in the Austrian countries with the Austro-Hungarian settlement in 1867.

In Russia. Russia received its Jewish population through the various partitions of Poland (in 1792, 1793, and 1795), and the Russian government anxiously watched the Jews to keep them within the boundaries of the newly annexed lands (settlement area). Alexander I (1801–1825) attempted some liberal measures in their favor, such as the Jewish Statute of 1804, but these largely remained dead letters. Nicolaus I (1825–1855) introduced a twenty-five-year term of military service for the Jews to further their assimilation (i.e., Baptism). Among cultured Jews, the Enlightenment, which in Russia and Poland they adopted in a typically Jewish form called the HASKALAH, made great progress and stimulated the growth of neo-Hebrew literature. During the reign of Alexander II (1855–1881), Jews were granted certain civil rights and cultural possibilities, but when the reactionary party was victorious under Alexander III (1891–1894), a real reign of terror began; in 1881 to 1882 a series of bloody pogroms broke out, which were followed by oppressive anti-Jewish measures.

Anti-Semitism. After the emancipation, opposition against the Jews adopted a new shape: modern anti-Semitism that aimed at forcing the Jews out of the positions they already had achieved and preventing them from making further progress in social life. This anti-Semitism was strongly promoted by the fact that many Jews, in making good use of the opportunities offered by liberalism and the nascent Industrial Revolution, had won for themselves leading positions in economic life.

In Germany the soul of the movement was the Protestant minister Adolf Stöcker (1835–1909), who was appointed court preacher in Berlin (1878). In Austria Canon Rohling (1839–1931), a theology professor of Prague, zealously propagated anti-Semitism by his writings. Karl Lueger (1844–1910), who later became mayor of Vienna, founded the Christian Socialist party, which made anti-Semitism a part of its program, while, in the Greater-Germany Camp, Georg von Schönerer (1842–1921) was the exponent of his party's anti-Semitic principles. In France the journalist Édouard Drumont (1844–1917) was the mouthpiece of the anti-Semites whose agitation led to the DREYFUS AFFAIR. This led the Jews, in turn, to reflect on the hazardous nature of their equality and to stand a sponsor of Zionism in the person of the Viennese journalist Theodor Herzl (1860–1904).

In America. The pogroms in Russia, the anti-Semitic movements in the other countries, and the lack of possibility for economic progress produced, from 1880 on, the great wave of Jewish immigration, especially from Eastern Europe, to America. Here, since the eighteenth century, a Portuguese-Jewish community had already existed, and this had later been increased by other Jewish settlers, particularly from Germany. The Jewish population in America soon made its importance felt in the economic sphere and showed a remarkable growth in cultural life. In the field of Jewish science and religious reform, all the movements from Europe underwent further independent development in America, and in their variety have given American Judaism its characteristic features.

In Palestine. Under the influence of the Zionist movement and its forerunners, emigrants, at first from Russia, began to settle in Palestine. In its beginnings this emigration was strongly promoted by Baron Edmond de Rothschild (1845–1934). The great pogroms of 1903 in Kishinev and Homel again drove numerous refugees into all the countries that would receive them.

In the Muslim World. In Islamic countries the Jews remained for a long time within the framework of their traditional structure. The Damascus Affair of 1840, when the libel of ritual murder caused Jewish persecution, cast a glaring light on their real situation and called to their defense leading European Jews, such as Sir Moses Montefiore (1784–1885), the English philanthropist, and Adolphe Crémieux (1796–1880), cofounder of the Paris Alliance Israélite Universele. The French occupation of Algiers in 1830 changed the lot of the Jews in this country also. The Alliance instituted lively cultural activity, and in 1870 the Lex Crémieux granted Algerian Jews French citizenship. Likewise in Tunisia, when it was formed into a French protectorate in 1881, the Jews were given civil equality with the Muslims, though in Morocco they were not freed from their medieval ghettos until 1912, and then only partially. In Egypt the English Protectorate in 1882 prepared the way to the same development, but in other Arab countries, such as Yemen, the Jews still remained without civic rights.

World War I and Its Consequences. Again mainly the Russian Jews suffered the consequences of the war; they were herded from the border areas into the interior of the country on the pretext that they were conspiring with the enemy. Although the revolution of 1917 brought them freedom, the Jewish communities, especially in the Ukraine, were again sorely afflicted in the ensuing struggles between the Reds and the Whites.

In the countries newly established by the peace treaty of 1918 to 1919, the Jewish problem had to receive new solutions. An agreement for the protection of minorities was drawn up, and a committee of the League of Nations was entrusted with the execution of its stipulations. The largest number of Jews (almost three million) lived in the newly organized state of Poland, where they preserved, in spite of some tendencies toward assimilation, their individual character as a people with its own language (Yiddish) and its own cultural institutions. Thanks to this situation, the Ashkenazi Jews retained the traditional way of life longer in Poland than elsewhere. Polish Judaism thus formed a large reservoir of native Jewish forces. The equality granted to the Jews by the constitution in Poland, as well as in Romania and Hungary (Numerus clausus), was quite limited in practice, whereas Czechoslovakia, under President Tomáš Masaryk (1850–1937), presented a praiseworthy exception in this regard.

In Soviet Russia the Jews in particular suffered in the economic upheaval that the new regime brought with it, which necessitated a change to entirely new means of gaining a livelihood. The attempt to establish the Jewish autonomous region of Biro-Bidyan in the far-eastern part of the Soviet Union met with but little response. Yiddish culture was still flourishing to some extent in Russia during the first years after the revolution, until under Josef STALIN all genuinely Jewish life became impossible.

In Germany: The Beginning of the End. In the German Reich, where the Jews played a role during the political revolution of 1918, and where, in the Weimar Republic, the way was prepared for an organic symbiosis between the Jews and the non-Jewish population, anti-Semites again appeared on the scene. In 1922 the Jewish minister of foreign affairs, Walter Rathenau (1867–1922), fell a victim to their machinations, and in 1923 Adolf Hitler managed the first Putsch in Munich, assisted by the anti-Semites of General Erich Ludendorff's Old Guard. Hitler's book Mein Kampf, which incorporated and systematized all the old anti-Semitic theories and slogans, became the modern bible of anti-Semitism, and when Hitler came to power in 1933 as the leader of his NSDAP (German National Socialist Labor party), the stage was set for the greatest catastrophe in the history of the Jewish people; six million people were its victims solely because they were Jews. It will take Judaism a long time to recover from this enormous massacre, but its inner power is unbroken, and the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948 has given a new proof of its vitality.

VII. CONTEMPORARY HISTORY (1948–2009)

The Jewish state of Israel emerged despite the response of Arab nations and the Palestinian Arabs who settled there after the British mandate. The latter invaded the Jewish territories of Palestine, especially the road leading to Jerusalem half a year prior to the end of the British mandate. Until then the holy city of Jerusalem had been continuously inhabited by the Jews over the centuries. Since the Biblical era when two temples were built, from the days of Solomon to the time of Jesus, they lived there as the center of the world of Jewry. Archaeological discoveries attest to their presence in the land of Israel. Following the Bar Kokhba defeat by Hadrian in AD 135, the Roman emperor renamed the land Palestine. Jerusalem was now called Aelia Capitolina, a pagan name; Hadrian forbade the Jews to enter the area under penalty of death. This is why the early Jewish-Christians, who were circumcised, were totally removed from Jerusalem, and the center of Christianity shifted to Rome. This is also why MUḤAMMAD in the QUR'ĀN never mentions the name of Jerusalem, for in the early Islamic period, the city was called Aelia, which is how Arabs referred to it. Over the centuries the Jews continued to live there as pilgrims, called the mourners of Zion.

Toward Israeli Independence. Prior to WORLD WAR I, during the last century of the Turkish rule of Palestine, the Jews were the majority in Jerusalem. They lived in poverty with charitable support from world Jewry. They even extended their settlement in Jerusalem outside the walls, after the visit of Sir Moses Montefiori. The British had already promised the land of Palestine as the Jewish homeland after World War I. On November 2, 1917, the foreign secretary, Lord Arthur Balfour (1848–1930), issued a declaration in the form of a letter to Lord Rothschild. "His majesty's government views with favor the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people" (Laqueur and Rubin 1984, p. 182). This statement gratefully acknowledged the support of chemist and first President of the State of Israel, Chaim Weizmann's (1874–1952) scientific contribution, namely the discovery of how to produce acetone through bacterial fermentation, to the British victory in World War I as well as to the NILI group headed by the Aharonson family in Atlit of Palestine that led to General Edmund ALLENBY's triumphant march to Jerusalem. The Jewry's active role during the war also liberated their promised land from severe Turkish rule.

The British reneged on the mandate, however, especially in their action prior to WORLD WAR II with closing the gate to Jewish immigration from Europe to Palestine, the promised homeland. At that time European Jewry was facing annihilation by the Nazi anti-Semitic agenda. The British instead were responding to the Palestinian Arabs' riots and not to the Jews who were seeking safety in their ancient land. Moreover, the Mufti of Jerusalem, as the Palestinian Arab leader, joined Adolf Hitler in promoting the "final solution" of Jewry in Europe. In contrast, thousands of Jewish adults of Palestine joined the British forces in Egypt to stop German general Erwin Rommel's (1891–1944) advance to Alexandria. It is ironic that during the British mandate the Jewish governor of Palestine, Sir Herbert Samuel (1870–1963), invited the Mufti to become the religious representative of the recently increasing Arab population as a gesture of fairness, for the Jewish inhabitants had already had their two rabbinic representatives over the years since the Turkish period. It is also ironic that this covenant by the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) was formulated prior to the Six Days War (June 5–10, 1967), when all the territories of Judea and Samaria, including the Old City of Jerusalem, were in Jordanian hands. The PLO's basic approach to the Jewish State in these propositions clearly deny any Jewish historical claim to the land and, moreover, to the Temple Mount (see Y. Harkabi, The Palestinian Covenant and Its Meaning).

The brazen act of war against the Jewish inhabitants was the Arab world's response to the United Nations (UN), half a year after the attack on the road to Jerusalem that isolated this city to the point of starvation. The Israeli response was to breach their siege by sending armed caravans of men and supplies to the holy city from Tel Aviv. In the latter city, Israel declared its independence on Friday, May 14, 1948. This state was immediately recognized by the Biblically oriented countries of the United States and Great Britain as well as the U.S.S.R.. In response, the armies of seven Arab countries invaded the newborn State of Israel and called to Arabs in Palestine to evacuate to safe territories of Lebanon and Jordan. The Jewish State, highly organized and disciplined, was able to hold their territories with given adjustments. The only unfortunate loss was their Old City Jerusalem with its Temple site and the neighboring old Jewish quarter that was forced to evacuate. This Old City during the Jordanian occupation was hermetically closed to Jews in violation of the UN agreement; in addition, their quarter with their ancient synagogues was totally destroyed.

Early Period of the State. After this war of independence, the Jewish state absorbed more than a million Jews who fled from Arab countries as they faced death threats, along with thousands of Jews who survived the HOLOCAUST (SHOAH) in European countries under Nazi control. The British held back the latter in Cyprus after World War II, but they allowed Arabs to enter Palestine. At that time the British were officially training Jordanian forces. As for the Palestinian refugees, the Arab countries kept them in separate camps, so the UN would assume responsibility for their lives. Israel was isolated in the UN as a pariah state and, moreover, in November 1975 the UN adopted a resolution labeling Israel a racist state. To the amazement of fair-minded representatives, this act clearly showed the bias that the Arab world has against the Jews, who were targeted as Semites by Nazi racism. Thereby, the Arabs sought to deny the Holocaust.

In light of this attitude, the plight of Arab refugees can be seen as a political ploy to cast an immoral shadow on the Jewish State, the only democratic entity in the Middle East. The Jewish State grants their Arab citizens full freedom and rights, in contrast to the Arab states in the area. At this point the UN assumed responsibility for the life of the Arab refugees, who lived in separate camps, where they were exposed to anti-Semitic propaganda, whereas Israel at the same time absorbed all Jewish refugees who came from Europe and fled from North Africa and Arab countries. The tiny state even absorbed Falashi Jews from Ethiopia and Yemenite Jewry from Arabia. Israel also settled Bedouin Arabs in the Negev and gave refuge even to non-Jews persecuted in dictatorial regimes. This positive attitude toward humanity and freedom enabled the melting pot to build the land and to enter the new age of technology, science, and medicine. The State of Israel adopted a democratic orientation: guaranteeing human freedom for all citizens, respecting varied religious expressions, and accepting women as equals.

During the early period of the State, from 1950, Palestine terrorist groups (the Fedayeen) began systematic raids into Israel. The Egyptian government supervised the formal establishment of these groups in Gaza Strip and northeastern Sinai. Local Jordanian-Palestinian Fedayeen were also active, operating from the West Bank. Thus, the Israeli response was a series of raids against terrorist targets. When Egypt blockaded the gulfs of Suez and Aqaba, sealing the only port, Eilat, at the southern end of Israel, the Jewish State regarded it as a definite act of war. Israel launched a full-scale military attack into Sinai on October 29, 1956. At the same time Britain and France, in response to the nationalization of the Suez Canal, attacked in Port Said. Israel reached the Suez Canal from the East, demonstrating their superiority in the air and on the land. This action, however, came to a halt after the United States and the USSR intervened at the UN. Israel retreated to its border, and Gamal Abdel Nasser (1918–1970), the head of the Egyptian government, aligned himself with the Soviet Union, seeking political alliance and modern weaponry. His anger and hatred was directed mainly toward Israel with a promise of total war.

Formation of the PLO. Nasser placed Israel in a pincer-move by linking his country with Syria under his presidency in 1958; Yemen also joined this federation. Furthermore, he deviated the waters of Jordan from its sources in Syria and Lebanon. At the same time the Palestinian Arabs organized themselves as the PLO, whose main purpose was to liquidate the Jewish State, as detailed in their covenant. The PLO and Arab countries dismissed the Biblical witness to the historical Israel and its continued Jewish life there.

The Islamic perspective is that the world is partitioned by two areas, Dar el Salam and Dar el Harb. The former is defined by the global belt from Morocco to Indonesia that is Islamic under the rule of peace (Salam). The latter determines the global areas under the sword (Harb). This jihadistic view of Islam allowed deception, terrorism, and war against their enemies. Thus Nasser called the Arab nations under his rule to launch war on the State of Israel as a holy act. According to him and Arab leaders, the Holy Mount and the walled city of Jerusalem are Islamic entities. Yet, Jerusalem is never mentioned in the Qur'ān; instead the Suras refer to the two sacred cities in Arabia, MECCA and MEDINA. Thus, Jordan, which then controlled the Old City of Jerusalem, also joined Nasser in declaring a total war on Israel, and Nasser marched his troops to the border of Israel in the Negev.

Six Days War. The Jewish State realized it was facing a war of annihilation, and its leaders sought a diplomatic solution from their allies and the UN, to no avail. At the same time they prepared themselves for a final conflict. On June 1, 1967, the Jewish State was led by a united government of all parties under the premier Levi Eshkol (1895–1969) and Moshe Dayan (1915–1981) as the Minister of Defense. On June 5, 1967, the Israeli air force attacked all bases in Egypt, Jordan, and Syria, which opened the Six Days War. Nasser issued false reports to Arab countries, while Israeli tanks swiftly entered the entire Sinai. Then the Jewish soldiers moved into the eastern part of Palestine as well as into the Old City of Jerusalem. On the last days they also captured the Golan Heights, which overlooked the Jewish settlements around the Sea of Galilee. From there, the Galilean Jews had been under constant fire from above.

This, indeed, was an overwhelming victory in less than a week that allowed Jews, for the first time since the state had been declared, to enter the Old City of Jerusalem. Jews continuously visited their Temple Mount, but mainly they gathered below at the Western Wall, because the rabbinic view of the Biblical teaching concerning the Temple does not allow anyone to visit the Temple Mount in a state of impurity. Thus, Dayan offered the keys of the Temple Mount to the Islamic council (the Waqf) for entry to the mosques. This kind gesture was eventually translated into the right of possession. The Waqf eventually destroyed all preserved structures of the Jewish Temple. At the same time they protested against archeological inspection, even though nearby the Israel archaeologists found a great number of materials with inscriptions dating from both temples. Jews continue to visit the Temple site, but they are not permitted to pray there. They gather in thousands for prayer at the Western Wall (the Kotel) below, even placing prayer notes in the crevices of the stones. Their victory in returning to the Old City of Jerusalem, despite the ruins of the Jewish quarter, was celebrated throughout the world of Jewry. Jews saw this unique event as providential concern for their safety after the Holocaust.

Orthodox and Liberal Judaism. A religious revival of Orthodox Judaism emerged in the United States as well as in Israel with the establishment of great Talmudic centers and the Orthodox mission of the Chabad movement throughout the civilized world of Jewish people. In the United States two religious expressions of liberal Judaism emerged. In the past the Conservative and the Reform had followings in the millions prior to World War II. In Europe, however, the Jewish people in the east, such as in Poland and Lithuania, remained orthodox with Hasidic and Talmudic centers, despite the increase of Jews who embraced the Communist orientation in Russia.

In Western Europe, however, a liberal expression of reformed Judaism that emerged in the nineteenth century spread to America. This development gave rise later to a marked deviation from classical Judaism. For example, the Reform movement allowed for either parent to determine the religious orientation of a child. Thereby, a number of congregants—those from the Jewish father only—cannot be considered Jewish from the Orthodox halakhic view. Similarly, the Conservative movement gave rise to Mordecai Kaplan's (1881–1983) determination of Judaism from a Reconstructionist view that Judaism represents a civilization and not theology. In addition to these deviations, the door to assimilation was opened to great numbers of nonpracticing Jews in the United States and Europe. Thus, following the miracle of the Six Days War, a significant number of Jews returned to practicing their faith.

There was a marked growth of Jews who sought different Hasidic communities, Orthodox Yeshivot, and academic centers of Torah and knowledge, such as Yeshiva University in New York City. Israel, too, enjoyed the increase of Orthodox institutions, along with highly successful academic centers that excel in the field of science, medicine, and mathematics, for the Jewish world was elated by the miraculous outcome of the war, from despair to total victory. The Arab countries, however, gathered at Khartoum to declare a triadic protest: "no recognition of Israel, no negotiations and no peace" (Summer 1967) (Laqueur and Rubin 1984, p. 359). Yet, Israel constantly was seeking to negotiate a peace settlement with all its neighbors, including those who did not recognize its existence as a state.

Changes in Arab-Israeli Relations. Significantly, the Six Days War opened a new chapter in Arab-Israel relations that eventually led to the peace process with two of her neighbors. It was surprising that the one who pursued this path was Menachem Begin (1913–1992), the ultra nationalist who followed Vladimir Jabotinsky's (1880–1940) view of the Greater Israel at the two banks of Jordan river (archaeologically, both sides were occupied by Jews in the past during both Temple periods). It took also a nationalist president Anwar el-Sadat (1918–1981) of Egypt to change his approach from war, which he sought in 1972–1973, against Israel. At a rally in Alexandria on May 1, 1972, he declared, "I am ready to pay one million men as the prize for their battle, as long as they be ready to pay a million men or more on their side" (Gilbert 2008). Such action he sought with Syrian President Hafiz al-Assad (1930–2000) on Saturday, October 6, 1973, when both Arab countries launched a concerted military attack on Israel from the north and the south. The day that they chose for the attack was the holiest day for Judaism, the Day of ATONEMENT. Thus, in Hebrew this Arabic confrontation is called the Yom Kippur War; it challenged also the spirit of Israel. Many who rushed from their synagogues on this holiest day of the year were enlisted soldiers, fasting with their prayer shawls (taliot) on.

It is ironic that, in the Qur'ān, Muḥammad changed the Day of Atonement (Asur), which he originally adopted at Mecca, for the pillar of Fasting (Saum) during the month of Ramadan (Sura 2:185). The former influence of Jewish praxis on the Islamic prophet was revoked, and thus the Islamic world wanted to provoke the Israeli prime minister, who at that time was Golda Meir (1898–1978). She declared: "We have no joy in killing others but our people are small in number who are surrounded by enemies, decided to live. Even when we have to pay the price of living. We shall win because we must live despite that we hate war" (Gilbert 2008). Jewish religion does not promote war as a pillar of faith but can seek to prevent homicide, for saving one life is saving the whole world (Mishnah Sanhedrin 4:5). Muḥammad knew this view, as it is recorded in the Qur'ān (Sura 5:35–38). Jews during the war must regard the life of others; thus, Israel distributed welfare food for thousands of Arabs in the Gaza Strip and to the Bedouins in Rafah. In addition they distributed two thousand packages in honor of the Muslim holy fast month of Ramadan.

At the outset, the fronts saw many casualties among the Jewish soldiers, yet after a week (October 14), the Israel army was able to push back the Syrians in the north and the Egyptians toward the Suez Canal in the south. The latter Israeli offensive was a brilliant move by General Ariel Sharon (1928–) that crossed the Suez Canal to the Western Bank. Egypt now faced military collapse, so the great power demanded a ceasefire. This operation led eventually to Sadat seeking peace with Israel at its Jerusalem parliament on November 19, 1979. Israel eventually retreated totally from Egypt, the Sinai, and the border of Gaza. Egyptian president Hosni Mubarak (1928–), following the killing of Sadat by Egyptian terrorists, continued to support said agreement.

Among the Arab countries, only Egypt and Jordan enjoy a peaceful coexistence with the State of Israel. Syria and Lebanon in the north, with the Gaza Strip on the west facing Israel, however, harbor Islamic terrorist organizations—Hezbollah and Hamas, respectively. These organizations declared openly their goal of destroying Israel with missiles, local infiltration, and kidnapping Jewish soldiers. Thus, in the northern border, two wars with Lebanon emerged, the first from June 6 to August 21, 1982, and the second from July 12 to August 13, 2006.

The first confrontation was in response to constant shelling of northern Israel; thus, its operation was named Peace for Galilee. When Israeli forces reached Beirut, the Christian Lebanese Phalangist forces, in response to the Islamic killing of Christians during the Lebanese civil war that began in 1976, utilized the opportunity to enter the western section of Beirut. There they massacred Islamic men, women, and children at Sabra and Shattila refugee camps as Israeli forces remained at the border of the city. The entire world blamed the Jews for this massacre; however, the Kahan report (February 8, 1983) concluded that no Israeli element intended to harm the non-combatant population in the camps. Yet, the Islamic media viewed the event as instigated by Israel, thereby triggering anti-Israel propaganda in the world. The Islamic confrontation with the Jewish State utilized the media to fan anti-Semitic sentiment with false reports and fabricated stories of injustice. Following the Israeli full retreat from Lebanon, a civil war flared between Christians and Muslims that resulted in Syria occupying Lebanon.

The Christian Lebanese, mainly in the south, sought to relocate to other countries, especially in Canada and the United States. The southern area where Palestinian refugees lived gave rise to terrorist control by Hezbollah, the Party of God. Eventually, their leader Sheik Hasan Nasrallah (1960–) openly attacked northern Israel with Katyusha rockets from southern Lebanon on July 12, 2006. More than a thousand rockets were fired into Israel, resulting in civilian casualties. Israel responded with air strikes, and their troops marched across the border until August 13. The United Nations sought a ceasefire as the Secretary-General Kofi Annan (1938–) sought to blame the Israelis' use of cluster bombs against Lebanese. The UN isolated Israel as a member state and, moreover, kept Arab refugees in camps throughout the period of Israel's existence, which generated anti-Israel sentiment. The Israeli operation resulted, however, in a border that remained silent, without missile attacks on Israeli towns.

Israelis also inhabited the Gaza Strip, where they established towns as well as centers for growing non-infected vegetables, which became an industry generating millions of dollars. However, the conservative war hero Ariel Sharon, as prime minister, decided as a gesture of good will to the Palestinians to move them from their camps into the built-up area after a total disengagement of Israeli families and soldiers. Reluctant Jewish settlers were all evacuated in August 2005. This act was praised by the world but not by the terrorist Hamas party, who sought to take over the entire Gaza Strip, declaring death to the Jewish State. They used the evacuated areas to bring in their warriors and missiles (Kassamim) to be launched daily against the neighboring Israeli towns, in particular, Sderot. Now, Israel's border was under siege with daily bombardment from the Gaza Strip; such a development gave rise to two military responses, one following the evacuation of September 26, 2005, and the other beginning on December 27, 2008, and ending on January 21, 2009, following three years of continuous missile attack. The latter operation, called Cast Lead, coordinated forces of air and land in this engagement to attack the Hamas warriors who used the UN buildings, Palestinian homes, and mosques as their shelter. Following the Israeli military response, the UN and European countries blamed Israel and gave millions of dollars for the restoration of Gaza. At the same time Hamas leaders worked in concert with Iran, the Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad (1956–) sought nuclear weaponry. The latter declared publicly his hatred for Israel, saying it should be wiped off the earth, an anti-Semitic approach reminiscent of Hitler.

History of the Term Anti-Semitism. The term anti-Semitism was coined in Germany by Wilhelm Marr in his 1897 book, Victory over Judaism. It came to describe only the racial hatred of Jews as Semites, but was not used for Arabs, who come from Shem in the Biblical story of NOAH's descendants. Such was the depiction as well in Hitler's work Mein Kampf, while he befriended the Arab Mufti of Jerusalem. The Arab world still utilizes the fabricated conspiracy published as The Protocols of the Elders of Zion. This very agenda was offered by the Nazis to justify their action against the Jews. This item as well as other anti-Semitic writings are offered to the Arab public daily. Israel is a pariah state in Islamic writings that support Palestinian parties' refusal to recognize the Jewish state. Moreover they raised children as God's warriors and offered money to compensate for their jihadistic death.

Christian-Jewish Relations. In contrast, Biblically oriented people of Christianity view Israel in the context of messianic times. The birth of the Jewish state after World War II emerged out of the ashes of the European Holocaust. The Church acknowledges that this genocide was an evil act inflicted on the Jewish people. The Catholic response as an act of repentance seeks to remove all negative statements toward the Jews in Church preaching and writings. The formal declaration of the Second Vatican Council, promulgated by Pope PAUL VI on October 28, 1965, known by the title, Nostra aetate (In Our Age), contains the Church's extended reflection on the Jewish people. It emerged from the decision by the righteous Pope JOHN XXIII, who in remorse sought to depart from the way the Church had related to the Jews since the days of Constantine. The Biblical paradigm Jewry used over the centuries was the conflict between the twin brothers Esau as Edom (i.e., Rome) vs. Jacob as Israel. This rivalry reflected the historical conflict between the Church and the Jews.

A shift of the paradigm occurred when the rabbinic delegation met Pope John XXIII, whose baptismal name was Joseph. He addressed them in Hebrew with the Biblical greeting of Joseph in Egypt to his brothers: "I am your brother Joseph" (Gen 45:4). Joseph acknowledged the elder brother Yehudah as the head of the delegation. Yehudah in Hebrew describes the Jews (Yehudi). This new paradigm governs the relationship of the Church to Judaism, for it seeks to remove all negative views of Judaism in Catholic educational material as well as through Church preaching. Furthermore, the mission statement rejected forcible conversion of Jews, as it respected the elder brother's faith. During the pontificate of Pope JOHN PAUL II, who personally knew the fate of Jewry in the Nazi period, the VATICAN established formal relations with Israel. Thus, the Biblically oriented religions of Judaism and Christianity jointly promoted the act of repentance and forgiveness along with respectful concern of human life. Violence and terrorism, lying, or killing in God's name are antithetical to Biblical religion. Thus, the Catholic Church opposes active proselytization among the Jews and encourages the removal of all negative statements against the Jews in Church preaching and teaching.

In light of this development, Pope BENEDICT XVI welcomed a delegation of representatives from various religions at the POPE JOHN PAUL II CULTURAL CENTER in Washington, D.C., on Thursday, April 17, 2008. For the Jewish delegation this occurred three days before Passover. The pope addressed them in the public hall as the elder brothers. He asked them to meet with him privately in another room, as witnessed by this writer.

The following day before Passover he joined Rabbi Schneier at his Park East synagogue in Manhattan. After all, Judaism and Christianity are bonded with the Passover celebration as the day of their freedom under God, the heavenly Father.

JOSÉ APARICIO SANZ AND 232 COMPANIONS, MARTYRS OF THE SPANISH CIVIL WAR, BB.

Also called Martyrs of Valencia; priests, religious, and laity; d. Valencia, Spain, 1936–1938; beatified March 11, 2001, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

José Aparicio Sanz and 232 companions, martyrs of the Spanish Civil War, were raised to the glory of the altars for their heroic deaths for the Faith during their homeland's civil war. Soon after the approval of the Spanish constitution in December 1931, Republicans, who saw the Church as a privileged part of the old regime, ordered schools to remove all religious symbols, forbade religious instruction, and disbanded the Society of Jesus. Over the next few years, mobs led by anarchists defaced religious images and looted churches. Hundreds of churches were torched or demolished. The execution of Catholics began around 1932, but did not reach its peak until the military insurrection of July 18, 1936, which began the Spanish Civil War.

From the beginning of the war until 1937, the death toll for Catholics clergy reached 6,832. The red terror, as it was called, executed 13 bishops, 4,172 diocesan priests, 2,364 male religious, and 283 nuns. The number of laity murdered has never been accurately counted; combined clergy and laity deaths may have totaled more than 10,000. In just a few years, Valencia lost 327 diocesan priests, or 27 percent of its clergy. Among them were the 41 priests, who were honored on March 11, 2001, along with 150 religious, and 42 laity, 38 of whom were members of CATHOLIC ACTION. These martyrs ranged in age from twenty-one to eighty-three. The oldest, María Teresa Ferragud Roig, insisted on dying with her daughters and asked to be shot last so she could encourage them to remain faithful as they died. When her executioners asked if she was afraid to die, she replied that all her life she wanted to do something for Jesus. She left behind a powerful testimony; even her executioners called her a saint.

The first of the 233 martyrs was also the youngest. Twenty-one-year-old Javier Bordas Piferrer (Xavier Piferer Bordas, [1914–1936]) was shot July 23, 1936, after authorities reviewing his documents determined he was a Catholic. A philosophy student at the GREGORIAN UNIVERSITY, he had taken his vows in 1932 and was in Spain visiting his family. The last of the 233 blesseds to be executed was Julio Junyer Padern (1892–1938), a Salesian priest, shot in the pits of Montjuïe on April 26, 1938. Before his death, Fr. Junyer had ministered to many religious displaced by the war. He was captured and convicted of espionage. In the fortress where he was imprisoned prior to his death, he continued to perform his priestly duties as he blessed the marriage of a couple condemned alongside him.

Fr. José Aparicio Sanz, under whose name the group is listed, was an ARCHPRIEST in Enguera, Spain. He was arrested and imprisoned on October 5, 1936, along with fourteen other diocesan priests. On December 29, 1936, Fr. Aparicio and about thirty others were executed in Picadero de Paterna. Of the 233 martyrs listed, many were from his archdiocese.

Pope John Paul II beatified these martyrs on March 11, 2001, as the first fruits of the third millennium. The celebration of their martyrdom was the first BEATIFICATION to follow the JUBILEE YEAR of 2000, a fitting tribute for the celebration of the spiritual fervor of their faith. In his homily, the pope stressed the transfiguration of the body that occurs in heaven, but he reminded the audience that, though this change happens later, the martyrs also demonstrated another transfiguration—that of the heart through grace.

The following list comprises sixteen different causes, and all martyrs are from Spain, unless otherwise noted.

JOSEPH TÀPIES AND SIX COMPANIONS, BB.

Also known as Josep Tàpies Sirvant or Josep Tàpies i Sirvant and six companions from the diocesan clergy of Urgell; priests, martyrs d. Salàs de Pallars, Pallars Jussà, Lleida, Spain, August 13, 1936; beatified October 29, 2005, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

Joseph Tàpies and his six companions served as priests of the diocese of Urgell during the Spanish Civil War (1936–1939). The civil war, a clash between Nationalists, who wanted to restore traditional ways, and the Spanish Second Republic (Republicans), a coalition of various leftist factions that opposed the old regime, began with a military insurrection in July 18, 1936. After Rome indicated its support of the Nationalists, the attacks against Catholics intensified.

Over the course of the next year or so, almost seven thousand clergy died. Some clergy fled or went into hiding, but others determined to live their faith and continue their work publically. Such was the case with Fr. Joseph Tàpies, who continued to wear his clerical garb, though many religious disguised themselves in civilian clothes.

Born March 15, 1869, in Lleida, Spain, Fr. Joseph Tàpies had been ordained a priest in 1892. He served as parochial vicar and church organist in La Pobla de Segur and had a reputation as a pious priest who demonstrated charity. People sought his wise counsel and looked to him as an example. On the day he was arrested, he called out that he was going to heaven, and he encouraged the other priests as they faced the firing squad.

With him that day was Pasqual (Pascal) Araguàs Guàrdia (Pasqual Araguàs i Guàrdia), rector of Noals from 1929 to 1936, who insisted on walking barefoot to his execution, as did Jesus heading to his crucifixion. This action was a reflection of Fr. Pasqual's humble spirit and dedication to God. Born on May 17, 1899, in Lleida, Spain, he had been a priest only six years when he entrusted his soul to God for eternity.

Born on July 5, 1901, in Lleida, Spain, Pere (Peter) Martret Moles entered the Urgell seminary at age eleven and was appointed parish priest of Puigcerdà in 1925. He moved to various churches and became econome (financial manager) of La Pobla de Segur in 1930. He was known for his dynamic homilies and for his involvement in the Federation of Christian Youth of Catalonia, a division of CATHOLIC ACTION.

The youngest of the martyred priests, Silvestre Arnau Pasqüet, born May 30, 1911, in Barcelona, Spain, had recently turned twenty-five. He had begun his training at the Urgell seminary at age twelve, continued his studies at the Gregorian University, and was ordained in 1935. He spent eight months as curate in La Pobla de Segur before undergoing house arrest beginning July 23, 1936, where he remained until the day of his martyrdom.

Josep (Joseph) Boher Foix was born in Lleida, Spain, on November 2, 1887, and was ordained in 1914. Pious and intelligent, he served as coadjutor and econome in various parishes before being appointed parish priest of La Pobleta de Bellveí. He was arrested on August 13, 1936, and soldiers took him that morning, without a trial, to the cemetery where the seven were shot.

Born in Lleida, Spain, on July 31, 1876, Frances Castells Brunei (Francesco Castells Brenuy or Areny), graduated from the Gregorian University in Rome and became vicar of Areny. He served as prefect and professor of philosophy in the diocesan seminary, as well as priest of various parishes and as econome of the parish of El Poal. At age sixty, he endured physical and moral torture, but refused to denounce the faith. He was released, then rearrested and taken to the cemetery.

Josep Joan Perot Juanmartí (Joseph John Perot Juanmarti), born July 1, 1877, in Boulogne, France, moved to Spain when he was young and, like many of his fellow martyrs, studied at the Urgell seminary. After serving several parishes, he arrived at Sant Joan di Vinyafrescal, where he was known for his love toward his parishioners. Unafraid to die for Christ, he was waiting when the soldiers came for him.

All seven priests were shot on August 13, 1936, at the cemetery gates of Salàs de Pallars, Pallars Jussà, Lleida, Spain. Declared VENERABLE on April 19, 2004, by Pope JOHN PAUL II, they were beatified by Pope Benedict XVI on October 29, 2005. In his HOMILY, Cardinal José Saraiva Martins praised their humility, charity, and tireless defense of the GOSPEL. The seven martyrs provided a shining example of their faith and fidelity in the face of bloody persecution as they filed past the firing squad and called out together, "Long live Christ the King!"

JUGAN, JEANNE, ST.

Known in religion as Marie of the Cross, foundress of the Little Sisters of the Poor; b. October 25, 1792, Petites-Croix (near Cancale), Brittany, France; d. August 29, 1879, Pern, France; beatified October 3, 1982, by Pope JOHN PAUL II; canonized October 11, 2009, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

After her father, Joseph, died at sea when she was four, Jeanne Jugan's mother, Marie Horel, supported six children as a farm laborer and taught them the faith. At sixteen, Jeanne, the youngest child, began work as a kitchen maid for a charitable family, whose mistress took her on visits to the sick and poor. After attending a revival led by former JESUITS, Jugan joined the third order of the Heart of the Admirable Mother (founded by St. John EUDES). She also gave away her meager possessions and began working at the Hospital of Le Rosais in Saint-Servan. After six years of exhausting work, she returned to domestic service, working for a Madame Lecoq, who upon death in 1835 left to Jeanne her entire net worth of 600 francs.

Renting a flat with two devout women, Françoise Aubert and Virginie Tredaniel, Jeanne took in her first poor elderly woman, Anne Chauvin, in 1839. Many other patients, whom she called "good women," soon followed. Jeanne and her friends were joined by the nineteen-year-old Marie Jamet, and the four began following their own rule based closely on that of the Eudist third order. Their ministry to the aged eventually moved to a former convent of the DAUGHTERS OF THE CROSS, thanks to the generosity of a benefactor. By 1842 Jeanne was elected the first superior of the new order, and the women built a strong relationship with the Hospitaller Brothers of St. John of God. They made begging for the poor a trademark of their ministry, adopting the motto, "We will ring in God's name," and they took additional vows of poverty and hospitality.

Jeanne's travels to raise funds for the elderly poor began to garner the attention of the press across Europe. In one article, Charles Dickens wrote: "There is in this woman something so calm, and so holy, that in seeing her I know myself to be in the presence of a superior being. Her words went straight to my heart, so that my eyes, I know not how, filled with tears." Her subsequent fame (and a petition from the people of Saint-Servan) resulted in her receiving the prestigious Montyon Award from the French Academy. Although Jugan was reelected superior (on December 8, 1843), she was suddenly replaced (on December 23, 1843) by twenty-three-year-old Marie Jamet through the action of their confessor, the Abbé Le Pailleur.

During the late 1840s and early 1850s the order grew exponentially, opening houses in Rennes, Dinan, Tours, Angers, and Paris. While the congregation was officially recognized by the Diocese of Rennes in 1852, Fr. Le Pailleur had authored its constitution, making himself its father superior general. As one of his first acts, he sent Jeanne permanently to the motherhouse near Rennes, where she remained for the remaining twenty-seven years of her life without an active role in the growth of the community. The only exception was when she was summoned to the Little Sisters' general council in 1865, where she urged the order not to accept donations of stocks and other annuities but instead to maintain its begging vocation. While the Little Sisters received Pope LEO XIII's approval of their constitutions on March 1, 1879, it was not until 1893 that Jugan was recognized as the founder of the congregation. This recognition was the result of an investigation which revealed that Le Pailleur had purposely hidden the true origins of the Little Sisters so that he would be credited as its primary founder. On her deathbed, Marie Jamet admitted that she had been ordered by Fr. Le Pailleur to lie about Jeanne Jugan's originating role.

St. Jeanne Jugan is attributed with the cure of Dr. Edward Gatz, a retired anesthetist from Omaha, Nebraska. After being diagnosed with cancer of the esophagus in January 1989, Gatz was advised to undergo chemotherapy and radiation, but he refused these treatments. His wife spoke with a priest, Fr. Richard D. McGloin, S.J., who encouraged her to pray the novena prayer of Blessed Jeanne Jugan, which he had learned while serving as chaplain of the Little Sisters of the Poor's home in Milwaukee, Wisconsin. A biopsy which took place on March 8, 1989, discovered no sign of the tumor.

At her canonization, Benedict XVI stated:

> Jeanne Jugan was concerned with the dignity of her brothers and sister in humanity whom age had made vulnerable, recognizing in them the person of Christ Himself. "Look at the poor with compassion," she would say, "and Jesus will look at you with goodness on your last day." … The evangelical impulse is followed today throughout the world in the Congregation of the Little Sisters of the Poor, which she founded and which bears witness to her following the mercy of God and the compassionate love of the Heart of Jesus for the littlest ones. May Saint Jeanne Jugan be for the elderly a living source of hope and for the persons so generously placing themselves at their service a powerful stimulus to pursue and develop her work!

JUSTIFICATION, JOINT DECLARATION ON

The Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification (JDDJ) is an ecumenical agreement between the Catholic Church and the churches of the Lutheran World Federation (LWF). It was ratified in 1999 and affirms that a consensus exists between the churches on Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification. Bishop Dr. Christian Krause and Edward Idris Cardinal Cassidy signing the Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification (JDDJ). THE LUTHERAN WORLD.

"basic truths of the doctrine of justification," and that the doctrinal condemnations contained in the documents of each church do not apply to the understanding of JUSTIFICATION presented in the JDDJ.

Origin and Development. Lutheran-Catholic dialogues in the decades prior to the JDDJ repeatedly affirmed a consensus on the doctrine of justification. The Gospel and the Church, a report released by the international Joint Lutheran–Roman Catholic Study Commission in 1972, affirmed that "a far-reaching consensus is developing in the interpretation of justification" (§26), but it did not elaborate the content of that consensus. More detail was provided in the U.S. Lutheran-Catholic Dialogue report Justification by Faith (1983), which concluded that "a fundamental consensus on the gospel" had been achieved (§164). A German dialogue between representatives of the EVANGELICAL CHURCH IN GERMANY (including Lutheran, Reformed, and United churches) and the German Bishops' Conference of the Catholic Church, published as Condemnations of the Reformation Era: Do They Still Divide? (1986), argued that each church's condemnations relating to justification need no longer apply to the other churches in a way that would divide them.

Dialogue reports, however, carry no formal authority. In 1993 the Catholic Church and the LWF began a process to test the results of the dialogues and, if possible, officially affirm their conclusions. Four successive drafts of an agreed declaration were prepared between 1994 and 1997. (All drafts were composed in German, and German was the original language of the JDDJ.) These were reviewed by Catholic and Lutheran authorities and revised on the basis of their comments. Among the drafters were Theo Dieter, Harding Meyer (both of the Institute for Ecumenical Research, Strasbourg, France), and Eero Huovinen (Lutheran Bishop of Helsinki, Finland) for the Lutherans; and Paul-Werner Scheele (Bishop of Würzburg, Germany), Lothar Ullrich (University of Erfurt, Germany), and Jared Wicks (GREGORIAN UNIVERSITY, Rome) for the Catholics. The final draft was submitted for approval to the Vatican and the member churches of the LWF in January 1997.

In June 1998 the Council of the LWF affirmed the JDDJ on the basis of positive responses by eighty-one Lutheran churches, representing 84 percent of the Lutherans in the LWF. The response from the Catholic Church, however, raised concerns about the JDDJ. Over the following year, an Annex to the JDDJ was produced that met these concerns. An Official Common Statement affirming the JDDJ "in its entirety" was signed by representatives of the Catholic and Lutheran churches in Augsburg, Germany, on October 31, 1999.

Content of the Declaration After a brief introduction, the JDDJ is divided into five major sections, which are further divided into forty-four numbered paragraphs. The first section develops the biblical background of the agreement, while the second briefly describes justification as an ecumenical problem. The third and fourth sections are the JDDJ's heart. The third section elaborates the shared understanding of justification, summarized in the common confession: "By grace alone, in faith in Christ's saving work and not because of any merit on our part, we are accepted by God and receive the Holy Spirit, who renews our hearts while equipping and calling us to good works" (§3.15).

The fourth section relates this shared understanding to seven traditionally controversial issues: (1) sin and human cooperation with God's justifying act, (2) justification as forgiveness and renewal, (3) the place of FAITH in justification, (4) the justified as sinner (5) law and GOSPEL, (6) the assurance of SALVATION, and (7) the good works of the justified. For each topic, an agreed statement is followed by specific Lutheran and Catholic paragraphs which, while divergent, "do not destroy the consensus regarding the basic truths" (§5.40). The remaining differences "are no longer the occasion for doctrinal condemnations" (Preamble.5).

A final section highlights the significance and scope of the JDDJ. Most significantly, it states that "a consensus in basic truths of the doctrine of justification" exists (§5.40) and that therefore the relevant doctrinal condemnations from the sixteenth century do not apply to the understanding of justification contained in the JDDJ (§5.41). Further paragraphs add, however, that "questions of varying importance still need further clarification" (§5.43). ECCLESIOLOGY, MINISTRY, and sacraments are explicitly mentioned as topics requiring further discussion.

Reception and Significance of the JDDJ. Prior to its ratification, debate over the JDDJ was most vigorous among Lutherans, particularly in Germany. A significant minority of Lutheran theology professors in Germany called for the text's rejection. The debate focused on whether the JDDJ adequately reflected the Lutheran understanding of justification as the interpretive key for understanding and judging all aspects of Christian thought and life. In the end, all but one of the regional German Lutheran churches affirmed the JDDJ. Worldwide, only two large Lutheran churches within the LWF (in Denmark and Madagascar) declined to affirm the JDDJ. The largest Lutheran church outside the LWF, the Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod (U.S.), was also sharply critical of the JDDJ.

Drafts of the JDDJ were not widely circulated in Catholic circles, and little public debate occurred among Catholics prior to the text's ratification. While Catholic criticisms of the agreement have been few, they have come from such prominent theologians as Cardinals Leo Scheffczyk (1920–2005) and Avery DULLES (1918–2008), who have questioned whether the text adequately reflects Catholic DOCTRINE (e.g., on the cooperation of the justified within justification itself, or on the meritorious status of good works). In 2006, the World Methodist Council, following discussions with the Vatican and the LWF, also affirmed the JDDJ.

JOHN PAUL II hailed the JDDJ as a major ecumenical breakthrough, and BENEDICT XVI has done so as well. While the JDDJ did not alter the state of division between Catholics and Lutherans, it did affirm an agreement on what, for many, was the most important issue of the Protestant REFORMATION. Subsequent dialogues between Catholics and Lutherans have used the JDDJ as a framework to seek further agreement.

JUSTO DE OLIVEIRA, LINDALVA, BL.

Virgin, MARTYR; b. October 20, 1953, Sitio Malhada da Areia, Brazil; d. April 9, 1993, São Salvador da Bahia, Brazil; beatified December 2, 2007, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

Blessed Lindalva Justo de Oliveira was born in Sitio Malhada da Areia, in the State of Rio Grande do Norte, Brazil. She was the sixth of thirteen children born to João Justo da Fé, a farmer and a widower, and Maria Lúcia de Oliveria, his second wife. Soon after Blessed Lindalva's birth, the family moved from their home to Açu, where she was baptized on January 7, 1954.

After receiving a diploma as an administrative assistant from Helvécio Dahe High School in Natal, she worked a variety of jobs in the city, sending a portion of her salary home to help her family. After each full day's work she took the time to visit the elderly, and she returned home in the late hours to read Sacred Scripture or to play the guitar.

Following a period of inner reflection upon the death of her father, Blessed Lindalva began helping with the vocational initiatives of the Daughters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul in 1986, which were geared toward attracting young vocations. Scarcely a year later, on September 13, 1987, she herself requested admission to their postulancy. She entered religious formation on February 11, 1988.

After her formation, Blessed Lindalva was assigned to Abrigo Dom Pedro II, a home for poor, abandoned, elderly men in São Salvador da Bahia. In January 1993, one of the men at the home, Augusto da Silva Peixoto, made repeated sexual advances toward her, which she resisted firmly. After referring the matter to her superiors, she chose nevertheless to remain at the home out of love for those whom she served. On April 9, 1993, GOOD FRIDAY, after taking part in a parish Way of the Cross, Blessed Lindalva returned to the home to serve breakfast. Peixoto, citing her rejection of him, approached and stabbed her forty-four times with a fishmonger's knife. He then turned himself in to the authorities.

At Blessed Lindalva's funeral the next day, Lucas Cardinal Moreira Neves, O.P., Primate of Brazil, referred to her death as a martyrdom. This judgment was confirmed by a decree on her martyrdom, promulgated December 16, 2006. She was beatified by Pope Benedict XVI on December 2, 2007. José Cardinal Saraiva Martins celebrated the rite of BEATIFICATION at Do Barradão Stadium in São Salvador. At his homily, Cardinal Saraiva Martins emphasized the particular value of Blessed Lindalva's joyful faithfulness to Christ, her commitment to the poor, and her witness to the young people of Brazil.

K

KASSAB, NIMATULLAH AL-HARDINI YOUSSEF, ST.

Baptized Youssef Girgis (Joseph George) Kassab, scholar, priest of the Maronite Rite; b. 1808, Hardine, Caza de Batroun, northern Lebanon; d. December 14, 1858, Kfifan Monastery, Lebanon; beatified by Pope JOHN PAUL II, May 10, 1998; and canonized by the same on May 16, 2004.

The third of seven children born to Girgis Kassab and Maryam Ra'ad, Youssef displayed a strong devotion to prayer and solitude from an nearly age. As a youth, he attended the monastery school of St. Anthony at Houb, where he studied Arabic, Syriac, and mathematics, and resided (and served Mass) with his maternal grandfather, Youssef Ra'ad, a Maronite priest. On November 1, 1828, he joined the Lebanese Maronite Order of Monks at St. Anthony at Kozhaya, where his brother Elisha, also a priest, served. It was there that Youssef took the name Nimatullah, which means "Grace from God." After a two-year novitiate, he made his profession at Kozhaya on November 14, 1830. Nimatullah soon began preparing for the priesthood at the Monastery of Sts. Cyprian and Justine in Kfifan. During his seminary studies, he suffered from exhaustion due to his strict adherence to ascetical practices and a fear of priestly responsibility, and he was ordered by his superiors to rest at the Monastery of St. Moussa Al-Habashi at Dawar. He later returned to Kfifan to complete his studies, and he graduated first in his class. After being ordained by Bishop Semaan Zouein on Christmas 1835, Nimatullah began teaching MORAL THEOLOGY at Kfifan and was appointed master of students in 1838. One of his students there was SHARBEL MAKLOUF, who was canonized by Pope PAUL VI on October 9, 1977. Nimatullah also served as assistant general of the Maronites for three terms (1845–1848, 1850–1853, and 1856–1858). Out of humility, he refused appointment to the office of superior general, although he was the recognized master of spirituality in the order.

Known as the "Saint of Kfifan," Nimatullah was renowned for his strict adherence to the Maronite monastic rule, his devotion to the Eucharist and the Blessed Mother, his constant examination of conscience, as well as his self-deprivation, fasting, and daily confession. Although his brother Elisha eventually retired to a hermitage, Nimatullah embraced the community of the monastery as a means of refining his own character by learning patience, understanding, and forgiveness through interaction with his brother monks. In addition to his teaching and administrative duties, Nimatullah also devoted his time to humbler tasks such as bookbinding, sewing monastic habits, and performing parish duties locally in Kfifan. His life of sacrifice resulted in his early death from pleurisy. St. Sharbel was among the brothers who attended his deathbed.

His cause for sainthood was accepted by the Vatican on June 13, 1966, and he was declared Venerable by John Paul II on September 7, 1989. Many miraculous cures have been attributed to pilgrimages to his tomb in Kfifan. The case of André Najem, who was completely cured of leukemia after visiting his grave, was accepted by the Congregation for the Causes of Saints on September 27, 1996, and was considered a documented miracle for Nimatullah's BEATIFICATION two years later. At his canonization, John Paul II remarked:

> A man of prayer, in love with the Eucharist which he adored for long periods, St. Nimatullah Kassab Al-Hardini is an example for the > monks of the Order of Lebanese Maronites as he is for his Lebanese brothers and sisters and all Christians of the world.... May his example enlighten our journey and bring forth, especially in young people, a true desire for God and for holiness to proclaim to our world the light of the Gospel!

Feast: December 14 (Maronites).

KAZIMIERCZYK, STANISŁAW YOUSEF, ST.

Augustinian canon regular of the Lateran of Corpus Christi; b. 1433 at Casimiria, near Kraków, Poland; d. there, May 3, 1489.

Stanislaw, son of Soltyn Matthias and Jadwiga, attended the local schools before studying at the Jagiellonian University of Kraków. After joining the canons regular of the Lateran of Corpus Christi (1456), professing his vows, and completing his studies for the priesthood, he was ordained. Thereafter, he served the community in many roles, including novice master and subprior. However, he is remembered for his defense of the faith against John HUS and John WYCLIF, his devotion to the Blessed Sacrament, concern for the poor and sick, and preaching. Some of his written sermons and lectures have survived the destruction of WORLD WAR II. His body now rests in the church of the Corpus Christi. JOHN PAUL II recognized his ancient cultus, April 18, 1993, following the issuance of the decretum December 21, 1992. On December 19, 2009, following the approval of a miracle, the Holy See announced that Kazimierczyk would be canonized by Pope BENEDICT XIV. As of the printing of this entry, a canonization date had not been set.

KENNEDY, JOHN F.

Thirty-fifth president of the United States; b. Brookline, Massachusetts, May 29, 1917; assassinated in Dallas, Texas, November 22, 1963.

John Fitzgerald Kennedy was the second-oldest son of nine children in the Irish Catholic family of Joseph P. and Rose Kennedy. By all accounts, Rose Kennedy was a devout Catholic who worked to instill this Faith in her children, despite Mr. Kennedy's poor example of open philandering and decision to send the male children mostly to secular schools. John F. Kennedy expressed that he experienced a lack of emotional love from his mother in his youth and that he had thought her "terribly religious" (Dallek 2003, p. 70). Although at times he demonstrated irreverence toward the Faith, he fully participated in the family prayer gatherings and attended Sunday Mass. After one year at a Catholic high school, Kennedy was educated at an elite preparatory academy and then graduated from Harvard University in 1940. He served extensively in combat in World War II as a PT boat commander and was recognized as a war hero for saving his fellow crew members when their boat split in half.

John Kennedy came home a war hero, but his older brother, Joseph Jr., was not so fortunate—he died during a risky air mission. Consequently, the political expectations for Joe Jr. shifted to John Kennedy, who served in the U.S. House of Representatives for three terms and then in the Senate from 1953 to 1960. During his first year in the Senate, he married Jacqueline Bouvier, who bore him two children (who survived infancy), Caroline and John Jr.

In 1960 he was elected the thirty-fifth president of the United States in an extremely close election against Richard Nixon. Among his many activities as president, he confronted the Soviet Union in the Cuban Missile Crisis, created the Peace Corps, funded the space program with the goal of landing a man on the moon, and proposed a new Civil Rights bill to the Congress. Kennedy's presidency ended tragically on November 22, 1963, when he was assassinated in Dallas, Texas.

Not only was Kennedy the youngest elected president in U.S. history (Theodore Roosevelt was younger when he was sworn in after President William McKinley's assassination in 1901), but he was also the first Catholic elected as U.S. president. In his run for the presidency, Kennedy's Catholic Faith posed a problem for his candidacy. Regardless of any weaknesses in his personal life with respect to living out the Faith, to the country he appeared as a symbol of the Catholic Faith due to his Irish-Catholic family history, his Mass attendance, and his strong relations with some members of the clergy. Indeed, Archbishop Richard Cushing of Boston was one of Kennedy's closest friends, eventually giving a memorable eulogy at Kennedy's funeral Mass. American wariness of a Catholic president had its roots in a strong anti-Catholic prejudice. Many Americans feared that Catholics and the Catholic Church were opposed to the American right to religious freedom and to the establishment clause of the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. They accused Catholics of having divided loyalties, including gaining political power so that the POPE could control American politics. As a reaction to this constant prejudice, Catholics (especially Irish Catholics) wanted to be fully accepted and integrated into prominent and influential leadership positions in American society. An Irish Catholic president would manifest this full acceptance.

As suspicion toward his Catholicism increased during the campaign, Kennedy realized that he needed to counteract the fear of many non-Catholics. He attempted to put the matter to rest once and for all by giving a speech in September 1960 to the Greater Houston Ministerial Association. This famous speech set out Kennedy's public position both on the First Amendment and on his Catholic Faith as it related to his duties as a politician who would be bound by presidential oath to defend the Constitution.

In the speech, Kennedy made it clear that he would not allow his Catholic Faith to affect the performance of his duties as president. He said he believed "in a president whose views on religion are his own private affair" and "whose fulfillment of his presidential office is not limited or conditioned by any religious oath, ritual, or obligation." Yet in contradiction to this, Kennedy offered to resign should a conflict arise between his Faith and his duties under the Constitution and laws. Ultimately, however, he said he would make decisions on policy matters "in accordance with what my conscience tells me to be in the national interest, and without regard to outside religious pressure or dictates. And," he said, "no power or threat of punishment could cause me to decide otherwise" (Kennedy 1960).

Catholic teaching, including its moral teachings—especially those that diverged from the prevailing politically popular morality—would not affect his decisions as a politician. It must be noted that this rejection by a Catholic politician of religious influence on one's private CONSCIENCE when making political decisions was not entirely novel. Al Smith, the 1928 Democratic presidential candidate, asserted the same position. Still, it was only after Kennedy's success that this approach became a model for later Catholic politicians such as Governor Mario Cuomo of New York and Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts. They have similarly argued that they should not allow their private religious beliefs (e.g., on ABORTION) to influence their public policy decisions. As a result, many Catholic politicians have promoted laws and policies that were in direct contradiction to the Church's moral teachings.

The Magisterium of the Catholic Church has strongly criticized and rejected this approach following the Second Vatican Council's constitution Gaudium et spes (no. 43) as well as the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith's (CDF) 2002 Doctrinal Notes on Some Questions Regarding the Participation of Catholics in Political Life (no. 6). In support of the Magisterium, the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops reminded Catholic politicians of their moral obligations in Living the Gospel of Life (1998, pp. 23–24, 31–32).

These and other Church documents provide a formation for Catholics so that their Faith can find fulfillment in daily life without compromise. A Catholic politician (and any Catholic) must inform his conscience according to the teaching of the Church in matters of faith and morals. The Church does not teach that a politician must legislate his religious beliefs (i.e., obligating citizens to participate in a particular form of worship); rather, it teaches that political issues can always be reduced to moral issues and a Catholic politician must discern how best to serve the public in light of the moral LAW. While there is tremendous latitude for a variety of prudential political matters, a Catholic politician must always uphold fundamental moral principles (e.g., the right to life) when forming public policy and law. This teaching regarding moral principles "is not a question of 'confessional values' per se, because such ethical precepts are rooted in human nature itself and belong to the natural moral law" (CDF, no. 5). During his time, Kennedy might not have had to worry about many practical conflicts between upholding the Constitution and laws of the United States and his Catholic Faith, yet today this is not the case. Fundamental principles of the natural moral law are being rejected, and natural rights are being violated, such as allowing the killing of unborn human life through abortion and embryonic stem cell research, and the recognition by the law of a relationship between members of the same-sex as equivalent to a marriage between a man and a woman.

Notwithstanding the Houston speech, Kennedy did think it important to speak of God during his presidency, as he did in his inaugural address, intimating that "on earth God's work must truly be our own." He also praised Pope John XXIII for his encyclicals and his promotion of world peace. For some, the presidency of John F. Kennedy signaled an important moment in overcoming American anti-Catholic prejudices and stereotypes. For many Catholics, though, this overcoming of prejudice is doubted, and the Kennedy's legacy, instead, has been that one should privatize, downplay, or even reject one's Catholic Faith in order to gain acceptance and participate fully in American political, social, and cultural life, which since the 1960s has shown to be the case among many Catholic politicians.

KENNEDY FAMILY

Few, if any, prominent Catholic families have played as large a role in the political history of the United States as the Kennedys: Joseph Patrick and Rose Fitzgerald Kennedy and their nine children. Through personal tragedy and legendary service to their country, they maintained a strong faith and brought Catholicism into the mainstream of American life.

Patriarch and Matriarch. Joseph Patrick Kennedy (1888–1969), the founding father of the Kennedy political dynasty, was a complex and contradictory figure. Driven by personal ambition that often appeared ruthless, he was fiercely loyal to his Irish Catholic origins and identity and extremely devoted to his children. The Boston-born grandson of Irish immigrants from the potato famine period, he grew up in a family already prominent in the local Irish community, its success established in Democratic ward politics and saloon-keeping. Joseph Patrick was relatively privileged in that he attended the Boston Latin School and Harvard University and married the mayor's daughter, also an Irish Catholic. Using connections and family wealth, he embarked on a career in finance after finishing college in 1912 as an undistinguished student. Within ten years, he had risen to the top of Boston's financial world and had personal wealth into the millions. Nonetheless, he developed a sense that because he was Irish and Catholic he remained an outsider in the highest circles of American wealth and power. Kennedy was determined to surpass these boundaries and determined that his children surpass them as well.

In 1926, Kennedy moved to New York City and began investing heavily in the motion picture industry. At this point, his public image became associated with glamour and sexual impropriety; rumors swirled about an alleged extramarital affair with the actress Gloria Swanson. Kennedy's savvy as an investor proved precocious; sensing that the economic trends of 1929 would lead to inevitable national catastrophe, he transferred his investments out of the stock market before the crash, leaving an estimated fortune of $100 million intact. He then turned his attention to politics, in step with the national resurgence of the Democratic Party. As one of the nation's most powerful and wealthy Democrats, Kennedy became a formidable force. President Franklin D. Roosevelt (1882–1945) appointed him as the first chairman of the newly formed Securities and Exchange Commission, and in 1938, ambassador to Great Britain. Erroneously believing that Nazi German leader Adolf HITLER could not be defeated in Europe, Kennedy advocated appeasement and supported American isolationism, bringing his political fortunes to an end when war eventually broke out. He now turned his attention to the success of his children. In 1961, shortly after his son John's inauguration as president, he suffered a severe stroke, which left him unable to speak and physically devastated until his death in 1969.

Rose Fitzgerald (1890–1995) married Joseph Patrick Kennedy in 1914 and gave birth to nine children. Daughter of John Francis "Honey Fitz" Fitzgerald, the popular Irish Catholic mayor of Boston, Rose was accomplished in her studies, proficient in music, and fluent in languages. Educated and nurtured in privilege, she, like her husband, was profoundly conscious of her Catholic identity and aware of the limits imposed on it by the highest echelons of American society. Rose was an exceptionally devout Catholic deeply committed to public service and charitable philanthropy, and she attempted to instill these values in her children. This family matriarch assumed a hands-on approach to raising her sons and daughters, and, throughout her long life, repeatedly assumed many public roles with grace, dignity, and poise. She endured numerous personal tragedies and relied on her deep Catholic FAITH to persevere despite the violent deaths of four of her children in the prime of their lives, the permanent disability of another, and numerous challenges with the remaining four. In 1952, Pope PIUS XII honored her as a Papal Countess distinguished in charitable works and personal devotion to the faith.

Rose always had a special concern for the mentally disabled and retarded, shaped by the illness of her oldest daughter, Rosemary (1918–2005), who was born with mental disabilities largely misunderstood at the time. Disturbed by Rosemary's inability to function socially, Joseph Kennedy secretly arranged for his daughter to have an experimental treatment then hailed as a miracle cure: a frontal lobotomy. The procedure left the young woman severely mentally disabled for the remainder of her long life.

Rose was responsible for the Kennedy family's large donations of money and energy to this cause. Her children remained publicly loyal and devoted to her until the end of her long life.

War and the Kennedys. The four oldest Kennedy children came of age at the dawn of WORLD WAR II, spending significant time in Great Britain, where their father was the American ambassador. The war years either transformed or ended the lives of each. Joseph Patrick Kennedy Jr. (1915–1944) and John Fitzgerald Kennedy (1917–1963) were staunch American interventionists and Anglophiles and enlisted in the U.S. Navy. Both served in numerous combat roles that entailed considerable danger. Joseph was a decorated pilot who died heroically after volunteering for a dangerous mission over the Bay of Biscay, off the coast of occupied France, in 1944. John served as a torpedo boat captain in the South Pacific and became a legendary war hero when a Japanese destroyer sank his ship, PT 109. He swam for miles with an injured crew member attached to his back and was lost at sea for days before he and ten others were rescued. Kennedy was awarded numerous honors for these heroics, which later became the subject of a popular book and movie. He also suffered serious injuries to his back, which, along with Addison's disease, plagued him for the remainder of his life, much of which was spent in excruciating pain. On three separate occasions, when close to death, Kennedy received the Last Rites, then known as the Sacrament of Extreme Unction.

Kathleen Agnes Kennedy (1920–1948), stunning in beauty and exuberant in personality, has often been described as her father's favorite child. She returned to London during the war to work as a Red Cross volunteer with a U.S. Army Officer's Commission. While there, she fell in love with and married the Marquis of Hartington, William Cavendish, thus becoming a British peer. Because Cavendish was Anglican, the wedding proceeded as a civil ceremony, with Kathleen unable to obtain a dispensation from the Church. Several months later, Kathleen was widowed when "Billy" Cavendish, serving in the British Army, was killed in France. Rose Kennedy had a strained relationship with Kathleen as a result of the marriage outside the Church, and Kathleen parted ways with her parents. Tragically, in 1948, while traveling to meet her father, apparently to restore family ties, Kathleen was also killed in a plane crash.

First Catholic U.S. President. The Kennedy political fortunes rose to new heights during the postwar years, only to end in repeated tragedy. John Fitzgerald Kennedy returned to Massachusetts after the war and entered politics. In 1946, he was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives and in 1952 to the Senate. In campaigning for both, he displayed his Irish Catholic identity prominently because it enhanced his profile with his heavily Irish Catholic constituency. How this would play out on the national stage remained to be seen, however, as he developed plans to run for the presidency in 1960. Kennedy hoped to campaign on his strengths as a war hero who would be tough on communism and as a young man who brought a fresh new energy to the national agenda. As soon as it became clear that the contest would be between Kennedy and Richard Nixon, the two tried to engage the public over who would be toughest on communist aggression. The public seemed to care little for this and seemed to focus increasingly on Kennedy's Catholicism. Would Kennedy's allegiance to his Church, with its hierarchical structure and sovereign PONTIFF's leadership, be free to put the interests of the United States first, or would Kennedy be bound to Church teaching over—even against—the national interest in certain circumstances?

At the start of the campaign, Kennedy attempted to dispel such fears by insisting that, first and foremost, his duties and responsibilities would be to the citizens of the United States. It is difficult to assess the final role of religion in this close and interesting election. Whereas anti-Catholicism unquestionably raged in some sectors, it is not clear that this actually led to Kennedy's losing votes. Some scholars have argued that, offended by nativist prejudices, Catholic voters mobilized behind Kennedy as one of their own. It has been pointed out that many of these Catholic voters were rather conservative in temperament, and in an election uncomplicated by the religious question, would have chosen the Republican Nixon over a more liberal Democrat.

Once he took office, however, Kennedy's public Catholicism seemed to cause little, if any, tension within his political life. Kennedy did support the Catholic Diem Regime in Vietnam, but with considerably greater restraint than the subsequent Johnson administration did. The POPE is reported to have spoken to Kennedy during the Cuban Missile Crisis, but he is also reported to have spoken to the leader of the Soviet Union. In short, for all its uniqueness at the time, the religion of the nation's only Catholic president proved to make little, if any, difference in the end.

John Kennedy's undisputed moment of greatness remains his handling of the Cuban Missile Crisis. In 1997, publication of tape recordings made in the White House during the crisis revealed how precarious the situation actually was and how close the world had indeed come to nuclear war. Kennedy's own military leaders advocated a speedy first strike against Cuba, an action that Kennedy himself correctly realized would have triggered nuclear war. Had the president deferred to his commanders, the world as we know it may very well have come to an end in 1962. The most important issues facing the country during Kennedy's presidency—civil rights, the Vietnam War, and the war on poverty—were all works in progress at the time of his assassination, so it remains difficult to judge what the final outcomes on these might have been had Kennedy lived. In each case, a tantalizing set of promising proposals and hopeful initiatives has made subsequent generations wonder "What if?" The assassination itself has been the source of repeated speculation and rumor, and, to this day, millions of Americans believe that it was a product of conspiracy and cover-up. It must be pointed out that despite mountains of circumstantial evidence and coincidence to the contrary, the basic finding of the official Warren Commission—that in assassinating the president, Lee Harvey Oswald acted alone—has not been disproved.

Little was said of Kennedy's private life during his presidency that did not project the harmonious image that he, his wife Jacqueline Bouvier Kennedy (1929–1994), and their two young children constituted an ideal family. Yet, years after his death, the tabloid press began to publish reports about his alleged extramarital affairs. So how can the public image of Kennedy, the practicing Catholic, be reconciled with the tabloid view of Kennedy the womanizer? As difficult as this may seem, it is not impossible to conclude that both contained an element of truth. But Kennedy maintained a close friendship with Richard Cardinal CUSHING, and MASS was celebrated regularly in the Kennedy compound.

Tragedy struck this branch of the Kennedy family again in 1999. John Kennedy, Jr. (b. 1960) graduated from New York University Law School and seemed destined for political life. He embarked upon a seminal career in political journalism but died in a plane crash off Martha's Vineyard, Massachusetts, before entering public life.

Robert and Edward Kennedy. On John's untimely death, the fate of the Kennedy family as a political dynasty was transmitted to Robert Francis Kennedy (1925–1968) and Edward Moore Kennedy (1932–2009). Robert embarked on a political career after graduating from the University of Virginia Law School in 1951. As an attorney, he worked in several government agencies before managing his older brother John's 1952 Senatorial campaign and 1960 presidential campaign. Holding the cabinet position of attorney general in the Kennedy administration, Robert was John's closest political adviser in office. During the Cuban Missile Crisis, Robert, by then usually called "Bobby," was entrusted with personally negotiating with the Soviet ambassador. After his brother's assassination, Robert never really adjusted to political life in the new Johnson administration and withdrew to run for the Senate, representing New York. He was elected in 1964 and quickly became a driving force in Democratic national politics. He bore increasing animosity toward Lyndon Johnson, and after the Tet Offensive of early 1968, Robert publicly broke with the president over the Vietnam War and announced his own candidacy for the presidency in the 1968 race. Kennedy, Hubert Humphrey, George Wallace, and Eugene McCarthy all vied for the Democratic presidential nomination. At the beginning of June, a dramatic victory in the California primary gave Kennedy a clear lead, but, as he approached the television cameras to give his victory speech, a gunman shot him in the head. He died a few hours later.

Bobby had become the leading spokesman for the more liberal wing of the Democratic Party, leaving his mark on numerous civil rights and Great Society domestic programs. This legacy was then conveyed to his younger brother, Edward. Edward Moore "Teddy" Kennedy was elected to the Senate from Massachusetts in 1962, replacing his brother John, who had become president. Edward's career, one of the longest of any senator in the history of the United States, is unambiguously associated with liberal politics and causes that were popular early in his career, but much less so since 1980. In 1980, Kennedy entered the primaries to run for president, but his insurgency against Jimmy Carter (1924–) failed. Many believe that issues in his personal life—notably the "Chappaquiddick incident" of 1968, in which Kennedy was involved in a car accident that claimed the life of his female passenger—made him unelectable to national office, despite carving out an important place in history. Edward's long political career has witnessed a transition in attitudes toward Catholics in politics. By the 1980s, Catholics had become relatively commonplace in American politics. Edward Kennedy remained a powerhouse in liberal politics well into the twenty-first century. Early in 2008 he was diagnosed with brain cancer but remained active in Democratic Party politics, supporting Barack Obama's bid for the Presidency and delivering a rousing speech at the Democratic National Convention in August. He passed away on August 25, 2009, at his home in Hyannis Port, Massachusetts.

Kennedys and Their Spouses. In earlier decades, the family's Catholicism repeatedly became an issue that brought their public and private lives into full view, particularly insofar as marriages were concerned. Edward's troubled marriage to Joan Bennett ended in DIVORCE, and he subsequently remarried outside the Church, but this received relatively little public attention. Patricia Kennedy (1924–2006) married the famous actor Peter Lawford in 1954, against the family's wishes. Lawford, a divorcé, an Englishman, and a Protestant, was a heavy drinker with a troubled personal life. After eleven years and four children, the couple divorced. Patricia never remarried. She devoted much of her life to charitable causes, remaining a practicing Catholic. Much of her effort focused on serving the mentally disabled and people with substance abuse problems.

John's widow, Jackie, received a special dispensation from the Church to marry Aristotle Onassis, a wealthy Greek businessman who had been previously divorced. The case caused great public speculation, but Jackie maintained her ties to the faith despite the controversy.

Eunice Mary Kennedy (1921–2009), married to Sargent Shriver, maintained a public attachment to the Church, and through the years the Shrivers devoted enormous amounts of their time, energy, and money to charitable causes and works of public service. She founded the Special Olympics and was awarded the Presidential Medal of Freedom by Ronald Reagan for her extraordinary efforts and accomplishments on behalf of mentally and physically disabled children. She died on August 11, 2009, at Cape Cod Hospital.

Jean Ann Kennedy (1928–) married Stephen E. Smith and also remained a practicing Catholic, prominently associated with philanthropic works and community works. She too received numerous honors for her exceptional devotion to mentally and physically disabled children. In 1993, President Bill Clinton appointed her ambassador to Ireland. She played a major role in promoting the peace process in Ireland and is said to have personally persuaded the Clinton administration to grant a visa to Irish Republican leader Gerry Adams (1948–), paving the way to negotiations with the Irish Republican party Sinn Féin. This milestone has substantially defused the Irish conflict.

The Kennedys were always deeply conscious of their Catholic identity, and, more often than not, reconciled their private practice of Catholicism to the public expectation of what such affiliation meant. They broke down barriers against Catholics in the United States, who have become widely accepted by mainstream America. The Kennedys were pioneers who made this possible.

KILMARTIN, EDWARD J.

Professor of LITURGICAL THEOLOGY, author; b. Portland, Maine, Aug. 31, 1923; d. Boston, Mass., June 16, 1994, of bone cancer.

Edward John Kilmartin was the son of Patrick Joseph and Elizabeth Gertrude (Sullivan) Kilmartin. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1941, attended Weston College from 1945 to 1948, receiving an A.B. in 1947 and an M.A. in PHILOSOPHY in 1948. He was ordained to the presbyterate on June 5, 1954, and received his licentiate of sacred theology (S.T.L.) in 1955.

Kilmartin's first teaching assignment was at Weston College in Weston, Massachusetts. He served there from 1958 to 1977, also teaching at BOSTON COLLEGE for the last nine years. From there, he moved to the University of Notre Dame and remained there until 1984, during which time he directed the doctoral program in LITURGY. In 1985, he accepted a position at the Pontifical Oriental Institute in ROME, Italy. He died of bone cancer in 1994.

The work of Edward Kilmartin could be said to function as a bridge between scholastic SACRAMENTAL THEOLOGY and a more modern, anthropological approach to WORSHIP. His analysis of the rites of the Church from apostolic times to the present emphasized the influence of historical circumstances on changes in the content of liturgical prayers. Furthermore, he appreciated the role of religious PRAXIS in the formulation of the questions considered by theologians.

Kilmartin believed that post-Tridentine Catholic Eucharistic theology was limited. He claimed that this theology, which identifies the narrative of institution as the moment of consecration and, thus, the essential form of the sacrament, focuses on the words of institution to the neglect of the function of these words in the liturgy, leading to a predominantly Christological Eucharistic theology influenced by the law of belief of the Church, rather than the law of PRAYER. His critique is based on his interpretation of the axiom lex orandi, lex credendi, and how he sees the relationship between prayer and DOCTRINE. In post-Tridentine theology, the doctrines of the Church were considered the source of Eucharistic theology, whereas the liturgical rite itself, which provides the experience of Eucharist and preserves the doctrines through generations, was ignored.

In his own Eucharistic theology, he attempted to overcome these limitations of scholastic theology by retrieving a more complete systematic understanding of the Eucharist from the first millennium Church, found in both the New Testament and early liturgical writings. In his biblical studies, he found a Eucharistic theology that concerns itself not only with CHRISTOLOGY, but also with ECCLESIOLOGY, pneumatology, SOTERIOLOGY, and eschatology, and is based on the structure and function of the Eucharistic prayer as a whole, not merely the words of institution of CHRIST. Rather than focusing primarily on the words of institution, and thus emphasizing the Christological dimension of the consecration of the elements, he examines the Eucharistic prayer as a whole, particularly its function within the context of the liturgy. The meaning of the prayers derives from their function within the liturgy, rather than from applying to the prayers some external doctrine of the Church.

From this perspective, Kilmartin explored several theological aspects. His theology contains elements of pneumatology, ecclesiology, soteriology, and Christology. But foremost was his understanding that liturgy is most completely an encounter with the Triune God, asserting that the Holy TRINITY has an integral role in a theology of liturgy. Kilmartin claimed that a theology of liturgy is, indeed, a theology of the Trinity, basing his argument on his understanding that worship is humanity's participation in the Trinity. The influence of Karl RAHNER's identification between the immanent Trinity and the economic Trinity is clear.

Kilmartin also emphasized the importance of the EPICLESIS of the Eucharistic prayer to the early Church, specifically its role in the consecration of the elements, using Australian priest and professor David M. Coffey's bestowal model of the Trinity to explain the sanctification of the Eucharistic elements and the sanctification of the communicants at the Eucharistic celebration. He judged the arguments of Odo CASEL and of Italian priest and professor Cesare Giraudo (b. 1941; both approached the problem from the experiential perspective) to be weak explanations of the presence of the historical salvific act. He preferred Irish priest Brian McNamara's metaphysical argument, which is based not on the experiential level of understanding, but on the divine perspective of the plan of SALVATION.

In his work on ministry, Kilmartin considered in what sense the apostolic office can be called sacrament of Christ, particularly the question of how the priest represents Christ and the Church. He argued that there was no genuine theological explanation for the opinion that the priest directly represents Christ. Rather, he believed that the priest directly represents the FAITH of the Church and so represents Christ, who, along with the Holy Spirit, is the source of this faith. He claimed that a proper understanding of ministry includes a respect for the distinction between CHARISM and office and the relationship that exists between the two.

Kilmartin's understanding of the axiom lex orandi-lex credendi led to his method of sacramental theology, which begins with an examination of the rites themselves. This method affords the rituals a greater value than the doctrinal statements of the Church on which these rites might be based. Kilmartin saw liturgy as both the source and the goal of systematic theology. All branches of systematic theology stem from the liturgy and lead to a better understanding of the liturgy. The term theology of liturgy has a twofold meaning. On the one hand, theology of liturgy is the theology contained in the liturgy itself. Whereas other areas of systematic theology focus on specific themes, a systematic theology of liturgy focuses of the liturgical symbolic activity in which all the themes of theology are brought together. Liturgical worship is a speaking about God in the form of speaking to God. Theology of liturgy is a source of theological knowledge. On the other hand, theology of liturgy is also the object of study, while the various areas of systematic theology are the subjects. In this way, the goal of other areas of systematic theology is a better understanding of the liturgy.

Kilmartin held memberships in the Catholic Biblical Association, the CATHOLIC THEOLOGICAL SOCIETY OF AMERICA, and the NORTH AMERICAN ACADEMY OF LITURGY, who granted to him its Berakah Award in 1994 for his distinguished lifetime contributions to liturgical theology. He held a variety of editorial positions with theological publications, including Theological Studies (for which he was also a major contributing author), Theology Digest, and New Testament Abstracts, as well as pastoral publications, such as New Catholic World and Emmanuel. He was also very active in the ecumenical work of the Church, specifically the Greek Orthodox–Roman Catholic ecumenical dialogue and the work of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

KŁOPOTOWSKI, IGNATIUS, BL.

Also known as Ignacy Kłopotowski; priest, founder of the Congregation of the Sisters of the Blessed Virgin Mary of Loreto; b. July 20, 1866, Korzeniówka, Poland; d. September 7, 1931, Warsaw, Poland; beatified June 19, 2005, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

The son of Johann Kłopotowski and Isabella Dobrowska, Blessed Ignatius Kłopotowski was born about one hundred miles west of Warsaw, Poland, in a region then under the control of the Russian Empire. He received his primary education from his parents, who instructed him in Eucharistic piety, concern for the poor, and a love of Poland. After completing his secondary studies in 1883, Blessed Kłopotowski entered the Major Seminary of Lublin.

On July 5, 1891, Blessed Kłopotowski was ordained a priest in the Cathedral of Lublin. Thence he was given several successive assignments, including the pastoral care of Greek Catholics in the Podlachia region, who were then under persecution by the Russian Empire. Alongside his pastoral responsibilities, Blessed Kłopotowski served for fourteen years as a professor at the Major Seminary in Lublin. He also founded a number of charitable institutions, including an office of employment, two orphanages, a home for the elderly, as well as a shelter to rescue young women from prostitution. In 1894 he added to these an apostolate of Catholic publishing, with a small prayer book titled, A Visit to the Most Holy Sacrament. This was followed by several works on topics such as the Eucharist, Marian dogma, the saints, and national heroes. These undertakings culminated in 1905, when he founded the magazine Polak-Katolik ("The Polish Catholic"), as well as Posiew ("Sowing Seed"). Having moved to Warsaw in 1908 to expand his written apostolate, in 1920 Blessed Kłopotowski founded the Congregation of the Sisters of the Blessed Virgin Mary of Loreto, part of whose charism is to serve the Sovereign Pontiff and the universal Church by continuing Blessed Kłopotowski's apostolate of Catholic publishing.

Blessed Kłopotowski died suddenly on September 7, 1931. In 1988 the Archbishop of Warsaw opened the cause for his canonization. On May 30, 2005, the Congregation for the Causes of Saints confirmed a miracle attributed to his INTERCESSION: Against the expectations of attending physicians and after medical treatment had been exhausted to no avail, Anthony Łatko, a priest in the Archdiocese of Katowice in Poland, fully recovered from severe head trauma inflicted upon him by thieves attempting to burglarize his home.

Blessed Kłopotowski was beatified by Pope Benedict XVI on June 19, 2005. Jozef Cardinal Glemp, Metropolitan Archbishop of Warsaw, celebrated the Mass for his BEATIFICATION in Warsaw.

Feast: September 7.

KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS

A fraternal benefit society of Catholic men chartered by the state of Connecticut in 1882. For over 125 years the order has responded to the myriad needs of local churches in the United States, Canada, Mexico, Puerto Rico, and the Philippines. This article traces the origins of Columbianism as a force in the Church and society, with particular focus on its character as a Catholic antidefamation society.

History. Venerable Michael J. MCGIVNEY was the New Haven priest who founded the Knights of Columbus in 1882. He was an unassuming, pious priest who easily elicited the trust of the laity. Concerned with the strong appeal of prohibited secret societies among Catholic youth and with the plight of the widows and children suffering the loss of their breadwinners, he was eager to form a fraternal insurance society imbued with deep loyalties to both Catholicism and the American experience.

In October 1881 McGivney and a small group of laymen decided to establish an independent society rather than become a branch of one of the two already existing Catholic benefit societies. In early February 1882 they placed their order under the patronage of Christopher COLUMBUS. According to the few surviving documents, the Columbian motif represented the group's Catholic consciousness. Columbus was the symbol. By portraying the navigator's landing at San Salvador as the Catholic baptism of the nation, the Knights were asserting religious legitimacy. Just as the heirs of the pilgrims invoked the Mayflower as the Protestant symbol of their identity as early Americans, so the Knights invoked the Santa Maria as the symbol of their self-understanding as Catholic citizens. On March 29, 1882, the order was incorporated in the State of Connecticut. One of the charter members invoked the cause of Catholic civil liberty when he asserted that the order's patron signified that, as Catholic descendants of Columbus, "[we] were entitled to all rights and privileges due to such a discovery by one of our faith."

For the first ten years insurance was a mandatory feature of membership in the order. In 1892 noninsurance or associate membership was established, which meant that candidates for knighthood could be drawn to the order unfettered by economic ties. When the order expanded into Massachusetts in 1892, Columbianism became more explicit. The quadricentennial of Columbus's landfall, the rise of another wave of anti-Catholicism in the form of the American Protective Association, and the expansionist policies of the leadership fostered the development of Columbianism. The general spirit of patriotism, culminating in the Spanish-American War, also animated the order's character. From New England the order expanded throughout the nation. By 1905 the Knights were in every state in the Union, five provinces of Canada, Mexico, and the Philippines, and they were poised to enter Cuba and Puerto Rico. This enormously successful period of expansion is primarily due to the way in which the Knights conveyed through their ceremonials their strong sense of American Catholic identity. In a sense, the ceremonials provided the candidates for knighthood with a rite of passage from old world ties to loyalty to the new republic. Basic to their ethos were the prevailing notions of manliness, fraternal sentiment, and muscular Christianity.

The Knights of Columbus (K. of C.) extolled Catholic unity and struggled against the divisive character of ethnic particularism. Though the leaders were all second-generation Irish Americans, they were realists on the ethnic issue. Hence, they permitted the establishment of the Teutonic Council for German-American Knights and the Italian-American Ansonia Council, both of which were instituted in Boston during the 1890s.

Activities. In accord with the order's antidefamation mission, it instituted in 1914 the Knights of Columbus Commission on Religious Prejudices. The latter was mandated "to study the causes, investigate conditions and suggest remedies for the religious prejudice that has been manifest through the press and rostrum." Under the chairmanship of Patrick Henry Callahan, then K. of C. state deputy of Kentucky and a wealthy industrialist known for his capital-labor profit-sharing plan, the commission followed its mandate to the letter. As an antidote to prejudices Callahan especially promoted the papal encyclical of 1891, Rerum novarum.

Columbian lay activism manifested itself in a new field of work in 1916, when U.S. troops were stationed along the Mexican border. After learning of the needs for recreational and religious centers, the order established sixteen buildings from the Gulf of Mexico to the Gulf of California to meet the social needs of all soldiers and the religious needs of Catholics.

As a result of this experience, the Knights offered such services to the U.S. government when it entered WORLD WAR I in April 1917. American and Canadian

K. of C. "Huts" with signs reading, "Everyone Welcome, Everything Free," were established in the training camps and eventually in Europe and Asia, even in the remote area of Siberia. The order raised one million dollars during the first year. As a result of a joint drive with the Y.M.C.A., the Jewish Welfare Board, the Salvation Army, and other groups, the order received over thirty million dollars for its War Camp Fund.

After the war, the Knights established employment bureaus throughout the country to help find jobs for veterans. They also provided college scholarships for returning servicemen and set up evening schools for veterans and all others interested in academic and vocational advancement. In January 1924 there were sixty-nine evening schools with an enrollment of more than 30,000 students. The Knights received numerous commendations for war and reconstruction work, but the greatest tribute was demonstrated by the more than 450,000 men who joined the order between 1917 and 1923.

During the 1920s Columbianism expressed itself in a variety of new programs. In response to those historians who stressed an economic interpretation of American history, disregarded the idealism of the revolutionary period, and ignored the contributions of the various non-Anglo-Saxon immigrant groups, the order established the K. of C. Historical Commission. The commission was charged with the responsibility "to investigate the facts of history, to correct historical errors and omissions, to amplify and preserve our national history to exalt and perpetuate American ideals and to combat anti-American propaganda by means of pamphlets ... and by other proper means and methods as shall be approved by the Supreme Assembly." Under the direction of Edward McSweeney, a former trade unionist and immigration officer on Ellis Island, the commission awarded prizes for the best historical monographs. Works of such scholars who later earned national reputations, as Samuel Flagg Bemis and Allan Nevins, were published by Macmillan in the Knights of Columbus Historical Series.

In the autumn of 1922, McSweeney designed a unique set of historical studies titled, "The Knights of Columbus Racial Contribution Series." Three monographs were published in this ambitious series: The Gift of Black Folk by W.E.B. DuBois; The Jews in the Making of America by George Cohen; and The Germans in the Making of America by Frederick Franklin Schrader. In his introduction to each of these books, McSweeney summarized the history of immigration to America, the waves of nativism, anti-Catholicism, ANTI-SEMITISM, and the persistence of racial prejudice in the life of the nation.

In 1921 Pope BENEDICT XV called upon Columbianism's Catholic antidefamation character to respond to religious prejudice in Rome. The pope elaborated on how anti-Catholic propaganda was a strong factor in the Protestant evangelization of Rome and the degree to which it threatened to break down Roman youth's loyalties to the Church.

Within a year after this historic audience, the order had appointed a commission for its Roman project, established a $1 million Italian Welfare Fund through a per capita tax on the membership, received permission to construct recreation centers from Benedict's successor, Pope PIUS XI, and contracted the services of Roman engineer and architect Enrico Galeazzi. Between 1924 and 1927 the order opened five recreation centers, the most significant of which was St. Peter's Oratory, adjacent to VATICAN CITY. In the 1930s this program was absorbed into the CATHOLIC ACTION movement.

During the Great Depression the Knights revived their antisocialism, a crusade that included a SOCIAL JUSTICE component. At the Supreme Council meeting in August 1937, held in San Antonio, Texas, the crusade was unanimously endorsed by the delegates. Supreme Knight Martin Carmody reported that the Daily Worker, the official voice of the American Communist Party, had frequently vented "its wrath against the Knights of Columbus." Shortly after the convention, the Supreme Board of Directors approved Carmody's proposal to hire an anti-Communist lecturer, George Hermann Derry, who had been a member of the K. of C.'s Historical Commission and who had recently resigned as president of Marygrove College in Detroit. Derry's lecture program, which was subject to the prior approval of the hierarchy, included a general public address sponsored by local Knights and an address to the clergy of the diocese on anti-Communist leadership.

The administrations of Luke E. Hart (1953–1964), John K. McDevitt (1964–1977), and Virgil C. Dechant (1977–2000) are identified with the modernization of the order within the context of its traditional loyalty to Church and country. Hart laid the basis for the modern insurance program that was later greatly refined by Virgil Dechant. Hart's conservatism on racial and labor issues alienated many members of the order and the hierarchy. McDevitt led a movement to reform the policy governing admissions to local councils, thereby engendering racial integration. By this policy and by cosponsoring a Human Rights Congress at Yale University and fostering other programs related to social justice, McDevitt restored the confidence of the hierarchy in the order's direction. In general, John McDevitt's administration represents a synthesis of modern fraternalism and traditional faith.

Virgil C. Dechant's administration reflected his command of the insurance programs, a policy to modernize the structures of the international headquarters in New Haven, Connecticut, a commitment to infuse a strong social service component into the order's fraternalism, a positive response to the needs of the American Church mediated by the bishop, and deep loyalty to the Vatican as evidenced by the order's support of the pope's charities as well as the Vatican's needs for architectural restoration and artistic beautification. Under Dechant's leadership the order also experienced considerable growth.

Dechant retired at the age of seventy, in October 2000. Upon his retirement, the Supreme Board of Directors elected the Supreme Secretary, Carl Anderson, to be Supreme Knight. Formerly the Dean of the JOHN PAUL II INSTITUTE ON MARRIAGE AND FAMILY, Anderson brought a theological dimension to his leadership. His columns in Columbia, the widely circulated magazine of the Knights, include a religious message in a popular idiom. Within a year of his election, the amount of insurance in force reached the then record level of $42 billion, demonstrating Anderson's command of that vital aspect of the Knights' mission. In his almost decade-long tenure as Supreme Knight, Anderson has been active in vigorously promoting Knights programs, in writing books and articles on behalf of the Knights, and in serving in various Church bodies. The order has a long association with the CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA. On September 8, 2009, McGivney Hall was dedicated on the campus of the Catholic University, funded by the Knights of Columbus to serve as the new home of the Pontifical John Paul II Institute for Studies on Marriage and Family, also heavily supported by the Knights. In keeping with its tradition as a Catholic antidefamation society, the Knights also publish occasional reports on how the news media depicts the Catholic Church.

The Knights remain a robust, financially sound, and financially generous organization. In 2007, the Knights of Columbus celebrated its 125th anniversary. As of 2009, there were more than 1.7 million Knights belonging to more than 14,000 councils in thirteen countries. Annually Knights fundraise and donate about $150 million to charity and dedicate about 70 million volunteer hours. With $60 billion of insurance in force and with the widespread programs of the order, the Knights of Columbus still manifest the vitality of their original mission to respond to the needs of the Church and to witness to the unique character of the Catholic experience in America.

In terms of Catholic doctrine and affiliation, the Knights of Columbus has recently distinguished itself in two particular areas: support for pro-life causes and for the papacy. Parishes throughout the United States feature pro-life publications of the Knights on their bulletin racks. Knights of Columbus publications for the laity include a "Study Guide to Evangelium Vitae" (1996), authored by Russell Shaw, former Director of Public Information of the Knights of Columbus, and a publication on the importance of protecting family life, "Serving the Human Family" (1998). The Knights fund the annual workshop on medical-moral issues for the American episcopate. The order also works closely with the Pro-life Secretariat of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops. The order has filed amicus briefs and lobbied for legislation to protect the dignity of marriage and the lives of the unborn. For example, the Knights contributed over $1 million in support of Proposition 8, the California Marriage Protection Act ballot initiative of 2008 that amended the California Constitution to define marriage as a union of a man and a woman. The Knights have not been without controversy in the political arena, however, as several prominent Catholic politicians are on record as being both Knights and strong supporters of legalized abortion. On an international level, the order is a nongovernmental organization of the United Nations (U.N.), where it participates in conferences and U.N. activities in furtherance of the order's Catholic and moral principles.

The Knights of Columbus has also demonstrated a special loyalty to the papacy. The Knights Vicarius Christi fund, established in 1981, has donated over $35 million to the papacy. The Knights funded the telecast of numerous trips of Pope JOHN PAUL II, including the pope's WORLD YOUTH DAY visit to Manila in 1994, the opening of the Holy Door in 1999, the pope's visit to the Holy Land in 2000, the papal peace summit in Assisi in 2002, and the annual funding of the satellite uplink of the pope's worldwide Christmas and Easter Masses. The order has paid for repairing the façade of ST. PETER'S BASILICA and other restoration work in the Vatican. In return the popes have shown great appreciation for the Knights. On October 17, 1988, Pope John Paul II praised the Knights for their "staunch support of the Catholic faith and for your financial aid and volunteer work on behalf of charitable and benevolent causes." The popes address an annual message to the Knights. When John Paul canonized twenty-five martyrs of the Mexican persecution of the 1920s, six of the saints were Knights. The popes have also given numerous gifts to the Knights which are on display in the papal gallery at the Knights of Columbus Museum in New Haven, Connecticut.

Interest in the Knights' founder, Fr. McGivney, has increased since the 2007 publication of his first full-scale biography, by noted authors Douglas Brinkley and Julie Fenster. In 1997, a cause for his canonization was opened in the Hartford Diocese. On March 15, 2008, Pope BENEDICT XVI declared Fr. McGivney a "Venerable Servant of God." In his homily at St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York about a month later, the pope referred to the "remarkable accomplishment of that exemplary American priest, the venerable Michael McGivney, whose vision and zeal led to the establishment of the Knights of Columbus." Proposed miracles are being investigated as Venerable McGivney's possible BEATIFICATION and canonization is advanced. If Fr. McGivney were to be canonized, he would be the first American-born priest to be recognized as a saint. Canonization would be a fitting tribute to a man who created such a distinctively American institution that has played a vital role in the modern history of the Catholic Church.

KÜNG, HANS

Priest of diocese of Basel, Switzerland, and professor emeritus of theology, University of Tübingen, Germany; b. Sursee, near Lucerne, Switzerland, March 19, 1928.

Küng, Hans (1928–). Prominent Catholic Theologian Hans Kung, told an audience here that he was renewing his vow to press for reform of an increasingly "repressive" Church. © CORBIS

Shortly after entering the Swiss diocesan seminary, Hans Küng was sent to the Pontifical German College in Rome. As a resident of the "Collegium Germanicum," he pursued his studies in philosophy and theology at the GREGORIAN UNIVERSITY from 1948 to 1955, achieving a licentiate degree in both subjects. He was ordained to the priesthood in Rome in 1954.

Küng left Rome in 1955, and after a brief stay in North Africa, where he acquired an interest in non-Christian religions, he was sent to continue his theological studies at the Institut Catholique at the Sorbonne in Paris, where he wrote his doctoral dissertation on Karl BARTH and JUSTIFICATION. The dissertation was published in 1957 as Justification: the Doctrine of Karl Barth and a Catholic Reflection. The book sought to bridge the gap that separated the Catholic and the Protestant traditions on this crucial theological issue. While recognized as a seminal work in ecumenical theology, it also brought Küng to the attention of Vatican authorities, particularly the Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office (formerly the Sacred Congregation of the Universal Inquisition), which established a special dossier on the young priest.

In 1960, Küng was appointed to the chair of fundamental theology in the Catholic faculty at TÜBINGEN UNIVERSITY in Germany. That same year he published The Council, Reform and Reunion, in which he laid out an agenda for the coming ecumenical council (Vatican Council II, 1962–1965) that conflicted with that proposed by the Roman CURIA. With the publication of this book and the attention given to it by the worldwide press, Küng became an overnight theological celebrity.

In 1962 Küng was appointed by Bishop Leiprecht of Rottenburg as his peritus (theological expert) at Vatican II. Both his book on the council and the subsequent Structures of the Church (1962)—in which he raised questions about Church ministry and the primacy and infallibility of the pope—raised further questions about the Swiss theologian's orthodoxy, putting him on a direct collision course with Church authorities. The confrontation was further exacerbated in 1967 with the publication of Küng's comprehensive ecclesiology, The Church. This book argued for a more scripturally based vision of the Church than had been achieved even in the conciliar document Lumen gentium. More specifically, he challenged the traditional notion of apostolic succession as belonging exclusively to the hierarchy, and he questioned whether the present structures of the Church are of biblical origin. The Congregation of the Holy Office (which had become the Congregation for the DOCTRINE OF THE FAITH, or CDF, in 1965) advised Küng that his writings were under doctrinal scrutiny.

The most sensitive aspect of Küng's reform-minded writings was his insistence on the reform of the PAPACY itself. His critique of the papacy reached a climax in his challenge to papal INFALLIBILITY, a teaching that he claimed had been wrongly proclaimed at VATICAN COUNCIL I and reaffirmed at VATICAN COUNCIL II. Küng's controversial book Infallible? An Inquiry (1970) examined this question in great detail. Relying on a rigorous systematic and historical methodology, he argued against the possibility of infallible propositions in both theory and practice. Declarations of the Magisterium, he claimed, were analogous to statements in Holy Scripture, so that just as the Scriptures as a whole are preserved in truth by the Holy Spirit—despite some propositions that are patently false—the certitude and reliability of Church authority is not diminished or vitiated by the proclamation of particular doctrines that are either false or defective. Fallible propositions taught by the Church, Küng argued, do not undermine its God-given indefectibility and perpetuity in the truth. He claimed that in this way he was preserving the core meaning of infallibility, while at the same time admitting both the possibility and reality of errors in Church teaching.

The CDF did not accept this thesis and immediately summoned Küng to ROME to answer questions on his position. Küng refused the invitation on the grounds that he had not been assured a number of procedural safeguards, such as a right to see his dossier and choose his own defense lawyer. The CDF's condemnation of Küng's position on infallibility was officially and publicly affirmed (without mentioning him by name) in 1973 in a vigorous Vatican declaration called Mysterium ecclesiae. While the document showed a sophisticated understanding of the historicity of doctrinal statements, it nevertheless insisted that the substance of dogmatic propositions is unchanging and must be held irrevocably by the faithful. The Vatican thereby rejected any attempt (such as Küng's) to substitute infallibility with the notion of " a fundamental permanence in truth." With this stance, the declaration also undercut any type of dogmatic relativism by maintaining that doctrinal formulae or propositions do, in fact, express determinate truths.

In the exchanges that followed, the CDF admonished Küng about the limits of theological inquiry and reminded him that no Catholic theologian is free to call into question "a dogma of faith in the name of theology." The CDF, supported by the German bishops, strongly exhorted Küng to abandon his controversial (i.e., erroneous) views and abide by the teaching of Mysterium Ecclesiae. With this stern admonition, Küng was expected to refrain from future challenges of official Church teaching, and in 1975 his dispute with the Vatican was temporarily put on hold. His dossier in Rome, however, was not closed.

Apart from questions of Church structure and of papal infallibility, the CDF also lodged a series of additional doctrinal objections to Küng's work, especially to some of the theological positions expressed in his massive volume titled On Being a Christian (1974). In particular, the CDF took issue with Küng's interpretations of the doctrine of the RESURRECTION and Mary's virginal conception, and especially his views on Christ's divinity.

Küng's silence on infallibility was to be short-lived. In 1979 he published a slim volume, The Church—Maintained in Truth?, in which he argued anew that by abandoning the claim of infallibility, the Church would not be giving up its certainty of faith. He sent a copy of the book to the new pope, JOHN PAUL II, followed by a letter in which he also urged the pontiff to dispense with the requirement of priestly celibacy. During that same year he wrote a caustic preface to August Bernhard Hasler's popular work, How the Pope Became Infallible (1981). Tensions with the Vatican were further aggravated by Küng's unsolicited "interim appraisal" of John Paul II's first year as pope, which was published widely in the international press.

On December 15, 1979, the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, in conjunction with the Conference of German Bishops, issued a declaration, approved by Pope John Paul II, which asserted that Professor Küng's writings failed to represent the "integral truth of the Catholic faith" and showed a "contempt for the teaching authority of the Church." In a statement issued on December 18, 1979, Cardinal Höffner, then president of the German Bishops' Conference, pointed out that "the Doctrinal Congregation sees the main reason for this decision in professor Küng's teaching about infallibility in the Church" (Swidler 1981, p. 390).With this decree, Küng was deprived of his canonical mission as a Catholic theologian, and he was subsequently removed from the Catholic faculty at the University of Tübingen. Through a special agreement, however, he was allowed to maintain his position as director of the University's Institute for Ecumenical Research. For his part, Küng continues to assert that he can be both a loyal Catholic theologian and a staunch opponent of Church failings.

Since losing his official status as a Catholic theologian, Küng has focused his writings on foundational questions, such as the existence of God, the religious challenge of Sigmund FREUD, and the reality of eternal life. He has won worldwide recognition for his contributions to interreligious understanding, and he enjoys international respect for his leadership in the movement for world peace through a global ethic. He claims that the Church's condemnation of his theological work was ultimately providential, for it gave him both the time and the opportunity to respond more fully to the universal and urgent challenges that face the world.

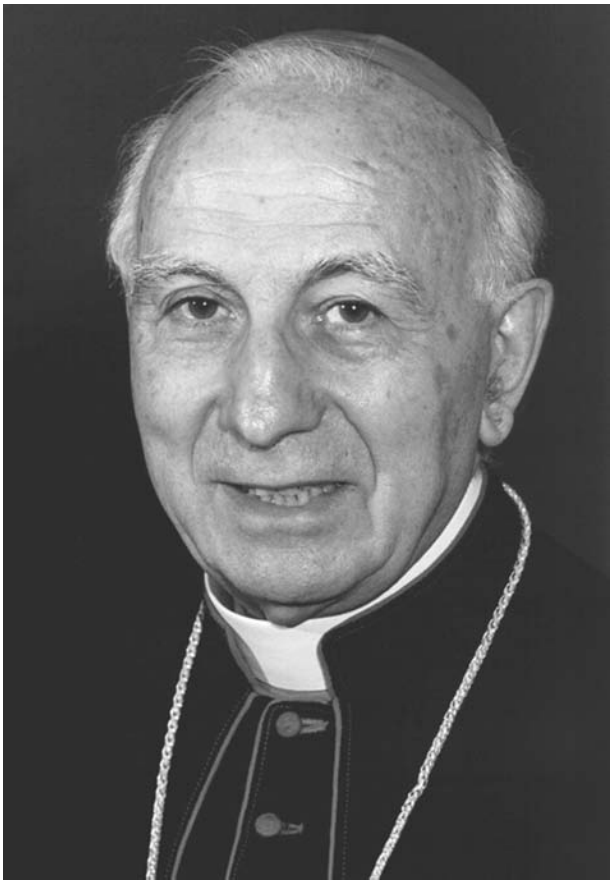
L

LAGHI, PIO

Cardinal, papal representative in JERUSALEM, Argentina, and the United States, prefect of the Congregation for Catholic Education; b. May 21, 1922, Castiglione (Forlì), Italy, d. January 11, 2009, ROME.



Laghi completed his primary and secondary education at the Salesian institute in Faenza, and then entered the diocesan seminary for philosophy. He was assigned to study theology at the Pontifical Lateran University in Rome, while continuing his priestly formation at the Roman Seminary. On April 20, 1946, he was ordained to the priesthood for the Diocese of Faenza. After a brief parochial assignment in Porto Garibaldi (Ferrara), he was sent back to Rome, again to the Lateran University, where he completed doctorates in theology (1947) and canon law (1950). At the request of the secretariat of state, he was assigned to the Pontifical Ecclesiastical Academy in the fall of 1950, to prepare for service to the diplomatic mission of the HOLY SEE.

In 1952 Laghi was appointed secretary to the apostolic nunciature in Managua, Nicaragua, where he mastered Spanish. Three years later he was posted to the apostolic delegation in Washington, D.C. In addition to carrying out the duties of the nunciature, he learned English, engaged in pastoral work, and began a lifelong interest in American culture and the Catholic Church in the United States. After six years in Washington, he was transferred to the nunciature in India, where he worked until 1964, when he was recalled to Rome. He then served five years in the Council for Public Affairs of the secretariat of state, during which time he convinced somewhat apprehensive superiors that it would be appropriate to make the Holy See's WORLD WAR II era archives available for scholarly research.

In 1969 he was ordained a bishop, with the titular see of Mauriana, and nominated by Pope PAUL VI to be apostolic delegate in Jerusalem and PALESTINE. During his five years there, he was a particularly vocal defender of the rights of the Church and the Palestinian people. His diplomatic duties also extended to Cyprus, where he was pro-nuncio, and to Greece, where he served as apostolic visitator.

His skills were such that in 1974 Paul VI appointed him apostolic nuncio to Argentina, where for six years he attempted to protect the prerogatives of the Church and the rights of citizens living under a hostile military government. His service there has been criticized as too accommodating to the junta, but the accounts of those who observed him there and other research show that he was effectively engaged in the more discreet advocacy proper to diplomats, and that he regularly prodded the sometimes apprehensive Argentinian hierarchy to be more aggressive in defending human rights.

Pope JOHN PAUL II appointed Archbishop Laghi apostolic delegate to the United States in 1980. For nine and a half years, his own personal manner, knowledge of America, and style of collaboration with the bishops made him a very visible and popular papal representative. His tenure coincided with notable controversies, such as those involving Raymond Hunthausen, the archbishop of Seattle, and Charles CURRAN, professor of MORAL THEOLOGY at the CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA. In 1984 diplomatic relations between the Holy See and the United States were established, and Laghi became the first apostolic pro-nuncio in America. As such, his responsibilities extended to include representing the interests of the Holy See to the White House, the State Department, and Congress. The U.S. bishops especially noted his annual addresses to the conference each November, in which he spoke on such topics as seminaries, vocations, and Catholic schools. They also expressed appreciation for his extensive travel throughout the country.

During his tenure as apostolic delegate and pronuncio, Archbishop Laghi was particularly well known for the role he played as papal representative in the process by which bishops were appointed and transferred in the United States. Church observers agreed that, in contrast with the years immediately after VATICAN COUNCIL II, when emphasis apparently was placed on the selection of men who came to be called "pastoral" bishops, a different episcopal style came to the fore via the episcopal appointments of the Laghi years, which produced a crop of so-called John Paul II bishops. These were bishops who, on the whole, appeared to attach more importance to orthodoxy in doctrine and conformity to Church law than their predecessors sometimes had done; in this group, it frequently was said, Cardinal John O'CONNOR of New York was a representative figure.

Archbishop Laghi's near decade in America came to an end in 1990, when he was appointed (pro-)prefect of the Congregation for Catholic Education; he was created a cardinal in the consistory of June 28, 1991, with the title of S. Maria Ausiliatrice in Via Tuscolana. As prefect he showed special interest in seminaries, particularly after the post-synodal exhortation Pastores dabo vobis (1992), and in Catholic universities, especially in the implementation of the Apostolic Letter Ex corde Ecclesiae. Beginning in 1992 he also served as president of the Pontifical Oratory of St. Peter, and since 1993 as Protector of the Sovereign Order of Malta. In November 1999, his resignation as prefect was accepted.

Besides his work with the Congregation for Catholic Education and his other posts in Rome, Cardinal Laghi carried out several special diplomatic assignments on behalf of the Holy See. In May 2002 he was special papal envoy to Israel and the Palestinian authority, charged with delivering a personal message from Pope John Paul urging a ceasefire and the resumption of peace talks between the two parties. In March 2003, with war impending in Iraq, he flew to Washington as a special envoy to U.S. President George W. Bush and delivered a message from the pope urging the United States not to launch a military attack. The cardinal had become friendly with President George H.W. Bush and other members of the Bush family during his years as apostolic delegate and pro-nuncio.

Following a private meeting with the president at the White House, the cardinal issued a statement declaring it to be the view of the Holy See that "peaceful avenues" still existed for settling differences with the Saddam Hussein regime in Iraq. "A decision regarding the use of military force can only be taken within the framework of the United Nations," he added, "but always taking into account the grave consequences of such an armed conflict: the suffering of the people of Iraq and those involved in the military operation, a further instability in the region and a new gulf between Islam and Christianity."

On January 11, 2009, after a long illness, Cardinal Laghi died of a blood disease in a Rome hospital. He was eighty-six. In Washington President Bush issued a statement calling him "a friend who ... worked tirelessly for peace and justice in our world." Mass for the cardinal was celebrated January 13 in ST. PETER'S BASILICA in Rome by Cardinal Angelo Sodano, dean of the College of Cardinals and former Vatican secretary of state. At the conclusion of the Mass, Pope BENEDICT XVI praised Cardinal Laghi as a man whose "entire priestly mission ... was passed in the direct service of the Holy See."

LAMBETH ARTICLES

Upon first consideration, the importance of the Lambeth Articles, the abortive 1595 attempt by Puritan divines to turn the Church of England in a decidedly Calvinist direction, seems solely an academic concern. They issued from a faculty squabble, and they never achieved canonical status. Further, Queen Elizabeth I disapproved of them, as did her successor, James I. Yet the articles and the circumstances of their production demonstrate in miniature how the Reformed tradition was developing in the late sixteenth century, which was a period of Roman Catholic resurgence. They also point to how the Anglican Church balanced its theological inclinations, then Reformed to the point of Puritanism, with its institutional imperative to be a national, and therefore somewhat politic, religious establishment.

The basic facts are as follows. In April of 1595, William Barrett, a junior don at Cambridge, delivered a sermon attacking the principles of predestination and the perseverance of the saints. While these principles are now commonly associated with CALVINISM, such associations were less common in 1595—indeed, they were only then coalescing. The Calvinist Synod of Dort, which confirmed these two principles, would not sit for over twenty years. In addition, the synod's foil, Jacobus ARMINIUS (c. 1560–1609)—who held that salvation required free human consent and who gave his name to the anti-Puritan (or "Arminian") party within Anglicanism—was still a member in good standing of the Dutch Reformed Church in 1595. Barrett, who was moving toward ARMINIANISM in his thinking and opposed to the Reformed tradition's Augustinian tendencies, used the word "Calvinist" in derogation, for he was determined to fix his enemies' position at its most extreme. The more rigid a point could be made, the more ridiculous it would seem and the more brittle it would be when pressed by reason and sound scriptural analysis. The perseverance of the saints, for example, was a dogma that savored of antinomianism—if the elect were sure of their fate, why would they honor civil and moral law?

Barrett was a Daniel preaching to the lions, however. Cambridge was dominated by PURITANS, and they rallied to squash what they saw as rank Pelagianism (which advocated the existence of free will), a covenant of works rather than of faith, and a diminution of God's sovereignty. What the older dons had in common with the upstart Barrett was the need to delineate a more rigorous Calvinist orthodoxy. Their motive was not, of course, to defeat Calvinism, but rather to see their version of it established within the Church of England and within Reformed Protestantism generally. By taking their predestinarian logic nearly as far as it could go (for the sake of cohesive strength), they went beyond what John Calvin and his cohort had preached in the first half of the century.

Chief among Barrett's critics was William Whitaker, the Regius Professor of Divinity at Cambridge. Whitaker drafted nine articles that clarified his party's stand (he would have said "God's will") on the nature of atonement and the atoned. Briefly put, ATONEMENT was defined as limited and arbitrary. That is, not everyone would be saved, God already knew who the saved were, and his grace did all the work. SALVATION, therefore, had nothing whatever to do with human effort. All human beings deserved reprobation, but Christ's sacrifice encouraged God to exercise his mercy and pluck some of these reprobates from the fire. Moreover, the elect—those who received the "justifying faith"—were assured of pardon and eternal life.

These articles were presented to the primate of the Anglican Church, John WHITGIFT (c. 1530–1604), the archbishop of Canterbury. Whitgift was annoyed by the imbroglio; his church was, after all, episcopal, and clerics further down the hierarchy, learned though they were, could not be allowed to drive policy. Whitgift was not, however, an unprincipled trimmer enamored of power and power alone. His intellectual sympathies were with Whitaker and the Puritans. Thus, while he doctored the articles slightly, once form (and his authority) was respected, he was content to accept the truth of the articles at a meeting held at his London seat, Lambeth Palace, on November 20, 1595.

Whitgift hoped the new articles would be taken as a supplement to the standard THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES of the Church of England (established in 1571), and thus confirm the Calvinist drift of Anglican belief. Other Puritans hoped the strong statement of principles would guide and bolster the ecclesiastical policies of James, Elizabeth's presumptive heir, who had been raised by Presbyterians (i.e., Calvinists). They would be disappointed. The Anglican Church was royal as well as episcopal, and if Whitgift was offended by Whitaker's initiative, it should not have been a surprise that Elizabeth was as well. From an official point of view, therefore, the Lambeth Articles were a dead letter.

James proved to be no friend to the Puritans either, and he resisted attempts to establish the articles in the early years of his reign. They were countenanced by the Church of Ireland between 1615 and 1634, but that is a trivial matter. What is of more moment is that the attempted but abortive establishment of the Lambeth Articles heralded the political and religious strife of the seventeenth century. The fiercest Puritans, frustrated by the hierarchy they once tried to colonize, went into opposition, and their commonwealth of saints was eventually built at the expense of King Charles and his bishops. The latter were simply dismissed; the former resisted the Puritans' late, violent ascendancy and paid for that mistake with his head.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS AND THE PAPACY

At the end of the nineteenth century, the PAPACY was perceived as being opposed to contemporary ideological and diplomatic developments, despite the efforts of Pope LEO XIII (1878–1903) to mend the papacy's diplomatic posture. In May 1899, when an international conference was held at the Hague to discuss the limitation of armaments and the pacific settlements of international disputes, the papacy was originally invited. It was then disinvited, however, at the behest of the Italians, who were suspicious of the Vatican's motives.

Pope Benedict XV (1914–1922). Born Giacomo Paolo Giovanni Battista della Chiesa, his pontificate was dominated by the events of World War I. THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

Leo was no more able to resolve the ROMAN QUESTION and the loss of the temporal power resulting from Italy's occupation of Rome in 1870 than his predecessor, Pope PIUS IX (1846–1878). His successor Pope PIUS X (1903–1914), in turn, was unable to prevent the eruption of World War I, while the mediation efforts of BENEDICT XV (1914–1922) during the conflict were coldly received by both belligerent camps. In fact, Article 15 of the Treaty of London (1915), which brought Italy into the conflict on the Allied side, specifically assured the Italians that the HOLY SEE would be excluded from the diplomacy of peacemaking. Thus, little heed was paid to Benedict's peace proposal of August 1917, which included his call for a league of nations to resolve international differences and disputes.

Benedict XV Favors League. Benedict's note to the belligerents reiterated the major aims of his pontificate regarding the war, which included a determination to preserve the Vatican's impartiality; to provide assistance without distinction of persons, nationality, or religion; and to hasten the end of the calamity. To achieve these ends, Benedict proposed the general terms on which a peace might be concluded: arbitration, the reduction of armaments, freedom of the seas, no punitive indemnities, evacuation of occupied territories, and the consultation of the inhabitants of disputed areas. Specifically, it called for:

1. A simultaneous and reciprocal decrease in armaments;
2. The institution of international arbitration as a substitute for armies;
3. Free intercourse of peoples and liberty of the seas;
4. The reciprocal renunciation of war indemnities;
5. The evacuation and restoration of all occupied territories;
6. The resolution of political and territorial claims in a spirit of equity and justice.

These could be realized in sequence: first the suspension of the fighting, second the reduction of armaments, and finally the institution of arbitration to resolve differences. The papal initiative was rejected by all the belligerent governments, however, and few were surprised when the 1917 Nobel Peace Prize was awarded to the Red Cross rather than the pope, whose efforts and endeavors remained unrecognized.

The Americans proved no more supportive of Benedict's efforts than the other belligerents. However, President Woodrow Wilson's "Fourteen Points," presented in January 1918, borrowed from the papal proposal. Wilson called for:

1. Open agreements and the renunciation of secret diplomacy;
2. Freedom of the seas;
3. The removal of economic barriers between nations;
4. The reduction of armaments;
5. Impartial adjustment of colonial claims;
6. German evacuation and restoration of Russian territory;
7. Restoration of Belgian sovereignty;
8. The evacuation of France by German troops and the return of Alsace-Lorraine;
9. Redrawing the Italian frontier along national lines;
10. Autonomy for the peoples of Austria-Hungary;
11. The Austro-Hungarian evacuation of Montenegro, Rumania, and Serbia;
12. Self-determination for the peoples of the Ottoman Empire and freedom of navigation through the Dardanelles;
13. The establishment of an independent Poland with access to the sea;
14. The creation of an association of nations to govern international relations.

Pope Benedict embraced Wilson's effort, which reflected his own proposal, as did his secretary of state, Cardinal Pietro GASPARRI. Both hoped it would end the costly and destructive war, provide a just peace, and assure future international tranquility. In his Easter Message to the United States, Pope Benedict called for the emergence of a new organization of peoples and nations aspiring to a "nobler, purer, and kinder civilization." In early December, Benedict responded positively to the armistice of November 11, proclaiming it a respite for a suffering humanity and invoking divine assistance for those taking part in the peace conference. He repeated this invocation in his Christmas Eve message, praying for God's blessing upon the Versailles Peace Conference and observing that the peacemakers had to repair the material havoc of the war while introducing a new international configuration.

Early in January 1919, Benedict XV met with Wilson, the first president of the United States to be received by a Pontiff, and the two discussed prospects for peace and the need to construct a new basis for international relations. The Roman Question was not raised, nor was there any effort on the pope's part to be included in the impending negotiations. Pope Benedict made it clear that he favored a reorganization of international relations, noting the inability of the prevailing international anarchy to peacefully resolve conflicts. He had adhered to this stance since the beginning of his pontificate, and as early as 1914 he appealed to the nations of the world to find some other means of resolving their differences.

Deploring the violation of international law, Benedict believed this contributed to the carnage of the war, and he sought a new code of conduct to assure a more tranquil future. Cardinal Gasparri repeated this message when he elaborated upon the pope's peace proposal of August 1917, focusing on Benedict's call for a new world order that would include the suppression, by common accord of compulsory military service; the constitution of a Court of Arbitration for the solution of international questions, and lastly, for the prevention of infractions, the establishment of a universal boycott (Koenig 1943, pp. 238–39). Consequently, the pope and his secretary of state welcomed the fourteenth point in Wilson's peace proposal, which called for the establishment of a general association of nations for the purpose of providing mutual guarantees of political independence and territorial integrity for great and small states alike.

Rumors of Papal Opposition to League. Despite the numerous and fervent pledges of papal support for the League of Nations, some suspected that both pope and Curia secretly opposed it. Allegedly, they resented the fact that the Covenant of the League, which formed the first part (Articles 1–24) of the treaties of Versailles (with Germany), Saint-Germain (with Austria), Trianon (with Hungary) and Neuilly (with Bulgaria), was formulated without direct papal input. Furthermore, it was believed by some that the Vatican resented that the League's membership was restricted to states, dominions, and colonies, so that the Holy See, generally described in international law as a "Power," was excluded. President Wilson was convinced that the Vatican resented this exclusion and believed that much of the sentiment against the League in the United States was inspired by the papacy. The American president claimed to have both documents and correspondence that exposed the Vatican's opposition and obstructionism, but he never produced them.

In fact, Benedict's Vatican supported Wilson's League. In his encyclical Pacem, Dei munus pulcherrimum (On Peace and Christian Reconciliation) of May 1920, the pope pleaded for nations to put aside mutual suspicion and unite in a league to prevent the outbreak of future disasters. Benedict explained that among the reasons for such an association of nations was the generally recognized need to make every effort to abolish or reduce the enormous burden of military expenditures, which states could no longer bear, and prevent future disastrous wars. Consequently, the Vatican neither engineered nor gloated over the American failure to enter the League of Nations, as some charged. In fact, Benedict was distressed and puzzled by the American rejection of the League they had sponsored, which he deemed "a great conception." Acknowledging the limitations and imperfections of the League of Nations, Benedict praised it as the sole organized effort to realize the Vatican's pacific goals.

Although disillusioned by postwar developments, in his last years Benedict continued to champion international efforts to preserve the precarious peace. In November 1921, he telegraphed the new U.S. president, Warren G. Harding, at the opening of the International Conference on Naval Limitation (the Washington Conference), and in December the pontiff blessed the work of the Congrès Démocratique Internationale, the First International Democratic Congress in Paris. Nonetheless, he regretted so little had been accomplished to assure tranquility, and some suspected this led the pope to neglect the cold he caught at the end of December 1921, which contributed to a bronchial infection and his death on January 22, 1922.

Pius XI and the League. In 1922 Benedict was followed by Ambrogio Achille Ratti, who assumed the name Pope PIUS XI. Like his predecessor, Pius called for international cooperation and conciliation, and he begged the world powers to abandon their recourse to military measures to resolve problems. He hoped that the League of Nations, imbued with a Christian spirit of reconciliation, would work to preserve the peace, and he offered support for such a mission. In the summer of 1923, when John Eppstein of the League's Committee on Foreign Relations proposed that diplomatic relations be established between the Council of the League and the Holy See, Cardinal Gasparri responded that the Holy Father very much appreciated the good work and peaceful efforts of the organization. He proceeded to outline the papal position toward the League. Speaking on behalf of Pius XI, he stipulated that the projected relations could be established with the understanding that the Holy See would be at the disposal of the League for matters within its competence. He cited, among other things, the Holy See's participation in the elaboration of principle regarding morality and international law and in providing assistance to the League's relief efforts.

The Vatican was not an uncritical supporter of every action undertaken by the League of Nations, however. In 1926, for example, the Holy See made a rare, direct approach to the organization by instructing its nuncio at Bern to present the Vatican's assessment of the projected antislavery convention. While approving the overall intent of the League's action, it did not believe that the proposed convention was sufficiently clear or strong in support of Christian missions in pagan countries. Determined to preserve its freedom of action, the Vatican did not petition for admission to the League, despite the spate of rumors that it planned to do so. The papal secretary of state discounted the rumors, letting it be known that the Vatican neither plotted nor planned for full participation. However, if it was called upon, it would put itself at the League's service in assisting those in need.

Nonetheless, the rumors of papal plotting against the League of Nations continued, and the accusation spread that the Holy See sought to orchestrate a uniform Catholic response to international questions. When Brazil withdrew from the organization in 1926, a good part of the English press clamored that the Vatican was responsible, claiming it had pressured that Catholic country to leave the League because it resented its continued exclusion. To rebut these unfounded allegations, in August 1926 L'Osservatore Romano, the authoritative voice of the Vatican, published a long article commending the work of the League and reiterating the Vatican's support and appreciation of its efforts. The article added that it would be against the spirit of the Church to deny support to institutions such as the League, which upheld the banner of peace and cooperation amid the mania of increasing national egoism. Furthermore, it noted that the Church's mission was primarily religious and social, and that, unless asked, the Church refrained from intervening in political and diplomatic affairs.

This was later confirmed by Article 24 of the LATERAN Treaty with Italy (1929), which specified that "in the field of international relations, the Holy See declares that it wishes to remain, and will remain, extraneous to all temporal disputes between nations, and to international congresses convoked for the settlement of such disputes, unless the contending parties make a joint appeal to its mission of peace." This was precisely the position the Vatican maintained toward the League's peacekeeping efforts. It was not indicative of disinterest on the part of the Holy See, which paid close attention to its attempts to promote disarmament and efforts to restore peace in China and South America. After 1930, the new secretary of state, Eugenio Pacelli (future Pope PIUS XII), likewise appreciated the League's efforts to promote the international common good. Early in 1931, L'Osservatore Romano hailed the English pronouncement that their government sought no alliance other than the "world alliance" provided by the League, claiming this reflected the papal stance.

Successes and Failures of League. Although the attitude of the Vatican toward the League of Nations remained one of support and sympathy, this view was tempered by a good dose of realism, particularly when the organization was challenged by the aggressive attitudes and actions of a number of states, including Fascist Italy, Nazi Germany, Imperial Japan, and Soviet Russia. Furthermore, the Vatican recognized the "excessive" influence of England and France in the organization, and while it appreciated the role the League played in the administration of the Saar region of Germany and the free city of Danzig, it questioned the Francophile sentiments of its administrators. Nonetheless, the Vatican recognized that the League provided the military force to preserve order in the Saar before and during the 1935 plebiscite that was to determine its final allegiance and political affiliation.

Furthermore, while acknowledging that the mandate system the League administered was better than having those territories formerly controlled by Germany overseas and the Ottoman Empire in the Middle East absorbed by the victorious powers, the Holy See recognized that their governance was less than objective and did little to prepare those "backward" territories for independence. Finally, while the League undertook to protect the minorities in the newly formed states of Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Yugoslavia from abuse and mistreatment, it confronted the prevailing wall of state sovereignty and opposition to outside intrusion, rendering its task difficult if not impossible.

The League also sought to aid the victims of persecution in Nazi Germany and a number of other states. The American James G. McDonald (1886–1964), who became the League's High Commissioner for Refugees, traveled to a number of states and the Vatican, seeking refuge for Jews and other persecuted minorities. He resigned in protest in 1935 due to the lack of support for his efforts and an unwillingness of many countries to open their borders to the persecuted.

The Vatican was also disappointed by the League's performance in confronting aggression in the international realm. This was clearly expressed by Monsignor Giuseppe Pizzardo, the papal undersecretary of state, who indicated that the Vatican made a diverse evaluation of the organization's political role and its social and cultural action. Acknowledging the contribution and accomplishments in this second area, the course of events he stipulated revealed the League's failure to cope with or curb aggression. This was clearly shown by the early 1930s, when the League proved unable to deal with Japanese aggression toward China, which was followed by the Japanese occupation of Manchuria in 1931. The League Council did appoint an international commission, presided over by Lord Lytton of Great Britain, to investigate the conflict. Before it could issue its report, however, Japan unilaterally recognized the "independent" state of Manchukuo, which was clearly a puppet regime. In March 1933, in response to the League's rebuke, Japan announced its intention of leaving the organization.

The League proved no more capable of providing a solution to the border dispute between Ethiopia and the Italian colonies of Eritrea and Somaliland (now Somalia). When Ethiopia appealed to the League for arbitration in 1935, Benito Mussolini dispatched his forces across the border and commenced the conquest of Ethiopia. The Council, having learned from its experience with Japan, moved quickly to condemn the Italian government's aggression, and subsequently fifty-one nations in the League Assembly voted to impose sanctions upon Italy. However, oil, Italy's greatest need, was not included in the ban, and Italian ships were still allowed to use the Suez Canal. This allowed Italy to complete its conquest and to annex Ethiopia in 1936. This had a further and more devastating effect, for during the international confusion that ensued, Adolf HITLER was able to remilitarize the Rhineland in violation of treaty obligations.

Pius was distressed by both the Fascist and Nazi actions. Although part of the clergy accepted Mussolini's propaganda that the conquest was, in essence, a crusade to spread Christianity, Pius XI opposed Italy's invasion, occupation, and annexation of Ethiopia, fearing this would have a negative impact on the natives' attitude toward the Church. Pius also believed that the Nazi occupation of the Rhineland only encouraged Hitler's further aggression. However, papal criticism no more curbed the Fascist regime than the limited actions of the League of Nations, and neither the Pope nor the world powers were surprised when Italy resigned from the League in 1937.

The League also failed to curb the intervention of the major powers in the Spanish Civil War (1936–1939), which cost the lives of some three-quarters of a million souls. In the absence of League action, some twenty-seven European states established an international nonintervention committee. However, this committee was to spend most of its time investigating charges of intervention, and it proved both unwilling and unable to prevent foreign intrusion into the conflict. Some have suggested that this failure of collective security encouraged the Fascist, Nazi, and Japanese aggression that led to the outbreak of World War II in September 1939.

Pius XII and League. Eugenio Pacelli, who became Pius XII on March 2, 1939, as the clouds of war thickened, understood that he could not rely on the League of Nations to preserve the peace, and this awareness encouraged him to undertake papal mediation. This proved unsuccessful, however, as did his attempt to keep Italy out of the conflict. Pius regretted the failure of the League, particularly its inability to implement the new international order he considered necessary to achieve a limitation on state authority, the theme of his first encyclical, issued in October 1939. He welcomed Franklin Delano Roosevelt's decision to dispatch a personal representative to the Holy See, and he shared the president's effort to limit the war and bring about a speedy and just solution to this second world conflagration. He also shared the American conviction that a new international order was needed, and he supported the creation of the United Nations at war's end.

The League of Nations clearly failed to preserve the peace in the interwar period. It was unable to curb aggression throughout the 1930s or prevent the outbreak of the World War II in 1939. In light of this record, some have judged it a total failure. Both Pius XII and President Roosevelt presented a more positive evaluation, however, with both of them appreciating its contribution in spreading the ideals of international cooperation, armament reduction, and providing aid and assistance to the whole of humanity. In addition, Pius XII and his successors have been supportive of the United Nations, whose institutions, framework, and vision mirror those of the League of Nations.

LEDÓCHOWSKA, MARIA TERESA, BL.

Foundress of the Sodality of St. Peter Claver for African Missions (now the MISSIONARY SISTERS OF ST. PETER CLAVER); b. Loosdorf, Austria, April 29, 1863; d. Rome, July 6, 1922; beatified Oct. 19, 1975 by Pope Paul VI.

She was the daughter of Count Antonius Kalka-Ledóchowski; the sister of Wladimir LEDÓCHOWSKI, superior general of the JESUITS, and St. Urszula LEDÓCHOWSKA (canonized by Pope John Paul II, May 18, 2003); and the niece of Cardinal Mieczysław LEDÓCHOWSKI. After living at Salzburg in the court of the grand duchess of Tuscany (1885–90), Countess Ledóchowska came under the influence of Cardinal Charles LAVIGERIE and dedicated herself entirely to the abolition of slavery and to the evangelization of Africa. In 1894 she founded a religious congregation to aid the missions of Africa directly or indirectly. For the remainder of her life she acted as the sodality's superior general. She recognized the importance of the press for the mission apostolate and started the periodical Echo of Africa. The polyglot printing plants that she established have published millions of copies of catechisms and other religious works in native languages.

LEDÓCHOWSKA, URSZULA (URSULA), ST.

Baptized Julia Maria, foundress of the Ursuline Sisters of the Heart of Jesus in Agony; b. Loosdorf, Austria, April 17, 1865; d. Rome, Italy, May 29, 1939; beatified June 20, 1983; canonized May 18, 2003, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

The second of nine children born to Count Antonius Kalka-Ledóchowski and Countess Josephine Salis-Zizers, Ursula Ledóchowska grew up in a pious household. Her siblings included Bl. Maria Teresa LEDÓCHOWSKA and Wladimir LEDÓCHOWSKI, and one of her uncles was Cardinal Mieczysław LEDÓCHOWSKI.

With her father's blessing, given just before his death in 1885, Ursula joined the Ursuline convent in Kraków on August 18, 1886. She spent more than twenty years there, the last few as prioress of the convent (1904–1907). During this time, Ursula was active in the education of the young and founded Poland's first boarding-house for female students after the universities were opened to women.

In 1907 Ursula left Kraków to work in St. Petersburg, Russia, where she established a convent and a boarding school for Polish girls, all while under surveillance from the Russian secret police. She was forced to leave Russia in 1914 at the outbreak of WORLD WAR I, and she spent the war years in the countries of Scandinavia, contributing to the ecumenical movement through her contacts with Protestant leaders. During this period, Ursula also worked vigorously to promote the welfare of Polish exiles and war victims through lectures on Polish culture, the foundation of small charitable organizations, and other activities.

Ursula returned to the Kraków convent in 1920. Her work during the war had focused on the education of the poor and infirm, and she recognized that this work had led her apostolate to diverge from that of the Kraków convent, which ministered mainly to women from better-off families. Ursula therefore founded a new autonomous congregation that would be better able to continue her apostolate, the Ursuline Sisters of the Heart of Jesus in Agony (or the "Gray Ursulines"), at Pniewy, near Poznań. The order's spirituality centers on contemplating Christ's saving love and participating in his mission of service to others. After receiving papal approbation (conditionally in 1923, permanently in 1930), the Gray Ursulines spread throughout Poland and beyond. The HOLY SEE eventually called Ursula to Rome, where she inspired many Catholic institutions and where she died. In his HOMILY at her canonization Mass in 2003, John Paul II praised St. Ursula as "an apostle of the new evangelization" in her own era, "demonstrating a constant timeliness, creativity, and the effectiveness of Gospel love by her life and action."

LEDÓCHOWSKI, WLADIMIR

Superior general of the JESUITS; b. Loosdorf, Austria, Oct. 7, 1866; d. Rome, Dec. 13, 1942.

He was the son of Count Antonius Kalka-Ledóchowski, the brother of Bl. Maria Teresa LEDÓCHOWSKA and St. Urszula LEDÓCHOWSKA (canonized by Pope John Paul II, May 18, 2003), and the nephew of Cardinal Mieczysław LEDÓCHOWSKI. During his secondary school studies at the Theresianum in Vienna, he was a page for the Austrian empress, Elisabeth of Bavaria. After studying law for a year at the University of Kraców, he began to study for the secular priesthood in 1885 at Tarnów and continued then at the GREGORIAN UNIVERSITY in Rome. In 1889 he joined the Jesuits and was ordained in 1894. He was appointed successively writer, superior of the residence in Kraców, and then rector of the college there, vice-provincial (1901) and provincial (1902) of the Galicia province. He acted as assistant for the German assistancy from 1906 until Feb. 11, 1915, when he was elected the 26th superior general of the order. During his term in this post (1915–42) assistancies increased in number from five to eight; provinces, from 26 to 50; missions, from 29 to 46; missionaries, from 971 to 3,785; members from 16,946 to 26,588.

Ledóchowski was responsible also for the new codification of the order's constitutions after the promulgation of the Code of Canon Law; the reorganization of the superior general's curia; changes in the Ratio Studiorum; the notable impetus given to the Jesuit institutions of higher studies in Rome, including the Pontifical Oriental Institute and the Russian College (which was confided to the Jesuits during Ledóchowski's generalate); the promotion of publications, especially scientific ones; the vigorous impulse to the work of the SPIRITUAL EXERCISES, to sodalities of the Blessed Virgin, and to the APOSTLESHIP OF PRAYER. His numerous letters and instructions to Jesuits promoted IGNATIAN SPIRITUALITY. Ledóchowski was noted for keen perception, knowledge of men and of conditions throughout the world, spiritual firmness, and indefatigable labor.

LEGION OF DECENCY

From 1934 through the late 1960s, the Legion of Decency, a voluntary organization established by American Catholic bishops, exercised considerable control over the content of Hollywood films and the choices of the Catholic movie-going public. The legion defended its activities as supporting public morality, but many charged it with censorship.

Efforts to control the content of motion pictures, of course, have not been limited to Catholics. During the early twentieth century, for example, Protestant progressive reformers worried that the violence, lust, and lawlessness portrayed on screen contributed to juvenile delinquency. In response to such concerns, states and cities throughout the country passed laws prohibiting the screening of motion pictures considered threatening to public morality. In Mutual v. Ohio (1915), the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the legality of these regulations, thus denying the right of the film industry to unlimited free speech and asserting the right of states and municipalities to enforce community standards of decency.

The "Hays Code." Soon after this decision, the reputation of the film industry suffered from several well-publicized scandals. Seeking to improve their image and to head off further regulation, the leaders of the industry decided to band together to regulate the content of films themselves. In 1922 they formed the Motion Picture Producers and Distributors of America (MMPDA), and Will Hays, a prominent Republican, was hired to direct the new organization. In 1930, Hays introduced the Motion Picture Production Code, or the "Hays Code," which prohibited sympathetic or explicit depictions of crime or sex outside of marriage. Nudity was prohibited, as was lewd dancing and the mockery of religion.

Hays had solicited advice on the code from several prominent Catholics concerned with the morality of Hollywood films including Father Daniel LORD (1888–1955), a drama professor at St. Louis University, and Martin Quigley, a Catholic publisher from Chicago. They were displeased by the tenor of films produced in Hollywood in the early 1930s, especially the sexual innuendo of Mae West movies such as She Done Him Wrong (1933) and the violence of gangster films like Scarface (1932).

Early History of the Legion. Public concern increased in 1933, when Henry James Forman's book, Our Movie Made Children, warned that Hollywood films were creating a new generation of criminals. In response, American bishops took action. They appointed Archbishop John T. McNicholas (1877–1950) of Cincinnati to lead the Catholic Legion of Decency (the official name soon changed to the National Legion of Decency), which was established to cleanse the country of "obscene and lascivious moving pictures" (quoted in Black 1998, p. 22). In January 1934, the Legion of Decency made headlines by threatening to boycott films they considered immoral. Both the Catholic press and the pulpit would be used to enforce their standards.

Anyone could join the Legion of Decency, so long as he or she signed the pledge to "remain away from all motion pictures except those which did not offend decency and Christian morality" (Time 1934). No dues were charged. Protestants and Jews were invited to join, but the vast majority of members were Catholics, whose concentration in urban areas made Hollywood executives particularly concerned about losing audience members for first-run films.

The legion spread quickly across America as local priests encouraged the faithful to stand and take the pledge. Pope PIUS XI endorsed the campaign, urging Catholics to make their decisions about which films to see "a duty of conscience." Within months, the legion claimed 2 million members, organized into diocesan chapters (Time 1934). By the summer of 1934, Fox, Paramount, and Warner Brothers all promised to cooperate with the new organization rather than risk a boycott from the nation's 20 million Catholics.

An agreement on a single standard of morality proved difficult to achieve, however. Within a few years, the legion delegated the task of judging films to the International Federation of Catholic Alumnae (IFCA), which had been producing a "white list" of films suitable for Catholic viewers since the 1920s. Under the direction of Mary Looram, a group of female volunteers rated films as either acceptable for all audiences (A1), acceptable for all adults (A2), objectionable (B), or condemned (C). Catholics were forbidden to view those films that received a "C" rating. However, final judgment rested with the Catholic hierarchy and with the male directors of the legion, who occasionally overrode the recommendations of the IFCA.

Father John McClafferty became the director of the legion's national office in 1937, but Martin Quigley remained its most powerful figure. Based in New York, the legion worked closely with the movie industry's own Production Code Administration (PCA) to prevent the production and distribution of offensive films. Hollywood producers whose films received a "C" rating could negotiate with the legion to remove the offending material. Scenes might be inserted or deleted, dialogue altered, or a prologue or epilogue added to frame the film in morally acceptable terms. Famous films changed to conform to the demands of the legion included A Streetcar Named Desire (1951), Baby Doll (1956), Suddenly Last Summer (1959), and Lolita (1962).

Burstyn v. Wilson. Few Hollywood films needed changes, however, because most writers, directors, and producers worked within the constraints set by the PCA and the Legion of Decency. But these self-imposed standards did not apply to foreign films. In December 1950, the Legion of Decency condemned The Miracle, a short film by the Italian director Roberto Rossellini about a peasant woman who believes she is an incarnation of the Virgin Mary and has become pregnant through an immaculate conception. The legion waged an aggressive campaign against the Manhattan theater showing the film. In response, Edward T. McCaffrey, the city commissioner of licenses, banned the film as "blasphemous," and the New York State Board of Regents revoked the permit to display the film (Parke 1950, p. 21).

Joseph Burstyn, the distributor of Rossellini's film, appealed the actions of the state, and the case eventually reached the U.S. Supreme Court. In 1952, the Court ruled in Burstyn v. Wilson that films could not be banned because censors deemed them sacrilegious. This and subsequent court decisions undermined the legal basis for censorship and made the Legion of Decency appear manipulative and overreaching. In the early 1950s, cultural critics such as Arthur Schlesinger Jr. began questioning the need for censorship. Leaders of the legion responded by hardening their stance, warning that Catholics who attended condemned movies were committing a sin.

The cultural climate in the nation continued to change, however, and moderate Catholic priests, writers, and laypeople began to doubt the judgment of the legion. In 1956, Hollywood moguls agreed to a less-restrictive production code. In 1957, Pope PIUS XII issued Miranda prorsus, an encyclical urging Catholics to take a more positive approach to film and other media as a means of education. As a result, the legion's negative approach began to seem more and more outdated.

In order to make itself appear more moderate, the Legion of Decency made several attempts at reform. In 1965, for example, its name was changed to the National Catholic Office for Motion Pictures (NCOMP). The power of the organization continued to decline, however, and many priests no longer found it appropriate have their parishioners swear to follow the revised pledge suggested by the NCOMP. In 1966, Hollywood adopted its own rating system.

At the height of its power, the League of Decency exerted a remarkable degree of influence over the production, distribution, and viewing of films in America. In the 1930s and 1940s, it succeeded in identifying Catholic morality with American values. By the late 1950s, however, this association began to fray and the Legion of Decency seemed increasingly out of touch with a nation less tolerant of censorship. Yet some Catholics continue to be concerned by the moral content of Hollywood films. In the beginning of the twenty-first century, the UNITED STATES CONFERENCE OF CATHOLIC BISHOPS continues to rate films as to their acceptability for Catholic audiences.

LIBERALISM

Derived from the Latin word for freedom, liberalism has been in many ways the dominant political and social philosophy of the modern Western world since the time of the French Revolution. Although the roots of the idea of freedom lie with the ancient Greeks, it was primarily during the ENLIGHTENMENT (eighteenth century) that the concept became central to Western thought. In many ways the founder of liberalism was John LOCKE, who argued that government exists to protect the liberties of the citizens and is therefore answerable to the citizens.

Locke defined liberties in a concrete, English way—life, liberty, and property—whereas the French Enlightenment (e.g., VOLTAIRE, CONDORCET, and ROUSSEAU) formulated liberty as an abstract concept that led to the revolutionary slogan "liberty, equality, fraternity!" To some extent liberalism has always been divided between these two concepts—"negative" liberty conceived as freedom from undue restraint, "positive" liberty as the ability to fulfill one's aspirations.

Development. The FRENCH REVOLUTION (1789–1799) exposed the danger of this abstract idea of freedom, in that the achievement of liberty required the suppression of everyone deemed to be its enemies, thereby justifying one of the most tyrannical regimes in Western history. Almost simultaneously, however, the American Revolution (1775–1783) produced the first successful example of a liberal polity.

Despite the fact that the Congress of Vienna in 1815 tried to restore the Old Regime as it was before the French Revolution, the movement now called liberalism remained in many ways the dominant influence in Western life for over a century. At a minimum it meant representative government that was respectful of the natural rights of its citizens. Some liberals, distrustful of the masses, thought that liberty was incompatible with DEMOCRACY, but the movement came to encompass everything from democracy to constitutional MONARCHY. Although separation of CHURCH AND STATE was not a universal liberal goal, FREEDOM OF RELIGION was. Liberalism was to a great extent a movement of the burgeoning middle class, who rejected the idea of hereditary privilege and celebrated self-determination.

The Anglo-Saxon tradition, epitomized by John Stuart MILL, pursued liberty incrementally, primarily through parliamentary institutions, but in other places it was not easily attained, as in the largely unsuccessful attempts at revolution in half a dozen countries in 1848. In France it was only with the overthrow of NAPOLEON III in 1871 that a truly liberal regime could be said to exist, while the movement made only limited gains in Germany, Spain, and other countries.

Taking the Enlightenment idea of progress virtually for granted, liberalism largely dismissed traditional beliefs and institutions as outmoded by holding that political liberty, intellectual freedom, and economic development would permit human existence to improve inexorably, a belief that seemed confirmed by dramatic technological progress.

Divisions. Liberalism had a complex relationship to nationalism, in that, as in Germany, the latter movement demanded freedom from traditional political dynasties but often patriotically supported authoritarian regimes once nationhood had been achieved. Liberalism also had an ambivalent relationship with imperialism, especially because England was both the leading liberal nation of the nineteenth century and the head of the greatest empire in the world. In Germany liberals in 1848 espoused nationalism under the authoritarian king of Prussia in order to achieve political unity. Some liberals opposed imperialism on the grounds that it deprived the colonial peoples of those liberties that the mother country claimed for itself, whereas others justified the system on the grounds that colonial peoples had to be kept in tutelage until they learned liberal principles of self-government.

At its core liberalism developed as an economic philosophy, variously known as "classical liberalism,"

"laissez-faire," and the "free market," based on the belief that, just as government ought not to dictate to people about religion or politics, so also it ought not to interfere with their economic activity. The Scottish philosopher Adam SMITH particularly articulated this idea, on the assumption that individuals best knew their own interests and should be left free to pursue those interests through unrestricted trading—the "law of supply and demand." Classical liberalism coincided with the Industrial Revolution and justified allowing the new system to develop unhampered by government regulation. Liberals also advocated free trade, by which they meant international markets unimpeded by tariffs.

The liberal understanding of freedom expanded throughout the nineteenth century, the most notable instance being the abolition of slavery throughout the West. In most liberal states universal male suffrage was achieved around the middle of the century, although female suffrage was delayed until the early twentieth.

The technological developments of the nineteenth century for the first time made it possible to alleviate many of the root causes of suffering. Although some classical liberals sternly insisted that poverty was inevitable according to the iron laws of the marketplace, the liberal spirit also gave birth to a new humanitarianism that was increasingly sensitive to social evils—slavery, child abuse, mistreatment of the insane, educational inequality, cruelty to animals, disease, destitution—and mounted organized efforts to mitigate them—all of which were to be alleviated through laws and by private philanthropy. To some extent demands for social reform that, of necessity, interfered with the free market placed orthodox classical liberals on the defensive.

Some liberals argued that war was caused mainly by outmoded dynastic rivalries and could be avoided through enlightened diplomacy and international trade. Ironically, sometimes it seemed necessary to go to war to defend liberal values. Thus Woodrow Wilson (1856–1924) justified American involvement in the First World War (1914–1918) to "make the world safe for democracy," and the post-war settlement was based on liberal principles, such as the dismemberment of defeated empires, self-determination for their former subjects, compulsory democracy in the former monarchies of Germany and Austria, and a League of Nations that promoted international cooperation.

Crises. But the Great War—the greatest carnage the world had yet seen, when the vaunted gains of technology became instruments of unimaginable destruction—also shook liberal confidence in progress, and overall the era between the two world wars was not a good time for liberalism. The Soviet Union, a country that had scarcely any liberal tradition at all, and Germany and Italy, where that tradition had been weak, created the distinctively modern phenomenon of totalitarianism—political control over every aspect of people's lives. Communism condemned liberal freedom as a mere cloak for bourgeois interests, whereas FASCISM was contemptuous of the liberal spirit as sentimental weakness that undermined the individual's loyalty to the nation. The League of Nations proved powerless to stop the aggressions of Fascism and Nazism, against Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, and Abyssinia, even as liberal Britain and France appeared to lack the will to do so.

The Great Depression (1929–1939) also damaged the credibility of liberalism, in that the free market appeared to have failed. Some Westerners saw the Soviet Union as a model of economic growth and social justice, whereas others regarded Germany and Italy as models of efficiency. Both wondered whether history had advanced to the point where liberal values had to be sacrificed for greater goods such as order and prosperity.

Redefinition. The tension between humanitarianism and the free market was exacerbated by the Depression, resulting in a revolution in the very meaning of liberalism, a shift from "negative" freedom as the absence of government control to a "positive" concept of governmental action on behalf of those in need. Economic institutions thus came to be viewed as more oppressive than government. The welfare state that provided for people's needs through pensions, medical services, and unemployment insurance had originally been a paternalistic conservative idea in the nineteenth century, but it now became the centerpiece of liberalism, almost the exact opposite of what liberalism had originally meant.

Both liberalism and conservatism then emerged as variations of liberalism. Classical conservatism, based on hereditary monarchy and ARISTOCRACY, had largely disappeared in the West, thus most so-called conservatives were actually the heirs of classical liberalism. The welfare state came to be generally accepted, with disagreements mainly over its scope.

In World War II (1939–1945) the Allies defined the issues in liberal terms—personal freedom versus dictatorship—so that the defeat of fascism gave liberalism a new life. During the Cold War that followed, the essential issue remained the same and, while some liberals remained enamored of communism, anti-communism was mainly a liberal phenomenon.

Liberalism and the Church. Historically, the Catholic reaction to liberalism was often negative, because it was seen as an assertion of human freedom against divine LAW, a perception strongly reinforced by the brutalities of the French Revolution. Union of Church and state and the divine authority of social hierarchy were often taken for granted by Catholics. A few, such as Félicité de LAMENNAIS, attempted to formulate a Catholic liberalism, but Joseph de MAISTRE, who blamed the disasters of the revolutionary era on the rejection of the divine order embodied in the Church, was more representative. The popes of the time mainly saw liberalism in its continental manifestations, where exaltations of freedom were often accompanied by such things as the curtailment of religious schools; thus PIUS IX condemned many of the doctrines of liberalism in The Syllabus of Errors (1864).

But although LEO XIII warned American Catholics against an uncritical view of democracy, he also encouraged Catholic participation in democratic politics. Paradoxically, although liberals viewed the Church as politically reactionary, the Church's criticism of liberal economic doctrines made it seem radical, as in Leo's Rerum novarum (1891), which condemned the unrestrained free market and upheld the rights of labor. To some extent Catholics viewed capitalism as a disordered acquisitiveness akin to the pride that had rejected traditional institutions.

From the beginning liberalism aroused the suspicion that it required philosophical skepticism or RELATIVISM, that its concept of freedom was empty, and that it could not identify basic human good. Some liberals considered any concept of absolute truth as dangerous—something that gave continental liberalism its anti-religious character—but liberalism was also justified on pragmatic grounds, as a public order that respected everyone's rights and was compatible with a variety of beliefs. Liberals in Anglo-Saxon countries have often been religious believers. The Church and liberal society achieved a theological rapprochement in the Second Vatican Council's Decree on Religious Liberty, which for the first time set forth a distinctively Catholic theory of political freedom, based not on skepticism but on a metaphysical understanding of freedom as essential to human dignity.

Contemporary Liberalism. The worldwide rebellion of the 1960s marked another major crisis for liberalism, as a renewed Marxism denounced liberalism for practicing "repressive tolerance" on behalf of entrenched interests, and liberals often responded by acknowledging the truth of the charges. Historically, liberalism was often criticized as excessively individualistic, of being unable to understand the importance of community in people's lives. Now liberals elevated the idea of equality above that of liberty, deemphasizing individual liberty, treating members of racial, ethnic, or gender groups equally, and advocating programs to achieve specific results for such groups, programs that in turn produced a conservative backlash.

The New Left also included a strong anti-religious element, so that contemporary liberalism, even in the Anglo-Saxon countries, became increasingly antipathetic to the influence of religion in public life. Until the later twentieth century, mainstream liberalism had little to do with ABORTION, CONTRACEPTION, DIVORCE, and HOMOSEXUALITY, but all such social issues were now defined by liberals as fundamental human rights, even as some liberal theorists, such as Amy Gutmann (1949–), justified the curtailment of religious liberty on behalf of Enlightenment values. The twenty-first-century crisis in liberalism thus became whether it could continue to uphold universal freedom or whether it would become merely one ideology among others.

LIMBO

Limbo is a word derived from the Latin limbus, literally meaning the hem or border as of a garment. The word is not employed by the Fathers, nor does it appear in Scripture. Since the thirteenth century, theologians have used the term to designate the state and place either of those righteous souls destined for salvation who could not enter heaven before the REDEMPTION (the limbo of the fathers) or of those souls who likewise do not deserve eternal torment but are eternally excluded from the beatific vision because of original sin alone (the children's limbo).

The Limbo of the Fathers. Inhabiting the "limbo of the fathers" (our ancestors in the faith) were those who led a righteous life before JESUS' earthly existence and death. They could not enter heaven even though righteous, however, because of ADAM and EVE's sin. This is the limbo (the Hebrew Sheol, the Greek Hades) referred to in the APOSTLES' CREED—the HELL into which CHRIST descended after his crucifixion. Jesus' experience of a true human death included his entering this realm of the dead, but his descent there redeemed the just and brought them to salvation. The "limbo of the fathers" explains how the righteous who died before Christ's death could eventually attain salvation, while maintaining that their salvation depended upon and was effected by Christ's death.

The Limbo of Children. The consensus of the Church Fathers was that baptism alone, with its remission of ORIGINAL SIN, could save small children in the event of their untimely death. In 385 Pope St. SIRICIUS warned against delaying the baptism of newborn infants, lest through death they should "lose the kingdom [of God]" (cf. Denzinger-Hünermann [D-H] 2005, 184). More emphatically, Pope St. INNOCENT I in 417 denounced as "utterly foolish" the opinion "that infants can be granted the rewards of eternal life even without the grace of baptism" (D-H 2005, 219). In the East, St. Gregory Nazianzen (d. 389) was equally definite that these souls will not be glorified, but added that neither will they suffer the pains of hell. "Not everyone," he argued, "who is not good enough to be honored is bad enough to be punished" (Oration 40 381, XXIII). Gregory's teaching, which spread gradually and without controversy throughout the East, eventually gained general acceptance in the West as well. Here, the term limbo of children was used from medieval times onward to designate the condition wherein unbaptized infants are deprived of the beatific vision but suffer no "pain of sense" in hell. Pope INNOCENT III affirmed in a letter of 1201 that this deprivation is the punishment for original sin, whereas "the torment of eternal Gehenna" is that which repays actual (mortal) sin (cf. D-H 2005, 780). The Council of FLORENCE (1439) defined that "those who die in actual mortal sin or in original sin only go down to hell without delay, but undergo different punishments" (D-H 2005, 1306). (The term hell is understood here to include limbo as its edge or border [limbus].) St. THOMAS AQUINAS held that because those in limbo are unaware that the supernatural bliss of the beatific vision is even possible, their own lack of it causes them no sorrow. Indeed, they will forever enjoy natural happiness (cf. II Sent., 33, 2, 2). Francisco SUÁREZ, in his Commentaria ac Disputationes on Aquinas' Summa theologiae, Part III, eventually developed the most positive view of limbo. He maintained that these persons would rise bodily on the Last Day to live happily as eternally young adults in the new earthly paradise (Disp. 50, 5).

The Augustinian Interlude. The arrival at a universal Christian consensus in favor of limbo (with or without that name) was delayed in the West by the fifth-century Pelagian controversy, in which Augustine of Hippo was a leading protagonist. Stressing the reality of original sin in reaction to Pelagius' denial of it, Augustine maintained that the souls of unbaptized infants, despite their lack of personal responsibility, do indeed suffer the pains of hell, although only "very mildly." Owing to St. Augustine's great prestige and his influence on the decrees of the provincial Council of Carthage (418), this view was endorsed by other theologians in the West, where it remained common teaching until the twelfth century. It was then Abelard who challenged this depressing Augustinian scenario and opened the way for the more optimistic thesis described above—a thesis which, in a simpler, less developed form, had gained peaceful currency throughout Eastern Christendom since the Patristic era.

From Trent to Pistoia. The Council of TRENT affirmed that justification "cannot take place without the washing of regeneration or the desire for it" (D-H 2005, 1524); but the Fathers also debated intensely Thomas Cajetan's opinion that this saving "desire" might include that of the parents of a dying unborn child, if one of them blessed it while invoking the Trinity. While no agreement was reached either for or against the orthodoxy of this opinion, the Council's Catechism soon afterward repeated the straightforward traditional teaching: "Infants have no means of attaining salvation other than baptism" (Catechism of the Catholic Church 2, 2, 33). In 1588 Pope SIXTUS V confirmed this in a Constitution that decreed the death penalty for abortion. A particularly heinous feature of this crime, he declared, was that, as its "certain outcome," "not only bodies, but—still worse!—even souls, are wantonly sacrificed"; for abortion "excludes [these souls] from the blessed vision of God" (Sixtus V 1923, p. 308). During the following two centuries, theologians attempted to determine exactly what punishment and what happiness (if any) are allotted to unbaptized infants in the next life. The great majority upheld limbo as the infants' destiny; but the influence of JANSENISM led to a revival of Augustinian severity in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Once again, certain highly respected Catholic theologians insisted that the fires of hell awaited these infants. The defenders of limbo found their strongest arguments in the teaching of Aquinas and his concept of original sin as a sin of nature and not of the person. As a result they viewed the punishment of original sin and that of personal sin as entirely different. Only personal sin involves a conversion to some forbidden created good that deserves the pain of sense.

Pistoia and the Bull Auctorem Fidei. The Jansenists in Italy, however, rejected limbo as a heretical Pelagian fable and insisted that Augustine's stern teaching was revealed truth. This they boldly proclaimed at the Synod of PISTOIA in 1786. ROME's censure of this claim came in Pope PIUS VI's 1794 bull Auctorem Fidei, the only magisterial intervention thus far containing the word limbo. The history of this document makes it clear that the pope's main purpose was to defend the upholders of limbo from slander, not to insist that it exists. The Jansenists' open denial of limbo was not, as such, censured by Pius VI, only the manner of their denial (cf. D-H 2005, 2626). Nevertheless, Auctorem Fidei dealt a de facto deathblow to St. Augustine's view, which has rarely been defended since. None of the parties to this dispute, however, questioned the established doctrine that unbaptized infants are definitely excluded from heaven. The only question any Catholic considered legitimate was whether they go to limbo or suffer in hell.

Recent Church Teaching. In the nineteenth century a few theologians, following Cajetan's lead, speculated that God might enable a "baptism of desire" for infants dying without the sacrament. But according to the 1860 Provincial Council of Cologne, whose acts were confirmed by Rome, "faith teaches us (fides docet) that infants, since they are not capable of this desire, are excluded from the heavenly kingdom if they die [unbaptized]" (Collectio Lacensis, V, col. 320). Nevertheless, uneasiness with this traditional doctrine spread among an increasing number of twentieth-century theologians and ordinary Catholics. Pope PIUS XII reaffirmed in a 1951 allocution that apart from baptism "there is no other way" of communicating the divine life to infants (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 43 [1951], p. 841). But the VATICAN's 1980 Instruction on Infant Baptism mitigated this position: "The Church does not know of any way other than baptism" of assuring the salvation of those dying in infancy (article 13). This more agnostic stance is also reflected in the post-Vatican II liturgy. For the first time in Church history rites for the burial of unbaptized infants were approved, as part of Pope PAUL VI's reform. These new texts, accessible in The Rites of the Catholic Church (1976), warn against any weakening of "the doctrine of the necessity of baptism" (p. 688) and remain entirely compatible with belief in the natural happiness of limbo; for they do not pray that these infants may enter eternal glory, only that the grieving family may be consoled by their faith that the child is in God's loving care (cf. pp. 719–720). But although these new ROMAN-RITE texts (and similar brief prayers permitted in the Byzantine rite) do not encourage the hope of heaven for unbaptized infants, neither do they rule it out. As the Catechism of the Catholic Church (CCC) puts it, the liturgy expresses the Church's consciousness that she "can only entrust [these infants] to the mercy of God." However, the catechism itself then goes a step further: "Indeed," it affirms:

> the great mercy of God who desires that all men should be saved, and Jesus' tenderness toward children which caused him to say: "Let the children come to me, do not hinder them" (Mk 10:14), allow us to hope that there is a way of salvation for children who have died without Baptism. (CCC no. 1261)

Contemporary Theological Discussion. The most important recent theological publication on the destiny of unbaptized infants is a 2007 statement of the INTERNATIONAL THEOLOGICAL COMMISSION (ITC). (Such statements are not magisterial interventions requiring the assent of the faithful; however, the pope, in approving their publication, indicates that they embody theological scholarship held in esteem by the contemporary See of Peter.) The ITC here traces the history of this doctrinal issue and then builds on the CCC statement. It argues that it is difficult to reconcile limbo with God's universal salvific will as attested in Scripture and Tradition, and notes in this context Vatican II's affirmation that "the Holy Spirit offers to all the possibility of being made partners, in a way known to God, in the paschal mystery" (Gaudium et spes, 22). Although the ITC concludes that there are "serious" reasons for hoping these infants can reach eternal glory, it disclaims any "sure knowledge" that they will do so, and acknowledges that limbo "remains a possible theological opinion." Most Catholic scholars today would undoubtedly support the theological and pastoral approach suggested by the CCC and the ITC, but a minority remains unconvinced that the grounds favoring this approach outweigh the strong consensus of earlier patristic, theological, and magisterial teaching that these infants do not attain the beatific vision. Indeed, several studies upholding limbo have appeared in the new millennium. (The possibility of an eternal state of natural bliss is not treated directly in official Church teaching, and among theologians it is addressed more generally in the discussions of the relationship between nature and grace.) Finally, it can be noted that the proliferation of legalized abortion in recent decades has prompted a new theological debate as to whether all, or at least some, victims of abortion are in fact martyrs (along with the Holy Innocents), who reach salvation by their own "baptism of blood."

Thus, whereas hope for the salvation of infants dying without baptism now prevails among theologians and other Catholics, with cautious support from Church authority, no real consensus exists on their destiny. As the ITC document states, this is something that "simply has not been revealed to us." What all orthodox Catholics do agree on is that only baptism can assure that those who die before attaining the use of reason can enter into eternal beatitude, so the sacrament should not be delayed for newborn infants (cf. CCC, 1250, 1257).

LINCOLN, ABRAHAM

American president; b. Hodgenville, Kentucky, February 12, 1809; d. Washington, D.C., April 15, 1865.

Abraham Lincoln, the sixteenth president of the United States (1861–1865), is generally considered the greatest chief executive that the country has ever had. Without a formal education, he rose to be an outstanding lawyer and a leading politician in his home state of Illinois and later in the nation, first as a Whig and then as a Republican. Once elected to the presidency, he succeeded not only in saving the Union with a military victory over the Southern secessionists in the Civil War, but also, with his excellent sense of timing, in freeing the nation's slaves. Those slaves living in the conquered areas of the Confederacy were freed by his Emancipation Proclamation of September 22, 1862, and the rest of the nation's slaves were permanently freed by the Thirteenth Amendment, which he actively supported in December and January of 1864–1865. His assassination shortly after the final Union victory at Appomattox not only made him a revered martyr but also assured his everlasting fame.

Lincoln's relations with Roman Catholics, though minimal, were always friendly. At a time when anti-Catholic bigotry was widespread, and even led to riots, he never hesitated to condemn it and stood out as an opponent of bigotry. On June 12, 1844, for example, while he was an active Whig, he appeared in his hometown of Springfield, Illinois, at a public meeting called to condemn the recent anti-Catholic riots in Philadelphia. He clearly outlined the subject of the meeting, which was to discuss the party's lack of response to the riots. It was on his motion that a powerful anti-bigotry resolution was adopted, which stated,

> That the guarantee of the rights of conscience, as found in our Constitution, is most sacred and inviolable, and one that belongs no less to the CATHOLIC, than to the Protestant; and that all attempts to abridge or interfere with those rights, either of Catholic or Protestant, directly or indirectly, have our decided disapprobation, and shall ever have our most effective opposition. (Basler 1953–1954, vol. 2, p. 234)

In the meantime, the anti-Catholics, after forming a number of political groups, started a secret society in 1949. Whenever they were asked about this group, they would reply, "I know nothing." Soon labeled the "Know Nothings," this virulent antiforeign and anti-Catholic organization formed the American Party, though it became known as the Know-Nothing Party. Again and again, Lincoln expressed his dislike of the organization. In a speech given on September 26, 1854, in Bloomington, Illinois, he not only said he knew nothing about the group, but that, if such an organization existed, and had for its object the interference with the rights of foreigners, his opponent, Democratic Judge Stephen A. Douglas, who favored the Kansas-Nebraska Act, could not deprecate it more severely than he himself. Then, on August 11, 1855, he wrote to the antislavery advocate Owen Lovejoy concerning the Know Nothings. In his letter he wrote, "I do not perceive how any one professing to be sensitive to the wrong of the negroes, can join in a league to degrade a class of white men" (Basler 1953–1954, vol. 2, p. 316). He put it more strongly on August 24 of that year, when he sent a letter to his friend Joshua Speed in which he said:

> I am not a Know-Nothing. That is certain. How could I be? How can any one who abhors the oppression of negroes, be in favor of degrading classes of white people? Our progress in degeneracy appears to me to be pretty rapid. As a nation, we began by declaring that "all men are created equal." We now practically read it "all men are created equal, except negroes." When the Know-Nothings get control, it will read, "all men are created equal, except negroes, and foreigners, and Catholics." When it comes to this, I should prefer emigrating to some country where they make no pretence of loving liberty—to Russia, for instance, where despotism can be taken pure, and without the base alloy of hypocracy [sic]. (Basler 1953–1954, vol. 2, p. 323)

Lincoln, Abraham (1809–1865). Served as the 16th President of the United States. AP IMAGES

He repeated his hatred for bigotry again and again. In 1859, for example, in a response to the editor of the German-language Illinois Staats Anzeiger, Theodore Canisius, who wanted to know his attitude toward the Massachusetts constitutional amendment requiring a two-year wait after naturalization before obtaining the right to vote, Lincoln stated that he was against its adoption, in Illinois or elsewhere. "Understanding the spirit of our institutions to aim at the elevation of men," he continued, "I am opposed to whatever tends to degrade them. I have some little notoriety for commiserating the oppressed condition of the negroes, and I should be strangely inconsistent if I could favor any project for curtailing the existing rights of white men, even though born in different lands, and speaking different languages from myself" (Basler 1953–1954, vol 3, pp. 380–381). That this included Catholics would seem to be obvious.

The 1856 elections, in which Lincoln was considered for the Republican nomination for vice president, did not interfere with his condemnations of the Know Nothings. On February 22 of that year, at a dinner concluding the Decatur, Illinois, Anti-Nebraska Editors' Convention, while he was trying to unify all elements opposed to the Kansas-Nebraska Act, he expressed his hearty concurrence with the group's resolutions against Know Nothingism and in favor of liberty of conscience and political freedom. He repeated his dislike of the Know Nothings in a speech at Jacksonville on December 26. Two years later, in a letter to Edward Lusk, a farmer and ex-steamboat operator at Meredosia, Illinois, he strongly denied the rumor that he had ever been a member of the organization or its political party. He repeated this denial several times while running for president, including to the Elizabethtown, Kentucky, circuit clerk, Samuel Haycraft, on June 4, and to a Jewish acquaintance, Abraham Jonas, on July 21, 1860.

More positive examples of Lincoln's friendship to Catholics occurred during his presidency. In an October 21, 1861, letter to Archbishop John HUGHES of New York, he asked him for the names of possible candidates for chaplains in hospitals. He also sent the archbishop to Europe as his personal representative to popularize the Union cause in England, France, and at the VATICAN. Pope PIUS IX (1846–1878) was thought to be friendly to the Confederacy, and he corresponded with the Confederate president, Jefferson Davis, making this mission an important one for the Union cause. All in all, then, Lincoln, though not averse to accepting support from former Know Nothings, was free from bigotry, condemned anti-Catholicism, and practiced the tolerance that he preached.

LITTLE BROTHERS OF JESUS

(LBJ) This religious congregation with simple, perpetual vows, was founded in 1933 by Father René Voillaume in South Oran, Algeria. It was made a diocesan congregation in 1936 by Bishop Nouet, Prefect Apostolic of Ghardaïa, Algeria. Its ideals are those of Bl. Charles de FOUCAULD (beatified on November 13, 2005, by Pope BENEDICT XVI). In their apostolate the Little Brothers seek to conform to the economic and social milieu where they live. Their stress is on manual labor among the laboring classes. They dwell in communities of three to five members and work mostly in factories and fisheries, among the poor and marginalized. The Little Brothers had established communities in Europe, Africa, Asia, and South and North America.

LITTLE MISSIONARY SISTERS OF CHARITY

(In Italian, Piccole Suore Missionarie della Carità, LMSC, Official Catholic Directory #2290) This congregation, with papal approval (1957), was founded at Tortona, Italy, in 1915 by St. Luigi ORIONE (canonized by Pope John Paul II on May 16, 2004) as a part of his program called the Little Work of Divine Providence. The purpose of the congregation was to perform works of charity among the poor, orphaned, aged, and the mentally and physically handicapped. The sisters are engaged in teaching, nursing, and social and catechetical work in Italy, Poland, Spain, England, Argentina, Uruguay, Chile, and Brazil. The sisters first arrived in the U.S. in 1949. The general motherhouse is in Rome. Don Orione founded a cloistered branch within the community when, in 1927, he organized the Perpetual Adorers of the Most Blessed Sacrament. This group is made up of blind persons who live a contemplative life, devoted mainly to prayer before the Blessed Sacrament.

LITTLE SISTERS OF THE POOR

(LSP, Official Catholic Directory #2340) The Congregation of the Little Sisters of the Poor was founded in 1839 at St. Servan, Brittany, France, by St. Jeanne JUGAN (canonized Oct. 11, 2009 by Pope Benedict XVI). The spirit of the Congregation is that of humility, evangelical simplicity, and confidence in Divine Providence. Its apostolate is the care of the elderly poor.

St. Jugan, a 47-year-old Cancalaise woman, founded the Congregation some time during the winter of 1839 when she opened her small St. Servan apartment to an elderly, blind, paralyzed woman who had no one to care for her. Jeanne and Françoise Aubert, a pious woman with whom she shared her apartment, soon welcomed a second woman; by 1843 there were forty old women under their care, and the group had moved to larger accommodations. Three young women came to help with the work, and they were aided materially by sympathetic persons in the community. In 1841 Jeanne herself began the practice of going from town-to-town and door-to-door to beg alms for her poor. In 1842 Jugan was elected superior of the young community, which adopted the name "Servants of the Poor." This name changed to "Sisters of the Poor" in 1844, and then "Little Sisters of the Poor" in 1849.

As the community grew, the work quickly spread to other towns and cities in France and beyond. Formal diocesan approbation was given by the bishop of Rennes in 1852, and papal approbation was accorded by Pope PIUS IX on July 9, 1854. At that time the Congregation numbered 500 Little Sisters and 36 houses, including foundations in England and Belgium. The motherhouse was established at La Tour St. Joseph, in the village of St. Pern, in 1856. The Constitutions of the Congregation were approved by Pope LEO XIII on March 1, 1879. Jugan died at La Tour St. Joseph on August 29 of the same year. She was beatified by Pope JOHN PAUL II in Rome on Oct. 3, 1982.

The first American foundation of the Congregation was made in Brooklyn, New York, in 1868. Within four years, thirteen homes were established in the United States. At the end of the 20th century, there were more than 30 homes in North America. Worldwide, there were about 3,600 Little Sisters caring for the elderly in 30 countries in addition to the United States: Algeria, Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Benin, Canada, Chile, Colombia, Congo, England, France, Hong Kong, India, Ireland, Italy, Kenya, Malaysia, Malta, New Caledonia, New Zealand, Nigeria, Portugal, Scotland, Singapore, South Korea, Spain, Sri Lanka, Taiwan, Turkey, and Western Samoa. As of 2009 there were 2,773 sisters in 205 homes located in 32 countries (Catholic Almanac 2010, p. 487).

The Little Sisters practice the three traditional vows of chastity, poverty, and obedience, and a special fourth vow of HOSPITALITY, by which they devote their lives solely to the care of the aged poor. An association of consecrated lay women, known as the Fraternity Jeanne Jugan, was begun in 1958 for those who wished to collaborate closely with the Little Sisters in their apostolate while retaining their lay status. This collaboration with the laity was expanded in 1998, with the approbation of statutes for a new initiative, the Association Jeanne Jugan, which offers to lay men and women the opportunity of sharing in the spirit and apostolate of the Little Sisters of the Poor and of deepening their Christian faith.

The Congregation is governed by a Superior General and a Council of six Assistants General. Each of the 20 provinces is governed by a Provincial Superior, in close collaboration with the Superior General and her Council. Provincial houses for the United States are located in Queens Village, NY, Baltimore, MD, and Palatine, IL.

LIVIERO, CARLO (CHARLES), BL.

Founder of the Little Servants of the Sacred Heart; Bishop of Città di Castello, Italy, from 1910 until his death; known by parishioners as "hammer of socialism"; b. May 29, 1866, Vicenza, Italy; d. July 7, 1932, Fano, Pesaro, Italy. Beatified by Pope BENEDICT XVI, May 27, 2007, Città di Castello, Italy.

When Charles was a young child, his father, a railroad worker, was transferred to Monselice, Padua Province. There Charles attended elementary and junior high school, and at age fifteen he entered Padua Seminary. Ordained at the young age of twenty-two, he was sent to Gallio, Vicenza, where he worked for ten years as a parish priest and taught youth who were discerning vocations to the priesthood. He instituted a number of social programs including the Catholic Agricultural Workers Society, a nursery school, and the Mutual Aid Society.

In 1900 he was transferred to Agna nella Bassa Padovanna, Padua, an area experiencing harsh economic conditions. Charles continued to promote his social assistance initiatives but he also established an oratory, a Christian workers association, and a young women's work-training school. On March 6, 1910, at age forty-three, he was consecrated Bishop of Città di Castello, and he founded a Catholic elementary school, a Catholic press, and numerous spiritual and charitable works in the fields of education, health care, and housing. His episcopal coat of arms bore the motto: "In Caritate Christi," indicating it was from Christ's love that he drew his love for others and for his ministry. In 1915 he founded the Sacred Heart Home for the education of the poor and orphaned youth, and in 1919 a Catholic bookstore opened which offered a circular library. By 1920 a student hostel was opened, and five years later a diocesan home for the care of orphans suffering from tuberculosis and rickets was established in Pesaro. An information bulletin was also established for his diocesan priests.

Deeply concerned for the poor throughout his life, the bishop was known to hear the voices of the poor while in prayer, and he kept them as his focus in building the Kingdom of the Sacred Heart of Jesus. He was open to all people throughout his life, until it was cut short by a serious automobile accident. Injuries from the accident, which occurred on June 24, 1932, resulted in his death two weeks later in Fano.

Liviero's BEATIFICATION was recognized Pope Benedict XVI and celebrated by Cardinal José Saraiva Martins in the cathedral of Città di Castello, Italy.

Feast: July 7.

LLUCH, JUANA MARÍA CONDESA, BL.

Foundress, Handmaids of the Immaculate Conception, Protectress of Workers, Valencia, Spain; b. March 30, 1862, Valencia; d. January 16, 1916, Valencia; beatified March 23, 2002, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

A daughter of privilege, Juana María demonstrated great piety toward the Blessed Sacrament and the Holy Mother at an early age. Through her own devotion and the sound principles instilled in her by her parents, Juana María developed an understanding of the terrible toll that poverty was taking on workers in the newly industrialized Spain.

She had long felt the call to consecrate herself to God, but at eighteen she became convinced that she should form a congregation to serve the increasing numbers of poor who were coming to the cities to look for work. These humble people could not make a living in rural areas. In a time before the rise of trade unions and government protections, they were subjected to inhumane conditions by factory bosses. Women, who were forced by circumstance to leave their families to work, were also exposed to sexual aggression and assault; Juana María felt a special empathy for them.

The archbishop of Valencia, Cardinal Antolín Monescillo, would not allow Juana María to start a congregation, but she was allowed to open a shelter in 1884. Here she provided temporal and spiritual assistance to the oppressed workers, and shortly thereafter she started a school for the children who lived at the shelter. Juana María was joined by women who shared her desire to help workers find the self-esteem denied them in the workplace, and she continued to petition the Church hierarchy for permission to officially establish the community. In 1892 the Congregation of the Handmaids of the Immaculate Conception, Protectress of Workers, largely composed of Juana María's compatriots at the shelter, was approved by the Diocese of Valencia. The members of the order took first vows in 1895 and perpetual vows in 1911.

The Handmaids of the Immaculate Conception, Protectress of Workers established themselves in cities throughout Spain. Long after Mother Juana María's death in 1916, the congregation received provisional approval by Pope PIUS XI in 1937. In 1947 the order was given official recognition by the Holy See. In beatifying her, Pope John Paul II said Mother Juana María "united herself to an assiduous prayer," and he noted that the congregation continues her mission to support working women.

LONGHIN, ANDREW (ANDREA) HYACINTH, BL.

Baptized Hyacinth Bonaventure, bishop, Treviso, Italy; b. November 23, 1863, Fiumicello di Campodarsego, Italy; d. June 26, 1936, Treviso; beatified October 20, 2002, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

Andrew was the child of poor Paduan farmers, Matthew and Judith Marin. On August 27, 1879, he entered religious training at the Capuchin seminary in Bassano del Grappa, taking the name Andrew of Campodarsego. He studied the humanities and THEOLOGY at schools in Padua and Venice. On June 19, 1886, Andrew was ordained a Capuchin friar.

A natural teacher, Fr. Andrew was assigned to the seminary at Udine. He became director of Capuchin teachers at Padua in 1889 and director of theology students at Venice in 1891. He was the spiritual director for the order's seminarians for eighteen years. In 1902 Fr. Andrew was elected provincial minister of the 200 Capuchins at Venice.

Pope PIUS X selected Fr. Andrew to be Bishop of Treviso during a private audience in early April 1904; he was elevated on April 14 of that year. Eager to understand his new constituency, Bishop Longhin undertook an almost five-year pastoral visit to the diocesan parishes. He implemented a series of reforms and policies, including ones that raised the level of education in seminaries and encouraged religious orders to take up their work in the Treviso diocese. He embraced the many lay movements that championed social reform, particularly the rights of farm workers and others to form unions. Two additional pastoral visits followed in 1912 and 1926, the former being interrupted by WORLD WAR I.

Treviso was the site of fierce fighting and aerial attacks during the war. Bishop Longhin provided spiritual and temporal support for the afflicted population. He avoided partisanship and attempted to ease suffering in every quarter. His unwillingness to align himself, and the Church, with any faction resulted in later criticism and even the imprisonment of priests who worked at his side. Undaunted, he dedicated himself to rebuilding and ultimately was awarded honors, including the Military Cross, for his brave acts during the conflict. He was named Apostolic Visitor to Padua (1923) and Udine (1927) in the hope of reconciling clergy in the bitter postwar years.

The end of the war signaled the rise of FASCISM in Italy, and Catholic organizations came under attack. Bishop Longhin continued his outspoken support for Franciscan values, Catholic social reform, and the rights of workers. He was increasingly at odds with the new government, but he remained committed to his faith and Church teachings. Pope John Paul II remembered him as "the bishop of essential things" and noted his dedication to his people and priests, "particularly in moments of difficulty and danger."

LÓPEZ DE MATURANA, MARGARITA MARÍA, BL.

Baptized Pilar, foundress, MERCEDARIAN MISSIONARIES OF BERRIZ, Berriz, Spain; b. July 25, 1884, at Bilbao, Spain; d. July 23, 1934, at Berriz; beatified October 22, 2006, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

Born to Vicente López de Maturana and Juana Ortiz de Zarate, Pilar, as she was named at baptism, was one of a pair of twin girls, the youngest of five siblings. To break up a romance that her mother disapproved of, Pilar was sent to a boarding school run by the Sisters of Our Lady of Mercy in Berriz. In that environment, Pilar, who had always been a devout young woman, recognized that she had a true vocation. At nineteen, in 1903, she entered the Cloistered Mercedarian Monastery of Vera Cruz in Berriz and assumed the name Margarita Maria. She was assigned to work in the order's boarding school, her own alma mater, in 1906.

After many years of CONTEMPLATIVE LIFE, Sr. Margarita María felt the call to serve by ministering to those who had not received the teachings of Christ. In 1920 she created the Mercedarian Missionary Youth group to raise awareness of the work of missionaries. Many in the Berriz house believed, with Sr. Margarita María, that they were called by God to work in the world. In 1924 the Berriz sisters asked the order's mother general to bring a petition to Rome to allow them to work as missionaries. On January 23, 1926, this request was provisionally granted and the first group of six left the Berriz house on a mission to Wuhu, China, later that year, arriving in November. The second group arrived in Saipan, the Mariana Islands, in March 1928. In 1927 Sr. Margarita María was named superior, and the following year she led a mission to Ponape Island, Japan.

The Holy See approved the transformation of the Berriz house into a missionary institute in 1930. On July 30 of that year, at the first General Chapter, Mother Margarita María was designated the mother superior of the newly recognized Mercedarian Missionaries of Berriz. She traveled widely in the years before her death.

In the twenty-first century, the Mercedarian Missionaries of Berriz consider themselves to be "citizens of the world" and are established on five continents. In his homily during the Mass of BEATIFICATION, Cardinal José Saraiva Martins said that Mother Margarita María helped to show, by her example, how to "open new horizons to evangelization and to take the path of holiness and faithfulness."

LOZANO GARRIDO, MANUEL, BL.

Also known as Lolo; layman; b. August 9, 1920, Linares, Jaén, Spain; d. November 3, 1971, Linares, Jaén, Spain; declared VENERABLE by Pope BENEDICT XVI, December 17, 2007.

As a youth, Manuel Lozano Garrido loved sports and nature, but greater still was his heart for God. He joined CATHOLIC ACTION when he was eleven and became devoted to the Eucharist. During the Spanish Civil War, he secretly brought Holy Communion to the Catholic prisoners he visited. Once he even hid a host in a bouquet of flowers and spent the night of Holy Thursday in prison alone with it.

Later he began a career as a journalist based in the Jaén Diocese in Spain. He not only wrote news articles, but also expressed his devotion to the Virgin Mary in his personal writing. In his early twenties he developed spondylitis, a disease that resulted in paralysis. Within a year, he was confined to a wheelchair for life. Although it curtailed his missionary endeavors physically, he continued to write as the paralysis spread—first using his left hand when his right became unusable, then later dictating his stories to his sister or to a tape. By age forty-two he was blind, but he still wrote for the Associated Press and for Catholic magazines; he also wrote nine inspirational books and started the magazine Sinai.

He was declared venerable by Pope Benedict XVI on December 17, 2007. Then on December 19, 2009, the pope issued a proclamation of a miracle in the cure of Rogelio de Haro Sagra in 1972, and plans were made for Lolo's beatification in 2010. At the time of the publication of this entry, a date had not been set for his beatification.

LUDOVICA DE ANGELIS, MARIA, BL.

Baptized Antonina; superior of the Institute of the DAUGHTERS OF OUR LADY OF MERCY and manager of the children's hospital of Buenos Aires, Argentina; b. October 24, 1880, San Gregorio, Abruzzo, Italy; d. February 25, 1962, Buenos Aires, Argentina; beatified by Pope JOHN PAUL II, October 3, 2004.

The eldest of eight children, Antonina was a thoughtful and admirable young woman who gave unstintingly in her many family tasks. She delighted in her work in the fields and its reminder of God's seasonal rhythms of planting, growing, and harvesting.

She welcomed and accepted all whom she met. Children held a special place in her heart. This acceptance was to be reflected in her later vocational choice, when in November 1904 she joined the community of the Daughters of Our Lady of Mercy in Savona, Italy. Received as Sr. Maria Ludovica, Antonina was in heartfelt sympathy with the words of the religious community's founder, St. Maria Giuseppa ROSSELLO: "Be merciful as your heavenly Father is merciful"; and, "All that you do [sic] the least of my brethren, you do to me."

Three years later, on November 14, 1907, Sr. Ludovica was called to the community's house in Buenos Aires. Here she would give fifty-four years of dedicated service to the Church-directed children's hospital.

Over the years, Sr. Ludovica's tasks would encompass everything from meal preparation to seeking financial assistance to build operating rooms, extra children's rooms, and medical equipment. She established a chapel, a children's convalescent home at Mar del Plata, and a farm that provided nutritious food for her beloved children.

She became manager of the hospital and superior of her community. Always her focus was on those in her charge. Her lifelong guiding maxim—"Do good to all, no matter who it may be"—was a reminder to those with whom she came in contact of God's care and mercy. Sustained by prayer, her ROSARY constantly with her, and radiating a gentle, warm smile, Sr. Ludovica was loved by all.

After her death, the hospital was renamed the "Superior Ludovica Hospital."

At her BEATIFICATION Pope John Paul II said, "'God did not give us a spirit of timidity but a spirit of power and love and self-control' (II Tm 1: 7). St Paul's words ... can be aptly applied to the life of Bl. Ludovica De Angelis, whose existence was totally dedicated to the glory of God and the service of her peers."

Feast: February 25.

LUMINOUS MYSTERIES OF THE ROSARY

On October 16, 2002, the beginning of the twenty-fifth year of his pontificate, JOHN PAUL II issued the Apostolic Letter Rosarium Virginis Mariae in which he proclaimed a "Year of the ROSARY," not only to celebrate his favorite prayer but also to revitalize this DEVOTION as an appropriate way to commemorate "the fortieth anniversary of the opening of the Second Vatican Ecumenical Council on October 11, 1962." To bring out more fully the Christological depth of the Rosary and to make it a more effective compendium of the GOSPEL, John Paul proposed a fourth series of mysteries that would bridge the gap between the Joyful and the Sorrowful Mysteries. This new series of Mysteria Lucis—Mysteries of Light or Luminous Mysteries—would concentrate on five significant moments in the public ministry of Christ, the "light of the world" (Jn 8:12), "when he proclaims the Gospel of the Kingdom":

1. his baptism in the Jordan,
2. his self-manifestation at the wedding of Cana,
3. his proclamation of the KINGDOM OF GOD, with his call to conversion,
4. his TRANSFIGURATION, and finally,
5. his institution of the Eucharist, as the sacramental expression of the Paschal Mystery.

According to John Paul, Mary's counsel at Cana, "Do whatever he tells you" (Jn 2:5), is a "fitting introduction to the words and signs of Christ's public ministry and it forms the Marian foundation of all the 'mysteries of light.'"

When Rosarium Virginis Mariae appeared, various press publications indicated that John Paul had based his Luminous Mysteries on the "Mysteries of Light" that were first mentioned in a leaflet published in 1957 by a Maltese priest, George PRECA, for private use by members of his Society of Christian Doctrine. The pope possibly discovered these "Mysteries of Light" when he was preparing for Preca's BEATIFICATION in Malta on May 9, 2001. In his HOMILY for the beatification, John Paul never mentioned the "Mysteries of Light" but praised Preca as a forerunner of Vatican II for his activity in promoting the role of the laity in the apostolate through founding the Society of Christian Doctrine and for his ability to communicate the freshness of the Christian message.

By not mentioning Preca in Rosarium Virginis Mariae, John Paul removed the Luminous Mysteries from the category of private devotion. Instead, he presented them within the framework of the new evangelization that originated with Vatican II, "the 'great grace' disposed by the Spirit of God for the Church in our time." There are significant differences between John Paul's mysteries and those of Preca, as can be seen in the wording of Preca's pamphlet:

1. When Our Lord Jesus Christ, after his baptism in the Jordan, was led into the desert.
2. When Our Lord Jesus Christ showed, by word and miracles, that He is true God.
3. When Our Lord Jesus Christ taught the Beatitudes on the mountain.
4. When Our Lord Jesus Christ was transfigured on the mountain.
5. When Our Lord Jesus Christ had his last meal with the apostles.

The Transfiguration. The Fouth Luminous Mystery. Jesus, transformed in Glory, speaks to Moses and Elijah while Peter, James and John look on. THE TRANSFIGURATION, 1594–95 (OIL ON CANVAS), CARRACCI, LODOVICO (1555–1619)/PINACOTECA NAZIONALE, BOLOGNA, ITALY/ALINARI/THE BRIDGEMAN ART LIBRARY

In comparing these mysteries to those of John Paul, one sees the pope slightly but significantly modifying them to bring out more effectively a central teaching emphasized in the new evangelization: the "revelation of the Kingdom now present in the very person of Jesus," and how this presence is experienced in the sacramental life of the Church.

There was indeed a great and immediate response to the Luminous Mysteries, not only in the Catholic world but even in the secular media. Numerous books, pamphlets, and articles appeared explaining the new mysteries and how they fit into a new twenty-decade Rosary. The attitude of many commentators was so positive that they frequently downplayed—or even neglected to mention—the important fact, noted by the pope, that the Luminous Mysteries were presented as a "proposed addition to the traditional pattern" that was not being mandated but rather "left to the freedom of individuals and communities." In proposing Thursday as a suitable day for their recitation, once again John Paul stressed that "this indication is not intended to limit a rightful freedom in personal and community prayer, where account needs to be taken of spiritual and pastoral needs.... What is really important is that the Rosary should always be seen and experienced as a path of CONTEMPLATION."

Despite John Paul's clear desire to present the Luminous Mysteries as an option, most subsequent literature on the Rosary has treated the new addition almost as a papal command. This unfortunate situation has led in some cases to a bitter rejection of these mysteries as an unnecessary addition to the Rosary that destroys its historical role as Mary's Psalter, with its 150 Hail Marys comparable to the 150 Psalms of the Divine Office. Some groups, unhappy about all changes since Vatican II, have suggested that the Luminous Mysteries may even be an attempt to sabotage the Rosary devotion, and that they are a rejection of Mary's own request to the children at Fatima that they recite "a third" of the Rosary every day, since she clearly intended five decades and not the six and two-thirds (i.e., 6.66!) decades of a twenty-decade Rosary.

In reality, many Catholics have adopted the Luminous Mysteries, while others have preferred to stay with the traditional fifteen-decade Rosary. A third option has also appeared: saying the traditional Psalter of Mary twice during the week and then saying the Luminous Mysteries on Sunday. In this option, there is no third repetition of one of the mysteries on Sunday as in the traditional Rosary: Joyful from ADVENT to LENT, Sorrowful in Lent, Glorious from Easter until Advent. This option of saying the Luminous Mysteries on Sunday, the day of the creation of light both in the Bible and in the Roman Breviary, also fits in very well with the suggestion of some commentators that these new mysteries, far from destroying Mary's Psalter, actually enrich it just as the biblical canticles (such as the Benedictus and the Magnificat) supplement the psalms in the Divine Office.

LUTHERANISM

The term Lutheranism refers both to a doctrinal perspective rooted in the sixteenth-century Protestant Reformation in Germany and to a group of churches that subscribe to this doctrinal perspective. In 2009 Lutheran churches included approximately seventy-two million members worldwide.

This article will (1) describe the historical development of Lutheranism and (2) outline the central affirmations of this doctrinal perspective according to the official documents of Lutheranism.

HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT

Martin Luther. Lutheranism developed out of a reform movement led by Martin LUTHER (1483–1546), a professor at the University of WITTENBERG in Germany and, prior to the Reformation, a priest in the order of Augustinian HERMITS. The movement began as a protest in late 1517 against the sale of INDULGENCES, but rapidly expanded into a critique of authority structures in the church and a debate on the theology of grace and JUSTIFICATION—that is, how the sinner comes to be accepted by the righteous God. Luther was an unusually prolific writer, and his many pamphlets, books, and biblical commentaries were quickly distributed throughout Germany by the recently established printing industry.

Luther's case was referred to Rome already in late 1518. After Cardinal CAJETAN (1469–1534) failed in his efforts to have Luther recant, Pope LEO X (1475–1521) issued the decree Cum postquam (November 9, 1518), reaffirming traditional teaching on indulgences (Denz-inger and Hünermann 2005, pp. 1447–1449). The papal bull Exsurge Domine (June 15, 1520) condemned forty-one errors attributed to Luther (Denzinger and Hünermann 2005, pp. 1451–1492), and Pope Leo X excommunicated him in January 1521. In April 1521, Luther appeared before the Diet (assembly) of the Holy Roman Empire in Worms and refused to recant. Although condemned by the Diet, Luther was protected by the ruling princes of his territory, Electoral Saxony, and was able to continue teaching and writing in Wittenberg until his death in 1546. During his lifetime, Luther remained the undisputed leader of what came to be called Lutheranism (Luther himself preferred the term evangelical as a description of the movement).

The Emergence of Lutheran Churches. Initially a popular movement fed by Luther's writings, Lutheranism took on a more ecclesiastical form when the reforms he advocated began to be implemented. In his Appeal to the German Nobility (1520), Luther called on the princes to reform the churches in their territories if the bishops were unwilling. Complications of German and European politics and the preoccupation of Emperor CHARLES V (1500–1558) with the threat of the Ottoman Empire permitted princes sympathetic to Luther to introduce various reform measures in their churches: a revised liturgy of the Mass, with lay reception of the cup; married clergy; and the preaching of a Lutheran understanding of justification.

In 1530 Charles V was able to turn his attention to the religious turmoil in the Holy Roman Empire and called a Diet to meet in Augsburg and settle the controversy. Territories that had adopted Luther's reforms submitted a statement explaining and justifying their reforms. This statement, the AUGSBURG CONFESSION, was rejected by the emperor. Negotiations continued but the Diet was unable to bridge the divide. After the Diet, the Lutheran movement was taken up by an increasing number of German states (Electoral Saxony, Hesse, Brandenburg) and free cities (Nuremberg, Hamburg). Charles V threatened to suppress Lutheranism by armed force, but he was unable to act until 1546. Despite initial success by the Catholic forces of the emperor, the wars proved inconclusive and the resulting Peace of Augsburg (1555) permitted territorial governments to choose Lutheranism or Catholicism. The Council of TRENT (1546–1563) provided a comprehensive Catholic response to many Lutheran reforms and cemented the difference between Lutheranism and Catholicism.

While Lutheran leaders voiced a preference for the traditional episcopal church order, the role of the bishops as princes of the Holy Roman Empire was unacceptable to the Lutherans, and no Lutheran territory in Germany successfully developed a new model of episcopacy. Instead, the tasks that had been carried out by the bishops were divided among the secular governing authorities and various church structures. Church and state were deeply interwoven, with the prince often referred to as summus episcopus, with responsibility for the health and external welfare of the church. A consistory or Kirchenrat was responsible for the internal life of the church. The Peace of Augsburg, which made the religion of the prince determinative for the religion of the territory (cuius regio, ejus religio), reinforced these state-church tendencies. This integration of church and state (the Landesherrliches Kirchenregiment) survived in Germany until the fall of the monarchy in 1918.

The Augsburg Confession and the Book of Concord. The Augsburg Confession or Confessio Augustana, drafted by Philip MELANCHTHON (1497–1560), Luther's closest associate at the University of Wittenberg, quickly became the defining document for Lutheranism. It has two parts. Part I outlines in twenty-one articles the understanding of doctrine behind the Lutheran Reformation. It emphasizes the commitment of the Lutherans to the patristic heritage of theology and distances the Lutherans both from the radical ANABAPTISTS and from the emerging Reformed theology of Huldrych ZWINGLI (1484–1531) and the Swiss Reformation. Part II explains the changes in church practice and governance that had taken place in the Lutheran territories and proposes a compromise by which the Lutheran territories would again accept the leadership of the Catholic bishops. Although a failure as a compromise proposal at the Diet, the Augsburg Confession was a success in giving form to the emerging group of Lutheran territorial churches. Subscription to the Augsburg Confession became the condition for membership in the alliance that was formed in response to the threat of military action by the emperor, and the Augsburg Confession was recognized as defining Lutheranism by the 1555 Peace of Augsburg. The Augsburg Confession remains the most widely recognized Lutheran doctrinal text.

Other texts came to be recognized as definitive of Lutheran teaching as the movement developed. Luther's Small Catechism and Large Catechism (both 1529) were widely adopted both as doctrinal texts and as educational tools. The Small Catechism has been memorized by generations of Lutherans. Following the Catholic rejection of the Augsburg Confession, Melanchthon wrote a lengthy Apology of the Augsburg Confession (1531), which was accepted as an authentic explanation of its sense. When Pope PAUL III (1552–1621) in 1536 called for a council to address Reformation controversies, the Lutheran leaders produced two texts in preparation for the council: the Smalcald Articles, which detailed what was and was not negotiable for the Lutherans, and the Treatise on the Power and Primacy of the Pope.

Following Luther's death in 1546, a series of intense debates broke out within Lutheranism on the nature of original sin, the place of the law and good works in the Christian life, the correct description of the presence of the body and blood of Christ in the bread and wine of the LORD'S SUPPER, and other topics. The debate was embittered by differences over how far to compromise with the Catholic forces after their military victories in the late 1540s. In addition, the reform movement in Switzerland, now led by John CALVIN (1509–1564) of Geneva (the Reformed churches), offered an alternative theological and practical agenda about which Lutherans disagreed.

While lines were not always clear, Lutherans fell into two parties: Philippists (followers of Melanchthon, more open to some agreement with both Catholics and Calvinists) and Gnesio (or purist) Lutherans (advocates of drawing sharp lines of difference, led most often by Matthias FLACIUS ILLYRICUS [1520–1575]). Agreement on disputed matters was reached in 1577 with the adoption of the Formula of Concord, but only after extensive and difficult discussion. Martin CHEMNITZ (1522–1586) of Braunschweig and Jacob Andreae (1528–1590) of Württemberg were most active in the drafting of the Formula.

In 1580 all of the Lutheran confessions were gathered, together with the Apostles', Nicene, and Athanasian creeds, as the Book of Concord, the standard collection of Lutheran doctrinal texts. While individual Lutheran churches have on occasion produced additional doctrinal standards, no texts beyond the Book of Concord have won acceptance as binding doctrinal standards for Lutheranism.

Not all Lutheran churches accept all of the Book of Concord. Membership in the Lutheran World Federation requires acceptance only of the Augsburg Confession and Luther's Small Catechism. The Church of Sweden, the largest Lutheran church in the world, officially affirms only the Augsburg Confession, in addition to the three ancient creeds. The Danish church accepts the Augsburg Confession and Luther's Small Catechism. In the United States, the Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod (a nationwide church, despite its name) affirms the entire Book of Concord. The larger EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA gives a higher standing to the Augsburg

Confession, called "a true witness of the gospel," than to the other Lutheran confessions, referred to as "further valid interpretations of the faith of the Church" (Constitution of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, chap. 2).

The Spread of Lutheranism. While Lutheranism began in Germany and all of its confessional documents originated in Germany, it spread during the sixteenth century to other areas of central Europe. East of the Holy Roman Empire, German-language communities in Transylvania (now in Romania) and in the Baltic area became Lutheran. Small Lutheran communities survived in Austria.

Most importantly, Scandinavia became Lutheran. Rebellion and civil war aided the introduction of Lutheranism. Denmark (also ruling Norway and Iceland) had been open to Lutheran influence from the early 1520s and became officially Lutheran in 1537 when Christian III (1503–1559) defeated his Catholic opponents in a civil war. While all the Catholic bishops were removed, the Danish church preserved an episcopal structure, under close supervision of the state. In Sweden (also ruling Finland), newly free from the Danish crown, a decision was made in favor of Lutheran practices in 1527. In the course of the sixteenth century, however, the tide turned at various moments both back toward Rome and toward Calvinist Geneva. Only in 1593 was the Augsburg Confession adopted by the Swedish church, which then remained firmly Lutheran.

Because no Lutheran country had extensive colonies prior to the nineteenth century, Lutheranism did not initially spread beyond Europe. A small Swedish colony in what is now Delaware and Pennsylvania existed for a brief time in the seventeenth century, leaving behind a small number of Lutheran churches. Significant numbers of European Lutherans did emigrate to North America. German Lutherans in Pennsylvania, working through the English court (the Hanoverian kings of England were also the rulers of Lutheran Hanover in Germany), sought assistance in Germany in organizing their church life. In 1742 Henry Melchior Muhlenberg (1711–1787) arrived in what is now the United States. His indefatigable labors produced the first Lutheran church structure in North America (the Ministerium of Pennsylvania).

Orthodoxy and Pietism. The early modern period in Lutheran theology is usually referred to as the age of orthodoxy. The faculty of the University of Wittenberg remained the leading theological authority. Following a renaissance of Aristotelian philosophy at the end of the sixteenth century, Lutheran theology took on a more scholastic form. The detailed development of precise theological explanations was the goal. Lutheran doctrine was to be defended both against Catholic opponents (such as Robert BELLARMINE [1542–1621]) and against Calvinist competitors. The greatest of these scholastic theologians was Johann GERHARD (1582–1637), professor at the University of Jena. He wrote both large and detailed dogmatic works (Loci theologici) and moving devotional works (Sacred Meditations). Leading proponents of orthodoxy in the following generations were Abraham CALOV (1612–1686) and Johannes Andreas QUENSTEDT (1617–1688), both of Wittenberg. Georg CALIXTUS (1586–1656) of the University of Helmstedt represented a contrary, more ecumenically open trend. He sought Christian unity on the basis of the common teaching of the ancient Church Fathers, the consensus quinquesaecularis. A vehement debate (the syncretistic controversy) broke out between Calixtus and the theologians of Wittenberg.

Johann Gerhard's Sacred Meditations and the hymns of Paul Gerhardt (1607–1676) ("O Sacred Head, Now Wounded"; "O Lord, How Shall I Meet You?") witness to the lively piety that coexisted with scholastic theology. Mystical tendencies in Lutheran devotion were most prominent in the writings of Johann Arndt (1555–1621), especially his True Christianity. Drawing extensively on late medieval mystical writings, Arndt stressed the union of the believer with Christ as the goal and experiential center of the Christian life. True Christianity became one of the most widely read and translated books of Lutheran spirituality.

In later generations, piety and a concern for doctrinal precision came to be seen as enemies. Philipp Jacob SPENER (1635–1705), an Alsatian pastor who had become head of the Lutheran ministerium in Frankfurt am Main, criticized Lutheran clergy as orthodox but lacking in a "true, living faith." In his book Pia desideria (1675), he laid out a reform program for the church, centered on a revived laity meeting in small groups or "bands" for Bible study, prayer, and shared accounts of Christian experience. Emphasis fell more on changed hearts and lives than on correct theological expression. Spener's critique proved controversial, and his movement of reform, generally called PIETISM, was seen by some as divisive, pitting the truly pious against others, and as "enthusiasm," placing experience above biblical truth.

Pietism found its greatest embodiment in a network of schools, orphanages, and welfare institutions created by a follower of Spener, August Hermann FRANCKE (1663–1727), centered in Halle, Germany. An emphasis on experiential religion was combined with concrete efforts toward care of the poor, Christian education at all levels, and, later, missions. The more churchly pietism of Halle was widely influential throughout the entire Lutheran world and beyond, most importantly through its impact on John WESLEY (1703–1791) and the Methodist movement.

Enlightenment, Confessionalism, and the Luther Renaissance. The ENLIGHTENMENT was less anticlerical and antireligious in Lutheran countries than in Catholic ones and was often absorbed into theological teaching. Gottfried Wilhelm LEIBNIZ (1646–1716), who combined mathematical and philosophical interests with a lively concern for theology, paved the way for a rationalist theology that would come to replace scholastic orthodoxy at the universities. Such theology was often disinterested in the particularities of Lutheranism, while remaining within the general structures of the Lutheran church. The greatest achievements of this period were less in theology than in a religiously tinged philosophy, taken in a more ethical direction by Immanuel KANT (1724–1804) and in a more speculative direction by G.W.F. HEGEL (1770–1831). Kant and Hegel would remain defining figures for much academic theology in the next two centuries.

More important for theology within the church was the rise of varying forms of confessionalism, a reaction against rationalism that sought a return to earlier affirmations of the faith. This reaction was furthered by attempts in the nineteenth century by German governments, especially in Prussia, to merge the Lutheran and Reformed churches, both under state control. These attempts made the rejection of CALVINISM a defining mark of Lutheran loyalty. Some confessionalists sought a simple return to the scholasticism of the seventeenth century (repristination theology). Others, especially those connected with the University of Erlangen (e.g., Adolf von Harless [1806–1879]), represented a complex mix of traditional elements with the new romanticism of the nineteenth century. Of particular importance for the success of confessionalism was Wilhelm LÖHE (1808–1872) of Neuendettelsau, both through his writings (Three Books about the Church) and his work for missions and social welfare, which connected him with Lutherans in other countries. American Lutheranism, after intense debates in the 1850s, became dominated by varying forms of confessionalism, either in a repristination theology (C.F.W. WALTHER [1811–1887]) or in a theology less tied to earlier scholasticism (C.P. KRAUTH [1823–1883]).

While the confessional revival turned to the Book of Concord as the dogmatic norm of Lutheran theology, the early twentieth-century "Luther Renaissance" saw an expansion of studies of Martin Luther, made possible by the rediscovery of many of Luther's writings, especially early writings, and their publication in the new Weimar edition of Luther's works. A picture of Luther emerged that was distant both from liberal accommodation to modern thought and life and from scholastic concern with dogmatic details. The focus instead was on the sinner's confrontation with the Word of God, which cannot be reduced to a system. Emphasis fell on paradox and the rediscovered categories of simul iustus et peccator (simultaneously justified and sinful) and theologia crucis (theology of the cross). This interpretation of Luther fit well with larger intellectual trends of the period (e.g., EXISTENTIALISM).

After some initial hesitation, Lutherans entered the ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT with vigor. Swedish archbishop Nathan SÖDERBLOM (1866–1931) was instrumental in calling the large ecumenical conferences on life and work and on faith and order in the 1920s. Dietrich Bonhoeffer (1906–1945) was a voice in the international Christian community for the oppressed German churches. Following the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965), the dialogue between the Catholic Church and the Lutheran churches was unusually fruitful. The Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification, signed by the Roman Catholic Church and the Lutheran World Federation in 1999, affirmed a "consensus in basic truths of the doctrine of justification" and declared that the mutual condemnations from the Reformation age related to justification do not apply to this consensus understanding. The Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification represents the first doctrinal agreement among the Lutheran churches since the Book of Concord.

The Formation of a World Lutheran Communion. While Lutheranism remains among the most European of Christian traditions in its membership (approximately half the world's Lutherans live in Europe), both immigration and missions have produced significant Lutheran churches beyond Europe. Large immigrant churches exist in North America, the southern countries of Latin America (Argentina, Chile, and southern sections of Brazil), and Australia. Mission churches have thrived in Africa (especially Tanzania, Ethiopia, Namibia, South Africa, and Madagascar) and Asia (especially India and Indonesia). Germany remains the country with the largest number of Lutherans (12.6 million in 2009), but the Lutheran church in Germany exists as a fellowship of independent regional churches. The largest Lutheran church in the world is the Church of Sweden (approximately 6.9 million in 2009).

Historically, Lutheranism had no structures uniting the Lutheran churches. Lutheranism was united by its confessional documents. The state control of the Lutheran churches made any authoritative international structure impossible. First initiatives toward a world Lutheran organization occurred in the second half of the nineteenth century. The Allgemeine Evangelisch-Lutherische Konferenz (General Evangelical-Lutheran Conference) was organized in 1868. Individuals, rather than churches, belonged to this organization, whose membership was primarily German. In 1923 the first Lutheran World Convention met in Eisenach, Germany. While the convention was organized as a one-time meeting, not as an ongoing organization, and its precise relation to the Lutheran churches was left ambiguous, a continuation committee was appointed at the end of the conference and further conferences were held in 1929 and 1935. The 1935 conference moved toward a more permanent organization, but plans for a further conference in 1940 in North America were disrupted by World War II (1939–1945).

In 1948 the Lutheran World Federation (LWF) was formed as an ongoing organization of Lutheran churches. An assembly is held approximately every six years. The LWF is headed by a president, elected by the assembly, and a general secretary who manages the secretariat headquartered in Geneva, Switzerland. In its initial constitution, the LWF was defined as "a free association of churches," emphasizing the autonomy of the member churches. In 1990 this description was amended to describe the LWF as "a communion of churches." All LWF member churches are in ecclesial communion with one another. While the individual member churches remain the center of administrative and doctrinal authority, the LWF was able to coordinate the actions of member churches in affirming the Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification and to engage in a form of discipline when it suspended the membership of two German-language churches in southern Africa in 1984 for compromising with apartheid. The LWF includes almost all the Lutheran churches in the world, the largest exception being the Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod.

DOCTRINAL PERSPECTIVE

Trinitarian and Christological Affirmations. The Lutheran confessions stress their acceptance of the classical affirmations of the doctrines of the Trinity and of the full humanity and divinity of Jesus Christ (Augsburg Confession, Arts. 1 and 3). These teachings were not matters of controversy in the Reformation period and were presupposed by all Lutheran theologians of the time. The one Lutheran innovation in the area was the development of a distinctive understanding of the communication of idioms, that is, the understanding of the interrelation of the divine and human natures of Christ with each other and with Christ's unitary personhood. Pressed by Reformed theologians to explain how the body and blood of Christ could be present on many altars simultaneously, Lutheran theologians taught that Christ's humanity could participate in some aspects of his divinity (e.g., ubiquity or the capacity to be present in many places at once) without losing its essential humanity (Formula of Concord, Arts. 7 and 8). This understanding was rejected by both Reformed and Catholic theologians.

Justification: The Heart and Touchstone of Lutheran Theology. The touchstone of Lutheran theology that gives Lutheran teaching its distinctive focus is the insistence that the sinner is justified before God by grace, through faith, because of Jesus Christ (Augsburg Confession, Art. 4). On this point, Luther insisted, "stands all that we teach and practice against the pope, the devil, and the world" (Smalcald Articles, Pt. II, Art. 1). Later Lutheran theology came to refer to the doctrine of justification as "the article by which the church stands and falls" (articulus stantis et cadentis ecclesiae). The Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification describes the doctrine of justification as "an indispensable criterion that constantly serves to orient all the teaching and practice of our churches to Christ" (para. 18).

The doctrine of justification concerns how the sinner comes to be accepted as righteous in God's judgment. While the topic of justification was addressed within medieval theology, it was generally handled as one theme among others within the discussion of divine grace (e.g., THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologica I–II, q. 113). Within Lutheran theology, justification tends to become the organizing category for all discussion of SALVATION. This transformation presupposes a particular reading of the New Testament, in which Romans and Galatians become central, and a religious situation in which the question of acceptance by divine judgment is of decisive importance for many Christians. Much of what Lutheran theologians said about justification presupposed the "terrified conscience," which feared that its own sinfulness excluded it from God's salvation.

By Grace. Lutheranism is one form of the Augustinian theology of grace that has shaped Western theology. Salvation and justification before God's righteousness are pure gift, which the sinner can in no way merit. This necessity of grace was founded both on a firm affirmation of the thorough sinfulness of the person apart from grace (Augsburg Confession, Art. 2) and on an insistence that all honor must be given to Christ in all things. If we could merit or contribute to our justification, not only would that mean some aspects of our action are untainted by sin, but it would also mean that we would have something to boast of in ourselves. A pastoral intent accompanied this insistence. For Melanchthon, the question is "whether we should place our confidence in Christ or in our own works" (Apology, Art. 4, para. 156). If our own actions are seen as making a necessary contribution, then "faced with God's judgment, we will discover that such confidence was futile, and consciences will then plunge into despair" (Apology, Art. 4, para. 157).

Because of Christ. An insistence that justification is by grace alone does not differentiate Lutheranism from Catholicism. More distinctive was a particular Christocentric understanding of justification. Christ is not only the source of the Christian's righteousness before God; Christ is the Christian's righteousness. That is, the righteousness, which will avail before the judgment of God, is the righteousness of Christ, which becomes the righteousness of those who have faith in Christ.

This understanding was most pointedly stated in Luther's early sermon on Two Kinds of Righteousness (Luther's Works 1955–1986, Vol. 31, pp. 297–306). Grace does work in the Christian a "proper righteousness," a righteousness that belongs to the Christian and is realized in the Christian's actions. This righteousness, however, is an effect of the "alien righteousness," the righteousness of Christ that belongs to the Christian through faith. "Through faith in Christ, therefore, Christ's righteousness becomes our righteousness and all that he has becomes ours; rather, he himself becomes ours" (Luther's Work 1955–1986, Vol. 31, p. 298). A "happy exchange" occurs in which Christ takes on the sinner's unrighteousness and the sinner receives Christ's righteousness. Luther often uses marital imagery to portray this union and exchange in ways similar to late medieval mystical depictions of the soul's marriage to Christ.

Only the "alien" righteousness of Christ, and not the "proper righteousness" of the Christian, can stand before divine judgment. First, in this life the Christian must continue to struggle with disordered desires and thus cannot love God with an undivided heart and mind. Until all such desires are removed, one cannot fulfill the command to love God with all one's heart and mind. Even when the Christian does the good work of resisting such disordered desires, the command of undivided love is not being obeyed. Thus, the person is simul iustus et peccator, both justified and yet a sinner. Second and more fundamentally, Luther understands the correct attitude of the human being as one of trustful dependence on God for all things. Even our standing before God must always be received from God. Trust in God and not in ourselves is what is commanded in the First of the Ten Commandments (Large Catechism, Ten Commandments, First Commandment). Even when all the effects of sin are removed, Christ will still be our righteousness. When we are finally cleansed from all sin, our dependence on Christ and his righteousness will be complete, perfect, and unimpeded.

In Luther's writings, the Christian's participation in Christ is the basis for God imputing Christ's righteousness to those who have faith in Christ. Already in the writings of Melanchthon and increasingly in later Lutheranism, participatory language is replaced by more legal language. Justification is forensic, in the sense that it is a legal declaration of pardon, an application of Christ's merits to those who have faith in him. The bond of participation falls into the background.

Through Faith. For Lutheranism, faith is the bond that links the Christian to the righteousness of Christ. Unlike the medieval definition of faith in relation to the triad of faith, hope, and love (I Cor. 13), with faith being located primarily in the intellect, in line with the description of faith as "the evidence of things not seen" (Heb 11:1), Lutheranism depicts faith as the total attitude of trusting dependence on God, which shapes the entirety of the Christian life: "The just shall live by faith" (Rom 1:17). Trust (fiducia) becomes the most important element of faith. As trust, faith is primarily receptive; it depends on and receives that in which it trusts. Faith as a human action of the justified self is not justifying; faith justifies only by what it receives: Christ. The importance of love and hope are not denied, but faith is the key to justification because by faith the self is open to receiving Christ.

Scripture and Tradition. Lutherans thought that this understanding of justification was the clear teaching of the New Testament and in accord with the teaching of the fathers of the church's first centuries. They rejected what they understood to be later traditions, which they viewed as incompatible with this gospel of justification. They did not believe that a magisterium to interpret Scripture with authority was needed.

The Lutheran confessions themselves say little about the authority of Scripture. Only the last of the confessions, the Formula of Concord, has a section on scripture and tradition, stating that "the only rule and guiding principle according to which all teachings and teachers are to be evaluated and judged are the prophetic and apostolic writings of the Old and New Testaments alone" (Formula of Concord, Epitome, Summary). Later traditions are to be judged by the standard of Scripture and respected "as witnesses of how and where the teaching of the prophets and apostles was preserved after the time of the apostles." The ancient creeds and doctrinal teachings of the early Church were accepted as normative because they were seen as accurately summarizing the biblical message. Over time, Lutherans added the phrase sola scriptura to the three other "soli" associated with the doctrine of justification: sola gratia, sola fide, solo Christo.

Law and Good Works. The Lutheran Reformers insisted that they were not rejecting the importance or even, carefully stated, the necessity of good works. They did insist that good works are a consequence of justification and not a contributing cause of justification: "It is also taught that such faith should yield good fruit and good works and that a person must do such good works as God has commanded for God's sake but not place trust in them as if thereby to earn grace before God" (Augsburg Confession, Art. 6; see also Formula of Concord, Art. 4). It is an "Epicurean delusion" to believe that one can be justified and continue to sin willfully (Formula of Concord, Solid Declaration, Art. 4, para. 31). Good works do not, however, increase our justification. While the Lutheran confessions affirm that good works can be meritorious (Apology, Art. 4, para. 366), they insist that neither justification, salvation, nor eternal life can be merited. Later Lutheranism dropped the language of merit.

The law, understood both as the law written on the human heart (Rom 2:15) and the biblical law summarized in the Ten Commandments, indicates what works please God. (This argument was a basis for the Reformation criticism of acts of devotion beyond the biblical law, such as pilgrimages and various monastic practices.) The law serves at least two functions: as embodied in a public institution, the law serves to restrain sin in the public order; as proclaimed, the law convicts of sin and drives to repentance. While the precise nature of the role of the law in instructing the justified person in the Christian life has been controversial within modern Lutheranism (the "third use of the law"), Lutheran ethics, especially as embodied in the Catechisms, followed a synthesis of biblical revelation as illuminated by natural law.

The Sacraments. The Lutheran confessions took no firm position on the number of sacraments (Apology, Art. 13, para. 2). Sacraments were defined as "rites, which have the command of God and to which the promise of grace has been added" (Apology, Art. 13, para. 3). Baptism and the Lord's Supper clearly met this definition. Whether the private confession of sins did so was debated among Lutherans. While the confessions took no firm position, Lutherans came generally to view only Baptism and the Lord's Supper as sacraments. Orders for private confession have remained in Lutheran service books, and private confession has been widely practiced during some periods of Lutheran history.

Sacraments have been important in Lutheran piety. The emphasis on justification in the righteousness of Christ fits with a piety that does not look inward at the state of the soul but outward at the external word that comes to the Christian and communicates Christ. Assurance of salvation is most confident when it looks to the means of grace. Baptism and the Lord's Supper, along with preaching, came to be the focal points for this emphasis on the external word.

Baptism. Lutheran teaching has consistently emphasized baptism as the divinely instituted means of inclusion into Christ and his Church. As such, baptism is said to be "necessary to salvation" (Apology, Art. 9). Baptism works with justification and regeneration when it is received in faith; without faith, baptism is valid but not efficacious. Lutheranism has consistently affirmed infant baptism, and infant baptism has been the most common practice within Lutheranism. The question of how infants can have the faith needed to receive baptism effectively has been answered with various understandings of the faith of infants or of the role of the faith of parents and sponsors. Lutherans have baptized both by immersion and by sprinkling.

The Lord's Supper. In the sixteenth century, Lutheran churches revised the Mass but kept its basic liturgical structure. The primary target of Lutheran critiques of medieval and Catholic Eucharistic teaching and practice was the understanding of the Mass as sacrificial. This teaching of the Mass as sacrifice was seen as compromising the Supper as primarily God's gift of Christ to the congregation. The "sacrifice of the Mass," it was argued, turned the Supper into a work we present to God. This shift was seen as contradicting a right understanding of justification. In line with such an understanding, Lutherans saw the Supper as the sacramental means of communicating forgiveness of sins.

Lutherans placed less emphasis on the critique of the doctrine of TRANSUBSTANTIATION. Over against the Reformed teachings of Zwingli and Calvin, they taught that the body and blood of Christ enter into a "sacramental union" with the bread and wine. The body and blood of Christ are "in, with, and under" the bread and wine in such a way that the bread and wine are literally, and not merely metaphorically, the body and blood of Christ (Large Catechism, Sacrament of the Altar, para. 8). All who receive the elements also receive Christ: those with faith receive unto salvation; those without faith, unto judgment.

The Catholic teaching of transubstantiation was criticized as inappropriately introducing philosophical categories into the understanding of Christ's presence under the bread and wine and unbiblically denying that the bread and wine remain bread and wine, even while becoming Christ's body and blood (Smalcald Articles, Pt. III, Art. 6). Non-Lutherans have labeled the Lutheran understanding consubstantiation, but Lutherans have resisted any such use of philosophical categories of substance.

The Church. The Lutheran confessions describe the church as "the assembly of all believers [communio sanctorum] among whom the gospel is purely preached and the holy sacraments are administered according to the gospel" (Augsburg Confession, Art. 7). The church is thus a creature of the word, a community gathered around proclamation and sacrament. While the church as a divine institution is visible only to faith and often hidden by the sins of its members, it is not invisible. The confessions (Apology, Art. 7, para. 20) and the writings of Luther (On the Councils and the Church) present various lists of marks by which the church is visible in the world, the most important of which are preaching and the sacraments.

The "ministry" or "preaching office" is said to be instituted by God (Augsburg Confession, Art. 5) and thus essential to the church. Lutherans have seen the divinely instituted ministry as embodied in the ordained clergy, referred to as pastors in English and German but as priests in the Scandinavian languages. Although the Lutheran confessions express a preference for an episcopal church order, such an order was not seen as necessary. No essential difference was seen between bishops and priests or pastors (Treatise on the Power and Primacy of the Pope, paras. 60ff). Episcopal and nonepiscopal Lutheran churches thus fully recognize each other's ordained ministries. Lutheran churches that do not use the title bishop have usually had some similar office, often called a president or superintendent. In recent years, ecumenical relations with Anglican churches have led Lutheran churches in North America and portions of Scandinavia to reclaim episcopal succession (which has always been claimed by the Swedish and Finnish churches).

M

MACKILLOP, MARY HELEN, ST.

Known in religion as Mary of the Cross, born Maria Ellen MacKillop, educator, foundress of the Josephite Sisters; b. January 15, 1842, Fitzroy (near Melbourne), Australia; d. August 8, 1909, Sydney, New South Wales, Australia.

The daughter of Highland Scottish immigrants, she was working as a governess when in 1861 she met Father Julian Tenison Woods, a missionary from England and one of the chief architects of Australia's Catholic education system. He inspired her to dedicate her life to teaching the children of the bush. In 1865, Mary and two younger sisters began teaching in an abandoned stable at Penola, South Australia.

Moving to Adelaide, Mary MacKillop and Father Woods founded the Institute of the Sisters of St. Joseph of the Sacred Heart. Together with her companions Mary pronounced the vows of religion August 15, 1866, and took the name of Mother Mary of the Cross. Her efforts to adapt the new community to a colonial environment encountered a decade of lay and clerical misunderstanding and opposition. In 1871, the bishop of Adelaide excommunicated her and disbanded the sisterhood. A Jewish person gave the homeless nuns a house rent free, until their restoration in 1872.

In 1874, Mother Mary traveled to Rome and submitted her rule to Pope PIUS IX. Rome's eventual decision was a compromise but the foundress won her principal point of central government for the sisters throughout the Australian colonies. She established 160 Josephite houses and 117 schools attended by more than 12,000 children. When she died after a long illness, her congregation numbered about 1,000.

Her tomb is in a vault donated by a Presbyterian woman in front of Our Lady's Altar in the Mount Street Josephite Chapel, North Sydney. At her beatification by JOHN PAUL II on January 19, 1995, at Randwick Racecourse in Sydney, she became the first Australian beata. She is the Patron of Australia. On December 19, 2009, following the approval of a miracle, the Holy See announced that MacKillop would be canonized by Pope BENEDICT XIV. As of the printing of this entry, a canonization date had not been set.

Feast: August 7.

MANDATUM, ACADEMIC

The Latin word mandatum refers to a "command, order, mandate, credentials," as well as the ritual of washing feet at the HOLY THURSDAY liturgy (cf. Stelton 1995, p. 157). As used within the Catholic Church today, a mandatum is most often associated with the "acknowledgment by Church authority that a Catholic professor of a theological discipline is a teacher within the full communion of the Catholic Church" (NCCB 2000, Pt. 2, Art. 4, 4e, i, p. 16). The mandatum is not the same "as an appointment, authorization, delegation or approbation of one's teaching by Church authorities" (Art. 4, 4e, ii, p. 16). Rather, it "recognizes the professor's commitment and responsibility to teach authentic Catholic doctrine and to refrain from putting forth as Catholic teaching anything contrary to the Church's magisterium" (Art. 4, 4e, iii, p. 16).

Canonical Background. The term mandatum as applied to those who teach "theological disciples" is found in canon 812 of the 1983 Code of Canon Law and in canon 644 of the 1990 CODE OF CANONS OF THE EASTERN CHURCHES (CCEO), where it applies to "those who teach subjects regarding faith and morals in Catholic universities." Canon 229 of the 1983 Code also speaks of the right of qualified lay persons "to receive from legitimate ecclesiastical authority a mandate to teach the sacred sciences" (mandatum docendi scientias sacras). The "theological disciplines" mentioned in canon 812 are usually thought to be those mentioned in article 51 of the Norms of Application issued by the Congregation for Catholic Education for the 1979 apostolic constitution, Sapientia Christiana: namely, Sacred Scripture; fundamental, dogmatic, moral, spiritual, and pastoral theology; along with liturgy, church history, patrology, archeology, and canon law.

The term mandatum as used in reference to professors at Catholic colleges and universities is found in the 1983 Code but not in the 1917 one. Prior to the 1983 Code, those who were authorized to preach or teach by the Church were granted a canonical mission (missio canonica), a term rooted in the requirement for preaching with ecclesiastical authorization found in various councils, both local and ecumenical, going back to the Council of Verona in 1184 (cf. Euart 2000, p. 967). Canon 1328 of the 1917 Code uses the term missio with regard to authorized preaching, but its placement in the Code "supported the opinion that the missio required in the canons applied to the broader ministry of teaching, including catechetical teaching as well as preaching" (Euart 2000, p. 967).

With regard to norms governing ecclesiastical faculties and universities, both the 1931 apostolic constitution, Deus scientiarum Dominus, of Pope PIUS XI and the 1979 constitution, Sapientia christiana, of Pope JOHN PAUL II, required a "canonical mission" for teaching disciplines concerning faith and morals "from the Chancellor or his delegate" because "they do not teach on their own authority but by virtue of the mission they have received from the Church" (Sapientia christiana, Art. 21, n. 1). Furthermore, professors must receive a nihil obstat from the HOLY SEE before being given "a permanent post" or promotion "to the highest category of teacher" (Sapientia christiana, Art. 21, n. 1).

The choice of the term mandatum rather than canonical mission in the 1983 Code might have been due to Vatican II's Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity, Apostolicam Actuositatem, where mandatum is used to refer to the procedure by which the Church's hierarchy associates some particular form of lay apostolate "more closely with its own apostolic function" (no. 24; cf. Euart 2000, p. 968). The word missio, when applied to the laity, "connotes entrusting to the laity certain tasks which are considered proper to the hierarchy but which require neither the power of orders nor the power of jurisdiction for their lawful exercise" (Euart 2000, p. 968). This is why those who receive a mandatum "teach in their own name in virtue of their baptism and their academic and professional competence not in the name of the Bishop or of the Church's magisterium" (NCCB 2000, Pt. 2, Art. 4, 4e, ii, p. 16). Those who receive a missio canonica, however, receive a more direct commission by the Church to undertake a task proper to the hierarchy (e.g., teaching) even if they are not ordained. In a similar manner, those who teach in seminaries receive their own type of "canonical mission" when approved and appointed to teach by competent ecclesiastical authority (cf. 1983 Code, canon 253, and CCEO, canons 340.1 and 351).

The difference between a mandatum and a canonical mission can also be explained by the distinction between a Catholic college, university, or institute of higher education and an ecclesiastical (sometimes called "pontifical") university or faculty. According to the 1983 Code, "ecclesiastical universities or faculties can be established only through erection by the Apostolic See or with its approval; their higher direction also pertains to it" (canon 816.1). Only ecclesiastical universities and faculties are "able to confer academic degrees which have canonical effects in the Church" (canon 817). The distinction between Catholic universities and faculties and ecclesiastic universities and faculties is also found in canon law. In the 1983 Code, canons 807 through 814 pertain to "Catholic Universities and Other Institutes of Higher Studies," canons 815 through 821 apply to "Ecclesiastical Universities and Faculties," and canons 232 through 264 deal with seminaries or "the formation of clerics." Many ecclesiastical faculties are found in Rome and directed by major religious congregations (e. g., the Gregorian by the JESUITS and the "Angelicum" by the DOMINICANS). In the United States, the CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA comes the closest to being an "ecclesiastical" university because of its three faculties of ecclesiastical standing: the School of Philosophy, the School of Theology, and the School of Canon Law. There are also other ecclesiastical faculties in the United States directed by religious congregations or attached to seminaries.

The Application of the Mandatum within the United States and Reactions. Between Vatican II and John Paul II's 1990 constitution, Ex corde Ecclesiae, there was considerable discussion and controversy about what were the essential characteristics of a Catholic university and the responsibilities of professors of Catholic theology. The Land O'Lakes Statement on "The Nature of the Contemporary Catholic University" was endorsed by twenty-six Catholic educators, administrators, and leaders (including several bishops) who met at a seminar held July 20–23, 1967, at Land O'Lakes, Wisconsin. This statement asserted the need for a Catholic university "to have a true autonomy and academic freedom in the face of authority of whatever kind, lay or clerical, external to the academic community itself" (Gallin 1992, p. 7). During the 1970s there were numerous discussions between the Holy See and the U.S. Catholic hierarchy on the nature and responsibilities of Catholic colleges and universities (Gallin 1992, pp. 63–86), and similar exchanges took place between Rome and other episcopal conferences. In his October 7, 1979, address to the presidents of Catholic colleges and universities at the Catholic University of America, Pope John Paul II, in contrast to the Land O'Lakes Statement, emphasized the "essential relationship to the hierarchy of the Church" that must exist at Catholic colleges and universities. He also spoke of the need for theological teaching to be faithful to the Word of God "as contained in Sacred Scripture and in the Tradition of the Church, as interpreted by the authentic Magisterium of the Church" (Gallin 1992, p. 132).

Questions concerning the responsibilities of theology professions to teach in communion with the Church were raised during the drafting of the 1983 Code of Canon Law. The Association of Catholic Colleges and Universities in the United States offered both criticisms and recommendations regarding the proposed canons (Gallin 1992, pp. 159–172). While the final work on the new Code of Canon Law was being undertaken, the Congregation for Catholic Education, in 1980, began work on a document that would address the nature and responsibilities of Catholic colleges and universities. The new Code of Canon Law was issued in 1983, and canon 812 stated that: "Those who teach theological disciplines in any institutes of higher studies whatsoever must have a mandate (mandatum) from the competent ecclesiastical authority." In his 1990 apostolic constitution on Catholic universities, Ex corde Ecclesiae, John Paul II referred to canon 812 in article 4.3 of the General Norms, by noting: "In particular, Catholic theologians, aware that they fulfill a mandate received from the Church, are to be faithful to the Magisterium of the Church as the authentic interpreter of Sacred Scripture and Sacred Tradition."

After the 1990 promulgation of Ex corde Ecclesiae, the U.S. bishops undertook a decade-long process of developing particular norms for the application of the papal constitution to Catholic colleges and universities in the United States. There was a sincere effort to listen to representatives of Catholic colleges and universities in the process. A particular point of concern was the mandatum, which some Catholic theologians feared would have a "chilling effect on the academic freedom of Catholics ... working in the field of theology" and be "injurious to Catholic intellectual life, to the Catholic character and future prospectus of Catholic universities" (Gondreau 2007, p. 94).

On November 17, 1999, the U.S. Catholic bishops, in plenary assembly, approved The Application of "Ex corde Ecclesiae" for the United States. The Congregation for Bishops granted recognitio to the document on May 3, 2000, and it took on the force of particular law in the United States on May 3, 2001. The applications of the U.S. bishops specify the "bishop of the diocese in which the Catholic university is located" as "the competent ecclesiastical authority" to grant the mandatum (NCCB 2000, Pt. 2, Art. 4, 4e, iv [1], p. 17). The mandatum remains in effect once granted "unless and until withdrawn by competent ecclesiastical authority"; it should be given in writing, and "the reasons for denying or removing a mandatum should also be in writing" (NCCB 2000, Pt. 2, Art. 4, 4e, iv [2–3], p. 17).

At their June 2001 General Meeting, the U.S. bishops approved a set of guidelines for issuing the mandatum to theologians in Catholic colleges and universities. The guidelines address the nature of the mandatum; who is required to have it; how it is to be granted; and the process for withholding or withdrawing it. Professors of theology hired after the effective date (May 3, 2001) were expected to obtain the mandatum by June 1, 2002. Those hired subsequently were expected to obtain it either within the academic year of being hired or within six months. If the professor does not obtain the mandatum within the designated time, the competent ecclesiastical authority is to notify the appropriate authority in the college or university, but no further course of action is specified.

While some have seen the mandatum as testimony "to theologian's reliance upon magisterial teaching as a genuine well-spring and guidepost for theological reflection" (Gondreau 2007, p. 94), others, like Fr. Richard McBrien of the University of Notre Dame, have refused to request a mandatum as a matter of principle, because it "compromises the academic integrity of the faculty and the university" (McBrien 2000, p. 14).

Although some Catholic colleges and universities have publicly proclaimed the complete adherence of their theology faculty with the mandatum, most have not provided lists of names of those professors who have or have not received a mandatum. Most bishops also have been reluctant to make public the names of those who have either received or been denied a mandatum, but many have been active in other ways in working toward strengthening Catholic theological instruction in the Catholic colleges and universities within their jurisdiction.

MANGANIELLO, TERESA, BL.

Also known as Maria Luisa Manganiello; laywoman; b. January 1, 1849, Montefusco, Avellino, Italy; d. November 3, 1876, Montefusco, Avellino, Italy; declared VENERABLE by Pope BENEDICT XVI, July 3, 2009.

Teresa Manganiello was born in 1849 into a farming family of some honor and wealth. Her spirituality developed early and manifested itself in her generosity and compassion as well as her willingness to help others lead virtuous lives.

When, in April 1869, Father Lodovico Acernese of the Third Order of St. Francis at Pietradefusi (Avellino), Italy, made plans to begin a congregation in Montefusco, Teresa expressed her great longing to consecrate herself wholly to God. Her ardent desire and that of other young girls led him to establish the order.

In her twenties, after she had become a Secular Franciscan Tertiary, Teresa had the opportunity to visit Rome. While there, she asked Pope PIUS IX to bless their recently established religious family, and the pope did so. Although Father Lodovico intended to make Teresa the head of a new congregation, she died suddenly at the age of twenty-seven. Nevertheless, Teresa's faith and exemplary life bore fruit. Many young women devoted themselves to the work of God under Father Lodovico's direction, and he established the Franciscan Immaculatine Sisters. By 1950 the order had received the decree from the HOLY SEE, and they began their first mission in Brazil. In 1982, they expanded to the Philippines and later into the Cochin Diocese.

Pope Benedict XVI declared Teresa Manganiello venerable on July 3, 2009, and issued a proclamation of a miracle attributed to her on December 19, 2009, leading to plans for her beatification in 2010. At the time of the publication of this entry, a date had not been set for her beatification.

MANTOVANI, MARIA DOMENICA, BL.

Known in religion as Mother Maria of the Immaculate; virgin, cofoundress and superior general of the LITTLE SISTERS OF THE HOLY FAMILY; b. November 12, 1862, Castelletto di Brenzone, Italy; d. February 2, 1934, Castelletto di Brenzone; beatified April 27, 2003, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

Maria Domenica Mantovani was drawn to a life of PRAYER from an early age. When she was fifteen, Fr. Giuseppe NASCIMBENI (beatified April 17, 1988) joined the parish at Castelletto. His spiritual direction would profoundly influence the course of Maria's life. He encouraged Maria, with other young women of the parish, to visit the sick and teach catechism.

Maria had a deep and abiding love for the Virgin Mary, who would be her life's guiding example. At twenty-four, Maria felt called to consecrate herself to God. She privately entered into a vow of perpetual VIRGINITY before a statue of Mary Immaculate.

In 1892 Maria Domenica cofounded the congregation of the Little Sisters of the Holy Family with Fr. Nascimbeni. The Little Sisters would devote themselves to the promotion of parish life and to assisting spiritually and materially those in need, including children and youth, families, priests, the elderly, and the disabled. Maria Domenica became superior general of the congregation as "Mother Maria of the Immaculate." The townspeople lovingly referred to her as "Mother." Today, the order has a worldwide presence.

Maria Domenica was a humble woman of prayer and determination who would continue to draw strength and wisdom from her beloved Mary Immaculate, trusting in the Holy Mother's guidance. As the work of the Little Sisters developed, she would say:

> The Holy Family, for the great and mysterious project [that God is calling it to], has chosen me as its Cofoundress ... knowing that the Lord uses the least qualified, little, unknown instruments to do great works.... I am tranquil and convinced that the Institute, the work of God, will be provided for and guided by Him. (Office of Papal Liturgical Celebrations)

In his HOMILY during the 2003 BEATIFICATION Mass, Pope John Paul said of her:

> This praiseworthy daughter of the region of Verona, a disciple of Bl. Giuseppe Nascimbeni, was inspired by the Holy Family of Nazareth to make herself "all things to all people", ever attentive to the needs of the "poor people". She was extraordinarily faithful, in all circumstances and to her last breath, to the will of God, by whom she felt loved and called. What a fine example of holiness for every believer!

MANYANET Y VIVES, JOSÉ (JOSEPH), ST.

Priest, founder of the Congregation of the Sons of the Holy Family and the Institute of the Missionary Daughters of the Holy Family of Nazareth; b. Tremp, Pallars Jussá, Catalonia, Spain, January 7, 1833; d. San Andres de Palomar, Barcelona, Spain, December 17, 1901; beatified November 25, 1984; canonized May 16, 2004, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

José Manyanet y Vives, the youngest of nine children born to farmers Antonio Manyanet and Bonaventura Vives, was baptized on the day of his birth. Following the death of his father in 1834, José informally became the ward of Fr. Valentín Lledós, who influenced his future vocation, as did his mother Bonaventura's piety. At age twelve, José left home to begin his education in the Piarist school at Barbastro (1845–1850). He continued his study of philosophy at the seminary of Lleida (1850–1853) and of theology at Seu d'Urgell (1853–1859), where he was mentored by Bishop José Caixal y Estrade (1803–1879) and ordained as a priest on April 9, 1859.

From the time of his ordination until 1865, Manyanet successfully served Bishop Caixal in a number of offices while engaging in pastoral ministry as CONFESSOR, spiritual director, preacher, CATECHIST, and promoter of several associations. Spurred by a heroic concern for the family, which he recognized was threatened by DIVORCE and individualism, he founded two religious congregations: one for men, the Sons of the Holy Family (Hijos de la Sagrada Familia, founded 1864 in Tremp), and one for women, the Daughters of the Holy Family (Hijas de la Sagrada Familia, founded 1874 in Talarn).

The Sons of the Holy Family grew out of Manyanet's work as the founder of a boarding school in his hometown of Tremp during the first few years after his ordination. He and his first companions in the congregation made their religious profession in Barcelona on February 2, 1870; the congregation received pontifical approval on June 22, 1901, near the end of Manyanet's life. The order operates schools for the Christian education of children and promotes devotion to the Holy Family in Argentina, Brazil, Colombia, Italy, Mexico, Spain, the United States (from 1920), and Venezuela. The congregation also publishes the periodical Revista "La Sagrada Familia" ("Holy Family" Magazine), which was started by Manyanet in 1899.

The founding of the female branch was more difficult. In 1859 Bishop Caixal placed a new community of women founded by Ana María Janer y Anglarill (1800–1885) under Manyanet's direction. The order was consumed by crisis until it was again recognized by Bishop José Morgades of Vich in 1892 under the direction of the cofounder, Mother Encarnación Colomina (1848–1916). She gave the order its new name, the Missionary Daughters of the Holy Family of Nazareth (Misioneras Hijas de la Sagrada Familia de Nazaret). The order was eventually approved by the VATICAN on May 10, 1958.

In the years after he founded the two religious congregations, Manyanet continued to seek ways to foster devotion to the Holy Family. He advocated for the liturgical celebration of the Feast of the Holy Family, which was instituted by Pope LEO XIII in 1892. Manyanet also proposed, in an 1869 letter to Bishop Caixal, the idea of constructing a temple dedicated to the Holy Family. This proposal would eventually bear fruit, in no small part due to Manyanet's advocacy, in architect Antoni Gaudí's still-incomplete Temple of the Sagrada Familia in Barcelona.

In 1872 Manyanet moved to Barcelona, where he pursued various pastoral activities, especially opening parochial schools and writing catechetical works. The most popular of the latter include the books Meditaciones: El espíritu de la Sagrada Familia (Meditations: The Spirit of the Holy Family, 1888–1895), La Escuela de Nazaret y Casa de la Sagrada Familia (The School of Nazareth and Home of the Holy Family, 1895), and Preciosa joya de familia (Precious Jewel of the Family, 1899). Manyanet's work as a writer also includes the constitutions of the two congregations he founded.

For many years before his death, Fr. Manyanet secretly bore the STIGMATIZATION of Jesus. He died in Barcelona in a school he founded, Jesús, María y José, and his mortal remains were kept there in a burial chapel. In 2007 his remains were transferred to a site beneath the altar of the Barcelona church that was placed under his patronage after his canonization in 2004.

The ordinary informative process for Manyanet's BEATIFICATION began in 1931, and his cause was formally introduced by Pope PIUS XIII in 1951. Pope John Paul II, in his HOMILY at the Mass of canonization for Manyanet, praised him as a "true apostle of the family" who "carried out his plan of personal sanctity and heroically devoted himself to the mission that the Spirit entrusted to him."

MARCONI, GUGLIELMO

Italian physicist, developer of wireless telegraphy; b. April 25, 1874, Bologna, Italy; d. July 20, 1937, Rome.

Credit for the technological revolution of the nineteenth century that simplified the propagation of the Catholic faith belongs to Guglielmo Marconi who, in 1909, received the Nobel Prize in Physics. He had invented the first practical radio signaling system in 1895. His technology created instantaneous communication throughout the world.

Beginning with Pope BENEDICT XV during World War I, the Church has been actively involved in ecclesiastical diplomacy, thanks to Marconi. Vatican Radio became a major channel of propagation for the survival of the universal Catholic Church. In fact, the Church became closely associated with the implementation of international policies and politics as well as the development of an effective communication system to support them. As political borders changed, the Vatican was prepared to meet the new challenges of international relations within a media framework.

History of Wireless Telegraphy. Marconi, the Italian physicist who developed wireless telegraphy, was born in Bologna, Italy, in 1874, to a wealthy Italian father and Irish mother. He died of heart failure on July 20, 1937. Experimenting with homemade apparatus in 1895, he succeeded in sending signals to a point more that a mile distant; by 1897 he had increased the distance from a vessel to the shore to 18 miles. Marconi formed a company in London and, continuing his experiments, in 1901 sent and received the first trans-Atlantic communications between Cornwall, England, and St. John's, Newfoundland. From this point on, papal diplomacy would never be the same.

Vatican Radio. Vatican Radio has enjoyed a long history of world recognition and credibility, supporting both the sacred and secular objectives of seven popes throughout a century of religious and political turmoil. It has been the daily voice of the pontiffs—a bridge uniting the Shepherd with his flock. It not only broadcasts the teachings of the Roman Pontiff, but it also gives information on the activities of the HOLY SEE, reports on Catholic life throughout the world, and indicates the Church's point of view on current issues and her readiness to respond to the signs of the times. It announces the Christian message freely and efficiently and links the center of Catholicism with the different countries of the world.

Cardinal Eugenio Pacelli (later Pope PIUS XII), then VATICAN secretary of state, sought ways to strengthen the Vatican's power against the growing pressures applied by the secular state. He suggested that the Holy See investigate the possibilities of incorporating a new medium, radio, into church evangelization. With airwaves of broadcast technology, no pope could ever be driven into isolation again; geographic and political borders became virtually meaningless. PIUS XI listened intently to Pacelli's arguments and later supported his proposal to build a transnational system for the Church. Pacelli began negotiations with his friend Marconi to create a powerful shortwave radio system for Vatican use.

Four days after the Lateran Concordat with Italy was signed in June 1929, Pius XI entrusted Marconi with setting up Vatican Radio. Several months later on November 8, 1929, a Vatican-Italy accord stipulated the regulations for Holy See communications. Its inauguration took place in the Vatican gardens on February 12, 1931.

In 1930 Cardinal Pacelli approached Marconi to help him modernize the Vatican secretariat by introducing an efficient telephone system as well as a powerful shortwave radio station. Marconi readily agreed. Within months Pope Pius XI blessed the first world transnational radio system. For the first time the Roman pontiff's voice was heard live simultaneously across the planet.

Marconi introduced the Pope at the inaugural ceremonies:

> For nearly twenty centuries the Roman Pontiffs have given their inspired messages to all people, but this is the first time in history that the living voice of the Pope will have been heard simultaneously in all parts of the globe. With the help of Almighty God, who places such mysterious forces of nature at mankind's disposal, I have been able to prepare this instrument that will give to the faithful throughout the world the consolation of hearing the voice of the Holy Father. (The Founding of Vatican Radio 1931)

Following Marconi's inaugural comments, Pius XI prayed for God's blessings on this new and powerful medium:

> To God let our first words be "Glory to God in the highest and on earth peace to men of good will." Glory to God who in our days hath given such power to men that their words should reach in very truth to the ends of the earth, and peace on earth where we are the ambassador of that Divine Redeemer, Jesus. (The Founding of Vatican Radio 1931)

Listeners were amazed at the technical clarity of his message on shortwave. Pius XI was delighted. Vatican Radio became a significant force in Church propagation, programming much of its content to diverse audiences in many languages. The Holy Father instituted a Catholic Information Service via Vatican Radio airwaves. This program attempted to clarify the pope's position as church leader and was created solely to attack the atheistic propaganda coming from Germany, Italy, Japan, and Russia. Radio became a primary medium for the pontiff's anti-Communist message.

For the second anniversary of the Lateran Treaty between Italy and the Vatican State, Radio Vaticana was received enthusiastically throughout the world within moments of its first broadcast. It focused mainly on international missionary activity, Church teachings, commentary on various Catholic lay groups, and religious-oriented newscasts. Despite a few reception problems, the pope's first address was heralded as a great success.

The first papal message was broadcast for Christmas in 1936. Confronted with increasing appeals from Germany and Latin America to respond to Nazi and Soviet propaganda, Jesuit director Father Filippo Soccorso augmented the radio transmissions with broadcasts in German and other languages as well as Italian. At the same time, the Vatican updated the radio equipment with a new transmission tower, which German technicians nicknamed the "Papstfinger" (Pope's Finger).

The Church's institutional strength brought hope and inner peace to its faithful followers through periods of political conflict and economic turmoil. Toward the end of his pontificate, Pius XI prayed that Cardinal Pacelli, who possessed the diplomatic experience and media knowledge necessary for the challenges of World War II, would be his successor. When Pope Pius XI passed away on February 10, 1939, Vatican Radio was the first to announce the news. Indeed, it was Vatican Radio (station HVJ) that announced Pius XII's election to the papal throne on March 2, 1939.

MARELLO, GIUSEPPE (JOSEPH), ST.

Bishop of Asti, Piedmont, Italy, founder of the OBLATES OF SAINT JOSEPH; b. December 26, 1844, Turin, Italy; d. May 30, 1895, of a cerebral hemorrhage in the bishop's residence at Savona, Italy; beatified on Sept. 26, 1993, by Pope John Paul II; canonized on Nov. 25, 2001 by Pope John Paul II.

While still a child, Giuseppe (Joseph) moved from Turin to Santi Martino Alfieri with his father, Vincenzo, after the death of his mother, Anna Maria. He entered the minor seminary at age 12 and was ordained priest in 1868. While in the seminary he was miraculously cured of typhus by the Blessed Virgin, and ever after he had a very deep devotion to her. In his capacity as secretary to Bishop Carlo Savio of Asti for 13 years, Father Marello attended Vatican Council I from 1869 to 1870. During this time he also assumed responsibility for a retirement home, served as spiritual director, and taught catechism. At this time, he also contemplated joining a Carthusian monastery in order to devote the whole of his time to prayer. However, Bishop Savio convinced him that his gifts were better suited to a life of pastoral service. To this end, Marello founded the Oblates of St. Joseph in 1878 with the instruction that the Oblates be "hermits at home" devoted to deep contemplation and prayer so that they might be "effective apostles away from home." He also wanted to instill a devotion to St. Joseph in the men that were called to this new religious order.

Marello wanted his followers to be humble servants of the Church, ready to serve the bishops in whatever tasks were assigned them. The congregation was approved in 1909 by the Vatican after Marello's death. They opened their first mission in the United States in 1929. Following his episcopal consecration Feb. 17, 1889, Bishop Marello dedicated his work especially to youth and the abandoned, striving to emulate St. Joseph and the love and instruction he gave to the child, Jesus. His remains were enshrined at Asti.

In 1944, a young Oblate seminarian, Aldo Falconetti, was stricken with tubercular meningitis. Falconetti's Oblate brothers prayed for the healing intercession of their founder, even as the young man was being given the Last Rights. He was not expected to live through the night. When Falconetti awoke the next morning, free of his illness, it was declared miraculous. He was examined by doctors who could not explain how he had recovered so suddenly from his illness. On April 2, 1993, this miraculous healing was attributed to the then Venerable Giuseppe Marello, whom the Oblates had prayed to so fervently for a cure. This miracle opened a clear path to Marello's beatification and canonization.

He decisively opposed "materialism, Masonry, and anti-clericalism, which prevailed at the time" (Decree of Canonization, Dec. 18, 2000).

MARIA CANDIDA OF THE EUCHARIST, BL.

Baptized Maria Barba, prioress of Teresian Carmel, Ragusa, Italy; b. January 16, 1884, Catanzaro, Italy; d. June 12, 1949, Ragusa, Italy; beatified by John Paul II, March 21, 2004.

Born at Catanzaro, Southern Italy, into a devout Sicilian family from Palermo, Maria and her family returned to Palermo when she was two. As a young child, she yearned to partake in the mystery of the EUCHARIST. Maria would greet her mother after Mass and ask to be kissed so that she too might be in communion with God. Even at that young age, she searched with a childlike faith to understand the tangibility of the Eucharist.

At age fifteen Maria wanted to enter religious life, but family disapproval dictated that not until 1919, twenty years later, was she able to pursue her vocation. She entered the Teresian Carmel at Ragusa, taking the name Maria Candida of the Eucharist. Here, her love for the Eucharist, the symbol of God's presence in, and sacrifice for, the world, blossomed and found support in the writings of St. TERESA OF AVILA, the foundress of the CARMELITES. For Maria Candida, contemplative faith, divine hope, and loving charity were explicit demonstrations of the mystery of the Eucharist at work. Out of these flowed obedience, poverty, and love. To her, the quintessential mirror of the Eucharistic life was the Virgin Mary. Maria Candida's devotion to the concreteness and closeness of God through the Eucharist remained her lifelong inspiration, study, and focus. The written fruits were her uplifting, reflective meditations titled, "The Eucharist, 'True Jewel of Eucharistic Spirituality.'"

Maria Candida was elected prioress at Teresian Carmel in 1924, and she served until 1947. Under her guidance, the Rule of St Teresa of Jesus was lovingly upheld by the community, the Discalced Carmelite Order grew in Sicily, and she assisted with the revival of the Order of Carmelite Friars in Ragusa.

John Paul II said of Maria Candida that:

> She was an authentic mystic of the Eucharist; she made it the unifying centre of her entire life … [and] fell so deeply in love with the Eucharistic Jesus that she felt a constant, burning desire to be a tireless apostle of the Eucharist. I am sure that Bl. Maria Candida is continuing to help the Church from Heaven, to assure the growth of her sense of wonder at and love for this supreme Mystery of our faith.

MARIA GIUSEPPINA OF JESUS CRUCIFIED, BL.

Baptized Giuseppina (Josephine) Catanea, Prioress of the Carmel of Saints Teresa and Joseph at Ponti Rossi, Naples, Italy; b. February 18, 1894, Naples; d. March 14, 1948, Naples; beatified by Pope BENEDICT XVI on June 1, 2008, in Naples, Italy.

Daughter of the Marquises Grimaldi, Giuseppina Catanea was called Pinella by her family. The strong religious examples of her mother and grandmother fostered her Christian development. From an early age she felt the call to become a Carmelite. In 1918 Giuseppina entered the Community of St. Maria at Ponti Rossi as a novice.

During this time Giuseppina Catanea was paralyzed by spinal tuberculosis. After touching a relic of St. Francis XAVIER and being visited by him in a dream, she was miraculously cured. Following her healing, many sought her wisdom and guidance.

In 1932, at the decree of Pope PIUS XI, the house at Ponti Rossi became the Carmel of Saints Teresa and Joseph at Ponti Rossi, a Carmel of the Second Order, within the care of the Archbishop of Naples. That same year Giuseppina fully entered the order as Sr. Maria Giuseppina of Jesus Crucified. God continued to grant Maria Giuseppina mystical experiences.

In 1945 Maria Giuseppina was elected prioress of the convent. She served in this office until her death. She continued to suffer from physical illnesses. In time, her sight would fail, and she would be paralyzed by multiple sclerosis. Throughout she remained cheerful and saw her illnesses as gifts from the crucified Christ. She died from gangrene on March 14, 1948. Even in death, God's grace abounded. Maria Giuseppina's body lay exposed for veneration for fourteen days before burial. Her body remained uncorrupted. Medical experts declared the lack of decomposition inexplicable.

Maria Giuseppina was an inspiration for her sisters, publishing exhortations and letters for them. She also published her autobiography (1894–1932) and her diary (1925–1945) under the guidance of her spiritual director.

Maria Giuseppina's beatification took place in the cathedral of Naples. The Archbishop Cardinal Crescenzio Sepe presided, delivering Cardinal Martins's homily. Cardinal Martins wrote, "Guardando in particolare la storia ed il messaggio della Beata Giuseppina, comprendiamo meglio l'esigenza ineludibile della dimensione contemplativa, nella vita di ogni cristiano. Il suo esempio ci indica, anche, la strada concreta per coltivarla." ("Examining in particular Blessed Giuseppina's life and message, we better understand the inescapable need for the contemplative dimension in the life of every Christian. Her example offers us also the concrete way to cultivate it.")

MARIA MADDALENA DELLA PASSION, BL.

Baptized Costanza Starace; foundress of the Compassionist Sisters Servants of Mary; b. September 5, 1845, Castellammare di Stabia, Naples, Italy; d. December 13, 1921, Naples, Italy; beatified by Pope Benedict XIV, April 15, 2007.

Costanza Starace's future vocation would be influenced by her mother's devotion to Our Lady of Sorrows and her early childhood schooling. Educated at a boarding school run by the Daughters of Charity, Costanza developed health issues that forced her to return home, where she laid the foundations of her prayer life.

In 1867 Costanza Starace entered the Third Order of the SERVANTS OF MARY. She took the name Sr. Maria Maddalena of the Passion. At the behest of Bishop Francesco Petagna, she directed the Pious Union of the Daughters of Mercy, teaching catechism to young girls. Following a cholera outbreak in the area in 1869, the young Sr. Maria founded the Compassionist Sisters Servants of Mary. The governing rule of the order was "to share the compassionate Jesus and the Sorrowful Mother, to assist one's neighbor in all his needs, spiritual or corporal."

Supported by her deep understanding of personal sanctification and love for the Crucified Christ and Our Lady of Sorrows, Mother Maddalena's trust in God's will for her life never failed. Despite many spiritual trials that shadowed her life, Mother Maddalena's constant confession was "The will of God is the only goal of my life," and "The will of God is my paradise." She accomplished much, including, as Cardinal Martins explained, "her daring decision to build a church dedicated to the Heart of Jesus on the Hill of Scanzano."

To Mother Maddalena, prayer was the keystone to all of life's activities and her rosary, her constant companion. Cardinal Martins described her as "ascending even to the heights of mysticism, training herself with rigorous asceticism and successfully giving her busy apostolic activity a deep motivation, ... [her] fundamental criterion focused on the conviction ... that success in nursing the elderly, educating youth and giving of oneself to those in need of help and comfort was bound to personal sanctification and deep union with God."

To Mother Maddalena, prayer and the righteous execution of one's responsibilities were synonymous: "The world is not renewed when people conceive holiness as something different from fulfilling the duties of one's own state. The worker will be sanctified in his place of work; the soldier will become holy in the army.... Each step forward on the road to holiness is a step in the sacrifice of fulfilling one's own duty."

MARIA TERESA OF JESUS, BL.

Baptized Maria Scrilli, known in religion as Mother Maria Teresa Scrilli; foundress of the Congregation of the Sisters of Our Lady of Carmel; b. May 15, 1825, Montevarchi, Arezzo, Italy; d. November 14, 1889, Florence, Italy; beatified at Fiesole, Italy, by Benedict XVI, October 8, 2006.

Mother Maria Teresa's journey is not just that of a remarkable woman who lived trusting God's will and guiding hand, but also that of an order that time and again teetered on the edge of extinction.

Bedridden for two years during her teens, Maria Scrilli was healed due to the intercession of the martyr St. Fiorenzo. Recognizing God's call, she entered the Carmelite convent of St. Mary Magdalene de' Pazzi in Florence and stayed two months before returning home.

Awaiting direction, Maria Scrilli started a small school for girls in Montevarchi. She provided a well-rounded education that included spiritual guidance focused on virtue and the love of God. Other like-minded young women joined her in this work. Their efforts were so respected that authorities asked them to direct a local school. God's call on Marie Scrilli's life now had focus.

In 1854, with three companions and the support of her bishop and Duke Leopold II (1797–1870), she entered the CARMELITES. Taking the name Maria Teresa of Jesus, she founded the Sisters of Our Lady of Carmel, whose mission was to develop religious schools for girls from early childhood to adolescence.

The year 1848 saw the beginning of political and social upheavals in Italy. Anti-Church sentiments were widespread. In 1859 the Montevarchi authorities closed the school. Despite several attempts to relocate, the congregation finally shut down in 1862.

In 1878 in Florence, Mother Maria restored her community, opening a boarding school for girls from deprived backgrounds. Regrettably, health issues and an austere lifestyle took its toll on the sisters. Amongst those who suffered and died was Mother Maria, in 1889, at age sixty-four.

The congregation again faced dissolution due to lack of initiates. Amazingly, membership revived, and by 2009 the congregation spanned several continents, continuing Mother Maria's charism.

The miracle required for Mother Maria's beatification was promulgated on December 19, 2005. Cardinal Martins said that Mother Maria responded to the concerns of her time:

> Giving particularly to the poorest girls a full human training from the cultural, academic and religious point of view, which would correspond with the needs of their specific life as women by preparing them for dignified employment.... Mother Scrilli, witness[ed] "heroically" to Christian hope and to the capacity for rising from suffering.

MARIA TERESA OF ST. JOSEPH, BL.

Baptized Anna Maria Tauscher van den Bosch; foundress of the Congregation of Carmelite Sisters of the Divine Heart of Jesus; b. June 19, 1855, Sandow, Germany; d. September 20, 1938, Sittard, The Netherlands; beatified by Pope BENEDICT XVI, May 13, 2006.

Daughter of a Lutheran pastor, Anna Maria's journey to Catholicism traversed the landscape of change of faith and was accompanied by family opposition and rejection. On October 30, 1888, she joined the Catholic Church. Suffering abandonment and homelessness, she was supported only by her deep faith in God. These circumstances laid the foundations for her future commission: to care for the poor, neglected, homeless, itinerant, and aged.

Inspired by St. TERESA OF AVILA and drawn to the CARMELITES, she eventually chose community involvement over seclusion. In 1891, taking the name Mother Maria Teresa, she founded the Congregation of the Carmel of the Divine Heart of Jesus in Berlin, where she opened a House of St. Joseph for the homeless. Prayer and charity would become the order's focus.

She was driven from Germany when Cardinal Kopp refused to grant her permission to be a religious. In 1897 she was admitted to the general house of the Discalced Carmelites. In 1898 she opened the first House of St. Joseph in the Netherlands. In 1906, at Rocca di Papa near Rome, the Congregation took their religious vows under canon law. The Congregation's motherhouse had been established there in 1904, with the assistance of Cardinal Satolli.

Allowed back into Germany, Mother Maria Teresa opened new Houses of St. Joseph. She traveled to America to continue her work, and while she was there the First World War broke out. Designated "German property," the motherhouse near Rome was seized by authorities.

In 1922 Mother Maria Teresa returned from America to the Netherlands and established a new motherhouse at Sittard. She stayed there, guiding the congregation and working on the institution's constitution and her memoirs, until her death on September 20, 1938.

The charism of the foundress was to integrate the contemplative spirit of Carmel with active ministry, as the Congregation's Constitution declares: "This union of prayer and service is our life and mission, and our gift to the Church and the world."

In 2005 Pope Benedict XVI promulgated the decree attesting to "the miraculous healing of Mrs. Mary Josephine Pieters-Maas ... through the intercession of the Servant of God Maria Teresa of St. Joseph," which paved the way for Mother Maria Teresa's BEATIFICATION at Roermond, The Netherlands.

MARÍA DEL CARMEN OF THE CHILD JESUS, BL.

Baptized María Carmela González Ramos García Prieto, also known in religion as María del Monte Carmelo of the Infant Jesus; foundress of the Franciscan Sisters of the Sacred Hearts; b. June 30, 1834, Antequera, Málaga, Spain; d. November 9, 1899, Antequera; beatified by Pope BENEDICT XVI, May 6, 2007.

Intensely religious and passionately devoted to the Blessed Virgin Mary, María Carmela was sustained by the power of the Eucharist and committed to serving the poor.

At twenty-two, María married Joaquím Muñoz del Caño. Their marriage was troubled. María found strength in her faith, attendance at daily Mass, and charitable works. Years later, María's prayers and loving patience for her husband were rewarded. Joaquím converted and sought her pardon for his behavior throughout their marriage. He died four years later.

Childless and widowed at forty-seven, María was drawn to the children of her neighborhood. Despite their cloaks of poverty, and their lack of faith and education, she recognized the Christ Child within them. Encouraged by her spiritual mentor, Fr. Bernabé de Astorga, she opened a small school for the children in her home. Other young women joined in these endeavors, paving the way for Mother Carmen's future religious congregation.

From this modest beginning sprang the Congregation of the Third Order Franciscan Sisters of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary, now the Franciscan Sisters of the Sacred Hearts. Under Mother Carmen's leadership, the Congregation spread across Spain, continuing the call of education for all, child and adult, and expanding to include convalescent homes.

As Cardinal Martins indicated at her BEATIFICATION:

> The Lord chose Mother Carmen as an instrument to reflect God's dwelling with men, to comfort, sustain, console in sorrow. She did this through the Franciscan spirit that predisposed her to be a bearer of peace and goodness through devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, meek and humble, which impelled her to "manifest to all men the love that God has for us" (cf. Constitutions, n. 5); in the Immaculate Heart of Mary she taught "the attitude before God and life."

Embodying Christian living, Mother Carmen drew strength from prayer and was nourished by the mysteries of the Eucharist. She was proclaimed venerable by JOHN PAUL II in 1984. In 2006 Benedict XVI promulgated the decree that in 1991 Sr. Maria José Rodríguez, who previously had a large tumor, had been miraculously healed without medical aid through the INTERCESSION of Mother Carmen.

MARÍA DEL TRÁNSITO DE JESÚS SACRAMENTADO, BL.

Baptized María del Tránsito Eugenia de los Dolores Cabanillas; virgin, foundress of the Congregation of the Franciscan Tertiary Missionaries of Argentina; b. August 15, 1821, Carlos Paz, Cordoba, Argentina; d. August 25, 1885, San Vicente, Buenos Aires, Argentina; beatified by John Paul II, April 14, 2002.

María del Tránsito was born into a large, wealthy, devout Christian family. From 1840 she studied in Cordoba and cared for her younger brother, a seminarian. When her father died in 1850, her family joined her there. María believed in the centrality of the Eucharist. She was a catechist and followed a life of prayer and penance, caring for the poor and sick. After her mother's death in 1959, she joined the Franciscan Third Order.

Committed to ascetical piety, María del Tránsito joined a CARMELITE monastery in Buenos Aires in 1873, but left in 1874. Later that year, she entered the convent of the Sisters of the Visitation, Montevideo. On both occasions, illness forced her to retire.

María del Tránsito was encouraged to turn into reality an earlier idea of founding an educational aid institute for poor and abandoned children. On December 8, 1878, with two companions, Teresa Fronteras and Brigida Moyano, she started the Congregation of the Franciscan Tertiary Missionaries of Argentina. In February 1879, the women made their religious profession. The congregation became officially affiliated with the Franciscans on January 28, 1880. Under María del Tránsito's wise governance, the congregation grew. New colleges were inaugurated: St. Margarite of Cortona, San Vicente; El Carmen, Rio Cuarto; and Immaculate Conception, Villa Nueva.

Fully immersed in the work of the institute, embracing the rigors of penance and mortification, María del Tránsito gave unstintingly to the vocation to which GOD had called her. Her inspiration and spiritual guidance supported the congregation's work and service for children, the poor, and the indisposed. Never fully recovering her health, this humble Servant of God succumbed to illness and died on August 25, 1885.

María del Tránsito was venerated by JOHN PAUL II in 1999. John Paul II said as he considered María del Tránsito, the first Argentinean woman to be beatified, "'Did not our hearts burn within us while he talked to us on the road, while he opened to us the Scriptures? (Lk 24:32)." The pope then compared this declaration of the disciples to Mother María del Tránsito's vocation: "The flame that burned in her heart brought María del Tránsito to seek intimacy with Christ in the contemplative life.... she undertook a life of poverty, humility, patience and charity, giving rise to a new religious family" in the Franciscan tradition.

MARIA OF THE PASSION OF OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST, BL.

Baptized Maria Grazia Tarallo; virgin, religious sister of the Institute of the Crucified Sisters, Adorers of the Eucharist; b. September 23, 1866, Giorgio a Cremano, Naples, Italy; d. July 27, 1912, Naples; beatified by Pope BENEDICT XVI, May 14, 2006.

Maria Grazia felt called to consecrate her life to God from childhood. Her vision of the perfect Christian life would encompass a true and sacramental devotion to God. At the age of five, Maria Grazia took a private vow of VIRGINITY. Her father wanted her to marry, but her fiancé died prior to their wedding.

Subsequently, in 1891 Maria Grazia entered the Order of the Crucified Sisters, Adorers of the Eucharist in Naples, founded in the previous year by the Servant of God, Maria Pia Notari. Witnessing Maria Grazia's dedication to the Eucharist, her love for Our Lady of Sorrows, and pursuit of a virtuous and holy life, the Servant of God gave Maria Grazia the name Sr. Maria of the Passion. As Cardinal Martins would intimate at her Mass of BEATIFICATION, Sr. Maria's love of the Eucharist is a call to all for a renewed fervor for the sacrament and understanding of the concrete reality it is.

Sr. Maria undertook a diversity of duties within the order. She served as a kitchen and laundry worker, a porter, a spiritual mentor for her sisters, and novice mistress. To the community she was a source of edification and admiration, an example of the charitable life, of supplication and prayer, and of dedication to her vocation.

As reported in her Vatican biography, Sr. Maria evinced a mystic's passion for her life's calling "to be holy, loving Jesus in the Eucharist, suffering with Christ Crucified and seeing Christ in my brothers and sisters." Her dying words of encouragement to her sisters were: "I exhort you to holy perseverance according to the Rule, readiness in obedience and especially daily Adoration of Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament. Love Jesus in the Eucharist, never leave him alone, do not anger him, do not disappoint him."

In 2005 Benedict XVI promulgated the decree for her beatification. In concluding his tribute to Sr. Maria, Cardinal Martins declared that by her example we are reminded that love is not barren but fruitful, and that working and living for the coming of the Kingdom of Christ in the world, a kingdom of love, justice, reconciliation, and peace among all, is the only good worthy of being pursued.

MARIAN FATHERS

(MIC, Official Catholic Directory #0740) The Congregation of Marians of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary, popularly called Marian Fathers, was founded in Poland in 1673 by Bl. Stanislaus of Jesus and Mary PAPCZYNSKI (beatified on September 16, 2007, by Pope Benedict XVI). The mission of this congregation is to honor the IMMACULATE CONCEPTION of the Virgin Mary, to teach the poor, and to pray for the souls in PURGATORY. The Marians first began as a diocesan community with simple vows. Within six years of their founding, King John III Sobieski granted permission to establish houses throughout his dominions. In 1699 INNOCENT XII gave the Marian Fathers the Rule of Ten Evangelical Virtues of Our Lady (approved by ALEXANDER VI in 1501) and designated the community as an order with solemn vows. This rule was complemented by statutes composed by the founder. The distinctive religious garb of the Marians was a white habit with cincture and cape.

The Marians made foundations in Lithuania, Portugal, and Italy, but religious persecutions gradually forced them out of Rome in 1798, Portugal in 1834, and Poland and Lithuania in 1864. Most Marians were either exiled to Siberia or absorbed into the diocesan clergy by 1864. Those who remained were permitted to live in the monastery of Mariampole, Lithuania, but were forbidden to accept novices. In 1908 there remained in Mariampole the last surviving Marian, Vincent Senkowski-Senkus, superior general. However, the order was saved from extinction by two Lithuanian priests, professors of the Roman Catholic Ecclesiastical Academy in St. Petersburg, Russia, who appealed to the HOLY SEE to be admitted secretly into the order. In order to facilitate restoration, Pope PIUS X approved the change from solemn to simple vows, and from the conspicuous white habit to the black cassock of a diocesan priest. On Aug. 29, 1909, by papal dispensation, George Matulaitis-Matulewicz made his religious profession without the required novitiate, and Rev. Francis Bucys was admitted into the novitiate. To rescue the reborn congregation from Russian persecution, the novitiate was transferred in 1911 from St. Petersburg to Fribourg, Switzerland. In 1910 a new constitution (revised in 1930) was approved by Pius X and supplanted the original rule. In 1930 Pope PIUS XI confirmed the former status of the Marians as exempt religious.

In 1913 the Marian Fathers first settled in Chicago, Ill., and from there spread to Wisconsin, Michigan, New York, Connecticut, Massachusetts, and Washington, D.C. Some of them minister in the Byzantine-Slavonic rite. In the spirit of their founder, they preach missions, teach, administer parishes, and publish newspapers, books, and periodicals.

The generalate is in Rome. There are two American provinces: St. Casimir (with its headquarters in Chicago, IL) and Blessed Virgin Mary, Mother of Mercy (with its headquarters in Stockbridge, MA). As of 2009, the congregation of 483 priests and brothers could be found in 17 countries around the world (Catholic Almanac 2010, p. 467).

MARIANITES OF HOLY CROSS

(MSC, Official Catholic Directory #2410) This congregation of religious women was founded in Le Mans, France, in 1841 by Bl. Basil Anthony MOREAU (beatified on September 15, 2007, by Pope Benedict XVI). Bl. Moreau also founded the Fathers of Holy Cross and reorganized the Brothers of Holy Cross. Mother Mary of the Seven Dolors Gascoin (d. 1900), the first superior, and her early companions received their training in religious life from the Good Shepherd nuns in Le Mans. At first Moreau intended his little community to be housekeepers in the seminaries and boarding schools staffed by the Holy Cross fathers and brothers, but the sisters' field of activity expanded to include teaching, nursing, caring for orphans and elderly people, and laboring in foreign missions. In 1869 Pope PIUS IX approved their constitutions.

Four Marianites began work in Indiana in 1843; others came to Canada in 1847, to Louisiana in 1848, and to New York in 1855. The sisters are engaged in education, healthcare, parish ministries, youth ministries, social work, and pastoral work. The U.S. headquarters is located in New Orleans, LA.

MARIANO DE LA MATA APARICIO, BL.

Augustinian priest and missionary; b. December 31, 1905, Puebla de Valdavia, Spain; d. April 5, 1983, São Paulo, Brazil; beatified at the Cathedral of São Paulo by Pope BENEDICT XVI, November 5, 2006.

Fr. Mariano is remembered by his Augustinian community with great respect as a supportive and caring presence. He "lived a life of holiness in the routine of everyday life." Born into a devout Christian family, Mariano followed his three older brothers into the Order of St. Augustine in 1921. He was ordained as a priest in 1930.

Sent to Brazil as a missionary in 1931, he spent the next fifty years in obedient humility serving his order's call. He was an assistant to the bishop at Taquaritinga, São Paulo. He taught natural sciences at St. Augustine College, of which he became the director. From 1945 to 1948, he was the vice provincial superior of São Paulo. He officiated as superior and as a professor at the Engenheiro Schmidt Seminary.

Returning to teach at St. Augustine College in 1961, Fr. Mariano took on the roles of spiritual director of the St. Rita of Cascia Workshop and parochial vicar of the Church of St. Augustine. Working among the destitute of Brazil, Fr. Mariano was both compassionate and empathetic. He was a friend to all—the old, the young, and the sick—shining the light of God in places darkened by poverty and despair. He went out of his way to succor those in need by visiting them regularly. He was a living message of charity among the impoverished, a real and present demonstration of God's love. He guided his charges faithfully, both spiritually and educationally. He is recognized for his heroic virtues. He died from cancer in 1983.

According to his official Vatican biography, Fr. Mariano's Augustinian life "remains an important model for all simply because he did nothing extraordinary; rather, it was through the faithful fulfillment of his daily duties that he reached the heights of sanctity."

Cardinal Martins upheld Fr. Mariano as "an example and a way of holiness for both the Augustinians and the Augustinian Family and the Dioceses in which he was born, lived, worked and died for the Kingdom of Heaven.... to be imitated as a model disciple of Jesus Christ."

MARIE-CÉLINE DE LA PRÉSENTATION, BL.

Baptized Jeanne-Germaine Castang, also known as Marie-Céline Castang; religious sister of the order of Poor Clares of Talence, Second Order of St. Francis; b. May 23, 1878, Nojals, France; d. May 30, 1897, Talence, France; beatified by Pope Benedict XVI, September 16, 2007.

From a devout family, the fifth of eleven children, Jeanne-Germaine Castang faced a background of poverty and disease. She contracted poliomyelitis at four, resulting in a wasted leg. Her mother died unexpectedly in 1892, and her father's business failed. The family found refuge in a rundown barn, surviving mainly on food Jeanne-Germaine sought from neighboring farms. When her father went to Bordeaux seeking work, Jeanne-Germaine looked after the home and her older brother, who later died from tuberculosis. Despite these hardships, her faith deepened. Educated at the local church school, she was inspired by the Sacrament of the Eucharist and contemplated joining an order from an early age.

Three years later, the family reunited in Bordeaux. When her father moved again, Jeanne-Germaine stayed for five years in Bordeaux with the Sisters of Nazareth. Eager to enter the religious life, she applied to the POOR CLARES and later to the order of St. Joseph at Aubenas. She was rejected because of her perceived incapacity. Finally, the mother superior of the Ave Maria Community of the Poor Clares at Talence, recognizing Jeanne-Germaine's devout sincerity of faith, received her favorably. Jeanne-Germaine entered the community on June 12, 1896. On November 21, 1896, donning the garb of the Second Order of St. Francis, she took the name Marie-Céline of the Presentation of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

Suffering from tuberculosis, Marie-Céline threw herself into the contemplative life and grew in her love for God, her community, and the Church. Her health steadily deteriorated, and she took her final vows on her deathbed. She died on May 30, 1897, at age nineteen. In the early 1900s her burial place became a pilgrimage site. In June 2006 her remains were taken to her childhood parish, the Church of Nojals-et-Clottes. That same year, Pope BENEDICT XVI promulgated a decree attributing a miracle to her intercession.

As a young novice Marie-Céline had written, "I am determined to be a violet of humility, a rose of charity, and a lily of purity for Jesus." After death she became known as the Saint of Perfumes, her appearance is accompanied by fragrant scents. Cardinal Martins said that Marie-Céline, "Ci viene presentata come modello di vita e di fedeltà incrollabile al Vangelo delle Beatitudini." (Presents to us a model of living and unshakable fidelity to the Gospel of the Beatitudes.)

MARK OF AVIANO, BL.

Baptized Carlo Domenico Cristofori, also known as Marco D'Aviano; friar of the Order of Friars Minor Capuchin; b. November 17, 1631, Aviano, Italy; d. August 13, 1699, Vienna, Austria; beatified April 27, 2003, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

At sixteen, filled with a zealous vision of heroes and holy martyrs, Carlo Domenico Cristofori left his Jesuit school in Gorizia, Italy, and started walking toward Crete to join the war between the Venetians and OTTOMAN TURKS. Exhausted, he reached Capodistria and sought refuge at a Capuchin CONVENT, where the superior encouraged him to return home.

Inspired by this encounter, Carlo was convinced that God was calling him to enter the Capuchin order. In 1648, at Conegliano, Veneto, he began his novitiate year. Twelve months later, he took his vows and became Fr. Mark of Aviano. He was ordained as a priest in 1655 at Chioggia.

He spent the following years in prayerful consideration, immersing himself in his vocation. In 1664 he was called from the cloister to be a preacher, spreading God's word throughout Italy. He was elected superior of two convents, Belluno (1672) and Oderzo (1674).

In 1676, while preaching at Padua, Fr. Mark blessed Sr. Vincenza Francesconi, who had been confined to bed for thirteen years. She was miraculously healed. People flocked to receive God's grace and healing extended through this pious friar.

At the direction of the HOLY SEE, Fr. Mark began a new ministry. He preached throughout Italy and beyond, evangelizing and healing. He gave spiritual guidance to Leopold I (1640–1705) of Austria, and served as the apostolic nuncio and papal legate for Pope INNOCENT XI in Vienna. From 1683 to 1689, he was assigned to military campaigns, bringing spiritual guidance to soldiers, sponsoring Christian ethics of conduct, and promoting good relations within the imperial army.

In this capacity, he helped bring peace to Europe, promoting unity between the Catholic powers in their stand against the Ottoman Empire, freeing Vienna (1683), and assisting with the liberation of Buda (1686) and Belgrade (1688). God granted him wisdom and discernment in this role. Fr. Mark died from a tumor in 1699.

John Paul II described Fr. Mark of Aviano as a "contemplative who journeyed along the highways of Europe [and] was the centre of a wide-reaching spiritual renewal.... An unarmed prophet of divine mercy, he was impelled by circumstances to be actively committed to defending the freedom and unity of Christian Europe."

MARKIEWICZ, BRONISŁAW, BL.

Known in religion as Fr. Bronisław, also known as Fr. Markiewicz; Salesian father, founder of the Congregation of St. Michael the Archangel; b. July 13, 1842, Pruchnik, Poland; d. January 29, 1912, Miejsce Piastowe, Poland; beatified June 19, 2005, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

Reared in a devout Polish family, Bronisław's antireligious school environment caused him to question his faith. Resolving this conflict, he answered God's call to the priesthood. After attending the seminary in Przemyśl, he was ordained a priest in 1867. His work with youth in the parish of Harta and the Cathedral of Przemyśl led him to further university studies at Leopoli and Kraków. He became a pastor at Gać (1875) and Błażowa (1877). In 1882 he went to teach pastoral THEOLOGY at the seminary.

Feeling called to join a religious community, Bronisław left Poland and entered the Salesian Monastery in Turin, Italy, in 1885. He took his vows in 1887 before St. John BOSCO, who would be his lifelong inspiration. Salesian community living was austere, and in 1889 the combination of lifestyle and climate had a detrimental effect on Fr. Bronisław's health, causing him to contract consumption.

In 1892 he was granted leave to return to Poland to serve as a pastor at Miejsce Piastowe. Always concerned for the young, and following the precepts of St. John Bosco, he opened an orphanage for poor and orphaned youth. Here they received food and shelter and were prepared spiritually and professionally for the future. In 1897 he founded the Congregation of St. Michael the Archangel, incorporating two congregations, a male and female branch called Temperance and Work. As pastor and director, he developed their CHARISM, adapting the rules of St. John Bosco with insights that reflected the cultural context. He started a related magazine in 1898. Recognition of the religious congregation was granted after his death—the male branch in 1921 and the female branch in 1928. The congregation was affirmed by papal law in 1966.

Supported by his bishop, Fr. Bronisław developed the congregations' work of housing and educating neglected orphans. Orphanages were established at Miejsce Piastowe and at Pawlikowice. His intense labors, fueled by a driving desire to develop programs and accommodate more orphans, placed a great strain on his already compromised health, culminating in his death in 1912.

The decree of the miracle performed by God through the INTERCESSION of Fr. Bronisław was promulgated in 2004. His BEATIFICATION Mass was conducted by the Polish primate, Józef GLEMP, in Pilsudski Square in Warsaw, Poland.

MARTILLO MORÁN, NARCISA DE JESÚS, ST.

Lay mystic; b. Daule (Nobol) near Guayaquil, Ecuador, October 29, 1832; d. Lima, Peru, December 8, 1869; beatified October 25, 1992, by Pope JOHN PAUL II; canonized October 12, 2008, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

Narcisa Martillo Morán was born to the landowners Pedro Martillo Mosquera and Josefina Morán; her mother died in 1838 and her father in 1851. The middle child of nine, Narcisa moved to Guayaquil after her father's death to find work as a seamstress to help support her siblings. Inspired by the example of the then recently beatified St. Mariana de Jesús PAREDES Y FLORES, Narcisa devoted herself to Jesus and especially to his PASSION. During this period of her life, she spent many solitary hours in silent meditation each day and in severe penance each night. She was often found in ecstasy from her awareness of the closeness of Jesus' presence.

For the next fifteen years, all spent in Guayaquil with a short break in Cuenca around 1865, Narcisa lived a life of manual labor, prayer, and penance, while also teaching catechism and caring for the neediest residents of Ecuador's capital. After the death of her spiritual director while she was in Cuenca, Narcisa was invited by the bishop there to join the CARMELITES, but discerned that her vocation was in the world. She then returned to Guayaquil, where, assisting Bl. Mercedes de Jesús MOLINA in running her orphanage, she gave catechesis to the children and made them clothes. Under the guidance of her Franciscan spiritual director, Narcisa travelled in 1868 to Lima, Peru, where she lived as a member of the community in the Dominican convent, keeping the rule there but remaining a lay woman. She died while at the convent, her physical health having likely been weakened by her years of penance and MORTIFICATION.

Soon after Narcisa's death, pilgrims began praying at her tomb in Lima. Her cause for BEATIFICATION was opened in 1889. In 1955 her incorrupt body was translated to Guayaquil. It now rests in her native town of Nobol under the altar of the Santuario de Santa Narcisa de Jesús, a shrine dedicated on August 22, 1998. During her canonization ceremony on October 12, 2008, Pope Benedict XVI praised her as "a perfect example of a life totally dedicated to God and to her brothers and sisters."

MARTIN, LOUIS, BL.

Layman, father of St. THÉRÈSE OF LISIEUX; b. Bordeaux, France, August 22, 1823; d. La Musse (near Evreux), France, July 29, 1894; beatified October 19, 2008, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

Louis Martin's father was a military captain; the home atmosphere was disciplined and devout. As a young man, Louis learned the art of watchmaking but also desired to be a religious. In 1843 he sought to join a monastery but was not accepted because he did not know Latin. He then opened his own watch shop and lived a reclusive, prayerful, happy life as a bachelor until he was thirty-five. One day, at a lace-making class, Louis's mother noticed Zélie Guérin, whom she thought would make good wife for her son. Around the same time, Zélie passed Louis on a bridge and heard an interior voice say, "This is he whom I have prepared for you." They wed in 1858. At first, the couple lived together in continence, but under the influence of their spiritual director they decided to have children.

Louis and Zélie had five daughters, on whom they doted without spoiling them. The eldest, Marie, whom Louis called his Diamond, was most like him in temperament. Pauline, his Pearl, was most like her mother. He called their middle daughter his "good-hearted" Léonie, and Céline was the Intrepid. Thérèse, his Little Queen, came last. Two sons and a daughter died in infancy. The death of his five-year-old daughter Hélène after a sudden illness struck him very hard, a grief from which he never fully recovered.

Louis eventually sold his watch shop in order to help Zélie, whose lace-making business was booming. Louis's love for his wife is evident in a letter written while he was away on business, which he signed, "Your husband and true friend who loves you forever." In 1876 a dormant tumor in Zélie's breast spread into cancer. Louis was devastated when Zélie's pilgrimage to LOURDES did not bring about her cure. Zélie died in August 1877. Shortly thereafter, Louis sold the lace business and moved the girls from Alençon to Lisieux in order to be near Zélie's brother Isidore and his family.

In Lisieux, Louis lived a quiet, ordered life with his daughters. Just as when Zélie was alive, their lives were structured around daily Mass and prayer. Marie ran the home and together with Pauline raised the younger girls. Louis loved to fish and made a habit of bringing his catch to the Carmelite monastery, as he had done for the POOR CLARES in Alençon. Little did he realize that three of his daughters would enter that Carmelite monastery in his lifetime: Pauline in 1882, Marie in 1886, and Thérèse in 1888. He keenly felt the loss of his daughters, yet he was honored that God had called them to be the spouses of Christ. He ardently supported Thérèse's desire to join at the young age of fifteen, even journeying to Rome with her to petition the pope.

Just prior to their Rome pilgrimage, he suffered one of what would be a series of strokes. Several months after Thérèse's entrance, he began to suffer dementia. Several times he set out on business trips, only to become confused and lost. Eventually, unable to keep him safely at home, Isidore insisted Louis enter the Bon Sauveur Hospital in Caen. He remained there for three years, suffering acutely from the separation from his family, until he was paralyzed by a stroke and brought to Isidore's home to be cared for by Céline. He had times of lucidity and cheerfulness that alternated with confusion, deep sadness, and weeping. Throughout seven years of profound physical and mental suffering, he tried to embrace each moment in love as the will of God. He passed away on July 29, 1894, after a heart attack. Céline, who was with him, described his last moments, in which she was praying aloud for him: "At that moment my beloved father opened his eyes, fixed them on me with affection and inexpressible gratitude. His eyes were filled with life and understanding. And then he closed them forever" (Martin 1957, p. 114).

After his death, Céline joined the CARMELITES and Léonie the Visitation Order. Louis's youngest daughter, Thérèse, was declared a saint and doctor of the Church. The cause for the canonization of Pauline, Marie, Léonie, and Céline is underway. Their father was beatified with his wife on October 19, 2008.

Feast: July 12.

MARTIN, MARIE-ZÉLIE GUÉRIN, BL.

Laywoman, mother of St. THÉRÈSE OF LISIEUX; b. St-Denis-sur-Sarthon (near Alençon), Normandy, France, December 23, 1831; d. Alençon, Normandy, France, August 28, 1877; beatified October 19, 2008, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

Zélie Guérin was the second daughter born to parents who were devout Catholics but austere in raising their children. Zélie described her childhood as extremely sad. She was not permitted to have dolls, suffered frequent headaches, and deeply felt the absence of an affectionate mother. She grew close to her sister Marie Louise and later to her younger brother Isidore.

Zélie sought to join the Sisters of Charity of St. VINCENT DE PAUL but was refused entrance due to her poor health. In 1851 she was led through prayer to pursue lace making. She learned the craft and opened her own business. One day, in 1858, Zélie passed Louis Martin on a bridge and heard an interior voice say, "This is he whom I have prepared for you." They were married that same year.

Zélie and Louis lived in continence for ten months before their spiritual director helped them fully understand their vocation to marriage. Once a mother, Zélie realized that she was born to have children, and Louis became her best friend. They rose early each day to attend Mass together. Zélie was a lively, loving mother who delighted in raising their five daughters: Marie, Pauline, Léonie, Céline, and Thérèse. She suffered tremendously, however, enduring a succession of six deaths in five years that struck like hammer blows: her father-in-law, two infant sons, her own father who lived with them, five-year-old Hélène who was suddenly taken ill, and an infant daughter. In The Mother of the Little Flower, Céline sheds light on the source of her mother's strength: "What characterized her above all was her certainty that God governs all things, that He has a particular love for us, and that whatever he does, is well-done" (Martin 1957, p. 74). (Considering the degree to which she suffered at the deaths of her children, it is noteworthy that the approved miracle for the beatification of Zélie and Louis Martin was the healing of an infant boy, Pietro Schillero, who was cured of a life-threatening lung malady.)

Zélie was a working mother, operating her lace business from home. She was generous, quick-witted, industrious, and prone to anxiety over small matters. Céline again provides insight, quoting her mother: "It is over little things that I worry most. Whenever a real misfortune happens, I am quite resigned, and I await with confidence the help of God" (Martin 1957, p. 34). Another source of anxiety was Léonie. Léonie was less gifted than her sisters and emotionally stunted, her underdevelopment likely exacerbated by the loss of her playmate Hélène. Zélie often felt at her wits end in dealing with Léonie's erratic behavior, but she persevered in patience, trying her best to nurture Léonie. With each of her daughters, Zélie sought to inspire them to obey through love, encouraging them to make sacrifices for Jesus and to overcome their faults.

In 1876 Zélie's health declined rapidly from breast cancer. In excruciating pain, and worried about leaving her girls motherless (her oldest was seventeen and the youngest was four), she also had to bear her sister's death from tuberculosis. She and Louis were optimistic that a pilgrimage to LOURDES would cure her. She returned from the trip in even worse health, but accepted it as God's will for her. In the last months of her life, Zélie's efforts to attend daily Mass in her debilitated state were nothing short of heroic. On August 28, 1877, at age forty-five, Zélie died with her husband and three eldest girls present. Her greatest desire, to consecrate her children to God, was to be fulfilled. Four of her daughters became Carmelite nuns; the youngest, Thérèse, was elevated as a saint and DOCTOR OF THE CHURCH. Léonie entered the Visitation Order. The cause for the canonizations of Marie, Pauline, Céline, and Léonie is underway. Their mother was beatified with her husband on October 19, 2008.

MARVELLI, ALBERTO, BL.

Layman, member of CATHOLIC ACTION, engineer; b. Ferrara, Italy, March 21, 1918; d. Rimini, Italy, October 5, 1946; beatified September 5, 2004, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

The second of six children of Luigi Alfredo Marvelli and Maria Mayr, Alberto Marvelli's mother provided a model of Christian generosity to the poor, which left a profound impression on him. In June 1930, his family moved to Rimini, where he attended the Salesian Oratory and joined Catholic Action. His father died shortly before his fifteenth birthday, leaving Alberto in a position of responsibility early in life. In October 1933, he began a spiritual diary that outlines his daily routine:

> I rise as early as possible each morning, as soon as the alarm rings; a half-hour of meditation > every day, not to be neglected except for circumstances out of my control; half an hour at least dedicated to spiritual reading; Mass every morning and Holy Communion as regularly as possible; confession once a week normally and frequent spiritual direction; daily recitation of the Rosary and Angelus at noon. (L'Osservatore Romano, 2004, p. 5)

At eighteen, Alberto was elected president of the Rimini Catholic Action group, which he continued to direct while he studied engineering in Bologna. Graduating in 1941, he was exempted from military service because his two brothers were already serving, and upon his return to Rimini he was elected vice president of the diocesan Catholic Action. Forced to move to Vergiano because of the intense bombing during WORLD WAR II (1939–1945), Alberto returned to Rimini frequently to care for the homeless, wounded, and dying. He collected and distributed food and supplies in and around war-torn Rimini on his bicycle, at great risk to his own life. During the German occupation, he freed many people bound for concentration camps by opening sealed train cars at Santarcangelo Station.

After the war, Alberto returned to his city and became an effective administrator in the rebuilding effort. He opened a soup kitchen and encouraged the spiritual life of the poor he served. He eventually joined the Christian Democratic Party and became an outspoken critic of COMMUNISM. When he was twenty-eight, he was struck by an army truck while he was bicycling to a political meeting and died several hours later.

Alberto's life was shaped by his devotion to the Eucharist, his care for the poor, and his work for the common good through political action. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on September 5, 2004, in Loreto.

MARXISM

The product of four decades of collaboration between Karl MARX (1818–1883) and Friedrich ENGELS (1820–1895), Marxism is at once a materialist philosophy and a theory of economics, a political ideology and an interpretation of history, a sociological theory of class structure and class warfare, and a quasi-religious ATHEISM. Although writing in terminology that owes much to the philosophies of Georg Wilhelm Friedrich HEGEL and Ludwig FEUERBACH and to the economics of Adam SMITH and David Ricardo, Marx and Engels did not merely repeat the views of any of their sources but transformed them into something distinctively new and something intentionally revolutionary. Smith, for instance, is a great proponent of laissez-faire capitalism and Hegel the champion of absolute idealism, but Marxism stands entirely opposed to both. Like the famous Communist Manifesto of 1848, many of Marx's pamphlets and newspaper articles were composed as polemics against views then current and as radical propaganda for specific campaigns. Such classic Marxist texts as Capital (1867) and Theories of Surplus Value (1863) are the result of long years of study during which Engels's financial and intellectual support allowed Marx to comb the library of the British Museum to gather support for his theories about how economic events shape history, how class struggles undergird these economic events, and how communist social organization will resolve these struggles.

Fundamental Concepts. Although the term "dialectical materialism" is not itself used by Marx or Engels, it has become common coin in Marxism for conveying its integration of the dialectical approach typical of Hegel's thought and a thoroughgoing materialism in regard to history and human nature. While rejecting the elaborate constructions of Hegelian metaphysics, Marx and Engels accepted Hegel's methodological principle of seeing the world not as a set of things but as a set of evolving processes. These processes are dialectical in that back-and-forth struggle produces change. The conflicts of opposing forces internal to the natures of things generate transformations that appear outwardly as social classes and historical change. As a methodology, dialectic materialism criticizes as simplistic any unquestioning acceptance of empirical appearances and seeks instead to grasp the underlying patterns and forces that produce surface-level appearances. The ethical implications of this approach are summarized in the Marxist notion that there is a need to change economic substructures if one wants to alter cultural and social superstructures.

The critical concepts within the Marxist dialectic of social evolution according to the laws of material nature and economic necessity are development and alienation. What Hegel had called the "contradictions" between thesis and antithesis that generate a synthesis, Marx and Engels analyzed as the inner stresses and pressures that generate change through natural activities of individual human beings and their various forms of association. In their vision, COMMUNISM will involve a society whose main principle is the full and free development of the potential of each individual. They saw capitalism as repressing such development, for instance, by its often life-long confinement of an individual to the repetitive and trivial operations of the factory assembly line. Further, they tended to see religion as involving the projection in some imaginary higher sphere of thwarted human desires for just, loving, and humane social relationships. Thus, for Marxism, in a society where even one's labor is a commodity that can and must be sold to those who own the means of production, it is only to be expected that one will seek compensatory consolation in religion and the expectations of an AFTERLIFE. Both the economic situation and the presence of religion are manifestations of self-alienation. Marxism is intended to put an end to such conditions.

Crucial for espousing such philosophical views is confidence that one can discern various "laws" of economics, such as the general necessity that Marx took to be operative within capitalism that commodities are exchanged in proportion to the costs of their production. Whether any particular transaction occurs at any specific time is contingent on the decisions of particular agents, but whenever such transactions take place, they will necessarily be part of a deep-seated pattern, much like the correlation of prices and resource availability. In support of these views, Marx and Engels worked out an elaborate economic explanation of value, labor, and surplus value in Capital. Unlike philosophical DETERMINISM, which tends to take the structures of cause and effect to be rigorously connected but generally one-way mechanisms at every level of reality, the approach favored by Marxist dialectical materialism favors an approach to these questions in terms of the interaction of the choices of individuals and the large-scale laws that govern any set of objects in a given domain (physical, physiological, economic, and so on).

Unlike many earlier materialists from EPICURUS and LUCRETIUS through Baron d'HOLBACH, Marx and Engels rejected the mechanistic determinism that a thoroughgoing materialism might seem to imply. Rather, they regularly stressed that human beings can change the circumstances and conditions of their upbringing. Inspired in particular by Feuerbach's critique of religion as a projection of unfulfilled longings onto supernatural beings, Marx hoped that exposure of the psychosocial origins of religion might help to bring "religious alienation" to an end and so championed the idea of religion as "the opium of the people," as he called it in On Religion (1984, p. 42). Although a thoroughgoing atheist himself, he does not seem to have intended this phrase as a justification for the persecution of religion in the way that Marxist regimes later employed it, so much as an incentive for the construction of social conditions that might better satisfy human desires without the projection of religious fantasies. The Marxist critique of religion is thus one component of a more general critique of the existing structures of society, including a critique of most previous philosophy. As Marx once put it in a famous phrase in his Theses on Feuerbach, "The philosophers have only interpreted the world in various ways; the point, however, is to change it" (2000, p. 173).

The potential of Marxism for totalitarianism is undeniable, but the writings of Engels and Marx themselves carry repeated warnings against manipulation of people being educated into this way of thought as well as against any mechanistic conception of causality in theoretical explanations of behavior. Despite a tendency to regard individuals as products of their environments (especially their economic situation), there is also a strong emphasis on cultivating political and economic freedom, especially during the transitional stages of history in preparation for the resolution to class struggles that they hoped communism would bring, as may be clear from his comments in Capital on the irony of talking about "free laborers" (1976, I: 297) who are actually compelled by social conditions to sell their very capacity for such to obtain the necessities of life. One also sees this point in such long-ranging observations as this, from The Holy Family: "Political emancipation is indeed a great step forward. It is not, to be sure, the final form of human emancipation, but it is the final form within the prevailing order of things" (2000, p. 155).

Like their economic tomes, the historical writings of Marx and Engels emphasize the influence of shifts in material substructure as the principal cause of changes in political and social superstructure, but without ever making these factors alone responsible. Whether in such technical works as Critique of Political Economy (1859) or in more popular venues such as The Eighteenth Brumaire (1852), The Civil War in France (1871), or The Origin of the Family (1884), the argumentation always includes both a consideration of the underlying economic conditions and of such ideological factors as the clash between those who prefer to maintain existing social relationships and those who think that progress can come through alteration of the status quo.

In their view, the logic within the pattern of history is not necessarily something that the agents of historical change themselves can always see. A prime example of this perspective comes in the Marxist doctrine of class struggle as presented, for example, in The German Ideology (2000, p. 195). The differences between the haves and the have-nots make conflict inevitable and peace impossible. The individuals and groups involved may not have any larger sense of purpose than their own interests, and yet by their free actions in pursuit of those interests they play out the inescapable laws of historical development. Further, every transitional social system contains within itself the roots of its own destruction. Within capitalism, for instance, the very strength of the better entrepreneurs within a free market will force the weaker elements into the ranks of the proletariat or working class; but then the excessive supply of labor will force wages down until their living conditions become so unbearable that they will have "nothing to lose but their chains," as put in the Communist Manifesto, and a revolution will overthrow the regime that has favored free-market capitalism (2000, p. 271). For Marx, the interaction of economic laws and individual choices explain the world-historical transitions from FEUDALISM to capitalism, and eventually to communism.

The Present Status of Marxism. Ironically, the history of Marxism has been in tremendous contrast with the predictions of its founders, in both the places where Marxism has become the predominant political idea and those where it has not been accepted. In the countries where capitalism has been dominant, Marxist analysis expected a steady deterioration of conditions and the onset of revolution, but generally speaking, the conditions of workers in those places have substantially improved with time and with the advance of technology. Instead, it has generally been in noncapitalist countries that Marxism has been dominant, and these countries have generally grown poorer in ways that seem related to the enforcement of Marxist doctrines. Socialist and communist dictatorships have been forcibly created in the name of the proletariat working classes without any sign that increased liberty, equality, or prosperity are likely to emerge so long as these policies remain in place. The forms that Marxism has taken have been various: BOLSHEVISM, Leninism, Stalinism, Troskyism, Maoism, Castroism, and many others of local vintage.

There have been regimes claiming the name of Marxism around the globe in the course of the twentieth century, including Afghanistan, Albania, Angola, Benin, Bulgaria, China, the Congo, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, East Germany, Ethiopia, Guineau-Bissau, Hungary, Kampuchea, Laos, Mongolia, Mozambique, North Korea, Poland, Romania, Somalia, the Soviet Union, Vietnam, Yemen, and Yugoslavia (see Glaser and Walker 2007). In countries where Marxism has not gained power, there have nevertheless been such Marxist-inspired political parties as the Communist Party of the U.S.A., the South African Political Party, Sendero Luminoso of Peru, and the Zapatistas of Mexico. Within religious circles, there has been considerable Marxist influence in many of the movements associated with LIBERATION THEOLOGY.

Although committed Marxists, especially in the intelligentsia of Western institutions of higher learning, often still deny that the end of the twentieth century saw the death of Marxism, there is considerable evidence for this case. The fall of the Berlin Wall in 1989 marked the end of the Marxist regime in East Germany, and by 1991 the communist government of the Soviet Union had collapsed along with its hegemony over eastern Europe. By the mid-1990s many of the Marxist regimes of Africa had pragmatically abandoned their ideological stances, and incipient Marxist movements in the Mideast have almost entirely yielded to the aggressive resurgence of fundamentalist ISLAM. Without explicitly forsaking its communist commitments, mainland China has in many respects embraced capitalism (if not a totally free market).

The reasons for such changes are numerous, but at very least one cannot fail to list the internal contradictions of Marxism, the empirically undeniable successes of capitalist systems to improve the living conditions of their members better than Marxist regimes have been able to do, the exhaustion of communist regimes in their efforts to keep pace with some of the initiatives championed by the likes of President Ronald Reagan of the United States and Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher of the United Kingdom, and most especially such spiritual and moral factors as the support provided by Pope JOHN PAUL II to Solidarność in Poland and the resiliency of Christian faith in central and eastern Europe despite several generations of religious persecution and enforced atheism.

While there have been notable displays of Christian sympathy for Marxism in the course of the twentieth century, especially within some of the elites of religious orders and among some missionary congregations, Catholicism's resistance to Marxism has been firm and long-standing. Within the tradition of Catholic social teaching, for instance, opposition to Marxism, socialism, and communism has been recurrent and has become ever more sophisticated in its analysis. One already finds opposition sounded in LEO XIII's Rerum novarum (1891), and in PIUS XI's Quadragesimo anno (1931) there are careful distinctions between communism and socialism that were not so clear in earlier documents. In JOHN XXIII's Mater et magistra (1961) and Pacem in terris (1963) there are warnings against the atheism intrinsic to Marxism and its faulty promises of human liberation through forms of human development that neglect the spiritual domain.

For some, the openness of Vatican II's Gaudium et spes (1965) and of PAUL VI's Populorum progressio (1967) to theories of development that accentuated material, economic, and sociological solutions suggested some kind of rapprochement between Catholicism and Marxism. Among other developments, such proponents of liberation theology as Gustavo GUTIERREZ, Ernesto Cardinal, Jean-Bertrand Aristide, Leonardo BOFF, and Jan Sobrino explicitly claimed Marxist inspiration for their political ideas. In response, the Congregation for the DOCTRINE OF THE FAITH repeatedly criticized liberation theologians on a number of fronts, including its connections with Marxism, in such documents as Libertatis nuntius (1984) and Libertatis conscientia (1986). The prefect of that congregation at the time, Joseph Cardinal RATZINGER (elected Pope BENEDICT XVI in 2005), also personally addressed the question of Marxism and liberation theology in a volume titled The Ratzinger Report (1985).

The papacy of John Paul II featured a multi-pronged response to Marxism, evident not only in its sharp reaction to Marxism in liberation theology but also in the support provided to the SOLIDARITY Movement by papal visits to Poland. Intellectually, John Paul II addressed questions related to Marxism in his three main social encyclicals. Laborem exercens (1981), for instance, offered reflections on labor by distinguishing between the objective and subjective dimensions of work and proposed a holistic context for understanding the significance of work on a basis entirely differently than that proposed in standard Marxist analysis. Sollicitudo rei socialis (1987) not only provided guidance about the proper interpretation of Gaudium et spes and Populorum progressio, so as to resist any efforts to claim ecclesiological approval for Marxist-inspired versions of liberation theology. It also made a fresh argument against the Marxist view that religion is a source of alienation by demonstrating that human vulnerability increases with an eclipse of God and that human dignity is better defended by the doctrine that human beings are made in God's image and likeness. John Paul II's third social encyclical, Centesimus annus (1991), not only reflects with joy on the recent deliverance of many peoples from domination by atheistic forms of Marxism but cautions against godless forms of capitalism and against morally deficient forms of democratic government. By these carefully balanced statements, Pope John Paul II provided not only specific guidance with regard to Marxism but also a sophisticated catechesis about the issues of human development and social organization that have been most prone to Marxist challenges.

The three encyclicals thus far to emerge from the papacy of BENEDICT XVI have also explicitly treated Marxism. Deus caritas est (2005) and Spe salvi (2007) both addressed the problem of distorted views of human nature and argued that the uniqueness of human dignity comes from being the single creature made in God's image and likeness. In the former, Pope Benedict directed his attention to the anthropological errors of Marx, FREUD, and NIETZSCHE even while acknowledging the genuine social problems that made their views attractive to so many for so long. In the latter, the pope distinguishes between the purely immanent eschatology of the Marxist vision and the more inclusive eschatology of genuine Christianity. He finds there to be a deep connection between preserving a strong sense that our true hope is hope of heaven and insisting on the temporal obligations of citizens and states to pursue realizable systems of justice on this earth, and he reminds Christians of their duties to be generous in personal and social charity. As a supplementary answer to the charges sometimes raised by Marxists and other critics, he adduces the witness of the martyrs and the historical evidence of many forms of practical charity by individuals and by ecclesial institutions. In continuing the tradition of papal social encyclicals, Caritas in veritate (2008) reinforces the initiative undertaken in Sollictudo rei socialis to insist on the proper context for interpreting Gaudium et spes and Populorum progressio as in continuity with the longstanding lines of Catholic social teaching and reiterates the main lines of that teaching in opposition to the dangers for humanity that remain in some of the alternative social theories, including Marxism.

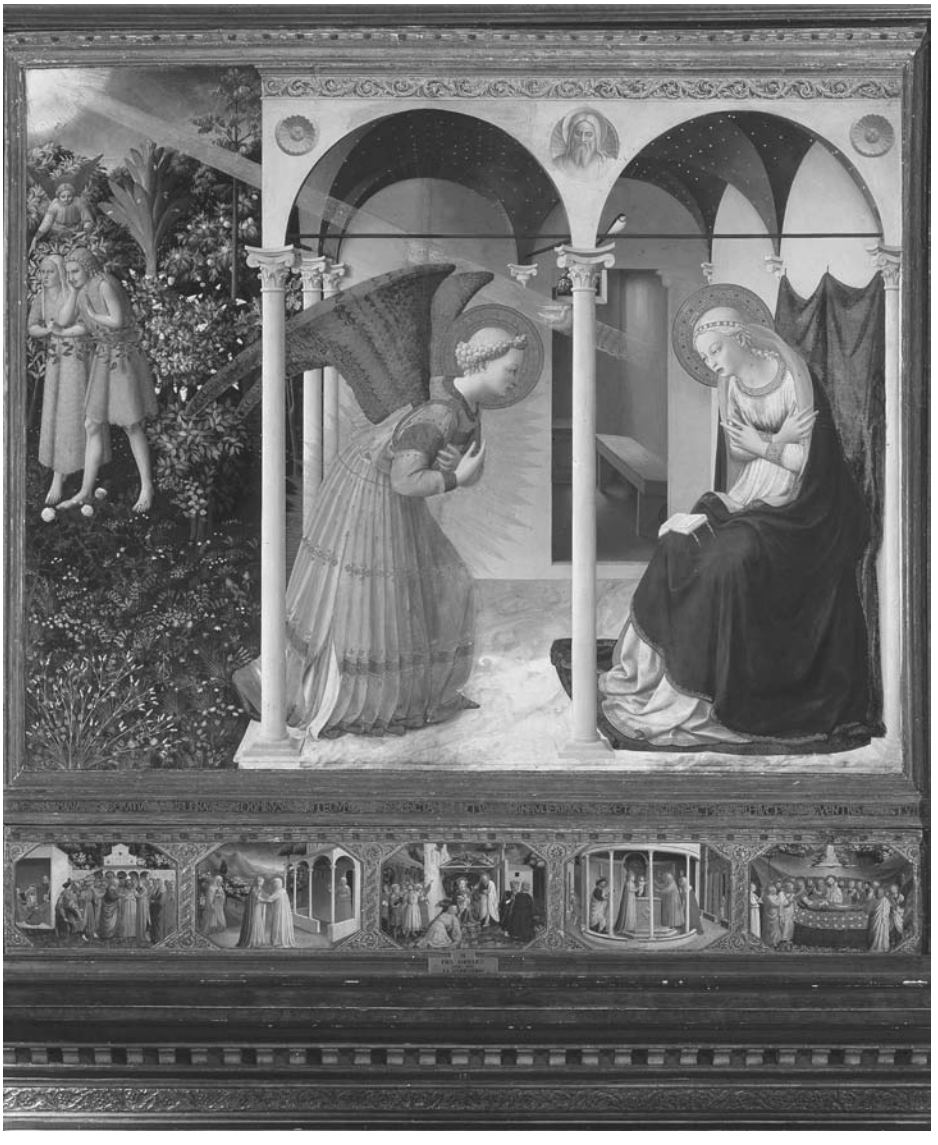
MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN (IN THE BIBLE)

In its dogmatic constitution on divine revelation, Dei verbum, paragraph 21, the VATICAN COUNCIL II asked for the preaching of the Church to be "nourished and ruled by sacred Scripture." The document of the same council on the Blessed Virgin MARY (Lumen gentium, chapter 8) and the subsequent major papal writings on Mary (Marialis cultus by Paul VI in 1974 and Redemptoris mater by John Paul II in 1987) affirmed that same principle: What the Church teaches about the Mother of the Lord has to be based on the Word of God.



Biblical data on the Blessed Virgin Mary, the Mother of Jesus, is naturally found primarily in the New Testament (NT). But also certain passages of the Old Testament (OT), as interpreted by inspired writers in the NT, concern her. Thus, the historical data on Mary and the inferences that can be drawn from it come from both the Old and New Testaments.

IN THE NEW TESTAMENT

The references to Mary in the NT are considered according to the chronological order of the writings in which they appear. Most scholars agree today that the letter to the Galatians was written before the Gospel of Mark, which was then followed by the Gospel of Matthew, the Gospel of Luke (and the Acts of the Apostles), the Gospel of John, and, eventually, the book of Revelation.

Galatians 4:4. In Galatians 4:4-5, St. PAUL alludes to Mary when he says that "When the fullness of time came, God sent his Son, born of a woman, born under the law, to redeem those who were under the law, so that we might receive adoption as sons." When St. Paul established the churches in Galatia, he did not impose circumcision and the resulting observances of the OT Law upon his converts. Judeo-Christian missioners, perhaps from JERUSALEM itself, who later visited these communities, urged them to adopt the OT LAW. According to them, St. Paul's proclamation of the Gospel was incomplete as long as it failed to incorporate the religious culture of the OT into the lives of Christians (cf. Acts 15:5). But Paul did not instruct the Galatians in OT observances because Christ not only introduced the justifying power of God into history in a new way, that is, through faith in His redemptive death and RESURRECTION, but at the same time liberated people from a source of anguish—their violation of the Law they had agreed to observe as the presumptive condition of their salvation (Gal 2:15–16).

The liberative effect of Christ's death and Resurrection, though, goes beyond the fact that the Law is no longer relevant for salvation: It leads to humankind's very adoption as children of God. Therefore Paul focuses attention on the reality of the human existence of Christ, SON OF GOD. In Galatians 4:4 Paul traces Christ's redemptive mission to an eternal decree of God concerning the Son that became effective in history ("but when the fullness of time came") in the birth of His Son ("God sent his Son, born of a woman"). Liberation from sin and death is effected as people become adopted children of God, which was made possible when the Son identified Himself fully with humanity through His birth of a human mother (cf. Heb 4:15). Paul establishes a connection between the birth of the Son of God from a human woman and humankind's adoption as sons and daughters of God. The uniqueness of JESUS is also stated here, which lies in the fact that He is at the same time

Scenes from the Life of Mary. This altarpiece, painted by Fra Angelico, depicts the expulsion of Adam and Eve and the Annuciation. Along the bottom of the work is also depicted the Visitation, the Presentation of the Child Jesus, the wedding feast of Cana, and the death of Mary. THE ART ARCHIVE/MUSEO DEL PRADO MADRID/ALFREDO DAGLI ORTI/THE PICTURE DESK, INC.

divine and human: divine because He is the Son of God and human because He is born of a woman (Mary).

Because in Galatians 4:4 Paul wishes to emphasize the reality of Christ's humanity, he does not refer to the mother of Jesus by her proper name, Mary, nor does he use woman as a religious title. He designates her as woman to make clear that Christ, despite His divinity, possessed full humanity because He is born like all people from a human mother from whom His humanity derived. Paul's allusion to the reality of Mary's maternity of Christ presupposes some knowledge about her on the part of both Paul and the Galatians. But the allusion is so restricted that it is not possible to determine the extent of this knowledge or its nature. Nothing more need be assumed to account for Paul's reference to Mary in this passage than the knowledge that Christ accepted her as His mother in the ordinary sense. The words of Galatians 4:4 are valuable as a reflection of the mind of the first Christian generation that Mary is the mother of Christ, the Son of God, in the commonly accepted sense of motherhood; that is, she conceived Christ and gave Him birth. Paul presents Mary's maternity as a fact of Christian faith without raising the further issue of the virginal conception of Christ, recorded by Luke and Matthew. Even if Paul is aware of the virginal conception, it would not serve his purpose to mention it in this passage. He is concerned only with the fact of Mary's maternity as the deliberate WILL OF GOD that provided the Son of God with the same humanity He died to save and with the very subjection to the Law from which He freed the world.

Mark 3:20–21 and 3:31–35. According to Mark 3:20–21, a group of people determined to exercise a certain control over Christ's conduct of His mission, for they concluded from information they had received that He was "beside Himself," that is, acting imprudently, or perhaps strangely. Mark designates this group as οἱ παρ' αὐτοῦ, literally, "those with him." The phrase is commonly taken to mean the relatives of Jesus, but it can also mean friends or neighbors. (On this phrase and the relationship between it and "His mother and brethren" in Mk 3:31, see the commentaries on the Gospel of Mark.) Although it seems more probable that the group is composed chiefly of the relatives of Jesus (See Jn 7:5 for the incredulous attitude of His relatives toward Him), it is doubtful that the mother of Jesus is included in it. The second evangelist is particularly concerned with the attitude of various groups toward Jesus (e.g., Mk 1:22; 2:16; 3:6, 22). Mark 3:20–21 indicates the relatives are hostile toward Him, perhaps out of fear that His actions will lead to family embarrassment. But this reference to the attitude of the relatives of Jesus does not warrant ascribing the same sentiments to His mother, whom Mark does not here specifically mention and who may be presumed to have rendered her own judgment on the question of her Son's conduct.

Modern scholarship of the Gospels has questioned whether the visit of Jesus' "mother and brethren" in Mark 3:31–35 (parallel passages in Mt 12:46–50; Lk 8:19–21) was the historical outcome of the efforts of the relatives to control His ministry. From the literary standpoint, Mark connects the two events ("they went forth" in Mk 3:21; the mother and brethren "come" in Mk 3:31). The specific mention of the presence of the mother of Jesus made in Mark 3:31 lends support to the older view assuming the events to be historically connected. Although according to Jewish family custom, Jesus was no longer under the rule of His mother, He would still show great respect to her (cf. 1 Kgs 2:19–20), neither was He subject to His other relatives. If, as the Catholic tradition holds (see text on "the brethren" of Jesus' below), He was Mary's only child, the relatives might have enlisted her presence, the more readily to secure access to Him in view of His constant preoccupation with crowds (Mk 3:20). The announcement conveyed to Jesus in Mark 3:32 concerning the arrival of His mother as well as His brethren has an authentic historical ring when viewed in the entire context.

These observations allow the inference that Mary permitted herself to be pressed into service by the relatives so that they might have their confrontation with Jesus, but do not infer that she shared their sentiments concerning His conduct of the ministry. The evangelist provides no data concerning her own state of mind on the issue raised by the relatives. He affords only that, in a matter of family concern, Mary did what the family asked.

Mark concludes his account of the visit, not by recording the meeting between Jesus and the relatives, but by citing His comment about the hostility of the relatives. Jesus observes that His mother and brethren are those who "do the will of God" (Mk 3:35) like the audience before Him listening to His teaching (Mk 3:34). In Mark's context this saying of Jesus constitutes a telling response to His relatives who are disturbed at His acceptance of the crowds (Mk 3:20–21): His own relatives are unwilling to accept His teaching as prophetic (Mk 6:4). As far as Mary is concerned, the idea that even Jesus' mother does not always understand Him and has to learn from Him would be consonant with Mary's reaction at finding the Child Jesus in the Temple, as reported by Luke (Lk 2:48). Nevertheless, Jesus does not dismiss family ties because the community He forms with those who believe in Him is His family.

Mark 6:1–4. In Mark 6:1–4 (parallel in Mt 13:54–57), the people of NAZARETH refuse to accept Jesus and His message (cf. Lk 4:16–30). They think they know Him too well. According to the parallel passage in Matthew 13:55, they know Him as "the carpenter's son." These were probably the original words in the early oral catechesis from which the Synoptic Gospels are derived. The best manuscripts of Mark 6:3 have: "the carpenter, the son of Mary." But this does not accord with the Jewish custom of describing a man as the son of his father rather than of his mother, a practice well illustrated in the title given Jesus in John 6:42. A third reading, in a few manuscripts, "the son of the carpenter and of Mary," is probably the result of a conflation of the other two variant readings. The title, the carpenter's son, implies no knowledge among the Nazarenes of Jesus' virginal conception, as is to be expected. Otherwise, it is unlikely that they would have questioned the origin of His wisdom (Mk 6:2).

The family circle of Jesus is further described in Mark 6:3 as composed of His "brothers" and "sisters," four of the brothers being explicitly named. The Greek words ἀδελφοί and ἀδελφαί that are used to designate the relationship between Jesus and these relatives have the meaning of full blood brother and sister in the Greek-speaking world of the evangelist's time and would naturally be taken by his Greek readers in this sense. About 380, Helvidius, in a work now lost, pressed this to attribute to Mary other children besides Jesus so as to make her a model for mothers of larger families. St. JEROME, motivated by the Church's traditional faith in Mary's perpetual virginity, wrote a tract against Helvidius (AD 383), explaining the GOSPEL usage of ἀδελφοί and ἀδελφαί for the relatives of Jesus that is still in vogue among Catholic scholars. In the SEPTUAGINT (LXX) ἀδελφόί is used in the sense of kinsman. In Genesis 13:8 and14:14, 16, ABRAHAM's nephew Lot is called his brother; the same term is applied to JACOB's nephew Laban in Genesis 29:15. In 1 Chronicles 23:22 the sons of Cis (Kish) are called the brothers of Eleazar's daughters, though they were their cousins. Hebrew is deficient in terminology for blood relationships (as is also Aramaic, the language behind the Greek of the Gospels). Both Hebrew and Aramaic use āḥîm, brothers, to mean kinsmen. The translators who produced LXX transferred this broader meaning of Semitic āḥîm to ἀδελφοί and thus established a usage that the evangelists followed.

The psychological and anthropological reality of speaking and writing in a language of another culture is, moreover, quite complex. The example of Abidjan, the major city of the Ivory Coast in West Africa, gives witness to it. It is today a big city of about four million inhabitants that grew up in a zone originally scarcely populated. The sparse original population was not able to absorb the waves of immigrants coming from all over the former French colonies in West Africa. The only language all these people had in common was French, and French became thus the native language of Abidjan. In most native languages of West Africa, no distinction is made between a "brother" and a "cousin," whereas such a distinction exists in French. Nevertheless, the inhabitants of Abidjan, whose mother tongue is French, who have been raised and educated in French, continue to use the French word for "brother" when they speak of a "cousin." Using the French word for "cousin" would betray the way they envision social and family relationships. When the people of Abidjan want to specify that "brother" means a true blood sibling, they need to add "same father, same mother" (même père, même mère). Full siblings are a particular kind of brother; they do not constitute the benchmark of brotherhood. The socio-cultural milieu of the authors of the New Testament is JUDAISM. So, we can accept the idea that, even if their text does not suppose a Hebrew or Aramaic substrate, their use of Greek words they would naturally convey the way their own Judaic society and culture envisioned social and family relationships.

Words such as ὁμοπάτωρ, homopatôr (stepbrother or half-brother by the father) or ὁμομέτωρ, homomêtôr (stepbrother or half-brother by the mother) existed in Greek. If the authors of the New Testament had wanted to render the relationships within Jesus' family as precisely as possible in Greek, they should have used such expressions because—and Matthew and Luke make it very clear—Jesus was not the true son of Joseph. If Jesus' "brothers" were sons of Mary, they would have been Jesus' stepbrothers or half-brothers by the mother, because a specific Greek word existed for that.

St. Jerome did not contend that the only possible linguistic meaning for brothers and sisters, used of Jesus' relatives in the Gospels, is cousins. To establish this, he worked from other, complicated evidence in the Gospels that indicated that the James and Joseph of Mark 6:3 were children of a Mary other than the mother of Jesus (cf. Mt 13:55; 27:56; Mk 15:40). This argument assumes (probably correctly) that the James and Joseph of Mark 6:3 are the same persons mentioned in Mark 15:40. On this supposition, the mother of James and Joseph who is called Mary in Mark 15:40 was a relative of Jesus' mother. Jerome considered her a sister of Jesus' mother and concluded that James and Joseph were His cousins. This conclusion, although reasonably probable, is less certain than the central point of Jerome's argument against Helvidius. Helvidius assumed that ἀδελφοί and ἀδελφαί in the Gospels, when used of blood relationships, had no other possible sense than full blood brother and full blood sister. Jerome's argument does not deny that such would be the normal usage of these terms in the Greek-speaking world, but he shows that the evangelists wrote within a linguistic tradition that used the terms in a broader sense. There is, then, no incompatibility between the Church's doctrine of Mary's perpetual virginity, in vogue long before Helvidius's time, and the Gospel usage of brothers and sisters for the relatives of Jesus. The FATHERS OF THE CHURCH whose mother tongue was Greek supported Mary's perpetual virginity without seeing the word ἀδελφοί applied in the NT to Jesus' relatives as problematic.

The texts here under consideration, as well as Mark 3:31 and its parallels, reflect the view of Mary as the natural mother of Jesus that prevailed during His public ministry. Even those on familiar terms with the family circle of Jesus were unaware of the virginal conception. Because they regarded Jesus as the son of Mary and Joseph in the fully natural sense, they could not possibly have attached any particular religious significance to the fact that Jesus was the only child of Mary and Joseph. All the texts so far considered, including perhaps Galatians 4:4, mirror a historical milieu that possibly made no religious reflection on the person of the mother of Jesus.

Matthew 1:18–25; 2:11, 13–14, 20–21. The theological conceptions that govern Matthew's INFANCY GOSPEL are expressed in his genealogy of Jesus (Mt 1:2–16). The genealogy invokes the messianic hope of ISRAEL by recalling the divine promises to the patriarchs (Mt 1:2) and to DAVID (Mt 1:6). It acknowledges Israel's sinfulness by pointing to David's murder of Uriah (Mt 1:6) and the disaster of the Babylonian captivity (Mt 1:11). It emphasizes the presence of God in Israel as continuously sustaining the faith and hope of the people (the sense of ἐγέννησεν, begot, is repeated constantly throughout the genealogy). Through the unexpected mentioning of four women who were connected with non-Israelite peoples and were originally not supposed to be part of the genealogy of the MESSIAH, it also alludes to the integration of foreign nations into the history of the PEOPLE OF GOD.

In this context of God's continuous and beneficent presence in Israel, the events in Matthew 1:18–2:23 are set. The evangelist's main purpose in these chapters is to declare that the saving action of God, begun in Abraham and carried forward throughout Israel's history, continues in Christ for the benefit of Israel and the world. Jesus is declared the SAVIOR of His people (Mt 1:21); the King of the Jews (Mt 2:1); the SON OF DAVID (Mt 1:1), that is, descended from the Davidic line in accordance with Nathan's prophecy (2 Sm 7:12–13); and the Son of Abraham (Mt 1:1), that is, the one through whom the divine promise that all the nations are to be blessed in Abraham is fulfilled (Gn 12:3; Gal 3:8–9). The affirmation of Jesus' kingship in Matthew reflects on Mary: in ancient Israel the kingdom's first lady—with all the honor due to her—was not one of the king's many wives, but the king's mother (cf. 1 Kgs 2:19).

Matthew clarifies Jesus as the Messianic bearer in history of God's saving action when he explains the origin of Christ (Mt 1:18): He shows how God's presence in Israel produced the person of Christ. The salvific action of God: (1) caused a virginal conception of Jesus in Mary, the fiancée of Joseph (Mt 1:18); (2) resolved Joseph's perplexity over this event by directing him to marry her to give the Child legal status as a descendant of David (Mt 1:20); and (3) provided the Child and His mother with necessary protection (Mt 2:11, 13–14, 20–21). As conceived by Matthew, the action of God involved a divine choice of the person of Joseph, since his role as legal father of the Child had specific purposes.

The evangelist cites Isaiah 7:14 as here receiving its fulfillment, that is, as revealing the continuity of God's saving action in history. In the virginal conception of Jesus, God acted in accordance with what He had planned all along, as faith perceives when it reads Isaiah 7:14 in the light of Mary's virginal maternity and the meaning of her Child as the bearer of salvation to the world ("'Emmanuel,' which is interpreted 'God with us'"). Matthew's position that Isaiah 7:14 already stated (so far as God is concerned) the virginal conception of Jesus that occurred in Mary implies a divine choice of her person to be the Virgin Mother of the Savior. The evangelist reinforces this point by stating that Joseph "did not know her" until the birth of the Child; that is to say, Joseph recognized that Mary was divinely chosen to be the Virgin Mother of the Child and fully respected the divine will that she remain a virgin.

It is universally recognized that Matthew's famous "until" ("he did not know her until she brought forth a son"; Mt 1:25) is not a term of chronological intent: it neither affirms nor denies marital intercourse after the Child's birth. The evangelist is not looking forward in time through the history of the marriage between Joseph and Mary, but rather backward to his own citation of Isaiah 7:14. He stresses this prophecy as being operative especially for the religious understanding of Joseph and Mary. This fact is important for the interpretation of the story of the Magi (Mt 2:1–12). The MAGI learn that the messianic king of the Jews has been born, and they worship Him. But Matthew's readers are better informed than the Magi. The readers know that the king is EMMANUEL; in Him is found the salvific presence of God (2 Cor 5:19). They know also, as the Magi do not, that the mother of the Child is the virgin MOTHER OF GOD in the salvific plan. Matthew's Christian readers can perceive not merely a continuity between the virginal conception of Christ and Isaiah 7:14 but also a continuity in history. In God's design, the virgin mother who appeared in Israel gave birth to the Savior in whom the GENTILES are to believe. God's plan is to bridge the gap between Jew and Gentile; this Israelite mother of divine choice becomes associated through her Child with the Gentile world.

Joseph's further role in Matthew 2:13–14 and 20–21 is to care for the Child in whom the Gentiles—represented by the Magi and the land of Egypt where the Holy Family fled—are to believe and for the virgin mother whose maternity is ultimately to make their faith possible. In Matthew 1and 2, Mary's maternity is related to the Gentile world through faith in Christ rather than through the personal family of hers and Joseph. Matthew fully accounts for her maternal role in the virginal maternity of Christ and its significance for the Gentile world. For the first evangelist, Mary is the Virgin Mother of the Emmanuel whose salvific presence, once He is conceived, remains in the world forever (Mt 28:20).

Luke 1:26–38; 1:39–56; 2:1–7; 2:16, 19; 2:33–35; 2:41–51. The Lucan Infancy Gospel (Lk 1–2) is a conscious product of literary artistry that offers a series of religious reflections on JOHN THE BAPTIST and Jesus, and on Zechariah, ELIZABETH, and Mary. Considered as a whole, Luke's Infancy narrative is made up of two diptychs. The first diptych parallels the annunciation of John to Zechariah (Lk 1:5–25) with the ANNUNCIA-

TION of Jesus to Mary (Lk 1:26–38). The second diptych parallels the birth of John (Lk 1:57–58) with the birth of Jesus (Lk 2:1–20). In addition to this broad scheme of parallelism, Luke compares and contrasts scene and detail throughout chapters 1 and 2. The more detailed use of parallelism is evident in the Annunciations; it is less evident, but clearly detectable, elsewhere (e.g., in the contrast between Mary in Lk 1:3–46 and Zechariah in Lk 1:20–23). The parallelisms in chapters 1 and 2 show adroitly the superior dignity of the divine gifts of Jesus over John, and of Mary over Zechariah and Elizabeth.

In certain portions of chapters 1 and 2, the literary style draws heavily upon words, expressions, and figures of the OT, not by direct citation as in Matthew 1 and 2, but by interweaving OT elements into the narrative. In this way the author alludes to past prophecies, personages, and momentous events of the sacred history of Israel to bestow life, warmth, and relevance upon the events and people he describes. Beneath the surface of his Annunciation narratives, and the MAGNIFICAT especially, lie unusually rich undercurrents of theological thought.

All the personages and events of Luke 1 and 2 derive their importance and meaning from Jesus. He is the Son of the Most High, the Davidic messianic King (Lk 1:32–33; cf. 2 Sm 7:13–14), miraculously conceived by the power of God (Lk 1:35). He is Savior, Christ, and Lord (Lk 2.11), the very bearer of salvation (Lk 2:30), the light of the Gentiles and the glory of Israel (Lk 2:32).

In the Lucan narrative, the mother of Jesus likewise derives her dignity from Jesus. The evangelist introduces her as a παρθένος (virgin) and the fiancée of Joseph (Lk 1:27). His judgment concerning her virginity is based not on historical data but on the more certain terrain of God's choice of her, much in the line of thought of Matthew 1:23. According to Luke, she is κεχαριτωμένη (highly favored, traditionally rendered as full of grace), the object of divine choice, because she is about to conceive and bear Jesus (Lk 1:28). The word κεχαριτωμένη appears at a place where the name of the greeted person is normally expected. It serves then as a substitute for Mary's name. Κεχαριτωμένη is a feminine perfect participle of the verb χαριτόω, which means to favor, to cause grace. As a perfect participle it refers to a grace or favor received in the past, the effect of which still lasts in the present. Because in ancient Israel, the name indicated the origin and identity of a person, κεχαριτωμένη also refers to Mary's identity and origin. The entire greeting, as Luke terms it (Lk 1:29), is not to be interpreted conventionally, for the evangelist describes Mary as pondering it, attempting to penetrate its meaning (Lk 1:29).

The participle κεχαριτωμένη is bracketed by χαῖρε (hail, greetings; literally rejoice) and ὁ κύριος μετὰ σοῦ (the Lord [is] with you). A growing number of NT scholars concede that the greeting is a subtle allusion to a set of OT prophecies that invite Israel, under the figure of a woman, the "daughter Sion," to rejoice at the prospect of the action of God bringing about the promised salvation of the people (Jl 2:21–27; Za 9:9–10; Zep 3:14–17). Luke's χαῖρε parallels the χαῖρε (rejoice) of Zephaniah 3:14 (LXX). The daughter Sion or daughter of Sion is an abstract personification of God's favored people, Israel, directed in these prophecies to rejoice at the fulfillment of their messianic hope. The expression, "The Lord [is] with you," as used in the OT (Gn 26:24; 28:15; 46:4; Ex 3:12; Jgs 6:12, 16), expresses the idea of God's salvific presence, here to inaugurate the messianic era, as in Zephaniah 3:15b: "The King of Israel, the Lord, is in your midst." After noting that Mary reflected on the greeting, Luke expands the parallel: "Fear not, Mary" (Lk 1:30) parallels "fear not, Sion" (Zep 3:16); "you have found grace with God" (Lk 1:30) compares with, "you have no further misfortune to fear" (Zep 3:15b). As the prophet Zephaniah invites Israel to rejoice over the presence of God to save it from all its misfortunes (Zep 3:14–17), so the angel invites Mary to rejoice because she is favored with the presence of God who saves her from all misfortunes. Whereas the prophecy of Zephaniah refers globally to Israel or more exactly to the faithful remnant of Israel, under the figure of a woman, the angelic greeting concretizes the prophecy in Mary: She receives in her person the fulfillment of the messianic hope of her people. She is also seen as a pre-figure of the new messianic people.

The angel explains that Mary is to receive the fulfillment by conceiving and bearing a son whom she is to name Jesus ("Yahweh is salvation"; Lk 1:31). The evangelist employs conventional language to allude to women favored by God with sons (Sarah: Gn 21:2; Samson's mother: Jgs 13:3; Anna: 1 Sm 1:19; the young woman of Is 7:14; see also the terms used in regard to Elizabeth: Lk 1:24, 57). After the Child is described as the Davidic Messiah, Mary presents her famous question, "How shall this happen, since I do not know man?" (Lk 1:34). Because Mary is fiancée to Joseph, because no historical background indicates that she and Joseph would have entered a virginal marriage of their own accord, and because no evidence exists in the Biblical texts that they were divinely enlightened to make such a decision at the time of their betrothal, it appears that Luke 1:34 does not refer to a vow of virginity Mary would have already made. Mary's reaction may parallel one she herself establishes with her own destiny and the one of Abraham (Lk 1:55). Abraham was called by God to leave his home and to move to the land of Canaan (Gn 12:1) as he had already left his home and was already heading to Canaan (Gn 11:31). This may indicate that when God calls someone, the call meets an aspiration that is already present in the one who is called or that God has prepared the person to receive His call. It is possible that Mary's words express something similar.

The interpretation of Mary's question has not achieved a consensus among NT scholars. It is clear that Luke intends it to contrast with Zechariah's question (Lk 1:18). He requests evidence to verify the truth of Gabriel's prophecy concerning Elizabeth's child. Mary, however, does not challenge Gabriel's prophecy that she will be the mother of the messianic King. Her question echoes the angel's announcement that it is out of the divine favor toward herself (Lk 1:30) that she will be mother of this King (Lk 1:31–33). She seeks to understand the divine favor toward herself in this messianic maternity ("how shall this be"), for she is not married, and, unlike women of the past favored with children, she has no evidence that she is barren ("since I do not know man").

Mary's question remains somewhat odd, for the answer seems obvious: betrothed to Joseph, she is to marry soon and have children with her future husband. However, since Mary connects later, in her Magnificat, what is happening to her with what happened to Abraham (Lk 1:55), the parallel with Abraham may shed some light on her question to the angel. When God called Abraham to leave his country to go to Canaan (Gn 12:1), Abraham had already left his country and was already moving to Canaan (Gn 11:31). God's call to Abraham confirmed a move that Abraham was already making but gave to it a totally new dimension. Likewise, the message of the angel invites Mary to enter into something toward which she was already moving without being aware of what it really was.

The angel replies that the divine favor is to be manifested through a virginal conception of the Child by the divine presence residing within her (Lk 1:35a). This divine action compares to the cloud, the symbol of the divine presence, that settled on the meeting tent housing the ark [Ex 40:35; to describe a special divine presence the Lucan text uses the verb ἐπισκιάζω (overshadow), the same word employed by LXX to translate the Hebrew verb šākan (to settle down, to abide) in Ex 40:35, where Yahweh's residence in the sanctuary is explained].

By God's action within her, the Child will have the holiness of YAHWEH, and the special divine presence within Him will come to be recognized (Lk 1:35b). Since what is announced is concealed by the virginal conception, the angel gives Mary a sign, that is, a pledge, that God's favor will be manifested in His own time. The sign is Elizabeth's pregnancy (Lk 1:36). Whether it is the case of the barren woman, Elizabeth, or the case of Mary, the virgin, God shows His favor when and as He chooses: "because nothing shall be impossible with God" (Lk 1:37).

Mary accepts the angelic message in its entirety, expressing her confidence in the virginal conception as an action of God, in the mystery of the divine presence in the Child, and in God's pledge that the divine favor toward her and her Child will be manifested: "Be it done to me according to your word" (Lk 1:38). The Lucan scene ends on the note that in the chosen woman, Mary, the divine presence resides as it resided in a similar manner in the midst of Israel in the sanctuary.

Luke's scene of Mary's VISITATION (Lk 1:39–45, 56) utilizes 2 Samuel 6:1–11, 15 to draw out the theological implications of the divine presence in Child and mother that the Annunciation narrative prophesied. Mary, carrying the Child in her womb, is compared to the ARK OF THE COVENANT, the site of the permanent presence of Yahweh among His people. As the ark was brought to Jerusalem in David's time, so the mother of Jesus departs in the direction of the Holy City to visit Elizabeth (Lk 1:39; cf. 2 Sm 6:2). As Israel honored the presence of Yahweh in the ark during its trip toward Jerusalem, so Elizabeth recognizes at Mary's greeting that the mother of Jesus carries in herself the divine presence. But unlike David's (2 Sm 6:9), Elizabeth's reaction to the presence of the Lord is one of joyful awe, not reverential fear (Lk 1:43), for Mary carries the presence of God that sanctifies (Lk 1:41) in contrast to the terrible presence that dealt Uzzah a mortal blow (2 Sm 6:7). As the ark stayed in the house of Obededom for three months (2 Sm 6:11), so Mary remains with Elizabeth for about three months (Lk 1:56).

Mary is not only exalted by Elizabeth as bearer of the divine presence, but she is also praised because of her faith. Luke presents Mary as the first one who has believed in Jesus Christ. This dimension of Mary has been overlooked in the past. The Vatican Council II (Lumen gentium, paragraph 58) rehabilitated it in speaking of Mary's "pilgrimage of faith." John Paul II's Redemptoris mater (paragraph 21) spoke later of Mary as "the first disciple" of her son.

Mary is also characterized by Luke in the Magnificat (Lk 1:46–58) as the perfect representative of the 'ănāwîm (lowly, humble, poor), the spiritual community of the poor, the remnant, whom God prepared to receive His expected salvation (cf. Zep 3:12). God took into consideration Mary's ταπείνωσις (humiliation, humble station, lowliness; Lk 1:48), both material and spiritual, and looked favorably upon her longing for deliverance from this condition. Following the OT tradition of authors ascribing canticles to the person honored by them, Luke attributes the Magnificat to Mary. The fact that Mary did sing the Magnificat cannot be totally excluded: Jewish mothers are familiar with their religious traditions because they are responsible for transmitting them to their children. It is therefore likely that Mary knew passages of the Scriptures by heart and selected some that reflected her state of mind. Essentially, the Magnificat is a series of religious reflections invoking various OT ideas about the mystery of God's salvific plan now come to term in Mary, through whose maternity of Jesus the generations to follow (the new Israel; Lk 1:50) will receive the blessings of the messianic era. All generations, recognizing the divine favor bestowed upon them through her, that is, through her maternal role in the creation of the new Israel, will call her blessed (Lk 1:48).

The second chapter of Luke shifts its orientation somewhat away from consideration of the mother of Jesus to focus upon the mystery of salvation to occur through her Child, Jesus. However, the reader is invited to reflect upon this mystery through the eyes of the mother. The Child's birth occurs in simple and lowly surroundings that reflect the condition of the parents as classic examples of the 'ănāwîm (Lk 2:6–7). The Lucan text makes discrete reference to Micah 5:1–5, with which it associates the birth of the Child at BETHLEHEM. It makes a second allusion by using φάτνη (crib, manger), which correlates with Isaiah 1:3–4 (cf. the LXX, where the same Greek word is used) to give meaning to the circumstances surrounding the birth as forecasting the later rejection of Jesus.

True to His pledge, God overcomes the poverty and isolation of the birth by the angelic revelation to the shepherds (Lk 2:8–15). Mary ponders the divine message to these 'ănāwîm to fathom its meaning as well as the circumstances of the birth (Lk 2:19; cf. Dn 7:28; Gn 37:11). In accordance with the Magnificat, she remains among the 'ănāwîm. In this capacity she presents the Child to the Lord in the Temple and makes the offering of the poor, two turtledoves (Lk 2:22–24). Again God manifests the significance of the Child as Savior both of the Gentiles and of Israel, fulfilling a pledge to Simeon (Lk 2:32). When the parents marvel at the ingenuity of the divine plan, Simeon foretells the rejection of the Child (Lk 2:33–34) and addresses himself to the mother: "and thy own soul a sword shall pierce, that the thoughts of many hearts may be revealed" (Lk 2:35). This prophecy has not been convincingly interpreted. It appears to allude to Ezekiel 14:17, where the sword is the sign of division that God produces in Israel to separate the faithful remnant from the rest of the people. The probable meaning of the prophecy is that she, together with her Child (Lk 2:34), will be separated from her people. She is here envisioned by Luke in her representative capacity, already indicated in the Magnificat, as mother of the new Israel. Because Luke does not place Mary at the cross (cf. Lk 23:49 with Jn 19:25), he most likely does not see the prophecy as a direct reference to her compassion. The episode of Jesus found in the Temple is bracketed by two statements about Jesus growing in wisdom (Lk 2:40, 52). As a matter of fact, the teachers in the Temple are amazed at the boy's understanding (Lk 2:47); Jesus is only twelve at the time (Lk 2:42). In ancient Israelite society, mothers raised the children, boys and girls; they introduced them into their culture, their tradition, their religion, their society. Once the boys reached puberty, their fathers taught them their profession. The episode of the Child Jesus in the Temple happens shortly before that as Mary, and not Joseph, is the one who "scolds" Jesus, for she is the one who is still in charge of His education. This reality is recognized by the woman who speaks in Luke 11:27. In this regard, ancient Israel shared a view common to the entire Mediterranean world that the full human being is the adult (after puberty). The Latin word for education is humanitas. In other words, education is what leads a newborn into humanity. Left to itself, a newborn would become a wild animal. So, the INCARNATION was not completed until Jesus had reached puberty. The Incarnation implied inculturation. And Mary's contribution to the Incarnation is much larger than often thought: It did not end at Christmas. If Mary is, of all human beings, the one who was most affected, even physically, by the Incarnation, she is also the one who was the most influential on Jesus. Luke hints at this.

Luke concludes his Infancy narrative with a cryptic allusion to the death and Resurrection of Jesus ("after three days"; Lk 2:46) in his account of the parents' discovery of Him in the Temple. The mother is left in a state of reflection on all the events of the childhood of Jesus.

Luke 8:19–21; 11:27–28; Acts 1:14. The first of these passages has parallels in Mark 3:31–35 and Matthew 12:46–50. Luke designates Mary as the perfect representative of the 'ănāwîm, and, in both of these passages, the evangelist alludes to the mother of Jesus as the perfect hearer of the word of God. In Lucan theology she is the model of all Christians, who must respond to the word of God and, in this sense, is already the figure or type of the Church.

The theological portrait of Mary in the Gospel of Luke takes the Christian reader from the lofty pinnacle of the symbolic ark of the new covenant, in whose person the Son of God was conceived and resided, down to the humble station of the 'ănāwîm and finally leaves her as an invitation to all Christians to allow the Word of God to fructify in themselves through an obedient faith as it fructified in the woman chosen to be the mother of Jesus. Because for Luke the divine favor manifested to Mary and in her Child is at first concealed and only gradually revealed, it appears quite incompatible with his theology that Mary would have other children by Joseph. To be the Virgin Mother of Jesus, the messianic King in whom the divine presence resides, is her personal, religious mission. Luke does not propose her virginity as a moral ideal, but as a determination of the divine will, a mystery of faith requiring that she hear the Word of God and keep it.

As a result of this, in Acts 1:14, the gap between Jesus' relatives and Jesus' disciples in Mark 3:34 is overcome: The disciples and the brothers of Jesus are praying together. Between the mention of these two groups, the name of Mary is highlighted.

John 2:1–12; 19:25–27. The mother of Jesus appears in the Fourth Gospel in roles unequaled for their prominence in the synoptic accounts of the public ministry of Jesus. The Gospel of John tells of seven signs performed by Jesus: the water changed into wine at Cana (Jn 2:1–2), the healing of the official's son at Cana (Jn 4:46–54), the curing of the man at the pool (Jn 5:1–18), the multiplication of the loaves (Jn 6), the man born blind who receives sight (Jn 9), the resurrection of LAZARUS (Jn 11), and the great sign of the PASSION and Resurrection of Jesus (Jn 13–21). Mary is present in the first sign (Jn 2:1–12), alluded to in the central one (Jn 6:42), and is present again in the last one (Jn 19:25–27). As in Luke's Gospel, Mary is also shown as leading others to believe in Jesus. At Cana she takes an active role in Jesus' changing of water into wine at a marriage feast. On CALVARY she is present beneath the CROSS, where she is instructed by her own dying Son to receive the beloved disciple as her son.

Attempts to interpret the Cana narrative (Jn 2:1–12) simply on the historical level have failed to account for all the data of the passage. Jesus' reply to Mary, "What wouldst thou have me do, woman? My hour has not yet come" (Jn 2:4), lacks coherence with Mary's confident instruction to the waiters, "do whatever he tells you" (Jn 2:5). The expression τί ἐμοὶ καὶ σοί (literally, "what to me and to thee") is invariably used in both the OT and the NT to imply a certain rejection (Jgs 11:12; Jos. 22:24; 2 Sm 16:10; 19:22; 1 Kgs 17:18; 2 Kgs 3:13; 2 Chr 35:21; Mt 8:29; Mk 1:24; 5:7; Lk 4:34; 8:28). The hour of Jesus in John is a technical term for His glorification through His Passion (Jn 7:30; 8:20; 12:23, 27; 13:1; 17:1). Even if hour is read as part of a question ("has my hour not yet come?") as some of the Fathers have understood it, an allusion to the Passion cannot be excluded from the text.

Because the Cana narrative cannot be interpreted solely as the historical record of an objective event, exegetes were forced to study the OT background to the account. An OT background saturates the evangelist's thought in his prologue (Jn 1:1–18), which alludes to Genesis 1:1 and to the concept of the LOGOS in certain Psalms and in the Book of WISDOM. But the OT background is even more evident in John 1:19–51: the messianic expectancy (vv. 19, 41), the citation of Isaiah 40:3 in verse 23, and the allusions to Isaiah 53:7 in verses 29 and 36, to the Law and the prophets in verse 45, to the Davidic Messiah (2 Sm 7) in verse 49, and to Daniel 7:13 ("Son of Man") and Genesis 28:12 in verse 51. The episode at Cana takes place "on the third day" (Jn 2:1). This alludes to the Passion and Resurrection to come. But the beginning of John 2 "on the third day" also happens after John 1, where four days are listed (vv. 19, 29, 35, and 43). Like Genesis 1, John starts his Gospel with an inaugural week in which the seventh day, the day for the Lord, is the day of Cana. Some exegetes have therefore seen in Mary's insistence at Cana, in spite of Jesus' remark that His "hour has not yet come," Mary's intuition that this hour has come indeed. Mary's pondering about Jesus (Lk 2:51) might have led her to that understanding, to that faith. Jesus' reluctance to accept His hour is similar to the request He makes to His Father to spare Him the Passion (Lk 22:42). The Gospel of John does not have an Infancy narrative, but it tells of Mary "giving birth" to the "public" Jesus at Cana. As a result of Mary's intervention and of the sign performed by Jesus, "His disciples believed in Him" (Jn 2:11). Mary's faith can thus be seen as being at the origin of the disciples' faith.

The Cana narrative alludes to the OT water of ritual purification in John 2:6, and Mary's statement to the waiters closely parallels Genesis 41:55. Moreover, in John 1:19–51, titles are important to clarify the religious significance of personages: the Baptist is not Messiah, ELIJAH, or the PROPHET, but "a herald's voice in the desert"; Jesus is the LAMB OF GOD, the Chosen One, teacher, Christ, Son of God, King of Israel, Son of Man; Simon is Rock; Nathanael is "a genuine Israelite." Titles are also used for Mary in the Cana narrative. The evangelist avoids the use of her proper name, designating her instead as "the mother of Jesus" (four times, including Jn 2:12) and "woman" (once). The title "the mother of Jesus" reflects the thought of John 1:14: The logos became flesh and "tabernacled" in her to manifest His glory.

Because the reply of Jesus to Mary in John 2:4 must be interpreted on a theological rather than a historical level, the title γυνή (woman) cannot be taken simply for the respectful term of address it represented in the Greek world of the evangelist's time. Except for the possible correlation with "Son of Man" in John 1:51 no direct indication of the religious sense of woman is provided in the first two chapters of John. It is necessary to judge the sense of the title based on the Cana narrative as a whole.

The narrative concerns the manifestation of the glory of Christ (Jn 2:11). The transformation of the ritual water of purification into wine is symbolic of the messianic benefits coming through Christ (for wine as one of the symbols of the messianic benefits, cf. Am 9:4; Is 25:6; Jer 31:12; Jl 4:18). The miracle fulfills Jesus' prophecy that Nathanael would see evidence that the messianic benefits promised to the Patriarchs are fulfilled in Him (Jn 1:51; Gn 28:12). The setting of the miracle is a γάμος (wedding banquet), a Christian term portraying the joys of the messianic kingdom (Mt 22:2; 25:10; Lk 12:36). Mary's declaration, "they have no wine" (Jn 2:3), petitions, or at least hints, that Jesus should bestow the benefits of the kingdom on Israel. Although He replies that the time for such action has not yet arrived, He performs the miracle. The ambiguity between Jesus' reply and His action suggests that the term woman shares in this equivocation.

One explanation for this peculiar usage of woman in John 2:4 is the varied uses of the same term in the Johannine theology of Revelation 12 (see below). Jesus' reply views Mary's petition eschatologically, that is, in the light of His future action inaugurating the kingdom with finality through His death on the cross. In this final sense He cannot now act; Mary is woman in accordance with Isaiah 26:17, the figure of the metaphorically pregnant woman, yearning for the kingdom but unable to bring it about. In Christ's ministry, however, the kingdom has really arrived (Mk 1:15). Thus He can respond to her request with a prophetic miracle indicating the future advent in Himself; from this standpoint Mary is the future mother-Israel of Isaiah 60:4, that is, the figure of the future people of God. Through her participation in the miracle at Cana, she is beginning to experience the joy of gathering the new people of God (Is 60:5) in the kingdom that Christ will finally establish. The title woman in the Cana narrative makes Mary the figure of the people of God: first of the old Israel yearning for salvation through Christ, yet completely dependent on the action of God through Him; and secondly of the new Israel to come into existence through His Passion and Resurrection.

The Johannine scene of Mary at the cross (Jn 19:25–27) makes Mary the only person who witnessed both the birth and the death of the Messiah. The scene completes John's Gospel theology of the mother of Jesus as woman. That the Cana and Calvary narratives involving the mother of Jesus are intended to be mutually explanatory is clear from several considerations: the theological sense of the word hour in John 2:4, meaning the glorification of Jesus through His Passion; the absence of the proper name in favor of the titles the mother of Jesus and woman in both passages; and the phrase "the third day" in John 2:1, an allusion orienting the Cana narrative to the Calvary scene (cf. Mt 16:21; Lk 9:22).

On Calvary Jesus addresses His mother from the cross, before He declares the Scriptures fulfilled (Jn 19:28), to inform her that she has a son in the beloved disciple. The promise of Cana here comes to term: The transition from the old to the new Israel, prefigured in Mary at Cana, is completed. The messianic fulfillment she yearned for in her declaration, "they have no wine," is the gift to her of her Son: The gift is the new people of God, typified in the beloved disciple. The yearning of Israel for messianic salvation, so often spoken of by the prophets as the woman in labor, is concretized on Calvary in the historical mother of Jesus. Just as she is the woman chosen by God to be the tabernacle of the Logos become flesh so that He might manifest His saving power among men, so she depicts in her person the faith, the expectancy, the suffering, and the final mysterious destiny of the Christian Church.

In another perspective, as Jesus on Calvary is lifted up on the cross and begins thus His return to the Father, the Son is, on the one hand, replaced before the mother by the disciple but, on the other hand, the master is equally replaced before the disciple by the mother (the Greek text of Jn 19:26 says: "Jesus seeing then the—τὴν—mother," not "his mother"). In receiving the mother, the disciple receives an educator, a teacher—a role of Mary alluded to in Luke 2:40–52.

In the Gospel of John, Mary is never referred to by name. The narrator speaks of her as the mother (of Jesus), and Jesus himself addresses her as "woman." Another possible explanation of why Jesus calls Mary "woman" is that Mary's intervention at Cana is an intercession. An intercession happens when someone—the intercessor—requests something on behalf of other people before a person who has the power to grant it. The intercessor must have a privileged access to this person, otherwise there would be no need for an intermediary: Those in need could ask the request directly. This privileged access is therefore the condition of the intercession. The Bible contains many cases of intercessions presented either before God or before human beings, usually persons of power (Ex 32:1–14; Am 7:1–7; Gn 44:18–34; 1 Sm 19:1–7). These examples reveal that the success of intercession does not derive from the ties between the intercessor and the person of power (Batsheba's intercession fails, though she is the mother of Solomon in 1 Kgs 2:22–25, whereas the unknown Canaanite woman of Mt 15:21–28 is successful, though her privileged access to Jesus is her mere physical presence), but from the strong ties that exist between the intercessor and those on whose behalf the intercession is made. In calling his mother woman at Cana and then from the cross, Jesus introduces a distance between himself and his mother. In making Mary the mother of the beloved disciple, Jesus strengthens the ties that exist between Mary and the community of the faithful. The ties between a mother and her children are the strongest that could exist. Mary's intercession is powerful because she is now the mother of the faithful. Evidently, as she also remains the mother of Jesus, Mary's situation as mother of both those on whose behalf she intervenes and the one who has the power to grant them what they need, makes of her an outstanding intercessor. In ancient Israel, a son always listened to his mother. This explains why the Church has traditionally turned to her: The Catechism of the Catholic Church (article 969) reaffirms about Mary that "taken up into heaven she ... by her manifold intercession continues to bring us the gifts of eternal salvation." Thus, because Mary's intercession takes place out of her motherly concern for the faithful and because Jesus Christ himself made Mary their mother, her intercession was hoped for, even willed, by God Himself.

Revelation 12. The image of the woman in chapter 12 of Revelation is a symbol of the people of God, Israel of the OT, and the new Israel of the NT (cf. Gal 6:10). In a highly subtle and complex manner, the author of Revelation 12 transforms the OT comparisons of Israel to a woman from metaphor to symbol. The OT prophets compare Israel to a faithless bride (Jer 2; Ez 16), to a mother (Hos 2:4; Is 66:7), and to a woman in labor (Jer 6:24; 13:27; Is 37:36). Selecting the woman image itself, Revelation 12 draws further upon the imagery of the OT Prophets to produce an original symbol that is remarkable for its ambivalence. New Testament scholars agree that the woman symbol of Revelation 12:1 stands for the people of God of both Testaments, but on the development of the symbol in the remainder of the chapter opinions diverge considerably (cf. Le Frois 1954).

The allusion to OT Israel in the symbol of the woman is evident from the unmistakable relationship between Revelation 12:2 and Isaiah 26:17. The thought and language of the two passages coincide. In Isaiah 26:17 the prophet likens Israel's suffering under divine chastisement to a woman in labor who is writhing and crying out. Like the metaphorical woman of this passage in Isaiah, the symbolic woman of Revelation 12:2 is with child, cries out, and writhes. But in Isaiah, the pregnancy, like the woman, is metaphorical: The whole figure of the Isaian woman is meant to depict the incapacity of Israel to save itself from its sufferings (Is 27:18). God Himself must intervene if Israel is to be saved (Is 27:20–22). The symbol of the woman in Revelation 12:2 pertains to the Israel of the OT yearning for salvation but unable of itself to fulfill this yearning.

The inclusion of the Christian Church under the symbol of the woman appears clearly from Revelation 12:5, 13–18, when these passages are understood in the context of the entire Book of Revelation. In Revelation 12:5, the woman bears a son who is described in terms that unmistakably designate Him as the Christ of Christian faith. Once born, the Child is taken up to God's throne, a plain reference to the Resurrection and Ascension of Christ. But the woman is separated from Him by the threat of a dragon. She escapes the dragon through the protection of God, who prepares a place for her on Earth (Rv 12:6, 14). Frustrated in his attempt to destroy the woman, the dragon awaits reinforcements before launching himself against the rest of the woman's offspring (Rv 12:17). In the context of the Book of Revelation, the woman who flees the dragon and is protected from harm by God can only be the Christian Church, for it is the Church at once divinely protected and persecuted that is the main theme of Revelation.

The ambivalent meaning of the woman symbol in the broad sweep of Revelation 12, symbolizing both Israel and the Christian Church, is clear also from the imagery of Revelation 12:1. There, at the opening of the chapter, the woman is described as clothed with the sun, having the moon at her feet, and crowned with twelve stars. The imagery of sun and moon is taken from Isaiah 60:1–2, 19–20, where the Israel of the future is envisioned, under the figure of a mother, as illuminating the entire world. Placed in heaven, that is, immediately below God's throne, she reflects the light of God Himself. She is, as it were, a new luminary for the earth, comparable to the sun and moon (cf. Gn 1:14–15). This imagery of the woman illuminating the world unifies the OT people of God and the NT people of God: The promise made to OT Israel in Isaiah 60 finds its fulfillment in the Church of the NT. The crown of twelve stars probably refers to the twelve tribes of Israel, who are sealed in Revelation 12:4–8, and to the twelve apostles, whose names are inscribed on the foundation stones of the New Jerusalem in Revelation 21:14. This interpretation corresponds perfectly to the ambivalence of the woman symbol.

The interpretation of the woman symbol meets with its greatest difficulty in Revelation 12:2, the portrait of the woman in labor, to Revelation 12:4–5, the portrait of the woman bearing the child. Because Isaiah 26:17 describes the labor of the woman in Revelation 12:2, the labor here is fruitless: The portrait reflects the Isaian contention that Israel cannot save itself from its sufferings, but must await the act of God (Is 26:20–22). In Revelation 12:4–5, however, the woman, who is no longer specified as being in labor but instead is confronted by the dragon, is fruitful and bears the child. Because Revelation 12:5 designates the child as Christ and as immediately seized to be brought to God's throne, it is legitimate to conclude that behind this allusion to the Resurrection and Ascension of Christ lies the Johannine concept of the ὕψωσις lifting up (Jn 3:14; 12:32), that is, the Passion-Death and Resurrection-Ascension of Jesus. This allusion to the historical Jesus is on the high plane of the theology of the Johannine Gospel: The reference is to the historical Christ who is glorified by the Father (Jn 12:28; 13:31–32). In the Johannine theology, Christ always possesses this glory. It is gradually revealed at the determination of the Father (Jn 2:11; 8:54). The woman of Revelation 12:5 gives birth to the Christ who is glorified by the Father because He possessed this glory, His self-revealing divine power, before creation (Jn 17:5) and lived among humankind to manifest it (Jn 1:14), especially through His Resurrection and Ascension (Rv 12:5b). In Revelation 12:5, John propounds an extremely complex set of ideas: (1) by an act of God, the OT Israel (the woman of Rv 12:5) received in herself the fulfillment of her longing for deliverance (Is 26:20); (2) the OT Israel (the woman of Rv 12:5) gave birth to the messianic King (Ps 2:7), whose proper dwelling is at the throne of God, where He now resides (Rv 12:5b); (3) but because Christ always possessed the divine glory He now enjoys, it was through the Virgin Mary (the woman of Rv 12:5) that He first "became flesh and tabernacled among us" (Jn 1:14) to manifest this glory ("and we saw his glory"; Jn 1:14). (The Johannine ἐσκήνωσεν, tabernacled, has the same overtone of the divine presence as the overshadow of Lk 1:35.) Thus, through its complex symbolism Revelation 12 combines into a single picture the mystery of God's salvific plan now operating through the Christian Church whose historical dependency on Israel lies in Christ, born of the Virgin Mary.

IN THE OLD TESTAMENT

When the OT is interpreted from the standpoint of its literal historical meaning, that is, the sense intended by the inspired human author for his OT audience, no Marian meaning is discovered. Such is true also of the Christological sense. Neither Christ nor Mary can be discovered in the books of the OT by critical, historical exegesis of their literal sense.

Relation of OT Prophecy to NT Messianism. Messianic prophecy both in origin and in fulfillment depends upon the will of God; God prophesies, and God fulfills the prophecy according to His own free determination and wisdom. The MESSIANISM of the NT derives from the prophetic proclamation of the TWELVE concerning Jesus of Nazareth: God raised Him from the dead so that the world might be saved from its sins through faith in Him (Acts 2:14–36). The entire NT is an elaboration of this fundamental prophecy. The messianism of the NT is a divinely instituted fulfillment of that of the OT, just as OT messianism is in itself of divine institution. The NT possesses an essential bond with the OT as the divinely caused fulfillment of the messianic expectancy of the old Israel. Under the prophetic light of Christ, the Apostles, and the Church, the NT provides its own prophetic messianism with intelligibility, depth, and color, not as the logical outcome of the expectancy of the old Israel, that is, a result deducible by reason from OT texts, but rather as the divinely determined outcome of this expectancy.

To interpret the OT, the authors of the NT begin with their own prophetic messianism. Understanding the OT in this light, they show the unity and wisdom of the divine plan of salvation that courses through both Testaments. The NT quest into the OT seeks to illuminate Christ as head of the Church. Its quest is principally, if not exclusively, Christological and ecclesiological. In principle the NT quest into the OT is not a Marian search, for the apostolic KERYGMA proclaims Christ alone to be the cause and source of salvation.

Mary in NT Messianism. The NT conceives of Jesus' mother as theologically significant within its own prophetic messianism: This discovery is reflected in the Infancy narratives of Matthew and Luke, in chapter 12 of Revelation, and in the Fourth Gospel. The theological significance the NT Church attached to the mother of Jesus is relevant to its new messianism: Her messianic maternity fleshes out the Church's Christology (both divine and human) and its ECCLESIOLOGY.

The discovery of Mary's messianic maternity, that is, the fact that she became the mother of Jesus by the open manifestation of the divine mind and will in her virginal conception, led NT thought to search into the OT to forge a stronger bond between its Christological messianism and the messianic expectancy of the OT. The bond is forged with theological care, subtlety, and delicacy. It does not consist in a series of affirmations that, in the mother of Jesus, God chose a salvific companion for Christ. It affirms that the divine plan of salvation included God's choice of a virgin in Israel

The NT quest into the meaningfulness of the mother of Jesus for Christ and the Church relies, as for CHRISTOLOGY itself, upon the prophetic grasp of the OT. This prophetic grasp is little, if at all, concerned with drawing a direct correlation between the mother of Jesus and the material content of OT messianic prophecy. The NT authors favor an allusive use of OT messianic texts and symbols to suggest the religious significance of the mother of Jesus against the broad background of OT messianism. The only passage directly applied to the mother of Jesus in the NT (Mt 1:22–23) is Isaiah 7:14. But the Isaian text is not employed here to affirm the truth of the virginal conception by appeal to OT prophecy. It is used to point up the religious significance of the virginal conception in the plan of God: In this way, He chose to inaugurate His presence in Christ, which remains permanent in the world (Mt 28:20).

Especially remarkable in the NT is that, when using the OT to illuminate its Christological messianism, it does not cite directly Genesis 3:15, of Christ and His mother. In Revelation 12:9 the NT uses Genesis 3:15 to express the earthly existence of the Church in its struggle against satanic power. However, there is a delicate association of the serpent with the woman who gives birth to the messianic King in Revelation 12:5 and, therefore, a complex Marian allusion to Genesis 3:15 (cf. Is 27:1).

The NT use of OT woman images to present its conception of the mother of Jesus is the most striking aspect of its theological reflection upon her person and role. Only through a deeper understanding of the NT prophetic use of the OT imagery is a more exact appreciation of the Biblical view of Mary's place and function in the divine plan of salvation attainable. In this regard, Mary's backstory is first of all to be found in the history of Israel, as told in the OT, rather than in speculative narratives about her childhood, as reported in some apocryphas. Related to Mary, the OT history of Israel may then be considered as a whole and not just as a collection of passages that apply to her.

The story of Israel understood as a covenantal history offers an example of this. The OT mentions four covenants established by God and human beings. Chronologically, they are the covenant with Noah, the covenant with Abraham (and Isaac, and Jacob/Israel), the covenant with Levi, and the covenant with David. In her Magnificat, Mary sees what is happening to her as the fulfillment of God's promise to Abraham (Lk 1:54–55). Her words are developed by Zechariah, who speaks about Abraham of a covenant, an oath that God swore with him (Lk 1:72–73). In the OT, before making a covenant with Abraham, God made a first one with NOAH (Gn 9:9–11). ADAM and EVE were created to live in harmony with God. Very quickly however, they broke that harmony. As a result of it, they were expelled from the garden of EDEN. Sin spread until God decided to wipe His creation away, with the exception of Noah, his family, and samples of the animal world. After the flood, God gives humanity, in Noah, a new chance through a covenant. Again, humanity did not respect the harmony willed by God (Gn 11:1–9, the Tower of Babel). As a result, humanity was split into many different peoples and nations. Given all this, God expressed His will of salvation by choosing, in Abraham, one people called to be dedicated to God. In Genesis 18:17ff, God explained to Abraham that, if the people born from Abraham stayed in harmony with God, "all the families of the earth would be blessed" (Gn 12:3; 18:18). So, God made this covenant first with Abraham himself (Gn 15:18; 17:1–8) and eventually with the entire people born from him (Ex 19:5; 24:8). Again, that people did not stay in harmony with God (Ex 32:1–6, the Golden Calf). So, God chose, among the people of Israel, one tribe that would be dedicated to him. He made a covenant with Levi and his descendants, the LEVITES (Jer 33:21; Mal 2:4–9). Again the harmony was broken (Lv 10:1–2). God then chose one family, one house—the house of David—to ensure the desired harmony. God made a covenant with David and his dynasty (Ps 89:4, 29, 35). Again David's successor, SOLOMON, broke the harmony (1 Kgs 11:1–10; Ps 89:31, 40). Then God chose a single human being, Jesus Christ, through whom all people would be saved. In Him a new and final covenant was made (Lk 22:20) that completed and perfected previous attempts (Heb 8:9). In Jesus, humanity remained in full and perfect harmony with divinity. The sequence of the four OT covenants, followed by the one NT covenant in Jesus Christ, shows a decrease in the number of human beings with whom God established a covenant. In Noah, the covenant was with all of humanity, in Abraham with one people, in Levi with one tribe, in David with one family, and, finally, in Jesus Christ with one person. Confronted by repeated human failures, God seems to have reduced His requirements. This may reveal His deep desire to save humanity. Eventually, all the people of the earth would be blessed if full harmony between humanity, and divinity could be achieved in only one person, namely Jesus Christ. Yet, at a certain point in time, the human assent to God in Jesus could not have been given by Jesus himself. Namely at the moment of the Annunciation, Jesus, as a human person, could not have assented to the complete harmony of humanity and divinity in Jesus Christ. Someone else, another human person, had to anticipate that on behalf of humanity: That person, of course, was His mother.

LIFE OF MARY ACCORDING TO THE GOSPELS

The sparseness of historical detail concerning the mother of Jesus is due to the theologically disciplined writing peculiar to Sacred Scripture: The interest of the inspired writers lies in the salvific action of God in history. Endeavoring to keep the divine activity in history foremost, they content themselves with only that data necessary to provide the minimal historical setting that renders the work of God comprehensible to their readers.

Historical Data. The main historical data offered in the Gospels concerning Mary is that she and Joseph were betrothed at the time of the Annunciation (Mt 1:18; Lk 1:27). Otherwise she is simply located at various places, always in connection with her Son: at Nazareth for the Child's conception (Lk 1:26); in the hill country of Judea (near Jerusalem) for Elizabeth's recognition of her unique maternity (Lk 1:39); at Bethlehem for the Child's birth (Lk 2:4, 7; Mt 2:1); at Jerusalem for her own purification in the Temple and the offering of the Child to Yahweh (Lk 2:22); at Nazareth for the Child's rearing (Lk 2:51; Mt 2:23); at Jerusalem for the discovery of Jesus speaking with the teachers in the Temple (Lk 2:42,46); at Cana for a wedding (Jn 2:1); and finally at Jerusalem when Jesus is crucified (Jn 19:25), where Luke places her at the origin of the Church (Acts 1:8). The datum of Matthew 2:13 that Mary spent some time in Egypt is difficult to interpret and need not be pressed historically.

The Biblical texts offer no information on the proximity of Mary's virginal conception of Jesus to her impending marriage to Joseph. It is legitimate to presume that the Annunciation occurred shortly before the wedding date and that the wedding took place at its predetermined time to prevent the shadow of scandal (quite likely in Galilee) over the conception of the Child. The OT did not foretell a conception through the action of the Holy Spirit. On the contrary, such an event was totally unprecedented and thus unconceivable. The text of Matthew reflects the fact that Joseph accepted the Child's paternity as the divine will; he could not exercise his legal right of divorce without casting the suspicion of adultery upon Mary, and thus also injuring the Child. Luke's Annunciation narrative appears rather to exclude Mary from the Davidic line. If she were of Levitical descent, a possibility raised by her relationship to Elizabeth, the evangelists have attached no importance to it; nor have they attempted to derive religious significance from her name. Her life seems to have been spent in the quiet and obscurity of Nazareth (Mk 1:9), where she acquired no other reputation than that of being the mother of Jesus.

Historical Inferences. The most important historical inferences to be drawn from the Gospel data about Mary's life are the religious implications of the Lucan Annunciation scene. According to Lucan theology, Mary's understanding of herself and of her future altered profoundly due to the virginal conception of the messianic King. She was required thereafter to live in the obscurity of faith, awaiting the realization of the angelic prophecies concerning her Son. In Matthew 1:18–25, Joseph agreed to share this religious life of faith with her. That they would have other children besides Jesus seems excluded by the Lucan theology. This theology demands of Mary that she await the manifestation of herself as God's choice as the Virgin Mother of His Son, the divine Messiah.

Overview of Gospel References. In spite of the relative scarcity of mentions about Mary in the NT, a final overview of the passages about Mary according to the chronology of the texts of the NT is revealing. As stated above, most biblical scholars agree that Paul wrote first, followed by Mark, Matthew, Luke, and John. By looking then at where passages about Mary occur in these authors and by organizing these passages according to their place in the lives of Mary and Jesus, this tableau emerges:

PAUL	MARK	MATTHEW	LUKE	JOHN
Gal 4:4–5
		Mt 1–2	Lk 1:26–58; 2
				Jn 2:12
	Mk 3:31.35	Mt 12:46–50	Lk 8:19–21
	Mk 6:2–3	Mt 13:54–56		Jn 6:41–42
			Lk 11:27–28
				Jn 19:25–27
			Acts 1:13–14

The Blessed Virgin in the Bible. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION OF GALE, A PART OF CENGAGE LEARNING

What appears is a tendency to write more and more about Mary. Very little is simply repeated about her, even among the Synoptics. Rather, new information is added. More is revealed about her, which probably shows a growing interest in her. The increasing interest in Mary that TRADITION displays is already identifiable in the NT itself. Tradition leans on this momentum. Sometimes and on some occasions, it even loses contact with the Biblical foundation. However, the recent texts of the Magisterium call MARIOLOGY back to its scriptural roots.

I. HOLINESS OF MARY

In this encyclopedia, the theology of Mary and its methodology are generally treated under the heading MARIOLOGY. Throughout, specific entries deal with Mary under her various titles or gifts: see ASSUMPTION OF MARY; DORMITION OF THE VIRGIN; IMMACULATE CONCEPTION; IMMACULATE HEART OF MARY; MOTHER OF GOD; MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, QUEENSHIP OF; and THEOTÓKOS. For ecumenical developments in Marian theology, see MARY (AND ECUMENICAL DIALOGUE). The historical developments of Marian theology are dealt with under Mariology. This entry discusses the specific theological questions about Mary as traditionally presented in the Roman Catholic theological tradition over the centuries under the following subheadings: (1) Holiness of Mary; (2) Knowledge and Faith of Mary; (3) Mary and the Church; (4) Mediatrix of All Graces; and (5) Spiritual Maternity of Mary.

The Catholic Church looks upon Mary as "most holy" (sanctissima) and believes she is blessed with such an abundance of grace that she has always been "free of all stain of sin, all beautiful and perfect" (ab omni prorsus peccati labe semper libera ac tota pulchra et perfecta) (Pius IX, Ineffabilis Deus, 1854; Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 2800). The Eastern Orthodox likewise honor Mary as "all-holy" (panagia), and, in the BYZANTINE LITURGY of St. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM, she is praised as the "Theotókos, ever blessed, most pure, and mother of our God; more honorable than the Cherubim, and beyond compare more glorious than the Seraphim" (Patriarchal Divine Liturgy, Vaporis 1985, p. 14). The Eastern Orthodox, however, generally do not accept the Catholic dogma of the Immaculate Conception because of a different approach to original sin (Fastiggi 2009, pp. 8–12). Catholics, though, believe Mary "was preserved from all stain of original sin" from "the first moment of her conception" (Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 2803). This special privilege is intimately linked with Mary's HOLINESS because she was never without sanctifying grace, and she never needed to be purified from any sin, personal or original.

Mary's status as "ever-virgin" is also linked to her holiness. Pope PIUS XII spoke of Mary as "the holy Mother of God who is the Virgin of virgins and 'the teacher of virginity'" (Sacra virginitas 1954, no. 64). Vatican II held Mary up as the model for consecrated religious "because of the type of poor and virginal life that Christ, the Lord, chose for Himself and His virgin mother embraced" (Lumen gentium no. 46). Vatican II also saw Mary's virginity as an expression of her role as the "type" or ideal figure of the Church, which "is herself a virgin, who keeps whole and entire the faith given to her by her spouse" (Lumen gentium no. 64). Pope JOHN PAUL II viewed Mary's perpetual virginity as a sign of her total consecration and "spousal love" for God (cf. John Paul II, Mulieris dignitatem 1988, no. 20).

THE SOURCE OF MARY'S HOLINESS

Beyond a special union with God through sanctifying grace, supernatural holiness involves identifying one's will with the will of God, evidenced through the practice of VIRTUE and the exclusion of sin. In the case of the Mother of the SAVIOR, the degree of supernatural holiness bestowed upon her and achieved through her meritorious life was most extraordinary and can be properly demonstrated through a consideration of her peculiar offices and privileges. Mary's freedom from sin, her fullness of grace, her virtues and gifts, and her final confirmation in grace at the end of her life were special factors of her sanctity, and each of these realities, considered in order below, contributed and gave testimony in its own way to the holiness of the Mother of God.

Freedom from Sin. Both the Scriptures and Church teaching clearly indicate that the Blessed Virgin Mary, immaculately conceived, received the gift of sanctifying grace and other special gifts in an unparalleled manner. The Archangel Gabriel's words, "Hail, full of grace" (Lk 1:28), represent a unique salutation. The Greek word used in the angelic greeting, kecharitoméne, is a perfect passive participle, which means, "to be enriched by grace in a stable, lasting way ... an action completed in the past whose effects endure" (Manelli 2007, p. 75). The angelic words of greeting imply that Mary was adorned with an abundance of heavenly gifts from the treasury of the divinity, to a degree beyond that of all the angelic spirits and all the saints. In fact, official Catholic teaching holds that God's grace was bestowed on Our Lady "in such a wonderful manner that she would always be free from absolutely every stain of sin, and that, all beautiful and perfect, she might display such fullness of innocence and holiness that under God none greater would be known" (Pius IX, Ineffabilis Deus 1854; Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 2800).

Mary's Immaculate Conception, therefore, was a unique and particular privilege. To be immaculately conceived, or to be ever without sin, is to possess grace, just as to be conceived without grace is to begin life in the state of sin. Catholic doctrine teaches, consequently, that Mary's predestination as the worthy mother of God postulates a fitting preparation in her soul and that from the very first moment of her existence she was filled with grace. This positive aspect of holiness, measured in terms of her possession of grace, stands in contradistinction to what is termed Mary's perfect sinlessness, the negative aspect of her sanctity. In the case of Our Lady, this perfect sinlessness implies more than merely the absence of sin; it implies also a complete indefectibility in the moral order, or the actual inability to sin.

Mary's Impeccability and Freedom from Concupiscence. The Catholic Church affirms Mary's preservation from all sin, both original and actual. Her preservation from original sin is her Immaculate Conception, which, as we have seen, implies that Mary was also "impeccable," that is, incapable of sinning. Some Church Fathers, such as Origen, St. John Chrysostom, and St. CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA, spoke of doubts and other flaws in Mary. It is debated whether these refer to actual sins or "normal human sentiments" (Haffner 2004, p. 90; cf. O'Carroll 2000, p. 173). Most Church Fathers, however, "like St. Augustine, St. Ambrose and St. Ephraem the Syrian, taught that Mary was sinless" (Haffner 2004, p. 90). The Council of TRENT, in its Decree on Justification (1547), held that Mary avoided all sins, even venial, throughout her whole life "by a special privilege of God" (Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 1573). The Eastern Orthodox likewise maintain that Mary never committed any actual sins in her life (Ware 1993, p. 259), even though they generally reject the Immaculate Conception.

Was Mary free from CONCUPISCENCE (the inclination to sin) or did she simply avoid sin because of a special privilege of grace? This issue was debated during the Middle Ages. St. THOMAS AQUINAS (c. 1225–1274) believed that Mary had the tinder for sin (fomes peccati) in its essence, but this was fettered or held bound "by the abundance of grace she received in her sanctification" (Summa theologica 3a, q. 27, a. 3). St. Thomas's position, however, was influenced by his belief that Mary "did indeed contract original sin but was cleansed from it prior to her birth" (Summa theologica 3a, q. 27, a. 2 ad 2). Today, in light of the Immaculate Conception, "it seems more reasonable to suppose that Mary enjoyed complete freedom from concupiscence from the first moment of her conception" (Haffner 2004, p. 94).

Mary's sinlessness, therefore, can be properly described as absolute and is the consequence of several factors. Her freedom from the assaults of concupiscence alone would not have been sufficient to ensure it, for the ANGELS, free from the weaknesses of a fallen ADAM, were still able to revolt against God. Two other special factors constituted Mary perfectly impeccable. The first was her constant awareness of God, living always in His presence, and the second was her reception of special and extraordinary graces. These particular graces represented the most important factor, for they enabled Mary to maintain a perfect harmony in her mind, will, affections, and appetitive powers and to recognize always, where error plagues lesser mortals, that true good and happiness are found only in union with God's will.

Such sinlessness in Our Lady, however, does not mean that Mary was intrinsically impeccable, but rather that the grace of her Immaculate Conception and her divine motherhood made sin utterly impossible in her life. She was free, as a consequence of her predestination, not only from all personal sin and from every voluntary imperfection but also from every involuntary moral fault and from even the first movements of concupiscence.

The fact and propriety of Mary's complete sinlessness, recognized in the Church long before other Marian mysteries were explored, can be established also through the theological axiom that the nearer one approaches to a principle of truth or life, the more deeply one partakes of its effects. Hence, Mary's unique proximity to God and the possession of grace made her immune to any kind of personal sin. Her maternal relationship with her divine Son was more than a mere physiological relationship and even more than an office endowed with special graces. It was, in fact, a supernatural, sanctifying union, implying a highly intimate affinity and relationship with the Most Holy Trinity. Therefore, Mary's relationship to the hypostatic order demanded that God, out of what was due himself, bestow the grace of IMPECCABILITY upon His Mother.

Fullness of Grace. Mary's complete sinlessness implies conversely what is termed the fullness of grace. The teaching Church, therefore, in referring traditionally to Our Lady as full of grace, has never attributed to Mary anything less than a supremacy of holiness. Whatever in providence has been given in any degree to individual saints must have been given to Mary in plenitude. If the first parents received an exceptional amount of grace from the moment of their creation, Mary must have possessed a far greater degree of sanctity from the time of her conception.

Even before papal authority confirmed their teaching, ecclesiastical writers and doctors of the Church were unanimous in holding that from her very creation Mary possessed a greater degree of sanctity than any angel or other merely human being. Many theologians have not hesitated to claim for Mary a sanctity surpassing, even from the beginning, the combined holiness of all angels and other men, excluding, of course, that of her divine Son (see Suárez, De mysteriis vitae Christi, in Vivès 1856, Disputation 21, III, 7, p. 321). Traditionally, therefore, the Church has always attributed to Mary any grace that has been granted to a lesser saint, either in its own form or in some more eminent and fitting manner. Certain graces, of course, could not be directly bestowed on Mary. The priesthood, for instance, was not appropriate for Our Lady as a woman, but the divine maternity brought her the local, not simply the sacramental, presence of Christ's body; physical martyrdom, not providentially in God's plan for His Mother, was superseded by her participation in a singular manner in the PASSION of her divine Son.

Our Lady's fullness of grace, however, preeminent as it was, was not comparable to the plenitude of grace in Christ. Our Savior is the source of grace; moreover, by reason of the HYPOSTATIC UNION, the plenitude of grace was complete in Our Lord from His conception. In Mary's case, grace was susceptible to growth. As Our Lady dealt with Christ, witnessed the events in the work of Redemption, and experienced one by one the episodes in her life linking her with the work of the Savior, her capacity for grace increased. In reference to the Blessed Mother, therefore, one speaks of the fullness of grace in a relative, not absolute, sense. No matter how extraordinary the graces granted her, an infinite distance always remained between her greatest perfection and the ineffable HOLINESS OF GOD. No creature can possibly possess absolute perfection, and even though Our Lady fulfilled perfectly the will of God in every instance, her grace was perfect only in proportion to that degree to which God destined her. Therefore, even though properly described by the Archangel Gabriel before the INCARNATION as full of grace, Our Lady was destined to advance in grace according to God's providential designs. This she did more abundantly and perfectly than any other pure creature, and, inasmuch as grace begets grace, in her this sanctifying quality was multiplied throughout her life in geometric proportions.

Mary's Growth in Holiness. Neither from Sacred Scripture nor from the teaching of the Church can it be proved, however, that Our Lady's meriting an increase in grace began from the very instant of her conception, though many theologians advance reasons indicating that such was the case. The Jesuit Francisco SUÁREZ (1548–1617), who is considered "the founder of systematic Mariology" (O'Carroll 2000, p. 334), organized his twenty-three disputations on Mary mostly on her dignity and sanctification (nos. 1–17) and her merits and intercession (nos. 18–23). He was quite clear in affirming that Mary did increase in grace through her own merits during her life (Suárez, De mysteriis vitae Christi, in Vivès 1856, Disputation 18, pp. 280–297).

How, though, did Mary increase in grace? Certainly she advanced in grace with the attainment of the use of reason, whenever, prematurely or normally in God's arrangements, that occurred, and she especially advanced in grace at the time of the incarnation. From that moment on, an ineffable relationship existed between the incarnate Word and His Mother, and whereas Mary gave Christ His humanity, Our Lord gave His Mother a constantly increasing participation in His divinity (i.e., divinization or theosis). In addition to Mary's unique degree of habitual grace as a permanent mode of being, she surpassed all other creatures, too, in the reception of actual graces. God granted her all the graces of intellect and will necessary to perform each action in her life with the greatest possible perfection.

Virtues and Gifts. Beyond sanctifying grace and its increase, beyond her actual graces, Our Lady received also the infused theological and moral virtues and the gifts of the Holy Spirit. The infused virtues enabled her to perform supernaturally meritorious acts, and the gifts aided her in perfecting her acts in complete accord with the inspirations of the Holy Spirit. The cooperation of the human will with divine grace in seeking that which is good results in progress and growth in the virtues.

Properly developed, they constitute holiness, not so much because of the quality of the exterior act as because of the perfection of the inner dispositions. In the case of our Blessed Mother, her inner dispositions were of such special excellence that her power to live a supernatural life surpassed that of all the saints even at the ends of their lives. The least of Mary's interior acts were animated by the purest motives and dispositions of love and were realized with a perfection of charity beyond that of the most heroic efforts of even the greatest of God's other servants. No one denies, therefore, that the Blessed Virgin Mary practiced virtue in a most exemplary manner. The Scriptures give testimony to as much. Note her stalwart faith (Lk 1:45), her profound humility (Lk 1:38–55), and her prompt obedience (Lk 2:5, 22). Because of her freedom from sin, she did not exercise such virtues as continence and penance, but this is not to deny that she possessed the habit of these virtues.

The Catholic tradition is full of references to Mary as the perfect exemplar of human virtues. According to DANTE ALIGHIERI (1265–1321), in Mary "is assembled everything in the creature there is of goodness" (Paradiso, canto 33, 20–21). St. Louis-Marie GRIGNION DE MONTFORT (1673–1716) said that "in all our actions we must look upon Mary, although a simple human being, as the perfect model of every virtue and perfection, fashioned by the Holy Spirit for us to imitate, as far as our limited capacity allows" (True Devotion to Mary, no. 260). At Vatican II, Mary was extolled as the one "who shines forth to the whole community of the elect as the model of virtues" (exemplar virtutum) (Lumen gentium no. 65).

Both from the limited, but pointed, details of Sacred Scripture and from theological reasoning, Mary is seen first of all as the perfect exemplar of the theological virtues. Her faith, strong, certain, and prompt in its assent, was enlightened by the gifts of wisdom, understanding, and knowledge. Extraordinary at the time of the ANNUNCIATION, her faith increased at Cana and throughout the public life of Our Lord until it reached its perfection on Mount CALVARY. Moreover, Mary possessed the virtue of faith in the highest degree experienced by any soul on earth, for Our Lord, possessing the beatific vision from the very moment of His conception, never needed faith or hope. He already possessed what these virtues lead to—vision and possession.

Along these lines, Pope PAUL VI spoke of Mary as "the attentive Virgin" who is "full of faith" in his 1974 apostolic exhortative Marialis cultus (no. 17). Pope John Paul II presented Mary as "she who believed" in his 1987 encyclical Redemptoris mater (nos. 12–19), and he held her up as the exemplar of Eucharistic faith in his 2003 encyclical Ecclesia de eucharistia (no. 55).

Beyond this deep faith, because Mary firmly believed in the promises of the infallible Almighty, she awaited the fulfillment of these promises concerning herself and the human race with a perfect trust and confidence, displaying the greatest hope of the eternal possession of God. Despite the trials and forebodings in the life of Christ and the seeming contradictions in what had been promised, her hope never faltered. Later, after the Ascension of Our Lord, the preeminent perfection of Mary's hope sustained that of the Apostles during the early and difficult days of announcing the Gospel message. In harmony with these truths, Pope BENEDICT XVI, in his 2007 encyclical Spe salvi, referred to Mary as "the star of hope" (no. 49) and "the Mother of hope" (no. 50).

If Mary's faith was singularly ardent and her hope so firm and sure, these virtues were perfected only in keeping with her love of God, her extraordinary charity. Mary, being intimately united with the Blessed Trinity, corresponded most perfectly with God's love for her. No human disorder or imperfection ever impeded her growth in the love of the Almighty. Especially at the moment of her cooperation in the mystery of the Redemption and all that it implied, a perfect example of heroic charity was evidenced. At the time of the Incarnation, Mary not only offered an extraordinary sacrifice for men, she offered that which was dearer than her own life, the life of her Son. Her charity was of such abundance that her sacrifice lasted not only for a few moments at the Incarnation and on Calvary but throughout the whole of Christ's life.

In a particular way, Pope John Paul II looked upon Mary as the supreme example of self-giving love or charity. In his 1988 apostolic letter Mulieris dignitatem, he also pointed to Mary as the model of "feminine humanity" because she discovers herself "by means of a sincere gift of self" (no. 11).

Because the infused moral virtues in a soul in the state of grace are perfected in proportion to its charity, Mary possessed also the virtues of prudence, justice, fortitude, and temperance in an extraordinary degree. The full hierarchy of virtues along with her special intellectual endowments constitutes Mary, then, as the model of both the contemplative and the active life. Her devotion to the Word Incarnate, her charity, and her observance of the law make her the exemplar of the Christian life.

In Catholic theological writings, Mary's reception of the Sacraments is also sometimes discussed. Because the Sacraments were instituted as a chief means for a Christian to grow in grace, the graces gained by Our Lady would be immense, for she was prepared to receive the Sacraments with ideal dispositions. Not all Sacraments were necessary in the case of Our Lady, and some she could not validly receive. The Holy Eucharist, however, for the time after its institution must have been for Mary the source of great consolation and increase in grace. The enormous graces that can be procured by an ordinarily devout soul from a single reception of the Eucharist reveal the increase in grace the Sacrament must have brought to the absolutely perfect communicant, the Blessed Mother.

Special graces are also granted to certain individuals in particular situations, not for the sanctification of the individual himself, but for the sanctification of others. Theologians call these gratiae gratis datae. Mary would not need to possess all such graces herself, because her duties in providence did not require them. However, it is likely that most of them were granted her, for it was fitting that she, as queen of the Apostles, possess in an eminent degree these various charisms.

Consummated Fullness. Mary's special gifts and the marvels that grace and Divine Providence produced in her soul led Our Lady to an ultimate perfection in the supernatural life that is called her final perfection, or consummated fullness of grace. At the end of Our Lady's life, consequent upon the fulfilling of her sacred offices and fruition of her special privileges, her cooperation and growth in grace led to a culmination anticipating her heavenly glory. Although the final plenitude of grace in Mary was of an ineffable degree, it must never be, as indicated earlier, conceived as infinite. The possibilities of the state of grace itself were not exhausted in Mary, nor were all the possible effects of grace realized in her life. Of necessity, grace in Mary remained a created, accidental entity and, consequently, a finite reality. Hence, the plenitude of grace in Our Lady was limited in comparison with that of Christ, although it was still, in comparison with that of any other creature, inexpressibly superior.

For ordinary Christians, two general factors are part of supernatural growth. Fidelity to duties of state involving the Commandments and the practice of the virtues and reception of the Sacraments are the common ways of sanctification. In the case of our Blessed Lady, however, there existed a third factor: her divine maternity and the offices and privileges consequent upon it. Because she was called to this special relationship with God, there followed for her the bestowal of extraordinary graces for extraordinary sanctification. These graces, like any others, became more and more numerous as Mary corresponded with them in greater charity and fidelity. Her perfect correspondence with grace, especially at the moment of the Incarnation and again on Calvary, produced in Mary's soul an increase and plenitude of grace that exceeds human description.

Hence, in an attempt to describe the holiness of Mary, the words of St. John Chrysostom in the Roman Breviary have become classic: "A great miracle ... indeed was the blessed ever-virgin Mary. What greater or brighter has ever been found or will ever be found? ... What is holier than she? Neither Prophets nor Apostles ... neither seraphim nor cherubim ... nor any created being, visible or invisible" (Lesson 5, Common of Feasts of the Blessed Virgin Mary).

MARY'S HOLINESS SINCE VATICAN II

Vatican II spoke of Mary as "the model of virtues" (Lumen gentium no. 65), and since the council, the popes have consistently pointed to Mary as the perfect model of faith, hope, and charity. Pope John Paul II, in his 1988 apostolic letter Mulieris dignitatem, held Mary up as the model of holiness for both virgins and mothers because "these two dimensions of the female vocation" coexist in her (no. 17). The Catechism of the Catholic Church (1992/1997) says the Church looks to the "all-holy Virgin Mary" as the "model and source" for all other human examples of holiness (no. 2030).

Vatican II also placed special emphasis on Mary as the eschatological sign of the Church in glory. She is extolled as "the image and beginning of the Church as it is to be perfected in the world to come" (Lumen gentium no. 68). The Catechism of the Catholic Church picked up on this link between Mary's holiness and the holiness of the Church by stating that, "in Mary she [the Church] is already all-holy" (no. 867). Mary's relationship to the Church has also been an important topic in ecumenical dialogues, especially with the Orthodox and Anglicans.

Another development since Vatican II has been an increased emphasis on Mary as not only a model of holiness but also as a teacher of holiness. Thus, Pope Paul VI spoke of Mary as "a teacher of the spiritual life for individual Christians" (Marialis cultus 1974, no. 21). Pope John Paul II consistently extolled Mary as the preeminent instructor of holiness. In his 2002 apostolic letter Rosarium Virginis Mariae, John Paul II recognized Mary as the best teacher for learning about Christ because "no one can introduce us to a profound knowledge of his mystery better than his Mother" (no. 14). In his final encyclical, Ecclesia de eucharistia (2003), John Paul II had chapter six titled: "At the School of Mary: Woman of the Eucharist." He pointed to Mary as the one who can best instruct the faithful on the true depth and mystery of the Eucharist (nos. 53–56).

The importance of Mary as a teacher of holiness was also stressed by Pope Benedict XVI when, as Cardinal Ratzinger, he presided at John Paul II's funeral Mass on April 8, 2005. Meditating on John 19:27, he noted that John Paul II did as the beloved disciple did: "he took her [Mary] into his own home (eis ta idia: Jn 19:27)—Totus tuus. And from the mother he learned to conform himself to Christ." As Pope Benedict XVI, he has continued to refer, like his predecessor, to "the school of Mary." In his first papal homily on January 1, 2006, for the Solemnity of Mary, Mother of God, Pope Benedict stated: "Let us too, at her school, learn to become attentive disciples of the Lord. With her motherly help, let us commit ourselves to working enthusiastically in the 'workshop' of peace, following Christ, the Prince of Peace."

II. KNOWLEDGE AND FAITH OF MARY

During the MIDDLE AGES, Scholastic theologians used distinctions when speaking about the knowledge that Christ's human intellect possessed. The first type of knowledge, they said, was intuitive, derived from the vision of God that explained Christ's relation to the Father (Jn 1:18; 3:11, 32); the second was infused knowledge, which they said explained Christ's knowledge of the future (Lk 2:46; Mk 13:24–26; Mt 7:28–29); and the third was acquired knowledge, which explained his growth in knowledge (Lk 2, 40, 52).

At times, these distinctions were applied to the Virgin Mary—for example, in the passages dealing with finding Jesus in the temple (Lk 2:48) and her request at CANA OF GALILEE (Jn 2:5). Questions arose about the Virgin Mary's knowledge at the time she made the consent to the Archangel GABRIEL at the ANNUNCIATION (Lk 1:38). St. THOMAS AQUINAS wrote that the redemption of mankind depended upon the consent of the Virgin Mary (Summa theologiae, 3a, q. 30, a. 1), and that "the one who gave birth to the only-begotten Son, full of grace and truth, received the greater privileges of grace than all others" (3a, q. 27, a. 1). This teaching is also found in the writings of Pope PIUS X and Pope PIUS XII: "Who could better than His Mother have an open knowledge of the admirable mysteries of the birth and childhood of Christ, and above all of the mystery of the Incarnation, which is the beginning and the foundation of faith?" (Ad Diem illum laetissimum 1904, 7; Mystici Corporis Christi 1943, 110). Some writers held that, at the moment of the Annunciation, Mary received special graces, a type of infused knowledge concerning the divinity of her son (Roschini, Martinelli, and Connell, in Connell 1957). Scripture makes no reference to the type of knowledge the Virgin Mary possessed, and little was said in the Patristic era. St. AUGUSTINE expressed the traditional belief: "She had already conceived Him in her mind before conceiving Him in her womb" (Patrologia Latina, 38, 937).

FAITH, especially after the Protestant Reformation, was considered a type of conceptual knowledge, that is, belief in the revealed truths. Faith, however, is "first of all a personal adherence of man to God," while, at the same time, it is the "free assent to the whole truth that God has revealed" (Catechism of the Catholic Church, 150). Contemporary authors speak of the "knowledge of faith." Mary believed that the things promised to her by the LORD would be accomplished (Luke 1:45): "It was the knowledge of faith, of perfect faith, but not vision, not continuous ecstasy. It was a kind of knowledge which became her Jewish character, her upbringing, and culture, her singular personality, her sex, her unique experience, intuitive, experiential, filling her whole existence, integral to her entire conduct" (O'Carroll 1982, p. 214).

At VATICAN COUNCIL II, one of the concerns addressed in the first Marian schema dealt with Mary's knowledge at the Annunciation. The texts of Vatican II do not rule out the possibility that, at that moment, the Virgin Mary received a personal communication from God, but they underscore her wholehearted acceptance of God's word. At the Annunciation, it was "the Virgin Mary, who at the message of the angel received the Word of God in her heart and in her body and gave Life to the world." (Lumen gentium 1964, 53). "The Father of mercies willed that the Incarnation should be preceded by assent on the part of the predestined mother, so that just as a woman had a share in bringing about death, so also a woman should contribute to life" (Lumen gentium, 56).

Vatican II also presented the Virgin Mary as "type" of the Church and its "outstanding model in faith and charity" (Lumen gentium, 53). Pope PAUL VI's APOSTOLIC EXHORTATION Marialis cultus (On Marian Devotion, 1974) spoke of the exemplary value of Mary for the Church. In her person, she manifests for the whole Church, the "absolute union with Christ" that is the heart of worship, and, for that reason, she is the exemplar or "model of the spiritual attitude with which the Church celebrates and lives the divine mysteries" (Marialis cultus, 16). The pope continues: "She is held up as example to the faithful rather for the way in which, in her own particular life, she fully and responsibly accepted the will of God (cf. Luke 1:38), because she heard the word of God and acted on it, and because charity and a spirit of service were the driving force of her actions" (Marialis cultus, 35).

In his ENCYCLICAL Redemptoris mater (Mother of the Redeemer, 1987), Pope JOHN PAUL II spoke of Mary's faith at the Annunciation: "From the moment of the Annunciation … Mary, she, his mother, is in contact with the truth about her Son only in faith and through faith" (18). Mary advanced in her "pilgrimage of faith," especially in the "many years, lived in intimacy with the mystery of her Son." But this faith also experienced the dark night: "Through this faith Mary is perfectly united with Christ in his self-emptying.... At the foot of the Cross Mary shares through faith in the shocking mystery of this self-emptying. This is perhaps the deepest 'kenosis' of faith in human history" (Redemptoris mater, 18). The key to Mary's religious experience, and her blessedness, is her faith. "All those who from generation to generation accept the apostolic witness of the Church share in that mysterious inheritance and in a sense share in Mary's faith," according to John Paul II (Redemptoris mater, 27).

The Catechism of the Catholic Church (CCC) speaks of faith as the only way in which the mysterious ways of God's almighty power can be understood: "The Virgin Mary is the supreme model of this faith, for she believed that 'nothing will be impossible with God' and was able to magnify the Lord: 'For he who is mighty has done great things for me, and holy is his name'" (CCC, 273). The "obedience of faith" is to hear God's word. Faith is "to submit freely to the word of God that has been heard, because its truth is guaranteed by God, who is Truth itself. Abraham is a model of such obedience in the Sacred Scripture. The Virgin Mary is its most perfect embodiment" (CCC, 144).

III. MARY AND THE CHURCH

In the modern development of MARIOLOGY, considerable interest is focused on the relationship between Mary and the Church. The intimate connection between the Blessed Virgin and the Church, however, is not new. Support for Mary's relation to the Church can be found in both Scripture (e.g., Jn 19:26–27, Acts 1:14 and Rev 12:17) and Patristic literature (see Gambero 1999, pp. 71, 124–125, 163–164, 198–199, 222–225; Haffner 2004, pp. 244–245; and Llamas 2007, p. 554). Many Church fathers taught that, as the Virgin Mary is the mother of CHRIST, so also the Church is the virginal mother of men. Their reflections were deeply influenced by their perception of the likeness that both Our Lady and the Church have with EVE, mother of all the living. In a similar manner, numerous medieval authors made use of the Mary-Church parallelism (see Gambero 2005, pp. 39–40, 48–49, 70–71, 125–129, 171–173, 180–181, 188–189, 212–213, and 311–312). They presented the Blessed Virgin as the image and type of the Church, her most eminent member and her loving mother. Theologians in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries revived this theme, convinced that the analogy between Mary and the Church, far from being a secondary theme on the surface of Catholic teaching, is necessary for understanding the dogma of the REDEMPTION. The popes, from the time of PIUS IX (r. 1846–1878), have also invoked the assistance of Mary in the face of modern challenges, and they "have entrusted the life and activities of the Church to the Virgin Mary" (Llamas 2007, p. 561).

Madonna with the Serpent. Mary and the Child Jesus, together, crush the head of the serpent. THE ART ARCHIVE/GALLERIA BORGHESE ROME/DAGLI ORTI/THE PICTURE DESK, INC.

At Vatican II, the original plan was to have a separate document on Mary. Among the original draft titles were Mary, Mother of Jesus and Mother of the Church and The Blessed Virgin Mary, Mother of the Church (O'Carroll 2000, pp. 352–353). In the fall of 1963, however, a group of the Council Fathers proposed that the draft text or schema on Mary be incorporated into the constitution on the Church rather than stand as a separate document. After considerable discussion, a vote was taken, and, by a simple majority (1,114 to 1,074, with some spoiled votes), it was decided to include the schema on Mary in the constitution on the Church (O'Carroll 2000, p. 353), forming the basis of what would become Lumen gentium, chapter eight (nos. 52–69).

In what follows, Mary's intimate relation to the Church will first be considered in light of her maternity, virginity, holiness, and coredemptive mission. Then, attention will be given to Mary and the Church in Vatican II and the postconciliar Church.

Maternity of Mary and the Church. In the supernatural order, the Mother of Christ is also the mother of the Church and therefore of all the members of the Mystical Body. Mary's basic relationship to the Church is maternal. This truth is taught by St. PIUS X in his ENCYCLICAL, Ad Diem illum laetissimum (1904). By the very fact that the Blessed Virgin is the mother of Christ, the head, she is the mother of the whole Body.

The Church, too, is the mother of men, for from her they receive supernatural life and education. The Church is the mother of men mainly by the administration of the Sacraments. Mary is the mother of men because grace, which is conferred by the Sacraments, is deposited in the treasury of the Church through her cooperation in Christ's redemptive sacrifice. In comparing Mary's spiritual motherhood with that of the Church, one perceives that the former is the nobler and is the source of the latter. But these two mothers do not have separate families or give birth to different children. They have the same sons and daughters whom they cherish with a common love. Mary brings forth the whole Body of Christ, the Church, which is also the mother of Christ's members.

The New Eve. The Fathers developed the theme of the new Eve in their reflections on recapitulation, which is prominent in St. IRENAEUS. GOD's plan had been clear from the outset: a man and a woman, ADAM and Eve, were to transmit the supernatural life of grace to all mankind. Restoration of the plan that had been compromised by sin was to be made by another man and another woman. That man is JESUS CHRIST, the new Adam. A woman also had to have a place in the restoration; from an early period, the FATHERS OF THE CHURCH recognized this woman. The new Eve is Mary and the Church.

Evil and death were introduced into the world by the disobedience of the first Eve. The second Eve is the Church, formed from the side of the second Adam sleeping in death on the cross, as the first Eve had been formed from the side of the sleeping Adam (cf. Catechism of the Catholic Church, 766, citing St. AMBROSE). But the new Eve as a definite person who repaired by her obedience what the first Eve had devastated by her disobedience is Mary. Thus both Mary and the Church are celebrated in TRADITION as the new Eve, mother of all who live the new life brought by Christ. As Eve contributed to the ruin of men, Mary and the Church contribute to their Redemption.

Later ages made a further application. Because Mary is mother of all the living, she is associated with her Son in His redemptive work. The consent that she freely gave at the ANNUNCIATION to be the mother of Christ was enlivened anew at the CRUCIFIXION. By cooperating in the redeeming sacrifice, she became the new Eve in the most perfect sense, source of men's life, mother of the Body as she is mother of the head.

Virginity of Mary and the Church. From ancient times, Mary, mother and virgin, has been likened to the Church, which is also mother and virgin. Yet this comparison involves differences as well as similarities. Mary is the mother of Christ; the Church is the mother of Christians who are "other Christs." Mary is literally a virgin; the Church is virginal because it has never adulterated the faith but has always been true to Christ. Maternity and virginity are literal for Mary, but analogous and metaphorical for the Church.

In Judeo-Christian writings, a virgin is a person or a community that is dedicated to God and remains faithful to Him. In the Old Testament, union with God consecrates virginity and at the same time makes it maternally fruitful as long as ISRAEL does not abandon its divine bridegroom for false gods. Virginity is fidelity; heresy and apostasy are adultery. Union with God hallows virginity by enriching it with fecundity; its fruit is imperishable life. As applied to the Church, virginity is linked with the purity of faith. The very maternity of the Church is virginal because, loyal in faith and undefiled by heresy, it brings forth God's children by the activity of the Holy Spirit.

When the Biblical notion of virginity refers to persons, it implies bodily integrity, especially as a sign of spiritual fidelity and complete consecration to God. Mary, virgin of virgins, is the ideal of all virginity. According to Catholic tradition, she conceived and bore her Son with unimpaired virginity by the action of the Holy Spirit (see Lumen gentium, no. 57). Her spiritual maternity, too, is wholly virginal; like Christ, the members of His Body, the Church, are born of Mary as children of God solely by the Holy Spirit's power.

The virginity of the Church illuminates the virginity of Our Lady. The Church is not only one flesh, but one spirit, with Christ (1 Cor 6:17). Though real, the union is spiritual and mystical. Similarly, Mary's virginity is not only the absence of carnal association with any man but also is her spiritual and mystical union with God. By the perfection of its virginity, therefore, the Church draws very close to the virginal Mother of God.

Holiness of Mary and the Church. As the virginity of the Church helps one to understand Mary's virginity, so Mary's holiness assists one to grasp the HOLINESS OF THE CHURCH. The sanctity of both is caused by the same grace of God. The main difference lies in the receptivity of Mary and the Church. No refusal or reluctance ever marred Mary's acceptance of God's advances, but the Church is a collectivity of men and women who never hold their souls completely open to God's generosity.

All men are called to holiness in the Church. The Church is holy because it has received from God the means of holiness, faith, and the Sacraments, which produce holiness in the members. However, although the Church is entirely holy, its members are subject to defects and sins that hamper the diffusion of its holiness. A comparison between Mary's holiness and the holiness of the Church reveals Mary's superiority. She was redeemed by way of preservation, and her IMMACULATE CONCEPTION implied her freedom from concupiscence. But the Church is formed of members who all, with the exception of Mary, contract original sin. Consequently, although they are purified from all guilt by BAPTISM, they are burdened with the weight of concupiscence, which slows down the growth of grace.

The Blessed Virgin's progress in sanctity was constant and rapid. Her whole life and all her actions were unfailingly directed toward God. She mounted from holiness to holiness, always full of grace, because each grace increased her capacity for further grace, which promptly filled her soul to repletion. The Church also grows in grace, aspiring to the full stature of Christ (Eph 4:13). But the Church is an assembly of sinners, who must unceasingly repent and be converted anew; its progress is impeded by the members' sluggish response to grace.

Sanctity flowers into glory and resurrection, the final triumph. On Earth the Church plods along in the order of terrestrial holiness, with all its setbacks; in heaven, it has not yet attained resurrection, the ultimate radiation of holiness. But Mary is now in glory; prior to the Church, she was taken up to heaven, body and soul. Yet her Assumption, coming at the climax of her last fullness of grace, prefigures and anticipates the assumption of the Church. Thus the Blessed Virgin, who excels the Church by her Immaculate Conception and by her progress in sanctity, also precedes it by her resurrection.

Coredemptive Mission of Mary and the Church. Mary's maternal relation to Christ's person has occupied the attention of theologians for centuries; in the twentieth century, they concentrated on her relation to her Son's work. They sought a clearer insight into the part God assigned to the Blessed Virgin and to the Church in the economy of salvation.

As representative and personification of the Church, Mary collaborated with Christ in the three great steps of the mystery of Redemption: the INCARNATION, the CROSS, and the Resurrection. Both Mary and the Church have a redemptive mission, but Mary's was exercised on an essentially higher level than that of the Church. God's Son became man that the Redemption might be a human as well as a divine achievement. But from the beginning, He required the consent of the human race and the donation of its flesh and blood. Mary, acting in the name of all mankind, gave that consent and donation.

During the first phase of her salvific activity, Mary preceded the Church. In response to God's proposal, she replied: "Behold the handmaid of the Lord" (Lk 1:38). St. THOMAS AQUINAS says that her consent was given in the name of the whole human race (Summa theologiae, 3a, q.30, a. 1), and this insight has been consecrated by the TEACHING AUTHORITY OF THE CHURCH: "In the name of the entire human race, she gave her consent for a spiritual marriage between the Son of God and human nature" (Leo XIII, Octobri mense, 1891; Denzinger-Hünermann, 3274*;* Pius XII, Mystici corporis, 1943, no. 110).

The activity exercised by the Blessed Virgin at the time of the conception and birth of Christ was carried on all during her life and reached its culmination on CALVARY. In His supreme hour of sacrifice, the REDEEMER drew His mother into His suffering to associate her with His redeeming act. He received her dedication, love, and merits and integrated her agony into His own PASSION to offer them to the Father for the salvation of mankind.

Mary's suffering endowed her maternity over men with a new dimension. Her first childbearing, by which she became the mother of God, was, according to tradition, without pain; her second childbearing, by which she became fully the mother of sinners, was painful in the extreme (see Pius X, Ad Diem illum laetissimum, 1904, no. 24). While Jesus offered Himself in sacrifice for men's Redemption, His mother offered her Son for the same purpose and, thus by cooperating in men's birth to supernatural life, became in a heightened sense the mother of the Church.

The Mother's contribution to the work of Redemption far surpasses that of the Church. Not only did she precede the Church during Christ's mortal life, but she also was integrated into the very Passion that procured men's reconciliation with God. She who was one with her Son at the Incarnation was one with Him at the moment of Redemption. The activity of the Church is exercised on the lower plane of application of the merits and atonement of Calvary.

A second phase of Mary's salvific mission extended from PENTECOST to the Assumption. During this period she lived in the Church as its first and most important member and, by her intercession and merits, collaborated in applying the Redemption. She had preceded the Church but was now in the Church, without official voice in its councils. Her hand did not hold the keys of the kingdom, but her prayers sustained the APOSTLE's hands that held them. She conferred no Sacraments, but their power derives from the sacrifice of the Cross, in which she had her part.

During the final phase of her mediatory activity, from her Assumption to the end of the world, Mary again goes before the Church, assists it with supernatural aid, and awaits its triumph. The mystery of Christ's Resurrection and ASCENSION is the culmination of the mystery of Redemption. The Church is included in the mystery and has, in its head, inaugurated its own resurrection. Mary has already risen; the resurrection of the collective Church at the end of time is personified in her, whose Assumption is the prelude of the future bodily victory of the rest of men.

Mary's coredemptive activity, obviously, has no gap to bridge in her Son's redemptive work. All she has, she received from Christ. What she received was power to act with the Redeemer for mankind's salvation. She stands next to the Redeemer as coredemptress subordinate to Him, and she can act only in dependence on Him. But dependence does not exclude productivity. Mary's redemptive office is wholly derived from Christ, for it is the cooperation of a subordinate associate that supposes His activity; yet she truly acts with Him.

Vatican II and Beyond. VATICAN COUNCIL II's Marian doctrine in the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (Lumen gentium, chapter 8) was most significant for the renewal of Mariology. As noted above, the Council Fathers voted on October 29, 1963, in favor of making the Marian schema a part of the document on the Church. The very title of the chapter, "The Blessed Virgin Mary, Mother of God, in the Mystery of Christ and the Church," placed her in close relationship with her Son (Christocentric Mariology) and with his Mystical Body (ecclesiotypical Mariology). This is the proper setting in which to assess Mary's role in the work of Redemption. The true ecumenical importance of the Council's decision is derived not from minimizing her place in Catholic faith and piety, but from emphasizing a sharing-oriented Mariology instead of a privilege-centered one. Under the impetus of Vatican II, the theology of Mary stresses that her special graces and prerogatives are primarily for the sake of her Son and his redeemed-redeeming Body, the Church. Divine Revelation about Mary makes the central mysteries of faith more intelligible and meaningful for Christian living.

The Christocentric and ecclesiotypical emphases of contemporary Mariology are mutually complementary rather than in conflict. Mary cannot be related to Christ without being intimately associated with the ecclesial Body that he received through his redemptive activity. At the same time, she is the archetype of the Church only because her unique relationship with Christ is the basis for the Church's share in his redeeming work (see Semmelroth 1963, esp. pp. 80–88). Consequently, concentration upon the ecclesiotypical significance of Marian doctrine and devotion should not obscure their basic Christocentric character.

Theologians in the twenty-first century are more inclined to include the Mary-Church analogy within the basic Marian idea or fundamental principle of Mariology. "Her concrete motherhood with regard to Christ, the redeeming God-man, freely accepted in faith—her fully committed divine motherhood—this is both the key to the full understanding of the Marian mystery and the basic Mariological principle, which is concretely identical with Mary's objectively and subjectively unique state of being redeemed" (Schillebeeckx 1964, p. 106). Within one organic principle, the two emphases are contained, that is, both the Christocentric (Mary's "fully committed divine motherhood") and the ecclesiotypical (her "objectively and subjectively unique state of being redeemed"). Her vocation to be the mother of the WORD INCARNATE must be considered in close connection with the graces that reveal her calling to be the prototype of the Church.

Divine Maternity. That Mary's motherhood of Christ is both bridal and virginal has rich ecclesiotypical significance (see Semmelroth 1963, esp. pp. 117–142). Her vocal fiat of free consent at the Annunciation and her silent fiat at the foot of the Cross make Mary the spiritual bride of the Redeemer. In her compassion she received the fruits of her Son's sacrifice both for her own redemption and for that of the whole Church. Concomitantly, and as a result of this creative receptivity to grace, her bridal motherhood is also virginal. Her maternal fruitfulness did not come from human power but from the breath of the Holy Spirit. Had she conceived Christ other than as a virgin, her bridal relationship with the LOGOS Incarnate would have been obscured. Without her perpetual virginity, the revelation of her complete and continuous fidelity to Christ and His messianic mission would have been blurred. Mary, then, is the archetype of the Church, as the Church is also the virginal bride of Christ. As the community of persons redeemed by Him, the Church is called to be constantly faithful to his word. The Immaculate Conception is the perfect exemplar of a grace-filled Church. As the sacramental community called to mediate Redemption to the world, the Church also portrays the bridal motherhood of Mary. The Assumption makes her "the sign of sure hope, and comfort for the pilgrim people of God" (Lumen gentium, nos. 68–69). All the Marian dogmas, therefore, converge toward a theological and prayerful contemplation of Mary as the archetype of the Church.

As bridal and virginal mothers, both Mary and the Church are to be dynamically united with the Holy Spirit. The sole source of their spiritual fecundity is the abiding presence and activity of the risen LORD's Spirit. A closer connection between Mariology and Pneumatology (the theology of the Holy Spirit) is contributing greatly to a balanced CHRISTOLOGY, ECCLESIOLOGY, and Christian anthropology. Along these lines, mention should be made of the contribution of Hans Urs von BALTHASAR (1905–1988), who synthesized anthropology, Mariology, ecclesiology, and Pneumatology in his articulation of the "Marian profile" of the Church. In his 1988 APOSTOLIC letter, Mulieris dignitatem, Pope JOHN PAUL II spoke of Mary as "the figure" of the Church, and he noted that the Church is both "Marian" and "Apostolic-Petrine," making specific reference to Balthasar's contribution (no. 27, footnote 55). Other theologians, like Angelo Cardinal Scola (1941–), the Patriarch of Venice, have drawn upon the writings of both Balthasar and John Paul II to give prominence to role of Mary in an "ecclesiology of communion."

New Eve. A portion of the patristic patrimony common to East and West is the image of Mary as the New Eve. Its rediscovery, under the special inspiration of Cardinal Newman's Marian writings, led to a renewed research into the witness of the Fathers who made use of this image in their teaching about Mary. After the Scriptures, it reflects the most ancient meditation upon Mary and is a very fertile source of the Mary-Church analogy and typology. The National Conference of Catholic Bishops (NCCB) in the pastoral on the Blessed Virgin Mary points out: "Even more anciently, the Church was regarded as the 'New Eve.' The Church is the bride of Christ, formed from his side in the sleep of death on the cross, as the first Eve was formed by God from the side of the sleeping Adam" (NCCB 41; cf. Catechism of the Catholic Church, 766). From her earliest days, the Church has seen herself symbolized in Mary and has come to understand her mysterious self more profoundly in light of Mary as archetype. Mary personifies all that the Church is and hopes to become. Citing St. Ambrose, Lumen gentium refers to the Mother of God as "a type of the Church in the order of faith, charity and perfect union with Christ" (no. 63) and notes that "in the most holy Virgin the Church has already reached that perfection whereby she is without spot or wrinkle" (no. 65; cf. Catechism of the Catholic Church, 867).

The impact of an ecclesiotypical Mariology upon Marian devotion has been most salutary. Pope PAUL VI in his APOSTOLIC EXHORTATION for the right ordinary and development of devotion to the Blessed Virgin Mary stated: "She is worthy of imitation because she was the first and most perfect of Christ's disciples. All of this has a permanent and universal exemplary value" (Marialis cultus, no. 35). John Paul II, in numerous writings and addresses, held up Mary as the "model" and "figure" of the Church and the Mother of all the faithful (Redemptoris mater, nos. 25–28). In a special way, he stressed Mary as the figure of the Church as both mother and virgin and the embodiment of "spousal love" (Mulieris dignitatem, no. 22). In his final Encyclical, Ecclesia de eucharistia (2003), John Paul II highlighted Mary as the "Woman of the Eucharist" (nos. 53–57), thereby accentuating her importance in the life of the Church, "which draws her life from the Eucharist" (no. 1). In this respect, John Paul II's Mariology and ecclesiology harmonizes (in some ways) with "the Eucharistic ecclesiology" of Eastern Orthodox theologians such as Metropolitan John Zizioulas (1931–).

Both John Paul II and his successor, BENEDICT XVI, have entrusted the life of the Church, in a special way, to Mary. John Paul II saw Mary as "the woman" spoken of in Genesis 3:15 and Revelation 12:1 who "is present in the Church as Mother of the Redeemer," assisting the PEOPLE OF GOD in "that monumental struggle against the powers of darkness" (Redemptoris mater, no. 47; cf. Gaudium et spes, no. 37). Pope Benedict XVI invoked Mary's assistance at the very beginning of his pontificate, and he has spoken of Mary as "the Bride of the Spirit" who possesses "a universal motherhood of all those who are generated by God through faith in Jesus Christ." This is why Mary, for all generations, "is an image and model of the Church which together with the Spirit journeys through time, invoking Jesus' glorious return: 'Come, Lord Jesus' (cf. Rev 22:17, 20)" (Marian Vigil for the Conclusion of the Month of May, May 30, 2009). Benedict XVI, in anticipation of the 150th anniversary of the apparitions at LOURDES, recognized Mary, in a particular way, as the Mater Dolo- rosa, who, in association with the passion of Christ, "suffers with those who are in affliction; with them she hopes, and she is their comfort, supporting them with her maternal help" (Message for the Sixteenth World Day of the Sick, January 11, 2008, no. 2).

IV. MEDIATRIX OF ALL GRACES

By Mary's mediation Catholics designate, in general, Our Lady's unique share in the soteriological, or saving, mission of her Son. The belief of the faithful in this Marian role has found expression in Christian literature in a variety of ways from time immemorial. The genesis of the title Mediatrix itself, as applied to the Mother of God, is rather obscure. Perhaps the earliest sure witnesses are St. ANDREW OF CRETE (d. 740), St. Germanus of Constantinople (d. 733), and St. Tarasius (d. c. 807). From the East, the title was introduced into the literature of the West around the ninth century through a translation by PAUL THE DEACON of the Life of Theophilus, in which the term is used. From the twelfth century on, it was applied to Our Lady with ever-increasing frequency until it became generally accepted in the seventeenth century.

Generally speaking, a mediator interposes his good services between two physical or moral persons to facilitate an exchange of favors (e.g., an alliance). In most cases, the mission of a mediator is to reconcile parties at variance. Catholic theology applies the title Mediatrix to Our Lady for three reasons. First, because, owing to her divine motherhood and plenitude of grace, she occupies a middle position in the hierarchy between the Creator and His creatures. This is known as her ontological mediation. Second, during her earthly career she contributed considerably, through specific holy acts, to the reconciliation between GOD and man brought about by the SAVIOR. Third, through her powerful intercession in heaven, she obtains for her spiritual children all the graces that God deigns to bestow on them. The last two phases constitute Mary's moral mediation. It should be borne in mind, however, that the mere use of the term Mediatrix need not always convey the above threefold meaning. In the more ancient writers, that expression is restricted sometimes to the first, sometimes to the third phase of Mary's mediatorial office. The exact meaning in each case must be determined by the context and parallel passages.

Mary at the Foot of the Cross. Christ stands alone as the Redeemer. The role of Mary as a participant in the Redemption is a topic of debate among theologians. CHRIST ON THE CROSS WITH THE VIRGIN, SAINT JOHN, AND SAINT DOMINIC (OIL ON CANVAS), TITIAN (TIZIANO VECELLIO) (C.1488-1576)/SAN DOMENICO, ANCONA, ITALY/ALINARI/THE BRIDGEMAN ART LIBRARY

Theologians are always careful to emphasize that Mary's mediation differs substantially from that of her Son. The latter is primary, self-sufficient, and absolutely necessary for men's salvation; the former is secondary, wholly dependent on Christ's, and only hypothetically necessary. However, Mary's mediation differs also, and indeed essentially, from that of other creatures (e.g., the angels, the saints, the priests of the New Testament). The latter avails only in particular cases and for particular graces; it is exercised dependent on Mary's will and exclusively in the sphere of the actual application of graces. The former is universal, dependent on Christ only, and has a definite bearing on the acquisition (meriting) of graces, as well as on their application.

The actual exercise of Our Lady's mediatorial function may now be considered. The two phases of her moral mediation are treated in two separate sections.

Our Lady's Coredemption. As indicated, the first aspect of Mary's moral mediation refers to her active and formal share in the redemptive work brought about by Our Lord while still on earth. To express this complex activity in one single word, Catholic theology has coined the Latin term Coredemptrix. This title first appears in Catholic literature toward the end of the fourteenth century (e.g., in an orationale of St. Peter's in Salzburg). It was used quite frequently during the seventeenth to nineteenth centuries. Because the HOLY SEE itself has made use of it in its documents [Acta Sanctae Sedis (ASS) 41 (1908) 409; Acta Apostolicae Sedis (AAS) 5 (1913) 364; 6 (1914) 108], Catholics no longer question its legitimacy.

Meanings Attached to the Term. Apart from the question of the term's appropriateness, theologians are divided as to the nature and extent of the doctrine conveyed by that title. Their views may be summarized as follows.

A first group claims that Our Lady, by knowingly and willingly making possible the coming of the Savior into the world, cooperated only remotely in the objective REDEMPTION. (Objective Redemption means the initial reconciliation of God and man as accomplished through the sacrifice of CALVARY.) Mary has, besides, a direct share in the subjective Redemption, that is, the dispensation of graces through which the objective Redemption is actually applied to individuals. The theologians of this group concede that Our Lady suffered and merited much for men's salvation during her life, but they contend that these sufferings and merits contributed not to bring about the Redemption itself but only to make it applicable to men. Such is the opinion of Henricus Lennerz, Werner Goossens, George D. Smith, and several others.

A second view, called the receptivity theory, has been advanced by a group of German theologians among whom Heinrich Maria Köster and Otto Semmelroth are the most prominent. According to them, Christ alone redeemed the human race. Mary, however, cooperated in the objective Redemption in the sense that at the foot of the cross she accepted the effects or the fruits of her Son's redemptive act and made them available to the members of the Mystical Body, whom she officially represented on Calvary. This theory has appealed to some outside of Germany (e.g., Clement Dillenschneider) as a plausible explanation of the relationship between Mary and the Church.

A third group, representing the vast majority of theologians, considers the above explanations insufficient and unsatisfactory. According to them, Our Lady is Coredemptrix because she cooperated directly and immediately in the redemptive process itself (i.e., the objective Redemption) and not merely in the application of its effects to individual souls. In this third view Christ and Mary constitute one single principle of salvation for the whole human race in such a way that the restoration of mankind to the friendship of God as consummated on Calvary was the result of their joint causality. This joint causality does not place Our Lady on the same level with the Savior. In the orbit of primary, independent, and self-sufficient causality, Christ remains utterly alone: men's only Redeemer. Mary's merits and satisfactions contributed to bring about objective Redemption only after the manner of a secondary cause and as deriving their redemptive value wholly from the infinite merits and satisfactions of her Son.

To justify this opinion, a few further clarifications are in order. The first truth to bear in mind is that, since Our Lady herself was redeemed by Christ, she could cooperate in the objective Redemption only after its effects had been applied to her. How could she cooperate to bring about something that had already produced its effects and that, therefore, God regarded as already accomplished? This becomes possible by distinguishing two logical stages (signa rationis, as the schoolmen say) in Christ's Redemption. First, He redeemed Mary alone with a preservative Redemption; then, together with her, in a subsequent logical stage (in signo posteriori rationis), He redeemed the rest of mankind with a liberative Redemption. Obviously, there is no chronological before and after in this process; merely a twofold acceptance of the Redemption on the part of the eternal Father, with a logical priority in favor of Mary.

Again, Our Lady's merits and satisfactions did not enhance the value of the infinite merits and satisfactions of her Son. Nevertheless, God accepted them as constituting a new title for granting pardon to the human race. Nothing prevents God from canceling men's debt in view of a twofold title, each of them operative in its own sphere. On the contrary, this divine disposition seems most fitting in the light of the Church's teaching, which considers Our Lady as the Savior's intimate partner and as man's official representative in God's redemptive alliance with mankind.

Does it follow from the above that Our Lady's cooperation was an essential element of the Redemption? Here a distinction is in order. Mary's share may have been essential in the sense that, without it, the Redemption would not have been what God decreed it to be. But it was not essential if it means that Christ's merits and satisfactions were, by themselves, insufficient to redeem men. Something analogous happens when the Christian cooperates with divine grace to perform some meritorious action. That cooperation is essential only insofar as it meets a divine requisite.

Of course, to establish that Mary's coredemption, as championed by the majority of theologians, is a true Catholic doctrine resulting from divine revelation, it is not sufficient to show that it is theologically possible and even fitting. Two further questions remain to be answered. Is it also attested to in the sources of revelation—Sacred Scripture and divine TRADITION? Is it accepted by the Magisterium, or TEACHING AUTHORITY OF THE CHURCH, as pertaining to the deposit of revelation?

Papal Teaching. Recent popes, beginning with LEO XIII in his Rosary encyclical Jucunda semper (1894), have expressed their views on this question with ever-increasing forcefulness. The classic passage is from BENEDICT XV's apostolic letter Inter sodalicia (1918), wherein he states: "To such an extent did [Mary] suffer and almost die with her suffering and dying Son, and to such an extent did she surrender her maternal rights over her Son for man's salvation, and immolated Him—insofar as she could—in order to appease the justice of God, that we may rightly say that she redeemed the human race together with Christ" [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 10 (1918) 182]. In a radio broadcast by PIUS XI (April 28, 1935) one finds the following words addressed to Our Lady: "O Mother of love and mercy, who, when thy dearest Son was consummating the Redemption of the human race on the altar of the Cross, didst stand by Him, suffering with Him as a Coredemptrix ... preserve in us, we beseech thee, and increase day by day the precious fruit of His Redemption and of thy compassion" (L'Osservatore Romano, April 29–30, 1935). In his encyclical Haurietis aquas (May 15, 1956) PIUS XII affirms unequivocally that "in bringing about the work of human Redemption, the Most Blessed Virgin Mary was, by the will of God, so indissolubly associated with Christ, that our salvation proceeded from the love and sufferings of Jesus Christ intimately joined with the love and sorrows of His Mother" [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 48 (1956) 352].

The Second Vatican Council, while not explicitly adopting the expression Coredemptrix, taught the doctrine: "So also the Blessed Virgin advanced in her pilgrimage of faith, and faithfully bore with her union with her Son even to the cross, where, in accord with the divine plan, she stood, vehemently grieved with her Only-Begotten, and joined herself to His Sacrifice with a motherly heart, lovingly consenting to the immolation of the Victim born of her" (Lumen gentium 58; cf. 61). Pope JOHN PAUL II explicitly used the expression Coredemptrix on at least half a dozen occasions. The most important and often cited was on January 31, 1985, in an address at the Marian shrine in Guayaquil, Ecuador:

> The silent journey that begins with her Immaculate Conception and passes through the "yes" of Nazareth, which makes her the Mother of God, finds on Calvary a particularly important moment. There also, accepting and assisting at the sacrifice of her Son, Mary is the dawn of Redemption... Crucified spiritually with her crucified Son (cf. Gal 2:20), she contemplated with heroic love the death of her God, she lovingly consented to the immolation of this Victim which she herself had brought forth.... In fact, at Calvary she united herself with the sacrifice of her Son that led to the foundation of the Church; her maternal heart shared to the very depths the will of Christ "to gather into one all the dispersed children of God" (Jn 11:52).... In fact, Mary's role as Coredemptrix did not cease with the glorification of her Son. (Insegnamenti di Giovanni Paolo II 8/1 1985, 318–319)

The CATECHISM OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH (CCC) stated that Mary was "associated more intimately than any other person in the mystery of His redemptive suffering" (CCC 618; cf. Lk 2:35).

Sacred Scripture. Interpreted in the light of papal pronouncement, Sacred Scripture itself lends weight to the doctrine under discussion. The words addressed by almighty God to the devil in the Garden of EDEN, "I will put enmity between you and the woman, between your seed and her seed," (Gn 3:15), are generally cited by Catholic theologians as a pertinent Biblical argument. They see in the singular struggle between Christ and SATAN, as related in the text, a prophetic announcement of the Savior's redemptive work. Because "the woman" spoken of is the mother of Christ in a true Biblical sense, as PIUS IX and Pius XII interpret it, and because her struggle with Satan is identical with her Son's, as Pius IX states, it follows that the prophecy foreshadows also Our Lady's coredemptive mission.

Another relevant passage is the ANNUNCIATION pericope. By her generous fiat to the angel's proposal (Lk 1:38), Our Lady willingly and knowingly made possible the redemptive INCARNATION of the divine WORD, and thus may be said to have formally participated in the soteriological mystery that was then being inaugurated. SIMEON's prophecy furnishes an insight into the concrete manner in which she was to share in that mystery: "And thy own soul a sword shall pierce" (Lk 2:35). This allusion to Mary's compassion found its dramatic fulfillment as she stood by the cross of her dying Son, sharing His bitter agony for the salvation of mankind. It was then that the Savior, pointing to St. JOHN, addressed Our Lady saying: "Woman, behold thy son" (Jn 19:27). Recent popes, particularly Leo XIII in his encyclical Adiutricem populi (1895), have seen in the beloved disciple a representative of all the redeemed, and they have for this reason interpreted Christ's words to Our Lady as a proclamation of her spiritual motherhood of men. Since the regeneration of mankind to the life of grace was brought about by Christ precisely by means of His redemptive act, theologians reason that Mary's direct share in the former is inconceivable without her direct cooperation in the latter.

Tradition. If Biblical passages in support of the coredemption are relatively meager, the data yielded by Catholic Tradition, as a whole, are copious indeed. As in the case of so many other doctrinal theses, this one also had rather modest beginnings, but gradually attained its full development through an ever-increasing awareness of its implications. Chronologically, the first germ of the doctrine may be traced to the striking antithetical parallelism between Mary and EVE, so frequently described by ancient writers, specifically St. IRENAEUS of Lyons (d. c. 202). Contrasting the episode of the Fall with the scene of the Annunciation, they pointed out that, just as the first woman, through her disobedience, had shared ADAM's responsibility in the original prevarication, so likewise Mary, through her voluntary surrender to God's designs, was instrumental in bringing about men's supernatural rehabilitation in Christ. It is scarcely likely, however, that these early writers intended to attribute to Mary an immediate cooperation in the objective Redemption. They seem to signify exclusively her conscious role in bringing the Savior into the world. At the end of the tenth century in the East and the first half of the twelfth in the West, the strictly soteriological character of Mary's cooperation began to receive explicit notice, due particularly to the intervention of John the Geometer (c. 989) and Arnold of Chartres (d. 1156), respectively. The latter's remarkable teaching on this point actually became a locus classicus in the Marian literature of subsequent centuries. By the beginning of the eighteenth century, virtually every aspect of Mary's coredemption (merit, satisfaction, ransom, sacrifice) had been studied at some length, and the doctrine accepted quite generally in its present formulation. The JESUITS Ferdinand Q. de Salazar (d. 1646) and Maximilian Reichenberger (c. 1677), the Franciscans Roderick de Portillo (c. 1630) and Charles del Moral (d. 1731), the Augustinian Bartholomew de los Rios (d. 1652), and the Dominican Lazarus Dassier (d. 1692) are only a few of those deserving of mention for their notable contribution in this connection.

From that time on, particularly in the decades of the mid-twentieth century, the theory of Mary's coredemption in the strict sense had won so many adherents that it was rightly regarded as the opinion of the vast majority of theologians. After centuries of careful analysis and theological reflection, the complex doctrine, which had such modest beginnings in Christian antiquity, entered its final phase of scientific systematization. Indeed, in the judgment of some, the doctrine had attained sufficient maturity to be solemnly sanctioned by the ecclesiastical Magisterium. The first to voice these sentiments in an official petition to Pope Pius XII (November 26, 1951) was the Cuban hierarchy, headed by Cardinal Manuel Arteaga y Betancourt (1879–1963), archbishop of Havana.

Controverted Points. While awaiting the official pronouncement of the Church, the theologians who championed the theory of a strict coredemption divided among themselves concerning some secondary aspects of this doctrine. Thus, for example, a growing number of Mariologists hold (correctly, it seems) that Our Lady's soteriological merit was not merely based on fittingness (i.e., de congruo), as the majority still believe, but rather based on simple justice (de condigno ex mera condignitate). This latter is not to be confused with Christ's merit, which alone was condign in strict justice (de condigno ex rigore justitiae). The former involves a certain equality between the meritorious work performed and its reward, while the latter supposes, besides, an equality between the person giving the reward and the person meriting it.

Another phase of the coredemption that has given rise to prolonged discussion is the nature of Mary's share in the sacrifice of the cross qua sacrifice. Was her offering of the Victim on Calvary a sacrificial action in the proper sense? Some authors, such as Hermann Seiler, Giuseppe Petazzi, Emilio Sauras, and Marceliano Llamera, claim that it was. Others, following Narciso García Garcés, Gabriel M. Roschini, and Cornelis Friethoff, believe that it was a sacrificial action only in a broad sense. The Holy See, by repeatedly cautioning against the use of the controversial title Virgin-Priest given by some to Our Lady, seem to favor the latter view.

A third point of discrepancy concerns the exact relationship between Our Lady's soteriological actions and those performed by the Savior Himself. Precisely in what sense did Mary cooperate immediately with her Son to bring about the Redemption? Some theologians, such as Benoît Henri MERKELBACH, Seiler, and Paul Sträter, explain that Our Lady's will directly determined (i.e., had some influence on) her Son's will to perform His redemptive actions. Others, such as Domenico Bertetto, Rosaire Gagnebet, and Marie-Joseph Nicolas, contend that Our Lady's cooperation was redemptive, not because it directly influenced or determined the soteriological actions of Christ, but rather because Christ's actions conferred a redemptive value on her merits and satisfactions, thus enabling them to concur (in a subordinate though direct manner) in bringing about men's reconciliation with God in its initial phase (in actu primo). This second position seems better to safeguard the unencroachable rights of the unique Redeemer, without compromising Mary's immediate cooperation in His redemptive work.

Twenty-first Century Theology. In the early 2000s theology continued to take an interest in Mary's coredemptive role. Paul Haffner developed a theology of Marian coredemption starting from Our Lady's discipleship (The Mystery of Mary 2004, pp. 175–207). For Hans Urs von BALTHASAR, Mary had a coredemptive part to play, and the fact that the Son is accompanied by a witness to God's atoning action means that the revelation of the Trinity on the CROSS cannot be expounded on the basis of the Crucified Christ alone. This witness, the Mother of the Lord, is an icon of the fruitful receptivity by which the Son greets the love of the Father in the Holy Spirit. Because she witnesses in her poverty the humiliation of which the Magnificat speaks, standing behind sinners and with them, she is able to receive the measureless outpouring of the Son on the Cross in His sacrifice of praise and petition to the Father and receive it in such a way that she becomes the Bride of the Lamb and the Womb of the Church, in a nuptial relationship (Balthasar 1994, p. 358). René Laurentin explains that the expression Coredemptrix has been used by the popes and therefore requires respect. It would be gravely temerarious to attack its legitimacy (Laurentin 1951, p. 27ff). For Brunero Gherardini, the truth of Marian Coredemption meets totally and verifiably the conditions to be considered Church doctrine. Its foundation is indirect and implicit, yet solid, in the Scriptures; extensive in the Fathers and theologians; unequivocal in the Magisterium. It follows, therefore, that the Coredemption belongs to the Church's doctrinal patrimony (Gherardini 2002, pp. 37–48). Gherardini points out that, until now, no solemn dogmatic or ex cathedra definition of the Coredemption exists. Hence it is not, in the narrow sense, a truth of Faith. The Coredemption is a part of the Church doctrine because it is indirectly and derivatively ascribable to the sacred deposit. Consequently, the theological note proxima fidei (close to faith) is appropriate for this doctrine. This means it belongs to Revelation, and even if not explicit, it is beyond doubt. The term proxima fidei best synthesizes all the intrinsic and extrinsic considerations involved in study of the Coredemption: in particular its connection with Revelation and its presence, even if not in a formal manner, within the ecclesiastical Magisterium.

Dispensation of Graces through Mary. The second phase of Our Lady's moral mediation concerns her share in the actual distribution of graces, that is to say, in the enduring process of applying to individual persons the supernatural merits acquired by Christ (and secondarily by herself) through the redemptive work. This is what theologians designate as Mary's cooperation in the subjective Redemption.

Meaning. Briefly stated, the meaning of this Marian prerogative is that all favors God grants to all men are granted in view of and because of Our Lady's actual intervention. This causality of hers, which is totally subordinate to that of Christ in the same process, is universal in its beneficiaries and likewise from its object's point of view. Thus, Mary's mediatorial intervention affects every member of the human race with the sole exception of Christ and herself. To those living before the objective Redemption was accomplished, including Adam and Eve, God made graces available in view of Mary's future merits, which were eternally present to Him. To those living after the objective Redemption, graces are granted through Mary's secondary efficient causality. Her mediation is likewise universal in that it grants every single grace without exception: sanctifying grace, the infused virtues, the gifts of the Holy Spirit, all actual graces, and even favors of the natural order insofar as they are related to the supernatural order. Our Lady does not, of course, produce the sanctifying grace given to men through the Sacraments. She does, however, intervene in its infusion in a twofold manner: (1) remotely, inasmuch as that grace was merited by her (together with Christ) as coredemptrix; (2) proximately, inasmuch as the very desire to receive the Sacraments and the proper dispositions to do so worthily are made possible only through actual graces obtained through Mary's intercession.

Theologians differ concerning the precise nature of this causality. Some, such as Cardinal Alexis LÉPICIER, Édouard HUGON, Gabriel M. Roschini, and Réginald GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, designate it as physical instrumental. The majority, however, believe that it is a moral causality by way of intercession. The arguments in favor of a physical-instrumental causality are based mostly on the traditional references to Mary as the channel, aqueduct, almoner, and treasurer of grace. But the proponents of moral causality point out that because these are metaphors, they hardly support the theory in question. The manner, then, in which Our Lady discharges her office as dispensatrix of all graces is specifically her intercession. She intercedes for men either expressly, by actually asking God to bestow a certain grace on a certain person, or interpretatively, by presenting to God her previous merits on men's behalf. While it is highly commendable to implore Our Lady's intercession in prayers, it is not necessary to do so. The graces men obtain from God are granted through her intercession whether she is invoked or not. As spiritual mother of men, Our Lady in Heaven is well aware of their spiritual needs and ardently desires to help them. Being the mother of God, the queen of all creation, and the coredemptrix of mankind, her appeal on men's behalf is most efficacious and always produces the intended results.

Position of the Magisterium. That Our Lady intervenes in the distribution of all heavenly favors to all men emerges quite clearly from the teaching authority of the Church as represented especially by the popes of the past two centuries. Thus BENEDICT XIV, in the bull Gloriosae Dominae (1748), likens Mary to "a heavenly stream through which the flow of all graces and favors reach the soul of every wretched mortal" (Opera omnia 1846, 428). Among the frequent allusions made by Leo XIII to this doctrine, the passage in the encyclical Octobri mense (1891) is particularly trenchant. After recalling that God had not wished to become incarnate in Mary's womb without first obtaining her consent, the pope adds: "It may be affirmed with no less truth and precision that, by the will of God, absolutely no part of that immense treasure of every grace which the Lord amassed … is bestowed on us except through Mary" (ASS 1891, 195–196). St. Pius X in his encyclical Ad diem illum (1904), Benedict XV in his Inter sodalicia (1918), and Pius XII in his Superiore anno (1940) and Doctor mellifluus (1953) explicitly corroborate the traditional theme: it is the will of God that one obtain every grace through Mary.

Pope JOHN XXIII also expressed the Church's faith in Mary's universal mediation:

> For the faithful can do nothing more fruitful and salutary than to win for themselves the most powerful patronage of the Immaculate Virgin, so that by this most sweet Mother, there may be opened to them, all the treasures of the divine Redemption, and so they may have life, and have it more abundantly. Did not the Lord will that we have everything through Mary? (Epistle to Cardinal Agaganian 1959, 88)

The Second Vatican Council illustrated how Mary is mankind's Mother in the order of grace, and this motherhood in the economy of grace lasts without interruption from the consent that she gave in faith at the Annunciation, and which she unhesitatingly bore with under the cross, even to the perpetual consummation of all the elect. "For this reason, the Blessed Virgin Mary is invoked in the Church under the titles of Advocate, Auxiliatrix, Adiutrix, and Mediatrix. This however is to be so understood that it takes nothing away, or adds nothing to the dignity and efficacy of Christ the one Mediator" (Lumen gentium [LG] 1964, 62). Vatican II added that Mary's function as mother of men in no way obscures or diminishes this unique mediation of Christ, but rather shows its power. Therefore, far from being an obstacle to the exercise of Christ's unique mediation, Mary instead highlights its fruitfulness and efficacy. "The Blessed Virgin's salutary influence on men originates not in any inner necessity but in the disposition of God. It flows forth from the superabundance of the merits of Christ, rests on his mediation, depends entirely on it and draws all its power from it" (LG 60). Pope John Paul II has several times affirmed Mary's universal mediation and explained it in precise theological terms:

> Thus there is a mediation: Mary places herself between her Son and mankind in the reality of its wants, needs and sufferings. She puts herself "in the middle," that is to say, she acts as a Mediatrix not as an outsider, but in her position as mother. She knows that, as such, she can point out to her Son the needs of mankind and in fact, she "has the right" to do so. Her mediation is thus in the nature of intercession: Mary "intercedes" for mankind. (Redemptoris mater 1987, 21)

Liturgy. The liturgical books of the Church, always a reliable index of Catholic belief, faithfully echo the familiar strain found in papal documents. Thus the official prayer books of the Byzantines, Copts, Syrians, Armenians, and CHALDEANS abound in references to Mary's role as dispensatrix of all graces. As to the Latin liturgy, its most notable witness is embodied in the Office and Mass of Mary Mediatrix of All Graces. The text was composed by Joseph LEBON of the Catholic University of LOUVAIN at the suggestion of Cardinal Désiré Joseph MERCIER, archbishop of Malines, and approved by BENEDICT XV in 1921. The privilege to celebrate this feast on May 31 of each year was originally granted to the dioceses of Belgium, but it was soon extended to numerous other dioceses and religious orders throughout the world. When in 1954 Pius XII ordered the universal observance of Mary's queenship on May 31, the feast of Mary's mediation was discontinued by some and transferred by others. Since the revision of the calendar after the Second Vatican Council, the Feast of the Visitation is kept on May 31. In some calendars, Our Lady Mediatrix of All Graces is kept on May 24.

Scripture. What the popes and the liturgy proclaim in express terms, Sacred Scripture teaches by implication. It has been indicated above how the prophecy known as the Protoevangelium (Gn 3:15) already foreshadows the intimate association of Our Lady with her Son in the entire process of man's supernatural rehabilitation. Because the actual application of graces to the members of the Mystical Body is but the specific way in which they, as individuals, benefit from the redemptive work of the Savior, it seems logical to infer that Our Lady should have a share in it. In other words, if Our Lady, as coredemptrix, earned or acquired these graces with and under Christ, it is highly fitting that she should have a part in their actual dispensation to men. The unity of the divine plan would seem to demand it.

Another biblical passage bearing on the subject is Our Lord's testament from the cross (Jn 19:26–27), in which, according to the documents of recent popes, the Savior proclaimed His mother as mother of the entire human race. This motherhood of Mary implies a communication of grace (spiritual life) to her spiritual children, not only at the initial phase of regeneration on Calvary, but also in the subsequent process of conservation and development of that supernatural organism in the soul of her children.

Tradition. From the point of view of Tradition, the doctrine under discussion has undergone a gradual development reminiscent of other Marian theses. In the early period, or germinal stage, the doctrine was taught only implicitly by the numerous Fathers and ecclesiastical writers who portrayed Our Lady as the second Eve, the mother of all the living in the supernatural plane, the associate of Christ as Savior of mankind. Appropriate references may be found, for example, in St. Irenaeus (d. c. 202), St. Epiphanius (d. 403), St. JEROME (d. 420), St. AUGUSTINE (d. 430), and St. Modestus of Jerusalem (d. 634). The eighth century yields the explicit testimony of St. Germanus of Constantinople (d. 733), who assures that "there is no one to whom the gift of grace is given except through Mary." It was, however, through the influence of St. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX (d. 1153) that this doctrine became widely accepted during the MIDDLE AGES. His statement that "God has willed that we should have nothing that did not pass through the hands of Mary" became a familiar apothegm in the Marian literature of subsequent centuries. The Franciscan St. BERNARDINE OF SIENA (d. 1444), who shares with St. Bernard the title Doctor of Mary's Mediation, summarizes the teaching of his age in these words: "I do not hesitate to say that she [Mary] has received a certain jurisdiction over all graces.... They are administered through her hands to whom she pleases, when she pleases, as she pleases, and as much as she pleases." During the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries the doctrine was not only generally accepted but also the object of extensive treatment within both dogmatic theology and devotional literature. The leading champion of the Catholic thesis during that period was St. ALPHONSUS DE LIGUORI (d. 1787), whose classic treatise Glories of Mary contains a vigorous refutation of the objections raised by Lodovico Antonio MURATORI (d. 1750).

In the twentieth century those who contributed most to the clarification of Mary's role as mediatrix are the Spanish Jesuit José M. Bover (d. 1954) and Joseph Bittremieux of the University of Louvain (d. 1950). Despite a few scattered adversaries, the Church generally regarded the traditional doctrine as definable. Shortly after WORLD WAR I and on the initiative of Cardinal Mercier, numerous petitions addressed to the Holy See urged defining the doctrine as an article of faith. These requests multiplied toward the turn of the century. For example, the petition of the Cuban hierarchy (1951) urged Pius XII to define both Our Lady's coredemption and her actual intervention in the distribution of absolutely every grace.

Difficulties and Responses. Some proposed difficulties concerning a dogmatic definition of the Blessed Virgin Mary as Universal Mediatrix or Coredemptrix include, first, if this is a truth of faith, a definition seems unnecessary. A response is that the Immaculate Conception and Assumption were recognized truths, but were defined nonetheless. Others object that Marian Mediation and Coredemption are truths beyond any definition. An answer is that the Divine Maternity itself is directed to the spiritual maternity and to its exercise, just as the divine Word was made flesh to save us. The third difficulty touches the extent of Mary's mediation. Is she the Mother of angels too, or only of men; of sinners also, or only of the baptized who remain faithful? St. Paul's teaching concerning Christ's mediation provides an answer: "The Living God is the Savior of all men, especially of the believers" (1 Tim 4:10). The Marian transposition of the Pauline text by Vatican II in Lumen gentium 54 is clear. The Church also considers that Mary, exalted to divine motherhood in the order of hypostatic union, has merited, in dependence on Christ, for the angels, grace and glory. Following some Greek Fathers and St. Anselm, the Church considers a certain cosmic dimension of the Virgin's role in relation to all human and supernatural use in the universe. A fourth issue regards the ecumenical dimension of a definition: This definition would not constitute in itself an obstacle. Indeed, true Christian unity would not be possible without an agreement on Mary's spiritual motherhood, already held as a truth of faith by the Catholic Church. Also, a certain number of Anglicans and Protestants believe with the Orthodox the substance of the doctrine of spiritual motherhood, understood as unique and privileged cooperation of the Virgin with the economy of Redemption. Among those is Professor John Macquarrie in his Principles of Christian Theology (1966, p. 254), as well as in Mary for All Christians, where he explicitly approved the term Coredemptrix (Macquarrie 1990, p. 113). Finally, the question exists whether reflection on these truths has reached the degree of maturity necessary for its definition. A dogmatic definition would not necessarily entail technical discussions among theologians; it is not the custom with the supreme Magisterium of the Church to do so or to suppress the freedom of discussion among theologians in matters that are not of faith.

V. SPIRITUAL MATERNITY OF MARY

Of all the titles given to Mary by the faithful, there is none more common than the one used to indicate her spiritual Maternity—Mother. Paradoxically, however, there is perhaps no other prerogative of the Blessed Virgin that is less understood.

Two reasons may be advanced in explanation. There is, first of all, the nature of the terminology. When one calls Mary his Mother in the supernatural order, he is making use of analogy, a comparison between the divine and human levels. A failure to develop the full force of the comparison results in the deficient idea that Mary is spiritual Mother of men simply because of the love she has for them or because of her adoption of mankind at the foot of the Cross. Second, there is the neglect of an essential element of every maternity—a relationship with a person of the opposite sex. In the spiritual Maternity, this simply means the failure to associate Mary with Christ in the divine plan to give men spiritual life. Both of the above dangers have been avoided by the papal Magisterium.

Reality of the Spiritual Maternity. Since February 27, 1477, when Pope SIXTUS IV, in his apostolic constitution Cum praecelsa, became the first pope to allude to the spiritual Motherhood of Mary (Mansi 1945, 32.373; Sericoli 1945, p. 153), the doctrine has been taught with ever-increasing emphasis. It can safely be asserted that this doctrine, having been taught clearly and repeatedly by the ordinary and universal Magisterium since Sixtus IV's time, is certainly definable as a doctrine of faith. (See the extensive articles by Sebastian, and Shea). It is important, therefore, to ascertain the meaning given to the spiritual Maternity in the explanations of the papal Magisterium. There are three possible significations: (1) metaphorical—Mary acts in men's regard as a mother acts toward her children; she prays for them, she obtains grace for them, and so on; (2) adoptive—Christ willed that Mary adopt men as her children and that she possess the rights and fulfill all the duties of a mother toward men; and (3) real—Mary in some way transmits spiritual life to men by a kind of generation in the spiritual order and is, therefore, truly, the Mother of men.

In the present state of research it cannot be affirmed with certitude that the sovereign pontiffs from Sixtus IV to PIUS IX went beyond the metaphorical signification. While it is true that Pope LEO XIII and his successors speak most often about Mary's action in men's regard and their filial attitude toward her, yet for them these complementary attitudes are based on a most stable reality. At least twice, in his encyclicals Quamquam pluries (August 1889) and Adiutricem populi (September 1895), Leo XIII affirms that Mary "has brought us forth to life."

Although it cannot be denied that Leo XIII went beyond the simple metaphorical sense, some are inclined to think that he stopped at the juridical notion of an adoptive Motherhood. It is true that this pope placed great stress on Christ's donation of His Mother as the spiritual Mother of all mankind (see Quamquam pluries 9:175; Octobri mense 11:341; Magnae Dei matris 12:221; Jucunda semper 14:305; and Amantissimae voluntatis 15:138). Nevertheless, it must not be imagined that adoptive sonship necessarily excludes the idea of real filiation, for supernatural adoption surpasses a merely human adoption in one essential way: It really makes the person upon whom it is conferred a true son, for along with it comes a true participation in the nature and life of the person adopting. In other words, if Mary cooperates with her Son in meriting the divine life of grace for mankind, she is really the spiritual Mother of men.

Leo XIII's successor, Pope St. PIUS X, is explicit on the reality of Mary's spiritual Motherhood. For him the foundation is men's incorporation in Christ and the role of Mary in the INCARNATION:

> Is not Mary the mother of Christ? She is therefore also our mother. It must be stated as a principle that Jesus, the Word made flesh, is at the same time the savior of the human race. Now, inasmuch as He is God-Man, He has a body like other men; inasmuch as He is redeemer of our race, He has a spiritual body, or, as it is called, a Mystical Body, which is > none other than the society of Christians bound to Him by faith.... But the Virgin did not conceive the Son of God only in order that, receiving from her His human nature, He might become man, but also in order that, by means of this nature received from her, He might become the savior of mankind.... And thus, in the Virgin's chaste womb itself, where Jesus took to Himself mortal flesh, He joined to Himself a spiritual Body formed of all those who were to believe in Him; and it can be said that, bearing Jesus in her womb, Mary bore there also all those whose life was included in that of the Savior. And so all of us, united to Christ, are, as the Apostle says "members of his body, made from his flesh and from his bones" (Eph 5.30); we ought to consider ourselves as having come forth from the womb of the Virgin, from which we once issued as a Body attached to its head.

> That is why we are called, in a truly spiritual and entirely mystical sense, the children of Mary, and why she, on her part, is the mother of the members of Jesus Christ that we ourselves are. (Tondini 1950, pp. 310–312)

The emphasis here is on Mary's free consent to the Incarnation, the first source of divine life in the present economy of salvation. This idea is taken up with one accord by St. Pius X's successors (see Pope BENEDICT XV, Cum sanctissima virgo and Cum annus; PIUS XI, Lux veritatis; PIUS XII, Mystici corporis and Mediator Dei). However, neither St. Pius X nor any of his successors rests his case for the spiritual Maternity on her part in the Incarnation. All stress Mary's role at the foot of the Cross, by which she participated directly with Christ in the act of redemption through which the divine life of grace was won for all men. They see it as the logical consequence of her union with Christ from the moment of the Incarnation. Popes Pius XI and Pius XII, it would seem, solve definitively the problem of an adoptive Motherhood depending upon Christ's words from the Cross—"Woman, behold thy Son.... Behold thy mother" (Jn 19:27)—for they see in these words of the dying Redeemer not a creation but a "proclamation" and "ratification" of a spiritual Motherhood begun at the ANNUNCIATION (Pius XI, allocution of November 30, 1933, to the pilgrims of Vicenza; Pius XII, allocution of July 17, 1954).

Association of Mary with Christ. The Magisterium in the use of its sources, Scripture and Tradition, associates Christ and Mary in the doctrine of the spiritual Maternity.

Scripture. Four major texts are commonly adduced. The first of these is the PROTO-EVANGELIUM (Gn 3:15): "I will put enmity between you and the woman, between your seed and her seed; he shall crush your head, and you shall lie in wait for his heel." If, as an increasing number of modern writers affirm (and their opinion seems to be supported by both Pius IX's Ineffabilis Deus and Pius XII's Munificentissimus Deus), the prophecy is to be understood of Mary alone, then one may certainly use it as an argument to prove Mary's spiritual Maternity, for the text then prophesies that Mary with her divine Son is to crush Satan's head. It is known that this takes place on CALVARY at the objective Redemption, which marks the rebirth of mankind to the spiritual life. Therefore Mary by her share in this work can truly be called men's spiritual Mother.

Second, there is the Annunciation pericope (Lk 1:26–38). The references cited above from St. Pius X, Benedict XV, Pius XI, and Pius XII are ample evidence of the importance attached to this passage by the magisterium. Pius XII speaks well for all, in his 1947 address to the Marian Congress at Ottawa, Canada:

> But when the little maid of Nazareth uttered her fiat to the message of the Angel ... she became not only the Mother of God in the physical order of nature, but also in the supernatural order of grace she became the Mother of all, who through the Holy Spirit would be made one under the Headship of her divine Son. The Mother of the Head would be the Mother of the members.

Third, there is Christ's testament (Jn 19:26–27): "When Jesus, therefore, saw his mother and the disciple standing by, whom he loved, he said to his mother, 'Woman, behold thy Son.' Then he said to the disciple, 'Behold thy mother.' And from that hour the disciple took her into his home." This passage has been so frequently used by the sovereign pontiffs as a strictly biblical support of the spiritual Maternity that it seems impossible to maintain that Christ's words refer to Mary's spiritual Motherhood only by accommodation (see Sebastian 1957, p. 357; Carol 1956, p. 51).

The final text of those commonly adduced concerns the vision of the woman clothed with the sun (Rv 12). Although St. Pius X in his encyclical Ad diem illum (February 2, 1904) explicitly stated that "no one is ignorant of the fact that this woman signified the Blessed Virgin" and then made a direct application to Mary's spiritual Maternity, still one cannot claim for this interpretation the support of the universal Magisterium, for none of his successors has repeated this meaning.

Tradition. From the time of St. JUSTIN MARTYR and

St. IRENAEUS in the second century it has been traditional to use the Eve-Mary comparison to illustrate Mary's part in the redemption of mankind. The popes of the last hundred years have frequently used the term "new Eve" or its equivalent (associate of Christ, coredemptrix, cooperatrix) to elucidate Mary's role in the lifegiving redemption. The epilogue of Pius XII's encyclical Mystici corporis (n. 108) is a summary of the teaching on the spiritual Maternity as well as a compendium of the Church's Mariological doctrine:

> [I]n the name of the whole human race she gave her consent for a "spiritual marriage between the Son of God and human nature" (St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologiae 3a, 30.1). Within her virginal womb, Christ our Lord already bore the exalted title of head of the Church; in a marvelous birth she brought Him forth as source of all supernatural life.... Free from all sin, original and personal, always most intimately united with her Son, as another Eve she offered Him on Golgotha to the eternal Father for all the children of Adam, sin-stained by his fall, and her mother's rights and mother's love were included in the holocaust. Thus she, who corporally was the mother of our head, through the added title of pain and glory became spiritually the mother of all His members.... and she continued to show for the Mystical Body of Christ ... the same mother's care and ardent love with which she clasped the infant Jesus to her warm and nourishing breast.

Vatican II Era's Confirmation of the Reality of the Blessed Virgin's Spiritual Maternity. Vatican II confirmed all that Scripture, Sacred Tradition, and Magisterial teaching had previously upheld regarding the fact that Mary's spiritual Maternity is ontologically real and neither an analogy nor a mere mental construct.

In Lumen gentium VIII, "The Blessed Virgin Mary, Mother of God in the Mystery of Christ and the Church," the council reiterated St. Irenaeus's famous second-century teaching in Against Heresies regarding the Blessed Virgin's coredemptive role in salvation: "She 'being obedient, became the cause of salvation for herself and for the whole human race'" (Adv. Haer. III, 22, 4; *Lumen gentium,*VIII, n. 56). After summarizing the continual witness of Sacred Tradition that Mary is not only the true Mother of God the Son but also truly the "Mother of the living" (St. Epiphanius, Haer. 78, 18; Lumen gentium VIII, n. 56), Lumen gentium VIII emphatically declares that Mary's Motherhood actually shows forth the power of the unique mediation of Jesus Christ, rather than diminishing it in any way (n. 60). This declaration by the council confirms the similar assertion by St. Louis de Montfort: "Mary must be known and openly revealed by the Holy Spirit so that Jesus may be known, loved and served through her" (de Montfort 2006, p. 49). Vatican II's confirmation of the reality of Mary's Motherhood reached a crescendo by declaring that in a "wholly singular way," the Blessed Virgin cooperated in the work of her Divine Son "in restoring supernatural life to souls. For this reason, she is a Mother to us in the order of grace" (Lumen gentium VIII, n. 61).

At the time he promulgated Lumen gentium on November 21, 1964, to close the third phase of the council, Pope PAUL VI formally declared that the Blessed Virgin should be given the title, "Mother of the Church." The Holy Father said:

> Very many Council Fathers made their own, pressing for an explicit declaration at this Council of the motherly role of the Virgin among the Christian people. To achieve this aim, We have felt it opportune to Consecrate in this very public Session a title which was suggested in honor of the Virgin from various parts of the Catholic world.... Therefore, for the glory of the Virgin Mary and for Our own consolation, We proclaim the Most Blessed Mary Mother of the Church, that is to say of all the people of God.

Three years later, Pope Paul VI issued Signum magnum, an Apostolic Exhortation on the Feast of Our Lady of Fátima, May 13, 1967. In this document, he both summarizes the Church's tradition that supports his proclamation of Mary to be the Mother of the Church, and calls upon all the clergy and faithful to renew, personally, their consecration to the Immaculate Heart of Mary, specifically as the Mother of the Church. The pope promulgated another Apostolic Exhortation on the Blessed Virgin Mary, titled Marialis cultus, on February 2, 1974, "to offer considerations and directives suitable for favoring the development of devotion" to the Blessed Virgin and "to put forward a number of reflections intended to encourage the restoration, in a dynamic and more informed manner, of the recitation of the Rosary, the practice of which was so strongly recommended by our predecessors and is so widely diffused among the Christian people," as stated in the exhortation's introduction. The Holy Father underscores the teaching of Vatican II by reminding the Church of the various relationships that bind the baptized to the Blessed Virgin. Chief among these are "the spiritual Motherhood of Mary towards all members of the Mystical Body" (n. 22). Furthermore, the pope declares that the Church recognizes Mary to be its "advocate and helper" as well as "the associate of the Redeemer" (n. 22).

Known as the Totus Tuus pope (from the phrase "entirely yours" of St. Louis de Montfort, see paragraphs 216 and 233 of True Devotion to Mary), Pope JOHN PAUL II explored the question of who Mary is for us in a series of audiences from 1995 to 1997. On September 17, 1997, he specifically taught: "Mary united herself to the sacrifice of her Son and made her own maternal contribution to the work of salvation"(John Paul II 2000, p. 234). Furthermore, the pope commented that by mentioning the presence of Mary in the first community of Jerusalem (Acts 1:14), St. Luke was stressing Mary's maternal role in the newborn Church, "comparing it to her role in the Redeemer's birth" (John Paul II 2000, p. 234).

Through his general audiences, papal addresses, and encyclicals, John Paul II repeatedly upheld Mary's maternal role as the fundamental element of her relationship to both redemption itself and redeemed humanity. In this regard, Redemptoris mater was an especially important document. It was originally presented in ST. PETER'S BASILICA on March 25, 1987, for the express purpose of laying out the Blessed Virgin Mary's "precise place in the plan of salvation," as stated in the encyclical's introduction. By promulgating Redemptoris mater, the pope underscored that Mary's maternal mediation of the life of sanctifying grace "flows from her divine Motherhood" and must be understood as the fullness of truth about her Motherhood of God the Son Incarnate (n. 38).

Pope BENEDICT XVI has clearly chosen to reinforce his predecessor's insistence on Mary's spiritual Maternity. In commenting on John 19:27, Benedict XVI explained that while our translations tell us the disciple took Mary into his house, the Greek is much richer. Specifically, the pope commented to audiences on August 12, 2009, and November 11, 2009, that the disciple took Mary eis tà idia, "into the profundity of his being, into the dynamism of the whole of his existence." Those redeemed by Christ are likewise called to realize that the Savior has specifically given us His own Mother to be our Mother too. It is only by taking her into the very heart of our own existence that we are guaranteed to be fully and surely united to her Divine Son.

MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, DEVOTION TO

In popular usage, devotion to Mary is synonymous with the cult of Mary. Technically, however, cult in reference to Mary means the external recognition of her excellence and of the superior way she is joined to God, and devotion adds the notion of an interior readiness for cult. The words devotion and cult are used interchangeably throughout.

Marian devotion originates in the Christian response to the role of the Blessed Virgin Mary in the mystery of Christ and His Church, the reaction of "redeemed mankind toward the Mother of God, who is mother of Christ and mother of men, particularly of the faithful" [Lumen gentium (LG) 54*; Acta Apostolicae Sedis (AAS)* 57 (1965): 59]. Over the centuries, Christians have responded in many ways to Mary's example, as found in Sacred Scripture, and to her living presence within the life of the Church, but three elements may be distinguished in devotion to her: (1) veneration, or the reverent recognition of the dignity of the holy Virgin Mother of God; (2) invocation, or the calling upon Our Lady for her motherly and queenly intercession; and (3) imitation, which may take such forms also as dedication and consecration. In addition to devotion in a generic sense, there are devotions to Mary; that is, particular practices of piety approved by the Church, both liturgical (feasts, litanies) and non-liturgical (the Rosary, the scapular, and private prayers). Finally, there are individual experiences of affection toward or identification with Mary that sometimes defy categorization.

Proper veneration of Mary differs essentially from the cult of adoration (worship in American usage) offered to God alone, such as is given to Christ and to the Father and the Holy Spirit. The cult of the Blessed Virgin is called hyperdulia to distinguish it both from latria (adoration) and dulia (veneration of the other saints).

Scripture. The bases for Marian devotion are found in the New Testament. Galatians 4:4 indirectly points to Mary's free cooperation in God's plan of salvation. In this she was foreshadowed by the Old Testament (OT) figure of "daughter Zion," who rejoiced at the presence of the MESSIAH (cf. Zeph 3:14–17). She personifies the faith and messianic expectation of the PEOPLE OF GOD.

She appears in all four Gospels, associated with the mysteries of the SAVIOR's life. She meets all the criteria for a disciple as given in Luke's gospel. Her virginity highlights her acceptance of God's initiative at the ANNUNCIATION (Lk 1:34; cf. Jn 3:9). Elizabeth hails Mary as "Mother of my Lord" (Lk 1:43) and proclaims her blessed for her faith (Lk 1:45). Mary reflects on the divine words in her heart (Lk 2:19). In John's gospel, Mary is the type of the believing Church, present when the "hour" of Jesus is initiated (Cana) and fulfilled (CALVARY), as the spiritual mother of Jesus' disciples. What is said of her in LUKE-ACTS and John shows that she was viewed as an important person of great faith in the communities where these works were written. Even the "hard sayings" of Mark 3:35 and Luke 11:28 teach that her faith is the reason for her blessedness.

Early Church. Early in the second century, SS. Justin and IRENAEUS (followed by TERTULLIAN) called attention to Mary's role as the new EVE associated with Christ the new ADAM. The emphasis is on Mary's faith and her active role within God's plan of salvation. The second-century apocryphal gospel known as the Birth of Mary or PROTOEVANGELIUM OF JAMES witnesses to early interest in Mary's holiness, virginity, and the details of her life.

The earliest clear evidence of prayer for Mary's intercession is a Greek manuscript fragment from fourth-century Egypt, the reconstructed text of which reads: "Under your mercy we take refuge, O Mother of God. Do not reject our supplications in necessity, but deliver us from danger. [O you] alone pure and alone blessed" (Gambero 1999, p. 79). This prayer later became the Latin Sub tuum praesidium, which in turn was the basis for the medieval Memorare ("Remember, oh most gracious Virgin Mary…").

Even before the Council of EPHESUS (431), devotion to Mary was widespread among Christians, in the context of growing devotion to the saints. Churches were dedicated to Our Lady as early as the fourth century. St. GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS (d. 390), in an oration delivered in 379, speaks of a Christian of CONSTANTINOPLE calling on Mary's intercession to save her from danger. In 380, St. GREGORY OF NYSSA describes a vision of Mary experienced by GREGORY THAUMATURGUS in the third century during which the Virgin helped the visionary. Early fifth-century apocrypha describing Mary's dormition witness to belief in the power of Mary's intercession. St. Epiphanius (d. 403) mentions an obscure sect, the Kollyridians, whom he accuses of worshiping the Virgin; this allows him to distinguish between the worship (proskunēsis) due to God alone and the honor (timē) due to Mary.

Origen (d. 253) proposes Mary as a model for every faithful Christian; whoever does the Father's will is a "Mother of Jesus." Mary is presented as a model for consecrated virgins by St. ATHANASIUS (d. 373), St. Gregory Nazianzus (d. 390), and St. AMBROSE (d. 397), who devoted a series of writings to Mary, model of Christian virginity.

The dogmatic definition of the divine motherhood at Ephesus (431) strongly encouraged devotion to Mary. Pope SIXTUS III (432–440) rebuilt St. Mary Major in ROME to commemorate the definition of Ephesus. SEVERIAN OF GABALA (d. after 408) called the praise of Mary a daily custom—she was called on before the apostles and martyrs. St. Nilus (d. c. 430) said the praise of Mary was found in every land and every language. Leaden seals have come down from the fifth and sixth centuries with the inscription servus Mariae—servant (or slave) of Mary.

Early Liturgical Cult. The name of Mary entered liturgical texts quite early. As early as the second century, "born of the Holy Spirit and the Virgin Mary" was used in baptismal creeds. A Eucharistic anaphora in the Apostolic Tradition (traditionally attributed to St. HIPPOLYTUS OF ROME) mentioned Mary.

The oldest Marian feast day was a Memory of Mary, at first a celebration of Mary's divine motherhood and virginity, later of her dormition and assumption. It was first kept around the beginning of the fifth century, in JERUSALEM on August 15 and in Constantinople most likely on December 26. By the end of the sixth century, the observance of Mary's Dormition on August 15 had spread throughout the empire. The Annunciation was recalled in ADVENT, but by the mid-sixth century was celebrated on March 25. The NATIVITY OF MARY (September 8) dates from the late sixth century. In the seventh century Oriental monks introduced these feasts to the West; all four were kept in Rome under the Greek-born Pope SERGIUS I (d. 701). Other feast days followed: the PRESENTATION OF MARY (eighth century in the East, 1372 in the West); the Conception of St. Anne (eighth century in the East, eventually developing into the IMMACULATE CONCEPTION in the Christian West).

In the Roman liturgy Our Lady has had a place in the first prayer of remembrance (communicantes) before the consecration since the sixth century. This has been called the highest expression of the Church's official Marian devotion and is used to good effect in both the introduction and the conclusion to the Marian final chapter of the dogmatic constitution on the Church, Lumen gentium [AAS 57 (1965): 58–67].

Seventh to Ninth Centuries. In both written works and preaching, Mary is increasingly viewed as heavenly queen and all-powerful intercessor. In the West St. ILDEFONSUS OF TOLEDO (d. 667) is the first to propose consecrating oneself as Mary's servant to dedicate oneself to God, an idea later summarized in the phrase "to Jesus through Mary." The liturgical celebration of Mary's Assumption led preachers such as Ambrose AUTPERT (d. 781) and PAUL THE DEACON (d. c. 799) to focus on Mary as a powerful intercessor. They invited Christians to entrust their lives to her heavenly intercession and patronage. Writers and preachers also called for imitation of Mary; for example, the Venerable BEDE (d. 735) cites Mary's fiat (cf. Luke 1:38) as a model of response to God's word. ALCUIN (d. 804) promoted Saturday as Mary's day. In the East the homilists, SS. Sophronius (d. 638); Germanus of Constantinople (d. 733), defender of icons; and ANDREW OF CRETE (d. 740) extolled Mary's power of intercession as they praised her Assumption.

Tenth to Fourteenth Centuries. During the decadence after the CAROLINGIAN RENAISSANCE, religious life survived around the great abbeys. In addition to preserving and renewing monastic life, the CLUNIAC REFORM greatly increased Marian piety (e.g., ODO OF CLUNY, d. 942; ODILO OF CLUNY, d. 1049). The title Mother (or Queen) of Mercy originated at Cluny had a profound impact lasting into the twenty-first century. Sermons presented Mary as a model for the monastic life, because of her unshakeable faith, humility, chastity, and poverty.

The Marian devotion of the High MIDDLE AGES accorded with general devotion to the saints; it was based on a sense of community between the Church on earth and the Church triumphant, with growing emphasis on the humanity of Jesus, such as the holy name of Jesus, the PASSION, and the Real Presence in the EUCHARIST. Numerous Marian shrines drew many pilgrimages. By this time the West was showing increasing independence of the East, the more so after the break-off of intercommunion between ORTHODOXY and Rome in the mid-eleventh century.

The eleventh century produced a rich Marian literature: sermons, prayers (as the SALVE REGINA), liturgical offices (LITTLE OFFICE OF THE BVM) and Masses (especially for Saturday), and public proclamations of being servants or slaves of Mary (as by Odilo of Cluny, d. 1049; and also by Bl. MARINUS, brother of St. Peter Damian). St. PETER DAMIAN (d. 1072) wrote of Our Lady helping the poor souls in purgatory; by the fifteenth century this took the form in popular piety of the sabbatine privilege of the SCAPULAR.

The twelfth century showed two doctrinal trends, strongly influencing devotion: (1) attention to Mary's compassion at Calvary and the interpretation of the Savior's words, "Woman, behold your son" (Jn 19:26), as signifying Mary's spiritual motherhood of Christ's brethren typified in the beloved disciple; and (2) under the influence of the doctrine of the Assumption, emphasis on Mary's present assistance to all Christians. St. Bernard (d. 1153) was noted for the Marian piety of his homilies. In his famous homily on the aqueduct, he spoke of Mary distributing all graces to mankind. He called on Christians to place absolute confidence in Mary's intercession and to look upon her as the guiding star of their lives. He drew attention to Mary's compassion and her suffering with her Son at the foot of the CROSS, which made her a martyr in spirit.

In the thirteenth century, doctrine and piety were intimately interwoven in the praise of Mary. Along with the great cathedrals of Marian dedication, Marian devotion was manifest in the lives of SS. Francis (d. 1226) and DOMINIC (d. 1221) and in the theological masterworks of SS. BONAVENTURE (d. 1274), ALBERT THE GREAT (d. 1280), THOMAS AQUINAS (d. 1274), and DUNS SCOTUS (d. 1308). The familiar prayer, the HAIL MARY, combining the scriptural greetings (Lk 1:28, 42) of the first part to the petition of the second part, attained its current form only in the fifteenth century, but variants were in use from the twelfth century, and the *Ave*s were repeated to form the Psalter of Mary or the Rosary. At this same time, independent litanies of Our Lady developed from lists of Marian titles in the form of a litany—one of which has been preserved in the LITANY OF LORETO. In the late fourteenth century, the Presentation of Mary (November 21) and the VISITATION (July 2, since 1969 transferred to May 31) were introduced in the West.

Fifteenth Century. The invention of printing in this century allowed rapid diffusion of Marian devotion, for example, the many editions of the Marian sermons, at once tender and terrible, of St. BERNARDINE OF SIENA (d. 1444) and the compendious Mariale of Bernardino de Bustis (d. 1515); early xylography helped spread the confraternities of the Rosary.

The artistic representation of the "mantle Virgin" was characteristic of the devotional outlook of the fifteenth century. Under her protecting mantle, Mary, Mother of Mercy, kept in her care all peoples, nobles and humble folk alike. This picture was rejected by the Reformation and disappeared in the RENAISSANCE.

Pope SIXTUS IV gave the feast of the Conception of Mary limited approval and the favor of indulgences (1477). In Christian spirituality, meditation on the life of Mary, as on the life of Jesus, was a prominent note. The ideal was a deeper, richer interior life, well expressed by Jean GERSON (d. 1429) in his counsels for a truly Christian attitude toward Mary. Popular preaching, however, often proposed an exaggerated reliance on Mary's mercy, as opposed to Christ's justice.

The Reformation. The Reformers attacked Marian devotion, not directly, but by positions on doctrine and cult that they regarded as essential and evangelical. Neither Martin LUTHER nor John CALVIN rejected totally the veneration of Mary, but they limited it to imitation of the humble, obedient Virgin Mother of the GOSPELS (even as type of the believing Church). The Reformers and early Reformation confessions uniformly rejected calling upon the saints for assistance; such invocation (especially using the titles queen of heaven and spiritual mother) was regarded as derogatory to Christ's unique mediatorship and as blasphemous to God, the one source of grace.

The Council of TRENT defended the cult of Our Lady and the other saints—invocation as well as admiration and imitation—for the blessed who reign with Christ can intercede for men on earth. Both Catholic and Protestant positions hardened in the subsequent struggles of the Reformation and COUNTER REFORMATION, and the cult of Mary, like the doctrine of the Real Presence, became a favorite subject for controversy. St. Peter CANISIUS (d. 1597) replied to the Protestant positions in a long work, De Maria virgine incomparabili, which proved a veritable arsenal for Catholic apologists. Iconographically, the triumph of Mary—the Immaculate crushing the serpent's head—often represented victory over Protestantism.

The internal development of devotion continued within the Church. The Sodality of Our Lady was founded under Jesuit guidance in 1563; many Marian sodalities and associations developed from this prototype.

Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries. The seventeenth-century flowering of Marian studies, especially in Spain and France, saw a corresponding development in devotion. Practices of the slavery of Mary grew up, variously rooted in the queenship and in imitation of the Child Jesus in his dependence on Mary. The sanguinary vow was a pledge to defend to the death the Immaculate Conception, when it was still being debated within the Church. Some of these customs were carried to excess and aroused protest, even condemnation, for example, certain forms of the slavery of Mary, complete with chains. Adam Widenfeldt lashed out against exaggerated devotional practices and questionable doctrines in his storm-provoking Monita salutaria (1672).

In the French school of spirituality founded by Cardinal Pierre de BÉRULLE, the cult of Mary was intimately joined to the mystery of the Word-made-Flesh. Jean Jacques OLIER developed the role of Mary in the interior life, especially of seminarians. St. John EUDES preached the IMMACULATE HEART OF MARY.

This period emphasized both God's majesty (extending to Mary, as so close to God) and the need for total commitment in consecration to Mary, which is really to Jesus Christ through Mary. The most famous form of consecration was the holy slavery of Mary of St. Louis Marie GRIGNION DE MONTFORT (d. 1716), which did not become generally known until 1842 when the book, since called True Devotion, was found. Popular exaggerations of Mary's intercessory role led to strong reactions, such as that of Lodovico Antonio MURATORI. St. ALPHONSUS DE LIGUORI defended Marian devotion with solid arguments, especially in the widely spread Glories of Mary (1750).

Nineteenth Century. In the aftermath of the ENLIGHTENMENT and the FRENCH REVOLUTION, the newly founded religious congregations and the restored older orders showed a special concern for Mary's role in the apostolate. Apostolic zeal was recognized as an authentic note of Marian dedication (cf. Lumen gentium 65). This was especially true of the missionary orders, founded in such numbers in this period, such as the MARISTS, OBLATES OF MARY IMMACULATE, CLARETIANS, and Scheut Fathers. Lay efforts were also made, such as that of Guillaume Joseph CHAMINADE (d. 1850), who worked with lay sodalists some years before he founded the Society of Mary (MARIANISTS). The definition of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception by PIUS IX, an act itself enabled by the Marian maximalism that followed Trent, spoke of Mary's "singular privilege" and thus kept the emphasis on what set her apart from humanity in general.

Nineteenth-century Marian devotion also led to the establishment of shrines in places of reported apparitions, such as LOURDES (1858) and Lafayette (1846) in France, Knock (1879) in Ireland, and elsewhere, as well as Fátima in 1917, all of which continue to attract pilgrims. The Church approved these practices particularly because they resulted in the good fruits of prayer and penance and in pilgrims frequenting the Sacraments. In other cases of reported Marian apparitions or locutions, Church authorities rejected claims of private revelation and forbade public devotions at such sites.

Twentieth Century. The first half of the twentieth century has been called the age of Mary. It continued the trend begun with Trent to maximize devotion to Mary, especially by proclaiming her privileges or glories, emphasizing difference and exceptionality. Marian devotion was shaped by a Christotypical MARIOLOGY that understood Mary's role in relation to the Church and to individual Christians in terms of the person and role of Christ. As the one closest to her Son, the REDEEMER and Mediator, Mary could be addressed as Coredemptrix and mediator, a powerful intercessor and perfect ideal. The Christian was encouraged to consider himself dependent on Mary, his spiritual mother, and to work in union with her to build God's kingdom and conquer evil. This kind of Marian spirituality was typical of such new APOSTOLIC as the LEGION OF MARY (1921) and the Blue Army of Our Lady of Fátima (founded 1947, later World Apostolate of Fátima). Other features distinctive of this period included local, national, and international Marian congresses, the founding of Mariological societies in several countries, and great pilgrimages to many Marian shrines, even through times of political unrest and wars.

During this period the popes officially encouraged and directed Marian devotion in many ways. St. PIUS X wrote on the spiritual motherhood: "Mary is our sure way to Christ" [Ad diem illum, Acta Sanctae Sedis 36 (1903–1904): 451]. BENEDICT XV addressed incessant appeals to the Queen of Peace during WORLD WAR I. PIUS XI commemorated the Ephesus anniversary (Lux veritatis 1931) and related Our Lady to the jubilee of the REDEMPTION (1933–1934). PIUS XII showed his great interest in Marian doctrine and cult by the following acts: the definition of the Assumption (1950); the consecration of the world to the Immaculate Heart of Mary (1942), which was further explained in the encyclical on the Sacred Heart (Haurietis aquas 1956); the inclusion in the Encyclical on the Mystical Body, Mystici corporis, of its Marian epilogue (1943); the proclamation of the Marian Year (1945) and its memorialization by the new feast of the queenship of Mary (May 31, transferred in 1969 to August 22); and the proclamation of the Lourdes centennial (1958). Particularly important for devotion were the directives of Mediator Dei, his Encyclical on the sacred liturgy (1947): the liturgy was declared to be the norm of Marian cult, though other approved forms of piety were also encouraged. Devotion to Mary is an indication of our firm hope of salvation; indeed "according to the opinion of the Saints it is a sign of predestination" [Mediator Dei 6*; AAS* 39 (1947): 584–585].

In the years leading up to the council, various pontiffs also pointed out the need for caution and moderation in Marian devotion. Pius XII called for correct balance in Mariology and Marian devotion in Inter complures, his message to the international Mariological and Marian Congress of Rome [AAS 46 (1954): 679], and also in Ad caeli reginam, his Encyclical on the queenship of Mary [AAS 46 (1954): 637]. Pope JOHN XXIII, in a discourse to the clergy of Rome, warned of "particular practices or devotions, which may be excessive in their veneration of Jesus and our mother—who will not be offended by these words of Ours" [AAS 52 (1960): 969]. He cautioned the French National Marian Congress (Lisieux, July 9, 1961) to "look rather to the most traditional Marian devotion, as it has been handed down to us from the beginning in the prayers of successive generations in East and West" [AAS 53 (1961): 506].

The renewal of Biblical and Patristic studies focused attention on the Mary-Church analogy, especially after WORLD WAR II. Theologians searching for a fundamental principle of Mariology turned to an ecclesiotypical approach that suggested a different kind of Marian devotion. While the Christotypical approach spoke of a vertical mediation of Mary, who was enthroned alongside her Son and above the Church, the ecclesiotypical approach considered her horizontal mediation, presenting her as the prototypical and preeminent member of the community of the redeemed, the concrete type of the Church, first disciple of her Son, and a sister in the Faith.

This scholarly trend affected the Second Vatican Council's pronouncements on Marian doctrine and devotion, as seen in the Constitution on the Liturgy [AAS 56 (1964): 125], Decree on Ecumenism, Unitatis redintegratio [AAS 57 (1965): 101, 104–105], and above all in chapter 8 of Lumen gentium, the Constitution on the Church. Lumen gentium called for promotion of legitimate devotion to Mary, especially her liturgical cult, noting that true devotion is based on true Faith. Although it did not explicitly define a preferred Marian spirituality, its presentation of Mary promoted new ways of thinking about Marian devotion. Mary is the type and example of the Christian life and of faithful discipleship. Through her faithful relationship with Jesus Christ, Mary is both a sister, as a fellow member of the Church, and the spiritual mother of all the baptized. At the end of the council's third session, PAUL VI, on his own authority, proclaimed Mary "Mother of the Church."

Post-Conciliar Period to Present. The period immediately following the council (approximately 1966 to 1972) saw both a decline in interest in Mariology and a crisis of Marian devotion. Such traditional practices as the Rosary, scapular, Novenas, and pilgrimages fell into steep decline.

Pope Paul VI's 1974 Apostolic Exhortation, Marialis cultus, was in part a response to this crisis. Paul encouraged the development of a devotion to Mary that was Biblical, liturgical, ecumenical, and anthropological, as well as integrated into the mysteries of the Trinity, Christ, and the Church, while avoiding doctrinally misleading exaggerations.

Pope JOHN PAUL II promoted and presided over a great flowering of Marian devotion. His motto, Totus tuus, quoted Montfort's formula of Marian consecration: "I am all yours, Mary, and everything I have is yours. I accept you into everything that is mine." True to these words, John Paul included a mention of Mary in all his major Encyclicals and entrusted to her motherly care his major efforts, such as his call for a new EVANGELIZATION. His great Marian Encyclical, Redemptoris mater [AAS 74 (1987): 361], grounds Marian devotion in Our Lady's spiritual motherhood of all Christ's disciples in the order of grace, with special reference to Our Lord entrusting all humanity to his Mother at the foot of the Cross (RM 45; cf. Jn 19:25–27). Every disciple should welcome Mary into his inner life and in turn seek to be welcomed into her motherly care. A series of seventy talks given at General Audiences from September 1995 to November 1997 presented a catechesis on Marian doctrine and devotion, in which Mary is portrayed as a model of faith and discipleship. His Apostolic Letter on the Rosary, Rosarium virginis mariae (October 16, 2002), encouraged praying the Rosary as a way to contemplate the divine mystery of the life of Christ, and he proclaimed October 2002 to October 2003 as the Year of the Rosary. Mary is the "incomparable model" who presents to the faithful the mysteries of the Christ and teaches the Church how to contemplate Christ. In his Encyclical Ecclesia de Eucharistia (April 17, 2003), he presents Mary as "woman of the Eucharist." Her faith in her Son encourages Christians to believe in the mystery of the Eucharist. By offering her virginal womb for the INCARNATION of God's Word, she anticipated the sacramental reception of the Lord's Body and Blood by believers. Her fiat is echoed in the Amen of the communicant, and her contemplation of the newborn Christ anticipates the adoration of the Eucharist. Her preparation for Calvary anticipates the sacrificial dimension of the Mass. Accepting the gift of the Eucharist means accepting Mary as our spiritual Mother. "Mary is present, with the Church and as the Mother of the Church, at each of our celebrations of the Eucharist (EE 57)." Mary's MAGNIFICAT expresses her own spirituality, defined as the model of a true "Eucharistic attitude."

The Directory on Popular Piety and the Liturgy, issued by the Roman Congregation for DIVINE WORSHIP AND THE DISCIPLINE OF THE SACRAMENTS in 2001, devotes an entire chapter to the veneration of Mary. Both liturgical cult and popular devotions are encouraged. In addition to the Marian feast days and Saturday remembrances of the liturgy, the document treats Marian Tridua, septenari and Novenas, the Marian months, the Angelus/Regina Coeli, the Rosary, the Litany of the Blessed Virgin Mary, Acts of Consecration or Entrustment to the Blessed Virgin Mary, Marian scapulars and medals, and the AKATHISTOS Hymn.

The period from the late 1970s onward saw a recovery in Marian devotion among Catholics. Some experienced a renewed interest in Mary's personal identity, focusing on Mary as a human person perfectly and fully redeemed by grace, ideal of faith, and model of holiness for all believers. Others returned to such traditional forms of devotion as the Rosary and scapular. Western Christians made increased use of Marian icons from the Eastern tradition in their public and private prayer. Efforts by theologians to define a "Marian spirituality" (a term found in Redemptoris mater 48) as a fundamental openness to God's will on the part of the believer (Hans Urs von BALTHASAR, Anton Ziegenaus) offered a new theological basis for Marian devotion.

Ecumenical Aspects of Marian Devotion. The Orthodox Christians of the East have always preserved a liturgical cult of Mary along with private devotion to her. Until recently, such was not the case within the communities born from the Protestant Reformation. However, since the Second Vatican Council, Protestants have shown increased openness to Marian cult and devotion. The Ecumenical Society of the Blessed Virgin Mary (founded 1967) promotes an ecumenical understanding of Mary's place in the life of the Church. Non-Catholic theologians have reconsidered the scriptural portrayals of Mary and her role within the communion of saints. The authors of the ANGLICAN/ROMAN CATHOLIC INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION document "Mary: Grace and Hope in Christ" (2004) agreed that Mary, as Mother of God, should be venerated in the public worship of the Church and recognized as a model for all Christians. They affirmed that Mary continues to intercede for the whole Church and that it is legitimate for Christians to ask Mary to pray for them.

MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, PAPAL MAGISTERIUM SINCE VATICAN II

To deal with the papal Magisterium on Mary since the Second Vatican Council (October 11, 1962–December 8, 1965), one must begin with the council itself and PAUL VI, who was at once the POPE who presided over all but the first of the four sessions of the council and the pope who strove to implement the conciliar constitutions, decrees, and declarations for the remaining twelve and a half years of his pontificate. Undeniably, the council's principal treatment of "The Blessed Virgin Mary, Mother of God in the Mystery of Christ and the Church," which constitutes the eighth chapter of Lumen gentium, the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, is the most extensive exposition on Mary ever promulgated by an ecumenical council. Its decision, however, to include the treatment on Mary in the document on the Church and not as a separate treatise was the subject of intense debates and resulted in the narrowest majority (1,114–1,074) in the history of the council.

Mariological Debate. Behind these votes were two different currents of thought which reflected to a certain extent the rediscovered insights of ecclesio-typical MARIOLOGY (which sees an ANALOGY between Mary and the Church) that were emerging again at the time of the council and christo-typical Mariology (which sees an analogy between CHRIST and Mary). Ultimately, the title as well as the content of chapter eight of Lumen gentium would strive to balance these two theological tendencies by considering Mary "in the Mystery of Christ and the Church." In a rare analysis of this situation by a pope, JOHN PAUL II stated in his Marian catechesis of December 13, 1995:

> During the Council sessions, many Fathers wished further to enrich Marian doctrine with other statements on Mary's role in the work of salvation. The particular context in which Vatican II's Mariological debate took place did not allow these wishes, although substantial and widespread, to be accepted, but the Council's entire discussion of Mary remains vigorous and balanced, and the topics themselves, though not fully defined, received significant attention in the overall treatment.

The proponents of further precisions on Mary's role in the work of SALVATION to whom the pope referred were obviously those who favored the Christo-typical approach. The matter remains more complex, however. The ecclesio-typical insights into Mary as model of the Church, as traveling the path of FAITH, are surely valid—even if they do not greatly nourish devotion—but this camp also included those who, for ecumenical reasons, favored minimizing statements about Our Lady and her collaboration in the work of salvation.

Interestingly, Christo-typical statements are not wanting in the final text. LG 57 calls attention to the "union of the Mother and the Son in the work of salvation" and LG 58 speaks of Mary's "consenting to the immolation of the Victim" on CALVARY and her "uniting herself with his sacrifice." LG 61 describes how Mary "cooperated by her obedience, faith, hope and burning charity in the work of the Savior in giving back supernatural life to souls." LG 62 states that "the Church does not hesitate to profess this subordinate role of Mary." The classical word to describe Mary's active role in the work of salvation is Coredemptrix (used by theologians for centuries and found in the Magisterium of PIUS XI three times and in that of John Paul II six times). Here the word was not used out of "ecumenical sensitivity," but the DOCTRINE was more clearly presented than in any previous conciliar statement.

A specific instance of these two mindsets was illustrated by the clash between these two camps on whether Mary should be described in the conciliar document as "Mother of the Church." In fact, the title of the third preparatory schema of the Marian text was precisely "Mary, Mother of Jesus and Mother of the Church" (July 1961). The history of the titles of the various drafts as well as their contents indicate the ongoing tension between those in the ecclesio-typical camp who wanted emphasis placed primarily on the more abstract concept of Mary's being an exemplar of the Church and those on the other side who wanted to emphasize Mary's role of spiritual maternity. The title "Mother of the Church" disappeared from the schema that arrived on the council floor in September 1964 and, despite pleas to replace it, the theological commission refused to do so. Thus LG 54 speaks of Mary as "Mother of God and of men, especially of the faithful"; LG 69 refers to her as "Mother of God and of men"; and LG 61 speaks of her as "mother in the order of grace." In closing the third session of the council on November 21, 1964, after promulgating the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, which included the Marian chapter eight and the decrees on the EASTERN CHURCHES and on ecumenism, Paul VI solemnly declared Mary Mother of the Church and commemorated the act by which PIUS XII had consecrated the world to the IMMACULATE HEART OF MARY on October 31, 1942. It was a decisive moment in the council and was greeted with resounding applause. Paul VI had acted courageously and found a way of overcoming clever maneuvering that spoke to the hearts of bishops and FAITHFUL.

Both the Christo-typical and ecclesio-typical currents of Mariology have solid bases in the ecclesial tradition and can be harmonized, as the final title of chapter eight of Lumen gentium and the subsequent papal Magisterium have illustrated. However, when the ecclesio-typical orientation is promoted to the exclusion of the other, as was frequently done by major interpreters after the promulgation of Lumen gentium, Marian devotion is bound to suffer, as in fact it did. Even some of the staunchest champions of ecclesio-typical Mariology found themselves shocked at the rapid and radical decline in Marian piety in the decade after the council. The question of the active collaboration of Mary in the work of salvation was looming on the horizon before the council began, and "though not fully defined, received significant attention in the overall treatment" of Mary in the council, as John Paul II said. It remains the central question in Catholic Mariology and THEOLOGY in the early twenty-first century, and the subsequent papal Marian Magisterium can only be fully grasped in this perspective. As LG 65 prophetically summarizes the matter: "For Mary, having entered intimately into the history of salvation somehow brings together in herself and reverberates the most fundamental teachings of the faith and, as she is proclaimed and venerated, calls the faithful to her Son and his sacrifice and to love of the Father."

Pope Paul VI (1963–1978). Almost immediately after the council, Paul VI found that all the fundamental truths of Catholicism were being contested, often because of inaccurate interpretations of the conciliar documents as well as because of epochal societal upheavals such as the protest movements of 1968. In this context he strove to be a faithful interpreter of the council, presenting the Church's Marian doctrine in a careful and balanced way in numerous discourses, messages, homilies, and prayers.

LG 66 had made a generic recommendation of "various forms of piety toward the Mother of God approved by the Church," but Paul VI subsequently felt it necessary to recommend the ROSARY in two encyclicals (Mense maio and Christi matri), an APOSTOLIC EXHORTATION, and on numerous other occasions. In his Rosary encyclical Mense maio of April 29, 1965, he went beyond the minimal recognition in LG 62 that Mary may be invoked as Mediatrix (numerous conciliar battles had been fought over this title regularly used in the pre-conciliar papal Magisterium), speaking of the "abundant gifts of divine mercy that flow to us from [Mary's] throne" and of the "treasures of mercy of which Mary has been constituted the minister and generous dispenser"(Mense maio, 9)

His Apostolic Exhortation Signum magnum of May 13, 1967, accompanied by his pilgrimage to Fátima to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the apparitions of Our Lady which took place there, testified to the entire Church that solid Marian doctrine leads to solid Marian devotion. In that exhortation he stated:

> As each one of us can repeat with St. Paul: "The Son of God loved me and gave Himself up for me," so in all trust he can believe that the divine Savior has left to him also, in spiritual heritage, His Mother, with all the treasures of grace and virtues with which He had endowed her, that she may pour them over us through the influence of her powerful intercession and our willing imitation. (Signum magnum, 5)

At its conclusion, he exhorted all "to renew personally their consecration to the Immaculate Heart of the Mother of the Church and to bring alive this most noble act of veneration through a life ever more consonant with the divine will" (Signum magnum, 9). Although theological interpretations of the conciliar Marian doctrine were already downplaying Mary's mediation of grace and the legitimacy of Marian consecration, Paul VI did not hesitate to exercise his teaching authority on these matters.

The pope's principal Marian document was Marialis cultus of February 2, 1974, on the right ordering and development of devotion to the Blessed Virgin Mary. Faithfully following the teaching of LG 67, Paul VI wanted to encourage the faithful about the unique place of Mary in the Church's worship, particularly in the LITURGY as it had been renewed in the post-conciliar books and then in the personal piety of the faithful. The document underscores the Trinitarian, Christological, and ecclesial aspects of Marian devotion and then proposes four guidelines for its development: that it be biblical, liturgical, ecumenical, and anthropological. In the third of these guidelines, he stated that "without in any way detracting from the unique character of this devotion, every care should be taken to avoid any exaggeration which could mislead other Christian brethren about the true doctrine of the Catholic Church," whereas in the fourth he emphasized presenting Mary as an imitable model, especially for modern women, a theme that John Paul would further develop in his Apostolic Exhortation Mulieris dignitatem of August 15, 1988. In the final part of the document, he reflected on and recommended the PRAYER of the ANGELUS and the Rosary.

On April 24, 1970, the Pope found a profound way to translate the teaching of LG 53 on the "indissoluble bond" between JESUS and Mary in his HOMILY at the Marian shrine of Our Lady of Bonaria in Cagliari, Sardinia: "If we want to be Christian, we must also be Marian, that is we must recognize the essential, vital, providential bond which unites Our Lady with Jesus and which opens to us the way that leads us to him"(Acta apostolicae sedis 62 [1970]: 300–301).

John Paul II (1978–2005). Speaking in this way, not only did Paul VI insist that Jesus is inseparable from Mary in the Christian life, but he also effectively sketched the profile of his successor, John Paul II, whose episcopal and papal motto was Totus tuus, an abbreviated form of an even older formula of Marian consecration found in St. Louis de Montfort's True Devotion to the Blessed Virgin: "I am all yours, O Mary, and all that I have is yours" (n. 216, 233). As John Paul II would later indicate in personal testimonies, during his youth he discovered the classic book by St. Louis de Montfort and, as he admitted to André Frossard, became convinced, "The more my inner life has been centered on the mystery of the Redemption, the more surrender to Mary, in the spirit of St. Louis Grignion de Montfort, has seemed to me the best means of participating fruitfully and effectively in this reality" (Frossard 1984, p. 126).

Undoubtedly Pope John Paul II has left the largest patrimony of Marian doctrine and devotion of all the successors of St. Peter, and it will be possible only to present a few highlights and to indicate major themes. Already in his very first ENCYCLICAL Letter, Redemptor hominis of March 4, 1979, he evoked the reality of Marian mediation without using the word: "We believe that nobody else can bring us as Mary can into the divine and human dimension of this mystery [of the Redemption]. Nobody has been brought into it by God Himself as Mary has" (Redemptor hominis, 22). He developed the idea in his next Encyclical Letter, Dives in misericordia of November 30,1980, meditating on the fact that:

> No one has experienced, to the same degree as the Mother of the crucified One, the mystery of the cross.... No one has received into his heart, as much as Mary did, that mystery, that truly divine dimension of the redemption effected on Calvary by means of the death of the Son, together with the sacrifice of her maternal heart, together with her definitive "fiat." Mary, then, is the one who has the deepest knowledge of the mystery of God's mercy.... [she] through her hidden and at the same time incomparable sharing in the messianic mission of her Son, was called in a special way to bring close to people that love which He had come to reveal. (Dives in misericordia, 9)

In this text he deftly introduced the concept of Mary's active collaboration in the work of Redemption as well as her mediatory role in bringing others to experience its effects.

On May 13, 1981, the Pope suffered an assassination attempt in St. Peter's Square. It was the anniversary of the apparition of Our Lady to the three shepherd children of Fátima in 1917. His life hung in the balance for several days, but as soon as he was able, he called for all of the relevant documentation on Fátima. To his dying day, he was convinced that Our Lady had spared his life, and he determined to make the consecration to the Immaculate Heart of Mary which Our Lady had asked for the conversion of Russia. The first such act was made on the first anniversary of the attempt on his life in Fátima. It was renewed in more specific collegial union with the Bishops of the Word on March 25, 1984, in ROME before the image of Our Lady flown in from Fátima. The text of these two acts is virtually identical and employs both the words consecrate and entrust. Russia was not publicly named in either of these acts, but was evidently clearly understood. The Pope would return to Fátima again on May 13, 1991, stating that "the Church ... does not cease consecrating herself to Mary." He returned again on May 13, 2000, to beatify Francisco and Jacinta, the little seers who had died respectively in 1919 and 1920, and had the imminent publication of the third secret of Fátima announced. The thematic of Marian consecration/entrustment and that of the Immaculate Heart of Mary, already abundantly represented in his writings, would be further reinforced through his association with Fátima.

In his APOSTOLIC Letter Salvifici doloris of February 11, 1984, he offered a remarkable exposition on Mary's role in the mystery of Redemption. First he insisted on the all-sufficiency of Jesus' sufferings: "The sufferings of Christ created the good of the world's Redemption. This good in itself is inexhaustible and infinite. No man can add anything to it" (Salvifici doloris, n. 24). But then he went on to indicate how Mary's sufferings are inseparable from those of Jesus:

> In her, the many and intense sufferings were amassed in such an interconnected way that they were not only a proof of her unshakable > faith but also a contribution to the Redemption of all.... It was on Calvary that Mary's suffering, beside the suffering of Jesus, reached an intensity which can hardly be imagined from a human point of view but which was mysteriously and supernaturally fruitful for the Redemption of the world....As a witness to her Son's passion by her presence, and as a sharer in it by her compassion, Mary offered a unique contribution to the Gospel of suffering, by embodying in anticipation the expression of St. Paul which was quoted at the beginning (Col 1:24). She truly has a special title to be able to claim that she "completes in her flesh"—as already in her heart—"what is lacking in Christ's afflictions." (Salvifici doloris, n. 25)

Are these statements of the pope in contradiction to each other? No. He was rather brilliantly expounding on a mystery. The sacrifice of Jesus is all-sufficient, but GOD wished the suffering of the "New Eve," the only perfect human creature, to be united to the suffering of the "New Adam." Is the pope saying that Mary could redeem us by herself? Certainly not. But he is saying that she could make her own unique contribution to the sacrifice of Jesus as the "New Eve," the "Mother of the Living."

These heretofore somewhat unnoticed declarations of enormous doctrinal value need to be seen as the context for that which John Paul II would present in the third part of his Marian encyclical, Redemptoris mater of March 25, 1987, on "Maternal Mediation." Commenting on LG 61, he stated:

> Mary entered, in a way all her own, into the one mediation "between God and men" which is the mediation of the man Christ Jesus. If she was the first to experience within herself the supernatural consequences of this one mediation—in the Annunciation she had been greeted as "full of grace"—then we must say that through this fullness of grace and supernatural life she was especially predisposed to cooperation with Christ, the one Mediator of human salvation. And such cooperation is precisely this mediation subordinated to the mediation of Christ. (Redemptoris mater, n. 39)

With this encyclical the pope effectively resurrected the explicit language of Marian mediation that had been used frequently by his predecessors, but that had been virtually buried by all of the major commentators after the Second Vatican Council. What is particularly striking is that his encyclical was a veritable tour de force precisely because he theologized on the concept of Mary's "mediation in Christ" utilizing the language of the council in its maximal sense integrated into many of his own unique insights.

At the conclusion of the Marian year which he had declared from March 25, 1987, to 15 August 1988, he published his Apostolic Letter Mulieris dignitatem, a document primarily "On the Dignity and Vocation of Women," but with many profound references to Our Lady. Perhaps one of the most unique features of that document is the pope's reference in n. 27 to the "Marian profile" of the Church, which takes precedence over the "Petrine." He had already elaborated this theme at greater length and depth in n. 2–3 of his address to the Roman Curia on December 22, 1987, utilizing the elements of ecclesio-typical theology in a truly maximal formulation.

The Marian Year was also the occasion of the publication of a collection of forty-six Masses of the Blessed Virgin Mary, each with its own propers, preface, and an accompanying lectionary. The publication of these Masses—some taken from propers conceded to certain religious communities or places, some composed for the occasion—are intended for use at Marian shrines and as votive Masses to be used on ferial days throughout the year and constitute "an event of far from negligible importance in the development by the Magisterium and in the experience of the Christian people of the great riches that are represented by Mary, the Mother of God" according to Cardinal Virgilio Noè. It should be noted that Paul VI had already provided for the publication of the Votive Masses of "Mary, Mother of the Church" and the "Holy Name of Mary" in the second typical edition of the Missale Romanum of 1975 and that John Paul II further expanded the Marian Masses available in the third typical edition of the Missale Romanum of 2002 and provided for an optional memorial of Our Lady of Fátima on May 13.

Surely a high point of John Paul II's Marian Magisterium was the course of seventy Marian catecheses which he presented during of his Wednesday general audiences from September 6, 1995, to November 12, 1997. These cover major themes in Marian doctrine and devotion, while utilizing texts of the pre-conciliar papal Magisterium, the Second Vatican Council, and the Catechism of the Catholic Church and making judicious use of certain contemporary authors. Many of these catecheses further confirm the Pope's clear affirmation of Mary's unique collaboration in the work of the Redemption, such as this passage from April 9, 1997:

> Applied to Mary, the term "cooperator" acquires a specific meaning. The collaboration of Christians in salvation takes place after the Calvary event, whose fruits they endeavor to spread by prayer and sacrifice. Mary, instead, > cooperated during the event itself and in the role of mother; thus her cooperation embraces the whole of Christ's saving work. She alone was associated in this way with the redemptive sacrifice that merited the salvation of all mankind. In union with Christ and in submission to him, she collaborated in obtaining the grace of salvation for all humanity. (XX/1 [1997]: 621–622)

It should be further noted that in the course of various addresses, homilies, and greetings John Paul II referred to Mary as Coredemptrix on at least six occasions. These clearly were not an exercise of his most solemn Magisterium, but pertain rather to what LG 25 refers to as the "ordinary" papal Magisterium. They are indications that this classical theological term, which indicates that Mary's role in the work of redemption is always secondary and subordinate to that of Christ and dependent on him, but at the same time altogether unique, remains a legitimate term. Hence it is astonishing that an anonymous article published in L'Osservatore Romano of June 4, 1997, during the pope's absence from Rome could label these references as "marginal and devoid of doctrinal weight."

As a committed disciple of St. Louis Marie de Montfort during his entire adult life, it is not surprising that Marian consecration/entrustment was a special feature of John Paul II's long pontificate. He placed himself, the entire Church and the world into the hands and heart of the Virgin Mary on hundreds of occasions, great and small. His homily at Fátima on May 13, 1982, presents an extraordinarily synthetic catechesis on the Hearts of Jesus and Mary, Mary's spiritual maternity, and the meaning of consecration, reaching its culmination in these words:

> Consecrating the world to the Immaculate Heart of Mary means drawing near, through the Mother's intercession, to the very Fountain of life that sprang from Golgotha. This Fountain pours forth unceasingly redemption and grace. In it reparation is made continually for the sins of the world. It is a ceaseless source of new life and holiness.... It means consecrating this world to the pierced heart of the Savior, bringing it back to the very source of its redemption.

Taking his lead from LG 66 and 67, John Paul II was conscious of the importance of the figure of Mary in the ecumenical dialogue. He stressed her significance as our "common Mother" particularly in his encyclical Redemptoris mater (n. 29–34), in his Apostolic Letter Orientale lumen of May 2, 1995 (n. 6 and 28), and in his Marian catechesis of November 12, 1997. In his Encyclical Letter Ut unum sint of May 25, 1995, he specifically identified five "areas in need of fuller study before a true consensus of faith can be achieved" (79), the fifth being "the Virgin Mary, as Mother of God and Icon of the Church, the spiritual Mother who intercedes for Christ's disciples and for all humanity" (12). In that same encyclical he insisted that "all forms of reductionism or facile 'agreement' must be absolutely avoided" (36).

With his Apostolic Letter Rosarium virginis mariæ of October 16, 2002, John Paul II launched a Year of the Rosary from October 2002 to October 7, 2003, yet another effort on his part to promote Marian devotion. The most novel aspect of the Apostolic Letter was his proposal of the luminous mysteries (n. 21) that come chronologically between the joyful and sorrowful mysteries and consist of (1) the BAPTISM of Jesus; (2) his manifestation at the Wedding at Cana; (3) his proclamation of the Kingdom and call to conversion; (4) his TRANSFIGURATION; and (5) his institution of the EUCHARIST. The entire document is a profound "exhortation to contemplate the face of Christ in union with, and at the school of, his Most Holy Mother" (n. UUS, 3).

No pope had ever commented with more frequency or more depth on the text of John 19:25–29 than John Paul II. He found in it the basis of Marian devotion, Mary's spiritual maternity, her own kenosis or emptying herself, and her collaboration in the work of redemption and consecration/entrustment. These are rarely simply repetitions of earlier statements, but almost always indicate new and deepening insights. Perhaps the crowning of these occurred in his last Encyclical Letter Ecclesia de eucharistia of April 17, 2003, in 57 of which he wrote:

> "Do this in remembrance of me" (Lk. 22:19). In the "memorial" of Calvary all that Christ accomplished by his passion and his death is present. Consequently all that Christ did with regard to his Mother for our sake is also present. To her he gave the beloved disciple and, in him, each of us: "Behold, your Son!" To each of us he also says: "Behold your mother!" (cf. Jn. 19: 26–27). Experiencing the memorial of Christ's death in the Eucharist also means continually receiving this gift. It means accepting—like John—the one who is given to us anew as our Mother. It also means taking on a commitment to be conformed to Christ, putting ourselves at the school of his Mother and allowing her to accompany us. Mary is present, with the Church and as the Mother of the > Church, at each of our celebrations of the Eucharist.

Benedict XVI (2005–). Although the Marian output of BENEDICT XVI will probably never equal that of the twenty-seven-year pontificate of John Paul II, there are clear indications that he continues to follow his predecessor in his own unique style and mode of presentation. He concluded his first Encyclical Letter, Deus caritas est, of December 25, 2005, in this way:

> The lives of the saints are not limited to their earthly biographies but also include their being and working in God after death. In the saints one thing becomes clear: those who draw near to God do not withdraw from men, but rather become truly close to them. In no one do we see this more clearly than in Mary. The words addressed by the crucified Lord to his disciple—to John and through him to all disciples of Jesus: "Behold, your mother!" (Jn. 19:27)—are fulfilled anew in every generation. Mary has truly become the Mother of all believers. Men and women of every time and place have recourse to her motherly kindness and her virginal purity and grace, in all their needs and aspirations, their joys and sorrows, their moments of loneliness and their common endeavors. They constantly experience the gift of her goodness and the unfailing love which she pours out from the depths of her heart....At the same time, the devotion of the faithful shows an infallible intuition of how such love is possible: it becomes so as a result of the most intimate union with God, through which the soul is totally pervaded by him—a condition which enables those who have drunk from the fountain of God's love to become in their turn a fountain from which "flow rivers of living water." (Jn. 7:38) (Deus caritas est, 42)

He then continued with a prayer entrusting the Church to Mary, saying "You abandoned yourself completely to God's call and thus became a wellspring of the goodness which flows forth from him." This text is not only a testimony to the doctrine of Mary's spiritual maternity, but also to her mediation of graces.

He would present this latter doctrine in even more strong language in his homily on May 11, 2007, at Campo de Marte, São Paulo, for the canonization of Frei Antônio de Sant'Ana GALVÃO:

> Mary, Mother of God and our Mother, stands particularly close to us at this moment. Frei Galvão prophetically affirmed the truth of the Immaculate Conception. She, the Tota Pulchra, the Virgin Most Pure, who conceived in her womb the Redeemer of mankind and was preserved from all stain of original sin, wishes to be the definitive seal of our encounter with God our Savior. There is no fruit of grace in the history of salvation that does not have as its necessary instrument the mediation of Our Lady.... This is the invitation that I address to all of you today, from the first to the last, in this Eucharist without frontiers. God said: "Be holy, as I am holy" (Lev 11:44). Let us give thanks to God the Father, to God the Son, to God the Holy Spirit from whom, through the intercession of the Virgin Mary, we receive all the blessings of heaven. (Insegnamenti di Benedetto XVI, III/1 [2007]: 820–821)

Benedict also continued to emphasize the precedence of the Marian over the Petrine profile of the Church, particularly on March 25, 2006, in his homily at the Mass for the conferral of rings on the new cardinals. On that occasion, he said:

> This providential circumstance helps us to consider today's event, which emphasizes the Petrine principle of the Church, in the light of the other principle, the Marian one, which is even more fundamental. The importance of the Marian principle in the Church was particularly highlighted, after the Council, by my beloved Predecessor Pope John Paul II in harmony with his motto Totus tuus....The icon of the Annunciation, more than any other, helps us to see clearly how everything in the Church goes back to that mystery of Mary's acceptance of the divine Word, by which, through the action of the Holy Spirit, the Covenant between God and humanity was perfectly sealed. Everything in the Church, every institution and ministry, including that of Peter and his Successors, is "included" under the Virgin's mantle, within the grace-filled horizon of her "yes" to God's will. (Insegnamenti di Benedetto XVI II/1 [2006]: 360)

He concluded his Encyclical Letter Spe salvi of November 30, 2007, with a discreet reference to Mary's mediation and intercession in n. 49:

> Life is like a voyage on the sea of history, often dark and stormy, a voyage in which we watch for the stars that indicate the route.... Certainly, Jesus Christ is the true light, the sun that has risen above all the shadows of history. But to reach him we also need lights close by—people > who shine with his light and so guide us along our way. Who more than Mary could be a star of hope for us? With her "yes" she opened the door of our world to God himself; she became the living Ark of the Covenant, in whom God took flesh, became one of us, and pitched his tent among us. (cf. Jn 1:14)

Perhaps more important than any explicit Marian statement on the part of Pope Benedict XVI was his very clear presentation of what he called "the hermeneutic of continuity" vis-à-vis "the hermenuetic of rupture" in terms of interpreting the documents of the Catholic tradition and those of the Second Vatican Council in his memorable discourse to the Roman Curia on December 22, 2005.

All three of these postconciliar Popes have had the grace to clarify the eighth chapter of Lumen gentium, Second Vatican Council's major treatment of the Mother of God in the Mystery of Christ and the Church. They have continued to present the Marian doctrine of the council in a way that situates it in a larger context that at once appreciates its newness while relating it to the Church's millennial tradition. Their Magisterium has supplemented the conciliar teaching on many important points and taken its interpretation out of the hands of the minimalists. It now remains to be made known among scholars, priests, and the Church at large, of which Mary remains Mother and exemplar.

MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, QUEENSHIP OF

From the early Church Fathers to modern ecclesial teaching, the Church's tradition and magisterial pronouncements bear strong witness to Mary's role as queen, sharing preeminently in her Son's reign in the Kingdom of God. As VATICAN COUNCIL II taught, Mary "was taken up into heavenly glory, and exalted by the Lord as Queen over all things, so that she might become more fully conformed to her Son, the Lord of lords and conqueror of sin and death" (Lumen gentium 1964, sec. 59).

Biblical Support for the Queenship Doctrine. The doctrine of Mary's queenship also has strong biblical support, as seen in the Old Testament role of the queen mother. In several ancient Near Eastern kingdoms the mother of the ruling monarch reigned as queen, influencing political, military, and cultic affairs in the kingdom. In the Davidic kingdom in particular, the king's mother was given the title Gebirah, "Great Lady."

In almost every instance in which a new monarch in Judah is introduced in 1 and 2 Kings, the king's mother is also mentioned, but not the wife. The king's mother is described as a member of the royal court (2 Kgs 24:12–15), who wore a crown (Jer 13:18), sat on a throne (1 Kgs 2:19; see also Jer 13:18), and participated in her son's rule over the kingdom (Jer 13:18, 20). The queen mother also served as a counselor to the king (Prov 31) and as an advocate for the people, bringing their petitions before her royal son (1 Kgs 2:17, 20).

The importance of the queen mother perhaps can best be seen by contrasting Bathsheba's role when she was the wife of King DAVID with her treatment when her son SOLOMON became king. As David's wife, she enters the royal chamber, bows before her husband, pays him homage, and leaves, saying "May David live forever!" (1 Kgs 1:16, 31). However, after David dies and her son Solomon takes the throne, she is suddenly treated like a queen: King Solomon bows before her and brings a throne out for her to be placed at his right hand, the position of authority and honor. In this scene, Bathsheba announces that she is bearing a petition from someone in the kingdom, and Solomon responds, "Make your request my mother, for I will not refuse you" (1 Kgs 2:20).

With this background in mind, it is not surprising that the New Testament portrays the mother of Jesus in ways that recall the queen mother of the Davidic kingdom. At the ANNUNCIATION, Mary is told that her Son will be the long-awaited Davidic MESSIAH—the one who would fulfill the promises made to David (Lk 1:32–33; 2 Sam 7:9–16). Mary, thus, is being given the vocation to be the mother of the king, which is why some have seen the queen mother tradition in the background of this scene. Similarly, Elizabeth's addressing Mary as "the mother of my Lord" at the Visitation (Lk 1:43) points to her queenship. Since "my Lord" is typically used as a royal title (see 2 Sam 24:21), Elizabeth's words highlight Jesus' status as the king. Yet, by her calling Mary "mother of my Lord," these words also point to Mary's own role as the mother of the king—a role that, in light of the Old Testament background, recalls the queen mother of the Davidic kingdom.

The woman of Revelation 12 also can be seen in this light. While commentators often interpret the woman as a symbol for ISRAEL or the Church, the woman figure also has traditionally been seen as having Marian significance, which is quite fitting, since Revelation 12 portrays the woman as the mother of the messiah. She gives birth to a son who is attacked by the DEVIL, taken up to heaven, seated on a throne, and destined to "rule all nations with a rod of iron"—an allusion to the messianic Psalm 2 (Rv 12:5–6). Depicted as the mother of the messiah, the woman certainly could be viewed as Mary.

As such, since the woman appears with her kingly son and wears a crown of twelve stars, she is clearly meant to be seen as a queenly figure. Like the queen mothers of old, she wears a crown, symbolizing her reign in the Church. She is clothed with the sun, radiating God's glory, and even the moon under her feet points to her royal authority, since "under the feet" imagery symbolizes royal power and the defeat of one's enemies (e.g., Ps 8:6; 110:1).

The Patristic Period and Beyond. The earliest Church Fathers expressed belief in Mary's royal office in two ways. JEROME and Peter CHRYSOLOGUS, for example, saw royal meaning in Mary's name, which was translated domina in Latin, meaning lady or sovereign. Others, such as CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, AMBROSE, and AUGUSTINE, as well as Jerome, focused on Mary being called "mother of my Lord," which led to deeper reflection on Mary's association with Christ's kingship. Origen was one of the first to do this, viewing Elizabeth's greeting Mary with the words "mother of my Lord" as honoring her with royal dignity. This approach paved the way for later Church Fathers to refer explicitly to Mary as queen. Chrysippus of Jerusalem, for example, made this move, referring to Mary as the mother of the king, who herself will be changed into a heavenly queen.

Writers in the medieval period went on to consider the foundations for Mary's queenship, focusing on her divine maternity and her unique cooperation in her Son's salvific work. The function and extent of her queenship also were elaborated upon. Mary's royal office was seen as one in which she ruled over heaven and earth, guiding and protecting souls through the power of her INTERCESSION. Liturgical practices also eventually expressed belief in Mary's queenship. The BYZANTINE LITURGY, for example, often referred to Mary as "queen," and the West honored Mary as queen in popular devotions such as the ROSARY and the LITANY of Our Lady and in hymns used in the LITURGY, such as the"Salve Regina," "Ave Regina Caelorum," and "Regina Caeli."

Magisterial Teaching. The Church's magisterium has often referred to Mary as a queenly figure. As early as the Third Council of Constantinople (680–681), Mary was called despoina (meaning lady), which was a queenly title. The most extensive magisterial teaching on Mary's queenship was Pope PIUS XII's 1954 ENCYCLICAL Ad caeli reginam (On Proclaiming the Queenship of Mary), which reaffirmed the traditional belief in Mary's queenship and instituted a liturgical feast to celebrate this Marian truth. Following the medieval tradition, the encyclical sees the theological basis for Mary's queenship in her being the mother of God and in her cooperation with her Son's salvific work. Pius XII also explains Mary's royal authority in the context of her powerful role as intercessor—a point that fits well with the advocacy role of the queen mother in Scripture:

> With a heart that is truly a mother's does she approach the problem of our salvation, and is solicitous for the whole human race; made Queen of heaven and earth by the Lord, exalted above all choirs of angels and saints, and standing at the right hand of her only Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord, she intercedes powerfully for us with a mother's prayers, obtains what she seeks, and cannot be refused. (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 46 [1954], 636–637)

The most noteworthy development in the Church's postconciliar teachings on Mary's queenship is found in Pope JOHN PAUL II's encyclical Redemptoris mater (On the Blessed Virgin Mary in the Life of the Pilgrim Church, 1987). John Paul II reaffirmed previous teaching, but introduced a new emphasis that considers Mary's royal office in the context of her humble service in the kingdom. Just as Jesus humbly served to the point of death and was raised and brought into heavenly glory as Lord over all (see Phil 2:8–9), so does Mary have "a share in this Kingdom of her Son" through her humble Christlike service (sec. 41). The pope notes how all true disciples of Christ are called to reign with Jesus through such service: "to serve is to reign." Mary does this in an exemplary way. John Paul II taught that Mary lived out her title as "the handmaid of the Lord" throughout her life and that she was the first disciple who served Christ in others and led them to him (sec. 41). The pope went on to explain that Mary's royal service continues even in heaven: "assumed into heaven, she does not cease her saving service, which expresses her maternal mediation 'until the eternal fulfillment of all the elect'" (sec. 41).

These insights underscore the Christological basis of Mary's queenship. Mary's royal office is rooted in Christ's. As John Paul II explained, Jesus' own royal exaltation flows from his humble self-abasement, becoming a slave, being obedient unto death, death on a cross (Phil 2:5–11). This is significant because the New Testament presents Mary as a model disciple whose life reflects this abasement-exaltation pattern. She is the first to hear God's word and obediently accept it (Lk 1:38, 45; 11:27–28), and she perseveres in faithfulness throughout her life (Acts 1:14), even in the face of suffering (Lk 2:34–5; Jn 19:25–27). Most of all, Mary is specifically described as being a lowly servant of the Lord whom God has exalted (Lk 1:45–55). Since Mary thus reflects Christ's royal pattern of service, it is fitting that the Church honors her as having a unique participation in Christ's reign.

John Paul II's teachings also shed light on the ecclesial dimension of Mary's queenship. Jesus promised that all his faithful disciples would reign with him (Mt 19:28–30; Rv 3:20–21; Lk. 22:28–30; 2 Tim 2:11–12). As the first and model disciple of Jesus, it is fitting that she would participate in the reign promised to all of Christ's faithful followers. In this light, Mary's exalted position in heaven should not be seen as something far removed from the daily Christian life. Rather, Mary's queenship inspires Christians to imitate her humble service as a disciple of Christ, so that they might reign in the same kingdom that she perfectly possesses.

MARY (AND ECUMENICAL DIALOGUE)

The ecumenical dimension of Marian doctrine was addressed at Vatican II in Lumen gentium, no. 67, which urged Catholics to "assiduously keep away from whatever, either by word or deed, could lead separated brethren or any other into error regarding the true doctrine of the Church." This was not a call to diminish the importance of Catholic teaching regarding Mary. Rather, it was an exhortation for Catholics to present Marian doctrines and devotions to other Christians in an accurate but ecumenically sensitive manner. Vatican II also expressed "great joy and comfort" in knowing that "even among the separated brethren there are some who give due honor to the Mother of our Lord and Savior, especially among the Orientals, who with devout mind and fervent impulse give honor to the Mother of God, ever virgin" (Lumen gentium, no. 69). In a similar manner, in its decree on ecumenism, Unitatis redintegratio, the Council praised the separated Eastern Christians who "pay high tribute, in beautiful hymns of praise, to Mary, ever Virgin, whom the ecumenical Synod of Ephesus solemnly proclaimed to be the holy Mother of God in order that Christ might be truly and properly honored as Son of God and Son of Man according to the scriptures" (no. 15).

Vatican II recognized the need for Mary's heavenly INTERCESSION in the cause of ecumenism. Thus, all the faithful were urged to pour forth "urgent supplications" to the "Mother of God and the human race" so that she, "who aided the beginnings of the Church by her prayers, may now, exalted as she is above all the angels and saints, intercede before her Son in the fellowship of all the saints, until all families of people, whether they are honored with the title of Christian or whether they still do not know the Savior, may be happily gathered in peace and harmony into one people of God, for the glory of the Most Holy and Undivided Trinity" (Lumen gentium, no. 69).

Postconciliar Statements. After Vatican II, the ecumenical aspects of Marian doctrine are addressed in a number of documents. In 1970, the Secretariat for the Promotion of Unity of the Unity of Christians, in its Reflections and Suggestions Concerning Ecumenical Dialogue, points out how the Marian dogmas should be understood and presented in connection with other revealed dogmas. Thus, for example, the IMMACULATE CONCEPTION should not be isolated from what the Council of EPHESUS (431) teaches about Mary as the Mother of God or the dogma of grace and its foundation in the redemptive incarnation of the Word (no. 4b). Pope PAUL VI, in his 1974 Apostolic Exhortation, Marialis cultus, notes how "devotion to the Mother of the Lord is in accord with the deep desires and aims of the ecumenical movement" because of Mary's own concern for Christian unity (no. 32). In this regard, he cites Pope LEO XIII, who in his 1895 encyclical, Adiuctricem populi, states that the cause of Christian unity "properly belongs to the role of Mary's spiritual motherhood" because, as a mother, she yearns for those who belong to Christ to be "in one faith and one love" (Marialis cultus, no. 33; Adiuctricem populi, no. 27).

Pope JOHN PAUL II, in his 1987 encyclical, Redemptoris mater, also highlights Mary's role in ecumenism, and he sees it as a "hopeful sign" that the separated "Churches and ecclesial communities are finding agreement with the Catholic Church on fundamental points of Christian belief, including matters relating to the Virgin Mary" (no. 30). In this regard, he notes especially "how the Catholic Church, the Orthodox Church, and the ancient Churches of the East feel united by love and praise of the Theotókos" (no. 31). He likewise points to the great honor given to Mary in the Byzantine liturgy (no. 32) and in the iconography of the East (no. 33).

In 1988, a year after Redemptoris mater, the Congregation for Catholic Education issued a letter on "The Virgin Mary in Intellectual and Spiritual Formation." This letter also underscores the importance of MARIOLOGY in the field of ecumenism, and it mentions how, in his December 7, 1987, homily given at St. Mary Major in Rome, Patriarch Dimitrios I of Constantinople observed that "the subject of Mariology should occupy a central position in the theological dialogue between our Churches ... for the full establishment of our ecclesial communion" (no. 14). The Congregation's letter also points out how dialogue with "the Reformation Churches ... has brought an end to the centuries-old mistrust" and led, in some cases, to a better appreciation of the person of Mary in ecclesial life (no. 14).

In his 1995 encyclical on ecumenism, Ut unum sint, John Paul II notes "five areas in need of fuller study before a true consensus of faith can be achieved" with separated Christians (no. 79). Among these five areas is the study of "the Virgin Mary, as Mother of God and Icon of the Church, the spiritual Mother who intercedes for Christ's disciples and for all humanity" (Ut unum sint, no. 79).

Dialogue with the Assyrian Church of the East. As already noted, the separated Eastern Churches join with the Catholic Church in giving high praise and devotion to the Blessed Virgin Mary. Traditionally, all of the Eastern Churches recognize Mary as the ever-virgin Mother of God or Theotókos (the birth-giver of God). The one exception was the ASSYRIAN CHURCH OF THE EAST, which had historically been referred to as "Nestorian" for its rejection of the teaching of the Council of Ephesus on Mary as Theotókos (preferring instead to speak of Mary as only Christotókos or "Mother of Christ"). In point of fact, however, the Assyrian Church of the East had actually distanced itself from the Nestorian doctrine, which separated the person of the Word of God from the person of Jesus, the Messiah, born of the Virgin Mary. In 1994 Pope John Paul II and Mar Dinkha IV, the Patriarch of the Assyrian Church of the East, signed a "Common Christological Agreement," acknowledging that the Catholic Church and the Assyrian Church of the East share the same faith "that the humanity to which the Blessed Virgin Mary gave birth was that of the Son of God himself," which is why the Assyrian Church prays to the Virgin Mary as "the Mother of Christ our God and Savior." Thus, both the Catholic Church and the Assyrian Church of the East "recognize the legitimacy and the rightness" of "Mother of Christ" and "Mother of God" as expressions "of the same faith," and "both respect the preference of each Church in her liturgical life and piety" (Dupuis 1996, no. 638, p. 254).

Dialogue with the Eastern Orthodox. The mainline Eastern Orthodox Churches accept the first seven ecumenical councils from Nicea I (325) through Nicea II (787) as binding doctrinally. Thus, they affirm Mary as the Theotókos as taught by Ephesus in 431, and they acknowledged Mary as "ever virgin" (Aeiparthenos), a title given to her at CONSTANTINOPLE II in 553 (cf. Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 437) and in the Byzantine liturgy. They also affirm the importance of icons of "our unblemished Lady, the holy Mother of God" as supported by Nicea II (Denzinger-Hünermann 2005, 600). They likewise recognize Mary as all-holy (Panaghia), and they ask for her intercession in prayer. Liturgically, the Orthodox also celebrate Mary's "Dormition" or "Falling Asleep," which is equivalent to the Catholic feast of her Assumption (Ware 1993, p. 260).

The Immaculate Conception is the one Catholic Marian dogma that the Orthodox, for the most part, reject. Either they say this dogma separates Mary too much from the rest of humanity, or they fail to see how it can be reconciled with the widespread Patristic belief in Mary's death prior to her Assumption into heaven. Since death is the punishment for ORIGINAL SIN, it is difficult to understand how Mary, who is widely thought to have died, was exempt from this effect of the Fall. Some Orthodox, however, believe Mary's exemption from original sin can be sustained as a theological opinion, but not as a dogma established by papal INFALLIBILITY (which they reject). Moreover, almost all Orthodox believe that Mary was free from actual sin, even if her death prevents the affirmation of her exemption from original sin (Ware 1993, p. 259).

In recent years, some Catholics have tried to present the dogma of Mary's Immaculate Conception in terms of her "original holiness" due to the deifying grace of God. Church Fathers such as St. John of Damascus (c. 675–749) are cited as providing support for Mary's conception in her mother's womb as all-pure and free from all stain (Fastiggi 2009, p. 3). Some Orthodox have, in turn, pointed to the doctrine of theosis or divinization as providing a possible basis for convergence between Catholics and Orthodox on Mary's Immaculate Conception, namely, maintaining that Mary's theosis began at the moment of her conception (Kimball 2004, pp. 228–244). Others, however, believe different concepts of original sin are the cause for the lack of consensus between Catholics and Orthodox with respect to the Immaculate Conception (Likoudis 2004, pp. 352–368). In this regard, Catholics claim that the possible death of Mary prior to her Assumption into heaven in no way argues against the Immaculate Conception, for the latter is concerned with Mary's preservation from the formal aspect of original sin, namely, the deprivation of sanctifying grace or holiness and not bodily death, which is something that even Jesus, who was sinless, endured (Fastiggi 2009, p. 10).

Dialogue with the Anglicans. After King Henry VIII's break with Rome in 1534, Marian piety did not immediately go into decline in the Church of England. The Ten Articles of 1536 affirmed the authority of the "four Holy Councils," which included Ephesus of 431 and its doctrine of Mary as Theotókos or Mother of God. Until King Henry VIII's death in 1547, belief in Marian intercession remained in place. During the reign of Edward VI (1547–1553), however, Thomas CRANMER (1489–1556), the Archbishop of Canterbury, introduced Protestant attitudes toward Mary. By 1571, the Thirty-Nine Articles of Religion were seen as ruling out prayers to Mary because of Article XXII, which described "the invocation Saints" as "a fond thing, vainly invented, and grounded upon no warranty of Scripture" (O'Carroll 2000, p. 28). There was some revival of Marian piety during the seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth centuries, with the CAROLINE DIVINES and the theologians of the OXFORD MOVEMENT. In the twentieth century, some ANGLO-CATHOLICS began to revive Marian piety and encourage devotions such as the recitation of the ROSARY. In 1967 the Ecumenical Society of the Blessed Virgin Mary was formed in England, and it continues to this day.

By far the most significant breakthrough in Catholic–Anglican dialogue on Mary is the statement of the ANGLICAN/ROMAN CATHOLIC INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION (ARCIC), Mary: Grace and Hope in Christ, which was completed in 2004 and published in 2005. This statement builds upon prior insights and agreements of the ARCIC, and it attempts to root Marian doctrines in Scripture and the ancient common Tradition. It likewise sees the role of Mary "within the pattern of grace and hope" (nos. 52–57), and it places the papal definitions of the Immaculate Conception and the Assumption within this context. Among the more significant aspects of the statement are: the common affirmation of Mary as Theotókos, "the mother of God incarnate" (no. 76); the mutual acknowledgement that the Catholic doctrines of the Immaculate Conception and the Assumption "can be consonant with the teaching of the Scriptures and the ancient common traditions" (no. 78); and the belief "that Mary and the saints pray for the whole Church and the practice of asking Mary and the saints to pray for us is not communion dividing" (no. 78).

Dialogue with the Protestants. The Protestants (or Christians of the ecclesial communities that emerged in the West during and after the sixteenth-century Reformation) have distanced themselves from various Catholic doctrines concerning Mary because of their insistence on what some call "the three only's: sola scriptura, sola fides and solus Christus" (Jelly 1986, p. 199). Because of "scripture alone" (sola scriptura), Protestants traditionally have rejected the Catholic beliefs of the Immaculate Conception and the Assumption, which they claim are not supported in the Bible. The emphasis on "scripture alone" has also led many Protestants to reject Mary as "ever-virgin," even though original Protestants, including LUTHER, ZWINGLI, and CALVIN, did not believe Mary had any other children besides Jesus (cf. Thurian 1964, pp. 37–41).

The Protestant teaching of sola fides ("faith alone") seems to rule out the Catholic belief in Mary's free cooperation and consent with God's salvific plan as taught in Lumen gentium, no. 56, and elsewhere. Furthermore, the principle of solus Christus ("Christ alone") appears contrary to Catholic doctrines of Mary as Mediatrix and heavenly Advocate (cf. Lumen gentium, nos. 60–63). Thus, Protestants have traditionally rejected the invocation of Mary and the saints in prayer because this practice seems to challenge the all-sufficiency of Christ, the one Mediator (Jelly 1986, p. 200). In a similar manner, Catholic devotion to Mary and the saints strikes many Protestants as a form of IDOLATRY and a violation of the commandment to worship God alone (cf. Ex 20:3–5; Dt 20:7–9).

The original Protestants, while objecting to the intercession and mediation of Mary, still maintained some Catholic beliefs concerning the Blessed Virgin. Martin Luther (1483–1546), for example, upheld Mary as the Mother of God and ever-virgin (O'Carroll 2000, p. 227). John Calvin (1509–1564) likewise affirmed the perpetual VIRGINITY of Mary, and he recognized Mary as the Mother of God from a theological perspective. Nevertheless, he preferred to speak of Mary as "the Virgin Mary" rather than the Mother of God because the latter title "can only serve to harden the ignorant in their superstition" (O'Carroll 2000, p. 94).

In recent decades, ecumenical discussions between Catholics and Protestants about Mary have resulted in a number of important studies and publications. In 1978 there appeared Mary in the New Testament: A Collaborative Assessment by Protestant and Roman Catholic Scholars. In 1992 The One Mediator, the Saints and Mary was published, synthesizing the results of U.S. Lutheran-Catholic discussions about Mary from 1983 to 1990. In 1999 an ecumenical group of some forty theologians in France, known as the Groupe des Dombes, published Marie dans le dessein de Dieu et la communion des saints, which came out in English in 2002 as Mary in the Plan of God and the Communion of the Saints. In 2000 the Bilateral Working Group of the German National Bishops' Conference and the Church Leadership of the United Evangelical Lutheran Church published Communio Sanctorum: Die Kirche als Gemeinschaft der Heiligen, which appeared in English in 2004 as Communio Sanctorum: The Church as the Communion of Saints. This book tries to understand Mary within the context of the Church as the communion of saints joined to Christ.

These studies reflect a growing effort on the part of Catholics and Protestants to consider points of agreement and disagreement regarding Marian doctrines. The overall thrust has been to understand Mary in the light of biblical teachings on salvation and grace and theological doctrines on Christ and the Church. Many Protestants have clearly moved away from prior hostility toward Catholic Marian doctrines, and many are prepared to say that these teachings "do not subvert the Gospel and have symbolic force" (Wicks 2000, p. 48). Moreover, the ecumenical community of Taizé has had a very "positive influence" with respect to a Protestant openness to Mary in liturgy and theology (Wicks 2000, p. 34). Although the more prominent Catholic-Protestant dialogues have been between Catholics and Lutherans and Catholics and Reformed (i.e., Calvinist) Christians, there have also been discussions of Mary between Catholics and Methodists and Catholics and Baptists (Thompson 2004, pp. 254–255). In all of these dialogues, Catholics have found the teachings of Lumen gentium, nos. 52–69, and Paul VI's Marialis cultus to be invaluable resources for ecumenical discussions concerning the Blessed Virgin Mary.

MARY MAGDALENE OF THE INCARNATION, BL.

Baptized Caterina Sordini, also known as Mother Mary Magdalene; foundress of the Perpetual Adorers of the Blessed Sacrament; b. April 16, 1770, Grosseto, Italy; d. April 29, 1824, Rome; beatified by Pope BENEDICT XVI on May 3, 2008.

Contemplating an arranged marriage at the age of seventeen, Caterina, the child of devout Catholic parents, was confronted by the reflection of Christ in her mirror. The image simply asked, "Do you want to leave me for another?" Shortly thereafter, in February 1788, she visited the Franciscan Tertiary Monastery in Ischia di Castro, and she made the decision to enter the order. Caterina took her vows six months later, becoming Sr. Mary Magdalene of the INCARNATION. In 1789 she received a vision of Jesus seated on a throne in the Blessed Sacrament surrounded by adoring virgins. During this state of ECSTASY, she heard Christ say, "I have chosen you to establish the work of perpetual adorers who, day and night, will offer me their humble adoration." In response, Sr. Mary Magdalene founded the Perpetual Adorers of the Blessed Sacrament, an enclosed, contemplative order dedicated to the prayerful adoration of Christ within the Eucharist. She was elected abbess on April 20, 1802.

Under Mother Mary Magdalene, the abbey experienced extraordinary blessings and growth. In May 1807 she and a small contingent of sisters traveled to Rome with a draft of the new congregation's rules. By July the convent of Sts. Joachim and Anne was established. During the Napoleonic Wars the order was suppressed, the convent appropriated, and Mother Mary Magdalene banished to Tuscany, where she reestablished the order.

After the wars, in March 1814, the order relocated to Sant'Anna al Quirinale in Rome. Pope PIUS VII approved the order's institutes, "dedicated to perpetual, solemn, [and] public exposition of the Most Blessed Sacrament," on February 13, 1818.

Mother Mary Magdalene died and was buried at the convent in 1824. In 1939, when the order of Perpetual Adorers moved to a different location in Rome, the Church of Santa Maria Maddalena, her remains were relocated to the new site. In 2007 Benedict XVI confirmed a miracle attributed to her INTERCESSION. At her BEATIFICATION Cardinal Martins said, "Just as Jesus stays in the sacrament after the [Eucharistic] celebration too, it is necessary for us to stay with him, [in an] adoration that is prolonged through time.... [T]he testimony of the new blessed is an impulse to never lose the conviction about the fundamental and irreplaceable importance of prayer, and above all, the recognition of the Eucharist in its role as source and summit of our faith lives."

MASTENA, MARIA PIA, BL.

Foundress of the Sisters of the Holy Face; b. December 7, 1881, in the town of Bovolone, Verona Province, Italy; d. June 28, 1951, in Rome; beatified November 13, 2005, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

Maria Pia Mastena was born to a Christian family and embraced religious life at a young age. On the occasion of her FIRST COMMUNION on March 19, 1891, she made a private vow of CHASTITY. She was active in her family's parish as a CATECHIST. Early on, she showed devotion to the Eucharist and to the Holy Face, and at age fourteen, she requested to enter religious life.

Mastena was not accepted until 1901, when she entered the Institute of the SISTERS OF MERCY at Verona as a postulant. On September 29, 1902, she was vested with the religious habit. A few months later, on April 11, 1903, she made "a private vow to be a victim soul." Then on October 24, 1904, she professed vows of religious life and received the name Sister Passitea Maria of the Child Jesus.

This phase of Mastena's life was characterized by a spiritual intensity, which led her later in life to take a vow to seek perfection in all things. She became a dedicated teacher in the Veneto region, serving for more than nineteen years in Miane. There, she showed great concern for the spiritual well-being and religious education of students of all abilities.

In April 1927, with the approval of her superiors and the HOLY SEE, Mastena entered the Cistercian monastery of Veglie with the aim of pursuing the CONTEMPLATIVE LIFE. But before year's end, encouraged by the bishop of Vittorio Veneto, she returned instead to teaching and began to work toward founding a new religious institute, the Sisters of the Holy Face. The institute was canonically recognized on December 8, 1936, and was recognized as a Congregation of Pontifical Right on December 10, 1947.

Mastena died on June 28, 1951, and was laid to rest in the town of San Fior, Italy. In his address to pilgrims in Rome on the day of her BEATIFICATION in 2005, Pope Benedict XVI said of Mastena, "Won over by the Face of Christ, she assumed the Son of God's sentiments of sweet concern for humanity disfigured by sin, put into practice his acts of compassion and subsequently planned an Institute whose aim was to 'propagate, repair and restore Jesus' gentle image in souls.'"

MATTIAS, MARIA DE, ST.

Foundress of the Sisters Adorers of the Most Precious Blood; b. February 4, 1805, Vallecorsa (Frosinone), Italy; d. August 20, 1866, Rome; beatified by Pius XII, October 1, 1950; canonized by Pope John Paul II, May 18, 2003.

Maria's parents, Giovanni and Ottavia (de Angelis) de Mattias, were poor but afforded her a good education. During a mission in Vallecorsa preached by St. Gaspare del BUFALO (1822), she was inspired to dedicate her life to prayer and good works. Under the guidance of Giovanni MERLINI, her spiritual director, Mattias organized a group of religious women with special devotion to the PRECIOUS BLOOD dedicated to the education of youth. The congregation originated when Mattias opened a school at Acuto on the invitation of the bishop of Anagni (March 4, 1834). Despite habitual poor health and misunderstanding within the community concerning her intentions, Mattias established sixty-three houses. In part this success was due to the generosity of a Russian widow, Princess Zena Wolkonska.

Mattias was beatified on October 1, 1950, and canonized nearly fifty-three years later by Pope JOHN PAUL II on May 18, 2003. In his homily the pope referred to St. Mattias as a woman whose "love for Jesus crucified was expressed in her passion for souls and in humble devotion to her brothers and sisters."

In addition to the two official miracles credited to St. Mattias toward her beatification in 1950, a third miracle, which cleared the path for her canonization, was officially recognized by the VATICAN. The miracle involved the intercession of St. Mattias in healing a sick boy born in Croatia, who was the great nephew of Sister Nikolina Zorica, a member of the SISTERS ADORERS OF THE PRECIOUS BLOOD founded by St. Mattias. The boy had contracted what medical experts labeled subacute encephalitis. After his family offered repeated prayers to the then Blessed Mattias, the boy underwent a recovery inexplicable by modern science. The miracle was officially recognized in the months leading up to St. Mattias's canonization.

Today St. Mattias continues to be sought after in prayers of intercession. Her legacy reverberates through the influence of her life and the sisters of her order who continue her work.

MAZZINI, GIUSEPPE

Revolutionary Italian thinker and politician, founding member of the Triumvirate of the Roman Republic; b. June 22, 1805, Genoa, Italy; d. March 10, 1872, Pisa, Italy.

Mazzini owes his status as a leading figure in the movement for Italian national unity to tenacity of purpose and inspirational power. Born in Genoa, the only male offspring to a family of the upper middle class (his father was a successful physician and university professor), he was deeply influenced by the religious convictions of his mother, a well-educated woman of strong ideas and deep religious convictions that tended toward JANSENISM. The son displayed similarly strong character and resourcefulness. With limited resources, he influenced minds and the course of political events by effective use of the printed word, a network of personal contacts, and resilience in the face of repeated setbacks. His efforts were to promote Italian political unification, republicanism, and democracy, which he saw as inseparable aspects of the same movement.

A key component of his vision was the historical role that he assigned to ROME, destined as he saw it to become the capital of an Italian Republic brought about by popular revolution. Just as the Rome of the Caesars had spread the rule of law in the ancient world, and the Rome of the popes had spread the message of Christianity in medieval times, the Rome of the people, as capital of the Italian nation, would set the example of popular democratic government. For that vision to become reality, Italy would have to be unified as a republic, and MONARCHY would have to be abolished, in all its forms, including the papal monarchy. Mazzini was thus set on a collision course with the most common form of government in his time, and most of all with the government of the Papal State, which was in possession of Rome and stood in the way of Italian unification.

The fundamental principles of Mazzini's creed were in place early on. As a radical student leader at the University of Genoa, from which he graduated in 1827 with a law degree, he attracted attention with his qualities of leadership, resolve, and readiness to act. The law was not to be his career. He was drawn instead to literature, literary criticism, and journalism. Shortly after his graduation, he joined the secret society of the CARBONARI, from which he distanced himself as he became disillusioned by its empty rituals, infighting, and what he saw as political timidity and reluctance to act. He left the Kingdom of Sardinia for France in 1831 to avoid confinement for his involvement with the Carbonari. In July 1831 he founded Young Italy in Marseilles. Young Italy's conspiracies were notable failures, but in the course of the next three years it set a new tone in the politics of protest by openly proclaiming its goals and appealing to young people. It spawned a number of similar "Young" societies. Young Europe, founded in Bern in April 1834, called for the unity of European revolutionary movements against the conservative order and for international cooperation after the success of popular revolution.

Mazzini's ideology is rightly called a creed because it relied heavily on the motivating power of faith. Members of Young Italy were called "apostles," and they pledged selfless devotion to the cause. They were expected to behave in an exemplary manner, to resist worldly temptations, to seek converts, and to be prepared to suffer martyrdom if necessary. The use of violence was justified wherever governments denied basic civil liberties, and it was to be directed against tyrants and traitors of the cause. Mazzini's reliance on faith as a political motivator was not an endorsement of any specific religion or theology. He admired Christ as a moral teacher, but rejected the notion of his divinity. He admired the universal spirit of Catholicism, but rejected its clericalism and authoritarian premises. As regards Protestantism, he admired the call to individual CONSCIENCE and responsibility, but deplored its centrifugal tendencies and factionalism. He was interested in the Muslim faith and oriental religions, but never wrote the comprehensive study of religion that might have allowed him to define his religious views in relation to other creeds.

He lived the life of a political exile. Expelled from Italy in 1831, from France in 1833, and from Switzerland in 1837, he spent most of the rest of his life in London, where he soon stood out among thousands of other political exiles from various parts of Europe. His admirers and followers came from the ranks of the radical movement, the working and middle classes, and from Protestant evangelicals and dissenters. Religious minorities, including UNITARIANS, Methodists, Quakers, and Jews, were particularly attracted to him; women responded to his call for equal rights. In the United States, the Young America movement of the 1850s was inspired by his ideas, as were abolitionists, religious reformers, diplomats, and naval officers interested in promoting the cause of republicanism abroad. Mazzini also spoke out against socialists, whom he accused of promoting divisions in the social body by appealing solely to class interests and ignoring spiritual values, thereby undermining the unity of movements of national liberation.

The revolutions of 1848 brought to Mazzini his greatest moments of triumph. He returned to Italy that year, hoping to steer the revolutions already underway toward the goals of national unity and republican government. Welcomed initially with enthusiasm, he ran into opposition in Milan and FLORENCE, partly from republicans who objected to his political tactics. The situation was different in Rome, where his followers proclaimed the Roman Republic in February 1849, after Pope PIUS IX had left the city in the hands of insurgents. For the next five months Mazzini held center stage in Rome as a representative of the people and Triumvir of the Republic. The most pressing issue was the defense of the city against French, Austrian, Neapolitan, and Spanish forces sent to restore papal power. But the republican government also enacted reforms such as adopting universal suffrage, protecting and promoting civil liberties, and providing work for the unemployed. The Roman Republic was also notable for the introduction of public rituals, ceremonies, and festivals designed to cement the unity of people and government. Its enemies accused it of acts of violence against the clergy and of plundering the riches of the Church. It fell in July 1849, after putting up a valiant resistance that gave the RISORGIMENTO a long list of heroes and martyrs.

MCMANUS, FREDERICK R.

Priest, canon lawyer, liturgist, and university professor; b. Lynn, Massachusetts, February 8, 1923; d. Boston, Massachusetts, November 27, 2005.

After graduating from Boston College High School, Frederick McManus studied at Holy Cross College in Worcester, Massachusetts, from 1940 to 1942. He later attended St. John's Seminary in Brighton, Massachusetts, where he received a B.A. in 1947. He was ordained into the priesthood in May 1947, after which he performed some parish service and ministry within the archdiocesan tribunal. He then went on to study canon law at the CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA, receiving his doctorate in 1954. His dissertation, titled The Congregation of Sacred Rites, examined the preconciliar VATICAN office that monitored the celebration of the sacred LITURGY throughout the Church. This noteworthy work reflected the abiding liturgical interests and expertise that characterized his academic and professional life.

After teaching at St. John's Seminary in Boston, McManus joined the faculty of the Catholic University School of Canon Law in 1958, and he was promoted to the rank of ordinary professor in 1964. He functioned as dean of the School of Canon Law from 1967 to 1973, as vice provost and dean of graduate studies from 1974 to 1983, and as academic vice president from 1983 to 1985. He retired from his tenured position in September 1993 but continued to teach until 1997, when he was named a professor emeritus.

Monsignor McManus was known for his broad canonical knowledge, and he was an esteemed liturgist. In the 1950s and 1960s he was a significant figure in the LITURGICAL CONFERENCE, which fostered liturgical renewal in the United States, and he served as the conference's president from 1959 to 1962 and from 1964 to 1965. Immediately before VATICAN COUNCIL II, he was a consultor to the Pontifical Preparatory Commission on the Liturgy from 1960 to 1962. Subsequently, he was a peritus, or expert, at all four conciliar sessions (1962–1965), and he was especially involved in the drafting of the Sacrosanctum concilium (Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy). From 1964 to 1970, he functioned as an active consultor to the Consilium for the implementation of the aforementioned constitution. For ten years after Vatican II, he directed the Secretariat of the Committee on the Liturgy of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops.

McManus's liturgical expertise, however, was hardly limited to the United States. He was one of the original founders of the INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION ON ENGLISH IN THE LITURGY, and he helped to draft its statutes and served on its advisory board from 1963 until 2000. This influential body has been responsible for the development of common English translations of Latin liturgical texts.

McManus was not only a canonist and a liturgist, however, he was also a recognized ecumenical leader. He was a significant figure in the North American Academy of Ecumenists, for example, and he was a member of the CONSULTATION ON COMMON TEXTS and the ENGLISH LANGUAGE LITURGICAL CONSULTATION. He also served as a consultor to the Vatican Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity (1969–1974), as a member of the Catholic-Orthodox Bilateral Commission, and as a member of the International Commission for Catholic-Orthodox Theological Dialogue.

A prolific scholar, Monsignor McManus wrote eleven books and hundreds of scholarly and popular articles that reflected a pastoral awareness of and openness to new academic developments. His canonical interests were very broad, covering general norms on Church governance, liturgical-sacramental law (his principal scholarly focus), the law on ordained ministry, the law on diocesan and supradiocesan ecclesiastical structures, academic legislation, and ecumenical legislation.

From 1959 until 2005, McManus edited The Jurist, the academic journal of the Catholic University School of Canon Law. Under his leadership, the journal consistently addressed issues of ongoing theological, canonical, and pastoral relevance for its readers, who are from varied backgrounds in the United States and abroad. Furthermore, from 1965 through 1975, he edited the newsletter of the Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy. His ongoing liturgical education concerns were also evident in his service as associate editor of the Yearbook for Liturgical Studies (1960–1967) and the influential liturgical journal Worship (1968–1976). A keen interest in continuing clergy education shaped his service as associate editor of the Catholic University–sponsored American Ecclesiastical Review (1969–1975). Finally, for many years he was a member of the editorial board of the New Catholic Encyclopedia.

The breadth of McManus's academic and professional interests was evident in his varied professional and academic memberships, which included the American Association of University Professors; the ASSOCIATION OF CATHOLIC COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES; the CATHOLIC THEOLOGICAL SOCIETY OF AMERICA (which awarded him its highest honor, the John Courtney Murray Award, in 1990); the CATHOLIC COMMISSION ON CULTURAL AND INTELLECTUAL AFFAIRS; the Interfaith Forum on Religion, Art, and Architecture; the NORTH AMERICAN ACADEMY OF LITURGY (which granted him its Berakah Award in 1980); and the SOCIETAS LITURGICA.

The CANON LAW SOCIETY OF AMERICA recognized McManus's preeminent canonical service by according him the first of its prestigious Role of Law awards in 1973. He was also one of the very few Americans who served as a consultor to the Pontifical Commission for the Revision of the 1917 Code of Canon Law (1967–1973), especially in light of Vatican II and contemporary pastoral developments. He worked tirelessly with members of the Association of Catholic Colleges and Universities in expressing their concerns about the drafting of academic legislation in the revised 1983 Code of Canon Law and in the 1990 APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTION on Catholic universities, Ex corde ecclesiae. He was also a member of the board of directors of the renowned Institute of Medieval Canon Law in Berkeley, California, for many years. Finally, he was a long-time member of the international canon law group, the Consociatio Internationalis Studio Iuris Canonici Promovendo.

A scholar, administrator, teacher, and author, McManus was appreciated by many for his gentle wit, keen insight, and generous cooperation with students and faculty, church leaders, liturgists, ecumenists, and ordinary FAITHFUL. His service to the Church was multifaceted, for he gave help and advice to the bishops gathered in ecumenical councils, in conferences (such as the National Conference of Catholic Bishops), and in their dioceses; to the Catholic University of America community; and to the worshiping people of God in the English-speaking world, whom he served exceptionally well through his liturgical teaching, writing, and practice.

MENEGUZZI, LIDUINA, BL.

Baptized Elisa Angela Meneguzzi, also known as "Angelina," Sister Liduina of the Sisters of St. FRANCES DE SALES; missionary in Ethiopia; b. September 12, 1901, in Giarre, Padova district, Italy; d. December 2, 1941, in Dire Dawa, Ethiopia; beatified October 20, 2002, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

Born to a farming family in Giarre, near Abano Terme in Padova, Italy, Elisa Angela Meneguzzi demonstrated religious devotion and a willingness to serve others at a young age. At fourteen, she began laboring as a servant in wealthy households and hotels in Abano, a resort town, earning wages to support her family.

On March 5, 1926, she entered the congregation of Sisters of Saint Francis de Sales in Padova, taking the name Liduina. Working as a servant, SACRISTAN, and nurse in the Santa Croce boarding school, she became a friend and confidant to many of the students.

Meneguzzi was drawn to overseas mission work, and in 1937 her superiors sent her to Dire Dawa, in Ethiopia, as a missionary. The Parini Civil Hospital, where she worked as a nurse, became a military hospital during WORLD WAR II (1939–1945). She tended to injured soldiers, alleviating their suffering whenever possible. Sr. Gudda (Sr. Great), as the Ethiopians called her, became known for her compassion and bravery. During bombing raids, when others cried out for help, she risked her life to carry the injured to safety, to minister to the mortally wounded, and to baptize dying children.

Meneguzzi demonstrated a love of her fellow man that surpassed the boundaries of her own background, reaching out not only to Christians and Italians, but to people of other races, cultures, and religious persuasions in Dire Dawa. Many of those who heard her speak were drawn to Catholicism.

When her health declined because of an incurable disease, she continued to minister to the injured as long as she was able. She died of complications following surgery on December 2, 1941, at age forty. Meneguzzi was buried in the graveyard of Dire Dawa in the area reserved for soldiers. Twenty years later, her body was brought to Padova to rest in the chapel of the motherhouse of the Sisters of Saint Frances de Sales. During the BEATIFICATION HOMILY for Meneguzzi and five others on October 20, 2002, Pope John Paul II observed that "in the course of her brief but intense life, Sister Liduina poured herself out for her poorer and suffering brothers, particularly at the hospital of the mission of Dire Dawa in Ethiopia."

MERKERT, MARIA LUISA, BL.

Cofounder and first superior general of the Congregation of the Sisters of St. Elizabeth; b. September 21, 1817, at Nysa, Silesia, Poland (then Germany); d. November 14, 1872, at Nysa; beatified September 30, 2007, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

After their father's death in 1818, Maria Luisa Merkert and her sister, Matilde, were educated and trained in the Catholic faith by their mother, Maria Barbara Pfitzner. Merkert cared for her ill mother prior to her death in 1842. The experience led her to commit to serving the sick and the poor. To this end, she and Matilde, along with Frances Werner, joined Clara Wolff, a Third Order Franciscan, in Wolff's work. They went on to found the Association of Sisters for the Assistance of Abandoned Sick, under the Protection of the Most Sacred Heart of Jesus, with the guidance of Fr. Frances Xavier Fischer.

Matilde Merkert died of typhus in 1846. Later that year, Fr. Fischer arranged for Maria Merkert and Werner to enter the novitiate of the SISTERS OF MERCY of St. Charles BORROMEO in Prague. In 1850 they left the Sisters of Mercy to carry on their work in Nysa with the homebound sick and the needy. There, they became known as the Gray Sisters of St. Elizabeth.

Ecclesiastic approval for the sisters' work was granted in 1859, and before the end of the year, the first general chapter met and elected Merkert its superior general. In 1860 she and twenty-five sisters took vows of POVERTY, CHASTITY, and OBEDIENCE, along with a fourth vow to care for the poor and sick. Merkert served as superior general until her death on November 14, 1872. The congregation grew to around five hundred sisters during that time, operating ninety religious houses in nine dioceses. In 1887 they were officially approved as a Congregation of Pontifical Right by Pope LEO XIII.

Because of her devotion to the sick and the poor, Merkert became known as the Samaritan of Silesia. In 1964 her remains were brought to the crypt of the Church of St. James at Nysa. They were moved to a side chapel of the same church in 1998.

Merkert was declared VENERABLE on December 20, 2004. On the day of her BEATIFICATION on September 30, 2007, Pope Benedict XVI, in a greeting to pilgrims from Poland, said Merkert "stood out for her concern for the sick, the poor and the abandoned."

MERZ, IVAN, BL.

Lay Catholic intellectual, apostle of youth, promoter of liturgical renewal, activist, educator; b. Banja Luka, Bosnia, December 16, 1896; d. Zagreb, Croatia, May 10, 1928; beatified June 22, 2003, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

Ivan Merz was a Croatian born in Banja Luka, Bosnia, in 1896. He lived during a turbulent time when Austria-Hungary occupied Bosnia, and he sought to use his gift of intelligence to revitalize the faith of the young people of his country. Merz received a rigorous education in Vienna and Paris, culminating in a doctorate in philosophy. He took two years away from his studies when he served in WORLD WAR I (1914–1918) on the Italian front, where the horrors he experienced profoundly affected him on a spiritual level. During the war, he wrote in his diary, "Never forget God! ... It would be terrible if this war had no meaning for me! ... I must begin a life regenerated in the spirit of this new understanding ... The Lord alone can help me, as man can do nothing on his own" (L'Osservatore Romano 2003, pp. 6–7).

At this time, Ivan took a private vow of CELIBACY and devoted himself to his Catholic faith, becoming a leader in CATHOLIC ACTION, liturgical renewal, and the education of young Croatian Catholics. He drew great inspiration and nourishment from the Eucharist, scriptures, and devotion to the Virgin Mary. Through his youth work, he sought to form a group of frontline apostles whose goal was holiness. Shortly before he died at age thirty-two, he offered his life for the youth of Croatia. After Merz's death, the healing of Anica Ercegovic from Gradusa near Sunja was attributed to Merz's prayerful INTERCESSION.

In his BEATIFICATION sermon in June 2003 at an open-air Mass on Merz's native soil, Pope John Paul II described Merz as a "gifted young man [who] made a good return on his rich natural talents and obtained great human success." But what made him blessed in God's eyes was that the great aspiration of his life was never to forget God. The pope shared Merz's life and words with a beleaguered and disheartened Catholic community in the Balkans, which was emerging from a terrible period of suffering and bloodshed between Croatian Catholics and Bosnian Muslims. The pope held Ivan Merz up as a beacon, so that young people everywhere, but especially in Merz's homeland, might act as lights in the world, resolutely countering evil with good and helping war-torn lands become places of reconciliation, encounter, and peace. Merz's commitment to actively living the Christian life and aspiring to holiness explains why 35,000 people from Bosnia-Herzegovina and neighboring countries were drawn to his beatification Mass, where John Paul II appealed directly to youth: "The name of Ivan Merz has meant in the past a program of life and activity for an entire generation of young Catholics. Today too it must do the same!"

MILLERET, MARIE EUGENIE OF JESUS, ST.

Baptized Anne Eugenie; foundress of the Religious of the Assumption; b. August 26, 1817, Metz, Lorraine, France; d. March 9, 1898, Auteuil, Hauts-de-Seine, France; canonized June 3, 2007, in Rome, by Pope BENEDICT XVI.

Anne Eugenie enjoyed a childhood of comfort and security. She was especially close to her younger brother, Louis, and her mother. Her father was a banker and civil servant, owned a mansion in Metz and a country estate, and was a follower of VOLTAIRE. Though her mother nominally participated in the Church's liturgies and had her children receive the sacraments, the family was essentially nonbelieving, involved in politics and SOCIAL JUSTICE instead of religion. Nonetheless, at her First Communion, twelve-year-old Anne Eugenie felt lovingly drawn into the presence of God. Within the next few years, disaster struck. Her father's banks failed, and he lost his money. The family homes were sold, her parents divorced, and she was taken to Paris with her mother while Louis went to Switzerland with their father. When she was fifteen, her mother became ill with cholera and died suddenly.

Anne Eugenie spent the next few years lonely and confused. At first she went to live with wealthy, worldly relatives whose shallow social lives left her empty and seeking for something more. Her father then sent her to live with Catholic cousins, whose narrow piety she found suffocating. In 1836, however, one of the cousins invited her to attend the Lenten conferences at Notre Dame in Paris, an event that changed her life. Abbe Lacordaire's preaching convinced her that Jesus Christ and his Church were the answer to the social problems her family had tried to address as she was growing up. She decided to devote herself to the Church, which she saw as the key to advancing all that is true and good. Not long after, another priest, Fr. Combalot, heard her confession. Fr. Combalot had long desired to found a congregation dedicated to Our Lady of the Assumption, and he was convinced it was God's will for Anne Eugenie to found a religious order dedicated to spreading the Kingdom of Christ through education. Anne Eugenie had already begun to desire to become a religious, and she embraced Fr. Combalot's plans as God's will for her.

Anne Eugenie founded the Religious of the Assumption at age twenty-two and took the name Marie Eugenie of Jesus. In 1839 she and a few other women began a life of prayer and study in a small home near the church of St. Sulpice in Paris. By 1841 a donor helped the sisters establish their first school. That same year, the women parted ways with Fr. Combalot and, under the guidance of a priest appointed by the archbishop, made their religious profession in August. Among the growing community was Kate O'Neill, an Irish woman who would take the name Therese Emmanuel and offer lifelong friendship and support to Marie Eugenie. Another lifelong friend was Fr. Emmaneul d'Alzon, Marie Eugenie's spiritual director and founder of the Augustinians of the Assumption in 1845.

Marie Eugenie and her sisters were devoted to an active life rooted in contemplation. They sought to embrace the modern world and transform it through education and living the GOSPEL values. In 1867 the congregation was recognized by Rome, and in 1888 the constitutions were definitively approved. Much of Marie Eugenie's long life was spent establishing new communities in France, England, Spain, Italy, Latin America, and the Philippines. The last decades of her life were marked by acute suffering, first in the deaths of Fr. d'Alzon in 1880 and Therese Emmanuel in 1888, and then in the decline of her own health and eventual paralysis in 1897. She died on March 9, 1898. Today the Religious of the Assumption carry on her work in thirty-four countries.

MISSIONARIES OF CHARITY

(MC; Official Catholic Directory #2710) An international congregation of religious women with both active and contemplative branches, the Missionaries of Charity have as their primary ministry the service of "the poorest of the poor" irrespective of caste, creed, and nationality. Their headquarters are located in Calcutta, India, where the congregation was founded by Bl. Mother Teresa Bojaxhiu (beatified October 19, 2003, by Pope John Paul II). The foundation was approved as a diocesan congregation in 1950 and made a pontifical institute in 1965. The distinctive habit of the Missionaries of Charity, made famous by Mother Teresa, consists of a white cotton sari with a blue border that covers the head, a cincture made of rope, sandals, a crucifix, and rosary. The sisters nurse sick and dying destitutes, including victims of AIDS; teach street children; visit and care for beggars, lepers, and their children; and provide shelter for the abandoned and homeless. They foster special devotion to Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament, and proclaim the Word of God to the spiritually destitute by their presence and the spiritual works of mercy.

In 1985 Mother Teresa, with the help of Fr. Joseph Langford, founded the MISSIONARY OF CHARITY FATHERS, who share the same charism as that of the sisters. These priests aid the sisters through the gifts specific to the priesthood, namely by celebrating Mass and providing the Sacraments to the sisters and the poorest of the poor they all serve.

In March 1997 the congregation elected Sister Nirmala and a council of four sisters to succeed Mother Teresa, who had asked to be relieved of administrative duties because of her poor health. Mother Teresa died later that same year on September 5 in Calcutta, India. At the time of Sister Nirmala's election, the order had some 4,500 nuns working in more than 100 countries. By 2009 there were 5,128 sisters and 757 established houses in 136 countries (Catholic Almanac 2010, p. 487).

MISSIONARIES OF CHARITY FATHERS

The founding of the Missionaries of Charity Fathers is the result of a coming together of two desires: the desire of a young American seminarian, Joseph Langford, to dedicate his future priesthood to the charism of MOTHER TERESA OF CALCUTTA, and the desire of Mother Teresa that her work for the poor be "completed" by extending her charism, already being lived by the Missionary of Charity Sisters and Brothers, into the ministerial priesthood.

Co-Founder of the Order. In 1972 Langford, then an Oblate of the Virgin Mary (O.M.V.) pursuing his priestly studies in Rome, first encountered Mother Teresa by means of a book written by the English journalist, Malcolm Muggeridge (1903–1990), Something Beautiful for God: Mother Teresa of Calcutta (1971). And although the book immediately aroused in him an interest to share somehow in Mother Teresa's work, as yet no priestly branch of the MISSIONARIES OF CHARITY existed. Upon communicating this desire to his confessor, the young Langford was advised to continue with his priestly formation with the Oblates until such time that God would make more clear how he might give expression to this desire to serve Mother Teresa's charism.

In keeping with this desire, at the time of his ordination in 1978, Langford requested of Mother Teresa that she entrust to his priestly intercession one of the homes of the sisters, thus establishing a "spiritual adoption" between him and her work. In response, Mother committed to his priestly patronage Kalighat, the home for the dying in Calcutta. This marked the informal beginning of bringing together the two desires: uniting to the charism of Mother Teresa the gifts of the ministerial priesthood, thus enriching both.

Priest Co-Workers. The following year (1979), Fr. Joseph proposed to Mother Teresa that other priests be allowed to do the same. Mother asked him to put his thoughts on paper, which he readily did. It was thus that the idea of the Priest Co-Workers of Mother Teresa was conceived. Mother, while enthusiastic, did not immediately give her full consent to the project. Not until August of the following year (1980) did Mother, arriving in the United States after a visit to her sisters in Haiti, request that Fr. Joseph, then stationed in St. Louis, Missouri, meet her in New York City. There she confided to him that, "Jesus would not let me sleep until I agreed to do something for priests." The two set out at once to begin work on the statutes of the Priest Co-Workers (PCW).

On November 1 of that same year, Mother met with the Holy Father, JOHN PAUL II, to discuss the PCW with him. The pope encouraged the proposal and requested that the Secretary of State, Cardinal Agostino CASAROLI, ask the Sacred Congregation for the Clergy to assist the PCW at its inception. As a result, the movement was approved by the same Sacred Congregation on the feast of the Sacred Heart, June 26, 1981. At this time, acting upon Mother's request, the name Priests Co-workers was changed to Corpus Christi Movement (CCM).

Corpus Christi Movement. As a clerical movement, CCM grew quickly. But at the same time, because members of the movement shared in Mother's charism from afar and were not directly involved with her work, Langford's desire to dedicate his priesthood to Mother Teresa's charism was still not fully realized. Moreover, being a religious himself and coming from a religious formation, Langford desired to live Mother Teresa's charism as a religious, not as a secular priest. In September 1982, Mother expressed her desire to begin this community for priests, but then hesitated. "She then asked Fr. Langford the same obedience that she had received after her inspiration of September 10, 1946: that he not think of the idea of such a community again" (Kolodiejchuk 1992, p. 3). It remains a little known fact that at the origin of Mother Teresa's work for the poor, far from mere human pity, stands a "decisive mystical encounter with Christ" which took place on a train journey to her annual retreat in 1946; September 10, to be exact. This encounter has come to be known among MC's simply as "Inspiration day" (Kolodiejchuk 2007, 39).

In the meantime, after nearly two years of existence, in the spring of 1983 the Sacred Congregation for the Clergy sought, for the sake of CCM's stability, to connect it to an already existing clerical institute that would care for its growth as well as support its aim of extending the Missionaries of Charity (MC) charism and spirituality into the priesthood. Langford's congregation, the Oblates of the Virgin Mary, declined to accept responsibility for CCM.

Corpus Christi Fraternity. It was then that on July 16, 1983, Langford, who had been recently re-stationed in Rome, experienced in prayer what he felt was a divine confirmation of his desire to begin a priestly community dedicated to Mother Teresa's charism. Newly emboldened, he approached Mother, who at that time was recovering from a serious heart condition at Salvator Mundi Hospital in Rome. Langford started by telling Mother that he had disobeyed her order of September 1982, but that he was convinced that the time to start a priestly community was now. In reply, Mother put her finger to her lips as if to quiet Langford. Pausing for a moment, she then responded: "Mother already knows ... Now we must ask the Church" (e-mail from Fr. Langford, October 27, 2009).

And so on July 19, the two went together to the Sacred Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life (SCRSI), where they were strongly encouraged to pursue the inspiration. For various reasons, the new group was to begin as a secular institute, to be known as Corpus Christi Fraternity. It was to have two branches: one whose primary commitment would no longer be to a diocese or other religious institute, but to the charism of Mother Teresa and the spreading of its message and spirituality within the Church, especially by means of renewal of the priesthood; this branch would also be responsible for the animation and guidance of the Corpus Christi Movement. While the members of the latter would also live Mother's spirituality, they would remain incardinated and work in their own dioceses.

On July 25 of that same year, 1983, Mother Teresa and Fr. Joseph attended the Holy Father's Mass at CASTEL GANDOLFO, where John Paul II gave his verbal approval to the CCF project, asking the two to soon return to discuss the details. On August 17, they did just that. This time Mother Teresa presented to the pope a handwritten page drafted by Fr. Joseph describing the purpose and aim of CCF, pro memoria. John Paul took the sheet in hand, signed and dated it, and added the words: "with my blessing."

Mother Teresa lost no time. She immediately phoned Cardinal Terrence COOKE of New York, asking if the new community of CCF could begin there. He assented. Thus, on August 22, 1983, the cardinal presented Mother with a letter establishing the CCF as a pious union of the archdiocese of NEW YORK. On August 28, Mother helped the first members of the community move into their new home in the South Bronx. Langford was not present, as he was still awaiting exclaustration from the Oblates, which he was granted on September 12.

The first members of CCF were Langford; Brian Kolodiejchuk, who since September of 1981 had expressed interest in being part of such a community should it become a reality; a Spanish seminarian until then studying in Rome, Pascual Cervera (as of 2009 with the archdiocese of Toledo, Spain; head of CCM for priests, relaunched by Mother Teresa shortly before her death in 1997); and Fr. Gary Duckworth, an Oblate in Argentina, who arrived some months later, in the Spring of 1984. Duckworth first came to know Mother as a lay volunteer in Calcutta in 1976 and, like Langford, had long desired to serve her charism as a priest.

During the first year of the CCF existence, the desire of Langford and other founding members to live as religious grew. As a result, in October 1984, when Mother asked Fr. Joseph to come to Rome, where she was to address an international priests' retreat (cf. Forrest 1987, pp. 72–75, 107–114), he hoped to ask her permission for CCF to take one final step from being a secular institute to becoming religious. But before he could raise the issue, Mother herself shared with him her desire that CCF become a religious institute. So the two again went to SCRSI to ask permission for the change, which was readily granted. As Providence would have it, on October 13, 1984, traveling together by plane back to New York from the international priests' retreat, Mother gave the new religious institute its name—Missionaries of Charity Fathers. The two desires had now borne fruit.

Missionaries of Charity Fathers. The small community of MC Fathers began attracting vocations from many parts of the world. For a number of reasons, but particularly so that "their roots might be placed among the very poorest of the poor," after four years in the archdiocese of New York, on June 28, 1988, the MC Fathers moved to Mexico and established their mother house in the border city of Tijuana (Kolodiejchuk 1992, p. 6). From there, the community branched out, making new foundations shortly thereafter in Mexico City; Rome (1992); Calcutta (1993); Tamahu, Guatemala (2001); Nairobi, Kenya (2001); Mseki, Tanzania (2005); Shillong, Northeast India (2005); and Guadalajara, Mexico (2009). As of 2009, the MC Fathers had nine foundations in all, with thirty-eight priests. Their habit consists of a gray clerical shirt, gray trousers, a cross worn over the heart, and sandals. Moreover, on March 25, 1992, the institute was recognized canonically as a clerical religious institute of diocesan rite.

Missionaries of Charity Charism. Theologically speaking, every institutional charism has three constitutive elements (Cencini 2004, pp. 111–122). First, there is a mystical experience from which an institute takes its origin. This experience of the Spirit in turn gives rise to both a particular ascetical way of life as well as specific apostolic ministry. Taken together, these three elements: mystical experience, ascetical way of life, and apostolic ministry give adequate expression to what is intended when speaking of an institutional charism.

Applying this theological description to the charism of the Missionaries of Charity, one marvels at the power and fecundity of the grace of September 10, because all five branches of the MC Society draw inspiration and orientation from the mystical experience or THEOPHANY that Mother Teresa received on that train journey to Darjeeling in 1946. It was this experience that lay at the source of her burning charity for the poorest of the poor. Though she was not a theologian, Mother clearly understood this: "The strong grace of Divine Light and Love Mother received on the train journey to Darjeeling on September 10, 1946, is where the MC begins—in the depths of God's infinite longing to love and to be loved" (Mother Teresa to the Missionaries of Charity Sisters, April 24, 1996). Specifically, Mother's experience was that of an intimate personal encounter with the thirst of Jesus dying on the CROSS "for love and for souls," the same Jesus who is "hidden in the poor." Mother herself described this extraordinary experience, or founding grace, in the following way: "For me Jesus' thirst is something so intimate—so I felt shy until now to speak to you of September 10th—I wanted to do as Our Lady 'who kept all these things in heart'" (Langford 2008, p. 56). As a result, the content of the grace of 1946 remained somewhat shrouded.

In fact, Mother's reticence to speak openly of the grace of September 10 was well known to her followers. "Among the missionaries of charity, it was understood that the one thing you could not ask Mother Teresa was about the grace of the train" (Langford 2008, p. 40). Perhaps the most conspicuous clue she left behind regarding what actually happened on that train in 1946 are the two words which she had placed beside the crucifix in every MC chapel around the world: "I thirst" (John 19:28). For his part, Fr. Langford had long intuited that Jesus' thirst and September 10 were intimately united at the heart of Mother's mystery. In fact, he was so convinced of this that he ventured to do what others dared not:

> On her next visit to New York, in early 1984, I finally had both reason and opportunity to ask her about the experience of the train.... I explained to her that, for me, the only thing that made sense of her placing "I thirst" in her > chapels, was that it grew out of her own experience of the thirst of Jesus, and most importantly, that her encounter with the divine thirst had been the heart and essence of September 10.... I waited in silence for an answer. She lowered her head for a moment, then looked up and said, "yes, it is true." Then after a pause, she added, "and one day you must tell the others." (Langford 2008, p. 46)

This "telling the others" would later coalesce into an essential MCF ministry, that of diffusing Mother's charism into the Church and the world.

The ascetical way of life that flowed from Mother's mystical encounter was, in the first place, the living of the three evangelical counsels of poverty, chastity, and obedience, which she had been doing with great fidelity for eighteen years as a Loreto nun, but now with a marked radicality (Mother Teresa 2007, pp. 28–38), even to the point of identifying with the poor, "to live with them, like them, so as to get at the people's heart" (Mother Teresa 2007, p. 50). Moreover, the tenor of this vowed life would be modeled after and animated by the IMMACULATE HEART OF MARY in a spirit of loving trust, total surrender, and cheerfulness. The MCs refer to these qualities of soul as "the spirit of the Society," and they spring from one's personal encounter with the grace of Mother's theophany of September 10.

From these two elements—the mystical experience and ascetical way of life—then flows the apostolic ministry of the MCs, one which goes in search of Jesus hidden in the poorest of the poor. The MCs express this "zeal for souls," as Mother would call it, in a fourth vow by which they bind themselves to free and wholehearted service to the poorest of the poor.

In Mother's Footsteps. Following in Mother's footsteps, the aim of the Missionaries of Charity Fathers is "to quench the infinite thirst of Jesus Christ on the Cross for love and souls by the profession of the three evangelical counsels and wholehearted and free service to the Poorest of the Poor" (Langford 2004, p. 16). To cite Mother's own words:

> MC Fathers complete the Missionary of Charity family—all one heart and charism in the Heart of Our Lady. Thank God for our charism and way of life—our mission—has already been approved by the Church since 1950 with our sisters and since 1963 with our brothers. Now it is my desire to extend this same approved way of life and mission by making our Fathers a diocesan institute. The life and mission of the Fathers is not something new or different, they complete the larger religious family of Missionaries of Charity and share in the same patrimony. (Mother Teresa 1992)

So the MC Fathers complete the work of the MC Society, by putting their priesthood at the service of Mother's charism. They also share the one way of life handed on by Mother and lived by the other branches of the society. Intense prayer, community life, and one-to-one service to the poorest of the poor are like the three pillars of the MCF vocation. The fact that the MC Fathers live the charism of Mother Teresa within the ministerial priesthood adds a unique specificity to their particular call within MC. As Mother used to say: "What you can do I cannot, what I can do you cannot, but together we can make something beautiful for God." Concretely, Fr. Langford's desire, aroused in 1972, to dedicate his priesthood to the charism of Mother Teresa has borne fruit and, over time, coalesced into three specific and concrete MCF ministries.

First of all, the ministerial focus of MCF is priestly service to the poorest of the poor being served by the other branches of the society, and then to "go in search" beyond. Secondly, MCF gives spiritual assistance to the other branches of the MC Society through the gifts proper to their priesthood (e.g., retreats and seminars). Thirdly, MCF has been charged by Mother herself (Langford 2008, p. 50) to bring the message of Jesus' thirst to the world at large through preaching, retreats, spiritual direction, and catecheses in her charism, so that all may be enriched by the gift God gave to the Church through Mother on September 10, 1946. In this way the MC Fathers "complete the work," as Mother would say, and fulfill the aim for which they were created: to satiate the thirst of Jesus dying on the Cross "for love and for souls" and be "one heart full of love in the Heart of Our Lady."

MISSIONARY SISTERS OF ST. PETER CLAVER

(SSPC, Official Catholic Directory #3990); also known as the Sodality of St. Peter Claver for the African Missions; a congregation with papal approbation (1910) founded by Countess Bl. Maria Theresia LEDÓCHOWSKA (beatified October 19, 1975, by Paul VI) in 1894 for the purpose of giving help to the African missions, especially by means of the apostolate of the press. Countess Ledóchowska, encouraged by Cardinal Charles LAVIGERIE, had begun to publish in 1889 the magazine African Echo (later published in eight languages) and had founded an association of lay persons called the Anti-Slavery Committee. Instructions received from LEO XIII in 1894 led her to found the sodality, which was first approved as a diocesan congregation by Cardinal Johannes Haller, archbishop of Salzburg, Austria, in 1897. As the number of religious increased, a house with a well-equipped polyglot press was opened at Salzburg; later, other houses were established in various nations and in Rome, where the generalate is located. The sisters established their first foundation in the U.S. in 1912. As of 2009, the sisters had 42 houses in 23 countries on five continents. The U.S. headquarters is in Chesterfield, MO.

MIT BRENNENDER SORGE

During the Nazi regime, programs of censorship silenced radio broadcasts and newspapers, and local churches were often the only places where the Catholic German population heard voices of protest against Nazism. Among the senior clerics who challenged the Third Reich in its racist and anti-Christian policies were Bishop Clemens Count von GALEN of Münster, Archbishop Konrad von Preysing of Berlin, Cardinal Adolf Bertram of Breslau, Cardinal Charles Joseph Schulte of Cologne, and Cardinal Michael von FAULHABER of Munich. The latter's series of ADVENT sermons aroused national and international interest and concern.

Pope PIUS XI (1922–1939) himself was also a vocal critic of the Nazi regime. On one occasion he infuriated the Nazis by openly declaring to a group of pilgrims, "Spiritually we are all Semites." He also publicly condemned HITLER in the 1937 encyclical Mit brennender sorge (With Burning Sorrow).

Events Leading up to the Encyclical. Despite a 1933 Vatican concordat with Germany, Nazi persecution of German clergy increased. Catholic groups were assaulted, and Church property was confiscated. As early as December 1933, Cardinal Faulhaber publicly condemned ANTI-SEMITISM. On November 4, 1936, he reproached Adolf Hitler for not respecting the terms of the concordat. German bishops joined him in sending a letter to Pope Pius XI, asking him to write an encyclical about the problems of the Church in Germany. They sought a formal condemnation of the ATHEISM and the assault on religious liberty perpetrated by the Nazi Party.

On January 16, 1937, Vatican Secretary of State Eugenio Pacelli held a secret meeting in Rome. Present were Cardinals Schulte, Bertram, and Faulhaber, as well as Bishops von Preysing and von Galen. In the presence of the pope they discussed the fifty-five communications, written in German, that were sent by the secretary of state to the German government between 1933 and 1936. They asked the pope formally to condemn Nazism, and the pope decided to publish an encyclical that would do so in strong and no uncertain terms. When the cardinals and bishops congratulated the pope, he pointed to Cardinal Pacelli and said: "Thank him! He did it all" (Paganuzzi 1988, pp. 28–29).

Summary of and Reaction to the Encyclical. Pius XI's encyclical recognized that the Nazis were intent on a war "of extermination" against the Catholic Church. After countless attempts at diplomacy were rebuffed, the pope had decided to make a final stand. The encyclical was not written in the usual Latin but in German to facilitate wider dissemination in Germany. Prepared under the direction of Cardinal Pacelli, who was fluent in German, the encyclical was aimed directly at the Third Reich. It strongly criticized German violations of the concordat with the Holy See and of human and religious rights in general. It publicly condemned anti-Semitic German legislation, denounced the attacks on the Catholic faith, and assailed Nazi ideology and political practices.

The encyclical was smuggled out of Italy, copied, and distributed to parish priests to be read from all Catholic pulpits in Germany on PALM SUNDAY, March 14, 1937. Its anti-Nazi message was clear:

> Whoever exalts race, or the people, or the State, or a particular form of State, or the depositories of Power, or any other fundamental value of the human community—however necessary and honorable be their function in worldly things—whoever raises these notions above their standard value and divinizes them to an idolatrous level, distorts and perverts an order of the world planned and created by God; he is far from the true faith in God and from the concept of life which that faith upholds (no. 8).... None but superficial minds could stumble into concepts of a national God, of a national religion (no. 11).

Reaction to the encyclical was immediate. The Nazis confiscated copies, arrested printers, and seized presses. In one parish, seven girls were arrested inside the church as they handed out copies after the Palm Sunday Mass. The following day, Das Schwarze Korps remarked that it was "the most incredible of Pius XI's pastoral letters: every sentence in it was an insult to the new Germany." A formal protest was sent from Berlin to Rome. Dozens of clerics found themselves arraigned on charges of immorality and slander against the Nazi state.

Pius XI had stated that the Church of God will defend its rights and its freedom. Catholic reaction was enthusiastic; the Jewish community and the international community were pleased by this strong condemnation of Nazi racism. Hitler, however, was furious. From the pages of Mein Kampf to the Table Talk, Hitler made his contempt for Christianity and its Jewish roots perfectly clear. Arrests multiplied in Germany, and in schools portraits of the Führer replaced crucifixes.

On July 17, 1938, The New York Times printed excerpts of the pope's condemnation of Nazi and Fascist notions of race, blood, soil, and nation, in which he spoke of "excessive nationalism—which we have already had painful occasion to denounce as erroneous and dangerous." The newspaper continued reporting on the matter through the autumn and winter of the same year, despite protests from the Fascists and Nazis, who claimed the pope was improperly interfering in political matters.

In a 1962 article on the encyclical which appeared in the German periodical Stimmen der Zeit, Fr. Robert Leiber wrote: "It is significant that the first initiative of the Holy See toward the government in Berlin concerned the Jews. As early as April 4, 1933, ten days after the Enabling Act, the Apostolic Nuncio in Berlin was ordered to intervene with the government of the Reich on behalf of the Jews and point out all the dangers involved in an anti-Semitic policy." The Catholic Church did not protest simply on behalf of Church interests during negotiations of the concordat, but on behalf of persecuted Jews as well, in response to an announcement of a major boycott of Jewish businesses. When Pope Pius XI died on February 12, 1939, the Union of American Hebrew Congregations issued a statement, printed in The New York Times the following day, offering sympathy to its friends in the Catholic Church: "He was a lover of peace and humanity.... His life was an inspiration and his passing is a loss to the people of all religious faiths." No doubt, this eulogy was merited in part by the pope's courageous encyclical Mit brennender sorge.

Rabbi Joseph L. Lichten wrote that in 1940 Pius XII sent out a secret instruction to the Catholic bishops of Europe titled Opere et caritate (By Work and Love). The letter began with a quotation from Mit brennender sorge, and ordered that all people suffering from racial discrimination at the hands of the Nazis be given adequate help. The letter was to be read in churches with the comment that racism was incompatible with the teachings of the Catholic faith. Responding to Pius XII's document, the Dutch bishops issued a pastoral letter condemning Nazi brutality, thus provoking the Nazis who retaliated by sending Dutch Jews to the extermination camps. Indifferent to the dignity of man and the rights of the human person, totalitarian governments sought to implement a "final solution" for undesirable races, groups, and individuals.

Even prior to March 2, 1939, when Eugenio Pacelli became the successor of Pope Pius XI, Das Schwarze Korps referred to him as the "Chief Rabbi of the Christians, boss of the firm of Judah-Rome."

MODERNISM

Broadly speaking, the term modernism designates a conviction that reconciliation between religious tradition and modern culture is possible and moreover crucial to the progress of both. This conviction has assumed a variety of historical expressions: One may speak of a "modernist impulse" in American Protestantism, an English Modernism that arose within the Anglican communion, and, within Catholicism, Roman Catholic Modernism.

Toward the end of the "long nineteenth century" (roughly coincident with "La Belle Époque," 1890–1914), a series of initiatives took shape within Roman Catholicism aimed at bringing the Church into a closer relation with modernity and a more constructive engagement with it. Acquiring the label Modernism around 1903, initiatives for intellectual and structural reform of Catholicism received Vatican condemnation under that name in 1907. Stigmatized in the encyclical Pascendi dominici gregis as the "synthesis of all heresies," Modernism was presented as a coherent doctrinal system. Its philosophical roots were exposed, and the extent of its inroads into multiple areas of Catholic intellectual and practical life were alarmingly portrayed.

The Vatican definition of Modernism did not go uncontested at the time and must be seen as part of the historical dynamic of positioning the movement, rather than as a definitive statement of Modernism's substance and the motivation of its partisans. While not neglecting perspectives offered by Pascendi, current scholarship views Modernism as a collection of loosely organized tendencies, reflecting great diversity among and within their regional expressions. Scholars today thus use a more inductive approach, taking account of writings by innovators and their critics, in preference to the deductive, neoscholastic procedure followed in the encyclical.

In any effort to understand Modernism, it must be kept firmly in mind that this label did not emerge from within the movement itself, but was applied first by critics, then given currency by the Vatican condemnation. Though accepted by partisans of reform, until that point they identified themselves in other terms: as liberal Catholics, Reform Catholics, advocates of a Catholic Progressivism, Sillonists, or Christian Democrats. This diversity of self-designations points to the complexity of the phenomenon and suggests why precise definition remains a difficult and contested enterprise.

MODERNISMS

France. France is pivotal to an understanding of Modernism. Many of those who came to be identified with the movement were French and these figures exercised disproportionate influence in other regions of the Church. Indeed, PIUS X called Modernism the "French disease."

In the last quarter of the nineteenth century, French Catholicism experienced an intellectual renaissance, stimulated in significant measure by the establishment of the Instituts catholiques and the contacts they afforded with the French Université. In Paris, an early influence was exerted through the teaching, mentoring, and writing of the Church historian Louis DUCHESNE. The circle of students he gathered included Alfred LOISY, Pierre BATIFFOL, and Marcel HÉBERT, all of whom would contribute to a broad movement of reform. Loisy went on to achieve notoriety through his voluminous output in biblical exegesis and for his L'Évangile et l'Église (1902), the book that may be said to have precipitated the Modernist crisis. Pierre Batiffol, himself a prolific writer on the history of the Church, later assumed the rectorship at the Toulouse Institut catholique. Closely allied with the Dominican biblical scholar Marie-Joseph LAGRANGE, director of the École biblique at Jerusalem and founder of the Revue biblique in 1892, Batiffol would grow increasingly uneasy with the more extreme tendencies among innovators and, toward 1900, adopt an openly critical posture toward Loisy and his supporters. These men created outlets for their research, Duchesne first with the Bulletin critique, later Loisy with the Revue d'histoire et de littérature religieuses, and Batiffol with the Bulletin de littérature ecclésiastique. A series of International Congresses of Catholic Scholars initiated in France (Paris 1888, 1891; Brussels 1894; Fribourg 1897; and Munich 1900) afforded a wider forum for critical scholarship and reinforced hopes for the prospects of biblical and historical studies within Catholicism.

Seconded by others who applied historical critical methods in their research—notably Albert HOUTIN in his critique of the legends surrounding the apostolic origins of French dioceses, the Bollandist Hippolyte DELEHAYE in his critical appraisal of hagiographical literature, and Joseph TURMEL in his forays into the history of doctrine—these scholars were in the forefront of efforts to assess and revise traditional positions in light of a modern historical consciousness. In Loisy's case, especially, this led to a conviction that a new synthesis was necessary to bring the ancient teaching and practice of the Church into conformity with minds formed by modernity. The extent to which the tradition would have to undergo revision became a source of disagreement among radicals, moderates, and progressives, although this division became apparent to reformers only gradually and was not always clear to their critics.

A second research front opened in philosophy with Maurice BLONDEL's L'Action (1893). Although Blondel's intentions were initially not well understood by Catholics, his book was welcomed by those who were seeking an alternative to the traditional APOLOGETICS based on miracle and prophecy. Blondel's attempts to clarify his positions in the Lettre sur les exigences de la pensée contemporaine en matière d'apologétique (1896) unleashed a storm of controversy, eliciting from critics accusations of KANTIANISM, subjectivism, and errors concerning the relation between the natural and supernatural orders. In reality, Blondel was not attempting to replace the objective neoscholastic approach of articulating and defending the faith, but rather trying to take account of the necessity of preparing minds to receive the Catholic case for a supernatural revelation. His method of IMMANENCE, which took greater account of the element of subjectivity in human knowing, was mistaken for a doctrine of immanence, and censured accordingly. In Histoire et dogme (1904), he renewed his criticism of the EXTRINSICISM of neoscholastic approaches, while also rejecting the historicism (i.e., doctrine of immanence) he found characteristic of Loisy's work. The latter, Blondel believed, risked eliminating the supernatural from history, thus compromising the objectivity of faith. He proposed a broadened notion of tradition as a via media between the two positions he criticized. Once again, such a stance testifies to the internal diversity of the larger movement for renewal.

Other philosophers in France followed Blondel's lead in proposing alternatives to the regnant

SCHOLASTICISM. Blondel's close collaborator, the Oratorian Lucien LABERTHONNIÈRE, argued for a legitimate autonomy of philosophy vis-à-vis theology. Working independently of these two philosophers, but closely following the work of Duchesne and Loisy, Marcel HÉBERT stressed the subjectivity of knowledge to the point of rejecting THEISM. Impressed by Darwinism, he advocated an impersonal law of evolutionary development as the ontological ground of reality. He quietly left the Church in 1903.

The combined effects of historical criticism and post-Kantian philosophy had repercussions for the traditional understanding of dogma. Logical approaches to its development which understood that process as a matter of conceptual clarification, or of making explicit what had been implicit in the deposit of faith, were superseded by a more organic notion of continuity and change on the model of the child growing into the adult. This led to changes in the very notion of dogma itself, exemplified in the Bergsonian philosopher Edouard LE ROY's explosive article, "Qu'est-ce qu'un dogme?" (1905), which sparked controversy within reformist ranks as well as drawing fire from scholastic theologians.

This series of loosely connected initiatives aroused fears within the hierarchy regarding their impact not only on Catholic scholars but on the clergy more broadly. Related, but somewhat independent activities in the social and political arena raised analogous fears over the consequences of liberal ideas for the laity. The encyclical Rerum novarum (1891), together with LEO XIII's call for French Catholics to rally to the Republic, stimulated involvement among Catholics in the social and political questions of the day. The Sillon (the "Furrow") began as a movement among younger Catholics to educate themselves in the social teaching of the Church and the social conditions of French society, in hopes of influencing French workers through personal interaction. By 1906 the Sillon was becoming increasingly politicized and, although disavowing any connections with "doctrinal Modernism," attracted criticism. Sillonists were accused of wanting to democratize the Church and of weakening the spirit of submission to the hierarchy through their claims for autonomy of action in the political sphere. The Semaines sociales, a sort of floating summer university designed to propagate Catholic social teaching, generated fears of IMMANENTISM and confusion between the natural and supernatural orders. Although Pascendi did not itself use the term social Modernism, it legitimated integralist perceptions of "sociological" applications of the doctrinal errors condemned by the Holy See. Despite this linkage of sociological and doctrinal errors in Pascendi, leading social Modernists differed in their attitudes toward intellectual Modernism. For example, the abbé démocrate Paul Naudet expressed sympathy for Loisy's work, whereas his political ally Hippolyte Gayraud remained committed to NEOTHOMISM and published harsh criticisms of L'Évangile et l'Église and its successor volume Autour d'un petit livre (1903).

Italy. A second important area of Modernist activity was Italy, where the intellectual concerns so prominent in France found resonances in the work of various scholars. Giovanni Genocchi and Giovanni Semeria found support in Francophone biblical scholarship for their own contributions, while Ernesto BUONAIUTI adopted critical perspectives in his investigations into the history of the Church. Those more philosophically inclined also found an alternative to NEOSCHOLASTICISM in Blondel's philosophy of action or could turn to representatives of pragmatism closer to home.

In Italy, however, social Modernism played a larger role and for some became the defining set of issues in adapting Catholicism to the culture. Like Gayraud in France, Romolo MURRI was a convinced Thomist who also championed democracy through his Lega democratica nazionale. In this combination of THOMISM and democracy he was representative rather than exceptional among other early Christian Democrats in Italy. While unsympathetic to new departures in philosophy and historical criticism, Murri's Thomism attempted to accommodate evolution and historical change. To the extent, then, that he could be considered a representative of Modernism, his was a Modernism of a most unusual kind. Like its counterparts in France, Italian Christian Democracy clashed with the hierarchy over an insistence on autonomy of political action. In 1906 the pretensions of "so-called autonomous Christian Democrats" were censured in the encyclical Pieni l'animo, and priests were forbidden to join Murri's league.

A third current of reform in Catholic Italy descended from liberal Catholicism and centered on Antonio Fogazzaro, whose Il santo (1905) expressed reformist aspirations in novelistic form. The short-lived review Rinnovamento, edited by Ajace Antonio Alfieri, Alessandro Casati, and Tomasso Gallarati Scotti, laymen notable for their intelligence and piety, provided a forum for innovating ideas. Similar publications included Salvatore Minocchi's Studi religiosi, Buonaiuti's Nova et vetera, and Murri's Cultura sociale.

Just as Francophone critical scholarship played a catalytic role among Italian Catholic intellectuals, motivating them to work along parallel lines, Catholic activists in France, Belgium, and Germany gave stimulus to Italian social Catholicism. Common to all of these reformist currents in Italy was a conviction that reform of civil society depended on religious and cultural reform of the Church, making the latter a matter of some urgency for them.

England. Although it lacked the Catholic culture of France or Italy, England contributed two of the most prominent representatives of Modernism. Working as an independent scholar, Baron Friedrich von HÜGEL turned his extensive knowledge of biblical scholarship to support of exegetes rather than to original research. His extensive contacts among both Catholic and non-Catholic scholars increased mutual awareness of research and could be drawn upon to elicit additional sources of support. His social position gained him access to members of the hierarchy, although advice on theological matters coming from a layman was not always appreciated.

English Modernism highlights another dimension of the movement: its connection to religious experience. Von Hügel's Mystical Element of Religion (1908) is another indication that Modernism was not an abstract, purely intellectual affair but engaged spirituality. This finds reinforcement in George TYRRELL's contributions. While conversant with the work of French authors mentioned previously, Tyrrell's writings exhibit his contact with the experience of souls who sought his spiritual counsel. Both von Hügel's and Tyrrell's influence was greater on non-Catholics within England, and on Catholics outside of the country, than on their English coreligionaries. In Tyrrell's case, especially, this sphere of influence was extended by the translation of writings into French and Italian and their dissemination in American journals.

The United States. In the United States, groups centered in St. Joseph's Seminary, Dunwoodie, and at the Catholic University of America provided conduits for the ideas of European thinkers, either by publishing their articles or by writing about their ideas, in the pages of the New York Review, the Catholic University Bulletin, the Catholic World, and the American Ecclesiastical Review. Earlier, John ZAHM had made a case for biological evolution in a series of articles, culminating in his Evolution and Dogma (1896). Presentation of his ideas at the International Scientific Congress at Fribourg the following year reinforced Roman fears that evolutionary ideas were spreading. Because the theory of evolution was frequently used in support of MATERIALISM and AGNOSTICISM, and because a preference for an empirical approach to the problem ran counter to a deductive scholastic method, advocacy of the theory was judged a threat to Catholic doctrine. Zahm's book was placed on the Index, although the decree was not made public.

The Fribourg congress also provided occasion for an address by Denis O'Connell that extolled the American tradition of separation of church and state, and appealed to the figure of Isaac HECKER as an exemplar of reconciling Catholicism to the modern age. Hecker's ideas as filtered through admirers were more hotly debated in France than in the United States. French controversies strongly shaped Vatican perceptions in the condemnation of the Americanist heresy in Testem benevolentiae in 1899, which viewed AMERICANISM as yet another consequence of a defective relation between nature and grace. Americanism as actually articulated by its proponents shared with Modernism a heightened historical consciousness, a critical attitude toward the traditional apologetics, and a determination to present the faith in modern terms. Both movements encouraged a climate of intellectual freedom. Modernists like William Sullivan and Joseph Slattery put a characteristically American stamp on the movement by judging the practical and ecclesiological concerns raised by Americanists more relevant to effecting radical reform of Catholicism than the intellectual products of European thinkers.

Germany. In Germany, attempts to overcome the cultural and political marginalization of Catholics that was a product of the KULTURKAMPF were termed REFORMKATHOLIZISMUS. Less a deliberate movement than a cluster of Catholic scholars united by similar, though distinct, efforts to bring Catholics into the mainstream, Reformkatholizismus had an agenda that encompassed a diversity of issues—ranging from a reconciliation of faith with developments in natural science to advocacy of pastoral changes that would liberalize Catholic practices. Its adherents were loyal to the Church, and intended to remain within its basic structures. Most preferred the name "progressive Catholicism" as a designation for the tendency.

To a degree, Reformkatholizismus became identified with Americanism, notably through the work of Franz X. KRAUS and Hermann SCHELL. Several of the latter's works found their way on to the Index in 1906. Americanist ideas on the relation of church and state resonated with German Catholic concerns, which on the whole remained more practical than doctrinal. Thus, practical Modernism became the focus of Vatican attention in Germany, particularly in regard to lay Catholic involvement with social issues. Here there was fertile ground for Integralist creation of bonds between intellectual Modernism and social Modernism, leading to a perception of greater solidarity between the two than was the case.

From this survey of reformist initiatives, it appears that Modernism cannot be limited to a largely internal Catholic affair, peripheral to mainstream intellectual and cultural history. It forms part of a larger engagement with human experience, with epistemological issues bearing on the problem of the nature of external reality, and with DETERMINISM, concerns that were shared with the major intellectual currents of the era.

ACTION BY CHURCH AUTHORITIES

The final decade of Leo XIII's pontificate was marked by a series of efforts to contain liberalizing tendencies. Among those may be noted the encyclical Providentissimus Deus (1893), which sought to address issues surrounding science and the Bible, but failed to adequately address historical problems that were becoming increasingly neuralgic. In 1897 the Holy Office issued a decree on a matter of textual criticism, resolving it by authoritative fiat rather than by historical investigation. The announcement of the establishment of a Pontifical Biblical Commission raised hopes that future decisions would be influenced by exegetes instead of dogmatic theologians, but its actual staffing under the next pontificate rendered its decisions staunchly traditionalist. The encyclical Graves de communi (1901) was addressed primarily to Italian Christian Democrats, encouraging their involvement in social concerns within the framework of Rerum novarum, but declaring "Christian Democracy" to be entirely nonpolitical. This stricture had a dampening effect on the movement and contributed to Murri's eventual break with the Church.

Under Pius X, individuals increasingly came under censure. Five of Loisy's books were placed on the Index in 1903, followed by works of Laberthonnière (1906, 1913), Batiffol (1907), Turmel (1908, 1909, 1910, 1911), Murri (1909), Buonaiuti (1910), and Duchesne (1913)—among others. While the Index proscribed without specifying the errors of these works, Lamentabili sane exitu and Pascendi dominici gregis supplied the general substance of Modernist errors. These measures, in responding to fears of Modernism, served only to deepen these fears. Further sanctions followed: For their public opposition to the papal condemnations, Tyrrell and Loisy were excommunicated. Von Hügel narrowly escaped excommunication. Laberthonnière was silenced. Murri incurred excommunication in 1909 (although he was later reconciled to the Church), Buonaiuti in 1925, and Turmel in 1930.

In the period before 1907, anxieties over the growing radicalization of reformist initiatives were growing. At stake was a sense that not only were doctrines specific to Roman Catholicism under attack, but Christianity itself was being undermined in heretical Christologies and assaults on scriptural inspiration and inerrancy. Moreover, the very future of religion itself was feared to be at risk, as critics naturalized the supernatural and rendered religion a merely human product. In this climate, Pascendi censured Modernism as the "synthesis of all heresies." In doing so, it did some synthesizing of its own.

Pascendi identified the most intensely problematic aspects of Modernism as philosophical. Modernism's foundational error, according to the encyclical, is agnosticism, which finds its complement in the doctrine of immanence. Together, they provide a naturalistic basis for the religious sense, which is perceived as evolving over time, like the symbolic expressions that derive from that sense. Thus, the third Modernist principle is evolutionism. These structuring principles find expression in a variety of ways: From the Modernist as philosopher, Pascendi proceeds to the Modernist as historian, as believer, as theologian, as critic, and as apologist. If the facets of the Modernist personality are multiple, so too are the objects of his passion for reform. While the encyclical concentrates on the intellectual side of Modernist efforts, the more practical measures of Americanism and social Modernism are also addressed. One of the more controversial assertions of the condemnation is its characterization of Modernists as a conspiracy of false Catholics who covered the extent of their agenda by publishing their positions piecemeal, in order to insinuate their ideas surreptitiously. The encyclical claims to lay bare the foundational errors of a concerted effort, the perpetrators of which are castigated for allegedly being motivated by intellectual pride and curiosity.

Pascendi's final section brought together a series of measures to control theological innovators and their ideas. An oath against Modernism was instituted in 1910 and the Index remained active. In the climate that followed the encyclical, reinforced by Integralist denunciations, reviews ceased publication or changed their editorial policies; scholars lost their positions, or withdrew into teaching from the manuals; and those who had espoused reformist ideas withdrew into a prudent silence when they did not repudiate their former positions. Although World War I brought a new set of issues to the fore, the aftermath of the Modernist crisis had a decidedly chilling effect on Catholic scholarship.

CONCLUSION

Modernism is too complex a phenomenon to be encompassed neatly by Pascendi's systematic definition. Although Modernism has links with various currents of liberal Catholicism, it can be distinguished from earlier forms of the latter through its conviction that a thoroughgoing reform of Catholic theology and ecclesiological structures are a necessary consequence of critical historical investigations, the epistemological implications of modern philosophies, and a developmentalist view of the Church and its identity.

On the one hand, Pascendi in its systematic portrayal of Modernism provides too narrow a view of Modernism. True, there were figures who fulfilled the encyclical's prophecy that beyond Modernism lay ATHEISM. Turmel, Hébert, and Houtin are representatives of this trajectory. Others passed beyond Christianity into forms of theism, as with Loisy. And there were Catholics who could fairly be characterized as lapsing into subjectivism, immanentism, and NATURALISM—such as Buonaiuti, who owned up to his lapses. But this was not true of all partisans of Modernism. Although von Hügel was an active supporter of Loisy (while not always agreeing with his positions), and a prominent figure in the Modernist movement, he certainly cannot be fairly identified with agnosticism, immanentism, and a naturalistic evolutionism. Then too, although the encyclical's highlighting of an antipathy toward scholasticism as a hallmark of the Modernist would apply to Loisy or to Laberthonnière, it would not be true of a Murri or a Gayraud. In short, the complexity of the issues and regional differences make generalizations about Modernism difficult.

If, then, Pascendi's perceptions were not pure fantasy, the climate of what sociologists call "moral panic" prevented the Vatican from distinguishing adequately among the diverse figures who could fall under the umbrella term modernism. Those who adopted a methodological atheism in their research differed from those who espoused a metaphysical form. Those who saw the necessity of taking account of historical development in Church doctrine and structure were not the same as those who naturalized that developmental history. And those who advocated a method of immanence tried to distinguish themselves from those who espoused a doctrinal immanentism. But such distinctions were not always clear and not always made.

It is more fruitful to see both Modernism and Pascendi as representative of different responses to modernity. Their clash was one of opposing worldviews. One side espoused the classicist outlook of neoscholasticism that looked to perennial truth in its dogmatic expression, stressed the objectivity of religious truth, sharply distinguished the supernatural from the natural, and minimized the effects of history and human experience on tradition. Modernists, by contrast, perceived a need to take into account the effects of history on development, leading to new models of that process, with relativizing effects on dogmatic formulas and dogmatic truth; a need to retrieve the practical effects of dogmas to counterbalance an overly conceptual appreciation; and the necessity of integrating human experience into theology. Both positions sought to come to terms with the rationality, objectivity, stress on autonomy, infatuation with science, and belief in human progress that characterized modernity. In their opposition to these elements, traditionalists appealed to an unchanging tradition, ultimately grounded in a supernaturally given revelation of timeless truths, contained in a deposit of faith, of which the Church is the divinely appointed guardian. Progressives of various types understood tradition in an historical, evolutionary, developmentalist way; rather than opposing tradition, they saw themselves in continuity with tradition so understood. "Modernists" in Pascendi's sense were those who took that understanding to lengths that they themselves recognized as incompatible with fundamental tenets of Christianity. Scholars today tend to use Modernists in a broader sense to include all reformers who became stigmatized for taking that understanding to lengths judged incompatible with neoscholastic orthodoxy.

Modernists asked many of the questions that were raised again at Vatican II, which stimulated renewed interest in them and their work. Although the resources for engaging those questions had developed in the interval, an understanding of Modernism remains important for a deeper appreciation of the Council and its implications.

MOLLA, GIANNA (JOAN) BERETTA, ST.

Physician, wife, mother, "MARTYR for life"; b. Magenta, Lombardy, Italy, October 4, 1922; d. Magenta, April 28, 1962; beatified April 24, 1994; canonized May 16, 2004, by Pope JOHN PAUL II.

Gianna Beretta was the tenth of thirteen children of Alberto Beretta and Maria de Micheli, who ensured that she received a Catholic education. Gianna began her apostolate of caring for the sick and elderly as a member of the St. VINCENT DE PAUL Society while she was still in school. Gianna was also a leader in the CATHOLIC ACTION movement, organizing retreats and spiritual exercises. Upon graduating from the University of Pavia with degrees in medicine and surgery (1949), she practiced medicine with her brother Ferdinando at Mesero (near Magenta) and studied pediatric medicine at the University of Milan (1950–1952). After completing her education, she devoted more time to providing medical attention to the indigent.

Gianna enjoyed skiing, mountain climbing, attending the opera, playing the piano, painting, and dressing fashionably. She married engineer Pietro Molla on September 24, 1955. In a letter to Pietro just a few days prior to their wedding, Gianna shared her desire that "with God's help and blessing, we will do all we can to make our new family a little cenacle where Jesus will reign over all our affections, desires, and actions." She pondered how they could "be working with God in his creation" to "give him children who will love and serve him" (Molla 2002, pp. 40–41).

Gianna and Pietro had three children: Pierluigi (b. September 1955), Mariolina (b. December 1957), and Laura (b. July 1959). In the second month of her fourth pregnancy, Gianna was diagnosed with a large uterine fibroma that required surgical removal. As a doctor, she knew that her best chance for survival would result in the death of the baby in her womb; nevertheless, she pleaded with the surgeon to save the life of her child regardless of the risk to her own life. Her daughter Gianna Emanuela was born April 21, 1962. Gianna Beretta Molla, however, died one week later on April 28. She is buried in a chapel, along with her daughter Mariolina and Pietro's sister Teresina, in the cemetery of Mesero. The chapel contains a mosaic of Gianna, Mariolina, and Teresina praying before Our Lady of Fátima.

The process for Gianna's BEATIFICATION was opened in the Archdiocese of Milan on April 28, 1980. She was declared VENERABLE on July 6, 1991.

The miracle that confirmed her state as BLESSED occurred in Grajau, Brazil, in 1977. There, at the hospital that Gianna's brother, Fr. Alberto, had helped to build, Lucia Sylvia Cirilo received a grave prognosis due to a fistula associated with a stillbirth during her fourth pregnancy. At this time, Sr. Bernardina of Manaus, a Capuchin nurse in the hospital, turned to prayer through the intercession of Gianna Beretta Molla. According to the hospital physician, the woman's fistula was completely healed. Following the investigation of this event and its confirmation as a miracle, Gianna was beatified by John Paul II on April 24, 1994, the year of the family. Her husband and three living children attended Gianna's beatification, during which Pope John Paul II said: "After an exemplary existence as a student, as a girl fully engaged in the ecclesiastical community, as a wife and a happy mother, she offered and sacrificed her life in order that the child she was carrying could live."

The miracle that led to her canonization occurred in 2000 when another Brazilian woman, Elizabeth Comparini Arcolino, lost all of her amniotic fluid in only her third month of pregnancy. After praying to Bl. Gianna, she gave birth to a healthy daughter, whom she named Gianna Maria. Gianna Beretta Molla was declared a saint on May 16, 2004. Her husband and children attended the canonization, during which Pope John Paul II prayed that "our age discover once again through the example of Gianna Beretta Molla, the pure, chaste and fruitful beauty of conjugal love, lived as a response to the divine call!" She has become the patroness of healthcare workers, mothers, professional women, the pro-life movement, spouses, and unborn children.

Feast: April 28 (Archdiocese of Milan).
